

CRS Report for Congress

Kuwait: Security, Reform, and U.S. Policy

Summary

Kuwait, which has been pivotal to nearly two decades of U.S. involvement in Iraq, has advanced its democratic development since the fall of Saddam Hussein. However, it remains mired in internal wrangling over economic issues and the political dominance of the ruling family, and it is showing signs of Sunni-Shiite tensions previously absent. This report, prepared with the assistance of Kim Klarman, will be updated.

Governmental Changes and Political Reform¹

Kuwait's optimism after the 2003 fall of its nemesis, Saddam Hussein, was interrupted by a succession crisis upon the January 15, 2006, death of Amir (ruler) Jabir Ahmad al-Jabir Al Sabah. His relative, Crown Prince Shaykh Sa'd Abdullah Al Sabah, was declared successor, but his serious illness led Prime Minister Shaykh Sabah al-Ahmad al-Jabir Al-Sabah (about 77, the younger brother of the late Amir) and his branch of the Sabah family to successfully succeed to rulership. After extensive discussions with the elected National Assembly, which had never before had a role in succession, the Assembly formally named Shaykh Sabah as the new Amir on January 29, 2006. The peaceful handling and Assembly involvement in the succession crisis, was widely hailed.

Amir Sabah subsequently sidestepped a tacit agreement to alternate succession between the Jabir and Salem branches of the family by appointing members of his Jabir branch as his Crown Prince/heir apparent (his half-brother, Shaykh Nawwaf al-Ahmad Al Sabah, age 67) and Prime Minister (his nephew, Shaykh Nasser Muhammad al-Ahmad Al Sabah, age 65). The highest ranking "Salem" in the cabinet is Dr. Mohammad Al Sabah, who kept his Foreign Minister post and simultaneously was made a deputy prime minister. In moves that have broadened representation in government, a second Shiite Muslim was named, giving the cabinet two Shiite ministers for the first time since 1992; a third (Minister of Public Works Musa al-Sarraf) was added in March 2007. That reshuffle also added a second woman to the cabinet, Nuriya as-Sabih, as Minister of Education and of Higher Education, joining Massouma Mubarak, a Shiite who was Minister of Health (she was first appointed Minister of Planning in June 2005). Ms. Mubarak resigned in September 2007 after some members of parliament blamed her for mismanagement. In January 2008, MPs levied a similar charge against Ms. al-Sabih, but she survived a no-confidence vote.

Amir Sabah supports political reform, but not at the expense of Sabah control, and Assembly-government differences have widened since the Amir's death, creating a sense of political and economic stagnation in Kuwait. It has the longest serving all-elected National Assembly of the Gulf monarchies; 50 seats are elected, plus up to 15 ministers serving in it ex-officio. The body was established by Kuwait's November 1962 constitution, but the Amir, on several occasions, has used his power to dissolve the Assembly (1976-1981, 1986-1992, 2003, 2006) when the Assembly aggressively challenged the government. The Assembly can vote no confidence in ministers and can veto government decrees made when the Assembly is not in session. Political parties are still not permitted, but factions can compete as "currents," or "trends." Kuwaitis have a parallel tradition of informal political consultations in nightly "diwaniyyas" – social gatherings held by elites.

In May 2006, the Amir suspended the Assembly and called new elections for June 29, 2006, after 29 opposition members — an alliance of liberals and Islamists — demanded to question the Prime Minister over the government's refusal to endorse a proposal to reduce the number of electoral districts to 5, from the current 25. The opposition wanted to increase the size of each district so that it would be more difficult to influence the outcome through alleged "vote buying" or tribal politics. In the 2006 election, the opposition, which attracted youth support under the "Orange" banner, won 34 out of the 50 seats. The election was the first in which women could vote or run, but none of the 27 female candidates (out of 249) won a seat. The schisms between the opposition and the government became unreconcilable in March 2008 when the Assembly insisted on a second pay raise for state employees, beyond one granted by the cabinet in February 2008, as a response to spiraling inflation. The government refused and, on March 17, 2008, the cabinet resigned. The Amir dissolved the Assembly and set new elections for May 17.

The May 17, 2008 elections were the first held since the reduction of electoral districts from 25 to 5 was passed into law. Election results indicate that there will be ongoing conflict between the legislative and executive branches because Islamists and conservative tribal leaders won a total of 24 seats in the new parliament – an increase of four seats. Their allies in opposition to the government – the so-called "liberals" – won seven seats. Shiites increased their representation by one to a total of five seats. Pro-government and other independent tribalists will hold the remaining fourteen seats. As in the 2006 election, none of the 27 women candidates won a seat. Turnout was 68.9%.

Prime Minister Shaykh Sabah announced the formation of a new cabinet only days after the elections. The new cabinet caused an uproar amongst Islamists who voiced opposition to the appointment of two women and a member of the Shiite minority. The two female cabinet members are Nuriya al-Sebih, who was reappointed as the education minister, and Mudhi al-Humoud, a liberal academic, who was appointed as state minister for housing and administrative development. Shiite Fadi Safar, appointed as the minister of public works and municipalities, was detained briefly in March 2008 and questioned over his connection to the local branch of Hezbollah, but formal charges were never brought against him. In June 2008, the newly-formed parliament and cabinet quickly passed a salary increase for public sector employees and approved additional citizens' benefits to help payoff rising personal debts associated with the mounting inflation rate (currently estimated at 10.14%.)

Kuwait's population is only about 3.3 million, of which 1.02 million are citizens. Over the past decade, the government expanded the all-male electorate gradually by extending the franchise to sons of naturalized Kuwaitis and Kuwaitis naturalized for at least twenty (as opposed to thirty) years, but these modifications raised the electorate to only about 130,000, or about 15% of the citizenry. The long deadlock on female suffrage began to break in May 2004, after the government submitted to the Assembly a bill to give women the right to vote and run. (A government attempt in May 1999 to institute female suffrage by decree was vetoed by the Assembly.) In May 2005, then Prime Minister Shaykh Sabah pressed the Assembly to adopt the government bill, which it did on May 16, 2005 (35-23) and which was effective as of the 2006 National Assembly elections. Islamist deputies added a requirement for gender-segregated polling entrances.

The State Department Country Report on Human Rights Practices for 2007 highlighted the licensing of six new daily newspapers during the year but reported that security forces continue to abuse detainees, particularly non-Gulf Arabs and Asians, and that stateless residents ("bidoons") continue to face discrimination. The report also notes that violence against women remains a "serious and overlooked problem." Kuwait is now designated by the State Department's "Trafficking in Persons" report (for 2007) as a "Tier Three" (worst level) country — a downgrade from the 2006 report (Tier Two Watch List) — because Kuwait is not "making significant efforts" to comply with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Official press censorship ended in 1992, and a vibrant press often criticizes the government. The government allows one trade union per occupation, but the only legal trade federation is the Kuwait Trade Union Federation (KTUF). Foreign workers, with the exception of domestic workers, are allowed to join unions. On religious freedom, the State Department report for 2007 reported "no change" in Kuwait's performance during the reporting period. Sunni-Shiite tensions have been previously absent in Kuwait, but Shiite Muslims (about 30% of Kuwait's population) have reported official discrimination, including limited access to religious education. Possibly as a spillover of sectarian tensions in post-Saddam Iraq, sectarian recriminations flared in February 2008 after several Shiite politicians attended a public ceremony commemorating the killing earlier that month of Lebanese Hezbollah terrorist leader Imad Mughniyah. Kuwait has seven officially recognized Christian churches.

The U.S. Embassy in Kuwait uses various programming tools, including dialogue and public diplomacy and funds from the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI), to encourage democracy. MEPI funds have been used to enhance the capabilities of the media, to promote women's rights, to support democracy initiatives, and to provide a broad spectrum of educational opportunities. Several Kuwaiti organizations, such as the Kuwait Women's Cultural and Social Society, actively promote democratization.

U.S.-Kuwait Relations and Cooperation on Iraq

A U.S. consulate was opened in Kuwait in October 1951; it was elevated to an embassy upon Kuwait's independence from Britain in 1961. Kuwait, the first Gulf state to establish relations with the Soviet Union in the 1960s, was not particularly close to the United States until the Iran-Iraq war (1980-88). In 1987-88, the United States established a U.S. naval escort and tanker reflagging program to protect Kuwaiti and international shipping from Iranian naval attacks (Operation Earnest Will). Kuwait's leaders were subsequently shaken by the 1990 Iraqi invasion, and they drew even closer to the United States after U.S. forces liberated Kuwait in the 1991 Persian Gulf War. Kuwait signed a ten-year defense pact with the United States on September 19, 1991 (the text is classified), which reportedly provides for mutual discussions in the event of a crisis; for joint military exercises, U.S. training of Kuwaiti forces, U.S. arms sales, pre-positioning of U.S. military equipment (armor for a U.S. brigade), and U.S. access to Kuwaiti facilities, such as Ali al-Salem Air Base. A related Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA) provides that U.S. forces in Kuwait be subject to U.S. rather than Kuwaiti law.² In September 2001, the pact was renewed for another ten years.

Kuwait contributed materially to the 1991 war and subsequent containment efforts — it paid $16.059 billion to offset the costs of Desert Shield/Desert Storm, funded two thirds of the $51 million per year U.N. budget for the 1991-2003 Iraq-Kuwait Observer Mission (UNIKOM) that monitored the Iraq-Kuwait border; and contributed about $350 million per year for U.S. military costs of Kuwait-based Iraq containment operations, including the 1992-2003 U.S.-led enforcement of a “no fly zone” over southern Iraq (Operation Southern Watch, involving 1,000 Kuwait-based U.S. Air Force personnel. Kuwait hosted an additional 5,000 U.S. forces during Operation Enduring Freedom that ousted the Taliban from Afghanistan.

airport and sea ports, and provided $266 million in burdensharing support to the combat, including base support, personnel support, and supplies such as food and fuel. Since then, according to Defense Department budget documents, Kuwait contributed $213 million in burdensharing support to OIF in FY2005, and contributed $210 million in both FY2006 and FY2007.

Kuwait hosts more than 50,000 U.S. military personnel rotating in or out of Iraq. The key U.S. staging facility in Kuwait is Camp Arifjan and a desert firing range facility, Camp Buehring (Udairi Range). U.S. forces vacated Camp Doha, the headquarters for U.S. forces in Kuwait during the 1990s, in December 2005. Kuwait's facilities would be pivotal in any U.S. withdrawal, and might also host a post-withdrawal U.S. force that could assist the Iraqi government on short notice. U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM) officials said in February 2008 they are establishing in Kuwait a permanent platform for "full spectrum operations" in 27 countries in the region. Among the objectives is to help Kuwait establish a navy. In appreciation of Kuwait's support to OIF, on April 1, 2004, the Bush Administration designated Kuwait as a "major non-NATO ally (MNNA)," a designation held by only one other Gulf state (Bahrain). Kuwait gave $500 million worth of oil to U. S. states affected by Hurricane Katrina.

U.S. officials say that the U.S.-Kuwait defense relationship has improved the quality of the Kuwaiti military, particularly the air force. Its military has now nearly regained its pre-Iraq invasion strength of 17,000. Kuwait, receives no U.S. defense aid, and is not eligible to receive U.S. excess defense articles and. Major post-1991 Foreign Military Sales (FMS) include (1) 218 M1A2 tanks at a value of $1.9 billion in 1993 (deliveries completed in 1998); (2) 5 Patriot anti-missile fire units, including 25 launchers and 210 Patriot missiles, valued at about $800 million, in 1992 sale (delivered by 1998). Some of them were used to intercept Iraqi short-range missiles launched at Kuwait in the 2003 war; (3) 1992 sale of 40 FA-18 combat aircraft (purchase of an additional 10 are under consideration); and (4) September 2002 sale of 16 AH-64 (Apache) helicopters equipped with the Longbow fire-control system, valued at about $940 million. According to the Defense Security Cooperation Agency (DSCA), another $730 million in purchases were agreed during 2005-2007, including a $20 million deal for 436 TOW anti-tank missiles. The first major sale to Kuwait under the "Gulf Security Dialogue" package for the Gulf states, designed to contain Iran, was 80 PAC-3 (Patriot) missiles and 60 PAC-2 missiles and upgrades, valued at about $1.3 billion, notified to Congress on December 4, 2007.

Kuwait is trying to build political ties to newly ascendant Iraqi factions in order to ensure there is no repeat of the 1990 invasion or the Shiite violence that rocked Kuwait in the 1980s. The December 1983 bombings of the U.S. and French embassies in Kuwait and an attempted assassination of the Amir in May 1985 were attributed to the Iraqi Da'wa (Islamic Call) Party, the Shiite party of Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki. Seventeen Da'wa activists were arrested for these attacks and Da'wa activists hijacked a Kuwait Airlines plane in 1987. Since the fall of Saddam Hussein, Kuwait has built a water line into Iraq, and it runs a humanitarian operation center (HOC) that has funneled over $550 million in assistance to Iraqis since Saddam fell, in line with its pledges. Kuwait has pledged to send an ambassador, but it has not established a full embassy to date. On April 22, 2008, Kuwait hosted the third Iraq security conference which included the United States, Iran, and other neighboring countries. However, Kuwait still insists on full U.N.-supervised reparations by Iraq for damages caused from the 1990 invasion; about $41 billion of such payments have been awarded to date, and of that about $11 billion has been paid from an escrow account funded by 5% of Iraq's oil revenues. That percentage was set by U.N. Security Council Resolution 1483 (May 22, 2003), a reduction from 25%. In 2004, Kuwait reportedly pledged to forgive a substantial portion of the $25 billion Saddam era debt, but it has not written off the debt to date. Of the 605 Kuwaitis missing and presumed dead from the 1991 war; the bodies of over 227 have been found (confirmed by DNA tests) in post-Saddam searches. A Kuwait company, First Kuwaiti General Trading and Contracting, was lead contractor on the new U.S. embassy in Iraq.

Other Foreign Policy Issues

After Kuwait's liberation in 1991, Kuwait's fear of Saddam Hussein colored its foreign relations. On the Arab-Israeli dispute, Kuwait was more critical than were the other Gulf states of the late Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat because he publicly opposed war to liberate Kuwait. Kuwait expelled about 450,000 Palestinian workers after liberation. Since Arafat's death, Kuwait has rebuilt its relations with the mainstream Palestinian Authority (PA) leadership. In March 2006, Kuwait pledged $7.5 million per month in aid to the then Hamas-led government, and it later supported a Saudi-brokered Fatah-Hamas unity government in March 2007, which later fractured. Kuwait participated in multilateral peace talks with Israel during 1992-1997, although it did not host any sessions. In 1994, Kuwait was key in persuading the other Gulf monarchies to cease enforcement of the secondary (trade with firms that deal with Israel) and tertiary (trade with firms that do business with blacklisted firms) Arab boycotts of Israel.

Cooperation in Global War on Terrorism. The State Department report on global terrorism for 2007 (released April 2008) credited Kuwait for measures to protect U.S. forces in Kuwait from terrorist attacks but noted that Kuwait has "difficulty prosecuting terrorists and terrorism financiers and facilitators." The report also said that Kuwait has continued to prosecute 36 members of the "Lions of the Peninsula" extremist group. Kuwait is criticized for not enacting stronger antiterrorism and money laundering legislation in 2007. On June 13, 2008, the Treasury Department froze the assets of a Kuwaiti charity with alleged links to Al Qaeda – the Revival of Islamic Heritage Society – under Executive Order 13224.

Economic Policy

Although Kuwait has a relatively open economy, U.S. officials have attempted to persuade Kuwait to open to foreign investment in the energy sector and to expand the private sector. Kuwait's state-owned oil industry still accounts for 75% of government income and 90% of export earnings. The United States imports about 260,000 barrels per day in crude oil from Kuwait (about 3% of U.S. oil imports). Kuwait's proven crude oil reserves are about 95 billion barrels, enough for about 140 years at current production levels (about 2.5 million barrels per day). The Kuwaiti government wants to open its northern oil fields to foreign investment ("Project Kuwait") to generate about 500,000 barrels per day of extra production, but the National Assembly has blocked the $8.5 billion project for over a decade because of concerns about Kuwait's sovereignty. There are ongoing discussions about reviving the project. In 1994, Kuwait became a founding member of the World Trade Organization (WTO). In February 2004, the United States and Kuwait signed a Trade and Investment Framework Agreement (TIFA), often viewed as a prelude to a free trade agreement (FTA), which Kuwait has said it seeks.
