Early spring flowering

Narcissi

Narcissi originate from Europe. They were first found in the wilds of Spain, France, England and Holland. England played an important role throughout history to develop better varieties from the original wild species. In later years, the Dutch contributed a great deal to help continue this difficult work. Many varieties were introduced, however most of them disappeared to be replaced by new and better ones. Because many varieties in different shapes and forms were introduced, they were eventually classified in groups or strains like the Tulips.

About 100 years ago, the Poetaz (Cluster Narcissus) were most in demand, while today, the most important groups are the Daffodils (Large trumpet Narcissi), as well as the large and small cupped Narcissi, double, and some Poetaz varieties.

Narcissi have gained widespread popularity in modern landscaping. Combined with Hyacinths, Muscari and some early varieties of Tulips, they bring a welcome variation to the spring garden. They make excellent cut flowers and can be used successfully for naturalizing.

Daffodils

The large trumpet narcissi are called 'Daffodils' and are the most important group today. A large bulb can produce 2 to 3 flowers in yellow, white or bicolors. They are ideal for landscaping, in borders, for naturalizing purposes and make excellent cut flowers. The daffodil can be forced to bloom easily in the winter months and is therefore much in demand by greenhouse growers as well. The yellow 'King Alfred' continues to be a long time favorite.
