First, It Takes One

"Elvery school boy knows," President

ohnson said out at Independence on Thursday, "that it takes two to make peace." If, he went on, there was now no peace in Vietnam, that was not the fault of the United States. In Washington yesterday, Secretary of State Dean Rusk complained that we have been waiting for some "word from Hanol that goes beyond bitter invective or charges that talk of peace is a trick or deceit or a swindle. "We have theen listening," he continued, "for sounds other than the sounds of bombs and grenades and mortars in South In the course of his own press conference remarks, he himself asserted, as Sanctified American truth, certain characterizations which the enemy might happen to regard as "invective." He referred to "a cruel aggression" which one can be sure the Vietcong itself defines as a 'defense of Asian liberties." And, while he was speaking, there was, in the background, the news report of additional American troop landings in Vietnam and of the Secrestary of Defense asking Congress for hands for "massive firepower" in Viet-

And Secretary Rusk, under questiondeed been some kind of diplomatic response from Hanoi to the President's "peace offensive," but declined to be specific about it other than to say that t had not been satisfactory or hopeful. Such is the official administration argument of the moment.

But those who hope for something more than the routine from the world's most important national leadership in what may be the world's most important moment of policy choice have the right to conclude that the official adinistration argument is still not quite good enough to end that "crisis of confidence" which has been existing, or to rate as the last and final definition of Swhat this administration might do in the cause of peace. It is not good enough for us to pro-elaim, piously, that it 'takes two to sign a peace agreement." Before we have won the right to use such an argument, we have to recog-Chine and demonstrate the truth of an even more basic principle, which can be stated like this:

"It takes one to make peace." By that we mean, of course, that it takes "at least one to make peace." It takes one with some bigger and higher objective than that of winning a propaganda hattle about responsibility for the lack of peace, or that of passing the peace buck back and forth to some

It takes one who is willing to be just as daring, to travel just as many miles, to take just as many risks for peace as tt has always proved easy to take for

It takes two eventually. But first, it takes at least one.

Mayor Lindsay's Photographer

It is not because it is a new thing of any kind, but rather that it is so sadly old, that there is news in the fact that City Hall, New York City, under Mayor John Lindsay, has a new official time for doing some shooting around City Hall, and will sell her pictures to news organizations which want something in particular.

startling, then, about Mayor Lindsay's having a City Hall photographer, paid for from some account, in this case the war against poverty account, which i lederal, instead of the firefighting account, which would be local.

The reasons the nation's newspape took such an old, routine kind of story and put it on page one the other day were, we suppose, that Mayor Lindsay a supposed to be another of those pur white knights in politics, and, even more importantly, the fact that only a night or two before he had gone on television with an austerity report to the people of his city and the brave announcemen that, because of the city's financial crisis, he has issued an order forbidding the hiring of new city employes. Or perhaps, after so many months of waiting, everybody was just joyously giad to see that the great war against everty was off and shooting at last suring that this particular visitor would never get past that barrier again.

When the telephone rang we knew it was Ilya or Amos or Drake and we pinned down by dandruff, and unable ever to rise again.

It was time or never. We swung around to our reference shelves, with their innocent looking titles, and flipped the gadsis one and one half turns. We revved up the radiator, threw the deak clutch and calmly adjusted our death's eye monocle to fatal. Just then Topless, the girl we would marry if we could ever find time between plots, came fearlessly forward and took her place at our side. We stood there together, Listerining anxiously. Suddenly, over the tinkle of the Doctor's jellybeans there came an unbelievable network mort. We looked at the office clock. It read a.m., not p.m. The damnable office computer had somehow been programmed for our morning work with our evening entertainment.

northeastern United States. But there may be other factors, too. As towns and cities sprawl into the countryside and as land is taken over for all the special uses of today's living, watersheds shrink and the demands for water multiply fantastically. It is not inconceivable, may never again be as full a body of water as it has been in past years. With this in mind, we wonder whether entirely complacent about the plan to is a project designed to pump water out of the Connecticut River into a storage ation in 1970 or 1971.

There is one feature about the layout that ought to be examined rather carefully, it seems to us. This is the plan to take the overflow from the Northfield Mountain reservoir and run it into Quabbin Reservoir, the big man-made lake in central Massachusetts which supplies Boston and a number of communities in central and eastern Massa-

Here in Connecticut we should have ample assurance that the hydroelectric power plant at Northfield is used for electric power and nothing more. There should certainly be no assumption that Connecticut is automatically assenting to any scheme for augmenting Boston's water supply.
