'Harvest' demonstrates how ag drives local economy

By Christopher Wood and Jeff Nuttall
Business Report Co-publishers

Technology is important. The same goes for real estate, banking, health care, hospitality, tourism and a myriad of other industries that collectively drive the Northern Colorado economy.

But no industry is more important than agribusiness, which makes up a huge portion of Northern Colorado's exports — and jobs. It's because of that importance that we publish Harvest — Northern Colorado's Agribusiness Data Source.

This second annual publication includes listings of 1,500 agribusinesses in Northern Colorado, as well as recent agribusiness articles and ranked lists originally published in The Northern Colorado Business Report, the region's award-winning biweekly business journal.

Listings in Harvest are broken down by subcategory, including Farms, Ag-Equipment Dealers, etc. Many of the listings include deep data about the companies, such as employment level, revenues, product description, key contacts and more.

Harvest's data is better than ever this year, thanks to the research efforts of Eleanor Anderson and Mishelle Baun, who worked diligently to flesh out the data that we had previously collected on companies, as well as to add hundreds of new companies.

Thanks also to our advertisers, who continue to support this worthwhile project. Call Mike Kelley at (800) 440-3506 for information on advertising in the next edition.

Please remember that, as with any research effort, errors and omissions are inevitable. If we inadvertently excluded your company, or listed it incorrectly, please let us know, and we'll correct our database immediately. We'll also ensure that your information is correctly listed in the next issue of Harvest.

Harvest can also be purchased in database format using the DataJoe system on our Web site, www.ncbr.com, and can be purchased on CD in Microsoft Excel or tab-delimited formats. Extra print copies are also available.

We hope that you enjoy Harvest, and we look forward to any advice and feedback that you, our valued reader, wish to provide.

Ethanol touted as major energy source

Extracting fuel from corn and biomass seen as path to energy independence

By Kim Lock
The Business Report

Growing fuel in a field – it may be the future of agriculture.

Ethanol is fuel produced by breaking down the starches found in corn, wheat and other plants into simple sugars. To be used as a fuel, ethanol is mixed with gasoline. The most common blends are 10 percent or 85 percent ethanol.

Over 1 billion gallons of ethanol are blended with gasoline every year in the United States, according to the American Coalition for Ethanol. Because the ethanol molecule contains oxygen, it allows the engine to more completely combust the fuel, resulting in fewer emissions.

Because ethanol is a renewable fuel that is gaining in popularity, the U.S. Congress is putting more emphasis on the fuel in energy bills.

Double production by 2012

The most recent bill included a requirement to double ethanol production for gasoline to 5 billion gallons a year by 2012. Production is expected to top 2.7 billion gallons this year.

Despite the potential setback, two Northern Colorado organizations have received funding this year for the development of biomass ethanol and the promotion of ethanol use in automobiles.

The Colorado Corn Growers Association received $50,000 from the National Ethanol Vehicle Coalition to help promote E85 – the term for the 85 percent blend of Ethanol – to car retailers and dealers.

The association hopes to install about 80 new ethanol pumps along the Front Range by the end of 2005. There are currently nine ethanol pumps in the state, including locations in Greeley and Lakewood.

“We are counting on the Colorado

KIM LOCK • THE BUSINESS REPORT

FUTURE FUEL? — Beth Weibert, director of production and stewardship for Colorado Corn, fills Colorado Corn’s promotional “E85” vehicle with ethanol at a gas station in Greeley.

Automobile Dealers Association to help us with the training and education of local car retailers and dealers,” said Bernie Lange, marketing director for the Colorado Corn Growers Association. “General Motors, Ford, and DaimlerChrysler are responsible for manufacturing the almost 3 million E85 vehicles on the road today.”

One problem with increasing ethanol usage is the lack of infrastructure. It is difficult to encourage someone to purchase a car that can run on ethanol when there are fewer than 10 gas stations selling the fuel in the state.

Chicken-and-egg scenario

“It’s a chicken-and-the-egg,” said John Cevette, executive director for the Colorado

Corn Growers Association. “You need the vehicles out there to get the infrastructure, and (you need) the infrastructure to get the vehicles. And we are short on both.”

Researchers at Colorado State University are working on ways to decrease the cost of ethanol production. Most commercial ethanol is produced from the corn kernels — which have value as a food crop — and that increases the price of production. The research is focused on producing ethanol from products often thought of as waste — any part of a plant that isn’t used for food.

“We’ve worked on this process since the late 1970s during the Carter administration,” said Linda Henk, a research scientist in the Department of Chemical Engineering. “It ➡ will reduce our dependency on foreign oil, it will reduce carbon emissions from fossil fuels and it will help the agricultural economy in rural America.”

If ethanol is produced strictly from corn, a typical irrigated cornfield can produce approximately 320 gallons of ethanol. If the waste products are added, the field can produce an additional 160 gallons of ethanol.

But research on other ways to produce ethanol is not being done strictly in the academic realm. A private company based in Northern Colorado is hoping to join in the game and eventually license and develop its system of production worldwide.

In September, Pure Vision Technology Inc. of Fort Lupton announced it received one of the three largest grants awarded under the terms of the Farm Bill, which was developed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, and the U.S. Department of Energy for biomass research, development and demonstration projects.

Demonstration project

The company will use the $2 million grant to demonstrate the economics of the company's new biomass recovery technology that can convert corn stalks and other wastes into bio-products. One of these products is ethanol.

The company's technology produces fiber for paper, hydrogen and ethanol from agriculture residue. This residue consists of corn stalks and leaves, wheat straw and sugar cane bagas.

“Right now we are operating on a small-scale pilot set-up out of Laramie, Wyo.,” said Ed Lehrburger, president of Pure Vision Technology.

The company currently has the ability to convert 500 pounds of biomass per day into usable products. Pure Vision's first plant in Alabama will process 20 tons of biomass a day.

Lehrburger said he expects the popularity of agriculture-based fuels to increase with time. Many of the fuels are still in the early or research stages, so it may be several years before their full capabilities are known.

“Ag fuels will consistently play a bigger role in American society over the next 50 years,” he said. “The infrastructure will grow as the industry grows ... I believe it is all very market driven.”

“You need the vehicles out there to get the infrastructure, and you need the infrastructure for the vehicles.”

Bio-farming plants seeds of high-value harvests

Crops grown for the production of pharmaceuticals hold financial promise

By Sue Lenthe
Business Report Correspondent

Farmer Marc Arnusch looks to the future and foresees a day when he might trim his 1,100-acre operation down to a much smaller operation of high-value pharmaceutical-producing crops.

Arnusch, 30, takes care of his farm, represents a large seed company and is also a contracting agent for ConAgra Cattle Feeders. For Arnusch, bio-farming holds the possibility of a better living with less risk and effort.

"As a young producer, it's not unthinkable that I could concentrate on, say, 160 acres of production instead of the 1,100 that I'm currently farming and make a very comfortable living doing it," Arnusch said.

Bio-farming is the process of growing crops genetically engineered to produce pharmaceutical or industrial agents.

Among potential plant-made pharmaceuticals are antibodies, antigens, enzymes, hormones, structural proteins and anti-disease agents. These pharmaceuticals might be used to fight cancer and AIDS, create vaccines, treat or prevent disease and chronic ailments.

And they can be produced more cheaply through plants than the biotech industry can currently produce them.

Corn, tobacco, canola, tomatoes, rice and alfalfa are plants being used to produce or test production of plant-made pharmaceuticals.

Still in infancy

Still very much in its infancy, bio-farming has captured the interest of ag producers nationwide. "It gives farmers an opportunity to really add further value to their crops," said Bernie Lange of Colorado Corn.

STEVE PORTER • THE BUSINESS REPORT

INTERESTED — Marc Arnusch, a farmer near Prospect Valley in South Weld County, said he's interested in planting crops for pharmaceuticals and biomedical research if there is potential for more income to be made in farming.

It won't be for everyone, ag experts note. Bio-farming demands rigid management practices. Requirements like isolation of bio-farm crops, separate machinery and tight bureaucratic scrutiny will drive up input costs.

In the case of genetically altered corn, for example, producers are required by the U.S. Department of Agriculture to maintain a one-mile separation between the crop and commodity corn crops. Planting dates must be separated as well. The altered corn must be planted a minimum of 28 days after commodity corn is planted to further ensure against the possibility of cross-pollination.

Because bio-farming is still likely several years away from regular practice, older producers may not see it become a part of their operations, Arnusch said.

"With an average producer age of 54, I do have a concern that this may not be a fit for many aging producers," he said. "Certainly, the limited youth we have in agriculture must look at this as an option as their farming careers advance."

The potential rewards, meanwhile, will be higher as well. A bushel of "pharmacorn" might bring $30 to $50 per bushel compared to the couple of bucks a bushel that conventional corn crops yield, Lange said.

"If you take the point of view that there is a potential for farmers in Colorado to be more profitable and for money to flow to the state of Colorado through this process, I think it's something that needs to be seriously considered," said Dr. Tom Holtzer, head of Colorado State University's bioagricultural sciences and pest management department.

"There is the potential for that to be the case. But it will require people with special knowledge and special training and commitment to doing it."

Ideal growing conditions

Ag experts say Colorado offers ideal conditions for bio-farming because the state has a relatively temperate climate and comparatively few climatic extremes. ➔

"Colorado is a natural fit in my mind because we can control a lot of environmental influencers," Arnusch said. Colorado doesn't receive a lot of rain, which reduces hail and damaging wind possibilities.

"We have very good soil types, especially on the extreme eastern plains," Arnusch said. And the state's wide-open spaces accommodate the required isolation of genetically altered crops.

In the long run, farmers like Arnusch see the possibility that bio-farming could help them reduce production risks and labor and other input costs. And, Arnusch added, it offers the chance to shift from forever pushing for high yields to concentrating on raising a quality crop with high standards.

Colorado agriculture made its first foray into the world of commercial bio-farming this past year when French biotech firm Meristem Therapeutics applied for and received permission from the USDA and Colorado Department of Agriculture to plant a test plot of approximately 17 acres of lipase-producing corn in Phillips County.

Lipase is a naturally occurring enzyme found in all living creatures except humans with cystic fibrosis. The enzyme breaks down fats. Cystic fibrosis sufferers must obtain lipase through pharmaceuticals. Currently produced conventionally by processing pig or cattle glands, lipase can be produced more cheaply through corn.

The Meristem application drew criticism in Colorado from some farm and environmental groups. At the time, the Rocky Mountain Farmers Union, the American Corn Growers Association, the Colorado Organic Producers Association, the Farmers Legal Action Group and the Sierra Club voiced opposition to approval of the permit application.

In general, concerns about bio-farming include fears that:

- Pollen from genetically engineered plants would fertilize commodity crops;
- Plant-made pharmaceutical crops might be mingled with commodity crops;
- Wildlife or the natural environment might be harmed by the introduced genes;
- Farm workers might face health risks from exposure to the genetically engineered crops and unexpected toxins;
- Residues from crop production could contaminate the plant-made pharmaceuticals.

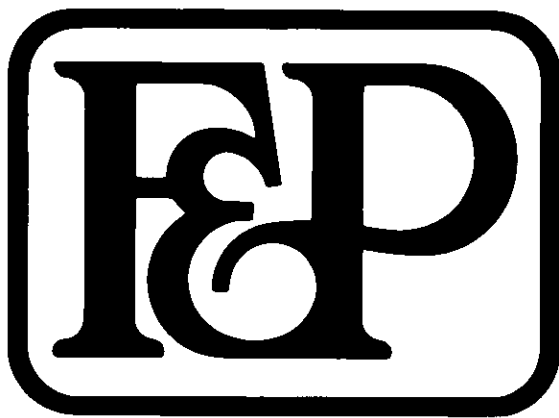

Meristem, meanwhile, opted not to plant during the 2003 growing season. However, the Meristem application remains active, said Jim White, director of policy and communications for the Colorado Department of Agriculture.

"There's a possibility that Meristem Therapeutics could move into Colorado under the precise terms of their permit granted last year and plant before the first of June," White said. "We have had no indication that they intend to do that."

For now, White said, bio-farming's benefits for Colorado agriculture remain largely in the future. "If and until the pharmaceutical industry decides it's going to shift to plant-made pharmaceuticals, the likelihood of widespread or large-scale production of these types of plants is pretty remote.

"I think, however, it would mean a lot to the agricultural economy in Colorado if the state was viewed as a place where pharmaceutical companies were welcome, provided they did the job the way they are supposed to."

High-tech changing face of farming

By Jane D. Albritton
Business Report Correspondent

Global positioning technology allows farmers to perform ag operations with new efficiencies

Rod Weimer, manager for Fagerberg Farms located near Windsor in Weld County, happened to be in San Francisco for a meeting when he noticed it was time to irrigate back on the farm. And so he went to his hotel room, fired up his laptop, and turned on the sub-surface irrigation drip system.

"At the same time I was telling the program to start the water, it also started keeping an exact record of exactly how much water was being applied," he said. "I could have fertilized that onion field, too."

Long distance irrigating represents just one of the items on today's menu of high-tech agricultural applications, which have developed in tandem with all other computer-driven advances and which got an extra boost when the Department of Defense opened the global positioning systems (GPS) to civilian use. (For inquiring minds, the worldwide satellite-based radio-navigation system consists of 24 satellites orbiting the earth at an altitude of 11,000 miles.) The GPS receiver collects the data; in turn, geographical information systems (GIS) organize that information as maps for agricultural uses.

"Farmers have always known that there is a lot of variability across their fields," said Rajiv Khosla, assistant professor of soil and crop sciences at Colorado State University. "But then what? A farmer doesn't have the time to go in and treat parts of fields differently. This is where GIS comes in. Tractors with GPS receivers and GIS software can drive through a field and automatically change the rate of application of seed or fertilizer."

Ag revolution?

In Khosla's view, this technology

KIM LOCK • THE BUSINESS REPORT

COMPUTERIZED PLOWING — This computerized device mounted in the cab of a tractor incorporates global positioning technology to allow the operator to plow a straight line to within on centimeter.

revolutionizes agriculture. For example, it is possible to map a weedy place in a field during harvest. This map can then be used to guide the direct application of pre-emergent herbicide to just that spot. The computer program humming along in the cab of the tractor activates and stops the spray nozzles, thus allowing the farmer not only to improve weed control with less chemicals, but also to make the applications on the fly.

The same processes may be used in controlling pests. Elaine McCallum, manager of Red Hen Farming Systems, LLP, said that the software and tools that come with this technology improve farming agronomically, environmentally and environmentally.

"Profitability hinges on all three variables," she said. "We can improve yields and then measure that improvement."

That the planting of seeds and the crop's subsequent care can be conducted via a computerized program assumes that the tractor can be directed to run in a very straight line. Traditionally, only the best farmers could hold a line and stay up to speed; even then the accuracy was subject to human lapses of attention. The new autopilot systems remove all those variables and replace them with astonishing precision.

Precision plowing

"I can determine the accuracy of the line you plow within a centimeter," said McCallum. "When I was plowing, I was paid a premium because I could plow a straight line. But these days it's hard for farmers to find good drivers. Nobody wants to invest in training a migrant farm hand or high school student when that person may quit or not come back the next season."

Weimer has another reason for appreciating a tractor that can hold a straight line. "We have 200 acres set up with an advanced drip system set eight inches below the surface that applies water and fertilizer directly to the root zone. We'll put in 150 more acres next year," he said. "When we pull into the field, we download our away point so that we stay in line and don't wreck the drip."

Weimer added that the drip system uses 30 percent less water and about 33 percent less fertilizer. Moreover, since both water and fertilizer are applied at the root zone, there is no runoff. Both the savings and the environmental benefits are significant.

Jerry Alldredge, agricultural extension agent for soils and crops, said that although GPS and GIS are still too expensive and “out there” to be broadly adopted, farmers are aware of the benefits.

“Farmers are interested,” he said, “because the care of the land that raises their crops is important to them. Precision farming, including yield monitoring, can help them be more responsible with their use of pesticides and fertilizers.”

Key to future

Mike Meth, sales manager for Bi-State Machinery, is convinced that the newest generation of high-tech ag equipment — including that which belongs to the John Deere family of Ag Management Solutions (AMS) — is the future.

“The initial investment is high, about $50,000 for the yield-monitoring equipment,” he said. “But with it you can take the information on-the-go and map out your field. That map can help you make decisions about water and fertilizer that will save money in the long term.”

According to information on the John Deere Web site, the GreenStar System (Deere’s term for precision farming) helps producers reduce costs and increase both efficiency and profitability. Faster field speeds and a reduction in per-acre-fuel-consumption (among others) are means to those ends.

What is not explicit in the John Deere message — but which is certainly implied — is that cost reductions will come in part from an increased use of unskilled labor. As McCallum pointed out, it takes training and practice (not to mention an interest in farming) to drive a tractor well. With the new autopilot systems, the only skill necessary is the ability to push the “go” button. In fact, if OSHA did not require that a person ride in the tractor cab, the driver could be eliminated altogether.

Competitive edge at stake

The effects of the technological advances are sweeping and will, in time, affect every participant in the ag sector. McCallum noted that crop consultants who are not up on the latest technology lose the competitive edge in a market driven by practicality.

“If five guys come to sell you fertilizer, you want to go with the one with the best systems for managing and keeping track of it,” she said. “Programs like ours can create a prescription for a field and then tell the tractor exactly how much fertilizer or pesticide to apply where.”

The attraction to all the new technology seems irresistible. Weimer, a low-tech farmer long before he became adept at fertilizing fields through cyberspace, has willingly adjusted his skill set because he is convinced that he can increase the yield at Fagerberg Farms by 15 to 20 percent in a good year, when the elements allow human ingenuity to have its way.

“Mother nature still has her say with what happens to our onion crop,” he said. “Hail is our biggest problem, and there is nothing technology can do about that.”

 best of the best
 But what really matters is that we do our best for you.

Five-star rating in treating heart attacks and peripheral vascular treatments that include angioplasty or stents.

Poudre Valley Hospital was recently honored with the 2004 Distinguished Hospital Award for Clinical Excellence, which puts us in the top 3.4% of hospitals nationwide. The award was given to us by HealthGrades, an independent healthcare quality reporting service.

But even as we receive national acclaim, we're not losing sight of the very local reason we strive for world-class healthcare. We do it for you and your family. We do it because we want you to have the best care possible.

For more information on the 2004 Distinguished Hospital Award, visit healthgrades.com.

A NEW DIRECTION IN BANKING

WE'VE CHANGED THE RULES.

You may recognize our faces. That's because for years every one of us has been a force in Greeley banking.

Not long ago, we stepped back and took a hard look at where banking was headed. Frankly, we didn't like the trend toward huge, impersonal, out-of-state financial institutions controlling local decisions. So we started from scratch and created a bank we could be proud of.

The result is New West. All the competitive products the big guys offer. Decades of local banking experience. Owned and operated by Weld County residents.

For banking that's direct, decisive and down to earth, visit New West Bank.

We're the
best of the best
But what really matters is
that we do our best for you.

Poudre Valley Hospital was recently honored with the 2004 Distinguished Hospital Award for Clinical Excellence, which puts us in the top 3.4% of hospitals nationwide. The award was given to us by HealthGrades, an independent healthcare quality reporting service.

But even as we receive national acclaim, we're not losing sight of the very local reason we strive for world-class healthcare. We do it for you and your family. We do it because we want you to have the best care possible.

For more information on the 2004 Distinguished Hospital Award, visit healthgrades.com.

THE NORTHERN COLORADO
BUSINESS REPORT

DataJoe Saves the Day...

I was reaching for a napkin to wipe the mustard from my tie when the door flew open. It was Hal. I could tell he was in trouble. "I'm in trouble, DataJoe. I've gotta get some info." Turned out he needed some news stories from a few years back to find a guy named Left-foot Len.

They weren't hard to find. Len was there, and his picture was all over them. Hal was pleased. He tossed me an envelope. "Here ya go, DataJoe. The info is worth the price."

"And by the way," he continued as he headed for the door. "You've got mustard on your tie."

Looking for someone? Just ask DataJoe. Hire him by the day, month, or year at www.datajoe.ncbr.com.

Tell him Hal sent you, but don't mention the mustard.

Working on these issues:

- country-of-origin food labeling
- better water management strategies
- world trade that benefits producers
- farm income from renewable energy
- cooperative assistance to producers directly marketing their products
- improved federal crop insurance program
- youth leadership development business is not for the faint of heart.

It does not suffer fools.
It will not allow you to catch your breath.
It will accept no excuses.

To make it takes decisive, bold action.
Action based on knowledge.
Not last week's, not yesterday's, but today's.

Knowledge from the lifeline of business.
In-depth analysis. Reliable, timely information.
Relevant data, trends and mergers.
Direct interaction.

Only one source holds the pulse. Whose only business is business. Where more successful companies, more savvy executives, more bold entrepreneurs get the knowledge they need, when they need it. Through print publications,
e-mail newsletters, Web data services, conferences and event networking.

Do you have what it takes?
