FOUR ABDUCTED REFUGEES FACE DEATH PENALTY

Four refugees abducted in Benin in January were tried by a military court in Equatorial Guinea from 14 to 16 August on charges of attempting to assassinate the President, and treason. If found guilty, they face the death penalty.

The four refugees, former military officers José Abeso Nsue, Manuel Ndong Anseme, Alipio Ndong Asumu and Jacinto Michá Obiang had been abducted in Benin in January. Reports indicate they have been tortured to make them confess. The authorities in Equatorial Guinea never confirmed that they were holding the men. Their trial was open to the public, but not publicized.

The men received a summary trial before a military court (Consejo de Guerra) in Malabo on 14-16 August, on charges of attempting to assassinate President Obiang Nguema, and treason. The charges related to an alleged attack on the presidential palace in February 2009. Two military officers, who apparently do not have legal training, were allocated to represent them. In court, they confirmed the statements they had made under torture that implicated them in the supposed attack but said their intention had been to steal money thought to be kept in the palace. The prosecution called for the death penalty. No date has been set for passing sentence but it is believed that it could be before the end of August. If they are sentenced to death they could be executed soon afterwards. There is no right of appeal against conviction or sentence by a military court.

- Expressing concern that the four men were tried by a military court, which provides no right of appeal, and that they did not have adequate legal representation;

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

On 17 February 2009 the authorities alleged that the presidential palace in Malabo had been attacked by a Nigerian armed group, Movement for the Emancipation of the Niger Delta (MEND), assisted by nationals from Equatorial Guinea. At the time of the alleged attack President Obiang was in the country's second city, Bata, on the mainland. Scores of Nigerian residents in Equatorial Guinea were rounded up, imprisoned and many expelled from the country. Seven Nigerian fishermen and traders were arrested at sea. They were charged with attempting to assassinate President Obiang and were tried unfairly, by a civilian court, in March 2010. On 5 April 2010, they were convicted and sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment.

Ten Equatorial Guineans members of the opposition party People's Union (Unión Popular – UP) were also arrested following the alleged attack on the palace. They too were charged with attempting to assassinate President Obiang and were tried in March 2010 together with the seven Nigerian nationals. Charges against eight of the Equatorial Guineans were dropped at the beginning of the trial and the remaining two were acquitted.

According to information received by Amnesty International, the four refugees now at risk of being sentenced to death were tortured to make them confess and implicate others. In those confessions, they said they had taken part in the attack on the palace on 17 February together with a group of Nigerians and that they had arrived by boat. They said they had not had weapons on the boat because they had expected to raid the palace's armoury and take the weapons for the attack. They also said that they fled after being discovered by the security forces.

In December 2009 the UN Human Rights Council, under its Universal Periodic Review mechanism, examined the human rights situation in Equatorial Guinea. During the session, member states made recommendations, 86 of which were accepted by the Equatorial Guinean government, including a recommendation to end the abduction of Equatorial Guinean refugees from neighbouring countries and their subsequent secret detention in Equatorial Guinea. However, the government rejected a recommendation calling for the abolition of the death penalty, saying this presented "moral and juridical difficulties."
