

The Electoral Commission

Election 2001
Campaign spending

We are an independent body that was set up by Parliament. We aim to gain public confidence and encourage people to take part in the democratic process within the United Kingdom by modernising the electoral process, promoting public awareness of electoral matters, and regulating political parties.

On 1 April 2002, The Boundary Committee for England (formerly the Local Government Commission for England) became a statutory committee of The Electoral Commission. Its duties include reviewing local election boundaries.

Preface

This is the first report of its kind. It brings together details of the campaign spending by political parties, third parties and candidates at the 2001 general election

The provisions of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, which came into effect for the first time at the election last year, requires parties to provide the Commission with detailed information on their national campaign spending. This report provides a detailed commentary on how they used the funds available to them under the newly imposed spending limits to conduct their campaigns. This kind of information has not previously been available.

Although the Government previously published figures for candidates spending, this report provides for the first time an analysis of the information highlighting the variations in spending patterns between candidates and parties.

By bringing together spending at both the national and local level we are able to see a much fuller picture of the overall spending by parties. I am sure the information in this report will be of continuing interest to parties, academics, media and others with an interest in elections.

The report marks an important step in bringing greater transparency and openness to the campaign spending of political parties. It also highlights a number of challenges for the Commission and parties in dealing with the new regulatory framework.

Executive summary

Spending by political parties

- The general election of 2001 was the first where party campaign expenditure was regulated, following the commencement of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA). PERA introduced spending limits and restricted the number of people within a party who could authorise campaign expenditure.
- The legislation created difficulties of interpretation for The Electoral Commission as well as parties contesting the general election. The Commission advised parties on items that should be included in the campaign expenditure return, including VAT. There was some confusion about the distinction between candidates' election expenses and party expenditure.
- A total of 80 registered political parties fielded candidates at the election and were bound by the new requirements. However, of these parties, only 36 incurred any expenditure that had to be reported to the Commission.
- £26,689,901 was spent across the UK by the 36 parties that incurred campaign expenditure at the election. Of this, £26,258,260 was spent in Great Britain and £431,641 was spent in Northern Ireland.
- £22,348,075 campaign expenditure was incurred in England, £2,523,086 in Scotland and £1,387,099 in Wales.
- Of the total expenditure incurred by parties in the UK, £23,696,932, or 88.8%, was incurred by the Conservative and Labour parties. Of total expenditure incurred 96.7% was spent by parties that won seats at the election.
- All registered parties, including Labour and the Conservatives, were comfortably within the overall national spending limits of £15.384m in Britain and £432,000 in Northern Ireland.
- The main items of expenditure varied across parties. However, common areas of high expenditure among the largest parties in Britain were advertising, transport and unsolicited material to electors. In Northern Ireland, the main areas of expenditure were advertising and party political broadcasts.

- Political parties reported that they had had some difficulty in accurately and consistently categorising expenditure to meet the reporting format. The Commission also identified that there were a number of failures by parties to apportion correctly expenditure between England, Scotland and Wales.
- A number of parties were unaware that PERA made it illegal to pay any claims for campaign expenditure that were received more than 21 days after the date of the poll, or to pay claims that were received during the permitted period more than 42 days after the date of the poll.

Spending by third parties

- For the first time, spending on national election material distributed by groups not fielding candidates for election was regulated.
- A total of 10 organisations promoting a variety of different views registered as recognised third parties during the regulated period for the general election in 2001. This was fewer than the number that had been expected to register. A number of organisations that contacted the Commission about the need to register subsequently took the view that they were not distributing material which fell within the scope of the controls.
- £1,210,510 was spent across the UK by the 10 recognised third parties. Of this, £1,189,195 was spent in Great Britain and £21,315 was spent in Northern Ireland.
- Controlled expenditure of £1,040,663 was incurred in England, £95,825 in Scotland and £52,707 in Wales.

Spending by candidates

- A total of 3,319 candidates stood in 659 constituencies at the 2001 general election, and 3,291 candidates submitted returns detailing their campaign expenditure to the Returning Officer for each constituency.

- Candidates spent just under £11.9 million in total, compared to £12.9 million at the 1997 general election. In real terms, spending decreased by almost 17% compared to 1997. The average amount spent by candidates was £3,581.
- Individual constituency spending limits were calculated by a formula, which took into account the size of the electorate and nature of each constituency. The constituency spending limits ranged from £6,846 in the Western Isles, to £11,957 in the Isle of Wight.
- Over the whole of the UK, 702 candidates (21% of all candidates) spent more than 80% of the permitted maximum in their constituency, while 1,761 candidates (53%) spent less than 30%, including 105 (3%) who declared no election expenditure.
- On average, candidates in Northern Ireland spent more than those elsewhere in the UK, while candidates in Scotland spent less than the average. The average expenditure declared by candidates in England and Wales broadly mirrored that of the UK as a whole.
- Candidates representing the six parties which each fielded more than 100 candidates spent some £10,498,055, while candidates from the smaller parties spent a total of £1,214,042. Independent candidates, or candidates who stood with no description, spent a total of £173,689.
- Candidates from the larger parties were more likely to spend a high proportion of the legally allowed amount.
- Candidates contesting marginal seats were more likely to spend close to the legally permitted maximum. In nine of the Conservative party's top 10 target marginal seats its candidates spent more than 90% of the maximum permitted amount.
- In 26 of the 29 seats that changed hands at the election the successful candidate spent more than 80% of the maximum amount.
- 85% of the total amount declared by candidates (£10,076,830) was spent on publicity, including advertising, printing, publishing and postage or other distribution.
- For a quarter of all candidates (842 in total) publicity was their only expenditure. In contrast, only £63,637 (equivalent to just over half of 1% of all expenditure) was spent on the hire of meeting rooms during the election.
- Fewer than half of all candidates, 1,390 in total, declared personal expenses. The total amount of personal expenses declared was some £306,560, and the average expenditure of those candidates who declared personal expenses was just over £220, up from £110 in 1997.
- Seven candidates declared expenses in excess of the statutory maximum.

Introduction

The Electoral Commission's report on the 2001 general election was published in July 2001 (Election 2001: The Official Results).<sup>1</sup> That report provided an overview of the election and the Commission's assessment of the election campaign, the attitudes of voters and the way in which the election itself was administered. It also contained the official results for all 659 parliamentary constituencies, together with an analysis of the results conducted by a team led by Professors Colin Rallings and Michael Thrasher at the University of Plymouth.

This second companion report contains details of the election campaign expenditure returns submitted by the political parties and candidates that contested the general election, plus the campaign expenditure of recognised third parties.

The report has three main sections. The first part details the national campaign spending of 80 registered political parties that fielded candidates at the election.<sup>2</sup> PPERA introduced for the first time controls governing national campaign expenditure by political parties at an election. Under PPERA, the regulated period during which expenditure must be accounted for is normally 365 days, ending on the date of the poll. However, since the Act came into effect on 16 February 2001, the regulated period for the 2001 general election ran from 16 February to 7 June 2001.

Parties that contested the 2001 general election were required to submit a report to The Electoral Commission detailing all campaign expenditure incurred by the party during the campaign period. For parties that spent less than £250,000, expenditure reports were due by 7 September 2001, and for parties that spent more than £250,000, reports were due by 7 December 2001. Reports submitted by parties that spent more than £250,000 were required to be accompanied by an assessment from an independent auditor. This report is based on the information contained in the returns submitted by the political parties and the results of the Commission's compliance reviews of those returns.

Some of the information on party campaign expenditure published in this volume in relation to the 2001 general election has previously been made public via the Commission's website.

The second part of the report deals with the campaign expenses of registered third-party organisations. These are bodies that do not field candidates but campaign for a party or category of candidates. Non-party organisations and individuals that wished to campaign at the general election in 2001 and spend more than £10,000 in England or £5,000 in Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland were required to register with the Commission and to submit a breakdown of expenditure incurred at the election.

The third part of this report contains details of the election expenses returns of 3,291 candidates who contested seats at the election.<sup>3</sup> Under the provisions of the Representation of the People Act 1983 (RPA 1983), the election agent of every candidate is required to submit a return and declaration of election expenses incurred in the conduct of the election. Previously, a report listing candidates' election expenses was published by the Government and laid before Parliament some time after each general election (the report on the general election of May 1997 was published in February 1999). The Electoral Commission has now taken on responsibility for this function. With the assistance of Returning Officers and Acting Returning Officers in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, The Electoral Commission has received and analysed the information contained in the candidates' expenses returns. We again acknowledge the assistance of Professors Rallings and Thrasher and their team in the compilation of this information.

The role of The Electoral Commission

PPERA gives the Commission a general responsibility for monitoring compliance with:

- Parts V and VI of the Act, which deal with campaign spending by parties and third parties;
- The restrictions and other requirements relating to candidates' election expenses and donations (although the provisions relating to donations did not come into effect until 1 July, after the general election).

Parties are responsible for reporting details of campaign spending to the Commission, within a set period. Following the return of the campaign expenditure reports, the Commission undertook a programme of work to examine the extent of compliance by parties in relation to the legislation (details of the Commission's compliance reviews are set out in the following section). The results of that work have aided the preparation of this document.

Returning and Acting Returning Officers were required to send the Commission copies of the candidates' election expenses returns submitted to them after the election. In analysing the information provided to us it has emerged that some candidates failed to submit expense returns or spent more than the permitted limit

The Commission's compliance focus has been very much on the new controls introduced by PPERA and the need to ensure that parties fully understand the requirements to which they are now subject during a general election. We recognise that our compliance role as regards candidates' expenses requires further development, particularly in the light of the new rules introduced from 1 July 2001. We have started the process by designing a new expenses reporting form and will be considering what other steps might be necessary both to ensure that we can effectively carry out our compliance role and that candidates are fully aware of the rules to which they are subject.

Campaign expenditure by political parties

PPERA introduced new UK-wide controls governing national campaign expenditure incurred by political parties in the period before an election. The legislation regulates the expenditure incurred specifically by parties and is separate from the controls relating to candidates' expenses.<sup>4</sup>

PPERA introduced limits on the amount of expenditure that can be incurred by a political party in the 'regulated period' before an election in response to concerns about the escalating 'arms race' in campaign spending between the major parties and subsequent pressure on fundraising.<sup>5</sup> In order to ensure that parties can comply with these spending limits, campaign expenditure can only be approved and incurred by individuals authorised to do so,<sup>6</sup> and invoices relating to campaign expenditure must be received and paid within specified time limits. Following a relevant election, parties that contested the election are required to submit a report detailing all campaign expenditure incurred by the party to The Electoral Commission. Reports submitted by parties that spent more than £250,000 must be accompanied by a report prepared by an independent auditor.

PPERA defines campaign expenditure as expenses incurred in respect of:

- party political broadcasts;
- advertising;
- unsolicited material;
- manifestos and other documents;
- market research;
- press conferences and dealings with the media;
- transport; and
- rallies and other events.

As well as counting expenditure actually incurred by a party against the expenditure limit, parties are also required to include the cost of notional expenditure on any of the items listed above against the limit. Notional expenditure is any goods, services, property or facilities provided to a party for free or at a discount of more than 10% from normal commercial terms.

<sup>5</sup> For general elections the regulated period is the 365 days ending with the date of the poll, while for elections to the European and Scottish Parliaments and to the National Assembly for Wales and Northern Ireland Assembly, the regulated period is normally four months, ending with the date of the poll. Party expenditure at a local election counts against the spending total only when it falls within a regulated period.

<sup>6</sup> Only the registered party treasurer or campaigns officer, any registered deputy treasurer or campaigns officer, or any person authorised in writing by the registered treasurer/campaigns officer or a deputy treasurer/campaigns officer, are allowed to authorise campaign expenditure.

Thus, if a supporter of a party provided printing facilities at half the normal commercial cost to enable the party to print its manifesto, in its return to The Electoral Commission the party would be required to report the amount paid as a campaign expense, and in addition indicate the value of the discount on the normal price as notional expenditure. Both would count against the party's overall expenditure limit.

The spending limit

The general election of 7 June 2001 was the first at which the new controls on campaign expenditure were in force. Since this provision of PPERA came into effect on 16 February 2001, the regulated period for the election ran from that date to 7 June 2001, rather than for the usual 365-day campaign period.<sup>7</sup> The expenditure limits for the election were reduced by Parliament to account for the shorter regulated period, with parties allowed to incur up to £24,000 for each seat contested, rather than the £30,000 that will normally be applicable per constituency contested at UK Parliamentary elections.

For a party that contested all 641 constituencies in Great Britain, therefore, the overall expenditure limit was set at £15.384m. Since traditionally the main parties do not contest the seat in which the Speaker is seeking re-election, the Labour, Conservative and Liberal Democrat parties could have had a maximum spending limit of £15.36m.<sup>8</sup> The overall Northern Ireland limit stood at £432,000. Although the Conservative Party fielded three candidates in Northern Ireland (and accordingly had a spending limit there of £72,000), this did not affect the expenditure limit that applied to the party in Great Britain.

<sup>7</sup> Campaign expenditure incurred before the regulated period but used for the purposes of the campaign during the regulated period is required to be treated as campaign expenditure. Although in 2001 the legislation was not in force before the regulated period commenced, some parties did include expenditure incurred before 16 February 2001 in their returns on the basis that it had been incurred in connection with the campaign.

<sup>8</sup> The Liberal Democrats withdrew their candidate in the constituency of Wyre Forest, and fielded 639 candidates; they were therefore subject to an expenditure limit of £15.336m.

Parties contesting an election in each part of Great Britain are subject to specific limits for each of England, Scotland and Wales, and are required to apportion expenditure between them. Therefore, the Scottish National Party was subject to the total limit for Scotland's 72 Westminster seats of £1.728m, while Plaid Cymru was subject to the £960,000 limit for Wales' 40 seats. Parties contesting England's 529 seats were subject to a limit of £12,696,000.

For those parties that contested a smaller number of seats, the expenditure limit was either the constituency amount multiplied by the number of seats contested, or: £810,000 in England; £120,000 in Scotland; and £60,000 in Wales, whichever limit was greater.

Interpretation of legislation

The difficulty both for the political parties contesting the election and The Electoral Commission lay in interpreting the new legislation: agreeing which expenditure should be included as campaign expenditure and in what category, assessing what value should be attributed to national expenditure and calculating how the expenditure should be apportioned between nations. Although the Commission had supplied all political parties with guidance on the new legislation governing campaign expenditure when they registered, it also worked closely with parties in the months before and after the election to achieve consistency in the treatment of these issues. The cases raised with the Commission were often complex, requiring the input of the Commission's legal team who, in the absence of any case law, had to enter new territory in advising on whether in their view, various items of expenditure should be included in the return or not.

All three main parties raised similar issues in relation to campaign expenditure. The Commission advised that campaign expenditure should be calculated inclusive of VAT, and that the cost of providing transport facilities for the media was, in its view, campaign expenditure. Parties and other organisations sought guidance on whether the paid secondment of staff from companies and other organisations to political parties for the duration of the campaign was campaign expenditure and/or a donation. The Commission took the view that although the Act excludes salary and other remuneration in relation to normal and temporary party staff from being treated as campaign expenditure, it requires any remuneration to non-party employees seconded to the party, or to agency staff taken on by the party for the campaign period, to be treated as campaign expenditure. In the case of staff seconded to parties, where these services were received for free, the actual cost was regarded as notional expenditure and additionally reported as a donation to the party.

This is one example among many in which there was an overlap between the new controls on donations and campaign expenditure. It is also an area that the Commission will review. The effect of the legislation is to require the inclusion of costs incurred in employing agency staff, but not directly recruited temporary party staff. However, as both are costs incurred directly as a result of the campaign, it would seem consistent for all such costs to be included, regardless of who the employer is. This would require a change to the legislation.

All political parties contesting the election were concerned about the distinction between what should be regarded as a candidate's election expense (and reported accordingly) and what should be classified as party campaign expenditure. Several sought guidance from the Commission on this. The difficulties of interpretation were exacerbated by the lack of any existing clear guidance on what should be included in a candidate's election expenses return. The Commission's view on the matter was that expenses that would previously have been treated as a candidate's election expense and included in an individual's return should still be treated as such, since PPERA did not aim to alter the treatment of candidates' expenses, but to regulate expenditure incurred in addition to these expenses.

However, despite the Commission's efforts to clarify the position, difficulties and some confusion remained, as was evident from the campaign expenditure returns, in which several parties reported expenses that had also been reported as candidates' expenses.

Public and media interest in the campaign

Party campaign expenditure in itself was not an issue at the election. Although there was a substantial amount of coverage about political donations – the first reports of donations to parties coincided with the beginning of the official campaign period in May and the Commission's website recorded large numbers of people logging on to view the first returns – there were fewer reports in the media about the amount of money being spent by the parties during the campaign. Whether this was because it was assumed that the issue of campaign expenditure had been resolved by PPERA, or because the election itself was such that it did not come to the fore remains unclear. However, the media interest in Spring 2002 surrounding party donations and state funding suggests that interest in the finances of political parties rarely remains dormant for long.

Commission guidance

The Commission recognised that further and more substantial guidance was needed in relation to the distinction between candidates' election expenses and party campaign expenditure in addition to other aspects of campaign expenditure. It was decided that this should be produced after the Commission had assessed the 2001 general election returns, since the experience of the election would provide the most useful indicator of where clarification was required. Accordingly, the Commission's post-election work plan provided for a project to produce core guidance on campaign expenditure, to be distributed to parties in time for the 2003 elections to the devolved legislatures. That project is underway and consultations have been held with the political parties on the contents of the guidance. The project is due to be completed by the end of 2002.

Completing and reviewing the expenditure returns

At the end of the election campaign, political parties faced a demanding task in compiling their expenditure returns. Appendix 2 indicates the information that had to be submitted. For all parties, the requirement to submit details of every single item of campaign expenditure, no matter how small, was a stringent one: for parties contesting several hundred seats and spending millions of pounds, the task was enormous. Furthermore, the fact that the returns of parties that spend more than £250,000 on a campaign must be accompanied by an independent auditors' report stating that the return 'fairly presents in all material respects the campaign expenditure incurred by or on behalf of the party' added to the pressure to ensure that full records were kept.<sup>9</sup>

Campaign expenditure returns are required by law to be submitted to the Commission within three and six months of the date of the poll, according to whether a party spent less than or more than £250,000. Therefore, returns from parties that contested the general election were due by 7 September 2001 and 7 December 2001 respectively. On receipt of the returns, The Electoral Commission's compliance team began the task of assessing the parties' compliance with the new controls.

The first step was to ensure that they complied with the reporting requirements: parties whose returns did not meet these requirements were asked to submit the outstanding information to the Commission. In addition, returns in excess of £5,000 were subject to more detailed examination. A number of common issues were identified, such as the apportionment of expenditure across Britain, and the categorisation of expenditure, and initial reports were prepared for the registered treasurer or campaigns officer, requesting further information or clarification of payments and giving points of advice on the return.

Following the issue of the initial reports, the Commission's compliance team visited parties in order to review the control and reporting systems which had underpinned preparation of the campaign expenditure return. The aim of these systems reviews was to gain an assurance that the procedures enabled each party to prepare an accurate and complete expenditure return in compliance with the requirements of PPERA, and particularly that all expenditure had been properly authorised and paid.

The compliance visits were also an opportunity to discuss issues raised in the compliance team's initial reports. In some cases, this meant amending the figures reported to the Commission. This occurred, for example, where parties had incorrectly apportioned expenditure between different parts of Britain or allocated spending to the wrong category. Some items of expenditure were also considered to be outside the definition of campaign expenditure: for example, spending incurred after the regulated period, or on items not regarded as campaign expenditure (e.g., party staff costs).

The compliance process ended with the issue of a final report to each party that confirmed the campaign expenditure totals to be reported and detailed agreed action plans for improvements and the sharing of best practice, as well as providing other points of advice. Further guidance and advice on these improvements and areas of best practice will also be contained in the proposed Core guidance on campaign expenditure. It is intended that the Commission will review progress with parties following the campaign expenditure returns prepared for the 2003 devolved legislature elections.

The compliance reviews were the first carried out by the Commission in relation to national campaign expenditure. The process has been necessarily detailed and lengthy in order to ensure that the returns were properly monitored. It is anticipated that following future elections, where parties will be able to use the Commission's core guidance to help them produce their returns, fewer issues will arise, and the compliance process will be less detailed.

Analysis of returns

Of the 80 parties that contested the election, only 36 reported to the Commission that they had incurred campaign expenditure. The following review deals separately with the returns submitted by parties on the register of parties for Northern Ireland and those on the register of parties for Great Britain.

Returns 1-36 show the information contained in the campaign expenditure returns submitted to the Commission by each party that contested the general election in Britain and Northern Ireland and reported that they had incurred campaign expenditure. The analysis of the returns is based on The Electoral Commission's compliance team's reviews of the returns, and in some cases the original figures submitted in a return have been revised and amended in agreement with the relevant party. Where figures have been amended, a revised return showing original and amended figures is shown.

Parties in the annexed list of parties that contested the general election (Appendix 1), for whom no expenditure is shown, reported that they had not incurred any expenditure separate to that declared to the relevant electoral officer in the party's candidates' expenses returns. As expected, in both Britain and Northern Ireland, several parties that fielded a low number of candidates, in addition to the many individuals that had registered as a political party to allow them to use a description on the ballot paper, submitted this type of nil return.

Some parties mistakenly duplicated in their returns to The Electoral Commission some or all of the information that they had submitted to the Returning Officer, although when checks were made, it was confirmed that the 'party expenditure' reported to the Commission was actually the candidate's expenses.

Northern Ireland analysis

All the parties that contested the election in Northern Ireland constituencies and that incurred campaign expenses spent less than £250,000, and were therefore required to submit returns to The Electoral Commission by 7 September 2001. Returns 30-36 indicate the breakdown of campaign expenditure by each political party.

Table 1 opposite lists the total expenditure incurred by each party, the number of constituencies contested and won, and the average constituency spend by each party. This shows that both the Ulster Unionist Party and the Social Democratic and Labour Party spent several thousand pounds more per constituency than the DUP and Sinn Fein. With the exception of the United Kingdom Unionist Party, which spent just £574 in the single constituency that it contested, the Alliance Party and Sinn Fein had by far the lowest campaign expenditure, at an average of £896 and £1,028 per constituency respectively.

Clearly, some parties have access to greater resources and will spend more than a rival political party during the course of an election campaign. However, a further reason for this differential may be traced to the way in which different parties organise their election campaigns. Some parties appear to prefer greater central spending and others target their spending at constituency level.

Sinn Fein and the Alliance Party are examples of parties that chose to concentrate their activity at constituency level. A comparison of each party's campaign expenditure return and candidates' election expenses return indicates that although both incurred low levels of central party expenditure, they incurred a proportionately greater amount of candidates' expenditure. Sinn Fein, for example, outspent the SDLP in several constituencies despite its relatively low party expenditure. In other seats, the Alliance outspent one or both of the Unionist and Nationalist parties.

Thus, although there is no clear correlation to suggest that the candidates of those parties that spent less centrally spent more than their rivals locally – in fact, candidates of each of the four main parties outspent their rivals in at least one constituency – the figures for both national and local party campaign expenditure enable a general assessment of how parties chose to manage their campaigns. In its compliance checks of the campaign expenditure returns, one of the key points that the Commission considered is whether the political parties that made returns apportioned their expenditure between party and candidates in a consistent manner. However, the Commission found no evidence that parties reported the same type of expenditure differently.

For all of the four main parties in Northern Ireland, advertising – including newspaper advertising and billboard advertising – accounted for by far the greatest proportion of campaign expenditure. There was some concern amongst parties at the rising commercial cost of this, with advertising accounting for more than half of the total party expenditure by the SDLP, UUP and Sinn Fein. The other common item of major expenditure was the party election broadcasts, the production costs of which are borne by political parties. The four main parties in Northern Ireland (the DUP, SDLP, Sinn Fein and UUP) were allowed four party election broadcast transmissions (on each of BBC1, BBC2, UTV and Radio Ulster), and the Alliance Party two broadcasts.

It was up to each political party to determine whether or not to produce a separate broadcast for each transmission, or to repeat the same broadcast. Parties' decisions in this area are likely to have been partly responsible for the significant differences in the amount of money spent by each party on its broadcast(s): the UUP, for example, which produced three broadcasts, spent nearly £25,000 more than Sinn Fein, which minimised costs by producing just a single broadcast using voiceovers.

The remaining campaign expenditure incurred by the main political parties in Northern Ireland varied significantly between parties. While both the DUP and UUP spent substantial amounts on manifestos and other party documents, neither Sinn Fein, the SDLP nor the Alliance spent more than a couple of thousand pounds in this area. The SDLP spent over £35,000 on market research and canvassing, but among the other main parties, only the UUP incurred any expenditure in this area, and even then just £342.

A contrast with the style of campaigning seen in Great Britain is evident from lack of significant expenditure by any party in respect of transport or media. Whereas in the rest of the UK, a substantial proportion of expenditure was incurred in the cost of transporting politicians around constituencies in 'battle-buses' with accompanying media facilities, in Northern Ireland, a considerably smaller geographical area, politicians appeared to travel in a more low-key fashion, by car, covering the costs themselves.

Despite the lack of common trends in the campaign expenditure incurred by political parties in Northern Ireland, there are nonetheless some conclusions that can be drawn.

Overall, the amount of campaign expenditure incurred by parties in Northern Ireland was relatively low. However, parties do appear to target their spending to gain the most benefit. Very little is spent in those constituencies in which a party has no chance of success, and the returns of individual candidates' expenses not surprisingly show a wide variation in the amount of expenditure by the same party across different constituencies. Resources are focused in constituencies where the impact is most likely to deliver success.

Compliance visits to the parties have not revealed that any party has incorrectly reported party expenditure or included candidates' election expenditure in their return. There was therefore a significant difference in national campaign spending between the major parties in Northern Ireland. PPERA can therefore be said to have achieved the aim of transparency in relation to campaign expenditure. In the light of the substantial differentials in spending, it will be interesting to compare the parties' annual accounts when these are first submitted to The Electoral Commission in 2003<sup>10</sup> and the spending by each party at the elections to the Northern Ireland Assembly in May 2003.

Great Britain analysis

The analysis below of the campaign expenditure returns made by political parties in Great Britain considers the general trends, as well as particular spending patterns in individual parts of Britain.

In many ways, those parties that contested the general election in Great Britain faced a significantly more difficult job in controlling and reporting the campaign expenditure that they had incurred in comparison with parties in Northern Ireland. The large number of seats that any one party in Britain can contest (641) and the resulting higher expenditure levels meant that the administrative issues facing parties during the campaign and afterwards were much greater.

Party	No. of seats contested	No. of seats won	Campaign expenditure incurred (nearest £)	Average campaign expenditure per constituency contested (nearest £)
Labour	640	412	10,945,119	17,102
Conservatives	640	166	12,751,813	19,925
Liberal Democrats	639	52	1,361,377	2,130
SNP	72	5	226,203	3,142
Plaid Cymru	40	4	87,121	2,178

Note: Excludes Speaker.

Parties were required to establish internal control systems that were robust enough to extend across those parts of Britain in which seats were to be contested, ensuring that only those people duly authorised by the party treasurer/campaigns officer (or their deputies) incurred campaign expenditure, and that all campaign invoices were paid on time and expenditure fully recorded. Furthermore, the reporting process was complicated by the need to apportion expenditure between England, Scotland and Wales according to the number of candidates standing for the party in each country. This requirement was imposed by PPERA in order to ensure that the campaign expenditure reported included an accurate reflection of the amount of money spent by parties in relation to each part of Britain.

The campaign expenditure returns submitted for Britain reported the expenditure and activity of a wide range of parties, from the country's largest and most represented parties to the much smaller groups that contested just a handful of seats. Returns 1-29 show the amount of expenditure incurred by each party. Four parties (Conservatives, Labour, Liberal Democrats and the United Kingdom Independence Party) incurred campaign expenditure of more than £250,000.<sup>11</sup> The Scottish National Party spent £226,203. Plaid Cymru, the Greens, the British National Party and the Socialist Alliance reported that they had spent between £15,000 and £80,000. A further 20 parties reported that they had incurred campaign expenditure of less than £10,000, in some cases only a few hundred pounds or less.

<sup>10</sup> Part III of PPERA, which requires that registered parties submit their annual accounts to The Electoral Commission for inspection, came into force on 1 January 2002. The first annual accounts, which must be audited for parties whose accounts are of more than £250,000, will therefore be submitted during 2003.

Problems in categorising expenditure

An obvious area of interest in analysing the campaign expenditure returns is the variation in how each party allocated its expenditure among different types of spending. The eight categories of expenditure used for classification were taken from Schedule 8 to PPERA 2000 (Appendix 3). However, it must be acknowledged that most parties felt that the categories of expenditure specified in the return were limited and somewhat ambiguous, and created difficulties for parties in accurately categorising the expenditure incurred.

Several parties felt that the given categories did not accurately reflect costs such as increased overheads and administrative costs incurred during the campaign, and that it was far from clear in which category certain items should be placed, e.g. dealings with the media and providing transport facilities for them could fall into either the media or transport category. This understandably led to some inconsistencies in how parties reported similar items of expenditure.

In order to improve the comparability of the campaign expenditure returns, the Commission's core guidance project is considering how to clarify the categories of expenditure so that they more accurately reflect how parties spend their money during a campaign. This will be facilitated by the compliance team's examination of the returns, which has revealed much about the indirect costs of the campaign. The returns have highlighted, for example, the substantial amount of money that is spent by parties in supporting those who participate in the campaign, be it politicians, party officials or activists.

For the 2001 election returns, there was no specific expenditure category for individual travel expenses and personal costs (e.g., hotel bills or other costs incurred by party politicians and activists) and thus, while in some instances these costs might have fallen obviously into one category of expenditure (e.g., the hotel costs of those involved in organising a rally in the north), in other cases (e.g., the expenses of party officials who travelled the country working on various aspects of the campaign) it is far less clear which category of expenditure they should be allocated to. For future returns, the Commission may consider a specific category to include this type of costs, in order to reflect the distinction between expenditure on direct campaigning (e.g., market research, printed material, battle-bus costs), and more indirect costs (e.g., expenses claims etc.).

Breakdown of total expenditure: the main three British parties

Table 3 indicates what proportion of overall expenditure the country's largest three parties spent on each specified type of expenditure. In comparing the parties' main areas of expenditure, there is a need to consider the problems of accurately categorising expenditure, as identified earlier. However, even allowing for a degree of uncertainty caused by this, interesting differences between the spending patterns of the Labour and Conservative parties, and in particular between these two parties and the Liberal Democrats, emerge.

For example, the Liberal Democrats spent just under £600,000 on transport, just below 44% of the party's overall expenditure (£1.36m). In contrast, Labour spent nearly £775,000, a much lower proportion of their overall expenditure of £10.95m, while the Conservatives spent nearly £1.49m on transport, out of £12.75m. Compliance reviews have revealed that part of the expenditure reported by the Liberal Democrats was in fact the cost of increased overheads incurred during the campaign period: in the absence of an obvious category in which to report this type of general cost, the party allocated it to the transport category.

However, in spite of this, the fact that the relatively low-spending Liberal Democrats spent around half a million pounds on transport suggests that this level of expenditure on transport is considered a necessity in traditional British campaigning. This accounts to some degree for the substantially lower amount of resources available to the Liberal Democrats for other campaign spending, once travel costs are accounted for.

Table 3: Proportion of total party expenditure spent on different categories of campaign activity

Conservatives	Labour	Liberal Democrats
Advertising (34.58%)	Advertising (45.90%)	Transport (43.58%)
Rallies and other events (15.47%)	Unsolicited material to electors (13.26%)	Media (16.95%)
Market research/canvassing (13.47%)	Rallies and other events (11.73%)	Advertising (14.45%)
Transport (11.66%)	Market research/canvassing (7.94%)	Manifesto/Party policy document (6.69%)
Unsolicited material to electors (9.53%)	Transport (7.07%)	Rallies and other events (5.42%)
Manifesto/Party policy document (8.04%)	Media (6.88%)	Market research/canvassing (4.85%)
Party Political Broadcasts (4.45%)	Manifesto/Party policy document (4.73%)	Party Political Broadcasts (4.07%)
Media (2.80%)	Party Political Broadcasts (2.49%)	Unsolicited material to electors (3.99%)

The differential between the spending on transport by the Conservatives and Labour is also noteworthy, and may in part be explained by the notional expenditure incurred by the Conservative party in respect of helicopter use. The costs of the use of the helicopter, which was provided for the party's use by a supporter, are required by PPERA to be valued at commercial rate. Thus, although the party did not actually incur this level of expenditure, it is required to count it against the overall expenditure limit.

A further example of different spending patterns is the amount spent by each party on advertising: Labour spent £5.02m on advertising, approximately 45% of its entire campaign spending. The Liberal Democrats spent considerably less, at close to £200,000, or just under 15%. Conservative spending on advertising fell in between, at 35% (£4.41m) of their total expenditure.

It is interesting to assess how the differences in the parties' spending patterns are reflected in how they conducted their campaigns. As stated earlier, both the Labour and Conservative campaigns relied heavily on advertising. Both parties ran widespread billboard advertising campaigns that had been planned and started several months in advance of polling date. In contrast, the Lib Dem campaign centred on more traditional methods of campaigning, such as daily London press conferences (reflected in the high proportion of media expenditure) and traditional bus tours.

Other parties and trends

The other high-spending party was the United Kingdom Independence Party. UKIP incurred expenditure of £743,904 during the campaign. However, a large proportion of this expenditure (£588,398) was notional expenditure, and only £150,260 was actually spent by the party.<sup>12</sup> The bulk of UKIP's spend was notional expenditure on party advertising: a party supporter paid £524,876 on the party's behalf for advertisements promoting the party and its main message. After advertising, the majority of the party's expenditure was on unsolicited material distributed to electors (£147,351) and the party political broadcast (£39,421). The party also spent significant amounts on rallies and other events, and on producing the party manifesto.

The Green Party incurred a smaller but still significant amount of expenditure, spending £44,912 in contesting 135 seats in England and six seats in Wales (the independently registered Scottish Green Party contested four seats in Scotland, spending just £440). The bulk of this expenditure was devoted to the production of the party's election broadcast and manifesto: £21,545 was spent on the party's election broadcast, including the costs of establishing a telephone hotline to respond to queries relating to the broadcast, while £16,855 was spent on the party manifesto. The party also spent over £3,000 on dealings with the media, and over £1,000 on unsolicited material to electors.

A number of other medium-sized parties reported that they had incurred expenditure that ran into thousands of pounds: the Communist Party spent £5,614 (largely devoted to party policy documents and advertising); the Marxist Party spent £2,078 (including £1,777 on the party manifesto and other policy documents); and the Socialist Alliance spent £27,062. The Alliance, which fielded 92 candidates in England, spent over £12,000, £5,000 and £4,000 on party advertising, broadcasts and policy documents respectively. Like the Socialist Alliance, the ProLife Alliance, which spent £8,010 contesting 27 seats in England, three seats in Scotland and seven seats in Wales, also concentrated its expenditure on advertising, the party broadcast, and party policy documents (£3,527; £2,245; and £2,108 respectively). The Socialist Labour Party spent £9,855 across England, Scotland and Wales contesting 114 constituencies.

The British National Party reported that it had spent over £15,000, solely on the production and distribution of unsolicited material to electors: however, compliance reviews revealed that the expenditure reported was actually candidates' expenses. The Co-operative Party, which fielded 29 joint candidates with Labour, reported that it had incurred £8,373 across England, Scotland and Wales: a small proportion of this figure was its share of the money that had been spent on the joint candidates in terms of party advertising, but the more significant amount (£6,818) was the cost to the party of producing its own manifesto, which outlined its independent aims. The Pensioner Coalition, which fielded just one candidate, spent nearly £5,000 on party advertising and the party manifesto, out of a total spend of £5,243, while the Liberal Party spent £2,422 in contesting 14 seats, the majority of which (£1,659) was spent on media activities.

Other small parties also reported varying levels of expenditure, such as the Muslim Party (£2,484), Fancy Dress Party (£151) and Pacifist Party (£2,154). It appears that in the case of some, but not all, small parties expenditure reported in candidates' election expenses returns may also have been reported to the Commission.

A notable feature is that the pattern of spending by smaller parties is different to that of the larger parties. Although advertising accounts for a major proportion of expenditure by parties of all sizes, along with party broadcasts where parties are entitled to them, smaller parties spend much higher proportions of their campaign budget on party policy documents, including manifestos, and considerably less on transport, media, market research, etc. This is entirely consistent with the fact that smaller, less well-resourced parties are less likely to be able to fund more expensive media or market research-based projects. With less well-known leaders and fielding smaller numbers of candidates, they are also less likely to undertake large-scale campaigning tours, and hence incur lower transport costs.

Apportionment of spending in England, Scotland and Wales

Various problems in the compilation of the returns emerged during The Electoral Commission's compliance reviews. The difficulties in categorising certain types of expenditure, and the resulting difficulties in accurate comparative analysis, have already been described. A further problem reported by some parties that contested the election on a Great Britain-wide basis was the difficulty of apportioning election expenditure to England, Scotland and Wales. This led to some adjustment of the figures reported as having been spent in each part of Britain.

Again, an element of this mis-reporting was undoubtedly due to unfamiliarity with the requirements, with parties required to make subjective judgements about whether to apportion different items of expenditure. However, the result of this is that some of those parties that contested the election in more than one part of Britain under-allocated expenditure to Scotland and Wales, leading to the initial reporting of lower levels of overall expenditure in these countries than was actually incurred, and conversely, a disproportionately higher amount of expenditure in England.

Whilst the staging of a rally in a certain part of Britain, for example Devon, might obviously be classified as expenditure incurred in England alone, other expenditure – e.g., national advertising campaigns, the cost of press conferences – which clearly impact on the whole of Britain, is required by PPERA to be apportioned. Having decided whether to apportion an item of expenditure, parties then also had to calculate the amount of expenditure to be allocated to England, Scotland and Wales.

PPERA specifies that parties should apportion general expenditure on the basis of the number of seats contested in each part of Britain. In some cases, this was not done, and in several of the returns there are obvious failures to apportion expenditure that should have been divided between each of England, Scotland and Wales. Where expenditure was not apportioned, it was usually attributed solely to England. Examples of this include the failure to apportion the costs of organising tours (in terms of equipment, etc.) that covered the whole of Britain; accommodation costs for people working on national aspects of the campaign; and the costs incurred in the preparation of a party's manifesto.

Compliance visits to the parties revealed that in some cases, there were justifiable reasons for not apportioning expenditure across Britain exactly on the basis of the number of seats contested by a party in each part of Great Britain. Parties were concerned, for example, that where an advert had been placed in a newspaper that does not circulate equally across Britain, they should be able to apportion on a basis reasonably calculated in proportion to the newspapers circulation. In other cases, parties carried out quite separate campaigning in different parts of Britain: for example, market research commissioned in England covered England alone, while market research in Wales was carried out independently; or a separate Scottish manifesto was produced. In these examples, there was no need to apportion the expenditure across Britain.

The returns submitted following the general election in 2001 have been revised to take account of the failure to apportion spending correctly. The Commission will offer advice to parties with the aim of ensuring that campaign expenditure is in future apportioned appropriately to England, Scotland and Wales.

It is worth noting that although parties are required to apportion their expenditure in different parts of Britain, there is no mechanism for regulating party (as opposed to candidate) spending in each individual constituency. Therefore, while parties usually have a nominal expenditure limit of £30,000 per constituency that they contest (£24,000 in 2001), PPERA does not require that parties adhere to this limit in each constituency, but merely that they do not exceed the overall limit which that multiplier gives them. Thus, parties might exceed the £30,000 figure in focussing on key, marginal constituencies, while remaining significantly below it in other seats where the campaign is less critical.

Some individuals who contacted the Commission after the election expressed concern that the ability of parties to target expenditure in this way undermined the election expenses limits imposed on candidates.

One example was of a marginal Scottish constituency targeted by a call centre based in England. Under PPERA, the expenditure of a national call centre of this type should be apportioned between England, Scotland and Wales. However, there is little doubt that the call centre would have targeted certain constituencies over others, and a complainant argued that this should have to be declared, if not by the candidate, then on a constituency basis in the party return. So long as it did not, it was argued, national party machinery helped the candidate to an extent that the party campaign expenditure return did not reflect, and to the detriment of other candidates.

This is an issue that may be raised again in future, although the Commission has no immediate plans for considering changes. The Commission's initial view is that it would be intrinsically difficult to implement a system regulating party campaign expenditure on a constituency-specific basis, given the national nature of most campaigning.

England, Scotland and Wales analysis

As Table 4 shows, the Conservatives outspent Labour in England by over £2 million. Nearly a third of the Conservative Party's expenditure was on advertising (£3.78m), and more than a million pounds was spent on rallies and other events, market research, transport and unsolicited material to electors. Just under half of Labour's expenditure in England was on advertising (£4.11m), whilst over a million pounds was spent on unsolicited material and rallies and other events. The Liberal Democrat's total expenditure in England was £1.10m, of which nearly half was incurred on transport (£485,541) and significant amounts were spent on media (£177,306) and advertising (£160,726). Like the two highest spending parties, UKIP's main item of expenditure was advertising, which accounted for £486,677 of its £693,274 expenditure.

Table 5 shows that in 2001 in Scotland, the Labour Party was the biggest spender, incurring expenditure of £1,113,426. The Conservatives spent £972,967 while the SNP and Liberal Democrats spent £226,203 and £178,146 respectively. The main items of expenditure by the SNP were the party's election broadcast (£38,794), advertising (£51,723), unsolicited material to electors (£65,127) and media costs (£38,551). The party also spent over £10,000 on its manifesto, over £5,000 on rallies and other events, and just under £3,000 on market research and on transport. The Scottish Socialist Party spent £12,332 on its campaign, slightly less than UKIP, who spent over £15,000.

In Wales, too, Labour spent more than any other party with a significantly wider differential between their spending and the Conservatives' than in Scotland. Plaid Cymru's expenditure across Wales' 40 constituencies amounted to £87,121: not far below the Liberal Democrats' expenditure of £103,454 but significantly below the Conservatives' spending of £442,824 and Labour's £710,730 expenditure (see Table 6). Plaid Cymru's main items of expenditure were advertising (£23,549), manifesto costs (£18,544), market research (£17,255), and unsolicited material (£16,007). In addition, the party also spent over £7,000 on its party political broadcast, over £1,500 was spent on dealings with the media and on rallies, but just £249 was spent on transport.

The three main parties that contested the maximum number of seats across Britain apportioned a substantial amount of their overall expenditure on an approximate proportion of 83% (England), 11% (Scotland) and 6% (Wales), reflecting the number of seats contested in each part of Britain. As a result of apportionment, spending patterns in Scotland and Wales by the big parties broadly reflect overall trends, although there were some notable differences in the types of expenditure that were incurred in greater proportions in Scotland and Wales in comparison to England.

For both Labour and the Conservatives, a large proportion of spending in Scotland and Wales was the allocation of party advertising costs in proportion to the number of seats contested. The Conservatives also allocated a large amount of their transport costs to Scotland and Wales, contrasting significantly with the small amounts spent on transport by the two nationalist parties, whilst Labour allocated over £100,000 of spending on unsolicited material.

Neither Labour nor the Conservatives prioritised market research in Scotland or Wales – less than 11 % and 6% of overall spending in this category was spent in Scotland and Wales – in contrast to the Liberal Democrats, who reported a relatively higher level of spending on market research in Scotland. The Liberal Democrats, and to a lesser extent Labour, also prioritised the production of manifesto and policy documents in Scotland and Wales: by contrast, the Conservatives allocated 87% of their expenditure on manifesto documents to England. Indeed, the Conservatives were the only party that allocated more than 83% of their overall spending to England in each category of expenditure.

Unpaid and late claims

One aspect of the legislation that caused difficulties for political parties of all sizes in Britain and Northern Ireland, was the requirement under PPERA for invoices to be submitted not later than 21 days after the end of the campaign period, i.e. 21 days after the date of the poll. Claims received within this time period have to be paid not later than 42 days after the end of the campaign period.

Where claims are not received, or not paid, within the respective time limits, they cannot be paid unless a court order is obtained.

Several parties felt that these requirements were unrealistic and inflexible. Some parties accidentally failed to pay invoices that they had received within 21 days (i.e., by 28 June) by the 42-day deadline (i.e., 19 July). Many were surprised to discover that in paying claims after 19 July, they had not complied with the legislation. Other parties, more familiar with the new requirements, were irritated that they had to seek a court order to pay for claims that, by accident, had not been paid on time. Some less well-resourced parties struggled to meet the payment deadlines because of liquidity problems. Finally, numerous parties expressed the concern that the law simply did not take account of the reality of how commercial firms operate (in that firms do not consider PPERA when sending invoices and demanding payments), or of the fact that the time for sending in and paying claims was the summer holiday period.

When parties contacted the Commission, while compiling their returns, to explain that they had unpaid claims, the Commission advised them of the requirements of PPERA in regard to court applications to pay claims. However, when reviewing the returns, the Commission has taken the decision that, where claims were paid outside of the relevant time period, no action will be taken against the party, since the election was the first time that the legislation had been in place. This is an area of PPERA that the Commission intends to keep under review.

Controlled expenditure by recognised third parties

Part VI of PPERA introduced limits on the amount of 'controlled expenditure' – that is, expenditure incurred in producing election material supporting a category of candidates or party – that can be incurred by organisations not themselves fielding candidates for election. The aim of this part of the Act is to ensure that third parties intending to spend significant sums at elections are subject to similar controls as political parties.

Third parties that do not register with The Electoral Commission are restricted by the legislation from spending more than £10,000 in England, and £5,000 in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland respectively. Organisations or individuals that choose to register with the Commission as 'recognised third parties' are allowed to spend substantially more on election material,<sup>13</sup> but are subject to the requirements of PPERA in terms of the controls and reporting requirements relating to campaign expenditure and donations.<sup>14</sup>

The regulated period: third parties

Interpretation of the legislation

Organisations wishing to campaign had to decide whether to register as a recognised third party. In order to assess whether or not they might come within the scope of the controls, third parties had to judge whether or not the material that they produced could be classified as 'election material which is made available to the public at large [and] that can reasonably be regarded as intended to promote or procure electoral success for political parties or a category of candidates'. PPERA specifies that material can be regarded as election material 'even though it can reasonably be regarded as intended to achieve any other purpose as well'.

This broad definition caused concern for a number of organisations, and difficulties for the Commission itself, which was asked to provide a view on whether or not publications produced by an organisation counted as election material. Many organisations felt that although they did not consider themselves to be in any way political or supporters of a particular party or category of candidates, the definition of election material was sufficiently wide for them to be in danger of incurring controlled expenditure in excess of the £10,000 (or £5,000) limit. They sought guidance from the Commission, submitting documents on a number of matters including the single European currency, animal welfare and countryside issues.

<sup>13</sup> Recognised third parties may incur up to £793,500 in England; £108,000 in Scotland; £60,000 in Wales; and £27,000 in Northern Ireland, on controlled expenditure during the regulated period of 365 days. These limits were reduced in accordance with the shorter regulated period of 16 February – 7 June and recognised third parties could accordingly spend up to £634,800; £86,400; £48,000; and £21,600 respectively.

<sup>14</sup> Under PPERA, organisations or individuals that register as recognised third parties, like political parties, can only accept donations of more than £200 from permissible donors. Donations of more than £200 from impermissible or unidentifiable sources cannot be accepted and must be returned. Recognised third parties are required to make a report of any relevant donations as part of their controlled expenditure return.

Guidance was also sought on whether material that could be classified as election material, but which was only distributed to the organisation's membership would be considered as 'being made available to the public at large'. The Commission advised that even though organisations might not consider their aims and activities to be political, they might nevertheless produce material that could be defined as election material. However, where material, whether political in nature or not, addressed issues that fell within the aims and objectives of the organisation in question, the Commission's view was that distributing this to their own members would not bring them within the scope of PPERA. The Commission did emphasise, though, that if the material referred to matters outside the aims of the organisation, it could be subject to the controls. In several cases the Commission advised that the material produced could potentially be regarded as election material, and that it might therefore be prudent to register as a recognised third party.

The Commission also received a number of enquiries from trade unions about whether the preparation and distribution of material to members constituted controlled expenditure. Again, the Commission advised that under normal circumstances,<sup>15</sup> members of unions received material in their capacity as union members rather than as members of the general public, and that this was therefore not controlled expenditure. However, the Commission stressed in all cases that organisations should seek their own legal advice, and that it might be prudent to err on the side of caution.

Registration

The Commission had advertised in the national press the requirements for third parties to register, once the election had been called. In the event, only 10 organisations registered as recognised third parties (these organisations are listed at Appendix 4). The majority of the recognised third parties had not been in contact with the Commission prior to their registration. In the case of a number of organisations that did seek clarification of their position, many chose to reject the Commission's more cautious approach, taking the view that their publications were not election material and that they therefore did not need to register as a recognised third party.

It has been noted that several organisations that traditionally distributed material relating to an election were not among those that registered with the Commission as recognised third parties. It remains to be seen whether this is because they took the view that PPERA did not apply to their activities, or because they were deterred from their usual activity by the new legislation. However, research by academics at the University of Sheffield<sup>16</sup> suggests that in the case of trade unions, PPERA did not act as a deterrent. Their report focused in particular on how the new legislation impacted on those trade unions that are affiliated to the Labour Party. (It makes the point that unions that are not affiliated to the Labour Party are prevented by their constitutions from advocating a political party, and therefore would not campaign in support of a party or category of candidates, regardless of the introduction of PPERA.)

The report found that, although the late passage of the PPERA and subsequent difficulties associated with the interpretation of it had caused uncertainty, the legislation had not deterred trade unions from at least some of their usual activity in seeking to persuade their members to vote for the Labour Party. Thus, the main reason for the fact that just three trade unions registered as recognised third parties appears to be due to the Commission's advice that the distribution of internal material to union members was not controlled expenditure, and not because union campaigning had been reduced by the PPERA. The report's authors also felt that, despite the non-registration by many unions, there remained a 'willingness to register and commit resources to open campaigning should circumstances arise in which such campaigning was deemed necessary'.<sup>17</sup>

<sup>15</sup> Normal circumstances were defined as expenditure that was met from a trade union's political fund, as provided for under the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidations) Act 1992.

A further complicating factor was the restrictions governing the activity of registered charities. Several organisations that contacted the Commission about PPERA were registered charities, and therefore subject to clear guidelines on the political activities in which they can engage. For some, registration as a recognised third party might have implied that these guidelines had been breached, and this could have restricted some activity.

However, at least one organisation that the Commission advised to register under its broad interpretation of 'election material' took the view that as its activities were within the Charity Commission's guidelines on political activity it did not need to register. This suggests that there may be some inconsistency between the definition of political material under PPERA and charity law.

Others have suggested that the opinion polls giving an apparently clear majority for the ruling Labour Party in the weeks leading up to the general election might alternatively have been a factor in deterring third parties from taking an active role in the election.

Whatever the precise reasons, it must be acknowledged that the legislation governing third parties did not have the impact that might have been anticipated, and that the number and differing types of organisations that might have been expected to register did not choose to do so. The Commission intends to review the law in relation to third parties in order to ensure that there is greater clarity in relation to the need to register.

For those organisations that did register as recognised third parties, similar issues arose in the estimation of controlled expenditure as had occurred for political parties and campaign expenditure. In some respects, organisations that were not ordinarily engaged in political activities (unlike political parties) faced more difficulties in assessing whether their expenditure should be treated as controlled expenditure and reported to the Commission. Unlike the statutory exclusion of party staff costs from classification as campaign expenditure, for example, the Commission advised recognised third parties that they must include all costs incurred in the production of election material as controlled expenditure, including staff costs. The difficulty in separating these costs became apparent when the returns of expenditure from recognised third parties were received.

Third parties' expenditure

Recognised third parties were required to submit different information in their expenditure returns than political parties. Appendix 5 shows the information that had to be submitted. Recognised third parties were, however, subject to the same compliance process as political parties. As with political parties, the requirement to provide a detailed return of relevant expenditure was a demanding one, made more difficult by continuing uncertainty about whether to include certain costs.

Returns 37-46 show the total amount of controlled expenditure incurred by each recognised third party. The reports they submitted varied significantly, reflecting both the breadth of organisations and activities and the uncertainty over the need to register. In fact, four spent less than the threshold required for registration.

There were significant differences in the spending reported by the trade unions that registered as recognised third parties. The return submitted by the Manufacturing, Science and Finance Union (MSF) revealed that it had not in fact needed to register, having spent just £4,726 across Great Britain on two leaflets that outlined the record of the Labour government and urged people to apply for a postal vote to ensure that they cast their vote for Labour.

<sup>17</sup> The report did find, however, that PPERA had had an effect in terms of reducing the amount of in-kind donations (usually the secondment of union officials to work for the party during the campaign period) to the Labour Party, which in turn affected the party's campaigning at local level. It also recommended that Parliament increase constituency spending levels.

The Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers (Usdaw) reported that it had spent £84,279 on its campaign. Usdaw aimed to promote itself (in terms of what the union does for its members) and the Labour Party jointly. Therefore it distributed promotional products (bags, posters and ballots etc.) featuring a joint Usdaw/Labour message, to both members and non-members. There was no question that this was election material regulated by PPERA.

Compliance reviews revealed that the union had spent a large proportion of this expenditure (£61,780) prior to registration as a recognised party, and that just £22,499 of the expenditure was incurred after the union was registered. The Commission wrote to the union to advise it of the law, but decided not to take further action on this occasion.

Unison was the highest spender amongst the recognised third parties, and the only recognised third party required to submit an audit report to support its return, having incurred £774,796 of expenditure across the UK. The funds used by the union to support its campaign were from the General Political Fund, which is supported by members of Unison who do not wish to wish their levies to be paid directly to the Labour Party.

Consequently, Unison reported that it had not received any donations in support of its campaign, since the contributions that support the fund are less than the reporting threshold for individual donations. £772,016 of Unison's expenditure was spent on national advertising, featuring a billboard campaign and a series of adverts across the national press.

After Unison, the other high-spending recognised third parties were Charter 88, an organisation committed to promoting constitutional reform, and the Democracy Movement, an organisation campaigning against the single European currency. These two organisations are both examples of organisations that took the view that they might be caught by PPERA as their campaigns featured a distinctly political message.

Charter 88 contacted the Commission at an early stage after PPERA came into effect in February 2001 in order to seek clarification of its status under the Act. As an organisation that is issue-focused, it could be argued that Charter 88 is not obviously political. However, on the basis that some candidates have an obvious sympathy for the organisation's objectives, it had been advised that it was potentially caught by the provisions of PPERA. The Commission took the view that Charter 88's publications, which were intended to outline the organisation's views and directly compare them with the views of candidates, could reasonably be regarded as election material.

Charter 88's spending, was concentrated on publications and advertising. The organisation's advertising campaign was the most expensive part of the campaign, and accounted for around £136,000 in design and publication costs. Adverts appeared in sections of the national media and included one that was more directly political in that it attacked the Labour government for not calling a referendum on proportional representation.

In its return, Charter 88 reported that it had received over £170,000 of funding from the Joseph Rowntree Reform Trust, an organisation with charitable status that seeks to promote social research and democracy. This funding, which was paid in March and May 2001, was sufficient to cover Charter 88's £154,144 spending on its 'Unlocking Democracy' campaign. The campaign covered England alone.

Compliance reviews revealed that Charter 88 had incurred £13,292 of expenditure prior to registering as a third party, in excess of the allowed limit of £10,000. The Commission wrote to the organisation to advise them of the law, but decided not to take further action on this occasion.

The Democracy Movement took an actively political role in the campaign, spending £103,300. The organisation targeted individual sitting MPs who support the introduction of the euro in the UK, taking advantage of amended legislation that allows third parties at constituency level to spend up to £500 in backing or disparaging an individual candidate.

The returns submitted by third parties are not required to report expenditure by type, but the invoices and receipts submitted in support of the return indicate quite clearly the traditional campaigning methods in which the Democracy Movement was engaged at local level: invoices show that the organisation produced numerous leaflets and newspapers for delivery in various parts of Britain. In addition, the return includes invoices for newspaper adverts, for PR work on a 'Keep the Power' campaign, as well as for local distribution of unsolicited materials.

The activities of the Yes Campaign, South Molton Declaration, and Campaign for an Independent Britain during the regulated period were less clear, although they appear to be concerned with the UK's relationship with Europe and/or the single currency. The Yes Campaign's return indicated that it had incurred £404 of expenditure before registering with the Commission, but just £185 after that date, and had received donations worth £668. The Campaign for an Independent Britain received donations of £1,550, spending just short of £1,700 across the UK. The organisation's expenditure would appear to be connected to a public meeting and a general election manifesto. The South Molton Declaration, a small organisation that campaigns on a pro-Britain platform, incurred the bulk of its total of £20,915 expenditure on large-scale advertisements in the national press.

Tacticalvoter.Net Limited spent £4,615 on a campaign to encourage tactical voting. The return indicates that some of this expenditure was on printing, and various administrative costs. Finally, the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children submitted a return stating that it had incurred £61,452 prior to registering as a recognised third party. Compliance reviews confirmed that this was controlled expenditure, since the organisation had run billboard and magazine advertising campaigns. The Commission therefore wrote to the organisation to advise it of the law, but decided not to take further action on this occasion.

Campaign expenditure by candidates

Following a parliamentary election and within 35 days after the declaration of the result, the agent of each candidate must submit a complete statement of election campaign expenses to the returning officer for the constituency in which the candidate stood, together with a declaration by the candidate verifying the return. For most constituencies at the 2001 general election, that date was 13 July 2001.<sup>18</sup>

Under RPA 1983, candidates' election expenses at the 2001 general election were defined as 'expenses incurred, whether before, during or after the election, on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of the election.'<sup>19</sup> A more detailed description of the items that might fall within the definition of election expenses is given below. At a parliamentary general election, a candidate's election expenses relate only to his or her expenses in a particular constituency, and do not cover expenses incurred in promoting a party in a particular part or parts of the UK.<sup>20</sup>

Upon receipt of a candidate's expenses return, the Returning Officer must supply a copy of the return to The Electoral Commission, and make it available for public inspection for the next two years. The Returning Officer must also publish a notice of election expenses returns for the constituency, including details of any candidates failing to submit a return, in at least two local newspapers. Any person may exercise the right to inspect the returns.

Prior to the implementation of Schedule 18 of PPERA on 1 July 2001, the form of the return to be submitted by candidates was prescribed by RPA 1983, and included a number of separate headings giving details of certain categories of expenditure. Since 1 July 2001, The Electoral Commission may prescribe a form of return for election expenses (Section 81 (10A) of RPA 1983), although candidates and agents are under no legal obligation to use the prescribed form.

The Electoral Commission asked Returning Officers to complete a separate form detailing the expenses of candidates in each constituency. With the assistance of a team led by Professors Colin Rallings and Michael Thrasher at the University of Plymouth, we have collated the information in these forms. The main table of candidates' expenses (Table 14 page 99) details the total amount spent by each candidate in their election campaign. These election expenses are categorised under the headings which were specified in the form required by RPA 1983, and which have been published in previous election expenses reports.<sup>21</sup>

For those constituencies where the result was declared before midnight on 7 June, the last day for the return of election expenses was 12 July 2001.

<sup>21</sup> Reports of election expenses were previously published jointly by the Home Office, Scottish Office and Northern Ireland Office. The report of the May 1997 general election was published by the Stationery Office in February 1999.

Under electoral law, there are a number of offences pertaining to non-compliance with the legal requirements relating to election expenses. Failure to submit a return within the given time period is an illegal practice.<sup>22</sup> Knowingly incurring election expenses in excess of the statutory maximum limit is also an illegal practice.<sup>23</sup> An illegal practice is an offence under the criminal law as well as an act that has consequences under electoral law, and a person convicted of an illegal practice may be penalised by a fine, disqualified from standing as a candidate or acting as an election agent, and the election may be declared void. Knowingly making a false declaration as to election expenses is a corrupt practice,<sup>24</sup> and is also an offence under the Perjury Act 1911.<sup>25</sup> A person convicted of a corrupt practice may be fined, but may also be imprisoned. He or she may be disqualified from standing as a candidate or acting as an election agent, and the election may be declared void.

The outcome of a parliamentary constituency election may be challenged on the grounds of corrupt or illegal practices in connection with election expenses. The mechanism is the issue of an election petition, which can be made by a voter at that election or a voter who had the right to vote in it, or by an unsuccessful candidate or an alleged candidate. An election petition alleging corrupt or illegal practices in connection with election expenses must be made within 21 days after the tenth day after the end of the time allowed for the delivery of candidates' election expenses returns.<sup>26</sup> At a parliamentary election, the petition is tried by two High Court Judges of the Queen's Bench Division, and will usually take place in the constituency. The election court may confirm the result of the election, substitute another candidate as the member, or order the election to be re-run.

An allegation of a corrupt or illegal practice may also be prosecuted through the judicial system. The Director of Public Prosecutions may give authority to the police or the Crown Prosecution Service to prosecute a candidate or agent for offences contrary to the provisions of RPA 1983.

It is important to note that the Returning Officer is under no obligation to check that any expenses return received by him or her conforms to the requirements of electoral law relating to candidates expenses as set out in RPA 1983. Equally, it is not his or her responsibility to initiate proceedings against any candidate who appears to have contravened the legal requirements relating to election expenses. PPERA now gives The Electoral Commission a statutory role in monitoring compliance with the RPA requirements.

Prescribed limits on spending

Each candidate is allowed to incur expenses up to a prescribed limit during his or her election campaign, although his or her agent must make all payments. Expenses subject to this legal limit include payments for agents, clerks, printing and publicity, public meetings and committee rooms, and are discussed in more detail below. However, the legal limit is not required to cover the candidate's personal expenses, which include such things as reasonable travelling expenses or the cost of living in hotels or elsewhere during the election. A candidate at a parliamentary election may incur personal expenses to any amount, although any expenditure over £600 must be paid by the candidate's agent. A statement of the candidate's personal expenses must be sent to his or her agent within 21 days of the declaration of the result of the election.

The statutory maximum limit for candidates' election expenses is calculated separately for each constituency, and is based on a formula that takes into account the size and nature of each individual constituency. The prescribed limit is revised periodically by Parliament, usually before each general election, in order to take account of the rate of inflation since the previous election.

In 2001, this limit was determined in the following way:

- (a) for county constituencies (mainly rural in nature), candidates were allowed to spend 6.2 pence for every

entry in the register of electors to be used in the election, plus a further £5,483;

(b) for borough constituencies (primarily urban and some suburban areas), the limit was 4.6 pence for every elector, plus a further £5,483.<sup>27</sup>

In 2001, the average size of a constituency was just over 67,000 electors. In a county constituency of this size, each candidate would be allowed to spend up to about £9,640. In a borough constituency, the limit would be £8,565. However, given the actual variation in size of the constituencies, the prescribed limit in county constituencies ranged from £6,846 to £11,957, while in borough constituencies the expenses limit ranged from £7,630 to £9,461.

Election expenses

As noted earlier, candidates' election expenses at the 2001 general election were defined as expenses incurred before, during or after an election on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of the election. The specified form of return had previously provided some guidance in identifying what might constitute such expenses, setting out various items that were clearly election expenses. However, these categories, which are listed below, were by no means considered exhaustive, and all items of expenditure would continue to be judged against the statutory definition mentioned above.

- Agents
Fees paid to election agents, sub-agents and polling agents for their duties at the election.
- Clerks, etc.
Payment for clerks and messengers during the election.
- Printing, stationery, etc.
The expenses of printing, advertising and stationery, including issuing and distributing addresses and notices. While the return does not mention expenditure in relation to the use of telephones, faxes and the internet, they would reasonably fall to be included in a return of election expenses, and have been included in this category.

- Public meetings
The expenses of holding meetings during the election, including payments to speakers.
- Committee rooms
Expenses relating to the hire of committee rooms for use during the election.
- Miscellaneous matters
All other expenditure in respect of miscellaneous matters not separately specified.

Spending by candidates

The total number of candidates contesting seats at the 2001 general election was 3,319 – 381 fewer than the number at the previous general election in May 1997. We have received the election expenses returns for 3,291 candidates, and the figures in this report are based on those returns.

A total of 28 candidates were reported to us as not having submitted a declaration of their election expenses to the Returning Officer for the constituency in which they stood, and they are listed in Appendix 6 to this report. Following the election, Returning Officers published notices of candidates' election expenses returns and wrote to all election agents, including those of candidates who had failed to submit an expenses return. A number of Returning Officers also wrote directly to agents of candidates who had failed to submit an expenses return notifying them of their legal responsibilities. The Commission has decided not to take any action against these individuals but will consider what action might be appropriate in the future, in the event of failure to submit returns.

In total, the expenditure declared by candidates (excluding personal expenses) was just under £11.9 million. In real terms, therefore, the total amount spent by candidates at the 2001 general election was almost 17% down on the amount spent in 1997.

The average amount spent per candidate in 2001 was £3,581. However, the variation in the amount spent by candidates was significant. Over the whole of the UK, 702 candidates (21% of all candidates) spent more than 80% of the permitted maximum in their constituency, while 1,761 candidates (53%) spent less than 30%, including 105 (3%) who declared no election expenditure.

* Total includes an extra £484.88. One candidate declared only the total amount spent, without giving detailed figures under the prescribed headings.

A total of seven candidates declared expenses totalling more than the maximum amount for their constituency, and they are also listed in Appendix 6 to this report. Any candidate or agent knowingly incurring election expenses in excess of the statutory maximum limit commits an illegal practice. Relief may be obtained by the candidate or his/her agent against the consequences of acts in which they have not participated, or which are merely due to inadvertence.<sup>28</sup> In particular, relief has previously been granted in circumstances where the legal maximum expenses limit was exceeded owing to a miscalculation of the number of electors, or where the agent or candidate calculated the limit as a county constituency when it was actually a borough constituency.

The Commission has been in contact with these seven candidates (see Appendix 6) and has decided not to take any action against them. However, it will consider what action might be appropriate in similar circumstances in the future.

Spending patterns by nation

The pattern of spending was broadly similar across the UK, with the exception of Northern Ireland. Candidates contesting constituencies in Northern Ireland spent an average of £4,267 (£686 more than the average for the UK as a whole). Only six candidates in Northern Ireland (6% of the overall total) spent less than 10% of the legal maximum, compared to an overall UK figure of 903 candidates (27% of the total). Nevertheless, they were just as likely to spend close to the permitted maximum in their constituencies as candidates elsewhere in the UK, with 22 candidates (22% of the overall total) spending more than 80% of the legal maximum.

Conversely, candidates in Scotland were less likely to spend close to the permitted maximum in their constituencies, with only 53 candidates (13% of the overall total) spending more than 80% of the legal maximum, compared to an overall UK figure of 21%. The overall average expenditure for candidates in Scottish constituencies was £2,916, some £665 less than the average for the UK as a whole. Spending by candidates contesting seats in Wales broadly mirrored those in England, and the UK as a whole.

Spending patterns by party affiliation

As might be expected, candidates representing the larger, more established political parties spent more than those from minor parties or independent candidates. In total, candidates representing the six parties which each fielded more than 100 candidates spent some £10,498,055, while candidates from the 73 smaller parties spent a total of £1,214,042.<sup>29</sup> Independent candidates, or candidates who stood with no description, spent a total of £173,689. Candidates from the four parties fielding the largest number of candidates (Labour, the Conservatives, the Liberal Democrats and the UK Independence Party) also spent a greater proportion of the overall UK total expenditure. While 71% of all candidates at the 2001 general election stood as representatives of these four parties, their campaign expenditure accounted for just over 87% of the total amount spent by candidates.

Many independent candidates and candidates from the smaller parties spent very little on their campaigns:

- Just over half of independent candidates and those who stood without a description spent less than 10% of the maximum permitted amount.
- Only 8% of independent candidates and those who stood without a description spent more than 50% of the maximum permitted amount.

In contrast, candidates representing the larger political parties were more likely to spend a higher proportion of the permitted amount on their campaign:

- Only 17% of candidates representing the four largest parties spent less than 10% of the maximum permitted amount.
- 45% of candidates representing the four largest parties spent more than 50% of the maximum permitted amount.
- 28% of candidates representing the four largest parties spent more than 80% of the maximum permitted amount, compared to an overall average for the UK of 21%.

Of the four parties fielding the largest number of candidates, those representing the Labour and Conservative parties were again much more likely to spend close to the legal maximum in their constituencies than rival candidates from the Liberal Democrats or the UK Independence Party:

- 37% of Conservative candidates and 23% of Labour candidates spent more than 90% of the maximum permitted amount, whereas 9% of Liberal Democrat candidates and only one candidate representing the UK Independence Party spent such a high proportion of the legal maximum.

<sup>29</sup> Candidates who stood for the Conservative Party in Great Britain and Northern Ireland have been treated as standing for the same party.

- 70% of Conservative candidates and 68% of Labour candidates spent more than 50% of the maximum permitted amount. In contrast, 52% of Liberal Democrats and 83% of UK Independence Party candidates spent less than 20% of the maximum permitted amount.

In Wales and Scotland, candidates representing Plaid Cymru and the Scottish National Party were also less likely to spend close to the legal maximum:

- Only 10% of Plaid Cymru candidates and 4% of SNP candidates spent more than 90% of the maximum permitted amount in their constituencies.
- 68% of Plaid Cymru candidates and 69% of SNP candidates spent less than 50% of the maximum permitted amount.

In Northern Ireland, spending by candidates representing the five parties contesting the largest number of constituencies (the Alliance Party of Northern Ireland, the Democratic Unionist Party, the Social Democratic and Labour Party, Sinn Fein and the Ulster Unionist Party) did not follow any clearly defined pattern:

- The average amount spent by candidates from these five parties ranged from £2,348 by Alliance Party candidates to £6,313 by Ulster Unionist candidates.
- Only 10% of candidates representing the Alliance Party spent more than 50% of the legal maximum, while 50% of Democratic Unionist candidates and 41% of Ulster Unionist candidates spent more than 80% of the maximum permitted amount.

Candidates representing the smaller Alliance Party were more likely to spend a smaller proportion of the permitted maximum in their constituency than their opponents from the larger parties:

- 40% of Alliance Party candidates spent less than 20% of the maximum permitted amount in respect of their campaigns, compared to only 6% of Ulster Unionist candidates and 7% of Democratic Unionist candidates.
- 33% of SDLP candidates and 22% of Sinn Fein candidates spent less than 20% of the maximum permitted amount.

Marginal constituencies and successful candidates

Unsurprisingly, candidates contesting marginal seats were more likely to spend close to the legally permitted maximum. For instance, in nine of the Conservative party's top 10 target marginal seats its candidates spent more than 90% of the maximum permitted amount, and none spent less than 85% of the maximum amount. The candidates defending those seats spent between 79% and 99% of the legal maximum.

In 26 of the 29 seats that changed hands at the election, the successful candidate spent more than 80% of the maximum amount. In only one of the constituencies that changed hands, Wyre Forest, did the successful candidate spend less than 50% of the legal maximum. It is interesting to note, however, that the second- and third-placed candidates in the Wyre Forest constituency each spent 96% of the legal limit.

Indeed, successful candidates at the 2001 general election declared generally high levels of expenditure. Of the 659 elected candidates in the UK, a total of 412 candidates (63%) spent more than 80% of the legal maximum, and 269 (41%) spent over 90%. Only 51 successful candidates (8%) spent less than half of the legally permitted amount, and no winning candidate spent less than 30% of the maximum amount.

Spending patterns by category of expenditure

As detailed earlier, candidates' election expenses returns specified a number of categories of expenditure. From the data contained in these returns, it is possible to draw some conclusions on spending patterns at the 2001 general election. Interestingly, some 85% of the total amount declared by candidates (£10,076,830) was spent on publicity, including advertising, printing, publishing and postage or other distribution. Indeed, for about a quarter of all candidates (842 in total) this was their only expenditure. In contrast, only £63,637 (equivalent to just over half of 1% of all expenditure) was spent on the hire of meeting rooms during the election. Just over 22% of all candidates, 742 in total, declared any expenditure in this category.

The pattern of spending on the various categories of expenditure was broadly similar across constituencies in Great Britain. However, candidates in Northern Ireland declared a higher proportion of their campaign expenditure on printing and publicity. Of the total amount spent in Northern Ireland 93% was in relation to publicity, in comparison with an overall UK proportion of 85% of the total amount. As a consequence of this, candidates in Northern Ireland allocated a smaller proportion of their expenses to the other categories of expenditure than their counterparts in constituencies in Great Britain.

Likewise, the pattern of expenditure varied little between candidates representing different political parties. As highlighted earlier, publicity was the largest category of expenditure for most candidates. For 2,504 candidates (just over 75% of all candidates) publicity and printing accounted for more than 80% of their total expenditure. Candidates spent consistently high proportions of their total expenditure on promoting their campaigns, regardless of whether they represented small or large parties, and smaller party candidates were not more likely to spend smaller amounts in percentage terms on advertising and printing. Non-party candidates were also just as likely to allocate a high proportion of their total expenditure to publicity as candidates representing registered political parties, with publicity accounting for some 88% of the total amount spent by independent candidates and those who stood without a description.

Fewer than half of all candidates, 1,390 in total, declared personal expenses. The total amount of personal expenses declared was some £306,560, and the average expenditure of those candidates who declared personal expenses was just over £220, up from £110 in 1997.

Conclusions

With the measures introduced by PPERA, the public, media and academics have for the first time access to detailed campaign expenditure information submitted by parties that contested a UK general election. A clearer picture emerges of how parties used the funds available to them to fight a general election

Political parties

The two main parties spent well below the total expenditure limit set for the election. It seems likely that this was a reflection of a number of factors unrelated to the limit itself. That limit has not therefore been tested and it remains to be seen how comfortably the two major parties can live within it in a more closely contested election.

Although parties did their best to comply with the new controls, the interpretation and application of the legislation proved extremely complex. As a result, it was to be expected that parties would interpret the rules in different ways: while all took the view that it was safer to err on the side of caution and remain well within the financial limits and report every possible item of campaign expenditure, it is clear that inconsistencies in the inclusion, calculation and categorisation of campaign expenditure occurred across parties. The Commission will work with parties to resolve these issues ahead of the next elections at which campaign expenditure controls will apply: the 2003 elections to the devolved legislatures.

A further factor preventing a full assessment of the new legislation at this stage is the fact that we have yet to see parties manage campaign expenditure over an entire 365-day regulated period. The difficulty for parties is, of course, that elections to Westminster are not fixed and parties do not know when the 365-day period begins. It can only be calculated retrospectively once the Prime Minister announces the date of the election. Parties have, effectively, to keep continuous records of any campaign spending (including for local elections, since such expenditure also counts against the national limit if it falls within the regulated period) so that they are able to calculate how much of the spending limit remains for the election itself. It remains to be seen how this works in practice.

Also, at future general elections parties will have to take account of the fact that PPERA specifically provides for campaign expenditure incurred before the regulated period (but used during it) to count against a party's expenditure limit, a factor which was complicated and not consistently applied at the 2001 election because of the fact that the legislation had not been in place before February 2001.

At present, we have little insight into how much of a party's ordinary annual expenditure in a non-election year would be classified as campaign expenditure during a regulated period, although a clearer picture may emerge when parties submit their annual accounts to The Electoral Commission for inspection.<sup>30</sup> Given that the two main parties spent nearly £11m and over £12.7m in the four months prior to the election, how much they spend in the preceding eight months will be critical if they are not to breach the expenditure limits.

Third parties

It is arguable whether PPERA fully achieved its aims with regard to third parties during the 2001 election. Far fewer third parties registered with the Commission than we had expected. It is not known whether more organisations carried out activities that fell within the scope of PPERA but failed to register. However, the transparency gained in respect of the activities of those organisations that did register as recognised third parties is welcomed. Despite the advertisements placed in national newspapers about the new rules relating to third parties, it seems doubtful that these are widely understood among those organisations that might wish to campaign at an election. The Commission will need to consider what more might be done to publicise the new arrangements. We have no reason to believe that they have had the effect of deterring organisations from campaigning but we recognise that this will need careful monitoring.

We also recognise that clear guidelines about what constitutes election material and controlled expenditure are required to ensure that there is consistency in the interpretation of PPERA by all to achieve the transparency that the Act envisaged. We need in particular to look at any possible conflict with the legislation governing organisations with charitable status. As stated in our report on the general election, the Commission intends to review the impact of PPERA on third parties as part of our wider review of legislation and practice (see below).

A further aspect of the legislation that merits review is whether or not to require third parties that operate at constituency level to account for their expenditure. PPERA increased the parliamentary constituency third party spending limit from £5 to £500, but did not impose a requirement on third parties to account for this expenditure. It seems inconsistent with the aim of introducing financial transparency into campaign spending to increase this limit so substantially without an accompanying requirement for a spending declaration.

Candidates' expenses

The returns of election expenses submitted by more than 3,000 candidates provide a comprehensive and detailed picture of spending patterns at constituency level at the 2001 general election. The detailed accounts of campaign expenditure have enabled us to draw some broad conclusions.

A small number of candidates did not feel bound by the legal requirement to submit a return as to their election expenses. While it is possible that many of those candidates may not have conducted particularly active campaigns, and would not have incurred any significant expense, it remains important that returns are submitted as required, in order to provide a complete and transparent record of expenditure and to allow both opponents and electors to review campaign spending. There is little evidence, however, to suggest that the expenditure limits themselves are impractical or unrealistic. Most candidates spent within the limit imposed by Parliament, and many spent little or nothing at all.

<sup>30</sup> Part III of PPERA, which requires that registered parties submit their annual accounts to The Electoral Commission for inspection, came into force on 1 January 2002. The first annual accounts, which must be audited for parties whose accounts are of more than £250,000, will therefore be submitted during 2003.

Nevertheless, it is clear that some of the headings under which expenses are declared are no longer clear or relevant to modern campaign methods, and do not allow for a more detailed breakdown of how expenditure was incurred. Over 80% of all expenditure at the 2001 general election was declared within a single category, encompassing all printing, stationery and publicity costs. The degree of transparency provided by the declaration of candidates' expenses may be compromised if the great majority of expenditure declared is categorised under a single heading.

We also note that there was confusion, in some instances, regarding the correct legal limit for candidates' election expenses. While it is clearly the duty of the individual candidate and his or her agent to ensure that they are fully aware of the correct limit, some additional guidance on calculating that figure may assist candidates, agents and returning officers. We intend to issue further advice to returning officers on best practice in calculating the maximum expenses limit and on disseminating that information to candidates and agents.

As detailed previously in this report, the legislation governing candidates' election expenses has changed since the general election of 2001. PPERA included a number of provisions amending the relevant legislation, bringing the treatment of individual candidates' expenses and donations more closely into line with the new controls on party campaign expenditure.

The new provisions, which came into force on 1 July 2001, have clarified the definition of election expenses, and the meaning of a 'candidate' in relation to election expenses. In particular, expenditure must now be regarded as an election expense if it is used for the purposes of a candidate's election after the date on which he/she becomes a candidate, regardless of when the expenditure was actually incurred.<sup>31</sup> Importantly, the changes have also amended the definition of a candidate within electoral law to more clearly specify the date on which a person becomes a candidate.<sup>32</sup>

Amendments to RPA 1983 also provide for benefits in kind (i.e. notional expenditure) given to candidates to be regarded as election expenses, bringing the classification of candidates' expenses into line with that of party campaign expenditure. Goods or services supplied to candidates free of charge or at a discount of more than 10% from normal commercial terms must now be declared in the candidate's election expenses at the market value for the use of the property or goods.<sup>33</sup>

The new provisions also regulate donations to candidates, so that candidates may now only accept donations of more than £50 made for the purpose of meeting election expenses if they are from a permissible donor.<sup>34</sup> These must also be reported.

PPERA also provided for The Electoral Commission to prescribe a new form of return for candidates' election expenses.<sup>35</sup> A draft election expenses return form (CEER02) was placed on the Commission's website in March 2002, for use at the May 2002 English local elections. The Commission intends to introduce a new form following feedback from these elections, which will more accurately reflect the true pattern of spending by candidates for future elections.

Future work programme

The Commission recognises that more detailed guidance is required for both parties and candidates on the new legislation regulating expenditure. Our analysis of the campaign expenditure returns for the 2001 general election, on which this report is based, will inform our work on the production of additional information for parties on complying with the legislation on campaign expenditure. In addition,

31 Section 90A RPA 1983, as inserted by Section 134(1) PPERA 2000.

32 Section 118A RPA 1983, as inserted by Section 135(1) PPERA 2000.

33 Section 90C RPA 1983, as inserted by Section 134(1) PPERA 2000.

34 Schedule 2A RPA 1983, as inserted by Schedule 16 PPERA 2000.

35 Section 81 (10A) RPA 1983, as inserted by Schedule 18 PPERA 2000.

the Commission intends to use the experience of the new legislation governing candidates' expenses at the English local elections in May 2002 as a basis for the production of a guidance document for candidates.

Finally, The Electoral Commission also intends to consider a number of policy issues that have arisen from the review of expenditure at the 2001 election, and indeed from the introduction of PPERA in general. The expenditure returns identified the significance of the parties' spending on party broadcasts and advertising, and the Commission is currently conducting a review of party election broadcasts; in the longer term, it will run a project to consider the case for a code on political advertising. The Commission has also begun a project looking at the wider impact of PPERA as a whole. Amongst other things, this project will consider the effect of PPERA on small parties, since the campaign expenditure returns indicated the differences in the resources and activities of different sized parties, and raised the issue of whether it is productive for all parties to be subject to the same controls.

The full programme of reviews are described in the Commission's Corporate Plan 2002-2006 which can be viewed on our website, www.electoralcommission.org.uk.

Appendix 2 – Information submitted in campaign expenditure return

Breakdown of campaign expenditure reporting

- Parties were required to report each individual item of campaign expenditure incurred by the party between 16 February-7 June 2001, however small.
- Parties contesting the election in more than one part of Great Britain were required to apportion certain items of expenditure between each of the nations in which the party fielded candidates. Therefore, although expenditure that related solely to one part of Britain need not be apportioned (e.g., costs of a rally in Yorkshire), expenditure that was incurred on a GB-wide basis (e.g., a national billboard advertising campaign) was divided between each part of Britain on the basis of the number of candidates being fielded in England, Scotland and Wales.
- For each payment made, parties supplied details of:
  - the name and address of the supplier;
  - the date the expense was incurred;
  - the date of claim for payment;
  - the date payment was made;
  - the amount of the item of expenditure (correctly apportioned between England, Scotland and Wales as applicable);
  - the category of expenditure to which the payment could be attributed.
- Parties were also required to submit the following details in respect of any items of notional expenditure incurred:
  - the name and address of the supplier;
  - the nature of the expense incurred;
  - the period/date when the expense was incurred;
  - the amount of the item of expenditure (correctly apportioned between England, Scotland and Wales as applicable).

Instead of an invoice or receipt, a declaration of value by the responsible party officer was required for items of notional expenditure of more than £200.

- In addition to items of actual and notional expenditure incurred by the party, parties were also required to submit details of any unpaid or disputed claims for payment. The information required comprised:
  - the name and address of supplier;
  - the amount of the claim (correctly apportioned between England, Scotland and Wales as applicable);
  - the date the expense was incurred and the invoice received (unpaid claims); or
  - the date the disputed claim was said to have been incurred and the invoice received (disputed claims);
  - any extra information, such as the reason the claim had not been paid, or the grounds for the dispute with the supplier.

For each individual item of expenditure submitted, whether actual, notional, unpaid or disputed, parties were required to specify which category of expenditure the item fell into. The categories of expenditure parties could use were:

- party political broadcasts;
- advertising;
- unsolicited material;
- manifestos and other documents;
- market research;
- press conferences and dealings with the media;
- transport; and
- rallies and other events.

In addition to listing each item of expenditure incurred by the party, parties were also required to submit a table specifying the amount of expenditure incurred in respect of each of the categories listed above, and also the total values of:

- actual payments made;
- notional expenditure incurred;
- unpaid claims;
- disputed claims.

Returns 1-36: campaign expenditure by parties

A total of £17,216 was deducted from the overall campaign expenditure from various categories. This includes £7,300 expenditure incurred in Northern Ireland for which the party subsequently submitted a separate return. The remaining net adjustments included expenditure incurred after the election and expenditure of a routine nature that would have been incurred regardless of whether or not an election was being held.

Total campaign expenditure was reduced by £335 from the original return. The original return showed £45,247 on analysis by type of expenditure and £43,125 on analysis by category, as the notional expenditure declared had not been included in the analysis of the expenditure across categories. The net adjustments to the campaign expenditure total include an increase in the total notional expenditure by £158, to reflect the additional cost of work not charged for in respect of party documents, and a reduction against PPB by £493 as a result of a duplicate payment being identified.

A total of £194,900 was deducted from the overall campaign expenditure from various categories. The majority of the expenditure deducted from the original return was candidates' expenses incurred in the East Midlands region, totalling £155,631. The remaining net adjustments include: the re-allocation of expenditure between England, Scotland and Wales, where it had previously been allocated to England; the re-categorisation of expenditure to ensure a consistent approach; and the re-allocation of expenditure across England, Scotland and Wales due to the party recording an incorrect number of seats contested in Scotland.

There was a net overall reduction of £3,617. The main issues arising were: deduction of £25,998 from actual payments, the majority of which was one invoice for £17,157 for the election night party; an addition of £284 to actual payments, and an addition of £22,096 to notional expenditure in respect of the party theme tune as reported in Q2 donation report. The other significant amendment is the transfer of £103,264 notional expenditure to actual expenditure. The original return included actual costs for additional overheads incurred by the party as notional expenditure.

A total of £15,173 was added to the overall campaign expenditure from various categories. The net adjustments included expenditure on market research advertising costs and costs for telephone canvassing. Amounts deducted from the return include candidates' expenses, routine expenditure that would have been incurred regardless of whether an election was held, and the costs of purchases by the central party that were sold on to candidates.

No change in the total campaign expenditure. However, the allocation of expenditure across England, Scotland and Wales was amended, as items of national expenditure had not been correctly apportioned across Great Britain. The net result is a transfer of expenditure from England of £1,638 and from Scotland of £183 to Wales (£1,821).

Total campaign expenditure was reduced by £4,699. This was as a result of: an arithmetical error, which resulted in the return being £707 overstated; a reduction of £1,532 relating to candidates expenses included in the return; and a further reduction of £4,295 (including £820 notional expenditure) due to claims being duplicated in the return. The final figure also included two invoices totalling £1,835 that had been correctly submitted with the return but not included in the party's calculations.

Appendix 3 – Categories of campaign expenditure (Schedule 8 to PPERA 2000)

SCHEDULE 8 CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURE: QUALIFYING EXPENSES PART I QUALIFYING EXPENSES

Expenses qualifying where incurred for election purposes

1. For the purposes of section 72(2) the expenses falling within this Part of this Schedule are expenses incurred in respect of any of the matters set out in the following list.

List of matters

(1) Party political broadcasts.

Expenses in respect of such broadcasts include agency fees, design costs and other costs in connection with preparing or producing such broadcasts.

(2) Advertising of any nature (whatever the medium used).

Expenses in respect of such advertising include agency fees, design costs and other costs in connection with preparing, producing, distributing or otherwise disseminating such advertising or anything incorporating such advertising and intended to be distributed for the purpose of disseminating it.

(3) Unsolicited material addressed to electors (whether addressed to them by name or intended for delivery to households within any particular area or areas).

Expenses in respect of such material include design costs and other costs in connection with preparing, producing or distributing such material (including the cost of postage).

(4) Any manifesto or other document setting out the party's policies.

Expenses in respect of such a document include design costs and other costs in connection with preparing or producing or distributing or otherwise disseminating any such document.

(5) Market research or canvassing conducted for the purpose of ascertaining polling intentions.

(6) The provision of any services or facilities in connection with press conferences or other dealings with the media.

(7) Transport (by any means) of persons to any place or places with a view to obtaining publicity in connection with an election campaign.

Expenses in respect of the transport of such persons include the costs of hiring a particular means of transport for the whole or part of the period during which the election campaign is being conducted.

(8) Rallies and other events, including public meetings (but not annual or other party conferences) organised so as to obtain publicity in connection with an election campaign or for other purposes connected with an election campaign.

Expenses in respect of such events include costs incurred in connection with the attendance of persons at such events, the hire of premises for the purposes of such events or the provision of goods, services or facilities at them.

Exclusions

2. Nothing in paragraph 1 shall be taken as extending to -

- (a) any expenses in respect of newsletters or similar publications issued by or on behalf of the party with a view to giving electors in a particular electoral area information about the opinions or activities of, or other personal information relating to, their elected representatives or existing or prospective candidates;
- (b) any expenses incurred in respect of unsolicited material addressed to party members;
- (c) any expenses in respect of any property, services or facilities so far as those expenses fall to be met out of public funds;
- (d) any expenses incurred in respect of the remuneration or allowances payable to any member of the staff (whether permanent or otherwise) of the party; or
- (e) any expenses incurred in respect of an individual by way of travelling expenses (by any means of transport) or in providing for his accommodation or other personal needs to the extent that the expenses are paid by the individual from his own resources and are not reimbursed to him.

Appendix 5 – Information submitted in controlled expenditure return

Breakdown of controlled expenditure reporting

- Recognised third parties were required to report each individual item of controlled expenditure incurred during the period in which the organisation or individual was registered as a recognised third party, however small.
- Recognised third parties campaigning in more than one part of Great Britain were required to apportion items of expenditure between the relevant parts of Britain. Therefore, although expenditure that related solely to one part of Britain need not be apportioned (e.g., costs of a rally in Yorkshire), expenditure that was incurred on a GB-wide basis (e.g., a national billboard advertising campaign) was divided between each part of Britain on the basis of the number of constituencies in England, Scotland and Wales.

For each payment made, recognised third parties supplied details of:

- the name and address of the supplier;
- the date the expense was incurred;
- the date of claim for payment;
- the date payment was made;
- the amount of the item of expenditure (correctly apportioned between England, Scotland and Wales as applicable).

All payments of more than £200 were required to be supported by a receipt or invoice.

- Recognised third parties were also required to submit the following details in respect of any items of notional expenditure incurred:
  - the name and address of the supplier;
  - the nature of the expense incurred;
  - the period/date when the expense was incurred;
  - the amount of the item of expenditure (correctly apportioned between England, Scotland and Wales as applicable).

Instead of an invoice or receipt, a declaration of value by the person registered as the responsible officer of the third party was required for items of notional expenditure of more than £200.

- In addition to items of actual and notional expenditure incurred by the third party, recognised third parties were also required to submit details of any unpaid or disputed claims for payment. For these the following information was required:
  - the name and address of supplier;
  - the amount of the claim (correctly apportioned between England, Scotland and Wales as applicable);
  - the date the expense was incurred and the invoice received (unpaid claims); or
  - the date the disputed claim was said to have been incurred and the invoice received (disputed claims);
  - any extra information, such as the reason the claim had not been paid, or the grounds for the dispute with the supplier.

In addition to information about individual payments, recognised third parties were required to submit the total values of:

- actual payments made;
- notional expenditure incurred;
- unpaid claims;
- disputed claims;
- the amount of controlled expenditure incurred during the regulated period before becoming a recognised third party.

During the regulated period, recognised third parties were also subject to controls on donations that are similar to the controls introduced on donations to political parties by PPERA in February 2001. As part of its return to the Commission, each recognised third party had to include, a record of all permissible donations of more than £5,000, and details of any donations of more than £200 received from impermissible or unidentifiable sources. The following details were required:

- For each permissible donation of more than £5,000:
  - the name, address and status of the donor (and company registration number if the donor was a registered company, or details of the contributors to the trust if the donor was an exempt trust);

- the amount (or value and nature if the donation was not made in cash) of the donation;
  - the date on which the donation was received;
  - the date on which the donation was accepted.
- For each impermissible of more than £200:
    - the name and address of the donor;
    - the amount (or value and nature if the donation was not made in cash) of the donation;
    - the date on which the donation was received;
    - the date on which the donation was returned;
    - the name and address of the person or organisation to whom the donation was returned.
- For each donation of more than £200 from an unidentifiable donor:
    - the manner in which the donation was made;
    - the amount (or value and nature if the donation was not made in cash) of the donation;
    - the date on which the donation was received;
    - the date on which the donation was returned;
    - the name and address of the organisation to which the donation was returned.

Recognised third parties were also required to submit the total value of all accepted donations of more than £200 but less than £5000 (i.e., donations that were not reportable individually).

The original submission to the Commission indicated that the total controlled expenditure had been incurred after the organisation registered as a recognised third party. The total controlled expenditure reported was reduced by £26,724 in respect of costs for permanent staff that had been included in the return. Of the remaining controlled expenditure that was correctly reported, £13,292 was incurred prior to registration as a recognised third party.

In July 2001, Paul Clark MP and his election agent were granted exception from the provisions of Section 76(1) of RPA 1983 by the High Court, after the Returning Officer for the Gillingham constituency advised candidates of an incorrect election expenses limit. Although the Gillingham constituency is a borough constituency, the Returning Officer calculated the legal maximum using the formula for a county constituency, leading to an overestimation of the allowable expenses.

The Commission sought comments from all the other candidates reported as having overspent the relevant statutory election expenses limit. In a number of cases, the Commission was advised that confusion over the number of electors on the electoral register led them to exceed the legal maximum. As stated in our conclusion, this is an issue that the Commission intends to address. Other explanations cited were a miscalculation of the correct expenses limit and confusion relating to whether or not VAT was included in a price agreed with a supplier.

Explanatory notes and definitions

Constituency details

Name of constituency

Constituencies are listed in alphabetical order.

Type of constituency

The type of constituency, borough (B) or county (C) is indicated after the constituency name, since the type of constituency governs the formula to be used in determining the legal maximum for a candidate's expenses.

Names of candidates

The names of candidates are listed in order of the number of votes polled. Consequently, the first candidate listed in each constituency is the candidate elected.

Party

The party affiliation of the candidate. Candidates may only include a description in their nomination papers and on the ballot paper if it has been authorised by a registered political party (rule 6A (1) of the parliamentary election rules, as amended by section 38 (3) of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000). All unaffiliated candidates must either use the label 'Independent' with no further description, or provide no description on the ballot paper at all. Registered party names and abbreviations for descriptions used by candidates are listed below.

The Electoral Commission

We are an independent body that was set up by Parliament. We aim to gain public confidence and encourage people to take part in the democratic process within the United Kingdom by modernising the electoral process, promoting public awareness of electoral matters, and regulating political parties.

On 1 April 2002, The Boundary Committee for England (formerly the Local Government Commission for England) became a statutory committee of The Electoral Commission. Its duties include reviewing local election boundaries.
