Summary

Although scientific and technological innovation has contributed to significant improvements in health conditions, health crises, relating, in particular, to HIV/AIDS, malaria, tuberculosis, and, most recently, avian influenza, continue to create major problems in many parts of the world. In various national and international fora, solutions are sought in respect of the role of patents in pharmaceutical innovation and fair and affordable access to health care. Dr. V. Muralidharan highlighted the importance of patents in pharmaceutical innovations needed for the improvement of public health.

In the contexts of public health, the resource person spoke about the challenge for policy makers to find an optimal balance between the rights of patent owners, who provide technological innovations to improve health conditions, and the needs of the general public. Listeners gained knowledge for the development of new drugs and also the exclusive right conferred by a patent for developers of new drugs to make the necessary investments into that research. He explained about the method of Clearing issues, such as ownership and licensing policies for innovation derived from public research, which would contribute to the promotion of a more effective deployment of public funds and public R&D programs.

Outcome

The seminar summarised about how patent system is designed to promote innovation and, at the same time, offer a mechanism ensuring that the fruits of that innovation are accessible to society. The seminar was concluded by giving knowledge regarding TRIPS agreement, public health, and license for export of medicine, intellectual property and public policy. 40 Students participated in this seminar.
