Male Captus Bene Detentus?

Paulussen, C.Y.M.

Publication date:
2010

Document Version
Publisher's PDF, also known as Version of record

MALE CAPTUS BENE DETENTUS? SURRENDERING SUSPECTS TO THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

Cover: Escorted by police motorcycles, two vehicles, one reportedly carrying ICC suspect Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, arrive at Scheveningen prison, the Netherlands, on 17 March 2006. (AP Photo/Fred Ernst.)

The research for this dissertation was financially supported by the Netherlands Organisation for Scientific Research (NWO).

SCHOOL OF HUMAN RIGHTS RESEARCH SERIES, Volume 41.

A commercial edition of this dissertation will be published by Intersentia under ISBN 978-94-000-0100-8.

The titles published in this series are listed at the end of this volume.

MALE CAPTUS BENE DETENTUS?

SURRENDERING SUSPECTS TO THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

PROEFSCHRIFT

ter verkrijging van de graad van doctor
aan de Universiteit van Tilburg, op gezag van de rector magnificus, prof.dr. Ph. Eijlander, in het openbaar te verdedigen ten overstaan van een door het college voor promoties aangewezen commissie in de aula van de Universiteit op vrijdag 24 september 2010 om 14.15 uur door

Christophe Yves Marie Paulussen,

geboren op 29 oktober 1979 te Maastricht

Promotiecommissie:

Promotores:	prof.dr. W.J.M. Van Genugten
	prof.dr. M.S. Groenhuijsen
Overige leden:	prof.dr. A.H.J. Swart prof.dr. H.G. Van der Wilt prof.dr. G.K. Sluiter
	dr. A.L.M. De Brouwer

To my father Charles and my mother Liesbeth, the kind of parents that any child should be entitled to

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

In the introductory words of his 2007 article 'Abducted Fugitives Before the International Criminal Court: Problems and Prospects', Robert J. Currie puts forward the question of why one would wish to revisit "every international law student's favourite essay topic [emphasis added, ChP]". Now, Currie's article is original, inspiring and well-written, but here, he appears to be wide of the mark: he does not provide the reader with any further evidence to sustain this bold statement, thereby seemingly violating one of the most precious commands in the scientific world, namely to write in a verifiable way.

However, was there really any need for Currie to insert a footnote with references here? Of course not. Some statements are simply so true that they do not need to be supported by further evidence.

In 2004, I wrote and defended my master's thesis, entitled 'Male Captus Bene Detentus? Human Rights and the Transfer of Suspects to International Criminal Tribunals', at the Law Faculty of Tilburg University. Luckily, I was (and, by the way, still am) so intrigued by this fascinating topic that I was able to transfer some of my enthusiasm regarding this subject to the text and its readers. As a result, the thesis was well-received, which, among other things, enabled me to gain a position in the first generation of students following the research master of the Tilburg Graduate Law School. This, in turn, led to a PhD position, as from September 2005, at the Department of International and European Public Law, a very competent and cosy department where I already had the privilege to work between 2001 and 2003 as a student-assistant.

Now, four and a half years later, I am writing the final words of this PhD thesis – the acknowledgements. Being aware of the fact that these are normally the most often read words of any PhD thesis, especially of those which are so massive that they could be used in a ripping-huge-books-in-half challenge of a strongman competition, I will choose my words carefully.

Obviously, my first words of thanks go to Willem Van Genugten and Marc Groenhuijsen, my supervisors. I will not easily forget their enormous confidence and support in every project I was involved in over the last years, whether it was related to this thesis, to an article, to a lecture, to a presentation or to a project such as Alpe d'HuZes, which had absolutely nothing to do with my work as a PhD researcher in international criminal law. It has been great to work with such excellent researchers and – far more importantly – with such kind personalities.

Secondly, I must mention the distinguished members of the reading committee who were willing to read and comment on my PhD thesis: Bert Swart, Harmen Van der Wilt, Göran Sluiter and Anne-Marie De Brouwer. I knew from the start that these experts in the absorbing field of international criminal law were the persons I wanted to ask for my committee and I am therefore grateful and honoured that they all accepted the invitation.

Special thanks should go to Steve Lambley of Steve Lambley Information Design in The Hague. While stressing that I have made the final choices with respect to his suggestions and thus that any errors remain, of course, my own, Steve has done a truly outstanding job in very swiftly and precisely "polishing up" the English of the main text.

In addition, I would like to thank Tom Scheirs, Isabelle Van Dongen and Myriam-Alexandra Vreven for their help at Intersentia Publishers and the Netherlands Organisation for Scientific Research (NWO) for financially supporting this research.

More personal thanks go to (my roomies and paranymphs) Vera and Maartje and my many other dear friends and colleagues about whom I could write a laudatio of such length here that even the strongest man in the world would not be able to rip this book in half. With dinners, concerts, visits to amusement parks, sporting events, '(vrimi)bo's', movies, holidays abroad, stupid e-mails or just a simple good conversation, they have, in the words of a good friend, "kept me sane in this otherwise oh-so-lonely profession", and hopefully will continue to keep me that way for the rest of my life.

My final words of thanks go to my family, in particular Charles, Liesbeth, Caroline, Maurice and Rens. The endless and unconditional support of these wonderful people in everything I do is moving, to say the least.

Christophe Paulussen
Tilburg, 1 March 2010

TABLE OF CONTENTS

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

ACHPR	African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights
ACHR	American Convention on Human Rights
AIDC	Académie Internationale de Droit Comparé
AIDP	Association Internationale de Droit Pénal
ARACHR	Arab Charter on Human Rights
Art(t).	Article(s)
ASP	Assembly of States Parties
ATCA	Alien Tort Claims Act
ATS	Alien Tort Statute
AU	African Union
CAR	Central African Republic
cf.	confer [compare]
CISCHR	Commonwealth of Independent States Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms
CPI	Cour Pénale Internationale
DARS	Draft articles on responsibility of States for internationally wrongful acts
DEA	Drug Enforcement Administration
Doc.	Document
DRC	Democratic Republic of the Congo
EAW	European Arrest Warrant
ECCC	Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia
ECHR	European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms
ECmHR	European Commission of Human Rights
ECtHR	European Court of Human Rights
ed(s).	editor(s)
edn.	edition
enl.	enlarged
EofC	Elements of Crimes
et al.	et alii/aliae/alia [and others]
etc.	et cetera [and so on]
et seq.	et sequentes [and the following ones]
EU	European Union
EUFOR	European Union Force

FBI	Federal Bureau of Investigation
ff	foliis [and (on) the following pages]
FRY	Federal Republic of Yugoslavia
FTCA	Federal Tort Claims Act
GA	General Assembly
GC	Geneva Convention
HRC	Human Rights Committee
IACtHR	Inter-American Court of Human Rights
Ibid.	Ibidem [In the same place]
ICC	International Criminal Court
ICCPR	International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights
ICESCR	International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights
ICJ	International Court of Justice
ICTR	International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda
ICTY	International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia
IFOR	Implementation Force
ILC	International Law Commission
IMT(s)	International Military Tribunal(s)
IRA	Irish Republican Army
KFOR	Kosovo Force
LRA	Lord's Resistance Army
MLC	Mouvement de Libération du Congo
MONUC	Mission de l'Organisation des Nations Unies en République démocratique du Congo (UN Mission in the DRC)
NATO	North Atlantic Treaty Organisation
No(s).	Number(s)
OAS	Organisation de l'Armée Secrète
OAS	Organization of American States
OR	Official Records
OTP	Office of the Prosecutor
p(p).	page(s)
para(s).	paragraph(s)
PCIJ	Permanent Court of International Justice
QC	Queen's Counsel
Res.	Resolution
rev.	revised
RPE	Rules of Procedure and Evidence
RS	Republika Srpska
SC	(US) Supreme Court
SCSL	Special Court for Sierra Leone
SFOR	Stabilisation Force
SG	Secretary-General
STL	Special Tribunal for Lebanon
Supp.	Supplement

UDHR	Universal Declaration of Human Rights
UK	United Kingdom
UN	United Nations
UNAMID	United Nations-African Union Mission in Darfur
UNMIK	United Nations Mission in Kosovo
UNMIL	United Nations Mission in Liberia
UNMIS	United Nations Mission in Sudan
UNSC	United Nations Security Council
UNTAES	United Nations Transitional Authority in Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium
UNTAET	United Mission Transitional Administration in East Timor
US(A)	United States (of America)
USSR	Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
Vol.	Volume
WW	World War

PART 1

INTRODUCTION

CHAPTER I
GENERAL INTRODUCTION

1 CONTEXTUALISING THE PROBLEM

1.1 From the past...

> The men in the first car had almost given up hope. They saw the bus stopping but didn't think anything would happen. All of a sudden Kenet noticed someone walking at the side of the road. It was too dark to make out who it was. "Someone's coming," he said to Gabi, "but I can't see who it is." A few seconds later, in a whisper that sounded to him like a shout, he exclaimed, "It's him!" Gabi's heart leapt with excitement. He threw a hurried glance at his men to check that they were all in position. Eli picked out the approaching figure immediately, but it took Gabi another fifteen seconds. Meanwhile, Klement was turning the corner into Garibaldi Street. Kenet hissed in Gabi's ear, "He's got one hand in his pocket – he may have a revolver. Do I tell Eli?" "Tell him," Gabi answered. "Eli," Kenet whispered, "watch out for a gun. He's got his hand in his pocket." Klement was standing right in front of the car. "Momentito," Eli said and sprang at him. Panic-stricken, Klement stepped back. In their practice exercises Eli had used the method called sentry tackle, seizing the man from behind and dragging him backward, but Kenet's warning about the gun forced him to change his tactics. He pounced on Klement to bring him down, but because Klement had stepped back Eli's leap brought them both crashing to the ground. As he fell, Klement let out a terrible yell, like a wild beast caught in a trap.[1]

This extract describes the thrilling details of Ricardo Klement's abduction in Buenos Aires, Argentina, on 11 May 1960. Klement, better known as Adolf Eichmann, the former head of the Gestapo section which had to implement the policy of the 'final solution' of the Jews in Europe,[2] was seized by agents of Israel's Secret Service the

[1] Harel 1975, pp. 165-166.

[2] See the 1946 Judgment of the IMT of Nuremberg, under 'War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity' and 'Persecution of the Jews' (read by Judge Nikitchenko and available at: http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/judwarcr.asp): "In the summer of 1941 (...), plans were made for the "final solution" of the Jewish question in all of Europe. This "final solution" meant the extermination of the Jews, which early in 1939 Hitler had threatened would be one of the consequences of an outbreak of war, and a special section in the Gestapo under Adolf Eichmann, as head of Section B4 of the Gestapo, was formed to carry out the policy."

Mossad[3] and, a little more than nine days after the capture, flown to Israel to face justice.[4]

Like Eichmann, Argentina was not content with the abduction – albeit, of course, for other reasons. The South American State charged Israel with violation of its sovereignty rights and claimed that the latter had illegally exercised authority on Argentine territory.[5] As a consequence, it demanded that Eichmann be returned to Argentina and that the captors be punished by Israel.[6] When Argentina felt that reparation was not forthcoming through direct negotiations with Israel,[7] it lodged a complaint with the UNSC, which requested Israel "to make appropriate reparation".[8] It thereby thus (implicitly) declared that Israel committed an international wrong – otherwise the reparation would not have been necessary. In a joint communiqué issued on 3 August 1960, the two Governments stated that they "resolve[d] to regard as closed the incident which arose out of the action taken by citizens of Israel, which infringed the fundamental rights of the State of Argentina".[9]

After the settlement of the 'incident',[10] the trial commenced before the District Court of Jerusalem. Eichmann was charged with crimes against the Jewish people, crimes against humanity, war crimes and membership of hostile organisations.[11] After the 15-count indictment was read to Eichmann, his counsel Servatius raised the preliminary objection that the Court had no jurisdiction because, among other things, "the Accused was seized forcibly and kidnapped and brought before the Court".[12] This can be seen as a reference to the dictum ex iniuria ius non oritur, which means that no right (in this case: jurisdiction to try Eichmann) can be derived from a wrong (in this case: Eichmann's abduction in Argentina).[13] Although

---

[3] See, for example, Shaw 2003, p. 577, Cryer et al. 2007. p. 46 or even the website of the Israeli Secret Service itself, available at: http://www.mossad.gov.il/Eng/About/IsarHarel.aspx. This site, like every site from this book, has been last accessed on 1 March 2010, the date this book was finalised. This also means that this book has not taken into account material which became available after that date.

[4] In the words of the accused himself: "I was assaulted in Buenos Aires, tied to a bed for a week and then drugged by injections in my arms and brought to the airport in Buenos Aires; from there I was flown out of Argentina." (Statement by the Accused on the sentence, The Trial of Adolf Eichmann, Record of Proceedings in the District Court of Jerusalem, Vol. V, Session 120, available at: http://www.nizkor.org/hweb/people/e/eichmann-adolf/transcripts/Sessions/Session-120-03.html.)

[5] See Silving 1961, p. 312.

[6] See ibid.

[7] See Baade 1961, p. 407.

[8] UNSC Res. 138 of 23 June 1960.

[9] District Court of Jerusalem, The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann, 'Judgment', 12 December 1961, Criminal Case No. 40/61, para. 40 (36 International Law Reports 1968, p. 59).

[10] For a more thorough examination on the diplomatic tension between Argentina and Israel after Eichmann's abduction, see Subsection 3.3.2 of Chapter III.

[11] See The Trial of Adolf Eichmann, Record of Proceedings in the District Court of Jerusalem, Vol. 1, Session 1, available at:
http://www.nizkor.org/hweb/people/e/eichmann-adolf/transcripts/Sessions/Session-001-01.html and http://www.nizkor.org/hweb/people/e/eichmann-adolf/transcripts/Sessions/Session-001-02.html.

[12] Ibid., available at:
http://www.nizkor.org/hweb/people/e/eichmann-adolf/transcripts/Sessions/Session-001-02.html.

[13] See Lasok 1962, p. 360, Green 1963, pp. 641-642 and Strijards 2003, p. 754.

Attorney-General Hausner did not deny the kidnapping itself, he was not impressed by Servatius' argument and stated:

> [W]here a person is legally [a]ccused of committing a crime and he is legally kept under arrest at the time when he is brought before the Court and stands his trial, the Court should not examine the circumstances which led to the fact that the Accused (…) is brought before the Court. In other words – the circumstances of the Accused's detention, his seizure and his transfer are not relevant for competence and they contain nothing which can affect this competence, and since they are not relevant, they should not be considered and evidence concerning them should not be heard.[14]

The judges of the District Court of Jerusalem, like their colleagues of the Israeli Supreme Court (on appeal), concurred with this counter-argument,[15] which can be viewed as an application of another Latin maxim: male captus bene detentus,[16] sometimes referred to as the 'tough luck rule':[17] a court can properly detain a person (read: can properly exercise jurisdiction over a person) (bene detentus), even if that person was brought into the power of that court in an irregular way (male captus). It is this maxim which is at the core of this study.

---

[14] The Trial of Adolf Eichmann, Record of Proceedings in the District Court of Jerusalem, Vol. 1, Session 1, available at:
http://www.nizkor.org/hweb/people/e/eichmann-adolf/transcripts/Sessions/Session-001-05.html.

[15] See District Court of Jerusalem, The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann, 'Decision on the Preliminary Objections', 17 April 1961, Criminal Case No. 40/61, available at:
http://www.nizkor.org/hweb/people/e/eichmann-adolf/transcripts/Sessions/Session-006-01.html: "As for the arguments over the circumstances under which the Accused was brought to the State of Israel, in view of the fact that we have found that the Court has jurisdiction to try the Accused, the manner in which he was brought within the jurisdiction of this Court has no relevance according to law, neither has the fact whether he was apprehended abroad by emissaries of the governing authorities of the State of Israel or not."; District Court of Jerusalem, The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann, 'Judgment', 12 December 1961, Criminal Case No. 40/61, para. 41 (36 International Law Reports 1968, p. 59): "It is an established rule of law that a person being tried for an offence against the laws of a State may not oppose his trial by reason of the illegality of his arrest or of the means whereby he was brought within the jurisdiction of that State. The courts in England, the United States and Israel have constantly held that the circumstances of the arrest and the mode of bringing of the accused into the territory of the State have no relevance to his trial, and they have consistently refused in all instances to enter upon an examination of these circumstances."; Supreme Court of Israel, Adolf Eichmann v. The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel, 'Judgment', 29 May 1962, Criminal Appeal No. 336/61, para. 13 (36 International Law Reports 1968, pp. 306 and 307): "[W]e agree with the reasoning of the District Court in its entirety and shall therefore content ourselves here with a brief reply to some of the contentions by which counsel for the appellant sought to destroy it. (…) As has been indicated, the moment it is conceded that the State of Israel possesses criminal jurisdiction both according to local law and according to the law of nations, the Court is no longer bound to investigate the manner and legality of the appellant's detention, as indeed may be gathered from the judgments upon which the District Court has rightly relied."

[16] See Strijards 2003, p. 755 and Sloan 2005, p. 497.

[17] See Paust et al. 1996, p. 454.

1.2 …via the 'war on terror'…

Almost half a century later, irregular methods are still used to seize suspects (of serious crimes). For example, in the 'war on terror', it seems that the ends often justify the means: suspects of terrorism are to be caught, while the way they are caught is considered less important.[18] For example, in the Amnesty International Report 2005, one can read:

> There is strong evidence that the global security agenda pursued since 11 September 2001, the US-led "war on terror", and the USA's selective disregard for international law encouraged and fuelled abuses by governments and others in all regions of the world. In many countries, new doctrines of security continued to stretch the concept of "war" into areas formerly considered law enforcement, promoting the notion that human rights can be curtailed when it comes to the detention, interrogation and prosecution of "terrorist" suspects.[19]

One can easily add the word 'arrest' here as well: in 2006, both a committee from the Council of Europe and the European Parliament issued reports in which one can find several examples of abduction operations involving terror suspects.[20] The most

[18] This is perhaps also due to the dangerous metaphor 'war on terror' which can be interpreted as meaning that the normal rules of criminal justice do not apply in this context at all. (See the famous phrase of Cicero from Pro Milone: silent [enim] leges inter arma, "[l]aws are silent amid arms" (Garner 2004, p. 1758).) Admittedly, two international armed conflicts have taken place within the wider context of the 'war on terror' (Afghanistan and Iraq) and in those conflicts, most legal rules are different than those applicable in peace situations. (See Borelli 2005, p. 46.) That, however, is not saying at all that the laws are silent in this context. In addition, "[t]o the minds of those who invoke that notion, (…) the "war on terror" extends far beyond the conflicts in Afghanistan and Iraq to encompass all the anti-terror operations which have taken place since September 2001." (Ibid.) Every operation within the context of the 'war on terror' not related to proper armed conflicts should be executed within the normal context of criminal justice. In the words of MacDonald: "On the streets of London, there is no such thing as a 'war on terror', just as there can be no such thing as a 'war on drugs'. (...) We should hold it as an article of faith that crimes of terrorism are dealt with by criminal justice." (K. MacDonald, 'Security and Rights' (Speech to the UK Criminal Bar Association), 23 January 2007, available at: http://www.cps.gov.uk/news/articles/security_rights.)

[19] Amnesty International Report 2005: The state of the world's human rights (available at: http://www.amnesty.org/en/library/info/POL10/001/2005), under ''Terror', 'counter-terror' and the rule of law'.

[20] See Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights (rapporteur: D. Marty), Parliamentary Assembly, Council of Europe, Alleged secret detentions and unlawful inter-state transfers of detainees involving Council of Europe member states, Doc. 10957, 12 June 2006 and (from the same rapporteur) Secret detentions and illegal transfers of detainees involving Council of Europe member states: second report, Explanatory Memorandum, AS/Jur (2007) 36, 7 June 2007. See also: Temporary Committee on the alleged use of European countries by the CIA for the transportation and illegal detention of prisoners (rapporteur: G.C. Fava), European Parliament, Report on the alleged use of European countries by the CIA for the transportation and illegal detention of prisoners (2006/2200 (INI)), 30 January 2007 (FINAL A6-0020/2007) and European Parliament, European Parliament Resolution on the alleged use of European countries by the CIA for the transportation and illegal detention of prisoners (2006/2200(INI)), 14 February 2007 (P6_TA(2007)0032). See finally: Amnesty International, State of denial. Europe's role in rendition and secret detention, June 2008. See for earlier publications on this subject, for example: Association of the Bar of the City of New York & Center for Human Rights and famous example is probably that of Hassan Osama Mustafa Nasr, also known as Abu Omar, in Milan, Italy. On 17 June 2003, this Egyptian cleric was "grabbed on the sidewalk by two men, sprayed in the face with chemicals and stuffed into a van".[21]

> Italian authorities suspect the Egyptian was the target of a CIA-sponsored operation known as rendition, in which terrorism suspects are forcibly taken for interrogation to countries where torture is practiced. (…) The CIA has kept details of rendition cases a closely guarded secret, but has defended the controversial practice as an effective and legal way to prevent terrorism. Intelligence officials have testified that they have relied on the tactic with greater frequency since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.[22]

These words show that it might not even be the intention of the kidnappers to bring the suspects to a courtroom, but merely to an interrogation room. In such a case, the male captus bene detentus maxim does not even have to be applied, for the case will not entail the involvement of a judge.[23] Admittedly, these practices are therefore not directly interesting for the purpose of this book.[24] However, they nevertheless

---

Global Justice, Torture by Proxy: International and Domestic Law Applicable to "Extraordinary Renditions", ABCNY & NYU School of Law, New York, 2004 and Center for Human Rights and Global Justice, Beyond Guantánamo: Transfers to Torture One Year After Rasul v. Bush, NYU School of Law, New York, 2005. It may be interesting to note that apparently, the new US Administration is not going to change its policy in that respect: "The Los Angeles Times on Sunday (1 February [2009]) revealed that according to executive orders signed by Mr Obama on 22 January, the CIA is to be permitted to engage in the abduction of terrorist suspects, so long as this is only performed for short-term periods." (L. Phillips, 'US rendition flights to continue', EUobserver, 3 February 2009, available at: http://euobserver.com/9/27523.) In Phillips' article, one can also find the following interesting remarks: "The US daily quotes an anonymous administration official as saying that the practice could be expanded as it is the last mechanism that remains to capture individuals suspected of terrorism. "Obviously you need to preserve some tools – you still have to go after the bad guys," the US official told the LA Times. "The legal advisors working on this looked at rendition. It is controversial in some circles and kicked up a big storm in Europe. But if done within certain parameters, it is an acceptable practice.""

[21] C. Whitlock, 'Europeans Investigate CIA Role in Abductions', The Washington Post, 13 March 2005, available at: http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/articles/A30275-2005Mar12.html.

[22] Ibid. Note that such tactics, even though '9/11' strengthened the feeling that they could be used in the terrorism context, were, in fact, indeed already part of a pre-'9/11' policy. A good example of this is Presidential Decision Directive (PDD) 39, 'US Policy on Counterterrorism' of 21 June 1995 (signed by Clinton): "If we do not receive adequate cooperation from a state that harbors a terrorist whose extradition we are seeking, we shall take appropriate measures to induce cooperation. Return of suspects by force may be effected without the cooperation of the host government". (See Borelli 2004, p. 351.) See also Kash 1997.

[23] See also Arbour 2006, pp. 514-515, who contrasts the 'old normal' with the 'new normal': "Reasonable people may disagree about the appropriate framework that should govern the apprehension and transfer to trial of an international terrorist suspect, war criminal or torturer. (...) But what all these cases [in the 'old normal', ChP] have in common (...) is that they were ultimately aimed at bringing alleged criminals to justice. (...) [The] features of the 'new normal' are characterized by the fact that it would appear that terrorist suspects are being arrested, detained and interrogated with no apparent intention of bringing them to trial." See also Parry 2005, p. 529.

[24] However, one can imagine (or at least hope) that if a suspect, after being kidnapped, interrogated and tortured, would nevertheless be brought before a judge, that that judge has no option but to refuse clearly demonstrate more generally that in the context of the struggle against terrorism, authorities may not hesitate to resort to irregular means of obtaining custody over high-level suspects. Now, if suspects of terrorism are 'lucky' enough to be brought to justice after their alleged irregular arrest, and if the outcome of the suspect's case is not already settled because of an established rule of law applicable to any suspect, whether that suspect is charged with fraud, genocide or terrorism (cf. the case in Eichmann and the text in footnote 15), one can imagine that the judge, in balancing all the different interests at stake, will probably not refuse jurisdiction too readily because of the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes and hence the importance of the continuation of the trial.[25]

1.3 …to the International Criminal Court

It has become clear from the above that the use of irregular means was (Eichmann) and is still (Abu Omar) considered an option in apprehending suspects, especially when the interests are (considered to be) strong. After all, it seems obvious that the authorities of State A would not easily put, among other things, relations with State B on the line by abducting a person from the latter State if that person is merely suspected of fraud. Conversely, the authorities of State A might consider the possibility of abduction more seriously if that person is suspected of serious crimes such as genocide or terrorism.

The link with the International Criminal Court (hereinafter: ICC) is now easily made: this Court tries suspects of "the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole",[26] namely genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and aggression.[27] The crime of terrorism – the previous subsection was jurisdiction. See also the remainder of Arbour's words (in n. 23): "And I say 'with no apparent intention of bringing them to trial' because the circumstances of their arrest, detention and interrogation – take only the length of their detention – would in any credible jurisdiction amount to such an abuse of process that trial jurisdiction, if it ever existed, could never be exercised."

---

[25] Although much will, of course, depend on the exact circumstances. Cf. the Al-Moayad case, to be discussed in Chapter V.

[26] Art. 5, para. 1 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (hereinafter: ICC Statute).

[27] Note that at the time the ICC Statute was signed in Rome, there was no consensus on the exact definition of the crime of aggression (the waging of an unlawful war). Between 31 May and 11 June 2010, a Review Conference will be held in Kampala, Uganda, to review and where necessary amend the ICC Statute (see Art. 5, para. 2 of the ICC Statute: "The Court shall exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression once a provision is adopted in accordance with articles 121 [entitled 'Amendments', ChP] and 123 [entitled 'Review of the Statute', ChP] defining the crime and setting out the conditions under which the Court shall exercise jurisdiction with respect to this crime. Such a provision shall be consistent with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations.") and this will, of course, constitute an excellent opportunity to retry reaching consensus on a precise definition. If that were to be realised, then the possibility of the ICC to actually prosecute persons responsible for waging an unlawful war would be within reach. The point 'Proposals for a provision on the crime of aggression' has, in any case, been included in the provisional agenda of the Review Conference, see point 9 (b) of the draft provisional agenda, available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/RC2010/RevConf-prov-agenda.ENG.15-September-2009.pdf. See for more information on this topic, for example, A. Seibert-Fohr, 'The Crime of Aggression: Adding a Definition to the Rome Statute of the ICC', ASIL Insights, Vol. 12, Issue 24, 18 November 2008, available at: http://www.asil.org/insights081118.cfm.

not only included to show that abductions still take place in our times – is not mentioned in the ICC's jurisdiction ratione materiae, but this might change in the future.[28] Furthermore, acts of terrorism might also fall under existing ICC crimes.[29]

Now, what is the ICC's position on suspects[30] claiming to have been the victim of a male captus? Does it opt for effectiveness (in the sense of achieving prosecutions and convictions), male captus bene detentus and a continuation of the case? Or is it of the opinion that values such as fairness, human rights and the integrity of its proceedings demand that in the case of an irregular arrest, the exercise of jurisdiction must be refused: ex iniuria ius non oritur?[31] Of course, one [28] As explained in the previous footnote, the ICC Statute, including its jurisdiction ratione materiae, can be amended pursuant to Art. 121 of the ICC Statute. In this context, reference should be made to Resolution E adopted at the Rome Conference in 1998 (see Annex 1 ('Resolutions Adopted by the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court') to the Final Act of the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Done at Rome on 17 July 1998, UN Doc. A/CONF.183/10, 17 July 1998). This resolution states, among other things: "The United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Having adopted the Statute of the International Criminal Court, (…) Regretting that no generally acceptable definition of the crimes of terrorism and drug crimes could be agreed upon for the inclusion, within the jurisdiction of the Court, (…) Recommends that a Review Conference pursuant to article 123 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court consider the crimes of terrorism and drug crimes with a view to arriving at an acceptable definition and their inclusion in the list of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court [emphasis in original, ChP]." In the context of the 2010 Review Conference, the Netherlands has proposed to include terrorism as a distinct crime in the ICC Statute pursuant to the above-mentioned Resolution E (comparable with the method used in 1998 in the context of the crime of aggression, meaning that the crime should now be included and that States can later agree on its exact definition and on the conditions regarding the exercise of jurisdiction with respect to that crime). See for more information on this proposal (and the initial reactions from other States): ASP, Eighth session, The Hague, 18 – 26 November 2009, OR (ICC-ASP/8/20), Annex II (Report of the Working Group on the Review Conference), paras. 40-51.

[29] See Goldstone and Simpson 2003, p. 24: "The effectiveness of the ICC as a forum for the prosecution of acts of terrorism is hampered by the fact that the crime of terrorism may only be included within the ICC's jurisdiction by way of amendment, which can happen no earlier than seven years after the Statute has come into force (i.e., 2009). Moreover, if such an amendment is made to the Statute, it will only be binding on those States Parties that accept it. In the interim, other kinds of fora must be used to prosecute any acts of terrorism that occur, unless of course the acts also fall under the definition of one of the crimes already within the ICC's competence [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[30] The word 'suspect' has been chosen in this book to typify the person under ICC investigation whose charges have not been confirmed yet – the person who will normally make the male captus claim. (After the confirmation of the charges, the actual trial process starts and the 'suspect' becomes an accused.) However, one must be aware of the fact that the term 'suspect' has been merely chosen for convenience sake: the ICC Statute itself does not use it. See also Hall 2008 A, p. 1097: "The drafters of the Rome Statute decided not to use the term "suspect", in part because some states thought that it would lead to premature prejudice against the person targeted by an investigation. However, in line with others who have sought to avoid the resulting awkwardness, this Commentary uses the term "suspect" to describe a person with regard to whom "there are grounds to believe that [he or she] has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court" and with respect to whom the Pre-Trial Chamber has not confirmed charges pursuant to article 61 para. 7, at which point a suspect becomes an "accused"". Cf. also Edwards 2001, p. 332, n. 33.

[31] This dilemma is reminiscent of Packer's two models of the criminal process: the Due Process Model and the Crime Control Model (see Packer 1968, pp. 149*ff*). See also Trechsel 2005, p. 84: "Crime can assume that much will depend on the exact circumstances here, for example, on the sort of male captus involved, but it is nevertheless good to keep this basic dilemma in mind when embarking on this study.

Luckily, this intriguing dilemma can now be examined, for already in the very first cases of the ICC, male captus claims were made to which the judges had to respond. However, when the first words of this book were written (in September 2005), when it was not yet clear that the ICC would issue male captus decisions, it was already predicted that the ICC would probably be confronted by male captus cases some day. This prediction was based on the following two features of the ICC's system.

First, the ICC cannot try suspects in absentia, that is, without them being present in the courtroom.[32] Hence, a trial can only commence when the suspect is in The Hague and, in most cases, that means that the person must be arrested and surrendered.[33] In other words, the arrest and surrender normally constitutes a conditio sine qua non to prosecution.[34]

Secondly, the ICC does not have its own police force. This means that it is dependent on others – one could hereby think of States and international forces – in the enforcement of arrests and surrenders. It can be seen, to use Cassese's famous and often-quoted metaphor when he was typifying the ICTY, as "a giant without arms and legs"[35] who "needs artificial limbs to walk and work".[36]

These two features can lead to the following two scenarios.

First, it may occur that a State is unwilling to cooperate with the ICC, for example, because the suspect still enjoys considerable support from the public back home and those in power do not feel like taking measures which will not be well received by their constituents[37] or because those in power are themselves being investigated by the Court.[38] In those cases, the ICC is dependent on a State which does not want to cooperate with the Court in The Hague. The question is how long the ICC can wait for suspects to be arrested – how damaging a prolonged period of control emphasizes outcome justice, effectiveness, and speediness, while due process centres on the right of the individual, the rights of defence, in short the concept of procedural justice."

---

[32] See Art. 63, para. 1 of the ICC Statute. See n. 1 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII for more information.

[33] As will become clear in Subsection 3.1 of Chapter VIII, a suspect can also be summoned to come to The Hague (without the necessity of arrest). Finally, there is the possibility that a suspect appears voluntarily before the judges. However, even though the ICC case of Abu Garda has already shown that an arrest may not be necessary, one can assume that this situation will not occur too often.

[34] See also Young 2001, p. 317.

[35] Cassese 1998, p. 13.

[36] Ibid. See in that respect also the title of Maogoto's article: 'A Giant Without Limbs: The International Criminal Court's State-Centric Cooperation Regime' (Maogoto 2004).

[37] Cf. in that respect the case of Croatian 'war hero' Gotovina in the context of the ICTY. See also Ph. Vallières-Roland, 'Prosecuting War Criminals: A Critique of the Relationship between NATO and the International Criminal Courts', Centre for European Security and Disarmament (CESD) – Briefing Paper, February 2002, available at http://www.isis-europe.org/pdf/2008_artrel_87_2002_archives_59_paper.natoandiccs.pdf, p. 7.

[38] See in that respect the situation in Darfur, Sudan before the ICC.

non-cooperation is for the ICC's credibility in the world.[39] Now, the ICC is a permanent international criminal court, so in a way, time is on its side: it can wait.[40] However, victims of the suspect in whom the ICC is interested (especially if that suspect is still continuing to commit his[41] crimes) do not have this luxury: they cannot wait. Their existence, in contrast to the ICC's, is not eternal.[42] Hence, it is not difficult to imagine that if a situation of non-cooperation lasts for quite some time, (international) pressure for 'results' will increase. And such pressure will probably not only be focused on the non-cooperative State, but also on the ICC itself as the latter, in the eyes of the international community, may not have been as efficient in trying suspects of international crimes as was hoped for.[43] In such a situation, it is not unthinkable that ICC officials may be inclined to look for more 'creative' ways in bringing suspects to The Hague,[44] even if such methods do not strictly follow the legal procedures to which the Court should adhere.[45]

---

[39] Cf. Ruxton 2001, p. 20, writing on the experience of the ICTY: "We had great difficulty in securing arrests in the early period. To such an extent that the credibility of the whole institution was put in jeopardy."

[40] See the following words of Chief Prosecutor of the ICC Moreno Ocampo: "To be indicted by the ICC is very serious. I would like Harun to be arrested quickly, but the court is a permanent one and it can wait." (S. Bradley, 'Prosecutor has Darfur masterminds in sights', Swissinfo, 12 March 2008, available at: http://www.swissinfo.org/eng/search/Result.html?siteSect=882&ty=st&sid=8848704.)

[41] As will become clear in the remainder of this study, almost all the suspects who will be reviewed in this book have the dubious honour of being male persons. As a result, the words 'he' and 'his' will be used when the sex of the suspect to which is being referred is not clear. For convenience sake, the masculine words 'he' and 'his' will also be used for other persons than suspects if the sex of that person is unclear. However, it is evident that in both situations, the feminine words 'she' and 'her' could and should be read here as well.

[42] See the above-mentioned (see n. 40) interview where Moreno Ocampo's words "it can wait" are followed by: "The problem is the victims. Harun is still active. It's not just about punishing him; we need to stop his activities." (Bradley 2008.) Note furthermore that long delays may also have other consequences, see Harmon and Gaynor 2004, p. 410, writing on the context of the ICTY: "Delays in securing the prompt arrest of indicted persons result in considerable problems in prosecuting and defending cases in the ICTY. The quality and availability of evidence may deteriorate over time: memories fade, witnesses die, and as witnesses settle into new, stable lives in the former Yugoslavia and elsewhere, some become reluctant to The Hague to retell and, in a sense, relive the horror of their past experiences."

[43] This, in turn, could have an effect on the credibility of the ICC. Cf. in that respect the following quotation from 1996 – the year in which not even one of the over fifty indicted persons had been detained by the ICTY – of the then ICTY's Prosecutor Goldstone: "This failure of the ICTY to follow through and arrest those indicted could well be fatal to the credibility of the Tribunal". (Goldstone 1996, p. 13.) (It must be noted, of course, that the ICC has already several suspects in its custody, but the remark of Goldstone can still be relevant for those (future) ICC situations under investigation where suspects are not surrendered to The Hague.) See finally also the words of Ruxton in n. 39.

[44] See also the ICC OTP's 'Informal expert paper: Fact-finding and investigative functions of the office of the Prosecutor, including international co-operation', 2003, available at: http://www2.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/490C317B-5D8E-4131-8170-7568911F6EB2/248459/372616.PDF, para. 89: "Articles 91 and 92 set forth arrest procedures in coordination with requested States. [The arrest procedures of the ICC, including Artt. 91 and 92 of the ICC Statute, will be addressed in detail in Chapter VIII of this book, ChP.] However, situations may arise where the Prosecutor is compelled, due to non-co-operation by a requested State or the sensitivity of "tipping off" the requested State, to explore ad hoc measures to effectuate arrest. The type of co-operation the Prosecutor may need from various

Although such a scenario will probably not happen too often (it cannot be completely excluded, however), the second scenario of an alleged male captus can occur quite easily. (It is also this scenario by which ICC judges were confronted in their very first case.) What is meant is the situation that a State (or international force) allegedly arrests or detains a suspect unlawfully before surrendering him to the ICC.[46]

It is not difficult to imagine that especially in a State (recently) torn apart by war,[47] less attention may be paid to exactly following the legal rules in arresting/detaining a person. Only a month after the above-mentioned prediction was made in September 2005, a situation occurred which confirmed the idea that the ICC would probably have to decide a male captus case stemming from this second scenario at some stage. This situation had to do with the ICC's case in Uganda, against the (initially) five leaders of the LRA: Joseph Kony, Vincent Otti, Raska

---

States to execute an arrest warrant under these circumstances could lead to innovative and extraordinary measures not contemplated by the Statute or the rules." Cf. in that respect also the (failed) attempt in 2007 of the ICC to divert a plane, allegedly carrying ICC suspect Harun, see P. Worsnip, 'ICC bid to arrest Sudan suspect failed – spokeswoman', Reuters, 6 June 2008, available at: http://www.reuters.com/article/idUSN06455243: "The idea was to divert a plane carrying Ahmad Harun, Sudan's minister for humanitarian affairs, as it was heading for Saudi Arabia, where the annual Muslim haj pilgrimage is held in Mecca, [ICC] spokeswoman Florence Olara said. The pilgrimage, which Muslims must perform at least once if they are able, took place last year from Dec. 17-21. "Using cooperation from some states, the plane would have been diverted," Olara said. "There was a country ready to receive the plane once it was diverted, but he was tipped off and got off the plane. So he never went to Mecca."" See finally also Gillett 2008, p. 27: "In light of the difficulties experienced by the ICC in its efforts to arrest those people accused of international crimes, creative solutions grounded in the principles underpinning the Rome Statute must be explored." (Note, however, that Gillett does not see a solution in, for example, an abduction legally 'approved' by the male captus bene detentus rule, see ibid., p. 24.)

[45] Cf. in that respect the ICTY Dokmanović case (see Subsection 3.1.1 of Chapter VI) where an investigator of the ICTY lured (see Subsection 1.3 of Chapter III for more information on this method) Dokmanović from the Former Republic of Yugoslavia to Croatia where he was subsequently arrested, an operation which was deemed legal by the ICTY, but not by Sluiter (2001, p. 153) who qualified Dokmanović's arrest as unlawful. (Cf. also Scharf 1998, p. 376 and Van Sliedregt 2001 B, p. 79.) See finally Swart 2002 C, p. 1675 (writing about "abduction and other methods of getting hold of a person"): "There may be a special temptation to use these methods in relation to States which have refused to comply with requests or orders for arrest or transfer issued by a tribunal."

[46] Indeed, even private individuals may play a role in this context, see again the ICC OTP's 'Informal expert paper: Fact-finding and investigative functions of the office of the Prosecutor, including international co-operation', 2003, available at: http://www2.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/490C317B-5D8E-4131-8170-7568911F6EB2/248459/372616.PDF, para. 89: "Alternatively, arrests may simply be spontaneously effected by private individuals in absence of any request or authorisation. This has on occasion occurred before the ad hoc Tribunals, where third parties have, via irregular processes, simply detained indictees on their own initiative and thereafter delivered them to peacekeeping forces obliged to transfer indictees to the seat of the Tribunal, thus prompting an immediate jurisdictional challenge before a Pre-Trial Chamber." This topic will also be addressed in detail in this book.

[47] This may also constitute an additional complication for the ICC's functioning: in contrast to several other international(ised) criminal tribunals, the ICC may often have to deal with ongoing conflicts. However, it should also be noted that the fact that the ICC may operate in such a context does not necessarily mean that it will be harder for the ICC to have persons arrested, see n. 35 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.

Lukwiya, Okot Odhiambo and Dominic Ongwen.[48] After it had become clear in 2005 that some of the rebels led by Vincent Otti might have fled to neighbouring DRC, the Los Angeles Times stated that Ugandan President Museveni "has said if the Congolese army doesn't apprehend the rebels, he'll send his army across the border to do the job".[49] Although this case has not seen any arrests yet, it is clear that if Otti were to be arrested in the DRC by the Ugandan army, he would probably claim to have been kidnapped before being brought to The Hague by the Ugandan authorities.[50]

Furthermore, the inter-State context of the struggle against terrorism described above may also lead to States taking a tougher stance on suspects of serious crimes more generally. That, in turn, may also have its consequences for the ICC, because that institution, as explained, is dependent on those States.[51]

2 GOALS, CENTRAL QUESTION AND METHODOLOGY

It is clear from the above section that this study more generally wants to combine two fascinating subjects which have not previously been put together in one book: male captus bene detentus and the ICC. As a result, the Latin maxim, the ICC (arrest and surrender) system and, most importantly, the area where these two subjects merge, namely the actual ICC position on male captus cases, will be thoroughly analysed. This might not merely be interesting to the reader; perhaps it might also be helpful. One could think here of (ICC) judges struggling with the topic and in need of more background information. Nevertheless, with respect to the ICC male captus

[48] The proceedings against Raska Lukwiya were terminated on 11 July 2007 when it became clear that Lukwiya was killed on 12 August 2006, see ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Situation in Uganda, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Joseph Kony, Vincent Otti, Okot Odhiambo, Raska Lukwiya, Dominic Ongwen, 'Decision to Terminate the Proceedings Against Raska Lukwiya' (Public), ICC-02/04-01/05, 11 July 2007.

[49] E. Sanders, 'Ruthless Rebels of Uganda Appear to Be Losing Steam', Los Angeles Times, 10 October 2005, available at: http://articles.latimes.com/2005/oct/10/world/fg-uganda10. Cf. also the following words (which seem to constitute implicit concerns) of UNSG Annan one year later in his Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to resolutions 1653 (2006) and 1663 (2006), 29 June 2006, S/2006/478, para. 54: "It should be emphasized that the countries of the region have an overwhelming capacity to address the LRA threat. If the Governments in the region find a mutually agreeable way to strengthen cooperation on the ground among their security forces, it could create a solid basis to deal more effectively with the lingering threat from LRA. However, I would urge them to seek a coherent approach to this challenge, which should be based on strict adherence to the provisions of international law, including respect for the inviolability of the internationally recognized borders and territorial integrity of the States affected by the activities of LRA and other illegal armed groups."

[50] Currie (2007, pp. 383-384) provides another example, namely of a national leader or another perpetrator who commits crimes on the territory of an ICC State Party and then flees to a non-State Party: "One can easily imagine circumstances in which vengeful politicians in a post-conflict or post-dictatorship government were motivated enough by an individual's crimes to employ their own forces – or bounty hunters – to apprehend their otherwise unreachable quarry." Note that Kony, Odhiambo and Ongwen are believed to have fled to Sudan, but this State "has given permission to the Ugandan army to pursue the wanted individuals on Sudanese territory." (Bekou and Shah 2006, p. 524, n. 132.)

[51] Cf. in that respect also Ülgen 2003, p. 441 (writing on the context of the ICTY, an institution which is also dependent on States).

position, this study does not want to confine itself to a 'mere' description or analysis; it also wants to know how the ICC position is doing in a broader context. In short, it wants to assess. All this leads to the following

Central question:

How does the ICC currently cope with the dilemmas that a male captus case can give rise to and how should this approach be assessed?

Describing and analysing the principle male captus bene detentus, the ICC (arrest and surrender) system and the current ICC position on the male captus issue is unproblematic in terms of methodology. These subjects and their correlations 'only' have to be sorted out and written down in such a manner as to be clearly understood by the reader.

It is the assessment exercise that needs some explanation here. This study is interested in two main questions, namely 1) how similar or different is the ICC male captus position to the position of other courts that have dealt with this problem before; and 2) how is the ICC position to be assessed in relation to its own law? Hence, what this study is striving for is to create two evaluative frameworks against which the ICC male captus position can be assessed, an external one (vis-à-vis the position of other courts) and an internal one (vis-à-vis the law of the ICC itself).

The last evaluative framework is probably the most important one for the ICC. It wants to compare the actual ICC male captus position with what the law of the ICC prescribes the judges to do. By making such a comparison, one can hopefully see if the practice of the ICC is in conformity with the theory, if the law in action is in accordance with the law in the books. This framework will be created by a detailed examination of Article 21 of the ICC Statute, which is entitled 'Applicable law' and which prescribes the legal route that judges must follow in making their decisions. It is submitted that with help of this framework, one should be able to see if the ICC is functioning as it should function according to its own law.

The first evaluative framework is more non-committal but certainly no less interesting. Its goal is not to see whether the ICC is acting as it should act; its goal is to see how other judges have coped with the problem in order to find out whether the ICC judges follow their colleagues or whether they take a different stance (and, if possible, what the reasons for potential divergence are/could be). Even if the ICC judges are not obliged to follow case law from other jurisdictions,[52] it is the opinion of this study that an examination of this case law can nevertheless be instructive as a comparison will help in elucidating the exact position of arguably the most important institution in the field of international criminal justice in this old[53] and [52] Whether this is truly the case will be addressed when examining Art. 21 of the ICC Statute, see Chapter IX of this study.

[53] Bauer notes, for example, that Baldus de Ubaldis (1327-1400), one of the most famous jurists from the Middle Ages, already argued that a court has no jurisdiction over a person who has been the victim of an abduction on foreign territory: "„In isto puncto videtur prima facie dicendum, quod quum dictus very interesting discussion in which so many have given their opinions before.[54] This framework will be created by reviewing the position of courts dealing with male captus cases from the context between States on the one hand and between States and international(ised) criminal tribunals other than the ICC on the other.[55]

This study will try to examine case law, literature and regulatory documents as objectively (but certainly not uncritically!) as possible because it is believed that only such an approach can lead to useful internal and external evaluative frameworks. However, the material can sometimes be interpreted in several ways. In such instances, this study will, of course, not hesitate in taking a position either.

This latter point also has to do with the third and final objective of this study; as well as more generally combining two fascinating subjects which have not previously been put together in one book and more specifically answering the above-mentioned central question, this study also seeks to make a contribution to the male captus discussion itself, to the discussion as to how ICC judges and judges in general can best deal with alleged irregularities in the pre-trial phase of their case, to the discussion on how proceedings can be achieved which are considered both effective and fair. Hence, this study will also contain several recommendations, of which the most important ones will be presented in the final chapter, after the central question of this book has been answered.

---

violenter captus, licet extra territorium, est quocumque modo sub fortia judicis, ubi deliquit, ibidem veniat puniendus. Sed his non obstantibus est veritas: quia non licuit eum capere in territorio alieno … forma (sc. remissionis) non servata debet captus tanquam spoliatus propria libertate in eandem libertatem restitui." [emphasis in original, ChP]" (Bauer 1968, p. 144, n. 2.)

[54] In addition to this evaluative value for this study, an overview of male captus case law from other jurisdictions can also be helpful to (ICC) judges struggling with the male captus problem and in need of more background information, just like the general information on the maxim itself and the ICC's surrendering system. After all, in many cases where a judge is confronted by a male captus case, abundant reference is often made by the Defence and Prosecution to male captus cases from different jurisdictions. For example, in the first male captus case before the ICC's Appeals Chamber (ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006), all the parties involved referred to (inter)national case law to back their positions. Overviews, which summarise the most important male captus cases from both the inter-State context and the context of the international(ised) criminal tribunals, may to a certain extent help judges who can no longer see the wood for the trees, who are trying to assess the relevance of these cases for their own decision, who are more generally struggling with the dilemmas male captus cases can bring forth and who would not mind to learn from the views of other judges who have already coped with the problem (even if they would not be obliged to follow their views).

[55] The precise benchmarks, namely the exact courts to be used in this external framework, will be further explained in Chapter IV.

3 OUTLINE

This research is composed of five parts.

Part 1 (and Chapter I) will end with this section and consists of a first introduction to the subject, including the goals, central question, methodology and outline of this study.

Before examining the status of male captus bene detentus in practice, the maxim itself will be scrutinised in Part 2. "Where does it come from?" and "What does it mean exactly?" are the two main questions of this rather theoretical part. As a result, an attempt will be made to find the (Roman?) origin of these four Latin words (Chapter II). In addition, the different elements of the maxim will be thoroughly analysed (Chapter III). In this third chapter, answers will be provided to four main questions, namely 1) "Which male captus situations exist?", 2) "What is violated by these male captus situations?", 3) "Who violates?" and 4) "What are the consequences of such violations?" At the end of this part, the reader will have been presented with concepts, delimitations and definitions which are necessary for a good understanding of the rest of this study.

In Part 3, after a short introduction (Chapter IV), the material necessary to create the external evaluative framework will be presented: attention will be paid to male captus case law from the context between States (Chapter V) and from the context between States and international(ised) criminal tribunals (Chapter VI). Furthermore, and when necessary for a better understanding of the problem, information will also be provided on (the reaction by) legal literature (to those cases) and on the legal systems in which those different courts function – one could hereby think of the transfer regime in the context of the international criminal tribunals. Finally, in Chapter VII, the principles distilled from Part 3, the actual external evaluative framework of this study, will be presented.

Part 4 is dedicated to the ICC. After providing general information on its arrest and surrender regime (Chapter VIII), attention will be paid to the crux of the internal evaluative framework: Article 21 of the ICC Statute (Chapter IX). After that, the two most important subjects of this study – male captus bene detentus and the ICC – will be put together to find the ICC's current position on this (by then hopefully very familiar) maxim (Chapter X).

In Part 5 (and Chapter XI) – the conclusion of this research – the successive parts will be brought together in order to answer the study's central question: "How does the ICC currently cope with the dilemmas that a male captus case can give rise to and how should this approach be assessed?" Furthermore – and in an effort not to deliver only a descriptive and analytic work – recommendations will be provided which might hopefully be of help to anyone interested in the topic, in particular the ICC judge confronted by a male captus. Finally, this study will end with a brief epilogue.

PART 2

ANALYSING MALE CAPTUS BENE DETENTUS

CHAPTER II
THE ORIGIN OF THE MAXIM

1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter should start with an explanation as to why it will be somewhat different from the rest of this study. As will be shown in the next part of this book – perhaps it has already become clear from some sentences written in the previous chapter – this study will in principle only look at male captus cases where a jurisdictional border has been crossed. Of course, male captus bene detentus may be applied within one and the same jurisdiction as well, meaning that a judge from State A would approve the trial of a suspect who was improperly arrested in State A by State A police forces. However, as the 'target' context of this book, that of the ICC, is characterised by a suspect being tried in another jurisdiction than the one in which he was arrested, only male captus cases with a multi-jurisdictional dimension will be examined in this study. To be even more precise, attention will only be paid to multi-jurisdictional male captus cases where the border of a country has been crossed.[1] (There are also multi-jurisdictional male captus cases within one and the same country, for example between the several States of the US.)[2] This further delimitation has been chosen because the surrender of a suspect from a country to an international criminal tribunal like the ICC is more akin to (although absolutely not the same as) extradition between two sovereign countries than to surrender between two entities within one sovereign country. After all, the ICC and the country which surrendered the suspect are not equal parts of a higher sovereignty, such as, for example, Texas and Ohio are of the US. Because of this international focus, it may be good to slightly adjust the introductory and rather general definition of male

[1] Note that the focus should be here on the country's legal border. After all, it might be possible that the person surrendered into the jurisdiction of the court does not physically leave the geographical national borders of a State. For example, when the Dutch authorities transfer or surrender a person from their own national jurisdiction to the ICTY or ICC (which have their headquarters in The Hague), a national jurisdictional and not a national geographical boundary is crossed. (The same goes for Sierra Leone and the SCSL and other internationalised criminal tribunals (with the exception of the STL).)

[2] Despite the fact that almost all the political entities within the country US are called 'States', the word 'State' in his book is most often used to designate an independent, sovereign country.

captus bene detentus as could be found in the first chapter of this book[3] because the words "was brought into the power of that court" could also be applied to a purely domestic context, a context on which this book does not focus. Hence, it is suggested to now understand the maxim to mean that a court can exercise jurisdiction over a person, even if the way that person was brought from one jurisdiction to another (namely the jurisdiction in which the court before which the suspect is now standing operates) was irregular.

Why then is this chapter different? As it is merely looking at the origin of the maxim, which may perhaps be found in a purely national setting, the above-mentioned delimitation does not need to be applied here as well. Nevertheless, the fact that the purely internal situation might also be looked at in the following pages does not mean that special attention cannot be paid, in this chapter as well, to the most interesting context for this book, namely the one where national borders are crossed.

2 ROMAN ORIGIN?

In several books and articles in which the topic of male captus bene detentus is addressed, history is often used to illustrate and contextualise the problem involved. One of the most comprehensive books on this subject, Wilske's Die völkerrechtswidrige Entführung und ihre Rechtsfolgen, even starts with the mythical Oedipus who, while in exile in Kolonos, had to defend himself against agents from Thebe who tried to bring him back to their territory "mit List und Gewalt".[4] One of the oldest historical inter-State male captus cases in which not only the abduction itself but, more importantly, also its legal context are described can be found in an article by O'Higgins. It is the intriguing case of Dr. John Story, who was seized by British agents in Antwerp in 1569:

> Story (…) was a bitter persecutor of religious dissentients under Mary. During the reign of Elizabeth he was under suspicion for some time and eventually was arrested. He escaped and with the aid of the Spanish Ambassador in London reached asylum in Flanders. Here, under the Duke of Alva, he was given the task of searching all vessels that called at Antwerp for English goods, and in particular for heretical books. Believing that Story was engaged in plotting against Elizabeth, Cecil instructed some of his agents to abduct Story from Spanish territory. Story was induced to board a ship at Antwerp by the report of one of Cecil's agents that it carried a number of blasphemous books. As soon as Story came aboard the vessel set sail for England, where he was put on trial for treason. He denied the jurisdiction of the English courts on the ground that he had become a Spanish national but made no attempt to oust their jurisdiction on the ground of the violation of Spanish sovereignty committed by Cecil's agents. The Spanish Ambassador did on two occasions demand Story's

[3] See Subsection 1.1 of the previous chapter: a court can properly detain a person (read: can properly exercise jurisdiction over a person) (bene detentus), even if that person was brought into the power of that court in an irregular way (male captus).
[4] Wilske 2000, p. 27.

> release and the punishment of those who has been concerned in his abduction. But without result and Story was executed [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[5]

Now, this is all very interesting, but it does not say anything about the history of the principle itself. Who was the first to 'invent' the maxim as such, namely the four words male captus bene detentus?[6] In his report to the Re Argoud case, which will be examined in detail in Subsection 2.1 of Chapter V, rapporteur Comte is sure of at least one thing, namely that the maxim "is certainly not from Virgil".[7] However, that does not help this study further, of course. Nevertheless, Comte's remark may imply that the maxim has antique roots (even if these roots cannot be traced back to the Roman poet Virgil).

Since the four words are Latin, it is indeed not illogical to think that their origin might be found in antiquity. In fact, an initial inquiry into some basic sources dealing with Latin rules[8] shows that a considerable number of them can be traced back to Roman times. To give two well-known examples: Cicero's already-mentioned phrase from Pro Milone: silent [enim] leges inter arma[9] ("[l]aws are silent amid arms")[10] and Celsus' phrase [i]us est ars boni et aequi[11] ("[l]aw is the science of what is good and just").[12] However, this is not the case with male captus bene detentus. This fact alone should make one doubt whether the above-mentioned (and prima facie logical) mental leap is in fact correct. Notwithstanding this uncertainty, the rule has often been labelled in literature as a(n "ancient"[13] or "old")[14] Roman maxim.[15] Unfortunately (but perhaps understandably), in none of these articles, a reference to a Roman source is made.

Therefore, it might be useful to shift the focus of this quest from the more basic sources dealing with Latin maxims to Roman law itself to see whether the latter reveals some information on the origin of male captus bene detentus.

---

[5] O'Higgins 1961, pp. 281-282.

[6] Or other representations of the same maxim such as: mala captus bene detentus or male captus bene iudicatus. The latter version of the adage is arguably the most correct one (see, for example, Schultz 1967, Poort 1988, Grams 1994, Bugnion 2002 and Van der Wilt 2004) as it represents the best translation of the idea that a judge can try a person/can exercise jurisdiction over him (iudicare), even if the way that person was brought into the court's jurisdiction was irregular. In addition, this formulation of the maxim also circumvents the possible confusion which might be created by the fact that an unlawful detention (which one may easily translate as male detentus) may also fall within the notion of male captus), see n. 6 and accompanying text of Chapter III. However, since the maxim is most often written as male captus bene detentus (and thus recognised as such), the latter version will be used in this book.

[7] Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 104 (Report of M. le Conseiller Comte).

[8] See, for example, Stein 1966 and Liebs, Lehmann and Strobel 1982.

[9] See Liebs, Lehmann and Strobel 1982, p. 197. See also n. 18 of Chapter I.

[10] Garner 2004, p. 1758.

[11] See Liebs, Lehmann and Strobel 1982, p. 105.

[12] Garner 2004, p. 1728.

[13] See, for example, Webb 1975, p. 171, Gray 1991, p. 172 and Stark 1993, p. 125.

[14] See, for example, Goldie 1987, p. 131, n. 31.

[15] See, for example, Cherif Bassiouni 1973, p. 45, Vincenzi 1987, p. 211 and Semmelman 1992, p. 514.

In such an examination, one should not leave out the legislation of Emperor Justinian (483-565), which > mark[ed] the end of the first period of the history of Roman law and the beginning of the second period. Together the Digest, the Code and the Institutes give a comprehensive picture of the way in which Roman law developed from the first century BC up to and including the sixth century. Although the compilers undoubtedly altered the texts in places, adapting them to their own time, they did not make any major changes. Consequently these three works are still the most important source of our knowledge about classical Roman law.[16]

Unfortunately, the maxim will not be found in the Digest, Code and Institutes either.[17] In fact, some rules seem to point to a(n international) legal context in which a rule like male captus bene detentus had perhaps no place at all. Taking the "most important"[18] work of the three, the Digest, as an example, and focusing first on the most interesting (inter-State) context for this book, the following rules are quite illustrative in that respect:

> -The governor of a province has authority only over the people of his own province, and that only while he is in the province. For the moment he leaves it, he is a private citizen. Sometimes he has power even in relation to non-residents, if they have taken direct part in criminal activity. For it is to be found in the imperial warrants of appointment that he who has charge of the province shall attend to cleansing the province of evil men; and no distinction is drawn as to where they may come from.[19] (…) -One who administers justice beyond the limits of his territory may be disobeyed with impunity.[20] (…) -It is customary for the governors of provinces in which an offense has been committed to write to their colleagues [in whose provinces] the perpetrators are alleged to live, requesting that they be returned along with those who are to prosecute them; this also is laid down in a number of rescripts.[21]

From such rules, the 17th century writer Matthaeus (logically) concludes that the governor from a province where a crime was committed could not arrest the alleged perpetrator on his own authority if the latter was residing in another province.[22] He continues:

> But the commentators ask what must be said if a judge has begun the pursuit of an accused person in his own territory, or when the accused was escaping into another territory. Can he continue to chase and arrest him? It is nearer to the truth to say that he cannot do so; for if he were to do so, he would be exercising jurisdiction in

[16] Tellegen-Couperus 1993, p. 148.
[17] One can easily scan these works on the very practical website http://www.thelatinlibrary.com/justinian.html.
[18] Stein 1999, p. 33.
[19] D.1.18.3 (from Paul, Sabinus, book 13). See Mommsen, Krueger and Watson 1985 A, pp. 34-35.
[20] D.2.1.20 (from Paul, Edict, book 1). See Mommsen, Krueger and Watson 1985 A, p. 42.
[21] D.48.3.7 (from Macer, Duties of the Governor, book 2). See Mommsen, Krueger and Watson 1985 B, p. 801a.
[22] See Hewett and Stoop 1994, p. 498.

> another's territory, not in his own. Everyone realised how dangerous this would be and how easily it would offer a reason for conflict.[23]

This valid argument is very simple yet very strong. If two States wish to live peacefully together, they should respect each other's sovereignty. Conversely, lack of this necessary respect will lead to distrust and potentially to complete chaos. That this powerful argument has not lost any strength over the centuries is evidenced by the UNSC's condemnation of Eichmann's abduction in Argentina (see Subsection 3.3.2 of Chapter III for more information).

This short overview appears to show that inter-State abductions were not permissible in antiquity either. Nevertheless, that does not necessarily imply that the rule male captus bene detentus was never applied in those days.[24] An analogy can be drawn to modern times here: even though the UNSC did indeed condemn the inter-State abduction of Eichmann, it did not lead to the refusal of exercising jurisdiction in the Israeli courts, where the judges applied male captus bene detentus. Notwithstanding this, and reconsidering the above-mentioned rule that "[o]ne who administers justice beyond the limits of his territory may be disobeyed with impunity [emphasis added, ChP]", one may doubt whether the international legal context of classical Roman law offered a good breeding ground for the growth of male captus bene detentus.

In the 1991 case Opinion in State v. Ebrahim,[25] which will be addressed in more detail in Chapter V, Judge Steyn of the South African Appellate Division (Supreme Court) examined "our common law"[26] on the issue of an abduction's effect on the jurisdiction of a court. As this South African common law "is still substantially Roman-Dutch law as adjusted to local circumstances"[27] Steyn also looked at Roman law. Referring to exactly the same rules from the Digest already mentioned supra,[28] Steyn explains:

> This limitation on the legal powers of Roman provincial governors and lawgivers is understandable and was unavoidable in the light of the great number of provinces comprising the Roman Empire in classical times, with their ethnic and cultural diversity, and their different legal systems which the politically pragmatic Romans allowed to remain largely in force in their conquered territories. Until late in the history of the Roman Empire certain provinces were controlled by the Senate and others by the Emperor. Intervention by one province in the domestic affairs of another was a source of potential conflict. In order to maintain sound mutual relations, a

[23] Ibid.
[24] It is therefore hard to agree with Burr, who states with (a probably unjustified) certainty that "Roman courts (…) declined to exercise jurisdiction over kidnapped suspects brought before (…) [their] courts [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Burr 2001, p. 108.)
[25] In this chapter, the edited and abbreviated English translation in International Legal Materials (prepared by John Dugard) was used: Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), pp. 888-899.
[26] Ibid., p. 892.
[27] Ibid., p. 895.
[28] See ns. 19-21 and accompanying text.

> practice developed among provincial governors relating to the arrest and extradition of offenders.[29]

After clarifying the fact that this practice became law in Justinian's Novellae Constitutiones,[30] he concludes:

> It is inconceivable that the Roman authorities would recognize a conviction and sentence, and allow them to stand, when they were the result of an abduction of a criminal from one province on the order or with the co-operation of the authority of another province. This would not only have been an approval of illegal conduct, and therefore a subversion of authority, but would also have threatened the internal inter-provincial peace of the Empire.[31]

This conclusion confirms the above-mentioned idea that acceptance of a rule which approves the trial of an internationally abducted person would not have seemed very appropriate in classical Roman law.

What can be said about the domestic context of classical Roman law? Again, one can turn here to Matthaeus, who also explains the arrest procedure in this context:

> If an accused person is present [in a footnote from the editors, one can read that here is meant "in the province", ChP] or if it is known to the judge where he is hiding, he orders him to be produced and taken into custody by an apparitor (minor public servant) (…). And it makes no difference whether he is arrested in public or at his home. Now some people think that formerly it was not permissible to drag an accused out of his house, but this is not true, for the rule which forbids this pertains to civil, not criminal cases (…). On the contrary, men can even be dragged from a sacred building, if they are accused of the more serious crimes like murder, adultery, or abduction (…).[32]

---

[29] Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 893.

[30] Ibid. See Novella 134, Chapter 5: "When any one of the criminals whom we have just mentioned conceals himself, or leaves the province in which he has committed the offence, We order the judge to call him into court by the publication of lawful edicts, and if he does not obey, the judge shall proceed in the manner prescribed by the laws. If it should be ascertained that the guilty party is living in some other province, We order the judge of the district in which the offence was committed to notify the judge of the province in which the delinquent resides, by means of a letter, to arrest him on his own responsibility and that of his court, and to send the accused to him. When the judge who has received a public letter of this kind fails to do what We have stated, and his court does not surrender the criminal, or if it does not execute the orders given it, We decree that the said magistrate shall pay a fine of three pounds in gold, and his court an equal amount. If, induced by a desire for gain, a judge, or any officer of his court, does not arrest a person of this description, or if, after having arrested him, he does not deliver him up, he shall, after conviction, be deprived of his office, and sent into exile."

[31] Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 894.

[32] Hewett and Stoop 1994, p. 497. The word "or" (in the sentence: "If an accused is present [in the province], or if it is known to the judge where he is hiding") might be a little confusing here. One could namely understand it to mean that a person can also be dragged from his home when the person is not living in the province if the judge knows where he is hiding abroad. Nevertheless, as has been shown earlier, one was not allowed to do that.

This information could be interpreted as meaning that the above-mentioned breeding ground for male captus bene detentus was perhaps more present in the domestic field than in the international context. However, the fact that an accused could be dragged out of his house in criminal cases is not an indication that the rule male captus bene detentus was accepted in classical Roman domestic law: if arresting a person at home was legally possible (as is the case in our modern society if law enforcers have fulfilled several procedural conditions) then one can no longer speak of male captus as the captus was perfectly legal: bene captus. Logically, if there is no male captus involved, then the judge cannot pronounce a decision summarised by the maxim male captus bene detentus. After all, in such a situation, the essential premise (namely that there was an irregular arrest) is not fulfilled. In conclusion, strong doubts remain about the origin of the Latin maxim in classical Roman law.

Until now, the focus of this Roman law survey was on classical Roman law, which 'merely' deals with a specific Roman law period (even if that period covers no less than seven centuries). However, also in more general sources on Roman criminal law, the maxim was not found.[33]

Although this survey cannot and will not be exhaustive, it is, in any case, clear that the true origin of the maxim is extremely difficult to find in sources on Roman criminal law. In fact, the legal contexts searched do not seem to be perfect places for the maxim to flourish at all.

In conclusion, one could assert that, notwithstanding its old-fashioned appearance, male captus bene detentus does not seem to have its roots in Roman criminal law. The four-word phrase may be Latin, but it is probably not Roman.[34]

3 MODERN ORIGIN?

In fact, the origin of the four-word Latin phrase may perhaps be relatively modern: the oldest text found which actually uses this phrase is M.H. Cardozo's article 'When Extradition Fails, Is Abduction the Solution?', which was published in the American Journal of International Law of January 1961.[35] Cardozo hereby refers to [33] Books searched include Mommsen 1955 ("the platform on which any worker in the field of Roman criminal law must build" (Robinson 1995, p. x)), Strachan-Davidson 1969 and Santalucia 1998.

[34] Cf. in that respect, for example, the Latin maxim nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege, which can be traced back 'only' to P.J.A. Feuerbach, Lehrbuch des gemeinen in Deutschland gültigen peinlichen Rechts, Georg Friedrich Heyer: Giessen 1801, para. 20. See Schreiber 1976, p. 17: "Die lateinische, bis heute allgemein gebräuchliche Formulierung des Satzes findet sich bekanntlich erstmals bei Feuerbach, und zwar in § 20 seines im Jahre 1801 erschienenen Strafrechtslehrbuches. Freilich hat Feuerbach hier dem Prinzip im Rahmen seines – später noch eingehend zu erörternden – Systems nur die klassisch gewordene Formel gegeben. Das Prinzip selbst ist älter, schon vor Feuerbach hat es in den Vereinigten Staaten während der siebziger Jahre des 18. Jahrhunderts und in Europa in Österreich (1787), Preußen (1794) sowie in für die weitere Zukunft maßgeblicher Gestalt in den Art. 7 und 8 der französischen Erklärung der Menschen- und Bürgerrechte vom 23. 8. 1789 und den Revolutionsverfassungen der folgenden Jahre gesetzlichen Ausdruck gefunden. Nach ganz allgemeiner Ansicht ist der Satz in der bis heute geltenden Gestalt ein Ergebnis des Rechtsdenkens der Aufklärungsepoche (...). Die Ansicht, es handele sich um ein Prinzip des römischen Rechts, stellt nur eine gänzlich unhistorische Kuriosität dar [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[35] See Cardozo 1961, p. 132.

the 1952 Frisbie v. Collins case and also to Hyde's International Law[36] but the maxim will not be found in these sources either. The same can be said of the reference to the rule in the equally 'old' article by H.W. Baade: 'The Eichmann Trial: Some Legal Aspects'.[37] In footnotes 12-15 of this article, published in Duke Law Journal in the summer of 1961, Baade refers to several older sources, but in none of them, the four-word Latin phrase can be found.[38]

Taking all the above into account, one can say that there are several factors pointing to the fact that the maxim might 'just' be relatively modern.[39] A maxim that nicely and concisely summarises the legal reasoning that an irregular arrest will not prejudice the exercise of a court's jurisdiction.

4 ORIGIN OF THE REASONING BEHIND THE MAXIM

If one tries to find the origin of the legal reasoning behind the Latin maxim, then one might have more success. Focusing on the, for this book, most interesting (inter-State) context, one might think back to the case of Dr. Story, which was introduced at the beginning of this chapter. However, in this 16th-century case, the legal reasoning of the English courts with respect to the effect on the exercise of jurisdiction of an (alleged) irregular arrest abroad was not presented (by O'Higgins).

A case which keeps re-appearing in literature and case law as the oldest one with a truly multi-jurisdictional, international dimension[40] and in which one can find such a consideration is the Ex Parte Susannah Scott case, decided by Lord Chief Justice Tenterden of the Court of King's Bench on Tuesday 19 May 1829.[41] In England, a

---

[36] See ibid., p. 132, n. 33. Hyde's book, in turn, refers to: "Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436; Ex parte Wilson, 140 S.W. 98; Mr. Bacon, Acting Secy. of State, to the Mexican Chargé, June 22, 1906, For. Rel. 1906, II, 1121. See also United States v. Unverzagt, 299 Fed. 1015; People ex rel. Stilwell v. Hanley, 207 N.Y.S. 176; Ex parte Campbell, 1 F. Supp. 899. See documents in Hackworth, Dig., IV, § 345." (Hyde 1945, p. 1032, n. 4.)

[37] See Baade 1961, p. 404.

[38] They are the following: "Lord Goddard, C.J., in Ex Parte Elliott, [1949] 1 All E.R. 373, 377-78 (K.B.). (…) Ex Parte Susannah Scott, 9 B & C 446, 109 E.R. 166, 167 (K.B. 1829). (…) Afouneh v. Attorney-General, [1941-1942] Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases 327, 328 (…) (Supreme Court of Palestine, sitting as Court of Criminal Appeal, 1942); (…) Yousef Said Abu Dourrah v. Attorney-General, id. 331, 332 (same court, 1941). See the authorities collected in Note, 165 A.L.R. 947 (1946) [this is Williams 1946, ChP], and in Scott[, Jr.] (…) 1953 (…) Garcia-Mora (…) 1957 (…). (…) Ker v. Illinois, 119 U.S. 436 (1886); Mahon v. Justice, 127 U.S. 700 (1888) (…) Lascelles v. Georgia, 148 U.S. 537, 543 (1893); In re Johnson, 167 U.S. 120, 125-27 (1897). (…) Fairman (…) 1953 (…). (…) Frisb[i]e v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519, 522 (1952)."

[39] That may include a period like the Middle Ages, cf., for example, the words of Baldus de Ubaldis (1327-1400) as mentioned in n. 53 of the previous chapter (opposing the idea behind male captus bene detentus).

[40] There is another multi-jurisdictional case from 1829 as well, but that one was within one State (namely within the US): State v. Smith, 1 Bailey Law 283, 19 Am. Dec. 679 (S.C. 1829). See Plumb, Jr. 1939, p. 340, n. 13.

[41] Court of King's Bench, Lord Chief Justice Tenterden, Ex parte Susannah Scott, 19 May 1829, 9 Barnewall & Cresswell's King's Bench Reports (1829), pp. 446-448; 109 English Reports (1829), pp. 166-167. Factual information from this case has been obtained from 9 Barnewall & Cresswell's King's Bench Reports (1829), p. 446; 109 English Reports (1829), p. 166.

certain Susannah Scott was indicted for perjury. Lord Chief Justice Tenterden granted a warrant for her arrest, specially directed to the English police officer Ruthven. When the latter apprehended her in Brussels, Scott applied to the English Ambassador for assistance. When he refused to interfere, Ruthven took her to Ostend, and from there to England. There, she was brought before Tenterden, and committed by him to the King's Bench Prison. Scott asked for her discharge (release) on the basis of habeas corpus[42] but Tenterden refused, stating:

> The question, therefore, is this, whether if a person charged with a crime is found in this country, it is the duty of the Court to take care that such a party shall be amenable to justice, or whether we are to consider the circumstances under which she was brought here. I thought, and still continue to think, that we cannot inquire into them. If the acts complained of were done against the law of a foreign country, that country might have vindicated its own law. If it gave her a right of action, she may sue upon it [emphasis added, ChP].[43]

This quote is one of the oldest, if not the oldest, demonstration of a[44] male captus bene detentus reasoning in an international context:[45] an irregular arrest abroad will

---

[42] Habeas corpus, literally meaning "that you have the body", is "[a] writ employed to bring a person before a court, most frequently to ensure that the party's imprisonment or detention is not illegal (habeas corpus ad subjiciendum)." (Garner 2004, p. 728.) See for more information on the history of this concept Duker 1980. Although the goal of habeas corpus is that the person detaining someone must bring the person deprived of his liberty to court so that a judge can check whether the deprivation of liberty is lawful, the aim is, of course, also that the person deprived of his liberty be released if the judge deems the deprivation unlawful. Well-known habeas corpus provisions, such as Art. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR and Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR (to which considerable attention will be paid in the next chapters), also mention this remedy of release.

[43] Court of King's Bench, Lord Chief Justice Tenterden, Ex parte Susannah Scott, 19 May 1829, 9 Barnewall & Cresswell's King's Bench Reports (1829), pp. 448; 109 English Reports (1829), p. 167.

[44] As will be shown in this book, there are more rationales behind invoking the male captus bene detentus rule. In this case, the judge did not refuse jurisdiction because it was not in his power (see the word "cannot") to look at pre-trial irregularities. Another example of a male captus bene detentus rationale is that a judge continues to exercise jurisdiction, not because he believes that he cannot look at the way in which a person was brought before him but simply because he is not interested in this pre-trial phase.

[45] In Ex parte Susannah Scott, reference was made to two older criminal cases to support the idea that "the court will not inquire into the manner in which the caption was effected" (Court of King's Bench, Lord Chief Justice Tenterden, Ex parte Susannah Scott, 19 May 1829, 9 Barnewall & Cresswell's King's Bench Reports (1829), p. 447; 109 English Reports (1829), p. 166): Rex v. Marks, 3 East, 175 from 1802 and Ex parte Krans 1 B. & C. 258 from 1823. However, both habeas corpus cases took place within one jurisdiction, see Plumb, Jr. 1939, p. 340, n. 13. (There is something special about Ex parte Krans: this case was born out of a battle on the high seas between a British Navy cutter and a smuggling boat. The men from the latter ship were arrested and brought to another ship, the Severn. "The principle question on appeal to the King's Bench from the denial of the writ [of habeas corpus, ChP] was whether the time of the smuggler[s]' (…) detention in the hold of the Severn was unreasonable so as to demand their release." (Birkett 1991, p. 609.) Chief Justice Abbott (actually the same judge as the one in Ex Parte Susannah Scott: Chief Justice Lord Tenterden is a title, see Birkett 1991, p. 610, n. 78) stated: "It appears to me that our proper course is, not to inquire into the facts of the case, whatever may be our power, but to commit the prisoners to the custody of the Marshal of the Marshalsea, that they may afterwards be taken before a magistrate, who may investigate the charge against them [original emphasis not endanger the exercise of jurisdiction in another State for it is not within the power of the judges to examine the circumstances of the apprehension.[46]

Before continuing to discuss other interesting male captus case law in Part 3 of this book, it is first important to pay attention, in the next chapter, to the different concepts, delimitations and definitions within the context of the maxim male captus bene detentus, for it is believed that a good understanding of these matters is essential for being able to clearly follow the remainder of this study.

omitted, ChP].” (Birkett 1991, p. 610.) Although this case seems to have an international dimension, Plumb, Jr. (see the beginning of this footnote) probably correctly placed this case in the category ‘illegal arrest within the jurisdiction’. See in that respect Birkett 1991, p. 609, n. 75: “The ship was apparently flying no flag and contained stolen goods and liquor. As such it was a ship having no status as sovereign territory. Thus, the boarding of this ship cannot properly be considered a violation of any principle of sovereign territory.”)

[46] It should, however, also be mentioned that the international dimension of Scott’s case was probably only limited to its facts, namely that she was brought from the Netherlands to England. “Lord Tenterden held that the Court could not inquire into the circumstances of the arrest. It is significant, however, that the learned Judge seems to have thought only in terms of a violation of Belgian law, not of international law.” (Morgenstern 1953, p. 273.) (Note that in 1829, the State of Belgium did not exist yet (but was part of the Netherlands).)

CHAPTER III
DISSECTING THE MAXIM: CONCEPTS, DELIMITATIONS AND DEFINITIONS

1 WHICH MALE CAPTUS SITUATIONS EXIST?

1.1 Introduction

In the very first subsection of this book, the maxim was defined to mean that a court can properly detain a person (read: can properly exercise jurisdiction over a person) (bene detentus), even if that person was brought into the power of that court in an irregular way (male captus). Because the words "brought into the power of that court" could also be applied in a purely domestic male captus situation, and because this book is focusing on the international context, it was suggested in the introduction of the previous chapter that the introductory and rather general definition of male captus bene detentus from the first chapter should be slightly adjusted so as to mean that a court can exercise jurisdiction over a person, even if the way that person was brought from one jurisdiction to another (namely the jurisdiction in which the court before which the suspect is now standing operates) was irregular. This chapter seeks to clarify the different elements of this maxim in more detail. To start with its first part, which situations fall under the words male captus?

Before addressing that question however, it must be emphasised that the information in this section is merely there for reasons of clarity. Of course, one can come up with the most lucid theoretical examples of male captus situations, but reality often shows a mix of different and more complex situations. However, as the following pages want to clarify instead of to confuse, only the basic scenarios will be reviewed. Furthermore, it must be understood that in the end, it will be up to the suspect to claim that a certain situation is to be seen as a male captus situation which must lead to the refusal of jurisdiction by the judges. In the same spirit, it is up to the judges to hear that argument and to decide whether the alleged male captus situation is indeed a proper one and if so, whether this has any impact on their exercise of jurisdiction.

Taking this into account (and returning to the question that was just posed), the spectrum of possible male captus situations may be broader than thought of initially. Probably because of the word captus, the concept of male captus is most often identified with an unlawful capture. However, as already explained, the maxim has to do with irregularities connected with the way a person was brought from one jurisdiction to another (namely the jurisdiction in which the court before which the suspect is now standing operates). And although the apprehension is an important aspect of this process, it is not the only aspect. After all, an arrest as such does not bring the arrested person before the judges: he may be put in pre-trial detention first and, of course, he needs to be surrendered to the court. Hence, it is submitted that all those pre-trial irregularities which are related to this process, to the process of bringing a suspect from one jurisdiction to another, can fall under the term male captus. Recall in that respect – see Chapter I – the words of Attorney-General Hausner in the Eichmann case:

> [T]he circumstances of the Accused's detention, his seizure and his transfer are not relevant for competence and they contain nothing which can affect this competence, and since they are not relevant, they should not be considered and evidence concerning them should not be heard [emphasis added, ChP].[1]

The pre-trial irregularities may also include irregularities preceding the (official) arrest. For example, in the ICTY Nikolić case (see Chapter VI), it was assumed that the defendant was abducted in the FRY "by unknown individuals having no connection with SFOR and/or the Tribunal",[2] brought to Bosnia and Herzegovina – where he was officially arrested by SFOR – and then transferred to The Hague. This irregularity preceding the official arrest by SFOR was used by Nikolić to challenge the exercise of jurisdiction by the ICTY. According to the Trial Chamber, Nikolić brought forth two lines of reasoning in that respect. The first was that

---

[1] The Trial of Adolf Eichmann, Record of Proceedings in the District Court of Jerusalem, Vol. 1, Session 1, available at: http://www.nizkor.org/hweb/people/e/eichmann-adolf/transcripts/Sessions/Session-001-05.html. See also the reasoning of the judges in the District Court of Jerusalem (see also n. 15 and accompanying text of Chapter I): District Court of Jerusalem, The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann, 'Decision on the Preliminary Objections', 17 April 1961, Criminal Case No. 40/61, available at: http://www.nizkor.org/hweb/people/e/eichmann-adolf/transcripts/Sessions/Session-006-01.html: "As for the arguments over the circumstances under which the Accused was brought to the State of Israel, in view of the fact that we have found that the Court has jurisdiction to try the Accused, the manner in which he was brought within the jurisdiction of this Court has no relevance according to law, neither has the fact whether he was apprehended abroad by emissaries of the governing authorities of the State of Israel or not [emphasis added, ChP]."; District Court of Jerusalem, The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann, 'Judgment', 12 December 1961, Criminal Case No. 40/61, para. 41 (36 International Law Reports 1968, p. 59): "It is an established rule of law that a person being tried for an offence against the laws of a State may not oppose his trial by reason of the illegality of his arrest or of the means whereby he was brought within the jurisdiction of that State. The courts in England, the United States and Israel have constantly held that the circumstances of the arrest and the mode of bringing of the accused into the territory of the State have no relevance to his trial, and they have consistently refused in all instances to enter upon an examination of these circumstances [emphasis added, ChP]."

[2] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 21.

> by taking over the accused from the unknown individuals, SFOR and/or the Prosecution have acknowledged and adopted the alleged illegal conduct of those individuals. The illegality of the acts of the individuals thereby becomes attributable to SFOR and to the Prosecution.[3]

The second line of reasoning was that "the illegal character of the arrest [by the "unknown individuals", ChP] in and of itself should bar the Tribunal from exercising jurisdiction over the accused."[4]

Thus, when this book refers to male captus situations, these situations can encompass in fact every pre-trial irregularity which can be seen to have occurred within the context of a certain case. Hence, they may include irregularities related to the surrender itself,[5] to the pre-trial detention,[6] to the official arrest and even to matters which occurred prior to that.[7] Notwithstanding the theoretically broad scope of this term, it must be admitted that most attention will be paid to irregularities dealing with the (formal) arrest.[8] After all, the word captus refers first and foremost to the capture, to the apprehension.

In the discussion of the case law in the remainder of this book, several (combinations of) male captus situations will be reviewed. To properly understand these situations, it is worth first giving some information on three basic situations.

---

[3] Ibid., para. 29.

[4] Ibid. See also ibid., para. 25 where the Trial Chamber mentions the Defence's submission "that the forcible removal of the Accused from the FRY [by the private individuals prior to the handing over to SFOR, ChP] entailed a breach of both the sovereignty of the FRY and the Accused's individual due process guarantees; and that although such breaches occurred prior to the delivery of the Accused into the custody of SFOR and the Tribunal, these breaches were of such magnitude that even absent the involvement of SFOR or Prosecution, the release of the Accused from the custody of this Tribunal and the dismissal of the indictment against him is the only appropriate remedy [emphasis in original, ChP]."

[5] Although the surrender/transfer itself (the actual transportation of the suspect from one place to another) will normally be without any problems, a suspect may claim that the ground for his surrender is unlawful, hence affecting the surrender itself. One could, for example, think here of the still-to-discuss Milošević case, see Subsection 3.1.3 of Chapter VI, in which case the former President of Yugoslavia claimed that his transfer to The Hague was illegal.

[6] See in that respect also the still-to-discuss 'Order of Provisional Detention' in the case of Kaing Guek Eav, alias Duch, where the co-investigating judges of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia, discussing the male captus bene detentus rule, explained: "Many examples exist in domestic as well as international law which apply this maxim, whereby the circumstances which bring an Accused before a tribunal have no effect on the judgement of the Accused. Although most of these precedents are based on the initial arrest of the Charged Person, and more rarely on the condition of their prior detention, in both cases the reasoning is the same as that with which we are now confronted [emphasis in original, ChP]." (ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, Criminal case File No: 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No: 001/18-07-2007, 'Order of Provisional Detention', 31 July 2007, para. 5.) See also Sluiter 2003 C, p. 649: "There has always been, and remains to be, abundant scholarly debate on the mala captus bene detentus doctrine. This doctrine enables a court to exercise jurisdiction even over an individual who has been unlawfully arrested or detained [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[7] However, as already stated, whether those irregularities are really to be seen as male captus situations is up to the judges to decide.

[8] As perhaps has already become clear from the previous two chapters where the words 'irregular arrest' were sometimes used.

They are the following: disguised extradition, luring and kidnapping/abduction.[9] As these situations originate from the context between States, they will now be explained in light of that specific framework. When examining case law in contexts different from that between States (such as between States and international(ised) criminal tribunals), it will, of course, be explained to what extent this difference in context affects these male captus situations. For now, however, it suffices to examine them in their original legal setting. Note finally that in this chapter's first section, the focus will be on explaining the situations as such (and not on the values which are violated by these male captus situations; that will be the subject of Section 2 of this chapter).

1.2 Common context

To better understand the following explanations on disguised extradition, luring and abduction/kidnapping, the following short common context might be useful. Suppose State A wants to try a person residing in State B. First, the former needs to have the legal means or laws to start a trial. However, that is not enough: State A also needs to have the person in its power.[10]

The situations mentioned below will continue here: how will the person get from State B (which, in this book, depending on the situation, may be referred to as, for example, the State of residence/the injured State/the sending State) into the jurisdiction of State A (which, in this book, depending on the situation, may be referred to as, for example, the forum State/prosecuting State/'abducting' State/receiving State)?

Normally, the suspect will arrive in State A as a result of the very old[11] method of extradition, which "designates the official surrender of a fugitive from justice, regardless of his consent, by the authorities of the State of residence to the authorities of another State for the purpose of criminal prosecution or the execution

[9] See, for example, also Van der Wilt 2004, p. 276. As one can see, these are primarily examples of apprehensions in which the normal procedures were not followed. However, a suspect can, of course, also claim that the arrest procedures themselves were perfectly correct, but that the actual arrest was executed with an excessive amount of force, hence leading to a male captus. Another example of a male captus situation is an excessively long pre-trial detention.

[10] Unless, of course, State A accepts the possibility of a trial in absentia (without the suspect being present during the trial). This book will, however, focus on the situation that a person is tried in his presence as a trial in absentia is not only in violation of a provision of the ICCPR (see its Art. 14, para. 2 (d)) but also in violation of all the Statutes of the international(ised) criminal tribunals which will be discussed in this book, see Artt. 21, para. 4 (d) of the ICTY Statute, 20, para. 4 (d) of the ICTR Statute, 63, para. 1 of the ICC Statute and 17, para. 4 (d) of the SCSL Statute. An exception to this, however, is the STL, see n. 1169 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[11] Shearer (referring to "W. Mettgenberg, 'Von mehr als 3000 Jahren', 23 ZVölkR 23 (1939) citing S. Langdon and A.H. Gardner, in 6 Journal of Egyptian Archeology 179 (1920)") shows that "[i]n what has been described as the oldest document in diplomatic history, the peace treaty between Rameses II of Egypt and the Hittite prince Hattusili III (c. 1280 B.C.), provision was made for the return of the criminals of one party who fled and were found in the territory of the other." (Shearer 1971, p. 5.)

of a sentence."[12] The exact form of extradition may vary, but in any case, a certain arrangement is required. In the words of Gilbert:

> [S]ome form of arrangement, whether formal or informal,[13] whether general or ad hoc, is necessary between the States involved. The arrangement may be based on a treaty, bilateral or multilateral, or on the application with respect to the requesting State of the requested State's domestic extradition legislation. Regardless, some level of agreement must have been reached between the two States acknowledging that a fugitive might be surrendered given that certain prerequisites are met.[14]

It is thus important to understand that there is not necessarily a problem if State B wants to fulfil the extradition request but does not have an extradition treaty with State A.[15] Much will depend on the domestic situation in that case:

> [G]eneral international law contains no limitations on a State's freedom to extradite, except for those fundamental (…) human rights that can be considered as part of (…) jus cogens. Whether, beyond that bar, extradition is admissible in the absence of a treaty is decided solely under domestic law. While the common law countries and, for example, the Netherlands are prevented from extraditing in the absence of a treaty, most civil law countries do grant extradition without treaty on the basis of reciprocity[16] and according to their national extradition acts.[17]

---

[12] Stein 1995, p. 327.

[13] With informal arrangements, one could think of "written instruments to express national obligations with greater precision and openness than tacit or oral agreements but without the full ratification and national pledges that accompany formal treaties." (Lipson 1991, p. 502.) Lipson continues explaining (ibid): "These informal arrangements range from executive agreements and nonbinding treaties to joint declarations, final communiqués, agreed minutes, memoranda of understanding, and agreements pursuant to legislation. Unlike treaties, these informal agreements generally come into effect without ratification and do not require international publication or registration." Note, however, that other definitions of extradition may not accept such informal arrangements, see, for example, European Commission for Democracy through Law (Venice Commission), Opinion no. 363/2005 (CDL-AD(2006)009, Strasbourg, 17 March 2006) on the International Legal Obligations of Council of Europe Member States in Respect of Secret Detention Facilities and Inter-State Transport of Prisoners, adopted by the Venice Commission at its 66th Plenary Session (Venice, 17-18 March 2006), para. 12: "Extradition is a formal procedure whereby an individual who is suspected to have committed a criminal offence and is held by one State is transferred to another State for trial or, if the suspect has already been tried and found guilty, to serve his or her sentence [emphasis in original, ChP]."

[14] Gilbert 1998, p. 27.

[15] A good example of extradition without an extradition treaty is extradition on the basis of the (principle of mutual recognition respecting) European Arrest Warrant (EAW), although some may wonder whether, due to the EAW's far-reaching simplified scheme, one should still speak of extradition here. See, for example, Fennelly 2007, pp. 519-520: "It is a remarkable (even astounding) fact that, within a very short space of time, an entirely new common binding system of surrender of suspects for criminal prosecution has come into effect between twenty-seven states. That system has replaced a multiplicity of bilateral extradition treaties and similar arrangements. Perhaps more importantly, it has introduced a system of extradition (if one is permitted to continue to use this term) between many states which previously had no such arrangements of any kind."

[16] Although this principle, which may be summarised by the Latin maxim quid pro quo (something for something) is especially interesting in extradition situations where there is no treaty available, it can be viewed as a principle of extradition law more generally (meaning that it also has importance in cases

Gilbert shows that there is even a growth of ad hoc extradition arrangements and that, as a consequence, one might think that there is less need for States to use methods not involving extradition to bring (or take!) a suspect from one jurisdiction to the other.[18] Nevertheless, such methods are sometimes used[19] and it is with respect to these 'techniques' that problems may occur.[20] In the words of Shearer:

> [I]t is necessary to stress the point that extradition is the only regular system devised to restore fugitive criminals to the jurisdiction of a court competent by municipal and international law to try them. As will be shown, the possible alternative methods are either irregular or are methods devised for some other primary purpose, in either event having only the probable de facto result of delivering fugitive criminals to a jurisdiction wishing to prosecute or punish them.[21] Whether from the aspects of where there are treaties available). See Stein 1995, p. 330: "Traditionally, the principle of reciprocity underlies the whole structure of extradition. Where general extradition relations are established by virtue of a treaty, reciprocity to a large extent is guaranteed, although even here optional grounds for denying extradition may result in the equality of reciprocal obligations. Extradition in the absence of a treaty is the field where the principle of reciprocity is mainly applied; here, surrender takes place usually only after assurances of reciprocity have been expressly given by the requesting State. The precondition of strict reciprocity, however, is increasingly considered as being detrimental to the interests of justice. Some recent extradition treaties and statutes, therefore, either do not mention reciprocity at all, allow considerable exceptions or express the principle in optional terms, thus conceiving reciprocity as a political maxim rather than as a legal precondition." Next to reciprocity, extradition is also possible on the basis of comity.

---

[17] Stein 1995, p. 329.

[18] See Gilbert 1998, p. 335.

[19] See ibid.

[20] Note, however, that there are also ways not involving extradition to bring a suspect from one jurisdiction to another which seem rather well-accepted. One could hereby think, for example, of a removal of a person from one jurisdiction to the other under the authority of Status of Forces Agreements (SOFAs). Sluiter explains: "There are instances where persons are delivered up to other states for the purpose of prosecution that are outside the realm of extradition. For example, under the Status of Forces agreements, states that send troops practically exercise exclusive jurisdiction over those soldiers. When they exercise their jurisdiction, the receiving state has a duty to hand over the requested person." (Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 607-608, n. 6.) For more information on this topic, see Norton 1975.

[21] An irregular method which will not be addressed here in detail but which should nevertheless be briefly mentioned is the technique of informal/simple return, "that is where one State hands over a fugitive to another without recourse to any officially recognised or organised procedure". (Gilbert 1998, p. 13.) (See also Cherif Bassiouni 1974, p. 121.) This method is much linked to disguised extradition, see, for example, the still-to-discuss Öcalan case (where the ECtHR, however, concluded that Öcalan's arrest and detention were in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law, see ns. 348 and 351 and accompanying text). This method has also been qualified as an abduction, but then as an abduction in which the authorities of the State of residence cooperated. (See also Acting Justice of Appeal O'Linn's term 'official abduction' in the Mushwena case, see n. 782 of Chapter V.) Because of this cooperation, there will not be any violation of the sovereignty of the State of residence, but the operation itself seems to be without any procedural guarantees. Cf. also Loan 2005 (writing on 'the right of an individual to be free from extraterritorial abduction'): "The basis of this right stems from the absence of procedural protections available to an abductee and the deliberate attempt by the abducting state to disregard the procedural safeguards available to the individual under the domestic law of the host state. This individual right exists independently from a breach of a state's sovereignty and can therefore be invoked by an individual in situations when the host-state is complicit in the abduction." (Loan 2005, p. 293.)

> regularity and fairness or from the practical consideration of certainty, extradition is clearly superior to any other system.[22]

1.3 Disguised extradition

The first male captus situation, disguised extradition, is a good example of the second method referred to by Shearer ("methods devised for some other primary purpose"). It is a method > by which a state relies upon its immigration laws to deny an alien the privilege of remaining in that state and then, in carrying out the exclusion, expulsion, deportation or denaturalization provisions of such laws against the individual, it places him directly or indirectly in the control of the agents of another state that is seeking him.[23]

Thus, what happens is that a mechanism, set up for other purposes,[24] is unlawfully used to make an impossible extradition possible or to make a possible, but, for example, too slow or expensive, extradition quicker or cheaper.[25] In other words: the

---

[22] Shearer 1971, p. 67. See also Gilbert 1998, p. 13 (hinting, however, that in some extreme cases, such techniques may be acceptable): "Given extradition is only possible where an international arrangement exists between the requested and requesting States, whether permanent or ad hoc in nature, and that many States do not have any such arrangements, then fugitives will sometimes be returned by other means. No problems arise as long as these other options are considered to be merely alternatives in extremis – in terms of international public order, overall efficiency and human rights, extradition must always be the primary method."

[23] Cherif Bassiouni 1987, p. 147.

[24] See Stein 1995, p. 327: "Unlike the case where an alien is expelled or deported (…), the motive for the return of a fugitive from justice [by extradition, ChP] is not the maintenance of domestic public order or security, but the furtherance of foreign criminal proceedings." In that respect, it is rather strange to hear that "the European Convention on Human rights permits co-operation between states, within the framework of extradition treaties or on matters of deportation, for the purpose of bringing fugitive offenders to justice, provided that this co-operation does not interfere with any specific rights recognised in the Convention [original footnote omitted and emphasis added, ChP]." (Extradition. European standards. Explanatory notes on the Council of Europe convention and protocols and the minimum standards protecting persons subject to transnational criminal proceedings, Council of Europe, December 2006, p. 104.) The omitted footnote refers to para. 86 of the ECtHR's decision of 12 May 2005 in Öcalan, see ns. 325-326 and accompanying text.

[25] See Stein 1995, pp. 327-328: "In numerous instances (...), expulsion and deportation have been and continue to be used as alternatives to extradition, sometimes in order to accelerate the transfer of the fugitive, in other cases also to circumvent rules of extradition law which would preclude the return of the fugitive". See also Borelli 2004, p. 338. Note that the other male captus situations may also be resorted to because of these reasons; because of the fact that the normal procedures are unavailable, have failed or are considered to be too slow or too cumbersome. See, for example, the 'Brief of the Government of Canada as Amicus Curiae in Support of Respondent' in the still-to-discuss Alvarez-Machain case (see Subsection 1.2 of Chapter V): "The position adopted by the petitioner in this case, however, raises a potentially far more serious problem; the spectre not only of federal, but more likely of official state and local incursions to abduct fugitives, where extradition is seen as too costly, too slow or unavailable, in violation of Canada's territorial integrity." (31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 923.) See also Scott, Jr. 1953, pp. 91-93. In his book The Capture and Trial of Adolf Eichmann, Moshe Pearlman explains the arguments of one of the Israeli agents to capture Eichmann in Argentina and bring him back to Israel as follows: "Assuming Klement to be Eichmann, it was possible, of course, mechanism to bring the suspect from State B to State A itself may not be irregular but its unlawful use in this particular case makes the whole procedure irregular.[26]

A well-known case in that respect is Bozano.[27] Bozano, an Italian national, was arrested on a charge of abduction and murder of a 13-year-old Swiss girl, Milena Sutter.[28] He was also charged with indecency and indecent assault with violence on four women.[29] The Italian Assize Court of Appeal, giving judgment in absentia[30] on 22 May 1975, sentenced Bozano to life imprisonment for the murder on Sutter and to four years' imprisonment for the other crimes.[31] Bozano, however, had taken refuge in France where he was arrested during a routine check.[32] Italy subsequently requested his extradition but the French Court of Appeal in Limoges ruled on 15 May 1979 that the Italian trial in absentia was incompatible with French public to arrange for the Argentine government to be notified, in the hope that it would take appropriate action against him as a war criminal. But the procedures, even for the issue of a warrant, were likely to be so lengthy that Eichmann would have time to escape once again. He could certainly count on the help of his Nazi friends in Buenos Aires. And, with the best will in the world, the Argentine government could not prevent a Nazi sympathizer from tipping off Eichmann that he was "wanted" and had best make himself scarce. Nor was the Argentine government under the legal obligation to allow his extradition to Israel. For the extradition treaty between the two countries had not yet been ratified." (Pearlman 1963, pp. 43-44.) See also ibid., p. 64, quoting an Argentinian political leader: "Even though our patriotic feelings have been hurt somewhat by the kidnaping of Eichmann, we understand that there was no other way in which he could be brought to justice. If our extradition procedures were regularized, there would be no cause for kidnapings." (Note that the word "kidnap(p)ing" and "kidnap(p)ed", especially in older contributions and cases (but see also the still-to-discuss 1992 Alvarez-Machain case), is sometimes written with one "p" only, but this is no error, see ns. 261 and 561 of this chapter, n. 434 and accompanying text of this chapter, ns. 213 and 407 of Chapter V and n. 208 and accompanying text of Chapter V.) As explained in the first chapter of this book, male captus techniques may be especially interesting for prosecuting authorities in the context of suspects of international crimes, cf. again (see also n. 45 of Chapter I) Swart 2002 C, p. 1675, writing about "abduction and other methods of getting hold of a person" in the context of the tribunals: "There may be a special temptation to use these methods in relation to States which have refused to comply with requests or orders for arrest or transfer issued by a tribunal." See finally Arendt 1994, p. 264, writing on Eichmann's abduction and his trial in Israel: "Its justification was the unprecedentedness of the crime and the coming into existence of a Jewish State. There were, moreover, important mitigating circumstances in that there hardly existed a true alternative if one indeed wished to bring Eichmann to justice. Argentina had an impressive record for not extraditing Nazi criminals; even if there had been an extradition treaty between Israel and Argentina, an extradition request would almost certainly not have been honored."

---

[26] Cf. also Cowling 1992, p. 254: "The essence of the concept of deportation is the decision by the appropriate authorities in a particular state that the continued presence of an alien in that state is undesirable. So such alien is ordered to leave the territory. The expelling state should not concern itself with the destination of the deportee, nor should deportation be preceded by a request from another state. Thus if a supposed act of deportation was initiated by a request from another state (...) to the effect that an alien should be deported to that state with the ultimate objective of his standing trial, this would constitute a clear case of disguised extradition."

[27] ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Bozano v. France, Application No. 9120/80, 'Judgment', 18 December 1986.

[28] See ibid., para. 12.

[29] See ibid.

[30] Bozano claimed that due to medical reasons, he could not appear in court.

[31] See ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Bozano v. France, Application No. 9120/80, 'Judgment', 18 December 1986, para. 14.

[32] See ibid., para. 17.

policy.[33] Therefore, the French Government could not extradite Bozano to Italy.[34] On the evening of 26 October 1979, the day on which the investigating judge of Limoges issued an order committing Bozano for trial on charges of less serious French crimes,[35] three plain-clothed policemen stopped Bozano on his way home and ordered him to follow them.[36] When he protested, he was seized, forced into an unmarked car, handcuffed and brought to Limoges where he was served with a deportation order dated 17 September 1979[37] in which it was stated that his presence in French was "likely to jeopardise public order".[38] The same night, he was forced to get into an unmarked BMW which drove him to the Swiss border.[39] After a first (and unsuccessful) attempt to cross the border and a few telephone calls, a Swiss unmarked car appeared and a Swiss policeman got out.[40] After other handcuffs were put on Bozano, he was made to sit in the Swiss car which crossed the border in the early hours of 27 October.[41] A couple of months after these events, Switzerland extradited Bozano to Italy where he was imprisoned.[42]

In his article 'Male Captus Male Detentus[43] – a Human Right', Frowein writes that "[i]t is frequently stated that expulsion may not be used to circumvent extradition proceedings."[44] Nevertheless, it would be quite difficult for a suspect to prove that the authorities abused their power to circumvent the regular procedures (détournement de pouvoir). After all, the fact that someone is wanted abroad does not mean that he cannot be deported, even if his extradition is impermissible.[45]

---

[33] See ibid., para. 18.
[34] See ibid.
[35] Namely forging and falsifying administrative documents and using false identity documents. (See ibid., para. 21.)
[36] See ibid., para. 23.
[37] See ibid., paras. 23-24.
[38] Ibid., para. 24.
[39] See ibid., para. 25.
[40] See ibid., para. 26.
[41] See ibid.
[42] See ibid., para. 27.
[43] This is another version of the maxim ex iniuria ius non oritur and means that the irregular way in which a person was brought into the jurisdiction of the court (male captus) must lead to a refusal of jurisdiction (male detentus). The oldest source in which this study could find this maxim is Dugard 1991.
[44] Frowein 1994, p. 179. See also Schomburg 1995, p. 105, citing Resolution No. 9 relevant to the topic 'The Protection of Human Rights in International Cooperation in Criminal Matters' (unanimously approved at the closing session of the XV Congress of the International Association of Penal Law in Rio de Janeiro, 4-10 September 1994): "[P]rocedures such as deportation or expulsion, deliberately applied in order to circumvent the safeguards of extradition procedures should be avoided."
[45] See Van der Wilt 2004, p. 285. See also the following words of Lord Denning in the Soblen case: "If a fugitive criminal is here and the Secretary of State thinks that in the public good he ought to be deported, there is no reason why he should not be deported to his own country, even though he is there a wanted criminal." (Court of Appeal, Reg. v. Governor of Brixton Prison, Ex Parte Soblen, 31 August 1962, International Law Reports, Vol. 33 (1969), p. 279.) See also Michell 1996, pp. 391-392: "The mere fact that an individual has been deported from state X to state Y, and Y seeks to prosecute him, is neither inherently objectionable nor a violation of international law. It only becomes objectionable when X deports the individual to Y with the intent of circumventing extradition proceedings, or perhaps where extradition would ordinarily be unavailable. The key question involves the circumvention of extradition

Moreover, the deporting State often has no choice but to deport the undesirable alien to his State of origin, where criminal proceedings may also have been initiated against him, because only that State is obliged, from an international law point of view, to take him back.[46]

In addition to this, some judges may only consider whether the deportation or expulsion order as such was lawful (and not whether it was used for the right purpose). Notwithstanding this uncertainty in the law,[47] Gilbert explains that "there seems to be a trend for courts to query more forcefully attempts to achieve de facto extradition by deporting the fugitive offender."[48]

1.4 Luring

As shown above, disguised extradition is a method executed by State B itself. Therefore, State A does not really have to do anything except wait to 'receive' the person from State B.[49] However, what happens if State B does not know that the person is on its territory or knows but is unwilling (or unable and not using the technique of disguised extradition) to deliver the person to State A, which is very eager to detain the suspect? In such situations, State A itself might act. Two techniques can be used in these situations: abduction/kidnapping (which will be discussed in the next subsection) and luring.

Luring (or trickery) is a method by which "deceit, fraud and tricks [are used] to lure individuals from the country of their residence to a location where there is jurisdiction to arrest the suspects."[50] This location does not necessarily have to be procedures by means of deportation [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." It would be easier for a suspect to prove abuse of power if he is not deported to the most obvious country such as the country whose borders are closest to the place from which the person is deported. In the Bozano case, for example, one can wonder why Bozano was deported to Switzerland and not to Spain (a country closer to Limoges than Switzerland), see also ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Bozano v. France, Application No. 9120/80, 'Judgment', 18 December 1986, paras. 31 and 59. In addition, the Defence argued that "in choosing Switzerland out of five neighbouring countries (…), the authorities knew that they were handing him over to the European State most likely to extradite him to Italy, owing to the existence of an extradition agreement between Italy and Switzerland and the nationality of the murdered girl." (Ibid., para. 29.) See also Michell 1996, p. 391: "Deportation to a specific foreign state may give rise to the suspicion that "disguised extradition" is taking place, thus depriving the individual of the procedural protections inherent to formal extradition proceedings."

---

[46] See Van der Wilt 2004, p. 285.

[47] See Gilbert 1998, p. 366: "The law in this area is in a state of flux. Some decisions favour the fugitive, while others merely look to see if the deportation or expulsion is technically lawful, regardless of the underlying motive of the requested State to avoid its extradition procedure."

[48] Ibid., p. 373.

[49] Nevertheless, it is clear that very often, there will be some involvement of State A in the disguised extradition operation as well. After all, the idea behind this male captus situation is not that State B deports the suspect to a random place, but to a place where State A can (directly or indirectly) get hold of him.

[50] Paust et al. 1996, p. 426. See also Mundis 2003, p. 1018, n. 15.

State B itself, as became clear in the Yunis case,[51] a good example of a luring operation.

In Yunis, the US Government sought to arrest and bring to justice the leader of a group of men who hijacked and later blew up a Jordanian aircraft in Beirut.[52] After months of investigation, the US identified Lebanese citizen Fawaz Yunis as the leader of this group.[53] It was with the help of a former friend of Yunis and now US informant, Jamal Hamdan, that this identification was made possible.[54] A detailed plan was made to lure Yunis, under the promise of a lucrative narcotics deal, from Lebanon to a location in international waters off the coast of Cyprus.[55] On 13 September 1987, the FBI-led operation 'Goldenrod' began: that morning, Hamdan and Yunis boarded a small motorboat off the coast of Cyprus which brought the men to a yacht anchored in international waters.[56]

> Immediately upon boarding the yacht, defendant was greeted, given a routine pat down and then offered a beer by one of the FBI agents. S.A. [Special Agent, ChP] George Gast, who assumed the role of one of the narcotic contacts, escorted Yunis to the stern of the boat where he and Yunis joined S.A. Donald Glasser. At a prearranged signal – a slight nod – the two agents, who were then positioned alongside Yunis, engaged in a "take down". Together, they grasped the defendant's arms, "kick[ed] his feet out from underneath him, and [took] him down to the deck and put handcuffs on him [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[57]

1.5 Kidnapping/abduction

The James Bond calibre of the final basic male captus situation, abduction or kidnapping,[58] is even greater. In this male captus situation, the way State A obtains custody of the suspect residing in State B without that latter's consent does not involve non-violent techniques such deceit, fraud and tricks, but plain force. One could hereby also think of the threat of use of force, for example, if an agent visits the suspect and, while holding him at gunpoint, orders him to come with him to the forum State. A (if not the most) famous example of this situation has already been described in the very first pages of this book: the Eichmann case.

---

[51] US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909).
[52] See ibid., p. 912.
[53] See ibid.
[54] See ibid.
[55] See ibid.
[56] See ibid.
[57] Ibid., p. 913.
[58] Some jurisdictions recognise a difference between the two crimes. See, for example, Gershenson 1954, writing on the Penal Law of the State of New York, at p. 35: "An abduction always must involve a female, a kidnapping may be committed as to either sex. An abduction always concerns a sexual purpose, a kidnapping concerns a seizure or detention and requires no sexual element." However, in the specific context of international criminal law, the two nouns (and the verbs deriving from them) are used interchangeably. Hence, that is what this book will do as well.

Although luring and abduction thus differ from each other, they are often put in the same category: see in that respect the often-used definition from Shearer, which defines abduction as "the removal of a person from the jurisdiction of one state to another by the use of force, the threat of force or by fraud."[59] In the same vein, Scharf explains that "most countries do not distinguish between abduction by fraud and abduction by force."[60] However, it is hard to disagree with the idea that abduction is clearly more objectionable than luring, since in the latter case only tricks and no weapons are used.[61]

Nevertheless, it may sometimes be difficult to 'label' certain situations. For example, while the above-mentioned situation of a threat of use of force can clearly be seen as an abduction and a threat from a foreign agent operating from another State (for example, via a telephone call) to induce the suspect to come to the forum State as a luring operation, it is more difficult to specify the latter situation if it takes place on the territory of the State of residence; on the one hand, the foreign agent uses a threat of force on the territory of the State of residence with the result that the suspect arrives in the forum State (abduction) but on the other hand, weapons were not used (luring). Another example illustrating the problem of 'labelling' is that two States may informally cooperate in transferring the suspect without any guarantees from one State to another. Such an informal transfer much resembles the situation of disguised extradition, but in the latter case, the transferring State still tries to give the operation a legal appearance by using its immigration laws to (unlawfully) deport/expel the suspect. However, a State may not even need to resort to those laws and just informally hand over the suspect with no guarantees.[62] This could also be done in a more forceful way, resembling the technique of abduction. The 'only' difference would then be that the State of residence consents to the operation.[63]

In short, the three situations – disguised extradition, luring and abduction – have been presented to clarify three basic situations which one will often find in male captus case law. However, as will also be shown in the next chapters, practice may also produce other male captus situations which do not clearly fall within one of [59] Shearer 1971, p. 72. See also Garner 2004, pp. 4: Abduction is "[t]he act of leading someone away by force or fraudulent persuasion." and 886: Kidnapping is, inter alia, "[t]he crime of seizing and taking away a person by force or fraud."

[60] Scharf 1998, p. 374. See also ibid., p. 382: "[B]oth are generally objectionable."

[61] See also Scharf 2000, p. 970: "As an extraterritorial law enforcement practice, luring is much more common, and less objectionable, than abductions. Unlike abduction by force, weapons are not used to get the suspect to the location where the arrest will occur. A luring can be accomplished telephonically, by fax, or by e-mail." See also Sluiter 2001, p. 152: "[F]orcible abduction is more serious than luring an accused". See finally also Costi 2003, pp. 64-65: "There is (…) abundant practice and legal opinion differentiating between forcible abduction and the luring of an individual from the state of refuge. Luring is found to be less objectionable since it involves no use of force or flagrant violation of the territorial sovereignty of the state of refuge [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[62] See, for example, the still-to-discuss Hartley case, see Subsection 1.2 of Chapter V.

[63] Cf. in that respect also the term 'official abduction' (an abduction in which the authorities of the State of residence cooperated), to be found in the (still-to-discuss) Mushwena case (a case which, however, could perhaps be best qualified as a disguised extradition), see n. 21 of the present chapter and ns. 94 and 782 of Chapter V.

those three categories and are therefore difficult to label. However, perhaps the exact label is not that important. What is arguably more important is to find out which values such techniques violate and what the result of such violations are.

2 WHAT IS VIOLATED BY THESE MALE CAPTUS SITUATIONS?

A number of important values can be violated by the three basic male captus situations, the three most important being: 1) State sovereignty, 2) human rights and 3) the rule of law.[64]

2.1 State sovereignty

One of the most important characteristics of a State is its independence, its sovereignty. This concept has an internal and external aspect. The internal one is that State A is the only one having authority over the territory of State A.[65] This means, for example, that it does not have to tolerate authority over its territory by State B. The external aspect signifies that State A itself must also respect the sovereignty of other States, meaning that it cannot intervene in the domestic affairs of State B. (There are, however, some exceptions but these will be addressed infra.)

That States (or even the UN)[66] in principle cannot intervene in each other's internal affairs is clearly a principle of international law;[67] this has been confirmed

[64] See, for example, also Van Sliedregt 2001 B, pp. 75*ff*.

[65] Note that a State's territory is not limited to the land of that State (which includes the territorial subsoil), but also extends to its territorial sea, internal waters and the airspace above its land, internal waters and territorial sea. See Brownlie 2003, p. 115. The high seas/international waters are outside the jurisdiction of any State, although States have, in principle, exclusive jurisdiction over ships flying their flag on the high seas. Hence, if a person with the nationality of State B is arrested on a ship with the nationality of State A (the flag State) in international waters, State A does not violate the territorial sovereignty of State B, see also the briefly mentioned (see n. 56 and accompanying text) Yunis case. (Note, however, that the luring in Lebanon (which led to the arrest in international waters) might be seen as a violation of Lebanon's sovereignty, but this point will be returned to infra and in Chapter V.) A very topical exception to the above-mentioned rule that, in principle, only the flag State has jurisdiction over the ship flying its flag is related to piracy, see Art. 19 of the 1958 Convention on the High Seas (available at: http://untreaty.un.org/ilc/texts/instruments/english/conventions/8_1_1958_high_seas.pdf): "On the high seas, or in any other place outside the jurisdiction of any State, every State may seize a pirate ship or aircraft, or a ship taken by piracy and under the control of pirates, and arrest the persons and seize the property on board. The courts of the State which carried out the seizure may decide upon the penalties to be imposed, and may also determine the action to be taken with regard to the ships, aircraft or property, subject to the rights of third parties acting in good faith."

[66] See Art. 2, para. 7 of the UN Charter: "Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the Members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter; but this principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter Vll."

[67] See generally Shen 2001, who argues that this fundamental principle (including its corollaries such as the prohibition on the use of force) constitutes a norm of ius cogens. Note that, although the principle of non-intervention and the prohibition on the use of force are often addressed together, there is a clear difference between the two: the former is general and broad in nature and encompasses the latter, see, for example, ibid., p. 6: "[N]o intervention, whether economic, political, military or otherwise, is in numerous political statements and documents, such as the United Nations General Assembly's 'Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention in the Domestic Affairs of States and the Protection of Their Independence and Sovereignty'[68] of 1965 and 'Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations' of 1970.[69]

The following authoritative cases also confirm the principle of non-intervention in relation to the (territorial) sovereignty of a State. In the S.S. Lotus case, the Permanent Court of International Justice (PCIJ) held that "the first and foremost restriction imposed by international law upon a State is that – failing the existence of a permissive rule to the contrary – it may not exercise its power in any form in the territory of another State."[70] In the Corfu Channel case, the successor of the PCIJ, the International Court of Justice (ICJ), recognised that "between independent States, respect for territorial sovereignty is an essential foundation of international relations."[71] The ICJ ruled again on this topic in the 1986 Military and Paramilitary Activities case where it stated that "the principle of non-intervention involves the right of every sovereign State to conduct its affairs without outside interference".[72] The concept of "exercise of power in any form" obviously includes the exercise of police powers. In the words of Lauterpacht, writing about "the obligation of States to refrain from performing jurisdictional acts within the territory of other States except by virtue of a general or special permission",[73] "[s]uch acts include, for instance, the sending of agents for the purpose of apprehending within foreign territory persons accused of having committed a crime."[74] tolerable without explicit prior agreements under international law. Armed intervention or other forms of intervention involving the use of force are further prohibited by the principle of non-use of force".

---

[68] UNGA Res. 2131 (XX). Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention in the Domestic Affairs of States and the Protection of Their Independence and Sovereignty, 1408th plenary meeting, 21 December 1965. In this document, the UNGA solemnly declared, among other things, that "[n]o State has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other State. Consequently, armed intervention and all other forms of interference or attempted threats against the personality of the State or against its political, economical and cultural elements, are condemned."

[69] UNGA Res. 2625 (XXV). Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, 1883rd plenary meeting, 24 October 1970 (annex). One apt quotation from this declaration can be found in its Preamble, in which the UNGA states that it is "[c]onvinced that the strict observance by States of the obligation not to intervene in the affairs of any other State is an essential condition to ensure that nations live together in peace with one another, since the practice of any form of intervention not only violates the spirit and letter of the Charter, but also leads to the creation of situations which threaten international peace and security".

[70] PCIJ, The case of the S.S. "Lotus", 'Judgment', 7 September 1927, Publications of the Permanent Court of International Justice, Series A. – No. 10, Judgment No. 9, p. 18.

[71] ICJ, The Corfu Channel Case (Merits), 'Judgment', 9 April 1949, p. 35.

[72] ICJ, Case Concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), 'Judgment', 27 June 1986, para. 202.

[73] Lauterpacht 1970, pp. 487-488.

[74] Ibid., p. 488. See also the Third Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States (American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third, Foreign Relations Law of the United States,

Returning to the three basic male captus situations, it is clear that an abduction by State A on the territory of State B violates the latter's (territorial) sovereignty and integrity and the norm of non-intervention.[75] This was also recognised by the UNSC in the Eichmann case (see also Subsection 3.3.2 of this chapter), when it, in Resolution 138 of 23 June 1960, considered "that the violation of the sovereignty of a Member State is incompatible with the Charter of the United Nations", noted "that the repetition of acts such as that giving rise to this situation would involve a breach of the principles upon which international order is founded", and declared

1987), which stipulates in Section 432 ('Measures in Aid of Enforcement of Criminal Law'), para. 2: "A state's law enforcement officers may exercise their functions in the territory of another state only with the consent of the other state, given by duly authorized officials of that state." Comment (b) on this rule (ibid.) clarifies that the rule is "universally recognized". See also the positions of the UNGA's Sixth (Legal) Committee, ("[I]nternational law prohibits a state from exercising its criminal jurisdiction beyond its territory as contrary to the sovereign equality and territorial integrity of states, unless the other state concerned has given its consent." (Morris and Bourloyannis-Vrailas 1994, p. 357)) and of the UN Commission on Human Rights' Working Group on Arbitrary Detention (Commission on Human Rights, Fiftieth session, Item 10 of the provisional agenda, Question of the Human Rights of All Persons Subjected to Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment, Report of the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, UN Doc. E/CN.4/1994/27, 17 December 1993, Decision No. 48/1993 (United States of America), pp. 135-140), pp. 138-139: "Another basic principle of international law and of international relations is respect for the territorial sovereignty of States, a principle which, in addition to prohibiting the use of force and intervention by one State in the affairs of another – includes refraining from committing acts of sovereignty in the territory of another State, particularly acts of coercion or judicial investigation. (...) What is more, intervention by one Power in the territory of another is not only a breach of international law but, in addition, if it is repeated, it may "endanger international peace and security" (United Nations Security Council, Claim by Argentina in the Eichmann case, resolution 138 (1960))." See finally Gluck 1994, p. 620: "It is a well-established primary rule of international law that no state may exercise its police power in the territory of another state without the consent of the host state [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[75] See not only the already-mentioned quotation of Lauterpacht (see the previous footnote and accompanying text) but, for example, also Jennings and Watts 1992, pp. 387-388, writing about violations of independence and territorial and personal authority, "the three main aspects of the sovereignty of a state" (ibid., p. 382) ("It is (…) a breach of international law for a state without permission to send its agents into the territory of another state to apprehend persons accused of having committed a crime [original footnote omitted, ChP]."), Michell 1996, p. 411 ("It is beyond controversy that a states violates customary international law by sending its agents into another state to abduct an individual for trial. Respect for the territorial integrity of other states is a fundamental principle of international law. (…) It would make a mockery of state sovereignty, a principle at the very foundation of the international legal order, if states were free to send their agents into other states to abduct fugitives [original footnotes omitted, ChP].") and Costi 2003, p. 61: "A state cannot send agents abroad to abduct an alleged criminal. An abduction carried out by agents instructed by the state within the territory of another state is a violation of international law. This rule is firmly rooted in the principle of respect for territorial sovereignty and integrity of other states and in the ensuing obligation of non-intervention in the internal and external affairs of another state [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

"that acts such as that under consideration, which affect the sovereignty of a Member State and therefore cause international friction, may, if repeated, endanger international peace and security."[76]

[76] UNSC Res. 138 of 23 June 1960, UN Doc. S/4349. Although it is thus clear that such an abduction violates the norm of non-intervention, and also involves the (threat of) use of force, it is less obvious whether it also violates the more specific prohibition on the threat or use of force as can be found in Art. 2, para. 4 of the UN Charter: "All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations." Although the UNSC in the Eichmann case has not explicitly qualified the abduction as such (see also Findlay 1988, p. 25), authors and cases have nevertheless used the Eichmann case to found their argument that abductions violate Art. 2, para. 4 of the UN Charter. See, for example, Glennon 1992, pp. 746-747: "Numerous authorities have viewed it as flatly impermissible under longstanding customary norms for one state to send its agents to seize an individual located in the territory of another state without the consent of the government of that state. (…) This norm not only is a bedrock of customary international law but is, in addition, incorporated in numerous treaties, among them the United Nations Charter (…) [Glennon hereby refers to Art. 2, para. 4 of the UN Charter, ChP.] Following Israel's 1960 abduction of the nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann, the UN Security Council construed Article 2, paragraph 4 of the Charter as proscribing abduction without the consent of the state in which the abduction occurs [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also the still-to-discuss Toscanino case: "Here, (…) Toscanino alleges that he was forcibly abducted from Uruguay, whose territorial sovereignty this country has agreed in two international treaties to respect. The Charter of the United Nations, the members of which include the United States and Uruguay (…) obligates "All Members" to "refrain . . . from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity of political independence of any state . . .." See U.N. Charter, art. 2 para. 4. Additionally, the Charter of the Organization of American States, whose members also include the United States and Uruguay (…) provides that the "territory of a state is inviolable; it may not be the object, even temporarily, . . . of . . . measures of force taken by another state, directly or indirectly, on any grounds whatever . . ." See O.A.S. Charter, art. 17. That international kidnappings such as the one alleged here violate the U.N. Charter was settled as a result of the Security Council debates following the illegal kidnapping in 1960 of Adolf Eichmann from Argentina by Israeli "volunteer groups." (…) The resolution merely recognized a long standing principle of international law that abductions by one state of persons located within the territory of another violate the territorial sovereignty of the second state". (US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), pp. 277-278.) See for the same argument (but without reference to the Eichmann case), for example, Scharf 2000, p. 967: "The unconsented exercise of such powers constitutes an infringement of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the host state in violation of the U.N. Charter [Here, Scharf refers to Art. 2, para. 4 of the UN Charter, ChP.] and customary international law [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Lamb 2000, p. 222. However, the opposite has also been asserted, see, for example, Findlay 1988, p. 25: "Publicists agree that many exercises of power within the territorial domain of another state do not rise to the level of a "threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state" within the meaning of article 2(4) of the United Nations Charter. Thus, according to Professor Bowett, actions directed against individuals within the territory of a state do not violate the territorial integrity or political independence of the state [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." However, it can be argued that this view is rather restricted and that it would be better to view the words "against the territorial integrity and political independence" broader as to mean territorial inviolability. State A does not need to have an intention to, for example, occupy State B; when it sends its agents into State B without the latter's consent, one can arguably already speak of a violation, by State A, of State B's territorial integrity and of Art. 2, para. 4 of the UN Charter. Cf. also Shen 2001, pp. 23 and 26-28: "D'Amato (…) argued that the prohibition of the use of "force against the territorial integrity or political independence" of states was technical and did not incorporate all uses of force, and in particular did not include the concept of territorial inviolability, but instead was confined to "preventing the permanent loss of a portion of one's territory" (…). "Political independence" does not simply refer to the maintenance of a State's government. It is a term broad

It is also clear that the method of disguised extradition does not violate a State's sovereignty as agents from State A in that situation do not exercise police powers on State B's territory. After all, although State A may also collude in the operation (and may thus be complicit in the commission of the male captus), it does not need to violate State B's sovereignty for the latter State will transfer the suspect from its territory to the territory of State A itself.[77]

Luring is more complex in that respect.[78] The idea behind luring is that agents of State A get hold of the alleged criminal 'only' by using deceit, fraud and tricks to lure the individual from State B to a location where there is jurisdiction to arrest the suspect. Very often, agents from State A do not have to enter the territory of State B to be able to lure the suspect to another State. For example, they simply can make telephone calls from another State to convince the suspect to leave his State of refuge.[79] However, it is also possible that those agents do enter the territory of State enough to cover a State's political integrity, dignity and sovereignty to manage its own internal and external affairs free from any foreign interference. (…) Similarly, "territorial integrity" cannot be narrowly regarded as merely referring to the inalienability of a State's territory. Rather, it refers to the territorial sovereignty, dignity and inviolability of a State. (…) Lauterpacht, in Oppenheim's International Law, convincingly wrote with force that "territorial integrity, especially when coupled with 'political independence,' is synonymous with territorial inviolability" (…). This and other evidence confirms that the fundamental principles of international law relating to non-intervention and the non-use of force, as embodied in the Charter, do not simply prohibit intervention and the threat or use of force aimed at dismembering a State or causing the permanent loss of a portion of its territory, but also proscribe any other form of intervention or use of force that otherwise offends a State's sovereignty, international personality, dignity, territorial inviolability and political freedom from foreign interference. The narrow interpretation of Article 2(4) is not only contrary to lex lata, but also dangerous and harmful to all nations. If we were to accept D'Amato's proposition, then Mexican law enforcement officers would be entitled to come across the border into Texas to capture criminal suspects without violating the "territorial integrity" of the United States, unless by doing so they designed to separate Texas from the federation [emphasis in original, ChP]." See also Skubiszewski 1968, p. 746: "The intentions of the framers of the Charter, though not always clearly expressed, were directed at removing force as a means of settling all international disputes, and, therefore, the ban equally covers situations where territory or independence are not at stake. Also, the principle of effectiveness requires Article 2 (4) to be read as prohibiting all threat or use of force unless the Charter, in other provisions, expressly permits its use."

---

[77] See also Morgenstern 1953, p. 270: "[T]he numerous cases in which individuals have been surrendered by agents of the state of refuge without resort to extradition proceedings are not directly relevant here. The state which receives the fugitive for prosecution has not exercised any force on the territory of the state of refuge and has in no way violated its territorial sovereignty. There is thus no violation of international law."

[78] See also Van der Wilt 2004, p. 283.

[79] See also Scharf 2000, p. 970: "A luring can be accomplished telephonically, by fax, or by e-mail. In this way, physical presence of law enforcement authorities in the territory of the host state can be avoided. Therefore, the risk of injury, damage, or incident in the host state is minimized." Note, however, that such an operation has also been viewed as violating the sovereignty of a State, see the still-to-discuss 1982 Swiss case X. See also Mann 1989, pp. 408-409: "It is submitted that a violation of international law occurs also where the State or its agent does not abduct the victim by force, but induces him by fraud or other illegal means to leave the country of refuge and proceed to some other country where he is apprehended. In such circumstances (…) the wrong is committed in the foreign State, because the illegal means are used or have their effect there. A State, being sovereign, is not expected to tolerate acts that involve generally recognized illegality, though they are not performed by force. It is not necessarily the use of force, but the illegality, that constitutes the wrong done to the

B. This would be done, not with the aim of making the actual arrest there (in that case, the operation could be qualified as an abduction/kidnapping), but with the aim of enabling the luring operation to succeed. It is highly likely that the suspect will not be convinced by the telephone calls or other techniques from other States,[80] thus making it necessary for the agents to enter the territory to persuade the suspect in a face-to-face conversation to come to another State. One can wonder whether such an operation, in which agents from State A enter State B's territory, not to make an arrest, but to make an arrest elsewhere possible, is a violation of State B's territory. Although the clearest enforcement operation, the arrest itself, is not carried out on State B's territory, one cannot deny that in such situations, operations on State B's territory are being carried out with the purpose of making the arrest possible. Therefore, one can very well argue that these operations are also to be seen as "jurisdictional acts" to which Lauterpacht was referring supra, even if the climax of the whole operation (the actual arrest) is effected elsewhere. Arguably more in line with the principle of respect for another State's sovereignty is not the (restricted) idea that agents of other States are not allowed to arrest persons in another State without that latter State's consent, but rather the (broader) idea that agents of other States are not allowed to carry out police operations in that other State, whether these operations amount to an actual arrest or not.[81] More far-reaching in that respect is the already briefly mentioned (see footnote 44) Resolution No. 9 relevant to the topic 'The Protection of Human Rights in International Cooperation in Criminal Matters' (unanimously approved at the closing session of the XV Congress of the International Association of Penal Law in Rio de Janeiro, 4-10 September 1994) which views luring in general (whether agents from State A are operating on State B's territory or not) as a violation of State B's territory:

> Abducting a person from a foreign country or enticing a person under false pretences to come voluntarily from another country in order to subject such a person to arrest sovereignty of the State [emphasis added, ChP]." See further the following general words of Paust et al. 1996, p. 435: "The international community appears to view the practice of abduction by fraud as a violation of territorial sovereignty and international law [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Knoops 2002, pp. 244-245: "Strict adherence to this principle [the principle of non-intervention, ChP] implies that even if no physical violation of the foreign territory whatsoever took place and the luring was merely conducted over the phone, radio, email or fax between law enforcement officials and the suspect, an infringement of international law can be present [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally Swart 2002 D, who notes that "the Dutch government has always maintained the view that activities of foreign police officers aimed at inducing a suspect to leave the Netherlands need prior consent of the competent Dutch authorities since the sovereignty of the Netherlands is at stake. This is the case even if the foreign agent himself does not enter the Netherlands."

---

[80] Note that such techniques may be in violation of the law of the 'luring' State, but they are often not seen as violations of international law as they do not take place on the territory of the suspect's State of residence. (See for other views, however, the previous footnote.)

[81] See also the following examples of Jennings and Watts 1992, p. 386: "A state is not allowed to send (…) its police forces into or through foreign territory, (…) or to carry out official investigations on foreign territory or let its agents conduct clandestine operations there, or to exercise an act of administration or jurisdiction on foreign territory, without permission [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

> and criminal prosecution is contrary to public international law and should not be tolerated (...).[82]

Notwithstanding this, it must be repeated that, even if luring indeed violates another State's sovereignty, this violation can be seen as less serious than the case of an abduction in which actual force is used on the territory of the injured State without that State's consent.[83]

2.1.1 Exceptions

There are some exceptions though. There are circumstances which ensure that the wrongfulness of an action (such as sending agents into another State's territory to seize a person) is precluded. Here, it might be useful to consult the rather influential ILC's 'Draft articles on responsibility of States for internationally wrongful acts'.[84] In Chapter V of these Draft articles (hereinafter: DARS) are six wrongfulness-precluding circumstances which ensure that no internationally wrongful act will take place. In an effort not to complicate matters too much (see also the 'disclaimer' in Subsection 1.1), only the two best-known circumstances will be addressed here: consent and self-defence.[85] In addition to that, some attention will be paid to interventions based on humanitarian grounds.

---

[82] Schomburg 1995, p. 105. See also ns. 79-80.

[83] See, again (see also n. 61), Costi 2003, pp. pp. 64-65: "There is (…) abundant practice and legal opinion differentiating between forcible abduction and the luring of an individual from the state of refuge. Luring is found to be less objectionable since it involves no use of force or flagrant violation of the territorial sovereignty of the state of refuge [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[84] See the Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), pp. 26-143. Here, one can find both the articles and the commentaries to these articles which were commended to the attention of governments "without prejudice to the question of their future adoption or other appropriate action" by the UNGA, see UNGA Resolutions 56/83 of 28 January 2002 (para. 3) and 59/35 of 16 December 2004 (para. 1). With respect to the authority of the Draft articles, see Caron 2002, who concedes that the articles are influential but who is also concerned "that the ILC's work, primarily because of its form, will have unwarranted influence." (Ibid., p. 866.) See also ibid., pp. 872-873: "The articles will have great effect, and that is a significant achievement. But they should have effect because of their integrity and value, not because they emerged from the ILC in a form that looks like a treaty. The ILC's work on state responsibility will best serve the needs of the international community only if it is weighed, interpreted, and applied with much care. (…) The articles are a mix of codification and progressive development; to be frank, it would often be difficult to say which article partakes more of one or the other. (…) The articles have already affected legal discourse, arbitral decisions, and perhaps also state practice. Now that they have been adopted by the ILC, they are likely to have even greater impact. To apply them correctly, decision makers must avoid a simple reading of the articles but, instead, must consult the commentaries and reports for each article, which illuminate the practice underlying the rule, the discussions of the ILC, and the comments of various governments. Together these sources bring life to the articles and reveal the degree of consensus."

[85] The other four are: Countermeasures in respect of an internationally wrongful act (Art. 22), Force majeure (Art. 23), Distress (Art. 24) and Necessity (Art. 25).

2.1.1.1 Consent

In Article 20 of the DARS, one can read: "Valid consent by a State to the commission of a given act by another State precludes the wrongfulness of that act in relation to the former State to the extent that the act remains within the limits of that consent." Thus, if State B gives consent to the exercise of police powers by State A on the territory of State B, there is no internationally wrongful act by State A. Consent to (otherwise unlawful) conduct may be given "in advance or even at the time it is occurring".[86] Consent given after the conduct does not take away the unlawfulness of the conduct (as is the case with respect to consent given in advance or at the time of occurrence). It is merely "a form of waiver or acquiescence, leading to loss of the right to invoke responsibility. This is dealt with in article 45."[87] According to the ILC, consent precluding wrongfulness "must be freely given and

[86] Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 73. A good example of prior consent could be a treaty between two States in which the topic of hot pursuit is regulated. See also Gilbert 1998, p. 363, who argues that the concept, "which is undergoing a revival in Europe", allows "for the police authorities of one State to cross into a neighbouring State in order to effect the arrest of a fugitive in flight. Its popularity in Europe is due to the policy of internal open borders within the European Union from 1993." An example in that respect is the Convention between the Kingdom of Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Kingdom of Spain, the French Republic, the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Republic of Austria on the stepping up of cross-border cooperation, particularly in combating terrorism, cross-border crime and illegal migration (Prüm Convention), signed in Prüm (Germany) on 17 May 2005 and available at: http://www.libertysecurity.org/IMG/pdf/Prum-ConventionEn.pdf. Art. 27, para. 2 (10) of this Convention reads: "The Contracting Parties' competent authorities shall provide one another with assistance (…), in particular by: (…) supplying information on practical implementation of cross-border surveillance, cross-border hot pursuit and controlled deliveries". For the concept of hot pursuit in the context of the law of the sea, see, for example, Shaw 2003, p. 551, who notes that "[t]he right of hot pursuit of a foreign ship is a principle designed to ensure that a vessel which has infringed the rules of a coastal state cannot escape punishment by fleeing to the high seas. In reality it means that in certain defined circumstances a coastal state may extend its jurisdiction onto the high seas in order to pursue and seize a ship which is suspected of infringing its laws." The modern origin of this right can be found in Art. 23 of the already-mentioned (see n. 65) 1958 Convention on the High Seas. Note finally, and to also come back to the plane diversion plan of the ICC as mentioned in the first chapter of this book (see n. 44 of that chapter), that a number of States neighbouring the State of the suspect could also cooperate in the air, agreeing, for example, that a plane carrying that suspect cannot enter their territory (which includes, it is reminded, see n. 65, the airspace above its land, internal waters and territorial sea). If that plane nevertheless enters their territory, States could lawfully divert that plane to an airfield in order to arrest the suspect. Cf. also Shaw 2003, p. 475, where he is writing about "[t]he right of a state to require a civil aircraft to land at a designated airport, where the aircraft is flying above its territory without authority".

[87] Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 73. Art. 45 of the DARS ('Loss of the right to invoke responsibility') reads: "The responsibility of a State may not be invoked if: (a) The injured State has validly waived the claim; (b) The injured State is to be considered as having, by reason of its conduct, validly acquiesced in the lapse of the claim."

clearly established".[88] In addition, it must be actually expressed (rather than presumed),[89] and it "may be vitiated by error, fraud, corruption or coercion".[90] An example of a case of consent, provided by the ILC, is the famous Savarkar case. The facts of this case between France and Great Britain can be found in the Permanent Court of Arbitration's award of 24 February 1911:[91]

> [I]t is established that, by a letter dated the 29th June 1910, the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police in London informed the "Directeur de la Sûreté générale" at Paris, that the British Indian Vinayak Damodar Savarkar was about to be sent to India, in order to be prosecuted for abetment of murder, etc., and that he would be on board the vessel "Morea" touching at Marseilles on the 7th or 8th July. (…) [O]n the 7th July, the "Morea" arrived at Marseilles. The following morning, between 6 and 7 o'clock, Savarkar, having succeeded in effecting his escape, swam ashore and began to run; he was arrested by a brigadier of the French maritime gendarmerie and taken back to the vessel. Three persons, who had come ashore from the vessel, assisted the brigadier in taking the fugitive back.[92]

The Court concluded:

> [I]t is manifest that the case is not one of recourse to fraud or force in order to obtain possession of a person who had taken refuge in foreign territory,[[93]] (…) there was not, in the circumstances of the arrest and delivery of Savarkar to the British authorities and of his removal to India, anything in the nature of a violation of the sovereignty of France, (…) all those who took part in the matter certainly acted in good faith and had no thought of doing anything unlawful.[94]

The ILC's commentary explains that the Permanent Court of Arbitration considered that there was no violation by Great Britain of France's sovereignty because "France had implicitly consented to the arrest through the conduct of its gendarme, who

---

[88] Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 73.
[89] See ibid.
[90] Ibid.
[91] See 'Award of the Permanent Court of Arbitration in the Case of Savarkar, between France and Great Britain, February 24, 1911', to be found in the American Journal of International Law, Vol. 5 (1911), pp. 520-523.
[92] Ibid., p. 521.
[93] These words can be used as authority for the idea that not only abductions, but also luring operations (as a fraudulent method of gaining custody over a person abroad) are to be seen as violating the concept of State sovereignty, see the discussion supra in Subsection 2.1. See also Schultz 1967, p. 71: "Dieses Urteil (…) hat unbestrittenermaßen klargestellt, daß das Völkerrecht verletzt ist, wenn sich ein Staat durch List oder Gewalt strafprozessualen Zugriff auf einen im Ausland befindlichen Angeschuldigten verschafft." See also Schultz 1984, pp. 100-101.
[94] 'Award of the Permanent Court of Arbitration in the Case of Savarkar, between France and Great Britain, February 24, 1911', to be found in the American Journal of International Law, Vol. 5 (1911), pp. 522-523.

aided the British authorities in the arrest [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[95] This was so even though the French central Government protested the arrest of Savarkar and had demanded his restitution.[96] Hence, consent (not leading to a violation of State sovereignty) can, in certain circumstances, be given by a local official.[97]

An interesting point which ought to be mentioned here is that the ILC had explained that consent "may be vitiated by error, fraud, corruption or coercion",[98] but that this case can arguably be seen as an example in which error (namely on the part of the French gendarme, who mistakenly cooperated with the British agents on French territory as he did not know exactly what was going on) was not viewed as a means which could jeopardise the consent.[99] Hence, on the basis of this case, one

[95] Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 73.

[96] See 'Award of the Permanent Court of Arbitration in the Case of Savarkar, between France and Great Britain, February 24, 1911', to be found in the American Journal of International Law, Vol. 5 (1911), p. 520.

[97] Cf. also Michell 1996, p. 421: "Consent from local officials is sufficient". It would perhaps have been better if Michell had used the word "may" here. After all, some expressions of consent from a local official can arguably never lead to valid consent from a State. One could hereby think of consent from a local police official that another State can establish a military base on the territory of the 'consenting' State. One can argue that only the central government can consent (or not) to these kinds of matters. (See also the Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 73.) See for another opinion than the one of Michell: Henkin 1990, p. 313: "The police of State X may not enter the territory of State Y (without Y's consent) to arrest an individual for violation of X's laws, not even to enforce law that is subject to universal jurisdiction. International law, sensitive to State autonomy and impermeability, requires that any consent to such entry be authentically that of high officials who authoritatively represent the State; the acts or omissions of local officials may be attributable to the State for some purposes, but generally are not sufficient to constitute State consent to foreign police activities [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Cf. finally De Sanctis 2004, p. 553: "[I]t can be argued that the exercise of jurisdiction by foreign officials on one's own soil should require the explicit, or at least implicit, consent of a high-level agent of the State, such as the chief of police. Holding that every State official has the authority to consent to a transnational seizure on his territory (…) may result in a legitimisation of the law of the jungle, where decisions deeply affecting fundamental rights of individuals may be taken by low-ranking officials without a clear assumption of responsibility at the high levels of the chain of command [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[98] See n. 90 and accompanying text.

[99] See 'Award of the Permanent Court of Arbitration in the Case of Savarkar, between France and Great Britain, February 24, 1911', to be found in the American Journal of International Law, Vol. 5 (1911), pp. 521-523: "[F]rom the statements made by the French brigadier to the police of Marseilles, it appears: That he saw the fugitive, who was almost naked, get out of a porthole of the steamer, throw himself into the sea and swim to the quay; That at the same moment some persons from the ship, who were shouting and gesticulating, rushed over the bridge leading to the shore, in order to pursue him; That a number of people on the quay commenced to shout "Arretez[-]le;" That the brigadier at once went in pursuit of the fugitive and, coming up to him after running about five hundred metres, arrested him. Whereas the brigadier declares that he was altogether unaware of the identity of the person with whom he was dealing, that he only thought that the man who was escaping was one of the crew, who had possibly committed an offence on board the vessel. (...) Whereas, while admitting that an irregularity was committed by the arrest of Savarkar, and by his being handed over to the British police, there is no rule of international law imposing, in circumstances such as those which have been set out above, any would perhaps sooner conclude that, in the words of Michell, "[c]onsent from local officials is sufficient, even if it is mistaken or ultra vires [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[100]

Also briefly addressing the ultra vires point made by Michell: a local official may indeed go beyond his powers in finding that he has authority to consent on behalf of his State with a certain arrest operation orchestrated by another State. In such a case, it might be possible that the 'injured State' consented to the operation, even if the central Government did not agree (see Savarkar) and even if this local official was not authorised to consent on behalf of his State. However, this situation must arguably be differentiated from the situation where, for example, another State bribed local police officials of the State where the operation took place to cooperate in the events. Such a case also involves local police officials agreeing with the operation and acting ultra vires, but they consent to the operation because of personal financial reasons. However, it can be argued that they do not consent to the operation with the idea in mind that they do so on behalf of their State. And that is, it is submitted, essential before one can speak of valid consent from the State where the operation took place.[101]

A final important point, made by Michell (especially when looking at the context of this book which often deals with conflict zones where there might be no functioning government), is the following: "Where there is no effective government in the host territory, no offense, consent, or protest is possible. Thus, an abduction will engender no state responsibility on the abducting state's part [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[102] One well-known case in which this element played a role is the obligation on the Power which has in its custody a prisoner, to restore him because of a mistake committed by the foreign agent who delivered him up to that Power [emphasis added, ChP]."

---

[100] Michell 1996, p. 421. See also n. 97 where it was argued that it would perhaps have been better if Michell had used the word "may" here because some expressions of consent from a local official can arguably never lead to valid consent from a State.

[101] See the Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 73: "Whether consent has been validly given is a matter addressed by international law rules outside the framework of State responsibility. Issues include whether the agent or person who gave the consent was authorized to do so on behalf of the State (and if not, whether the lack of that authority was known or ought to have been known to the acting State), or whether the consent was vitiated by coercion or some other factor [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." Hence, there is not only the question of authority which may play a role here (see also n. 97), but also the question of whether the consent was given on behalf of the State.

[102] Michell 1996, p. 421. See also Weissman 1994, p. 471, n. 78: "[N]o violation of national sovereignty could occur in the case of a suspect abducted from a territory with no effective sovereign government. (…) This is so because in the absence of a government, the asylum nation has no political independence or territorial sovereignty to violate." Cf. finally the International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty's report The Responsibility to Protect (December 2001), available at: http://www.iciss.ca/pdf/Commission-Report.pdf, para. 4.22 (p. 33): "In a failed or collapsed state situation, with no government effectively able to exercise the sovereign responsibility of protecting its people, the principle of non-intervention might seem to have less force."

1948 Chandler case.[103] In this case, a US citizen called Douglas Chandler was accused of treason against the US[104] and brought from occupied Germany to the US.[105] He contended that the way in which he was brought before the US courts was unlawful, among other things, because he was not extradited according to the interbellum extradition treaty between the US and Germany. Chief Judge Magruder rejected this argument and showed that the extradition treaty was not to be consulted at all:

> Passing these difficulties with the argument, the treaty on its face has no application to the abnormal situation here presented. (…) To establish that the treaty has been violated here, appellant would have to show from the language of the treaty that the United States thereunder assumed a contractual obligation as follows: that if a citizen of the United States should betake himself to Germany upon the eve of the outbreak of war between the United States and Germany, and if after war is declared between the two countries the American citizen should commit in Germany acts of treason against the United States, and if the armed forces of the United States and those of its Allies should invade and occupy Germany, supplant the defunct Government of the German Reich, and assume the powers of sovereignty, then, in such event, the United States contracts that it will not apprehend such traitor and bring him to trial for treason. Putting the proposition in this naked form, its absurdity is manifest. The United States made no such contract in the extradition treaty. (…) Chandler was not taken into custody and returned to the United States pursuant to the extradition treaty between the United States and Germany. His arrest by our occupying forces was [103] US Court of Appeals, First Circuit, Chandler v. United States, 3 December 1948, No. 4296 (171 F.2d 921). Another case is the 1886 Ker-Illinois case, which will be discussed in detail in Subsection 1.1 of Chapter V, see n. 20 of that chapter.

[104] More specifically, "[t]he indictment charged that the defendant, in various places within the German Reich, and at all times beginning on December 11, 1941, and continuing thereafter up to and including May 8, 1945, he then and there being a native-born citizen of the United States, and a person owing allegiance to the United States, in violation of said duty to allegiance, did knowingly, intentionally, and traitorously adhere to the enemies of the United States, and more particularly, to wit, the Government of the German Reich, and the German Radio Broadcasting Company and the officials and employees thereof, giving to the said enemies of the United States aid and comfort within the United States and elsewhere; that the aforesaid adherence of the defendant and the giving of aid and comfort by him to the aforesaid enemies of the United States 'consisted of working as a radio speaker and commentator in the U.S. zone of the Short Wave Station of the German Radio Broadcasting Company, a company controlled by the German Government, which work included the preparation and composition of commentaries, speeches, talks and announcements, and the recording thereof for subsequent broadcast by radio from Germany to the United States'; that these activities of the defendant 'were intended to persuade citizens and residents of the United States to decline to support the United States in the conduct of said war, and to weaken and destroy confidence in the administration of the Government of the United States.'" (US Court of Appeals, First Circuit, Chandler v. United States, 3 December 1948, No. 4296 (171 F.2d 921), p. 928.)

[105] See ibid., p. 927: "In May, 1945, shortly after the close of hostilities in Europe, Chandler was taken into custody by the U.S. Army at his home in Durach, Bavaria, but he was returned to Durach, and apparently released from custody, on October 23, 1945. He was rearrested by the Army on or about March 12, 1946, at the request of the Department of Justice. On December 10, 1946, still in military custody, he was taken by plane to the United States, via Paris, the Azores, and Newfoundland."

> wholly outside the treaty, and not in violation of any international undertaking either expressed or implied in the treaty.[106]

This elucidates that there could not have been any violation of the extradition treaty or of the sovereignty of Germany because at the time Chandler was arrested, there was no effective German authority.[107]

However, it is clear that this cannot be easily established.[108] Gillett, for example, explains:

> There is a virtually uniform practice in international law and politics of treating any group of nationals in control of their territory as the legitimate government. If the consenting party is the incumbent government, then the fact it has lost control over the state territory will not prevent its consent being recognized [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[109]

Nevertheless, if there is really "no recognizable or organized authority within a territory that is capable of declaring a legally valid consent, and if there is no pre-existing instrument of consent",[110] it will be hard to establish whether consent has been given or not.

2.1.1.2 Self-defence

The wrongfulness-precluding circumstance of self-defence can be found in Article 21 of the DARS: "The wrongfulness of an act of a State is precluded if the act

---

[106] Ibid., pp. 935-936.

[107] See also Morgenstern 1953, p. 273, n. 4 (distinguishing this case from the Palestinian Afouneh case (see Subsection 3.1 of Chapter V)): "The unlawful seizure [of Afouneh, ChP] took place on Syrian territory at a time when that country was under British occupation. An irregular apprehension by British forces was thus facilitated but not justified, because Syria did not lose her independence and extradition did not fall within the powers of the occupation authorities. On the other hand, the decision of a United States Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of Chandler v. United States (1948), 171 F. 2d 921, to the effect that there was jurisdiction to try a person who had been arrested in Germany by American military forces of occupation may be justified by reference to the fact that at the time Germany's independence was in suspense." See also Cardozo 1961, p. 133 ("There was no sovereign whose sovereignty was offended by the action of foreign officers on its soil.") and finally Weismann 1994, p. 471, n. 78: "The First Circuit Court of Appeals (…) stated that U.S. agents did not violate Germany's territorial sovereignty because no effective government existed at the time of the abduction."

[108] See Gillett 2008, pp. 24-25: "[T]here are publicists who argue that when a state's governmental authorities have substantially collapsed (…) no rights of sovereignty pertain to that territory. On that basis, it is argued that an incursion into that territory to carry out a lawful arrest would not constitute any breach of general international law. However, that approach is problematic. Whilst it is true that underlying the doctrine of consent is a presumption of representative autonomy, the principles of the international legal order are strongly oriented towards the continued recognition of a state, existing or nascent, within any given territory. Even the most dysfunctional of the State Parties to the Rome Statute will not readily be considered to lack sovereign rights, and thus fair game for external intervention [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[109] Ibid., p. 25.

[110] Ibid., p. 26.

constitutes a lawful measure of self-defence taken in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations." The principle of self-defence is undisputed.[111] See also in that respect the wording of Article 51 of the UN Charter, speaking of an "inherent right":

> Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. Measures taken by Members in the exercise of this right of self-defence shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security.

Article 21 of the DARS refers to "a lawful measure of self-defence [emphasis added, ChP]". This requires, among other things, compliance with the concepts of proportionality and necessity.[112] Randelzhofer explains:

> Consequently, lawful self-defence is restricted to the repulse of an armed attack and must not entail retaliatory or punitive actions. The means and extent of the defence must not be disproportionate to the gravity of the attack; in particular, the means employed for the defence have to be strictly necessary for repelling the attack [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[113]

In addition, Article 21 of the DARS requires that this "lawful measure of self-defence [is] taken in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations." This is a reference to the above-mentioned Article 51 of the UN Charter.

The principle of self-defence has been used in the context of male captus situations as well. In the words of Halberstam: "Not all abductions are violations of international law. Abduction of terrorists may be justified self-defense under Article 51 of the United Nations Charter and may thus not be in violation of international law."[114] Paust, writing about "an individual whose present activity forms part of a process of armed attack on a state in violation of the United Nations Charter",[115] comes back to the above-mentioned concepts of necessity and proportionality in his observation that abduction of such an individual "may provide a less violent and [111] See Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 74.

[112] See ibid., p. 75. See also ICJ, Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, 'Advisory Opinion', 8 July 1996, para. 41: "The submission of the exercise of self-defence to the conditions of necessity and proportionality is a rule of customary international law." (Referring to ICJ, Case Concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), 'Judgment', 27 June 1986, para. 176.) See generally Gardam 2004.
[113] Randelzhofer 2002, p. 805.
[114] Halberstam 1992, p. 736, n. 5.
[115] Paust 1993, p. 566.

injurious option than general military strikes or targeting that is otherwise reasonably necessary and proportionate."[116]

A comparable idea can be found in Calica's article 'Self-Help Is the Best Kind: The Efficient Breach Justification for Forcible Abduction of Terrorists', in which he argues:

> In essence, under the efficient breach justification, forcible abductions of terrorists are optimal because the benefits to the breaching nation and to the international community outweigh its costs. (…) Where abduction would constitute a breach of international law, breach is efficient if (1) the terrorist threat appears imminent and the opportunity for abduction is fleeting; (2) the target nation is unwilling to extradite or prosecute; (3) the operation involves minimal threat to bystanders; (4) the territorial infringement is reasonably limited; and (5) the accused will receive humane treatment and a fair trial [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[117]

Calica thus asserts that an imminent threat, among other things, may justify an abduction whereas the above-mentioned remarks by Halberstam and Paust refer to the seemingly stricter requirement of an armed attack. (Halberstam refers to Article 51, which in turn refers to the occurrence of an armed attack.) Although Calica's proposition is not limited to the context of self-defence,[118] it is interesting to look

[116] Ibid. Cf. also Bush 1993, p. 980. Note that acts of non-State actors, such as terrorists, might indeed lead to an armed attack, as a result of which a State can exercise its right of self-defence. However, whether this is only possible if these acts can be attributed to a State or not is the object of debate. See in that respect Trapp, commenting on the case ICJ, Case Concerning Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda), 'Judgment', 19 December 2005, in which the World Court did not address this question: "The Court's continued refusal to engage the issue (…) has resulted in scholars taking extreme positions regarding the right to use force in self-defence against non-State actors – either reading the Court's jurisprudence as requiring that armed attacks always be attributable to a State before they give rise to a right to use force in self-defence in foreign territory (or supporting a similar position), or arguing that there is an emerging right under international law to use force in self-defence directly against non-State terrorist actors, irrespective of the territorial host State's non-involvement in the terrorist attacks [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Trapp 2007, p. 141.) See Trapp's article and Ruys and Verhoeven 2006 for a middle position. Gill (2007, p. 118) is of the opinion that "[n]othing in either Article 51 or customary law says that attacks can only be carried out by States. (…) Any act of force which can be deemed to constitute an armed attack can trigger the right of self-defense, irrespective of whether such an attack is carried out by official State organs, by a State acting indirectly through other agents, such as armed bands, militias, terrorist groups and so forth, or by a non-State entity which is capable of mounting an attack on its own." Note finally that even if an abduction of persons can in theory be seen as a very proportionate and limited form of self-defence (see, however, Quigley (1988, p. 208): "Measures of self-defense may be taken only against a state. They may not be taken against individuals, even individuals operating on behalf of a state."), one can assume that a State will only turn to self-defence if the danger posed is so great that the defending State will probably not limit itself to a mere abduction operation, see Bush 1992, p. 980: "[S]elf-defense and related rationales have always assumed an overwhelming exigency for which only a military response would suffice [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[117] See Calica 2004, pp. 414-415. See also McNeal and Field 2007, pp. 519*ff*. See for older accounts: Kash 1997 and Izes 1997.

[118] See Calica 2004, p. 394: "The theory of efficient breach justifies self-help and takes into account both a country's need to protect its nationals as well as the self-defence justification." For the meaning of the concept of self-help, see, for example, Mrazek, 1989, p. 99: "Self-help, or autoprotection, is of more generally to the concept of imminence in order to see at what moment in time the right of self-defence may be exercised.

In explanations related to the concept of imminence, reference is often made to the Caroline incident. Here, one can find "[t]he traditional definition of the right of self-defence in customary international law".[119]

> In 1837, the United Kingdom was facing a rebellion in Canada, which at the time was still under British control. It was in the context of this rebellion that British forces attacked and sank a forty-five ton, privately-owned, U.S. steamer, the Caroline. A number of the rebel forces acting in support of the Canadian rebellion, (the majority of which being U.S. nationals) were stationed on Navy Island, in British territory. They were supplied in munitions and personnel by the Caroline, which was hired for that purpose. On December 29, while the Caroline was docked at Schlosser, in U.S. territory, it was attacked by British-Canadian forces that set fire to the steamer and towed it over the Niagara Falls. In the process, Amos Durfree, a U.S. citizen, was killed [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[120] limited significance in present international law. The concept itself has been given different meanings. Historically, it involved retaliatory measures of a state against another state that had violated its rights protected by international law. The basic idea of self-help consisted in the fact that there was no centralized enforcement in the international community. Self-help covered retorsions, reprisals, both armed and peaceful, and peaceful blockade as well as war itself. The limits on its use were vague and depended on the will of the state. Furthermore, self-defence was considered to be self-help by numerous authors. [Note that Gill (2007, p. 152), for example, also views self-defence as a form of self-help, ChP.] In Article 51 of the United Nations Charter, however, self-defence was defined as a separate institution, while self-help is not mentioned by the Charter at all. At present self-help includes retorsions and peaceful reprisals, but as a separate, although exceptional, means of the use of armed force, it has no support in contemporary international law." In the commentaries to the DARS, one can read that nowadays, there is at least one category of accepted self-help, namely countermeasures, see Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 128: "It is recognized both by Governments and by the decisions of international tribunals that countermeasures are justified under certain circumstances. This is reflected in article 22 which deals with countermeasures in response to an internationally wrongful act in the context of the circumstances precluding wrongfulness. Like other forms of self-help, countermeasures are liable to abuse and this potential is exacerbated by the factual inequalities between States. Chapter II has its aim to establish an operational system, taking into account the exceptional character of countermeasures as a response to internationally wrongful conduct. At the same time, it seeks to ensure, by appropriate conditions and limitations, that countermeasures are kept within generally acceptable bounds." See also ibid., p. 136: "Countermeasures are a form of self-help, which responds to the position of the injured State in an international system in which the impartial settlement of disputes through due process of law is not yet guaranteed. Where a third party procedure exists and has been invoked by either party to the dispute, the requirements of that procedure, e.g. as to interim measures of protection, should substitute as far as possible for countermeasures. On the other hand, even where an international court or tribunal has jurisdiction over a dispute and authority to indicate interim measures of protection, it may be that the responsible State is not cooperating in that process. In such cases the remedy of countermeasures necessarily revives."

---

[119] Shaw 2003, p. 1024.

[120] Green 2006, p. 433.

This violation of US territory and the death of at least one US national[121] caused some uproar and the tensions between the UK and the US were not sufficiently resolved through diplomatic channels.[122] In November 1840, when the British-Canadian Alexander McLeod was arrested in New York for his alleged involvement in the incident, the intrusion by Britain was again the centre of (diplomatic) debate.[123] In a letter to the British Special Representative to the US, Lord Ashburton (dated 27 July 1842), US Secretary of State Daniel Webster quoted a letter he had sent to the British Minister in Washington, Henry Fox, on 24 April 1841:

> [I]t will be for Her Majesty's Government to show, upon what state of facts, and what rules of national law, the destruction of the Caroline is to be defended. It will be for that Government to show a necessity of self-defense, instant, overwhelming, leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation. It will be for it to show, also, that the local authorities of Canada, even supposing the necessity of the moment authorized them to enter the territories of the United States at all, did nothing unreasonable or excessive; since the act justified by the necessity of self-defense must be limited by that necessity, and kept clearly within it [emphasis added, ChP].[124]

The British did not agree with the facts as understood by the Americans, but they did agree on the above-mentioned principles.[125] These principles are now "accepted as part of customary international law [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[126]

As Caroline does not mention the requirement of an armed attack, one could argue that on the basis of Caroline, a State may also be permitted to exercise its right of self-defence before an armed attack has actually occurred. After all, Caroline only stipulates that a State must show a 'necessity of self-defence'. That could mean that a State can also exercise its right of self-defence when an armed attack is going to occur, thereby creating a necessity for the target-State-to-be to defend itself. Nevertheless, in that case, the attack (or whatever circumstance is creating the necessity: as already mentioned, Caroline does not speak of an armed attack) must be imminent. In the words of Caroline, a government must show "a necessity of self-defense, instant, overwhelming, leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation".[127] [128]

---

[121] See ibid., pp. 433-434, n. 11: "It should be noted that some more recent accounts refer to the death of the ship's cabin boy, "Little Billy." (...) However, this may be brought into question, as this death was not mentioned in the various testimonies of the crew."
[122] Green 2006, p. 434.
[123] Ibid.
[124] Ibid., p. 435 (referring to its original source in the British and Foreign State Papers).
[125] Ibid., p. 436.
[126] Shaw 2003, p. 1025.
[127] There are in fact two concepts of necessity in Caroline. The first is the above-mentioned idea that a State must show a necessity of self-defence: a State can only use self-defence if it is really necessary. The second concept has been explained by Randelzhofer (see n. 113 and accompanying text) and is only important if the State is justified in using self-defence. In that case, it is not allowed to take just any measures. Its freedom to use measures of self-defence is restricted: it may only take those measures which are strictly necessary to defend itself. (See for both concepts the following words of Caroline:

What is the correlation between the arguably broader notion of self-defence as found in Caroline and the version of Article 51 of the UN Charter, to which the DARS refer and which states that self-defence is only possible "if an armed attack occurs"?

The examination of this very controversial point[129] can start with the already-mentioned fact that Article 51 of the UN Charter refers to an "inherent" right of self-defence. That could mean that the broader, inherent, customary right to self-defence (from Caroline) is not affected by Article 51 and that UN Member States would also

---

"[T]he act justified by the necessity of self-defense must be limited by that necessity, and [must be] kept clearly within it.")

[128] This formulation, by the way, clearly excludes the so-called 'Bush doctrine' on self-defence, where the attack may not necessarily be imminent but located in a more distant future. See The National Security Strategy of the United States of America, 17 September 2002 (available at: http://www.globalsecurity.org/military/library/policy/national/nss-020920.pdf), p. 15: "Given the goals of rogue states and terrorists, the United States can no longer solely rely on a reactive posture as we have in the past. The inability to deter a potential attacker, the immediacy of today's threats, and the magnitude of potential harm that could be caused by our adversaries' choice of weapons, do not permit that option. We cannot let our enemies strike first. (…) For centuries, international law recognized that nations need not suffer an attack before they can lawfully take action to defend themselves against forces that present an imminent danger of attack. Legal scholars and international jurists often conditioned the legitimacy of preemption on the existence of an imminent threat – most often a visible mobilization of armies, navies, and air forces preparing to attack. We must adapt the concept of imminent threat to the capabilities and objectives of today's adversaries. Rogue states and terrorists do not seek to attack us using conventional means. They know such attacks would fail. Instead, they rely on acts of terror and, potentially, the use of weapons of mass destruction – weapons that can be easily concealed, delivered covertly, and used without warning. The targets of these attacks are our military forces and our civilian population, in direct violation of one of the principal norms of the law of warfare. As was demonstrated by the losses on September 11, 2001, mass civilian casualties is the specific objective of terrorists and these losses would be exponentially more severe if terrorists acquired and used weapons of mass destruction. The United States has long maintained the option of preemptive actions to counter a sufficient threat to our national security. The greater the threat, the greater is the risk of inaction – and the more compelling the case for taking anticipatory action to defend ourselves, even if uncertainty remains as to the time and place of the enemy's attack. To forestall or prevent such hostile acts by our adversaries, the United States will, if necessary, act preemptively. The United States will not use force in all cases to preempt emerging threats, nor should nations use preemption as a pretext for aggression. Yet in an age where the enemies of civilization openly and actively seek the world's most destructive technologies, the United States cannot remain idle while dangers gather." See also 'President Bush Delivers Graduation Speech at West Point' (United States Military Academy, West Point, New York, 1 June 2002, available at: http://georgewbush-whitehouse.archives.gov/news/releases/2002/06/20020601-3.html): "We cannot defend America and our friends by hoping for the best. We cannot put our faith in the word of tyrants, who solemnly sign non-proliferation treaties, and then systemically break them. If we wait for threats to fully materialize, we will have waited too long." See for criticism on this doctrine, for example, Gill 2007, pp. 147-150. Gill notes, among other things: "Self-defense however defined, has always been linked to the existence of a concrete (threat of an) attack within at least the foreseeable future. While this is not necessarily the immediate temporal future in the sense of minutes, hours or even days, the principles of immediacy and necessity are central to the concept of self-defense itself and cannot be open ended as the NSS implies." (Ibid., p. 149.)

[129] Randelzhofer 2002, p. 792.

be able to use the customary right of self-defence (not requiring the 'trigger' of an armed attack).[130] The ICJ, in the Nicaragua case, stated on this point:

> As regards the suggestion that the areas covered by the two sources of law are identical, the Court observes that the United Nations Charter (…) by no means covers the whole area of the regulation of the use of force in international relations. On one essential point, this treaty itself refers to pre-existing customary international law; this reference to customary law is contained in the actual text of Article 51, which mentions the "inherent right" (in the French text the "droit naturel") of individual or collective self-defence, which "nothing in the present Charter shall impair" and which applies in the event of an armed attack. The Court therefore finds that Article 51 of the Charter is only meaningful on the basis that there is a "natural" or "inherent" right of self-defence, and it is hard to see how this can be other than of a customary nature, even if its present content has been confirmed and influenced by the Charter. Moreover the Charter, having itself recognized the existence of this right, does not go on to regulate directly all aspects of its content. For example, it does not contain any specific rule whereby self-defence would warrant only measures which are proportional to the armed attack and necessary to respond to it, a rule well established in customary international law. Moreover, a definition of the "armed attack" which, if found to exist, authorizes the exercise of the "inherent right" of self-defence, is not provided in the Charter, and is not part of treaty law. It cannot therefore be held that Article 51 is a provision which "subsumes and supervenes" customary international law. It rather demonstrates that in the field in question (…) customary international law continues to exist alongside treaty law. The areas governed by the two sources of law thus do not overlap exactly, and the rules do not have the same content.[131]

Nevertheless, even though the ICJ recognises that the law of self-defence can be found in both customary as well as in conventional law, one could also argue that the customary version is only of importance with respect to those issues which are not regulated by the conventional version, for example, regarding the definition of the concept of an armed attack or the principles of necessity and proportionality. It seems, however, that the ICJ does not recognise that the right of self-defence can be invoked by a party to the UN (Charter)[132] in situations other than in the case of an armed attack.[133] Although the "inherent right" of self-defence is referred to in

---

[130] That would thus also mean that States could argue that Art. 21 of the DARS is complied with if they would abduct a terrorist implicated in an imminent attack. (The argumentation would then be: Art. 21 of the DARS refers to the conventional version of self-defence, which in turn refers to the broader (anticipatory) inherent right of self-defence.)

[131] ICJ, Case Concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), 'Judgment', 27 June 1986, para. 176.

[132] Almost every territorial entity in the world is a member of the UN and thus bound by the UN Charter. (Exceptions are, for example, the Holy See (a non-member State maintaining Permanent Observer Mission at UN Headquarters) and Palestine (an entity maintaining Permanent Observer Mission at UN Headquarters), see http://www.un.org/members/index.shtml.)

[133] In that case, the ICJ's acceptance of the principle of necessity does not imply that UN Member States can refer to the first concept of necessity in Caroline as was explained in n. 127, namely that a State only has to show a necessity of self-defence before it can resort to self-defence. After all, in the above-mentioned view, an armed attack (and not merely a 'necessity of self-defence') is the required trigger of

Article 51, it is also clearly connected to the words "armed attack": "[T]he (…) text of Article 51 (…) mentions the "inherent right" of individual or collective self-defence, (…) which applies in the event of an armed attack."[134]

Does this mean that a State can never act in anticipation of an attack, can never use anticipatory self-defence?[135] Randelzhofer, first referring to those who would argue that the above-mentioned question is to be answered in the negative,[136] explains that this would indeed not be permissible:

> An anticipatory right of self-defence would be contrary to the wording of Art. 51 ('if an armed attack occurs'), as well as to its object and purpose, which is to cut to a minimum the unilateral use of force in international relations. Since the (alleged) imminence of an attack cannot usually be assessed by means of objective criteria, any decision on this point would necessarily have to be left to the discretion of the State concerned. The manifest risk of an abuse of that discretion which thus emerges would de facto undermine the restriction to one particular case of the right to self-defence. Therefore Art. 51 has to be interpreted narrowly as containing a prohibition of anticipatory self-defence. Self-defence is thus permissible only after the armed attack has already been launched [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[137] self-defence. Hence, the fact that the ICJ accepts the principle of necessity can, in this view, only refer to the second concept of necessity in Caroline (see also the explanation of Randelzhofer at n. 113 and accompanying text and n. 127), meaning that a State, after an armed attack has started, can only take those measures which are strictly necessary to repulse that attack. This view is supported by the above-mentioned words of the ICJ in the Nicaragua case (para. 176): "For example, it does not contain any specific rule whereby self-defence would warrant only measures which are proportional to the attack and necessary to respond to it, a rule well established in customary international law."

---

[134] See in that respect also para. 193 of the Nicaragua case where the ICJ noted "that in the language of Article 51 of the United Nations Charter, the inherent right (or "droit naturel") which any State possesses in the event of an armed attack, covers both collective and individual self-defence [emphasis added, ChP]."

[135] The ICJ did not comment on this issue in the Nicaragua case as the facts of that case did not demand this, see its para. 194: "In view of the circumstances in which the dispute has arisen, reliance is placed by the Parties only on the right of self-defence in the case of an armed attack which has already occurred, and the issue of the lawfulness of a response to the imminent threat of armed attack has not been raised. Accordingly the Court expresses no view on that issue."

[136] "[I]n particular those authors who interpret Art. 51 as merely confirming the pre-existing right of self-defence consider anticipatory measures of self-defence to be admissible under the conditions set up by Webster in the Caroline Case, i.e. when 'the necessity of that self-defence is instant, overwhelming and leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation' [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Randelzhofer 2002, p. 803.)

[137] Ibid. See also ibid., p. 793: "The content and scope of the customary right of self-defence are unclear and extend far into the spheres of self-help [Recall the title of Calica's article, ChP.] in such a way that its continuing existence would, to a considerable extent, reintroduce the unilateral use of force by States, the substantial abolition of which is intended by the UN Charter." This view might lead to problems with respect to the problem of nuclear weapons where one can doubt whether a State, which has become the victim of a nuclear attack, is still able to defend itself. Randelzhofer (ibid., p. 804) explains: "[I]t must be pointed out that the prohibition of anticipatory self-defence embodied in Art. 51 is compatible with the nuclear strategy of the Super-powers only as States are able to defend themselves against a pre-emptive strike launched against them. Should this so-called second-strife capability become void, the prohibition of anticipatory self-defence would not be removed as such, but it would nevertheless be diminished in its observance by States."

The word "inherent" (as in: inherent right of self-defence) would in that view simply mean that every State (even a State which is not a member of the UN) has a 'natural right' to defend itself.[138] Nevertheless, those States which have signed the UN Charter can only exercise this 'natural' right under certain circumstances, namely if the armed attack has started.

It should, however, be repeated that this is a very controversial point.[139] Gill, for example, states:

> While there are some[140] international lawyers who, relying on a literal textual interpretation of Article 51, reject the possibility of any form of anticipatory self-defense altogether, most authorities and States are prepared to concede the possibility of some degree of anticipatory action within what are frequently referred to as the "strict criteria" of the Caroline case [original footnote omitted, ChP].[141]

Gill, repeating the point already mentioned by the ICJ in the Nicaragua case that "the right to self-defense cannot be interpreted solely on the basis of Article 51 of the Charter",[142] is of the opinion that one should follow Article 51 of the UN Charter where it is clear, for example in requiring the occurrence of an armed attack,[143] but that where it is not, for instance regarding the exact meaning of an armed attack or [138] See ibid., p. 793. Randelzhofer hereby explains (ibid., p. 792, n. 25) that the Special Rapporteur of the ILC, R. Ago (in his Eight Report on State Responsibility, ILC Yearbook (1980), Vol. 2, part 1, p. 67, n. 263) "takes the term 'inherent' to emphasize that the ability of lawfully defending itself against an armed attack is a prerogative of every sovereign State which it is not entitled to renounce".

---

[139] See also Wilmshurst 2006, p. 963: "There are few more controversial questions in international law than the proper limits of the right of self-defence."

[140] Note, however, that Gill, in n. 2 of his article, asserts that "[a] significant number of scholars oppose any notion of anticipatory or preemptive self-defense prior to the actual launching of an armed attack [emphasis added, ChP]." (Gill 2007, p. 113, n. 2.)

[141] Ibid., p. 125. See also 'The Chatham House Principles of International Law on the Use of Force in Self-Defence' which clarify: "[T]he view that States have a right to act in self-defence in order to avert the threat of an imminent attack – often referred to as 'anticipatory self-defence' – is widely, though not universally, accepted. It is unrealistic in practice to suppose that self-defence must in all cases await an actual attack [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Wilmshurst 2006, p. 964.) The Chatham House hereby refers, among other things, to the UNSG's report In larger freedom: towards development, security and human rights for all, UN Doc. A/59/2005, 21 March 2005, para. 124: "Imminent threats are fully covered by Article 51, which safeguards the inherent right of sovereign states to defend themselves against armed attack. Lawyers have long recognized that this covers an imminent attack as well as one that has already happened."

[142] Gill 2007, p. 117. Gill hereby refers to "both the drafting history of Article 51 and the fact that it was never intended to completely codify the law of self-defense." (Ibid., pp. 116-117.) According to him, Art. 51 "primarily sought to safeguard the right to mutual assistance provided for in regional self-defense agreements and delineate the relationship between the right of States to exercise self-defense and the system of collective security contained in Chapter VII of the Charter. This relationship is spelled out in detail in Article 51, while the substance of the right is merely mentioned." (Ibid., p. 117.)

[143] See ibid.: "Where Article 51 is specific it will clearly prevail, as for instance in subjecting the exercise of self-defense to the requirement of an armed attack, or in providing for the Security Council as the ultimate arbiter of the continued necessity of the exercise of self-defense [emphasis in original, ChP]."

the starting point of this armed attack,[144] one can turn to the customary law version of self-defence. And as this customary version (read: Caroline) recognises some form of anticipatory self-defence, States do not have to wait, for example, for the missile to be actually launched. In short, > self-defense is a right, grounded in both Charter and in customary law, which allows some degree of anticipatory action to counter a clear and manifest threat of attack in the immediate, or at least proximate, future, within the confines of the well-known and widely accepted 1837 Caroline incident criteria, relating to necessity, immediacy and proportionality [original footnote omitted, ChP].[145]

Notwithstanding these controversies – to which already enough attention has been paid here – it is clear that Paust's earlier mentioned example of the abduction of a terrorist will probably be accepted under the DARS as he refers to an armed attack.[146] Whether one also accepts Calica's proposition, which is not restricted to the context of self-defence but also covers the field of self-help, is more problematic and will partly depend on one's view on the above-mentioned discussion.

In conclusion, self-defence (from the perspective of State A)[147] or consent (from the perspective of State B) are two important scenarios which do not lead to a

---

[144] See ibid: "However, where Article 51 is incomplete, as in leaving open what constitutes an armed attack and when an attack has commenced, or silent, as in relation to other requirements governing self-defense, recourse must be had to customary law as a means of complementing the Charter lex scripta."

[145] Ibid., p. 114. Gill further explains that "immediacy in relation to anticipatory self-defense is not primarily a question of time, but one of the existence of a credible threat of probable (or in some cases potential) attack, which together with necessity and the absence of feasible alternatives, make anticipatory action justifiable or even imperative. While time is a relevant consideration, it is not the only one, nor necessarily the most important." (Ibid., p. 146.) "[A] classic example of a lawful anticipatory self-defense" (ibid.) mentioned by Gill is the Six Day War: "The conduct of Israel's neighbors in creating a crisis, engaging in preparations for a potential attack, and uttering hostile pronouncements formed an immediate threat which justified Israel's anticipatory action in self-defense. Irrespective of whether such an attack was in fact on the point of being launched, or ever would have been, Israel had every reason at the time to believe that there was a high possibility, that an attack would be mounted in the near future. How near was unknown, but under the circumstances that fact hardly mattered. Likewise, it was clear that waiting would only increase Israel's vulnerability, without any likelihood that the situation would resolve itself." (Ibid.)

[146] Paust wrote about "an individual whose present activity forms part of a process of armed attack on a state in violation of the United Nations Charter". (See Paust 1993, p. 566 or n. 115 and accompanying text.)

[147] It is interesting to also briefly mention here the subject of 'protection of nationals abroad', which is sometimes seen as a form of self-defence. In that view, it is not the State itself, but its nationals (to be seen as 'little parts' of that State) who are under attack, which in turn leads to resorting to self-defence. The most famous example in that respect is the Entebbe rescue operation in 1976 during which Israel intervened in Uganda (at the Entebbe airport) to free hostages from a plane hijacked by terrorists. Shaw, also examining similar incidents, explains: "It is difficult to extract from the contradictory views expressed in these incidents the apposite legal principles. While some states affirm the existence of a rule permitting the use of force in self-defence to protect nationals abroad, others deny that such a principle operates in international law. (...) On balance, and considering the opposite principles of saving the threatened lives of nationals and the preservation of the territorial integrity of states, it would seem preferable to accept the validity of the rule in carefully restricted situations consistent with the conditions laid down in the Caroline case [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Shaw 2003, p. 1034.) See violation of State's A obligation to refrain from interference in State B's domestic affairs.

A final matter which should be discussed here are interventions based on humanitarian grounds.

2.1.1.3 Humanitarian grounds

Although the concept of State sovereignty was earlier presented as rather absolute, it is, of course, true that in the modern world, in which States through various means are interconnected (for example, via the internet) and in which many problems are seen as international problems (for example, global warming), (legal) boundaries seem to disappear and with that the importance of State sovereignty. This also goes for the human rights context.[148]

It may be that in the past, a tyrant could commit genocide on its territory with impunity by shielding outside interference with the notion of State sovereignty, arguing that it was a domestic affair with which other States had no business.[149] However, that was then. Nowadays, such a tyrant cannot get away with it as easily as he perhaps used to; these kinds of issues are now also considered to be of interest to other countries and the international community as a whole.[150] For example, if genocide occurs in a certain State, that State can no longer convincingly assert that it is a purely internal matter, with which other States or the international community as a whole have no business.

It was mentioned supra that the concept of State sovereignty has both an internal and external aspect.

The internal aspect, it was stated, meant that State A is the only one having authority over the territory of State A. However, it should be understood that that for more information on this subject in the context of abductions Findlay 1988 (who, by the way, views this justification as distinct from the justification 'self-defence'). On p. 29 of his article, he writes: "[T]he United States could seize terrorists on the territory of another country pursuant to the doctrine of humanitarian intervention to protect nationals, as long as the capture was necessary to prevent future harm to its citizens and the mission's objectives were strictly confined to that task. If the United States acted under this doctrine, the territorial state would have little basis to complain about a violation of its territorial sovereignty [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

---

[148] See generally Flinterman 2000 and Lauren 2004.

[149] See Lauren 2004, pp. 16 and 26. At this last page, Lauren provides the interesting example of Hermann Goering, who "declared in response to accusations of crimes against humanity: "But that was our right! We were a sovereign state and that was strictly our business." [original footnote omitted, ChP]"

[150] See Van Genugten 1992, p. 205, writing on the (now defunct) UN Human Rights Commission: "The former argument of non-intervention ('mind your own business') today makes little impression and is brushed aside without wasting words ('it is our own business') [own translation, ChP]."

does not mean that State A can do whatever it pleases on its territory.[151] Having the supreme power over a territory also brings with it responsibilities.[152]

It seems more and more accepted that in compelling cases such as genocide, in which the territorial State is unwilling or unable to fulfil its responsibility to protect its own people from barbarity, political/economic pressure by other States to stop the atrocities may not be enough. It might be necessary to actually intervene. The argument that such an intervention would violate the foundation of the international order can then be countered by the idea that in fact non-intervention would damage that order. Perhaps non-intervention in each and every case makes the legal order stable (in that no State interferes with another State) but one can doubt whether such an 'order', in which genocide can take place without a serious reaction from another State, does not gravely undermine its own basic values.[153] In addition, one can wonder whether the above-mentioned idea that non-intervention makes the legal order stable would also be accurate in such a situation. After all, in our interconnected world, a conflict of considerable size – if not tackled soon enough – can easily spread to other countries and become a regional conflict, thereby creating a direct threat to the stability of the international order.[154] In such cases, it is obvious that intervention, as an ultimum remedium, should not be ruled out.[155] The most

[151] See the International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty's report The Responsibility to Protect (December 2001), available at: http://www.iciss.ca/pdf/Commission-Report.pdf, para. 1.35 (p. 8): "The defence of state sovereignty, by even its strongest supporters, does not include any claim of the unlimited power of a state to do what it wants to its own people."

[152] See ibid.: "It is acknowledged that sovereignty implies a dual responsibility: externally – to respect the sovereignty of other states, and internally, to respect the dignity and basic rights of all the people within the state."

[153] One of the purposes of the UN is "[t]o achieve international co-operation (…) in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all". (Art. 1, para. 3 of the UN Charter.) See also Art. 55 ("With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the United Nations shall promote: (…) c. universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all") and 56 of the UN Charter ("All Members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in co-operation with the Organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in Article 55.") See also the International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty's report The Responsibility to Protect (December 2001), available at: http://www.iciss.ca/pdf/Commission-Report.pdf, para. 8.31 (p. 75): "[T]he very term "international community" will become a travesty unless the community of states can act decisively when large groups of human beings are being massacred or subjected to ethnic cleansing." Cf. finally Silving 1961, p. 358, who writes that the UN Charter "declares it to be one of its several goals "to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person," and postulates encouragement of "respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all. …" If these words are more than so-called "jurisprudential niceties," perhaps they might be taken to afford a basis for argument that, given most exceptional circumstances, "fundamental human rights" ought to override considerations of conventional international law."

[154] Think, for example, of the flux of refugees to neighbouring countries.

[155] These two aspects (serious violations of the basic values of the international order and a direct danger to the stability of that order) are also reflected in the International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty's report The Responsibility to Protect (December 2001), available at: http://www.iciss.ca/pdf/Commission-Report.pdf, para. 4.13 (p. 31): "The Commission found in its consultations that even in states where there was the strongest opposition to infringements on appropriate route through which such a military intervention for humanitarian aims should be effected is clearly the UNSC, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter ('Action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, and acts of aggression'). Nevertheless, in some cases, an intervention will take place without the UNSC's approval. If such an intervention, often called 'humanitarian intervention', is more or less accepted (afterwards) by the international community,[156] one can imagine that the apprehension of the person allegedly behind the genocide, in the context of the more general operation to stop that (imminent) genocide, would be acceptable as well.

Nevertheless, one can seriously doubt whether an intervention without the approval of the UNSC, only consisting of the apprehension of that same person a couple of years later, after he has been charged with the genocide that has in the meantime ended, would also be condoned.[157] After all, the emergency situation, sovereignty, there was general acceptance that there must be limited exceptions to the non-intervention rule for certain kinds of emergencies. Generally expressed, the view was that these exceptional circumstances must be cases of violence which so genuinely "shock the conscience of mankind," or which present such a clear and present danger to international security, that they require coercive military intervention."

---

[156] Note that such an intervention without the approval of the UNSC, in contrast to consent and self-defence, is not yet seen as an established exception to the norm of non-intervention. See Shen 2001, p. 29: "The "humanitarian" intervention doctrine, although seemingly attractive, cannot be sustained as an exception to the non-intervention principle. International law does not recognize this alleged exception as such." See also Shaw (2003, pp. 1045-1046) who is, however, less outspoken: "[I]t [the right to humanitarian intervention, ChP] is difficult to reconcile today with article 2(4) of the Charter unless one either adopts a rather artificial definition of the 'territorial integrity' criterion in order to permit temporary violations or posits the establishment of the right in customary law. Practice has also been in general unfavourable to the concept, primarily because it might be used to justify interventions by more forceful states into the territories of weaker states. Nevertheless, it is not inconceivable that in some situations the international community might refrain from adopting a condemnatory stand where large numbers of lives have been saved in circumstances of gross oppression by a state of its citizens due to an outside intervention. In addition, it is possible that such a right might evolve in cases of extreme humanitarian need."

[157] Cf. also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 60. However, if the UNSC were to approve an arrest operation of a person suspected of having committed international crimes (even though one can imagine that it will be very unlikely that this will happen), this would be unproblematic, see also Van der Wilt 2004, p. 295. Cf. in that respect, for example, Sharp, Sr. 1997, p. 435: "The coercive authority of the Security Council has also been used to authorize the arrest and prosecution of persons suspected of international crimes against noncombatants in an area of ongoing conflict. On June 6, 1993, the Security Council unanimously reaffirmed the authority of the Secretary-General to take all measures necessary to ensure the arrest and prosecution of those persons responsible for the murder of twenty-four U.N. peacekeepers in Somalia on June 5, 1993. This resolution served as the authority for the U.N. Special Representative to publicly call for the arrest of General Aideed, and to conduct an aggressive series of military operations to arrest him. Accordingly, as a coercive measure to maintain international peace and security under Article 39 of the Charter, the Security Council has the authority to impose upon states an obligation to search and arrest persons suspected of war crimes [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Although it must be borne in mind that this situation involved a State which was under the control of an international force (namely UNOSOM II), such an operation might also be condoned with respect to a State which is not under such international supervision. See also Scharf justifying an intervention, no longer exists. The 'damage' – unfortunately – has already been done.[158] It may sound harsh, especially for the victims, but in the context of an intervention without the approval of the UNSC, an arrest of a person who is actually committing, or, in the very near future is about to commit genocide would probably be more acceptable than the arrest of a person who is charged with already having committed the genocide.[159]

However, the concept of humanitarian intervention ignoring for now, such an arrest may perhaps be based on other humanitarian considerations. The idea that a suspect who is charged with such serious crimes that it is imperative that there should be no safe haven for him and that he is to be brought to justice (irrespective of the means), may perhaps be founded in the Latin (but again not Roman, see Chapter II) maxim aut dedere aut iudicare.[160] This maxim, meaning 'extradite or prosecute', "requires a state which has hold of someone who has committed a crime of international concern either to extradite the offender to another state which is prepared to try him or else to take steps to have him prosecuted before its own courts."[161] For example (and as will be shown in Chapter VIII), such an aut dedere

2000, pp. 966-967: "[W]ithout the authorization of the Security Council, the consent of the territorial state in a peace agreement, or a situation that qualifies as self-defense, an apprehension of an indicted war criminal may constitute an "unlawful abduction" in violation of international law."

[158] Cf. the 'just cause threshold' from the International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty's report The Responsibility to Protect (December 2001), available at: http://www.iciss.ca/pdf/Commission-Report.pdf, p. XII: "Military intervention for human protection purposes is an exceptional and extraordinary measure. To be warranted, there must be serious and irreparable harm occurring to human beings, or imminently likely to occur, of the following kind: A. large scale loss of life, actual or apprehended, with genocidal intent or not, which is the product either of deliberate state action, or state neglect or inability to act, or a failed state situation; or B. large scale 'ethnic cleansing', actual or apprehended, whether carried out by killing, forced expulsion, acts of terror or rape [emphasis added, ChP]."

[159] It is, of course, possible to arrest an indicted war criminal in the context of a humanitarian intervention (cf., for example, ibid., paras. 7.26 and 7.49 (pp. 62 and 66)) but in those situations, the arrests are 'only' small parts of the bigger humanitarian intervention. However, in these cases, the arrests cannot be seen as humanitarian interventions. That seems only possible if the person is not yet indicted for, but is actually, or on the verge of, directing a genocide.

[160] This famous rule comes from Grotius' maxim aut dedere aut punire (extradite or punish). See Hugo Grotius' De Iure Belli Ac Pacis, Book 2, Chapter XXI, para. 4 (entitled: "Nisi aut puniant aut dedant: quod exemplis illustratur [emphasis added, ChP]"), especially under 1: "Cum vero non soleant civitates permittere ut civitas altera armata intra fines suos poenae expetendae nomine veniat, neque id expediat, sequitur ut civitas apud quem degit * qui culpae est compertus, *alterum facere debeat, aut ut ipsa interpellata pro merito puniat nocentem, aut ut eum permittat arbitrio interpellantis. * hoc enim illud est dedere*, quod in historiis saepissime occurrit [emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (See Grotius 1913, p. 368.) The translation by Kelsey goes as follows: "Since as a matter of fact states are not accustomed to permit other states to cross their borders with an armed force for the purpose of exacting punishment, and since such a course is inexpedient, it follows that the state in which he who has been found guilty dwells ought to do one of the two things. When appealed to it should either punish the guilty person as he deserves, or it should entrust him to the discretion of the party making the appeal. This latter course is rendition, a procedure most frequently mentioned in historical narratives [emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Kelsey 1925, p. 527.)

[161] Bassiouni and Wise 1995, p. 3.

aut iudicare obligation already exists with respect to grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions.[162]

It must be noted that this maxim addresses the State of residence (State B); the maxim only demands that that State does something, namely prosecute (on its own territory)[163] or extradite the suspect.[164] However, a third State could perhaps argue, if the State of residence does not either prosecute or extradite the suspect itself, and if by doing so violates an international obligation, that it must act itself to ensure that the suspect does not escape justice.[165]

In that context, it may invoke the concept of countermeasures,[166] which is, like consent and self-defence, an accepted wrongfulness-precluding circumstance which

---

[162] Cf. also Michell 1996, p. 423, n. 205: "[I]n cases where the fugitive is accused of war crimes or crimes against humanity, it is arguable that the presumption against enforcement jurisdiction within the territory of another state may be realigned. States may be able to abduct a fugitive from another state and charge him with crimes under international law without incurring international responsibility for the violation of the latter's territorial sovereignty, particularly where the asylum state has refused to either extradite or prosecute a fugitive accused of an international crime."

[163] Cf. also Van der Wilt 2004, pp. 280-281, rightly explaining that one should not confuse the authority (or obligation) to create universal jurisdiction with the physical enforcement of criminal law (enforcement power). See also Lamb 2000, pp. 220-221 and Strijards 2001, p. 99. The obligation to arrest and prosecute suspects charged with grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions is only valid for a State's own territory and does not extend to the territory of other States.

[164] Note that the maxim aut dedere aut iudicare could perhaps be used by the State of residence to argue that it, if it cannot prosecute the suspect itself, will deliver the suspect to a third State, whether or not it has extradition arrangements with that State. Although the above-mentioned translation and explanation of the maxim speak of (the lawful method of) extradition, the rule itself uses the broader term dedere. (See also Bassiouni and Wise 1995, p. 4, n. 7: "[S]trictly speaking, dedere means "surrender" or "deliver" rather than "extradite."") This could be interpreted as meaning that if State B cannot prosecute the suspect itself, it has an obligation to deliver him to a State which is willing and able to prosecute, even if no extradition arrangements exist with that State.

[165] See in that respect also the interesting 1662 case of Okey, Corbet and Barkestead presented by Strijards (see Strijards 2001, pp. 93-95). In this case, three former members of the English parliament "pledged their vote in favour of the decapitation of King Charles the first." (Ibid., p. 93.) Unfortunately for them, however, the Royal Government was restored. As a result, the men fled to The Hague, where they were arrested by English officials and brought back to England. The Dutch Grand Pensionary Johan de Witt explained the States of Holland, which had decided to admit the English men for an application for asylum, that the action on Dutch territory was in accordance with the law of nations. In the words of Strijards: "Because of the unchallengeable egregiousness of the act of regicide, the Dutch Republic was in its relationship to England under the obligation either to prosecute and punish the regicidici or to extradite them to the State where their abominable deeds were done ("aut dedere aut iudicare"). Whereas the Republic failed to act in either manner in order to comply with its obligations directly prompted by ius cogens (international peremptory law) – it did not prosecute itself, it did not comply with the English request for extradition – England, as the grieved party, had the right to grant itself the right to exercise its national penal enforcement power on Dutch soil [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., p. 94.) See also Izes 1997, p. 18 (writing on the Eichmann case): "Other authorities justify Israel's action under the international legal principle of "extradite or prosecute." This principle holds that no state should offer a safe haven to individuals who are accused of serious crimes under international law." See finally Gurulé 1994, pp. 490-491.

[166] See Art. 22 of the DARS ('Countermeasures in respect of an internationally wrongful act'): "The wrongfulness of an act of a State not in conformity with an international obligation towards another State is precluded if and to the extent that the act constitutes a countermeasure taken against the latter State in accordance with chapter II of Part Three."

ensures that no internationally wrongful act will take place. Nevertheless, countermeasures may not involve the threat or use of force,[167] which would exclude a male captus technique such as abduction.[168] However, perhaps, the concept could be used to justify a luring operation, although it must also be noted that countermeasures must not affect obligations for the protection of fundamental human rights.[169] (And that a luring operation may affect the right to liberty and security, a human right with, at least, customary international law/general international law status. This point will be addressed in Subsections 2.2 and 2.2.5.)

Before turning to the next subsection, it must be stressed that humanitarian grounds may very well lead to a justified arrest of a suspect without the consent of the State of residence, but much will depend here on the circumstances. However, more generally, it can be stated that even though the concept of State sovereignty is being eroded, it is still the fundament of the fragile inter-State community[170] and should therefore only be trespassed in clearly accepted situations. If one goes beyond these accepted situations, it is arguably a matter of time before the law of the jungle re-enters the international arena. In the words of the Argentine Ambassador Mario Amadeo in his speech to the UNSC after Eichmann's capture in Buenos Aires:

> [T]he main threat to international peace and security does not arise from the fact (which in itself is prejudicial to the rule of law) of the violation of Argentine sovereignty and its unfortunate repercussions on Argentine-Israel relations. It results from the supreme importance of the principle impaired by that violation: the unqualified respect which States owe to each other and which precludes the exercise of jurisdictional acts in the territory of other States. If this principle were to fall into abeyance, if it could be violated with impunity, if each State considered itself entitled, whenever it so desired, to supersede the authority of another State and take justice

[167] See Art. 50 of the DARS ('Obligations not affected by countermeasures'): "1. Countermeasures shall not affect: (a) the obligation to refrain from the threat or use of force as embodied in the Charter of the United Nations; (b) obligations for the protection of fundamental human rights; (c) obligations of a humanitarian character prohibiting reprisals; (d) other obligations under peremptory norms of general international law. 2. A State taking countermeasures is not relieved from fulfilling its obligations: (a) under any dispute settlement procedure applicable between it and the responsible State; (b) to respect the inviolability of diplomatic or consular agents, premises, archives and documents."

[168] Cf. Borelli 2004, p. 363, n. 127. Cf. also Lamb 2000, pp. 220-221: "When armed insurgents are sent by a State (or with the connivance of a State) into the territory of a third State to effect an arrest, this could be categorized as either a breach of the principle of non-intervention in the domestic affairs of the third State, a violation of the territorial integrity of that State, or even, exceptionally, as an armed attack. This is so despite the fact that States are, in view of their treaty obligations (most notably those arising under the 1949 Geneva Conventions), obliged to prosecute and punish persons accused of serious violations of international humanitarian law. Although the existence of this obligation is undisputed, its scope nevertheless extends only to the borders of the prosecuting State and not into the territory of a third State [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (See also n. 163.)

[169] See n. 167.

[170] See Shaw 2003, p. 410: "The principle of respect for the territorial integrity of states is well founded as one the linchpins of the international system". See also the International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty's report The Responsibility to Protect (December 2001), available at: http://www.iciss.ca/pdf/Commission-Report.pdf, paras. 4.11 and 4.12 (p. 31).

> into its own hands, international law would very soon be replaced by the law of the jungle. (...) Can it be argued that the repetition of such incidents is not likely to strike at the very roots of international order?[171]

2.2 Human rights

The previously mentioned argument by Eichmann that his capture violated the sovereignty of Argentina is a male captus defence originating from classical international law when it "concerned itself exclusively with the relationship between states".[172] It was étatiste international law so to say.[173]

States were the only real actors in the international community and respect for State sovereignty was the most important principle governing this system of inter-State/'inter-*nation*al' law.

By contrast, individuals played no important role in this field.[174] This meant that State sovereignty and not human rights was the most important value to complain about in the case of, for example, an abduction.[175]

In addition, only States and not individuals could complain about these violations of State sovereignty.[176]

In the words of the District Court of Jerusalem:

> The ratio of this rule is that the right to plead violation of the sovereignty of a State is the exclusive right of that State. Only a sovereign State may raise the plea or waive it, and the accused has no right to take over the rights of that State.[177]

> Indeed, there is no escaping the conclusion that the question of the violation of international law by the manner in which the accused was brought into the territory of

[171] UNSC, 15th Year, OR, 865th meeting, 22 June 1960, UN Doc. S/PV.865, para. 34 (p. 7). See also Mann 1989, p. 420: "The wrongful abduction from a foreign State's territory is bound to lead to international anarchy and friction, both in law and in fact."
[172] Goldstone 1996, p. 1.
[173] See Feinrider 1997, p. 81.
[174] See Strijards 2003, p. 755.
[175] A very good example of this can also be found in Art. 16 ('Apprehension in violation of international law') of the 1935 Harvard Research in International Law's Draft Convention on Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime, see the American Journal of International Law Supplement, Vol. 29 (1935), pp. 435-651 for the entire research. This male captus male detentus article states: "In exercising jurisdiction under this Convention, no State shall prosecute or punish any person who has been brought within its territory or a place subject to its authority by recourse to measures in violation of international law or international convention without first obtaining the consent of the State or States whose rights have been violated by such measures."
[176] Note that not only the State whose sovereignty had been violated could protest the abduction, but also the home State of the abducted person. However, in the latter case, the home State has to exercise its prerogative of diplomatic protection (see Feinreider 1997, p. 81) which is "the protection given by a (...) subject of international law to individuals, i.e. natural or legal persons, against a violation of international law by another subject of international law." (Geck 1992, p. 1046.)
[177] District Court of Jerusalem, The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann, 'Judgment', 12 December 1961, Criminal Case No. 40/61, para. 44 (36 International Law Reports 1968, p. 62).

> a country arises at the international level, namely, the relations between the two countries concerned alone, and must find its solution at such level.[178]

Although it is not often mentioned in literature,[179] Eichmann not only tried to plead a violation of the sovereignty of Argentina, he also brought forth a human rights argument. On appeal, his counsel Servatius stated:

---

[178] Ibid., para. 50 (36 International Law Reports 1968, p. 70). Note that this stance, which was, for example, also followed by the French Argoud (see n. 389 and accompanying text of Chapter V) and US Noriega (see n. 207 of Chapter V) cases, was rejected in the context of the international criminal tribunals, see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Duško Tadić a/k/a/ "Dule", 'Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction', Case No. IT-94-1-AR72, 2 October 1995, para. 55: "Authoritative as they may be, those pronouncements do not carry, in the field of international law, the weight which they may bring to bear upon national judiciaries. Dating back to a period when sovereignty stood as a sacrosanct and unassailable attribute of statehood, recently this concept has suffered progressive erosion at the hands of the more liberal forces at work in the democratic societies, particularly in the field of human rights. Whatever the situation in domestic litigation, the traditional doctrine upheld and acted upon by the Trial Chamber is not reconcilable, in this International Tribunal, with the view that an accused, being entitled to a full defence, cannot be deprived of a plea so intimately connected with, and grounded in, international law as a defence based on violation of State sovereignty. To bar an accused from raising such a plea is tantamount to deciding that, in this day and age, an international court could not, in a criminal matter where the liberty of an accused is at stake, examine a plea raising the issue of violation of State sovereignty. Such a startling conclusion would imply a contradiction in terms which this Chamber feels it is its duty to refute and lay to rest." It should be clarified, however, that the fact that a suspect has ius standi to plead an alleged violation of State sovereignty does not mean that this plea will also be successful; as will be shown at n. 582 and accompanying text of Chapter VI, if there is no request by the injured State for the return of the suspect, the latter's argument for returning him to the injured State is doomed to failure. (Although this does not mean, of course, that the suspect cannot claim that his case should be dismissed on other (human rights/due process) grounds.) See ibid., para. 56: "The Trial Chamber was (...) fully justified to write, on this particular issue: "[I]t is pertinent to note that the challenge to the primacy of the International Tribunal has been made against the express intent of the two States most closely affected by the indictment against the accused – Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Federal Republic of Germany. The former, on the territory of which the crimes were allegedly committed, and the latter where the accused resided at the time of his arrest, have unconditionally accepted the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal and the accused cannot claim the rights that have been specifically waived by the States concerned (...) [emphasis added, ChP]."" See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanovic', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 76 (see n. 259 of Chapter VI), ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999, para. 32 (this case will be discussed in Subsection 3.1.2 of Chapter VI) and ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 97 (and n. 107) (see Subsection 3.1.4 of Chapter VI). See finally also the discussion of the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić in the same Subsection 3.1.4 of Chapter VI.

[179] See, however, Quigley 1988, p. 198. The point is also mentioned in an annex to a motion from the Defence in the still-to-discuss Nikolić case, see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the

> The District Court is wrong to assume that only the states concerned can derive rights resulting from violation of international law. This conception must be considered obsolete on account of the development of international law. The individual, having duties imposed on him deriving from international law, must also be granted rights to the same extent in the case of infringements committed. It cannot be accepted that an individual becomes a toy of states who, for the sake of national interests, disregard the interests of the individual.[180]

Regarding "the development of international law", Servatius referred to the 1948 UDHR and, more specifically, to the 1950 ECHR. Although he conceded that Israel was not a party to the European Convention, he made a sort of customary international law plea by arguing that both instruments mention the right to liberty and security, "a basic principle which ought to serve as a guideline to every country".[181] The Israeli Supreme Court, however, was not impressed by these arguments: it agreed with the reply of the Attorney-General that Israel was simply not a party to the European Convention. In addition, it was stated that "[f]rom the point of view of customary international law, (…) the abduction of the appellant is no ground for denying to the Court the competence to try him once he is within the area of its jurisdiction."[182]

Times have changed, however. The UDHR and the ECHR, born out of the horrors of WW II, set in motion the signing of other human rights treaties such as the ICCPR.[183] More and more, individuals entered the arena of international law. This was also visible in the field of mutual assistance in criminal matters which "increasingly focused on the individual."[184] And rightly so. After all, individuals are

---

Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 17 May 2001, p. 18.

[180] Supreme Court of Israel, Adolf Eichmann, Appellant versus The Attorney General, Respondent, Criminal Appeal No. 336/61, 31 January 1962, Written Pleadings Submitted by Counsel for the Appellant Adolf Eichmann, available at: http://www.nizkor.org/ftp.py?people/e/eichmann.adolf/transcripts/Appeal/Appeal-Pleading-01-01.

[181] Supreme Court of Israel, Adolf Eichmann, Appellant versus The Attorney General, Respondent, Criminal Appeal No. 336/61, 22 March 1962, Transcripts of Appeal Session 1, available at: http://www.nizkor.org/ftp.py?people/e/eichmann.adolf/transcripts/Appeal/Appeal-Session-01-01.

[182] Supreme Court of Israel, Adolf Eichmann v. The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel, 'Judgment', 29 May 1962, Criminal Appeal No. 336/61, para. 13 (36 International Law Reports 1968, p. 308).

[183] See also Zappalà 2002 A, p. 1187 and Lauren 2004, p. 25.

[184] Trechsel 2005, p. 431. See also Cherif Bassiouni and Wise 1995, p. ix: "International law traditionally has been the law of a society made up almost exclusively of sovereign national states. It is becoming the law of a planetary community of which all human beings are members". See also Costi 2003, p. 68. In that connection, it is also interesting to compare the UNSC's condemnation of abductions in 1960 (focusing on the rights of the injured State alone) and the following condemnation in 1985 where there was a focus on the rights of the individual as well: UNSC Res. 579 of 18 December 1985 states: "Considering that the taking of hostages and abductions are offences of grave concern to the international community, having severe adverse consequences for the rights of the victims and for the promotion of friendly relations and co-operation among States, (…) 1. Condemns unequivocally all acts of hostage-taking and abduction; 2. Calls for the immediate safe release of all hostages and abducted persons wherever and by whomever they are being held; 3. Affirms the obligation of all States in whose territory hostages or abducted persons are held urgently to take all appropriate measures to secure their more than little parts of States.[185] Now that they have rights independent of the States where they live or of which they are nationals, they should be able to protest against a male captus situation, even if the injured State consents to the operation, hence even if there is no problem from a classical international law point of view (between States).[186]

Nevertheless, one will not find generally drafted human rights (conventions) specifically forbidding the techniques of disguised extradition, luring and abduction as methods to bring a person to justice.[187] What a victim of a male captus situation safe release and to prevent the commission of acts of hostage-taking and abduction in the future; (…) 5. Urges the further development of international co-operation among States in devising and adopting effective measures which are in accordance with the rules of international law to facilitate the prevention, prosecution and punishment of all acts of hostage-taking and abduction as manifestations of international terrorism [emphasis in original, ChP]."

---

[185] See also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Duško Tadić a/k/a/ "Dule", 'Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction', Case No. IT-94-1-AR72, 2 October 1995, para. 97: "[T]he impetuous development and propagation in the international community of human rights doctrines, particularly after the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, has brought about significant changes in international law, notably in the approach to problems besetting the world community. A State-sovereignty-oriented approach has been gradually supplanted by a human-being-oriented approach. Gradually the maxim of Roman law hominum causa omne jus constitutum est (all law is created for the benefit of human beings) has gained a firm foothold in the international community as well."

[186] See Michell 1996, p. 439: "Under international human rights law, individuals have legal rights and duties; they are not stand-ins or beneficiaries of rights derived from states. Thus, individuals may assert their own rights and need not wait for the injured state to do this for them." One may also argue, as was done in the ICTY Tadić case, see n. 178, that individuals should be able to plead a violation of State sovereignty. Nevertheless, as also stated in the same n. 178, this does not mean that such a plea will be successful; much will depend here on the reaction of the injured State and that State may not protest the abduction or demand the return of the suspect, see Rayfuse 1993, p. 890: "Even in the face of an egregious violation of international law there may be occasions when no protest is forthcoming from the offended State – for any number of reasons which may not necessarily be related to the case at hand. For example, in Ker [see Subsection 1.1 of Chapter V, ChP] the individual in question had not been a national of Peru, the country from which he was abducted. Although Peruvian territory had been violated Peru would probably have had little interest in protesting in order to seek the return of a non-national – assuming the authorities were even aware that he had been kidnapped – especially during a time of national emergency such as Peru was experiencing at the time." However, this dependence on the reaction of the injured State is lacking in the context of human rights, which individuals enjoy irrespective of the reaction of any State.

[187] An example where the prohibition on kidnapping can be seen in another context is the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, whose signing ceremony took place in Paris on 6 February 2007. This Convention is focused on kidnappings as tools to make persons disappear (instead of kidnappings as tools to bring persons to justice), see its Art. 2 which states: "For the purposes of this Convention, "enforced disappearance" is considered to be the arrest, detention, abduction or any other form of deprivation of liberty by agents of the State or by persons or groups of persons acting with the authorization, support or acquiescence of the State, followed by a refusal to acknowledge the deprivation of liberty or by concealment of the fate or whereabouts of the disappeared person, which place such a person outside the protection of the law [emphasis added, ChP]." Another human rights example where one can see a condemnation of kidnapping can be found in Art. 35 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, adopted by UNGA Res. 44/25 of 20 November 1989: "States Parties shall take all appropriate national, bilateral and multilateral measures to prevent the abduction of, the sale of or traffic in children for any purpose or in any form." Nevertheless, this positive obligation to prevent abductions is only applicable in the context of a limited group of could do, however, is rely on more general human rights provisions from international and regional human rights treaties.[188] Before giving examples, two remarks should be made. First, the examples only cover the basic male captus situations. Of course, during an abduction, the suspect may also be mistreated or even tortured by his kidnappers. In fact, in many cases in this book, the suspect alleges that he was mistreated. In such situations, he can also turn to articles such as Article 3 of the ECHR,[189] Article 7 of the ICCPR (the prohibition of torture) or Article 10, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR ("All persons deprived of their liberty shall be treated with humanity and with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person").[190] To keep matters clear, however, the examples in the following pages individuals, namely children. Art. 1 of the same Convention explains what a child is: "For the purposes of the present Convention, a child means every human being below the age of eighteen years unless under the law applicable to the child, majority is attained earlier." It may finally be interesting to mention that a bilateral treaty has been drafted which explicitly forbids the use of abductions as a means to bring suspects to justice, but this instrument has not entered into force. This instrument is the Treaty Between the Government of the United Mexican States and the Government of the United States of America to Prohibit Transborder Abductions, which was drafted after the (in)famous Alvarez-Machain case of 1992, which will be discussed in Subsection 1.2 of Chapter V. (The treaty can be found in Abbell 2001, at A-303-A-306.) Although both Mexico and the US signed the treaty on 23 November 1994, it was never submitted to the US Senate for advice and consent to ratification. As a result, it has never entered into force. See, for example, Henderson 2006, p. 196 and US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, Alvarez-Machain v. United States et al. (No. 99-56762) and Alvarez-Machain v. Sosa et al. (No. 99-56880), 3 June 2003 (331 F.3d 604), p. 619.

---

[188] See also the following statements. (It must be mentioned that these were made before the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, which explicitly states in Art. 1, para. 1 that "[n]o one shall be subjected to enforced disappearance" (which includes an abduction). Nevertheless, as already explained in the previous footnote, such an abduction is not focused on bringing a person to justice (the context in which this study is interested) but on making a person disappear.) Costi 2003, p. 69: "No international treaty explicitly recognises an individual human right against forcible abduction or irregular rendition. Yet, such a right has been read into the provisions of regional and international human rights instruments relating to the right to liberty and security of the person and to protection against torture or other degrading treatment." American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third, Foreign Relations Law of the United States, 1987, para. 432 ('Measures in Aid of Enforcement of Criminal Law'), Reporters Note 1 ('Exercise of enforcement functions in foreign state without consent'): "None of the international human rights conventions to date (…) provides that forcible abduction or irregular extradition is a violation of international human rights law. However, Articles 3, 5, and 9 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as well as Articles 7, 9 and 10 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights might be invoked in support of such a view." Borelli 2004, p. 356: "Forcible abduction is not expressly prohibited by any human rights treaty or customary rule. Nevertheless, the kidnapping of an individual implies per se the violation of several fundamental rights protected by international law. For instance, concerns like the preservation of the security of the individual, the condemnation of arbitrary arrest and detention, the respect of the right to a fair trial may be interpreted to preclude State-sponsored kidnapping [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally also Quigley 1988, p. 198.

[189] For example, in the Öcalan case (see Subsection 2.2.4), the suspect in question claimed that his male captus from Kenya to Turkey did not only violate his right to liberty and security but also "his right to respect for his physical integrity. He added that the circumstances in which the arrest had been effected also amounted to degrading and inhuman treatment." (ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 177.) (The Court, by the way, did not agree with this, see ibid., para. 185.)

[190] See also Quigley 1988, pp. 199-201.

will focus on 'simple' male captus situations, where these complicating and aggravating factors are not present.[191] Secondly, the examples will only involve (the more important)[192] general human rights treaties. To take again a suspect who alleges to have been mistreated during the male captus: such a person could perhaps also rely on more specific treaties such as the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. However, an inquiry into all these specific instruments would only complicate matters, whereas this chapter – as has already been said several times – is merely there to clarify. (They may appear in the remainder of this book however.)

The arguably two most important human rights that can be violated in basic male captus situations are the right to liberty and security and the right not to be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention.[193]

However, before analysing these two rights, it is also worth mentioning the right to a fair trial here. Although the provisions in human rights treaties where the word 'fair' can be found are mainly dedicated to a fair hearing in court, this does not preclude a suspect from arguing more generally that his trial must be considered unfair if something goes wrong during, for example, his arrest and judges in court subsequently do not pay attention to this matter.

Arguably, the concept of a fair trial is not limited to the hearing in court, but encompasses the whole criminal proceedings, including the pre-trial phase and hence also the arrest proceedings.

See in that respect the following words of Nowak, commenting on Article 14 of the ICCPR:

> The claim to a fair trial in court on a criminal "charge" ("accusation") does not arise only upon the formal lodging of a charge but rather on the date on which State activities substantially affect the situation of the person concerned. This is usually the

[191] Cf. Garner 2004, p. 886: a simple kidnapping is a "[k]idnapping not accompanied by an aggravating factor" whereas an aggravated kidnapping is a "[k]idnapping accompanied by some aggravating factor (such as (…) injury of the victim)." Although "Professor Henkin also stated (…) that "[a]bduction would also appear to be 'cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment' in violation of" human rights law [original footnote omitted, ChP]" (Paust 1993, p. 563), the view of Paust himself is arguably better: "I do not agree (…) that every abduction or capture of a person in foreign state territory without foreign state consent (…) is necessarily (…) "cruel," "inhuman," or "degrading" within the meaning of relevant human rights standards." (Paust 1993, p. 564.)

[192] For example, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union will not be discussed because the older European Convention is clearly more authoritative.

[193] One may also look at a right such as the one mentioned in Art. 13 of the ICCPR ("An alien lawfully in the territory of a State Party to the present Covenant may be expelled therefrom only in pursuance of a decision reached in accordance with law and shall, except where compelling reasons of national security otherwise require, be allowed to submit the reasons against his expulsion and to have his case reviewed by, and be represented for the purpose before, the competent authority or a person or persons especially designated by the competent authority.") to contest a disguised extradition, as will be shown infra when discussing the case Giry v. Dominican Republic.

> first official notification of a specific accusation, but in certain cases, this may also be as early as arrest [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[194]

Going back to the more specific right to liberty and security and the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily, these rights are recognised, at least on paper, around the world, in both global and regional human rights treaties.[195]

In addition, many countries have adhered to these legal provisions. For example, the ICCPR has currently[196] 165 States Parties.

The fact that so many States have adhered to these provisions (State practice) plus the fact that States arguably have done this because they feel they have a legal

---

[194] Nowak 1993, p. 244. Another interesting quotation can be found in ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Miailhe v. France (No. 2), Application No. 18978/91, 'Judgment', 26 September 1996, where the ECtHR stated in para. 43 that it must "satisfy itself that the proceedings as a whole were fair, having regard to any possible irregularities before the case was brought before the courts of trial and appeal and checking that those courts had been able to remedy them if there were any". (Note, however, that this case dealt with the admissibility of evidence.)

[195] See for the right to liberty and security of person: Artt. 3 of the UDHR, 9 of the ICCPR, 5 of the ECHR, 7 of the ACHR, 6 of the ACHPR, 5 and 8 of the ARACHR and 5 of the CISCHR. See for the right not to be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention/imprisonment: Artt. 9 of the UDHR, 9 of the ICCPR, 7 of the ACHR and 6 of the ACHPR. (Note that the three other conventions (ECHR, ARACHR and CISCHR) do not explicitly use the words "right not to be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention" but that other rights could very well encompass this right, see Art. 5 of the ECHR ("[n]o one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law"), Art. 8 of the ARACHR ("no one shall be arrested, held in custody or detained without a legal warrant and without being brought promptly before a judge") and Art. 5 of the CISCHR ("[n]o one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure established by national legislation"). What strikes is that there is no regional human rights treaty for Asia. Tomuschat explains this point as follows: "This failure is due not only to political difficulties, but also to the fact that Asia is a continent which lacks cultural homogeneity. The Arab countries are a world apart, and although their endeavours to produce a human rights instrument came to fruition in 1994, the Arab Charter of Human Rights, the outcome of their joint efforts has not attracted any ratifications to date. India views itself almost as a continent with a rich intellectual heritage, and China, the Middle Kingdom, has always considered that it is the true centre of the world. Japan, too, has a distinct cultural identity which can by no means be equated with Chinese culture. Not only do historical and ethnic traditions compete with one another. Asia is also divided by the different religions of its peoples. Given such divergencies, there is not the slightest prospect that one day an Asian convention on human rights reflecting a specific Asian civilization might see the light of the day [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Tomuschat 2003, pp. 33-34.) Note, however, that this might change in the future. One possible (but admittedly still restricted) sign could be the fact that on 20 November 2007, 10 Member States of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations or ASEAN (namely Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines, Singapore, Thailand, Brunei Darussalam, Vietnam, Lao PDR, Myanmar and Cambodia) signed the ASEAN Charter, whose Art. 14 ('ASEAN Human Rights Body') states: "1. In conformity with the purposes and principles of the ASEAN Charter relating to the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, ASEAN shall establish an ASEAN human rights body. 2. This ASEAN human rights body shall operate in accordance with the terms of reference to be determined by the ASEAN Foreign Ministers Meeting." Moreover, on 23 October 2009, the inaugural ceremony of the ASEAN Intergovernmental Commission on Human Rights (AICHR) was held, see 'AICHR unveiled, for the betterment of all ASEAN peoples', available at: http://www.aseanhrmech.org/news/AICHR-unveiled-for-betterment-of-ASEAN-people.htm.

[196] See http://treaties.un.org/doc/Publication/MTDSG/Volume%20I/Chapter%20IV/IV-4.en.pdf.

obligation under international law to do so (opinio iuris) means that these rights have customary international law status.[197]

Furthermore, it could be asserted that this right can be seen as part of general international law,[198] if not because of the great number of States which have ratified the ICCPR,[199] then because of the provisions' customary international law status.[200]

[197] For further evidence of the assertion that these rights have customary international law status, see, for example, para. 8 of the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, General Comment No. 24: Issues relating to reservations made upon ratification or accession to the Covenant or the Optional Protocols thereto, or in relation to declarations under article 41 of the Covenant, 4 November 1994, CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.6: "[P]rovisions in the Covenant that represent customary international law (and a fortiori when they have the character of peremptory norms) may not be the subject of reservations. Accordingly, a State may not reserve the right to engage in slavery, to torture, to subject persons to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, to arbitrarily deprive persons of their lives, to arbitrarily arrest and detain persons, to deny freedom of thought, conscience and religion, to presume a person guilty unless he proves his innocence, to execute pregnant women or children, to permit the advocacy of national, racial or religious hatred, to deny to persons of marriageable age the right to marry, or to deny to minorities the right to enjoy their own culture, profess their own religion, or use their own language. And while reservations to particular clauses of article 14 may be acceptable, a general reservation to the right to a fair trial would not be." See also Rayfuse 1993, p. 891: "It would seem uncontroversial to suggest that the rights to liberty and security of the person and to freedom from arbitrary arrest are rights which (…) are now firmly rooted in the corpus of customary international law." See also Higgins 1994, p. 70 and De Zayas 2005 p. 22: "The above international norms [De Zayas refers hereby to international and regional human rights protecting the liberty and security of person, ChP] reflect a universal consensus that an individual cannot be deprived of liberty except pursuant to specific legislative authority and with respect for procedural safeguards." See finally De Londras 2007, p. 240: "As well as being protected in specific conventions as outlined above, the right to be free from arbitrary detention also forms part of customary international law. By analysis under the two relevant considerations – 'the material facts, that is, the actual behaviour of states, and the psychological or subjective belief that such behaviour is 'law'' – it is clear that the right to be free from arbitrary detention is a customary international law right. In particular, the establishment of the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, the production of the Body of Principles for the Protection of All Those in Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment and the conclusion of the Draft International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance testify to this assertion [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[198] See Rodley 1999, p. 264 where he explains that the right to liberty and security is "a right which (...) is recognized by general international law". See also ibid., p. 341: "There are also strong indications that the International Court of Justice considers that violation of the right to liberty and security of person and the prohibition of arbitrary arrest and detention is a violation of general international law (...). Here the statement of the World Court in the Tehran Hostages case will be recalled: "Wrongfully to deprive human beings of their freedom and to subject them to physical constraint in conditions of hardship is in itself manifestly incompatible with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, as well as with the fundamental principles enunciated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights." This statement appears to have been a specification of the more general finding that, by keeping the hostages effectively imprisoned at the US embassy in Tehran, Iran had committed 'successive and continuing breaches of the obligations laid upon it by the ... applicable rules of general international law'. The language hardly admits of an interpretation that does not cover the principles concerning arbitrary arrest and detention and liberty and security of person [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Cf. finally the still-to-discuss Barayagwiza case before the ICTR (see Subsection 3.2.1 of Chapter VI) where the judges held even more generally that "[t]he International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights is part of general international law". (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 40.)

Now that the status of these articles has been clarified to a certain extent, it is worth looking at their content. Even though it will be shown that the two rights are not exactly the same, the following pages will address them in concert, because they are mentioned almost everywhere in one and the same article.[201]

What is the exact meaning of this right to liberty and security/the right not to be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention? It would go beyond the scope of the present study to examine all the different versions of this right in detail but some important aspects should be addressed. Attention will hereby be paid to arguably the two most important human rights treaties for the field of international criminal law, namely the ICCPR (see Article 9, paragraph 1)[202] and the ECHR (see Article 5, paragraph 1).[203] [204] Alongside a more theoretical examination of both provisions (in

---

[199] See Brownlie 2003, p. 4: "[T]reaties binding a few states only are dubbed 'particular international law' as opposed to 'general international law' comprising multilateral 'law-making' treaties to which a majority of states are parties [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[200] Cf. Tunkin, presenting the prevailing theory (in 1993) as follows: "General international law is customary law only. Conventional norms, even if all States are parties to a treaty, need the opinio juris of these States to become norms of general international law. In other words, treaty provisions must be converted into customary norms, in order for them to become norms of general international law." (Tunkin 1993, p. 535.) Note, however, that Tunkin himself was of the opinion that multilateral treaties (and not only customary law) could also lead to general international law, see ibid., p. 541: "I believe that international lawyers should accept that general international law now comprises both customary and conventional rules of international law."

[201] See n. 195.

[202] "Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. No one shall be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as are established by law."

[203] "Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law: (a) the lawful detention of a person after conviction by a competent court; (b) the lawful arrest or detention of a person for non-compliance with the lawful order of a court or in order to secure the fulfilment of any obligation prescribed by law; (c) the lawful arrest or detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence or when it is reasonably considered necessary to prevent his committing an offence or fleeing after having done so; (d) the detention of a minor by lawful order for the purpose of educational supervision or his lawful detention for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority; (e) the lawful detention of persons for the prevention of the spreading of infectious diseases, of persons of unsound mind, alcoholics or drug addicts, or vagrants; (f) the lawful arrest or detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorized entry into the country or of a person against whom action is being taken with a view to deportation or extradition."

[204] See, for example, the following words from the ICTR Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza case on 'Applicable and Authoritative Provisions': "The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights is part of general international law and is applied on that basis. Regional human rights treaties, such as the European Convention on Human Rights and the American Convention on Human Rights, and the jurisprudence developed thereunder, are persuasive authority which may be of assistance in applying and interpreting the Tribunal's applicable law. Thus, they are not binding of their own accord on the Tribunal. They are, however, authoritative as evidence of international custom." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 40.) Although the American Convention is also mentioned here, it can be argued that the ECHR is more authoritative. Cf. in that respect, for example, Sluiter 2003 B, p. 940, n. 20 when writing on the regional conventions: "In particular the ECHR can be considered to reflect customary Subsections 2.2.1 and 2.2.3), how the human rights bodies supervising the ICCPR (namely the HRC, see Subsection 2.2.2) and the ECHR (namely the (now defunct) ECmHR and the ECtHR, see Subsection 2.2.4) have interpreted these provisions in the context of alleged male captus cases will also be examined. It should be emphasised that most of the cases from these supervisory bodies do not go into the real male captus discussion as they do not need to analyse the effect of the specific male captus on the jurisdiction of the court. They are 'only' there to determine whether a violation of their instruments has occurred.[205] As a result, most of these cases will be discussed in this part of the book and not in Part 3. Nevertheless, some decisions of the supervisory bodies will also be found in Chapters V and VI, for example, because it may be interesting to see how an inter-State/tribunal case, after being addressed at the national level/the level of the tribunals, was continued at the level of these supervisory bodies, or because the supervisory body seemed to do more than just determine whether or not a certain act had led to a violation of the human rights instrument in question (see the Al-Moayad case, to be addressed in Subsection 2.2 of Chapter V).

2.2.1 Article 9, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR

Nowak, in his commentary to this article, explains that "it is not the deprivation of liberty in and of itself that is disapproved of but rather that which is arbitrary and unlawful."[206]

> It obligates a State's legislature to define precisely the cases in which deprivation of liberty is permissible and the procedures to be applied and to make it possible for the independent judiciary to take quick action in the event of arbitrary or unlawful deprivation of liberty by administrative authorities or executive officials.[207] international law. It is true that this is only a regional convention and therefore the ensuing State practice is by definition limited, but this Convention dates from 1950 and served as a model for the ICCPR."

---

[205] See also Currie 2007, p. 360 (also writing on male captus case law from (inter)national(ised) courts): "Decisions of the human rights supervisory bodies are not exactly on point with the current discussion, as they fulfil different functions than either the national courts or the international criminal tribunals. While abduction and illegal rendition may cause jurisdictional inquiries in the latter fora, being the very courts which can try the individuals, bodies such as the European Court of Human Rights and the United Nations Human Rights Committee have a supervisory function. At their most specific these courts will adjudge whether a particular prosecution undertaken in spite of abduction or illegal rendition was itself a violation of its constitutive human rights instrument, or at least whether the mode of apprehension itself was offensive." See also ibid.: "As might be expected, these cases rest on the illegal acts themselves as human rights violations, rather than speaking to the inherent process of the court." See finally IACtHR, Velásquez Rodríguez, 'Judgment', 29 July 1988, Ser. C., No. 4 (1988), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/b_11_12d.htm, para. 134: "The international protection of human rights should not be confused with criminal justice. States do not appear before the Court as defendants in a criminal action. The objective of international human rights law is not to punish those individuals who are guilty of violations, but rather to protect the victims and to provide for the reparation of damages resulting from the acts of the States responsible."

[206] Nowak 2005, p. 211.

[207] Ibid., pp. 211-212.

Thus, a person's deprivation of liberty must not only be "on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as are established by law" (lawful); it must not be arbitrary either.[208] The first condition encompasses the principle of lawfulness/legality and has two dimensions: a substantive one ("on such grounds (…) as are established by law") and a procedural one ("in accordance with such procedure as [is] established by law")[209] and the second condition contains the prohibition on arbitrariness.[210]

How do these conditions, which will be further examined infra, relate to each other? It is clear from the above that if, for example, a police official maintains that an arrest or detention did not violate Article 9, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR, then he has to prove both conditions, meaning that he must show that the arrest violated neither the principle of legality nor the prohibition of arbitrariness. Consequently, this also means that any arrest which does not comply with one of the conditions can be seen as violating Article 9, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR. Hence, if it is established that an arrest violated the principle of legality (for example because it was not "in accordance with such procedure as [is] established by law"), there is already a violation of Article 9, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR. It is not necessary in that case to also prove that the arrest was arbitrary because the principle of legality was already violated. As a result, the arrest can never comply with both conditions (and only that will lead to the conclusion: no violation of Article 9, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR). Likewise, a violation of Article 9, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR can also be established if the arrest did not violate the principle of legality, but was 'merely' arbitrary.[211]

Focusing now on these conditions and looking first at the principle of legality, it must be clarified that the word "law" primarily refers to national law.[212] Nevertheless, from the remainder of the article, it becomes clear that an arrest or detention must not only be lawful according to national law but also according to international law. For example, in his discussion on paragraph 5 of this article (which will be further discussed in Subsection 4.2), Nowak writes:

> Arrest or detention is unlawful when it contradicts one of the provisions in Art. 9(1) to (4) and/or a provision of domestic law. (…) [A]n arrest may be consistent with [208] See ibid., p. 223. See also ibid., p. 224: "It is not enough for deprivation of liberty to be provided for by law. The law itself must not be arbitrary, and the enforcement of the law in a given case must not take place arbitrarily."

[209] See ibid., pp. 223-224.
[210] See ibid., pp. 224-228.
[211] See in that respect Nowak's presentation of the Van Alphen case: "In van Alphen v. The Netherlands, concerning a Dutch solicitor who was detained for more than nine weeks in order to force him to waive his professional obligation to secrecy and to solicit evidence which could be used in the criminal investigations against his clients, the [ICCPR's Human Rights] Committee gave a general legal opinion about the factors that may render arbitrary an otherwise lawful detention. In conformity with the drafting history, the Committee held that remand in custody pursuant to a lawful arrest must not only be lawful but reasonable and necessary in all circumstances, for example, to prevent flight, interference with evidence or the recurrence of crime. After carefully balancing the different arguments, it found a violation of Art. 9(1) [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., p. 227.)
[212] Ibid., p. 224.

> domestic laws but nevertheless unlawful under international law, regardless of whether this is arbitrary or in violation of the procedural guarantees in paras. 2 to 4 [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP].[213]

The same goes for paragraph 4 (which will also be examined in detail in Subsection 4.2):

> In decisions concerning the mandatory detention of immigrants and asylum seekers who enter the territory of Australia without a valid entry permit, the [ICCPR's Human Rights] Committee held that judicial review of the lawfulness of detention under Art. 9(4) must also include the compatibility with international law, above all the Covenant itself [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP].[214]

Returning to the prohibition of arbitrariness, what does it entail? Nowak, writing on the negotiations of Article 9 of the ICCPR, explains:

> Whereas some delegates were of the view that the word "arbitrary" ("arbitraires") meant nothing more than unlawful, the majority stressed that its meaning went beyond this and contained elements of injustice, unpredictability, unreasonableness, capriciousness and unproportionality, as well as the Anglo-American principle of due process of law [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP].[215]

Hence, arbitrariness covers the notion of unlawfulness, but is in fact much more than that.[216] This additional element is, of course, to be welcomed; otherwise, there

---

[213] Ibid., p. 238.
[214] Ibid., p. 224.
[215] Ibid., p. 225.
[216] Cf. also the 1964 United Nations Committee 'Study of the Right of Everyone to be Free from Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, and Exile'. According to Marcoux, Jr. (1982, p. 366), this committee "provides one of the most important interpretations of "arbitrary" [original footnote omitted, ChP]". And indeed, if one looks at the material examined by the committee, one can only agree with this. Marcoux, Jr. explains the committee's methodology and outcome as follows (ibid.): "During the course of its study, the United Nations Committee consulted the preparatory works and legislative history of the Universal Declaration and the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. The Committee also referred to the reports of the United Nations Seminars on the Protection of Human Rights in Criminal Law or Procedure, and the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners adopted in 1955 by the first United Nations Congress for the Prevention of Crime and Treatment of Offenders. In addition, the Committee examined documents of the League of Nations and work undertaken by regional organizations, such as the Organization of American States and the Council of Europe. Finally, the Committee collected information relating to the laws and practices concerning arrest and detention in "as many countries as possible." After this exhaustive study, the Committee concluded that "'arbitrary' is not synonymous with 'illegal' and … the former signifies more than the latter. It seems clear that, while an illegal arrest or detention is almost always arbitrary, an arrest or detention which is in accordance with law may nevertheless be arbitrary." Accordingly, the Committee adopted the following definition of "arbitrary": "Arrest or detention is arbitrary if it is (a) on grounds or in accordance with procedures other than those established by law or (b) under the provisions of a law, the purpose of which is incompatible with the right to liberty and security of person" [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." One could argue that on the basis of this definition, an illegal arrest/detention is always (and not would be nothing wrong with a deprivation of liberty which may be based on a law but which may nevertheless be clearly arbitrary (for example because the law on which it is based is also manifestly unreasonable).

The word "unproportionality" in the previous quotation shows that the requirement of non-arbitrariness is relative in nature:[217] it will depend on the specific situation and the circumstances of the case whether a certain case of deprivation of liberty will be viewed as arbitrary or not. Nowak also notes this when he states:

> Cases of deprivation of liberty provided for by law must not be manifestly disproportional, unjust or unpredictable, and the specific manner in which an arrest is made must not be discriminatory and must be able to be deemed appropriate and proportional in view of the circumstances of the case [original footnote omitted, ChP].[218]

This quotation shows that one should not only look at the correctness of the law on which the arrest and detention was based, but also at the correctness of the enforcement of the law in this specific case.[219] A couple of pages earlier, however, Nowak explained:

> At this stage, a further limit on the scope of personal liberty should be mentioned. The traditional view is that it relates solely to the fact of deprivation of liberty and the observance of the minimum guarantees specifically formulated in this context, and not to the manner in which liberty is deprived. For example, if a person is arrested and not informed of the reasons, this is a violation of personal liberty; if he is mistreated in the process, this has nothing to do with personal liberty [emphasis in original, ChP].[220] almost always, see supra) arbitrary because it will fall under the first category of arbitrary arrests/detentions.

---

[217] See also Marcoux, Jr. 1982, p. 374: "The more a law operates to deprive individuals of the right to personal liberty, the more such a law becomes arbitrary. At the same time, the state has a correspondingly greater duty to justify its actions. In this manner, "arbitrary" is not an absolute concept with a single, ascertainable meaning. Rather, it is as a relative concept: a law may be more or less arbitrary as it more or less derogates from the fundamental right to personal liberty. "Arbitrary" may thus be conceptualized as a continuum, at one end of which is complete maximization of the right to personal liberty, and at the other, complete minimization of the right to personal liberty. According to this analysis, one may judge a law or proposed law by the greater or lesser extent to which it places a restriction upon the right to personal liberty. The state may be able to justify impositions on the right to personal liberty by referring to other universally recognized goal values, and by arguing that factors such as necessity and proportionality justify its action. However, the state has the burden of justifying its derogation. This burden becomes greater as infringement upon the personal liberty value increases."

[218] Nowak 2005, p. 225.

[219] See also n. 208. In that respect, Nowak's quotation seems to go further than the (admittedly also quite old) 1964 United Nations Committee 'Study of the Right of Everyone to be Free from Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, and Exile' (see n. 216) which did not seem to look at the specific manner in which the arrest was made. (The 1964 Study focused on the question whether the arrest and detention were lawful and whether the purpose of the law on which the arrest and detention were based was compatible with the right to liberty and security.)

[220] Nowak 2005, pp. 212-213.

Although it indeed seems clear that other problems which may come with deprivation of liberty, such as mistreatment of the arrested person, are not within the scope of the right to liberty and security, the fact that the second quotation states that one should not look at "the manner in which liberty is deprived" appears to contradict the first quotation where one can read that one may look at "the specific manner in which an arrest is made". It looks like the last-mentioned idea (in the first quotation) is, however, Nowak's view. This may be discerned from the fact that the second quotation speaks of the "traditional view" with which Nowak may not agree.[221] Another argument in favour of looking at the specific manner in which the arrest was made is that this view can also be found in Nowak's statement that "the enforcement of the law in a given case must not take place arbitrarily".[222]

Whatever the case may be, this study will follow, as others seem to do as well,[223] the first quotation in that one should also look at the correctness of the specific manner in which an arrest is made. That one should take into account the specific manner in which an arrest was made in the determination of whether the arrest was proportional (to come back to that point) seems logical. One can imagine that the arrest of a high-level person who, it is known, will do anything to evade justice may justify other methods of arrest than in the case of the arrest of a 'normal' suspect who, it is known, will cooperate with the police. However, it may be the case that applying the arrest methods of the first suspect to the second suspect (where this is absolutely not necessary and, in fact, disproportional for the goal of arrest) may render the otherwise perfectly legal arrest arbitrary. Hence, applying certain methods of arrest may not lead to a violation of a person's right to liberty and security in one case but may lead to a violation in another case.

Paust, however, goes one step further (and arguably one step too far) when he asserts:

> What is "arbitrary," otherwise "unlawful," or "unjust" will have to be considered in context and with reference to other legal policies at stake. (…) [I]t may not be incompatible with principles of justice, "unjust," "unlawful" or otherwise "arbitrary" to abduct or capture an international criminal in a context when action is reasonably necessary to assure adequate sanctions against egregious international criminal activity [original footnote omitted, ChP].[224]

Although one can imagine that the same legal arrest is non-arbitrary in one case and arbitrary in the other, it is allegedly not so that an operation that is so often labelled as unlawful and arbitrary that one may assert that it is always, in every case,

---

[221] However, it must be admitted that if this is indeed the case, Nowak does not clearly present it as such.
[222] Nowak 2005, p. 224. See also n. 208.
[223] See, for example, Chapter IV ('Overview of International Human Rights and Humanitarian Law Standards') of the Training Manual on Human Rights Monitoring (available at: http://hrlibrary.ngo.ru/monitoring/chapter4.html) under D 2 (a).
[224] Paust 1993, pp. 563-564.

unlawful or arbitrary (such as an abduction, see Subsections 2.2.2 and 2.2.4),[225] may become less unlawful or arbitrary under certain circumstances.

After having reviewed this theory, one would think that all three basic male captus situations (disguised extradition, luring and abduction) violate Article 9, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR.[226] (Whether the law in practice agrees with this will be disclosed in a few moments when the actual case law of the HRC is addressed.) After all, they all involve operations in which the normal route of bringing a person from State B to State A, namely extradition, is circumvented. Hence, such apprehensions are arguably not "in accordance with such procedure as [is] established by law" because one can assume that States will not draft legislation explicitly approving disguised extradition/luring/abduction. However, even if they did, such legislation would arguably be arbitrary in nature. That would seem logical with respect to abduction, but the same can be argued for disguised extradition and luring.[227]

In the first case (disguised extradition), procedures in place for other purposes are used to extradite a person to another State. Although these procedures as such may be procedurally correct, their use as a means to extradite a person to another State is arguably not in conformity with the principle of legality. However, even if that argument were to be rejected, one could assert that the deprivation of liberty is

[225] Cf. also Shearer 1971, p. 75 (see also Gilbert 1998, pp. 358 and 362, referring to Shearer): "[A]bduction is such a manifestly extra-legal act, and in practice so hazardous and uncertain, that it is unworthy of serious consideration as an alternative method to extradition in securing custody of fugitive offenders." See also Nowak 2005, pp. 227-228: "[O]bvious examples of arbitrary arrest and detention include the practice of enforced disappearances and incommunicado detention, as well as kidnappings by secret service agents abroad [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." With respect to incommunicado detention, this remark should, however, be refined, see Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights and International Bar Association 2003, pp. 210-211: "The practice of holding detainees incommunicado, that is to say, keeping them totally isolated from the outside world without even allowing them access to their family and lawyer, does not per se appear to be outlawed by international human rights law, although the Human Rights Committee has stated in its General Comment No. 20, on Article 7 of the Covenant, that "provisions should ... be made against incommunicado detention". What is clear from the jurisprudence, however, is that incommunicado detention is not allowed to interfere with the effective enforcement of the legal guarantees of people deprived of their liberty. In a case where the authors had been held incommunicado during the first 44 days of detention, the Committee concluded that both articles 9(3) and 10(1) of the Covenant had been violated because they had not been brought promptly before a judge and because of the incommunicado detention. (…) Brief incommunicado detention, that is, deprivation of liberty for a short period of time in complete isolation from the outside world, including family and lawyer, does not per se appear to be illegal under international human rights law, but it cannot be used in order to bar the detainee from exercising his or her rights as an arrested or detained person [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[226] Cf. also Van der Wilt 2004, p. 276, arguing that the three methods violate a person's right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily.

[227] See also Currie 2007, p. 360: "[A]bduction and forms of rendition that are not prescribed by law are generally viewed as being human rights violations." See also Gilbert 1998, pp. 358-359 (whose words can arguably also be applied to luring): "[S]ince abduction and collusive deportation clandestinely avoid extradition, an arrest for either purpose must, by definition, be unlawful."

more generally to be seen as arbitrary.[228] It seems, in any case, hard to state that in such a case, there is nothing wrong with the deprivation of liberty.

Now, it is true that the ICCPR provision appears to focus on the actions of a State's own investigating authorities and that it does not refer to actions of authorities from other States which may execute the actual disguised extradition. Nevertheless, as already explained,[229] one can imagine that in many cases, the 'receiving' State may very well collude with the sending State in the disguised extradition operation. In addition, even if this is not the case, one could argue that a person's right to liberty and security/right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily has been violated by some State and that it is the responsibility of the receiving State (which in a way profits from the violation of the sending State) to determine that, in the more general process of depriving a person of his liberty and bringing him to the jurisdiction of the court in the receiving State, the person's right to liberty and security/right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily was violated.[230] If that were not done, then a person whose liberty was factually unlawfully/arbitrarily deprived could not exercise the human right he is entitled to, thereby ending up in a legal vacuum caused by the fragmentation of the deprivation of liberty over two legal systems.[231] That is obviously to be prevented. Sluiter, writing on the context of the tribunals, states: "It is imperative that the defendant receives the full protection of human rights instruments and should not be the victim of the fragmentation of the criminal procedure over two or more jurisdictions."[232] That reasoning should arguably also count for the inter-State context.

What can be said about the second case: luring? Can a luring operation be seen as a deprivation of liberty not in violation of the right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily? It seems that it can. In Subsection 2.1, where whether luring could violate a State's sovereignty was examined, a passage from a resolution from the International Association of Penal Law was quoted. This resolution also looked at the question as to whether the practice of luring violates a person's human rights and arguably answered this in the affirmative by stating that "[t]he violation entails liability in respect of the person concerned and the State whose sovereignty has been violated, without prejudice to any criminal liability of the persons responsible for the abduction."[233] Perhaps the following quotation by Paust who refers to the position of another international organisation, the International Law Association (which is also of the opinion that luring can be seen as a form of abduction, see Subsection 1.5) is clearer: [228] Cf. also Sluiter 2003 C, p. 648: "Both disguised extradition and abductions are generally considered violations of the right to be free from arbitrary arrest and detention [original footnote omitted, ChP].

---

[229] See n. 49.

[230] Cf. also Frowein 1994, p. 182 (writing on the European context): "[O]ne should recognize that it is a violation of Article 5 of the Convention if European countries work together to circumvent the guarantee of personal liberty enshrined in Article 5 of the Convention."

[231] For more information about the negative effects of two overlapping legal systems, see Sjöcrona and Orie 2002, pp. 18 and 270.

[232] Sluiter 2001, p. 156.

[233] Schomburg 1995, p. 105.

> The International Law Association recognizes that kidnapping by deception is a form of abduction, and abduction to another State to stand trial violates the territorial sovereignty of the state from which the person is abducted. The abduction is also a violation of the human rights of the abductee. The abductee is unlawfully arrested and detained, which is a direct violation of several international human rights conventions [original footnote omitted, ChP].[234]

Before turning to the case law, one important point must still be made. It was argued above (when discussing disguised extradition) that even though Article 9 of the ICCPR appears to focus on the actions of a State's own police, a judge confronted by a male captus committed by another State should also look at these allegations so that he can avoid a potential legal vacuum for the victim of such a male captus. The same can be argued with respect to extraterritorial police actions by a certain State. Although one may argue that Article 9 of the ICCPR only looks at the arrest proceedings within a certain State and hence only covers illegal domestic arrests (and not inter-State disguised extraditions (to the extent that State A is colluding in such an operation), luring and abduction operations), such a view is arguably too restricted. Again, in order to ensure that suspects do not become the victim of a legal vacuum, of proceedings that are fragmented over several jurisdictions, the judge reviewing the legality of the arrest and detention should look at the entire deprivation of liberty proceedings, including those preparatory parts abroad which made it possible to, in the end, effectuate the arrest.[235]

2.2.2 Case law from the HRC

Although the Human Rights Committee, the body supervising the ICCPR, has not clearly pronounced itself on the method of luring and disguised extradition, it has decided several cases involving abductions, of which four will now be examined.[236]

---

[234] Paust et al. 1996, pp. 436-437. See also International Law Association 1994, pp. 162-163.

[235] See also the HRC's General Comment No. 31: "States Parties are required by article 2, paragraph 1, to respect and to ensure the Covenant rights to all persons who may be within their territory and to all persons subject to their jurisdiction. This means that a State party must respect and ensure the rights laid down in the Covenant to anyone within the power or effective control of that State Party, even if not situated within the territory of the State Party." (HRC's General Comment No. 31 [80]: 'Nature of the General Legal Obligation Imposed on States Parties to the Covenant', CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.13 of 26 May 2004, para. 10.)

[236] In addition to these cases, there is another case by the HRC not clearly falling within the different male captus situations but still often referred to (see, for example, Rayfuse 1993, p. 892, Michell 1996. p. 441, Costi 2003, p. 70 and Loan 2005, p. 272) when these matters are examined: HRC, Pierre Giry v. Dominican Republic, Communication No. 193/1985 (20 July 1990), UN Doc. CCPR/C/39/D/193/1985 (1990), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/undocs/session39/193-1985.html. In this case, the author of the complaint, the French citizen Pierre Giry, stated that he stayed for two days in the Dominican Republic and then went to the airport to buy a ticket to Saint-Barthélemy (ibid., para. 3.1). On the airport, however, he was taken to a police office, searched and (two hours and forty minutes later) put on a plane bound for Puerto Rico (ibid.). It was there where he was arrested, charged with conspiracy and attempt to smuggle drugs into the US, tried before a US District Court, convicted, sentenced to 28 years' imprisonment and fined $ 250,000 (ibid., paras. 3.1-3.3). (Puerto Rico is US territory with commonwealth status where US federal law applies.) Giry claimed that the Dominican

In Celiberti de Casariego v. Uruguay,[237] Lilian Celiberti de Casariego, a Uruguayan citizen by birth and Italian national, was arrested in Brazil on 12 November 1978 by Uruguayan agents with the connivance of two Brazilian police officials.[238] After a detention of seven days in her apartment, she was driven to the Uruguayan border and forcibly abducted into Uruguayan territory, where she was detained again.[239] The Committee first explained that the ICCPR can have extraterritorial force:

> Article 2 (1) of the Covenant places an obligation upon a State party to respect and to ensure rights "to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction", but it does not imply that the State party concerned cannot be held accountable for violations of rights under the Covenant which its agents commit upon the territory of another State, whether with the acquiescence of the Government of that State or in opposition to it.[240]

After this remark, which confirms the above-mentioned idea that a provision such as Article 9, paragraph 1 should have extraterritorial force so as to avoid a legal vacuum for the male captus victim and which should hence be welcomed, the HRC concluded that Uruguay had violated, among other things, "article 9 (1), because the

---

Republic had violated, among other things, Artt. 9 and 13 (see n. 193) of the ICCPR (ibid., para. 2). The Committee, limiting itself to an examination of Art. 13 (ibid., para. 5.4), found that there was indeed a violation and stated: "The Committee notes that, while the State party has specifically invoked the exception based on reasons of national security for the decision to force him to board a plane destined for the jurisdiction of the United States of America, it was the author's very intention to leave the Dominican Republic at his own volition for another destination. In spite of several invitations to do so, the State party has not furnished the text of the decision to remove the author from Dominican territory or shown that the decision to do so was reached "in accordance with law" as required under article 13 of the Covenant. Furthermore, it is evident that the author was not afforded an opportunity, in the circumstances of the extradition, to submit the reasons against his expulsion or to have his case reviewed by the competent authority." (Ibid., para. 5.5.) Four members of the Committee, in an individual opinion (available at: http://www.unhchr.ch/tbs/doc.nsf/0/1c06d841819e0385c1256acb00449e95?Opendocument), noted that it was not Art. 13, but Artt. 9 and 12 (right to liberty of movement) of the ICCPR that should have been looked at. With respect to the most important article here, Art. 9, the four members stated: "In the present case, the Dominican Republic was not able to produce or refer to any administrative act ordering the expulsion or extradition of Mr. Giry before or after his arrest at the airport. Had there been an administrative act, even an irregular one, this might have been a case of expulsion falling within the scope of article 13. In the absence of such an act, identifiable, inter alia, by its date, by the authority taking the decision and by its nature, it appears to the signatories that the arrest of Mr. Giry and his enforced boarding of an Eastern Airlines flight when he wished to travel to Saint-Barthélemy constitute unlawful and arbitrary arrest within the meaning of article 9, paragraph 1, of the Covenant." This case could be seen as evidence that the HRC is of the opinion that male captus cases which do not qualify as proper abductions may nevertheless violate Art. 9, para. 1 of the ICCPR.

[237] HRC, Lilian Celiberti de Casariego v. Uruguay, Communication No. R.13/56 (29 July 1981), UN Doc. Supp. No. 40 (A/36/40) at 185 (1981), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/undocs/session36/13-56.htm.

[238] Ibid., para. 9.

[239] Ibid.

[240] Ibid., para. 10.3.

act of abduction into Uruguayan territory constituted an arbitrary arrest and detention."[241]

The second case is also against Uruguay. In Sergio Ruben Lopez Burgos v. Uruguay, the author of the complaint asserted that her husband, the Uruguayan national Lopez Burgos, was kidnapped on 13 July 1976 in Buenos Aires by members of the 'Uruguayan security and intelligence forces' in cooperation with Argentine para-military groups.[242] After two weeks of secret detention in Buenos Aires, he was illegally transported to Uruguay, where he was again secretly detained until his official arrest on 23 October 1976.[243] The Committee agreed with these facts.[244] As in Celiberti de Casariego, the Committee explained that the ICCPR can have extraterritorial force[245] and then concluded that Uruguay had violated, among other things, "article 9 (1), because the act of abduction into Uruguayan territory constituted an arbitrary arrest and detention."[246]

And the third case, which even led to the suspension of diplomatic relations, is also against Uruguay. In María del Carmen Almeida de Quinteros et al*. v. Uruguay*,[247] the Uruguayan national Almeida de Quinteros submitted a communication on her own behalf (not related to the right to liberty and security) and on behalf of her daughter Elena (among other things related to Article 9 of the ICCPR). According to Almeida de Quinteros, Elena was arrested on 24 June 1976.[248] Four days later, she was taken by military personnel to a specific place in Montevideo near the Embassy of Venezuela.[249] Almeida de Quinteros explained: "My daughter would appear to have told her captors that she had a rendezvous at that place with another person whom they wished to arrest."[250]

The following appalling details were then provided by Almeida de Quinteros about her daughter's subsequent kidnapping:

---

[241] Ibid., para. 11.

[242] See HRC, Sergio Ruben Lopez Burgos v. Uruguay, Communication No. R.12/52 (29 July 1981), UN Doc. Supp. No. 40 (A/36/40) at 176 (1981), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/undocs/session36/12-52.htm, para. 2.2.

[243] See ibid., paras. 2.2-2.3.

[244] See ibid., para. 11.2: "As regards the whereabouts of Lopez Burgos between July and October 1976 the Committee requested precise information from the State party on 24 March 1980. In its submission dated 20 October 1980 the State party claimed that it had no information. The Committee notes that the author has made precise allegations with respect to her husband's arrest and detention in Buenos Aires on 13 July 1976 by the Uruguayan security and intelligence forces and that witness testimony submitted by her indicates the involvement of several Uruguayan officers identified by name. The State party has neither refuted these allegations nor adduced any adequate evidence that they have been duly investigated."

[245] See ibid., para. 12.1.

[246] Ibid., para. 13.

[247] HRC, María del Carmen Almeida de Quinteros et al*. v. Uruguay*, Communication No. 107/1981 (21 July 1983), UN Doc. CCPR/C/OP/2 at 138 (1990), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/undocs/newscans/107-1981.html.

[248] See ibid., para. 1.2.

[249] See ibid.

[250] Ibid.

> Believing that Elena was going to denounce someone, her captors brought her near to the Embassy, allowing her freedom of movement so that she could go to the supposed rendezvous. Elena, who had already given thought to the possibility, went into the house next to the Embassy. From there she managed to jump over the dividing wall, thus landing in Venezuelan territory. She shouted "Asylum!" and stated her name and occupation. When they realized what was happening, the policemen escorting her came through the gate giving access to the gardens of the Embassy, without being stopped by the four policemen on guard. When they heard Elena shouting, the Ambassador and his secretary, as well as other officials, ran towards her and were able to see her being beaten and dragged by the hair by the policemen who were trying to remove her by force from Venezuelan territory. The Counsellor of the Embassy, Mr. Frank Becerra, and the Secretary, Baptista Olivares, tried to prevent the woman seeking refuge from being removed from the Embassy garden before she could enter the residence itself. While Elena was being dragged outside, the two diplomats were grappling with the police, grabbing hold of Elena's legs. One of the policemen struck Mr. Becerra, who fell, thus enabling them to take Elena away and put her in a greenish Volkswagen (…). In their anger, the police even went to the inhuman lengths of slamming the car door hard against Elena's legs while she was being bundled into the car, certainly causing a fracture. The car then moved off at high speed, with its doors still open, against the oncoming vehicles and despite the heavy traffic to be found at that hour (…).[251]

Again, the Committee agreed with these facts as Uruguay did not furnish the Committee with satisfactory evidence to the contrary. As a result, the Committee concluded that Uruguay had violated, among other things, Article 9 of the ICCPR.[252]

The last case is Cañón García v. Ecuador.[253] On 22 July 1987, the Colombian citizen Edgar A. Cañón García, together with his wife, travelled to Guayaquil in Ecuador.[254]

> At around 5 p.m. the same day, while walking with his wife in the reception area of the Oro Verde Hotel, they were surrounded by 10 armed men, reportedly Ecuadorian police officers acting on behalf of Interpol and the United States Drug Enforcement Agency (D.E.A.), who forced them into a vehicle waiting in front of the hotel.[255]

After half a day of detention in what appeared to be a private residence, Cañón García was brought to the airport of Guayaquil, "where two individuals, who had participated in his "abduction" the previous day, identified themselves as agents of the D.E.A. and informed him that he would be flown to the United States on the

[251] Ibid., para. 10.3.
[252] See ibid., para. 13.
[253] HRC, Cañón García v. Ecuador, Communication No. 319/1988 (5 November 1991), UN Doc. CCPR/C/43/D/319/1988 at 90 (1991), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/undocs/html/dec319.htm.
[254] See ibid., para. 2.1.
[255] Ibid. 9

basis of an arrest warrant issued against him in 1982."[256] Cañón García's complaint to Ecuador[257] was that "in the light of the existence of a valid extradition treaty between the State party and the United States at the time of his apprehension, he should have been afforded the procedural safeguards provided for in said treaty."[258] In contrast to Uruguay, Ecuador was frank and conceded that things had gone wrong.[259] Notwithstanding this, the Committee concluded that Ecuador had violated, among other things, Article 9 of the ICCPR.

What strikes is that in three of these cases,[260] the State of residence colluded in the operation. Notwithstanding the fact that there was hence consent from the State of residence and thus no problem from a classical (inter-State) international law point of view, the HRC still found that an abduction had taken place and that this abduction violated modern (human rights) international law. As a result, "[t]he Committee reinforced the customary international law rule prohibiting forcible abduction and transplanted the rule into the human rights context, protecting individuals qua individuals."[261]

2.2.3 Article 5, paragraph 1 of the ECHR

Like Article 9, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR, Article 5, paragraph 1 of the ECHR requires that a deprivation of liberty must be in accordance with the law. Comparable with the ICCPR context is that this requirement has both a substantive aspect – related to the grounds of the deprivation – and a procedural aspect, in that

[256] Ibid., para. 2.2.

[257] With respect to the role of the US authorities, the Committee "observed that several of the author's allegations appeared to be directed against the authorities of the United States, and deemed the relevant parts of the communication inadmissible, since the United States had not ratified, or acceded to, the Covenant or the Optional Protocol." (Ibid., para. 5.1.)

[258] Ibid., para. 3.

[259] See ibid., para. 4.1: "Since it is the basic policy of the Ecuadorian Government to monitor the application of and respect for human rights, especially by the law enforcement authorities, a thorough and meticulous investigation of the act has been conducted which has led to the conclusion that there were indeed administrative and procedural irregularities in the expulsion of the Colombian citizen, a fact which the Government deplores and has undertaken to investigate in order to punish the persons responsible for this situation and to prevent the recurrence of similar cases in the country."

[260] Namely in Celiberti de Casariego v. Uruguay, Sergio Ruben Lopez Burgos v. Uruguay and Cañón García v. Ecuador.

[261] Michell 1996, p. 442. See also Loan 2005, p. 282: "The right to be free from abduction exists independently of whether there is also a breach of the host-state's sovereignty. To make a breach of an individual's rights dependant on there first being a breach of state sovereignty is to effectively limit the scope of the right to being no more than a derivative of a state's right to territorial inviolability. If the prohibition of arbitrary detention is to be an effective human right it must also be available to protect an individual in situations where the host-state consents to their abduction. This approach is endorsed by Harry Blackmun, a dissenting Supreme Court Justice in United States v. Alvarez-Machain, who commented, "even [with] the consent of the foreign sovereign, [kidnaping] a foreign national flagrantly violates peremptory human rights norms." [See also n. 434 and accompanying text, ChP.] Such a view recognizes that the rights of an abducted individual will be affected in the same manner whether the host-state is complicit in the abduction or not [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

certain procedures must be followed.[262] In this context, the ECHR, again just like the ICCPR, essentially refers back to national law.[263] Hence, it is clear that both rights are almost identical. Nevertheless, there are some differences. For example, the ECHR, in contrast to the ICCPR, does not contain an explicit prohibition of arbitrariness. However, notwithstanding this, Trechsel claims that the ECHR still offers more protection than the ICCPR.[264] This is, according to him, because in paragraph 1 of Article 5 ECHR, one can find an exhaustive list mentioning the only possible exceptions to the right of liberty ("No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases"). Conversely, the ICCPR is more open and states in paragraph 1 of Article 9 that "[n]o one shall be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds (…) as are established by law."[265] In addition to this, the prohibition of arbitrariness has already been explicitly mentioned in case law as a purpose of Article 5, paragraph 1 which, of course, must be complied with:

> [T]he "lawfulness" of detention under domestic law is not always the decisive element. The Court must in addition be satisfied that detention during the period under consideration was compatible with the purpose of Article 5 § 1 of the Convention, which is to prevent persons from being deprived of their liberty in an arbitrary fashion. The Court must moreover ascertain whether domestic law itself is in conformity with the Convention, including the general principles expressed or implied therein (...).[266]

---

[262] See Trechsel 2005, p. 406.
[263] See ibid., p. 420.
[264] See ibid., p. 407. Cf. also n. 195.
[265] See, however, Marcoux, Jr. (1982, pp. 371-372) for another view: "By its limitationist approach, the European Convention provides a substantially lower standard of protection than do the Universal Declaration and the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights because the word "lawful" qualifies all the limitations to the right to personal liberty found in Article 5. To the extent, therefore, that "arbitrary" should protect against arbitrary laws, the United Nations prohibitions provide a higher standard or protection than does the European Convention [original footnote omitted, ChP]."
[266] ECtHR (Third Section), Case of Stašaitis v. Lithuania, Application No. 47679/99, 'Judgment', 21 March 2002, para. 58 (referring to ECtHR (Third Section), Case of Jėčius v. Lithuania, Application No. 34578/97, 'Judgment', 31 July 2000, para. 56). See also ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Winterwerp v. The Netherlands, Application No. 6301/73, 'Judgment', 24 October 1979, paras. 39 and 45, in which the Court first focused on national substantive and procedural law respectively, law which is in principle to be decided by national authorities (para. 40 and 46), but then stated that "no detention that is arbitrary can ever be regarded as "lawful"." (para. 39) and "the domestic law must itself be in conformity with the Convention, including the general principles expressed or implied therein. The notion underlying the term in question is one of fair and proper procedure, namely that any measure depriving a person of his liberty should issue from and be executed by an appropriate authority and should not be arbitrary." (para. 45) and that that is something the ECtHR can surely look into. See also the already briefly mentioned (see n. 27 and accompanying text) and still further to discuss (see Subsection 2.2.4) decision ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Bozano v. France, Application No. 9120/80, 'Judgment', 18 December 1986, para. 54: "The Convention here refers essentially to national law and establishes the need to apply its rules, but it also requires that any measure depriving the individual of his liberty must be compatible with the purpose of Article 5, namely to protect the individual from arbitrariness [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally the (still-to-discuss, see Subsection 2.2 of Chapter V) 2007 decision in the case Al-Moayad against Germany, para. 78: "The Convention lays down the obligation to conform to the substantive and procedural rules of national law. However, it requires in addition that any

This quotation shows as well that although the focus of this article is on national law, international law, namely the Convention itself, should also be looked at in establishing whether a deprivation of liberty is lawful or not (cf. the ICCPR), see the last sentence of the above-mentioned quotation.[267]

Before turning to the case law of the European institutions related to male captus situations, it can again be argued that also in the context of the ECHR, Article 5 should be able to have extraterritorial force, even though it is admitted that the rights of the Convention are in principle territory-based.[268] As explained already in the context of the ICCPR, in order to ensure that suspects do not become the victim of a legal vacuum, of proceedings that are fragmented over several jurisdictions, the judge reviewing the legality of the arrest and detention should look at the entire deprivation of liberty proceedings, including those preparatory parts abroad which are executed by officials from the State party to the Convention and which made it possible to, ultimately, effectuate the arrest.

2.2.4 Case law from the ECmHR and the ECtHR

What is the ECmHR and ECtHR's position on alleged male captus situations? Are disguised extradition, luring and abduction in violation of Article 5 of the ECHR?

Starting with disguised extradition and recalling the already-mentioned Bozano case (see Subsection 1.3, where it was explained what a disguised extradition in fact entails), the defendant in this case brought applications against the three relevant countries: France,[269] Italy[270] and Switzerland.[271] The application against the deprivation of liberty should be consistent with the purpose of Article 5, namely to protect individuals from arbitrariness". (With reference to, among other things, ECtHR (Third Section), Case of Čonka v. Belgium, Application No. 51564/99, 'Judgment', 5 February 2002, para. 39, cf. also n. 605 of Chapter V, and ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 83, see Subsection 2.2.4.)

---

[267] This point can already be found in the passages from the Winterwerp, Bozano and Al-Moayad cases as can be found in the previous footnote (referring to the Convention), but in (para. 78 of) the Al-Moayad case, the ECtHR stated even more generally: "The Court reiterates that on the question whether detention is "lawful", including whether it complies with "a procedure prescribed by law" within the meaning of Article 5 § 1, the Convention refers back essentially to national law, including rules of public international law applicable in the State concerned".

[268] See ECtHR (Grand Chamber), 'Decision as to the Admissibility of Application No. 52207/99 by Vlastimir and Borka Banković, Živana Stojanović, Mirjana Stoimenovski, Dragana Joksimović and Dragan Suković against Belgium, the Czech Republic, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Spain, Turkey and the United Kingdom', 12 December 2001, para. 61: "The Court is of the view (…) that Article 1 of the Convention ["The High Contracting Parties shall secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in Section I of this Convention.", ChP] must be considered to reflect this ordinary and essentially territorial notion of jurisdiction, other bases of jurisdiction being exceptional and requiring special justification in the particular circumstances of each case".

[269] ECmHR (Plenary), Bozano v/France, Application No. 9990/82, 'Decision of 15 May 1984 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 39, pp. 119-146. The English translation can be found at pp. 133-146.

deporting State, France, was declared admissible with respect to Bozano's complaint concerning the alleged disguised extradition and the ECtHR, in its decision of 18 December 1986, concluded that > the applicant's deprivation of liberty in the night of 26 to 27 October 197[9] was neither 'lawful' within the meaning of Article 5 (1)(f)[[272]] nor compatible with the 'right to security of person'. Depriving Mr. Bozano of his liberty in this way amounted in fact to a disguised form of extradition designed to circumvent the negative ruling of 15 May 1979 by the Indictment Division of the Limoges Court of Appeal, and not to 'detention' necessary in the ordinary course of 'action ... taken with a view to deportation'.[273]

Before further discussing this important decision of the European Court, it may first be good to point out that both the application against Switzerland, the State which extradited Bozano, after his disguised extradition from France, to Italy, and the application against Italy, the State where Bozano was eventually brought to justice, were found inadmissible.[274] The fact that Bozano could be brought to justice in

---

[270] ECmHR (Plenary), Bozano v/Italy, Application No. 9991/82, 'Decision of 12 July 1984 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports. No. 39, pp. 147-157. The English translation can be found at pp. 153-157.

[271] ECmHR (Plenary), Bozano v/Switzerland, Application No. 9009/80, 'Decision of 12 July 1984 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 39, pp. 58-70. The English translation can be found at pp. 65-70; ECmHR (Plenary), Bozano v/Switzerland, Application No. 9009/80, 'Decision of 13 December 1984 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 39, pp. 71-74. The English translation can be found at pp. 73-74.

[272] Which reads: "Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law: (…) the lawful arrest or detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorised entry into the country or of a person against whom action is being taken with a view to deportation or extradition."

[273] ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Bozano v. France, Application No. 9120/80, 'Judgment', 18 December 1986, para. 60. It hereby attached great weight to the findings of the presiding judge of the Paris Tribunal de Grande Instance and of the Limoges Administrative Court. The first stated that "[t]he various events between Bozano's being apprehended and his being handed over to the Swiss police disclose manifest and very serious irregularities (...). Moreover, it is surprising that precisely the Swiss border was chosen as the place of deportation although the Spanish border is nearer Limoges. [See also n. 45, ChP.] Lastly, it may be noted that the courts have not been given an opportunity of making a finding as to the possible infringements of the deportation order issued against him, because as soon as the order was served on him, Bozano was handed over to the Swiss police, despite his protests. The executive thus itself implemented its own decision. It therefore appears that this operation consisted, not in a straightforward expulsion on the basis of the deportation order, but in a prearranged handing over to the Swiss police ..." (Ibid., para. 31.) The Limoges Administrative Court stated: "[I]n reality, the executive sought, not to expel the applicant from French territory, but to hand him over to the Italian authorities via the Swiss authorities, with whom Italy had an extradition agreement; the executive was therefore seeking to circumvent the competent judicial authority's negative ruling which was binding on the French Government; ... the impugned decision was [therefore] an abuse of powers ...". (Ibid., para. 35.)

[274] See Michell 1996, p. 443, n. 307: "Bozano brought an application against Switzerland complaining of his arrest on French territory by Swiss police. (…) The Commission considered the application to be partly admissible and partly inadmissible, but held that Switzerland could not have avoided its treaty obligations to extradite the fugitive to Italy, even if he had been unlawfully deported to Switzerland

Italy, notwithstanding the fact that he had been brought from France to Switzerland via the method of a disguised extradition, could be seen as support for the male captus bene detentus reasoning.[275] Furthermore, the fact that Switzerland could extradite Bozano to Italy, notwithstanding the fact that Bozano was brought from France to Switzerland through a disguised extradition, can be seen as support for a concept which is sometimes referred to as male captus bene deditus: one can extradite a person to a third State (bene deditus), even if that person arrived in the extraditing State in an irregular way (male captus).[276]

Returning to the European Court's decision with respect to France, Van den Wyngaert has qualified this decision as "a great step forward in that it contains the first unequivocal international judicial condemnation of deprivation of liberty for the purposes of disguised extradition [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[277] Nevertheless, others were less enthusiastic. One such was Judge Schermers, who wrote a dissenting opinion to this case. He first noted that "both parties brought convincing arguments before the Commission"[278] and that "[i]n a case of doubt where two interpretations are possible, it is justifiable to give priority to that interpretation that best suits the long term purpose of the Convention."[279] This was, according to him, "that interpretation of the provisions on extradition inside Western Europe that best facilitates co-operation between the legal systems."[280] After having pointed to the fact that in Europe, criminals can easily move from one jurisdiction to another, he stated that this necessarily means that they "should be brought before the courts of the jurisdiction affected with a[s] few formalities as possible."[281]

> It does not serve (…) the unity of Europe or the rule of law for a person to get greater protection when he moves from one national jurisdiction to another than when he stays within one jurisdiction. Special legal protection against extradition may be sound when the extradition is to a foreign country, but for re-extradition within Europe (one could call it intradiction) such protection should not be necessary. (…) [I]t should be normal for a person lawfully convicted in one Western European State from France. (…) Bozano also brought an application against Italy (…). Bozano's allegations that the Italian authorities had corroborated with their counterparts in France and Switzerland to secure his return were deemed to be "manifestly ill-founded.""

---

[275] See also Warbrick 2000, p. 495, writing on Bozano's applications against France and Italy: "[I]t is the case that detention for the purposes of disguised extradition violates the obligations of the detaining State under Article 5(1)(f) but, equally, that the State to which such a person is returned has no Convention obligation not to put him on trial [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., p. 496: "Convention law does not require an automatic abstention from trial of a defendant simply because there were defects in the way in which custody over him was obtained." Cf. also n. 293 and accompanying text and n. 351.

[276] This point will be returned to in Chapter V, for example, in cases like X, Schmidt and Al-Moayad.

[277] Van den Wyngaert 1990, p. 774.

[278] Dissenting Opinion of Judge Schermers to the ECtHR's decision of 18 December 1986 in Bozano, available at 9 European Human Rights Reports 326-327, p. 326.

[279] Ibid.

[280] Ibid.

[281] Ibid.

> to be brought to the prisons of that State from any of the other Western European States without further formalities.[282]

Focusing on this case, Schermers was hence of the opinion that "[t]he factual deprivation of liberty by the French authorities was justified by the need to bring a convicted criminal to prison and, therefore, permitted by Article 5(1)(a)."[283] This view, which clearly favours cooperation over procedural correctness, is arguably too much focused on lex ferenda: one may, of course, be of the opinion that a detention is justified by a certain need, but that does not also mean (see the word "therefore") that the detention is also legally correct (both substantively and procedurally). One can agree with the European Court that not Article 5, paragraph 1 (a), but in fact Article 5, paragraph 1 (f) of the ECHR had to be looked at in this case.[284]

Whatever one may think of this case, it must be repeated (see Subsection 1.3) that it will be quite difficult for a suspect to prove abuse of power (détournement de pouvoir) on the part of the deporting/expelling State. After all, the fact that someone is wanted abroad does not mean that he cannot be deported, even if his extradition is impermissible.[285] However, recalling the different purposes of extradition and [283] Ibid., p. 327. Art. 5, para. 1 (a) of the ECHR reads: "Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law: (…) the lawful detention of a person after conviction by a competent court".

---

[282] Ibid.

[284] See ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Bozano v. France, Application No. 9120/80, 'Judgment', 18 December 1986, para. 53: "The applicant, the Government and the majority of the Commission were of the view that only sub-paragraph (f) applies in the instant case in addition to the first sentence of paragraph 1 and the beginning of the second sentence. The Court shares this view. The issue before it is not the sentence of life imprisonment Mr. Bozano is serving in Italy after his "conviction by [the] competent court" within the meaning of sub-paragraph (a), but the deprivation of liberty he suffered in France during the night of 26 to 27 October 1979. The impugned forcible removal was effected "after" the aforementioned conviction only in a chronological sense. In the context of Article 5 § 1 (a) (art. 5-1-a), however, the preposition "after" denotes a causal link in addition to a succession of events in time; it serves to designate detention "consequent upon" and not merely "subsequent to" the criminal court's decision (…). This was not so in the instant case, since it was not incumbent on the French authorities themselves to execute the judgment delivered by the Genoa Assize Court of Appeal on 22 May 1975 (…). Nor was it for the French authorities to ensure that that judgment was executed, since the Indictment Division of the Limoges Court of Appeal had, by its negative ruling of 15 May 1979 (…), caused the Italian extradition request to be refused. The disputed deprivation of liberty was, consequently, not undergone as part of "action ... with a view to extradition"; rather, it was the means chosen for giving effect to the ministerial [deportation, ChP] order of 17 September 1979, the final stage of "action ... with a view to deportation...". Sub-paragraph (f) therefore applies only in respect of the latter words."

[285] See Van der Wilt 2004, p. 285. Nevertheless, as already stated (see n. 45), it would be easier for a suspect to prove such abuse of power if he is not deported to the most obvious country such as the country whose borders are closest to the place from which the person is deported. In the Bozano case, for example, one can wonder why Bozano was deported to Switzerland and not to Spain (a country closer to Limoges than Switzerland), see also ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Bozano v. France, Application No. 9120/80, 'Judgment', 18 December 1986, para. 25. See also n. 273.

deportation,[286] the suspect should have a chance to prove that his deportation is not used as a tool to remove him from a State – for example because he is endangering the public order and security of his State of residence – but as a tool to bring him to another State because that State is, for example, interested in prosecuting him.

However, the following two cases from the ECmHR and the ECtHR seem to contradict this idea.

The first case is C. v. the Federal Republic of Germany.[287] According to the facts of the case, the applicant, a German citizen, was convicted of criminal offences including insulting the constitution and dissemination of propaganda for unconstitutional organisations and sentenced to nine months' imprisonment. When he fled to Belgium, Germany did not request his extradition because his convictions did not concern extraditable offences under the German-Belgium treaty. On 26 August 1983, he was arrested in Belgium, brought to the German border and handed over to the German police. The applicant claimed that the German authorities had instigated his arrest and unlawful expulsion by the Belgian authorities. However, according to the Court of Appeal of Schleswig-Holstein, which confirmed a regional court's decision, the applicant had not submitted concrete evidence to show this: "The circumstance that the applicant had been expelled to Germany as an undesirable alien was to be seen as a simple fact."[288] When the applicant made a constitutional complaint, a committee of the Constitutional Court decided not to accept it and stated that the Basic Law (the Constitution) did not "prevent the German authorities from asking a foreign State to extradite a convicted person even though there existed no legal obligation for that State to extradite the person in question under an extradition treaty."[289] The applicant subsequently went to Strasbourg and claimed, among other things, that Article 5 of the ECHR had been violated. The Commission first stated > that there existed no rule of international law preventing the German authorities from seeking the applicant's extradition from Belgium despite the fact that the offences for which he had been convicted were not extraditable under the German-Belgian extradition treaty.[290]

Thus, even if Belgium could not extradite him under the German-Belgian extradition treaty, it was up to the Belgian authorities to decide on the basis of national law whether he could nonetheless be extradited in another way.[291] Hence,

---

[286] See n. 24: "Unlike the case where an alien is expelled or deported (…), the motive for the return of a fugitive from justice [by extradition, ChP] is not the maintenance of domestic public order or security, but the furtherance of foreign criminal proceedings." (Stein 1995, p. 327.)

[287] ECmHR (Plenary), C. v/the Federal Republic of Germany, Application No. 10893/84, 'Decision of 2 December 1985 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 45, pp. 198-204.

[288] Ibid., p. 200.

[289] Ibid., p. 201.

[290] Ibid., p. 203.

[291] Ibid.: "In principle, the question whether or not the offences in question were extraditable or whether they were political offences justifying a refusal of extradition was a matter to be judged by the Belgian authorities on the basis of the applicable Belgian law." (Cf. also Subsection 1.2 where it was explained

"[a]s there was no right for the applicant not to be extradited there could be no question in this case of an inadmissible extradition being circumvented by an expulsion procedure."[292] The Commission then distinguished this case from the Bozano case but arguably confirmed the male captus bene detentus/deditus reasoning underlying that case (with respect to the applications against Italy and Switzerland):

> In this respect the case can be clearly distinguished from Application No. 9990/82 v. France, where the courts had already established the inadmissibility of extradition and the authorities nevertheless proceeded to the expulsion of the applicant to a third country obliged under a treaty to extradite him to his home country. As the Commission found, this way of proceeding might raise an issue under Article 5 para. 1 (f) read in conjunction with Article 18 of the Convention as to the lawfulness of the detention of the expelling state (…). However, as the Commission also found in its decisions concerning that applicant's subsequent detention in the third country involved (No. 9009/80 v. Switzerland (...)) and in his home country (No. 9991/82 v. Italy (...)), its lawfulness was not affected by the possible unlawfulness of the actions of the expelling State. Similarly in the present case, the lawfulness of the applicant's detention in the Federal Republic of Germany could not be affected even if his previous detention and expulsion by Belgium might have been unlawful [emphasis added, ChP].[293]

Then, the Commission made the following general statement:

> There is nothing in the Convention to prevent a State from expelling a person to his home country even if criminal proceedings are pending against him in that country or if he has already been convicted in that country. Nor does the Convention prevent cooperation between the States concerned in matters of expulsion, provided that this does not interfere with any specific rights recognised in the Convention.[294]

It is submitted that these last words, namely that the Convention does not prevent cooperation between States in matters of expulsion, are rather strange. After all, the nature of expulsion/deportation has arguably nothing to do with cooperation between two States but only with a unilateral action of one State, namely to remove an unwanted person from its territory. In the context of expulsion/deportation, the destination of the removed person is in principle[295] not relevant (whereas it is, of that a person can be extradited on another basis if extradition on the basis of an extradition treaty is not possible. That would hence not only be the case if there is no extradition treaty at all, but also if the existing extradition treaty does not cover the crime with which the person in question is charged. However, if a treaty would explicitly prohibit extradition for a certain crime, this prohibition can, of course, not be circumvented by extraditing that person on another basis.)

---

[292] Ibid., p. 203.

[293] Ibid.

[294] Ibid.

[295] This may, of course, be different when a domestic law states that the expelled/deported person shall be expelled/deported to the State, for example, of which that person has a passport or of which that person is a citizen/national.

course, in the context of extradition, where a person is removed to a specific location, namely to the State interested in that person); all that matters is that the person is removed from the expelling/deporting State's territory. Although these words may not have the truly 'colluding' meaning as they appear to have (perhaps the words merely refer to the simple cooperative situation that the unilaterally deporting/expelling State informs the State to which the person is being deported/expelled that he is coming), another, more famous, case arguably confirms the above-mentioned conjecture that the European institutions may view deportation and expulsion as means, not so much to remove a person from a State's territory but to bring a person into the power of the authorities of a State which is interested in prosecuting that person.

This is the famous[296] Öcalan case.[297] In this case, the leader of the Workers' Party of Kurdistan (PKK) and one of Turkey's greatest enemies,[298] Abdullah Öcalan, claimed, among other things, that Turkey had violated Article 5 of the ECHR because of his alleged abduction from Kenya. What had happened? On 9 October 1998, Öcalan was expelled from Syria, where he had lived for many years.[299] After a rather complicated trip to several places where the authorities denied his application for political asylum (Greece, Russia, Italy and then back to Russia and Greece), he was taken to Kenya where "[h]e was met at Nairobi Airport by officials from the Greek Embassy and put up at the Greek Ambassador's residence."[300] He also lodged an application for political asylum with this Ambassador, but he never received an answer from him.[301] The Kenyan authorities were obviously not happy with Öcalan's presence, which, according to them, [296] See Künzli 2004, p. 141 (commenting on the (comparable) decision of the ECtHR's Chamber of the First Section, which was referred to the Grand Chamber): "This case has been referred to as 'one of the most significant and high-profile cases ever to come before the European Court' and understandably so. It deals with Turkey's most wanted man, with terrorism, with the death penalty, and with fundamental human rights as laid down in Articles 2, 3, 5, and 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights (…). The case also fits in with a whole series of cases dealing either with the relationship between the fight against terrorism and the rights under the Convention – right to a fair trial, prohibition of arbitrary detention – or with violations of human rights by Turkish officials [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[297] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005.

[298] See ibid., para. 18: "The Turkish courts had issued seven warrants for Mr Öcalan's arrest and a wanted notice ("red notice") had been circulated by Interpol. In each of those documents the applicant was accused of founding an armed gang in order to destroy the territorial integrity of the Turkish State and of instigating various terrorist acts that had resulted in loss of life." The Turkish Court of Cassation, upholding the death penalty imposed by the Ankara State Security Court which tried Öcalan after his arrest, held that "[a]s a result of the acts of violence carried out by the PKK from 1978 until the applicant's arrest (in all, 6,036 armed attacks, 3,071 bomb attacks, 388 armed robberies and 1,046 kidnappings) 4,472 civilians, 3,874 soldiers, 247 police officers and 1,225 village guards had died" (ibid., para. 49) and that "the PKK, founded and led by the applicant, represented a substantial, serious and pressing threat to the country's integrity." (Ibid., para. 50.) (Almost three years after the decision of the Court of Cassation, the Ankara State Security Court commuted Öcalan's death penalty to life imprisonment because of an amendment to Turkey's Constitution, see ibid., para. 51.)

[299] See ibid., para. 14.

[300] Ibid., para. 15.

[301] See ibid.

constituted "a major security risk",[302] and the fact that the Greek authorities had organised this whole operation without informing them.[303]

On the last day of his stay in Kenya, Öcalan was informed by the Greek Ambassador "that he was free to leave for the destination of his choice and that the Netherlands was prepared to accept him."[304] However, things went a little different in practice. When the Kenyan officials went to the Embassy to bring Öcalan to the airport,

> [t]he Greek Ambassador said that he wished to accompany the applicant to the airport in person and a discussion between the Ambassador and the Kenyan officials ensued. In the end, the applicant got into a car driven by a Kenyan official. On the way to the airport the car in which the applicant was travelling left the convoy and, taking a route reserved for security personnel in the international transit area of Nairobi Airport, took him to an aircraft in which Turkish officials were waiting for him. The applicant was then arrested after boarding the aircraft at approximately 8 p.m.[305]

After the domestic proceedings in Turkey,[306] the case went to Strasbourg. There, Öcalan challenged before the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR the decision of the Chamber of the ECtHR of 12 March 2003,[307] in which the judges had held "that his detention by Turkish officials was lawful and that his interception by Kenyan officials and transfer to the Turkish aircraft where Turkish officials were waiting for him could not be regarded as a violation of Kenyan sovereignty or international law."[308] According to Öcalan, "there was prima facie evidence that he had been abducted by the Turkish authorities operating overseas, beyond their jurisdiction, and that it was for the Government to prove that the arrest was not unlawful."[309] Öcalan also stressed, referring to the above-mentioned Bozano case, "the individual's liberty and security from arbitrariness"[310] and argued that "his forced expulsion had amounted to extradition in disguise and had deprived him of all procedural and substantive protection."[311] Because Öcalan used both the concepts of abduction and disguised extradition, his arguments are not very clear. This is because, as was shown earlier, a disguised extradition is mainly a method used by the State in which the suspect is residing and which hence does not lead to a violation of that State's sovereignty whereas in the case of a classical abduction, the

[302] Ibid., para. 16.
[303] See ibid.
[304] Ibid., para. 17.
[305] Ibid.
[306] See n. 298.
[307] ECtHR (First Section), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 March 2003.
[308] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 74.
[309] Ibid.
[310] Ibid., para. 77.
[311] Ibid.

forum State violates the sovereignty of the State of residence.[312] Be that as it may, Öcalan also argued that the 1996 decision of the ECmHR in the Illich Ramirez Sánchez case was not relevant and was thus not to be followed. In this case,[313] whose national case history will be addressed in Subsection 2.2 of Chapter V and in which Ramirez Sánchez[314] also complained of a male captus situation related to the way he was brought from Sudan to France,[315] the Commission, underlining the importance of inter-State cooperation, especially in the context of serious crimes,[316] stated:

> [T]he Convention contains no provisions either concerning the circumstances in which extradition may be granted, or the procedure to be followed before extradition may be granted. It follows that even assuming that the circumstances in which the applicant arrived in France could be described as a disguised extradition, this could not, as such, constitute a breach of the Convention.[317]

Öcalan argued that this case was not to be followed as Sudan and France had cooperated with one another whereas there had been no cooperation between Kenya and Turkey in Öcalan.[318]

Although the above-mentioned quotation seems to run counter to the decision of the European Court in Bozano (where it was, after all, found that the disguised extradition of Bozano from France to Switzerland constituted a violation of Article 5 of the ECHR), it must be remembered that the basis for determining that Bozano's deportation was in fact an extradition in disguise was founded in the law of France, [312] See also n. 21 where it was explained that this case may perhaps also be seen as an informal return.

---

[313] ECmHR (Plenary), Illich Sánchez Ramirez v/France, Application No. 28780/95, 'Decision of 24 June 1996 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 86-B, pp. 155-162.

[314] Note that the European Commission speaks of Sánchez Ramirez whereas Ramirez Sanchéz is more often used, see for example: ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Ramirez Sanchez v. France, Application No. 59450/00, 'Judgment', 4 July 2006 (which involved a decision related to another complaint).

[315] See ECmHR (Plenary), Illich Sánchez Ramirez v/France, Application No. 28780/95, 'Decision of 24 June 1996 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 86-B, p. 156: "He alleged that, while he was staying lawfully in Khartoum, Sudanese police officers had seized, bound, drugged and hooded him and handed him over to French police officers, who had put him, by force, into a French military plane bound for Villacoublay military base".

[316] See ibid., p. 162: "It does not appear to the Commission that any cooperation which occurred in this case between the Sudanese and French authorities involved any factor which could raise problems from the point of view of Article 5 of the Convention, particularly in the field of the fight against terrorism, which frequently necessitates cooperation between States." It can be argued that this is not a very clear sentence as the specifics of this case (the first part of the sentence) are connected to a general statement that cooperation is highly needed in the field of the fight against terrorism (the second part of the sentence). In any case, the fact that the importance of an effective fight against terrorism is stressed may be viewed as evidence for the idea that the seriousness of a suspect's alleged crimes may play a role in the male captus discussion, see also Cazala 2007, pp. 859-860.

[317] ECmHR (Plenary), Illich Sánchez Ramirez v/France, Application No. 28780/95, 'Decision of 24 June 1996 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 86-B, p. 162.

[318] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 78.

a State Party to the Convention over which the Court has jurisdiction.[319] This was not the case in the Ramirez Sánchez decision as Sudan is not a State Party to this treaty. The same can be said of Kenya and that could be a reason for the Court in Öcalan to follow Ramirez Sánchez and not Bozano. (This point will be returned to when discussing the views of the Court itself.)

Alongside these international decisions, Öcalan referred to national male captus male detentus case law such as the to-be-discussed Bennett, Hartley and Toscanino cases[320] and argued > that the arrest procedures that had been followed did not comply with Kenyan law or the rules established by international law, that his arrest amounted to an abduction and that his detention and trial, which were based on that unlawful arrest, had to be regarded as null and void.[321]

---

[319] Cf. also Frowein 1994, p. 180: "In several cases the Commission has decided that where the expelling state was not a member of the Convention it was impossible to argue before the Commission that this state had circumvented extradition proceedings." However, if the 'receiving' State is a party to the European Convention, and if there is prima facie evidence supporting his case, a suspect could perhaps argue that the receiving State colluded in the operation, hereby violating the provisions of the Convention. See also ibid., p. 175: "Where the country from which the applicant was extradited or expelled is a country not bound by the European Convention on Human Rights it can only be argued that accepting him in a country bound by the Convention is in violation of his rights."

[320] Reference was also made to the South African case "[Mohamed] and Dalvie v. The President of the Republic of South Africa and others, (CCT 17/01, 2001 (3) SA 893 CC)", decided by the Constitutional Court of South Africa on 28 May 2001 and available at: http://www.saflii.org/za/cases/ZACC/2001/18.html. In this case, the Constitutional Court decided that the removal of Khalfan Khamis Mohamed, one of the suspects of the bombings of the US Embassy in Dar Es Salaam (Tanzania) in 1998, from South Africa to the US, was unlawful, see para. 69 of that decision: "Here South African government agents acted inconsistently with the Constitution in handing over Mohamed without an assurance that he would not be executed and in relying on consent obtained from a person who was not fully aware of his rights and was moreover deprived of the benefit of legal advice. They also acted inconsistently with statute in unduly accelerating deportation and then despatching Mohamed to a country to which they were not authorised to send him." However, as Mohamed was already transported to the US, the South African judges could not do more than make a declaration that the handing over of Mohamed from South Africa to the US was unlawful and that the American judge now trying the case had to be informed of this declaration as a matter of urgency. (See ibid., para. 74.) In the American case in which this declaration was the subject of proceedings (US District Court, Southern District of New York, United States v. Bin Laden, 23 July 2001, No. S(7) 98 CR 1023 LBS (156 F.Supp.2d 359)), "Mohamed's request that the Court direct the Government to discontinue its capital case against him (…) [was] denied and his request that he be permitted to present the decision of the Constitutional Court of South Africa as a mitigating factor (…) [was] granted". (See ibid., under V. ('Conclusion').) In the end, "[o]n July 10, 2001, after deliberating for approximately two days, the jury informed the Court that they were "unable to reach a unanimous verdict either in favor of a life sentence or in favor of a death sentence, for any of the capital counts" and indicated that they understood "that the consequence of this is that Khalfan Khamis Mohamed will be sentenced to life imprisonment without the possibility of release." (…) There is no way to gauge the significance that the jury attached (…) to the decision of the Constitutional Court during the weighing process." (See ibid., under IV. ('Addendum').)

[321] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 79.

The Turkish Government, in response, argued that Öcalan was arrested by Kenyan authorities and handed over to Turkish authorities in the framework of cooperation between two States confronted by terrorism and that this could not be seen as an extradition in disguise violating the Convention.[322]

The European Court, after having explained that a deprivation of liberty cannot be arbitrary (see the already discussed Bozano case)[323] and that "[a]n arrest made by the authorities of one State on the territory of another State, without the consent of the latter, affects the person concerned's individual rights to security under Article 5 § 1"[324] (see the still-to-discuss Stocké case infra), noted – and this was the point under discussion before this case was presented in this study – that "[t]he Convention does not prevent cooperation between States, within the framework of extradition treaties or in matters of deportation, for the purpose of bringing fugitive offenders to justice, provided that it does not interfere with any specific rights recognised in the Convention [emphasis added, ChP]".[325] As mentioned earlier,[326] this is arguably rather strange as the aim of expulsion/deportation is to remove a person from a State's territory and not to bring that person into the hands of the authorities of a foreign State.[327]

The Court then turned to the fact that in this case, one of the States (Kenya) was not a State Party to the Convention (leading to the observation that possible irregularities in Kenya could not be reviewed by the Court).[328] It explained that

---

[322] See ibid., paras. 81-82.
[323] See ibid., para. 83.
[324] Ibid., para. 85.
[325] Ibid., para. 86. This general statement was also made by the ECmHR in the still-to-discuss Stocké case (which will be examined in a few moments when discussing the method of luring/abduction), see n. 374. See also the report Extradition. European standards. Explanatory notes on the Council of Europe convention and protocols and the minimum standards protecting persons subject to transnational criminal proceedings, Council of Europe, December 2006, p. 104.
[326] See n. 24.
[327] See also Michell 1996, p. 391: "Extradition and deportation are conceptually distinct procedures with different purposes. The purpose of deportation is to expel unwanted immigrants. In theory, a state which deports an individual has no preference as to her destination – it simply wants her to leave. Extradition, by contrast, is concerned with the transfer of an individual to a specific foreign state so that she may be prosecuted there for specified offenses." See, however, Frowein 1994, pp. 181-182: "No problem under the Convention arises where the expulsion procedure is used to bring a person before the judicial authorities of a foreign country if, under the laws of the expelling state, there are proper reasons for expulsion. Those reasons might exist in connection with a generally unlawful entry and stay in the country or criminal or other unlawful behaviour. (…) [T]he notion of disguised extradition (…) should only be seen in the context of the national law concerned. Deportation cannot be used in the cooperation between different national authorities only where national law makes it unlawful. Where, however, such deportation is fully in line with domestic law, no reason exists to [compel] states only to use a formalized extradition procedure [emphasis added, ChP]."
[328] See ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 90: "Irrespective of whether the arrest amounts to a violation of the law of the State in which the fugitive has taken refuge – a question which only falls to be examined by the Court if the host State is a party to the Convention – the Court …". See on this point also the report Extradition. European standards. Explanatory notes on the Council of Europe convention and protocols and the minimum standards protecting persons subject to transnational criminal proceedings, Council of Europe, December 2006, pp. 112-113 (see n. 388).

> [a]s regards extradition arrangements between States when one is a party to the Convention and the other not, the rules established by an extradition treaty or, in the absence of any such treaty, the cooperation between the States concerned are also relevant factors to be taken into account for determining whether the arrest that has led to the subsequent complaint to the Court was lawful.[329] The fact that a fugitive has been handed over as a result of cooperation between States does not in itself make the arrest unlawful or, therefore, give rise to any problem under Article 5 (…).[330]

Before commenting on this remark by the European Court, it is worth briefly discussing the case to which the judges, among other things, refer here, namely the Barbie (or Altmann) decision. After the national proceedings in France (which will be discussed in Subsection 2.2 of Chapter V), Barbie filed a complaint with the ECmHR,[331] claiming to have been the victim of a disguised extradition in violation of Article 5 of the ECHR.[332]

First, the Commission made the general statement (comparable with the one made in the Ramirez Sánchez case, see footnote 317 and accompanying text)

> that the Convention contains no provisions either on the condition under which extradition may be granted or on the procedure to be applied before the extradition may be granted. It follows that, even if the applicant's expulsion could be described as a disguised extradition, this would not, as such, constitute a breach of the Convention.[333]

However, the Commission also noted that the question nevertheless arose "of whether any concerted action between the two Governments, or the fact that he was expelled rather than extradited, would constitute grounds for considering the applicant's imprisonment after he was handed over to the French authorities as illegal."[334] After having referred to the Winterwerp jurisprudence of the ECtHR (see footnote 266), namely that the lawfulness of a person's detention is essentially a reference to domestic law, in the first place to be decided by national authorities, but that the European institutions should also check whether the detention is in

---

[329] It must be noted that "[t]he Convention contains no provisions concerning the circumstances in which extradition may be granted, or the procedure to be followed before extradition may be granted." (ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 89.) See also the report Extradition. European standards. Explanatory notes on the Council of Europe convention and protocols and the minimum standards protecting persons subject to transnational criminal proceedings, Council of Europe, December 2006, p. 105.

[330] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 87.

[331] See ECmHR (Plenary), Klaus Altmann (Barbie) v/France, Application No. 10689/83, 'Decision of 4 July 1984 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 37, pp. 225-235. (The English translation of this decision can be found at pp. 230-235.)

[332] In the application, it is even said that Barbie complained "that his arrest in Bolivia and his subsequent transfer from Bolivia to French [Guiana], were effected under an illegal procedure for which the French authorities were responsible. He considers that he was virtually kidnapped on the initiative of the French Government with the complicity of the Bolivian authorities." (Ibid., p. 232.)

[333] Ibid., p. 233.

[334] Ibid., p. 234.

conformity with the prohibition of arbitrariness,[335] the Commission turned to the facts of this case and concluded, without any real motivation, that > it forms no part of its task to examine whether the Court of Cassation correctly interpreted the French law in this case in arriving at the conclusion that the applicant's detention complied with this law. In the context of the Commission's examination, it is sufficient to state that the Court of Cassation did not apply the law in an arbitrary manner and that there is no other ground for concluding that the detention had not been ordered "in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law", or that it was not "lawful", within the meaning of Article 5 (1) (c) of the Convention.[336]

As a result, the application was declared inadmissible.[337] The case's legacy within the context of the European human rights dimension will be discussed at the end of this subsection.

Returning to the Öcalan case and the remark by the ECtHR that "[t]he fact that a fugitive has been handed over as a result of cooperation between States does not in itself make the arrest unlawful or, therefore, give rise to any problem under Article 5", the Court further clarified that in the context of cooperation, even an atypical extradition could not as such be seen as being contrary to the Convention, "provided that the legal basis for the order for the fugitive's arrest is an arrest warrant issued by the authorities of the fugitive's State of origin".[338] This quotation, of course, very much resembles the excerpts already presented in the context of the Ramirez Sánchez and Barbie cases mentioned supra,[339] although the words "atypical extradition" are probably better chosen than the words "disguised extradition".[340] These observations were clearly inspired by the following 'Schermers'-like argument (see the discussion of the Bozano case) made by the Court, which stressed the importance of cooperation in the fight against crime:

> Inherent in the whole of the Convention is a search for a fair balance between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. As movement about the world becomes easier and crime takes on a larger international dimension, it is increasingly in the interest of all nations that suspected offenders who flee abroad should be brought to justice. Conversely, the establishment of safe havens for fugitives would

[335] See ibid.
[336] Ibid., p. 235.
[337] See ibid.
[338] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 89. See also the report Extradition. European standards. Explanatory notes on the Council of Europe convention and protocols and the minimum standards protecting persons subject to transnational criminal proceedings, Council of Europe, December 2006, p. 107.
[339] See ns. 317 and 333 and accompanying text.
[340] Note that the Chamber of the First Section of the ECtHR (before the case was referred to the Grand Chamber) used the expression "extradition in disguise", see ECtHR (First Section), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 March 2003, para. 91.

> not only result in danger for the State obliged to harbour the protected person but also tend to undermine the foundations of extradition (…).[341]

After having explained these general principles, the Court considered the facts of this specific case and noted first that the Convention was applicable to Turkey, even though Turkish officials had operated outside their territory[342] – this point was already argued in the final words of Subsection 2.2.3. It then turned to the question as to whether the arrest was lawful under Turkish law. With respect to the substantive element of lawfulness, it noted that, among other things, the seven Turkish warrants for Öcalan's arrest ensured that "his arrest and detention complied with orders that had been issued by the Turkish courts "for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence"".[343] The Court then turned to the procedural element of lawfulness and stated that it had to find out > whether the applicant's interception in Kenya immediately before he was handed over to Turkish officials on board the aircraft at Nairobi Airport was the result of acts by Turkish officials that violated Kenyan sovereignty and international law (as the applicant submitted) or of cooperation between the Turkish and Kenyan authorities in the absence of any extradition treaty between Turkey and Kenya laying down a formal procedure (as the Government submitted).[344]

The Court agreed with the Turkish Government. Important reasons to reach that conclusion were, for example, the fact that "[t]he car in which the applicant was travelling was driven by a Kenyan official, who took him to the aircraft in which

---

[341] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 88. These words were used for the first time in the famous Soering case, see ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Soering v. The United Kingdom, Application No. 14038/88, 7 July 1989, para. 89.

[342] See ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 91: "The Court notes that the applicant was arrested by members of the Turkish security forces inside an aircraft registered in Turkey in the international zone of Nairobi Airport. It is common ground that, directly after being handed over to the Turkish officials by the Kenyan officials, the applicant was under effective Turkish authority and therefore within the "jurisdiction" of that State for the purposes of Article 1 of the Convention, even though in this instance Turkey exercised its authority outside its territory. It is true that the applicant was physically forced to return to Turkey by Turkish officials and was under their authority and control following his arrest and return to Turkey". The Court referred here, among other things, to the Ramirez Sánchez case, where the ECmHR held: "[T]he applicant is essentially complaining about the deprivation of his liberty by the French authorities. According to the applicant, he was taken into the custody of French police officers and deprived of his liberty in a French military aeroplane. If this was indeed the case, from the time of being handed over to those officers, the applicant was effectively under the authority, and therefore the jurisdiction, of France, even if this authority was, in the circumstances, being exercised abroad". (ECmHR (Plenary), Illich Sánchez Ramirez v/France, Application No. 28780/95, 'Decision of 24 June 1996 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 86-B, pp. 161-162.)

[343] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 92.

[344] Ibid., para. 93.

Turkish officials were waiting to arrest him"[345] and the fact that "[t]he Kenyan authorities did not perceive the applicant's arrest by the Turkish officials on board an aircraft at Nairobi Airport as being in any way a violation of Kenyan sovereignty."[346] As a result, the Court found that Öcalan had not proven that "Turkey failed to respect Kenyan sovereignty or to comply with international law in the present case"[347] and hence concluded that his arrest and his detention "were in accordance with "a procedure prescribed by law" for the purposes of Article 5 § 1 of the Convention."[348] The final conclusion was thus that this provision was not violated.[349]

Besides the fact that the Court only mentions[350] and does not address the element of non-arbitrariness here, it still appears strange that the Court concludes that Öcalan's arrest and detention were not only substantively but also procedurally correct under Turkish law, even though the arrest and detention were made in the context of mere cooperation and "in the absence of any extradition treaty between Turkey and Kenya laying down a formal procedure".[351]

---

[345] Ibid., para. 94.

[346] Ibid., para. 95. See also ibid.: "The Kenyan authorities did not lodge any protest with the Turkish Government on these points or claim any redress from Turkey, such as the applicant's return or compensation." This latter point, however, could mean that if Kenya would have protested and would have asked for the return of Öcalan, the Court might have decided that the arrest of Öcalan was unlawful and that he had to be returned to Kenya. See also the report Extradition. European standards. Explanatory notes on the Council of Europe convention and protocols and the minimum standards protecting persons subject to transnational criminal proceedings, Council of Europe, December 2006, p. 108: "This means that in case of a violation of Kenya's sovereignty, the Court would consider a request of return as a logical means of redress. Therefore, the continuity of the inter-state proceedings in Turkey would be impaired; the proceedings would have been enforced against a person, which would not be lawful under the jurisdiction of that state, especially in view of the fact that the return of the person is considered a means of reparation."

[347] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 98. Currie 2007, p. 362, referring to this paragraph and para. 90 of the decision, notes that "the Court confirmed its jurisprudence to the effect that violation of either the sovereignty of the "refuge" state or of an existing extradition or other cooperative arrangement between the two states is required for the arrest to be deemed illegal [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[348] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 99.

[349] Ibid. Hence, if there is no extradition treaty or other formal cooperation regime in force between two States, the handing over of a person does not in itself make the arrest unlawful under Art. 5 of the ECHR. In such circumstances, there are two requirements, namely that the substantive and procedural domestic rules regarding arrest and detention have been followed by the requesting State and furthermore that the requesting State's actions did not violate the sovereignty of the requested State. See the report Extradition. European standards. Explanatory notes on the Council of Europe convention and protocols and the minimum standards protecting persons subject to transnational criminal proceedings, Council of Europe, December 2006, p. 107.

[350] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 83.

[351] See the above-mentioned quotation at n. 344 and accompanying text and n. 21. See also Künzli 2004, p. 147, commenting on the (comparable) decision of the ECtHR's Chamber of the First Section: "[I]t is remarkable that the Court could find a 'procedure described by law' in the absence of an extradition treaty or even an extradition agreement between Turkey and Kenya." (Cf. also De Sanctis 2004, p. 554.) Künzli warns that "[b]y not finding any violation of the Convention in the circumstances leading to the

One can agree with Borelli (who at that time commented on the (comparable) decision of the Chamber of the First Section of the European Court) that there is a clear difference between the HRC and the ECtHR regarding the point to what extent the statal dimension must be taken into account in the process of establishing a human rights violation:

> [W]hile according to the Human Rights Committee the attitude of the state whose territorial sovereignty has been violated is irrelevant, the European Court of Human Rights still seems inclined to consider that the forcible abduction of a fugitive constitutes per se a violation of the rights protected by the Convention only in the case where the authorities of the territorial state do not consent to the abduction, and where the procedures put in place by any existing extradition treaty have not been followed.[352]

It indeed seems bizarre to make a violation of a human right dependent on the 'injured' State's attitude towards the male captus:[353] is it not odd that one cannot arrest and in the arrest itself, the Court left the door open for 'co-operation' between states in order to arrest suspects of crimes by means of extradition in disguise or abduction. With the current fear of terrorism and the development of communication technologies, certain forms of co-operation might seriously endanger individual liberty and security and indeed lead to arbitrary arrest and detention. Herewith the Court apparently adheres to the male captus bene detentus doctrine, notwithstanding efforts to prohibit abduction and even raise this prohibition to the level of peremptory norms of international law [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., p. 148.) See also Trechsel 2005, p. 432 (see n. 388 and accompanying text).

[352] Borelli 2003, p. 807.

[353] See also Künzli 2004, p. 146, (as earlier explained) also commenting on the (comparable) decision of the ECtHR's Chamber of the First Section: "[C]o-operation does not necessarily legitimize the abduction itself. Although it no longer violates the principle of territorial sovereignty and non-intervention, it can still lead to arbitrary detention and arrest, and ultimately result in a denial of justice, since the abducted person is not able to challenge the abduction and to prevent it by legal means. (…) [I]n the present case the European Court did consider the violation of territorial sovereignty in case of abduction, and concluded that Kenya had consented and thereby taken away the illegality, but the Court refrained from judging on abduction in itself as a violation of human rights law, in particular Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Trechsel 2005, p. 433 (like Borelli and Künzli commenting on the (comparable) decision of the ECtHR's Chamber of the First Section): "[I]t is not quite convincing that the respect of the applicant's rights under Article 5 of the Convention should depend on the question whether the sovereignty of Kenya has been respected. Kidnapping suspects abroad cannot be compatible with the rule of law." See also Clapham 2003, pp. 478-479 (like Borelli, Künzli and Trechsel also commenting on the (comparable) decision of the ECtHR's Chamber of the First Section): "While the Court's reasoning with regard to the possible violation of Kenyan sovereignty seems incontrovertible, one may ask why the Court, in determining the legality of the detention, only looks at the possible violation of sovereignty by Turkey, and not the possible violation of human rights by the Kenyan authorities. (…) It is true that the Court cannot determine the legality of the arrest in Kenya under the law of Kenya or indeed under the ECHR; but the Court could try to determine whether the detention is in conformity with international human rights law. If a European state knowingly received a detainee subsequent to an illegal arrest procedure, in international law, that European state in assisting, abetting, facilitating or benefiting from a violation of international law such complicity would normally incur responsibility in general international law [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]." Although one can agree with Clapham that the Court focuses too much on the issue of State sovereignty here, one can wonder whether Clapham's test regarding State responsibility is not too broad. In his article (see ibid., p. 479, n. 8), Clapham refers to Art. 16 of the speak of a human rights violation if the suspect has clearly been the victim of a male captus, only because the 'injured' State – for whatever dubious reasons – has consented to the operation?[354] Furthermore, this also creates the situation that comparable male captus cases can lead to different outcomes, something which is, of course, to be avoided from the point of view of legal certainty.[355]

Whether the European human rights bodies were of the opinion that the other two techniques, namely luring and abduction, violate Article 5 of the ECHR was addressed in the Stocké luring case.[356] In this case, Walter Stocké, a German citizen, was held in custody because he was suspected of tax offences.[357] He was provisionally released, but when the Ludwigshafen District Court found that he had not complied with the conditions of this release, his redetention was ordered.[358] At that moment, in November 1977, Stocké fled to Switzerland and from there to Strasbourg in France.[359] In 1978, a certain Köster, a police informer who himself was the subject of criminal proceedings, offered Hoff, a police officer, his assistance in finding Stocké because he knew a certain Werner, a former colleague of

---

DARS which states that "[a] State which aids or assists another State in the commission of an internationally wrongful act by the latter is internationally responsible for doing so if: (a) that State does so with knowledge of the circumstances of the internationally wrongful act; and (b) the act would be internationally wrongful if committed by that State." (Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 65.) The commentary to this article even mentions, as an example of conduct falling under this article, "facilitating the abduction of persons on foreign soil". (Ibid., p. 66.) However, this would seem to require active assistance in the conduct, see ibid.: "Article 16 limits the scope of the responsibility for aid or assistance in three ways. First, the relevant State organ or agency providing aid or assistance must be aware of the circumstances making the conduct of the assisted State internationally wrongful; secondly, the aid or assistance must be given with a view to facilitating the commission of that act, and must actually do so; and thirdly, the completed act must be such that it would have been wrongful had it been committed by the assisting State itself." Hence, merely benefiting from a violation of international would not seem to fall under this article.

[354] Cf. also Mowbray 2003, p. 317 (like Borelli, Künzli, Trechsel and Clapham also commenting on the (comparable) decision of the ECtHR's Chamber of the First Section): "The judgment of the Chamber displayed a united resolve to support States in their legitimate attempts to bring suspected offenders, who have fled to another country, back to face trial in the territory where their alleged crimes occurred. (…) [T]he Chamber determined that extra-territorial actions taken in a non-member State by a party to the Convention would violate the fugitive's right to liberty (Article 5) if they were proven, beyond reasonable doubt, to have infringed the sovereignty of the host State and thereby contravened international law. This approach allows member States considerable latitude in devising and applying strategies to secure the return of wanted suspects." Cf. also the warning of Künzli mentioned in n. 351.

[355] See the report Extradition. European standards. Explanatory notes on the Council of Europe convention and protocols and the minimum standards protecting persons subject to transnational criminal proceedings, Council of Europe, December 2006, p. 109: "The breach of sovereignty may impair the arrest and detention of the individual, but the motion of the state, where he or she was previously located, proves the existence of a breach. It may be noted that in this way uncertainty is created in the exercise of the individual's right."

[356] ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Stocké v. Germany, Application No. 11755/85, 'Judgment', 19 March 1991.

[357] See ibid., para. 9.

[358] See ibid.

[359] See ibid.

Stocké.[360] At a meeting with Hoff's superiors, the prosecutor in charge of Stocké's investigation told Köster that although his department did not have the funds to reward individuals helping the police, his assistance might play a role at his own trial.[361] It was emphasised, however, "that any action had to be lawful and designed either to discover the applicant's whereabouts abroad, for the purpose of extradition proceedings,[362] or to induce him to return to the Federal Republic of Germany of his own accord".[363] Köster introduced Hoff to Werner to talk about a business proposal but it was decided to meet again in Luxembourg because Hoff wished to talk to Stocké in person.[364] The 'Luxembourg' plan failed, however, and a new meeting was set up in Strasbourg. It was there that Köster, Werner and Stocké met on 7 November 1978. Köster told Werner and Stocké that the other parties had not been able to make it to Strasbourg but were waiting in Luxembourg for them and that he had chartered a plane to get there.[365] Köster secretly asked one of the two pilots to touch down at Saarbrücken (Germany) and it was there that Stocké was arrested by the German police.[366]

The ECmHR stated that the applicant's arrest was effected on the basis of a valid warrant of arrest and was as such justified under Article 5, paragraph 1 (c) of the ECHR.[367] However, the Commission also (and arguably correctly) looked at the pre-arrest phase.[368] It stated that the words "within their jurisdiction" from Article 1 of the ECHR, which stipulates that "[t]he High Contracting Parties shall secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in Section I of this Convention [namely Articles 2-18, ChP]" are not limited to the territory of the State Party.[369] It "extends to all persons under its actual authority and responsibility, whether this authority is exercised on its own territory or abroad."[370] These words,

[360] See ibid., paras. 10-11.
[361] See ibid., para. 11.
[362] In November 1977, an international request for the location of Stocké's whereabouts was issued, but this had not led to any results. (See ibid., para. 9.) After Köster become involved in the case, "the Kaiserslautern public prosecutor's office had renewed the international request for the location of Mr Stocké's whereabouts (…) for the purpose of seeking his extradition from France." (Ibid., para. 16.)
[363] Ibid. para. 11.
[364] See ibid., para. 12.
[365] See ibid., para. 18.
[366] That this case involved a luring operation was assumed from the outset, see ECmHR (Plenary), Walter Stock[é] against the Federal Republic of Germany, Application No. 11755/85, Report of the Commission (Adopted on 12 October 1989), para. 173: "The Commission, like the parties, starts from the assumption that K [Köster, ChP] tricked the applicant into boarding an aeroplane allegedly destined for Luxembourg, whereas K had arranged for a landing at Saarbrücken-Ensheim airport [emphasis added, ChP]." The parties even referred to the term abduction so now and then, see ibid., paras. 183-185.
[367] See ibid., para. 164.
[368] See ibid., para. 165: "However, the lawfulness of the applicant's deprivation of liberty must also be established in the light of the events resulting in this act, namely the alleged activities of German authorities before the arrest of the applicant who was resident in France."
[369] See ibid., para. 166. See also ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Loizidou v. Turkey (Preliminary Objections), Application No. 15318/89, 'Judgment', 23 March 1995, para. 62.
[370] ECmHR (Plenary), Walter Stock[é] against the Federal Republic of Germany, Application No. 11755/85, Report of the Commission (Adopted on 12 October 1989), para. 166.

which are a reminder of the above-mentioned communications of the HRC (see Subsection 2.2.2) and of the ECtHR's decision in Öcalan (see footnote 342 and accompanying text), are, of course, to be welcomed because they avoid the legal gaps in which victims of male captus situations can fall if such a situation takes place in several legal systems. The Commission then clarified that "a person, who is on the territory of a High Contracting Party may only be arrested according to the law of that State."[371] Conversely,

> [a]n arrest made by the authorities of one State on the territory of another State, without the prior consent of the State concerned, does not, therefore, only involve the State responsibility vis-à-vis the other State, but also affects that person's individual right to security under Article 5 para. 1.[372]

This statement, which is reminiscent of the one made in the Öcalan case (see footnote 324 and accompanying text), clearly spells out that the more serious technique of abduction violates Article 5 of the ECHR, but says nothing of the technique of luring, where the arrest is not made on the territory of another State. Nevertheless, in its determination of what the effect of the involvement of a private police informer would be on the responsibility of the prosecuting State, the Commission stated more generally:

> In the case of collusion between State authorities, i.e. any State official irrespective of his hierarchical position, and a private individual for the purpose of returning against his will a person living abroad, without consent of his State of residence, to its territory where he is prosecuted, the High Contracting Party concerned incurs responsibility for the acts of the private individual who de facto acts on its behalf. The Commission considers that such circumstances may render this person's arrest and detention unlawful within the meaning of Article 5 para. 1 of the Convention [emphasis added, ChP].[373]

---

[371] Ibid., para. 167.

[372] Ibid. To an extent, the ECmHR decoupled this right from the classical (inter-State) international law context when it continued stating: "The question whether or not the other State claims reparation for violation of its rights under international law is not relevant for the individual right under the Convention." (Ibid.) See also Michell 1996, p. 445. However, one must not forget either that the ECmHR still demands a statal element for a human rights violation to materialise, namely that there was no prior consent of the injured State. (An element which was lacking in the context of the HRC case law, where violations were established, even when the injured State cooperated in the male captus.)

[373] ECmHR (Plenary), Walter Stock[é] against the Federal Republic of Germany, Application No. 11755/85, Report of the Commission (Adopted on 12 October 1989), para. 168.

Thus, according to the Commission,[374] merely (colluding for the purpose of) returning against his will a person living abroad, without the consent of his State of residence, to the territory of a High Contracting Party where the latter State can prosecute that person (this is arguably broader than the technique of abduction where the person is actually arrested on the territory of the State of residence) can also entail the responsibility of the prosecuting State and can also lead to an unlawful arrest/detention within the meaning of Article 5 of the ECHR.

The question now is, of course, whether a luring operation can be seen as an operation against the will of the person. It is clear that this is a difficult matter,[375] but at first sight, it appears not to be an operation against the will of the person. Recall in that respect the facts of the Yunis and Stocké cases. It is true that the defendants were lied to so that they could be apprehended. It is also true that they would never have agreed to board the motor boat and the aeroplane respectively if they had known that this would lead to their arrest. Nevertheless, even if they were tricked, they boarded the boat and aeroplane voluntarily and not against their will. It is important to distinguish this situation from an abduction where a person is, for example, held at gun-point and summoned to board a boat or aeroplane. One could argue that in that case also, a person is not physically dragged into the boat or aeroplane and hence makes a 'voluntary' move. However, the quotation marks say enough: this person, even though he enters the boat or aeroplane by himself, does not act voluntarily but under duress, for example, because he does not want to experience the possible physical injuries of his refusal to enter the boat or aeroplane. This is clearly different from a normal luring operation as, in the abduction situation, the person does not want to follow his abductors but does it anyway because he fears the consequences of his refusal, whereas in most situations of luring, a person truly wants to join his (unknown) arresting authorities because he has been tricked and he does not know what he can expect. (Otherwise, he would not have wanted to follow them.) However, as already explained, much will depend on the circumstances. For example, if agents of another State call the suspect and threaten to kill him if he does not come to the luring State, and if the suspect, pressured by these threats, agrees in the end, it can be argued that the suspect's coming to that State was clearly against his will.

Although it can be argued that in this case, Stocké's luring can probably not be seen as being against his will, the Commission appeared to take another view of this matter. In its finding that there was no collusion between the German authorities and the private individual Köster in the luring operation – the main focus of the Commission[376] – it arguably took for granted that the luring operation was in fact a forcible operation, an operation against the will of the suspect.[377] However, even if the operation was indeed against the will of Stocké, and notwithstanding the fact that German officials cooperated with Köster in the phase before the arrest of Stocké,[378] Germany did not collude in the luring operation itself and hence did not violate Article 5 of the ECHR.[379] Nevertheless, if the German authorities had colluded in the luring operation, this would arguably have constituted a violation of this provision.[380]

[374] Which, by the way, continued saying: "The Commission would add that the Convention does not prevent co-operation between States, within the framework of extradition treaties or in matters of deportation, for the purpose of bringing fugitive offenders to justice, provided that it does not interfere with any specific rights recognised in the Convention (…). A problem under Article 5 para. 1 may, however, arise in exceptional circumstances, e.g. if a deportation amounting to a disguised form of extradition is designed to circumvent a domestic court ruling against extradition". (Ibid., para. 169.) (Cf. the holding of the ECtHR in the Öcalan case (also speaking about deportation) and the holding of the ECmHR in the C. v. the Federal Republic of Germany case (speaking about expulsion).)

[375] See Paust et al. 1996, p. 426: "Unlike abduction by force, weapons are not used to get the suspect to the location where the arrest will occur. However, whether tricks can overbear the will of an individual just as much as a gun is a controversial issue."

On appeal, the ECtHR agreed with the Commission that Stocké was lured to Germany by Köster.[381] The Court then noted that French inquiries vis-à-vis the luring operation had not shown that Stocké's boarding of the plane was against his will:

> In a letter of 30 October 1980 the public prosecutor's office in Strasbourg informed the office in Kaiserslautern that it had discontinued the proceedings initiated on the

[376] "In the present case, the Commission has to determine (…) whether there was collusion between the German authorities and K to return the applicant, against his will and without knowledge of the French authorities, to the territory of the Federal Republic of Germany in order to effect his arrest, thereby incurring the responsibility of the Federal Republic of Germany." (ECmHR (Plenary), Walter Stock[é] against the Federal Republic of Germany, Application No. 11755/85, Report of the Commission (Adopted on 12 October 1989), para. 170.)

[377] See not only the previous footnote but also ibid., paras. 178 ("[T]here is no conclusive evidence about an agreement with K concerning the applicant's forced return to the Federal Republic of Germany"), 191 ("[T]he Commission finds that the payment of K's expenses (…) does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that the prosecution authorities had known beforehand about K's plan to return the applicant against his will"), 192 ("The Commission (…) finds that (…) it has not been established that German authorities had known about the applicant's return against his will from France and consented to this plan, and that there was thus a particular collusion in this respect"), 193 ("The Commission has next examined whether the general concept of co-operation between the German prosecution authorities and K in the search for the applicant was such as to cover also the applicant's involuntary return from France") and 197: "It follows that it has not been established that the co-operation between German authorities and K in general also covered the applicant's return against his will from France."

[378] That was certainly the case, see ibid., para. 174: "The Commission finds that the applicant's arrest at Saarbrücken-Ensheim airport was preceded by a close co-operation between German prosecution authorities and the police informer K."

[379] The Commission came to the conclusion "that the facts found do not show that the co-operation between the German prosecution authorities and K also covered unlawful activities abroad such as to return the applicant against his will from France to the Federal Republic of Germany." (Ibid., para. 202.) Another argument by Stocké, namely that his trial was unfair under Art. 6, para. 1 of the ECHR because of the circumstances of his arrest and detention, was also rejected. (Ibid., para. 212.)

[380] See again (see also n. 373 and accompanying text) ibid., para. 168. See also Rayfuse 1993, p. 892: "[T]he Commission was quite clear in its reasons that if involvement on the part of the German authorities has been proved then a violation of the Convention would have been established [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[381] ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Stocké v. Germany, Application No. 11755/85, 'Judgment', 19 March 1991, para. 49: "The Court notes at the outset that the applicant was induced by a trick to board a plane chartered by Mr Köster".

> complaint [lodged by Stocké, alleging false imprisonment, ChP], as no offence has been committed on French soil; the inquiries that had been made had shown that the applicant had boarded the plane of his own free will and not under duress (…).[382]

After having stated that several witnesses examined by the Commission "all denied having known about Mr Köster's plan to bring Mr Stocké back to the Federal Republic of Germany against his will or having agreed to such a plan being carried out",[383] the Court concluded:

> Neither the facts found by the Commission nor the circumstances of the case as a whole established that the cooperation that there had unquestionably been between the German prosecuting authorities and Mr Köster had extended to "unlawful activities abroad such as [returning] the applicant against his will from France to the Federal Republic of Germany".[384]

A number of issues are now clear: there was a luring operation and there was cooperation between the German authorities and Köster. Nevertheless, this cooperation did not extend to unlawful activities abroad such as returning Stocké against his will from France to the Federal Republic of Germany. However, the exact stance of the Court with respect to luring remains obscure because the statement that the cooperation between the German authorities and Köster did not extend to unlawful activities abroad such as returning the applicant against his will from France to the Federal Republic of Germany can be read in two different ways.

The first reading is that Germany did not commit unlawful activities abroad, not because the Germans did not cooperate in the luring operation, but because a luring operation in general cannot be seen as an inter-State return of a person against that person's will. Proof for that reading may be found in the fact that the Court referred to the findings of the French authorities that Stocké had boarded the plane of his own free will. That may mean that the Court, seemingly in contrast to the Commission, is of the opinion that luring a person to another State is not against that person's will and hence can never constitute an unlawful activity, even if German authorities cooperated in it.

The second reading is that the Court concurs with what is arguably the Commission's finding that a luring operation constitutes an inter-State return against the will of the deceived person and hence an unlawful activity.[385] However, because in this case, the German authorities did not cooperate 'enough' in this illegality, it

---

[382] Ibid., para. 50.
[383] Ibid., para. 51.
[384] Ibid. See also ibid., para. 54: "Like the Commission, the Court considers that it has not been established that the cooperation between the German authorities and Mr Köster extended to unlawful activities abroad."
[385] See in that respect also the fact that the Court referred to the denials of the Commission's witnesses that they had known about "Mr Köster's plan to bring Mr Stocké back to the Federal Republic of Germany against his will or having agreed to such a plan being carried out [emphasis added, ChP]". (Ibid., para. 51.)

cannot be concluded that Germany, as a State, committed an unlawful activity.[386] In short, the first reading represents the view that Germany did not commit an unlawful activity because luring in general cannot be seen as an inter-State return of a person against that person's will and the second reading represents the view that Germany did not commit an unlawful activity because it was not involved 'enough' in the luring operation, which nevertheless has to be seen as an inter-State return of a person against that person's will (and hence as an unlawful activity).

One final point has to be made here. The above has shown that whether or not luring can be seen as an unlawful activity in general (the following does not concern the point whether or not it can be seen as an unlawful activity by the State (of Germany)) depends on the question whether it can be seen as a technique of returning a person against his will from one State to another.[387]

That implies that as long as the deceived person boards the plane (Stocké) or boat (Yunis) of his own free will and not under duress, he comes voluntarily to a jurisdiction where the arrest can be executed. In that view, there is nothing wrong with this technique as long as that person arrives voluntarily in the jurisdiction where the arrest is effected.

However, one can wonder whether this view is not too restrictive and does not lead to unfair results: one can also argue that even if a lured person voluntarily enters a jurisdiction, his deprivation of liberty may nevertheless be viewed as violating Article 5 of the ECHR. That may be the case because the operation involves a circumvention of an impossible extradition (and hence cannot be seen as an apprehension "in accordance with such procedure as [is] established by law") or because such an operation may not withstand the test of non-arbitrariness in general.

This may also be the reason why Trechsel writes, referring to this case (and to Öcalan and Barbie): "[D]oes the Convention support the thesis of male captus bene detentus (or judicatus)? It would seem that it does [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[388] Although it must not be forgotten that the Commission/Court in principle

---

[386] Cf. also Rayfuse 1993, p. 892 who states: "[T]he Commission was quite clear in its reasons that if involvement on the part of the German authorities has been proved then a violation of the Convention would have been established. Given its decision with respect to lack of State involvement the Court did not find it necessary to comment on this point. The Commission's reasoning, therefore, still stands [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[387] Recall (see n. 384 and accompanying text) the words: "Neither the facts found by the Commission nor the circumstances of the case as a whole established that the cooperation that there had unquestionably been between the German prosecuting authorities and Mr Köster had extended to "unlawful activities abroad such as [returning] the applicant against his will from France to the Federal Republic of Germany" [emphasis added, ChP]."

[388] Trechsel 2005, p. 432. See also n. 275 (with respect to the Bozano case) and n. 293 and accompanying text (with respect to the case C. v. The Federal Republic of Germany). Cf. also Van den Wyngaert 1990, p. 778 (referring to Barbie): "Neither the European Commission nor the Court has unequivocally condemned the practice based on the maxim male captus, bene detentus [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Künzli 2004, p. 148, referring to the Öcalan case (see also n. 351): "By not finding any violation of the Convention in the circumstances leading to the arrest and in the arrest itself, the Court left the door open for 'co-operation' between states in order to arrest suspects of crimes by means of extradition in disguise or abduction. With the current fear of terrorism and the development of communication technologies, certain forms of co-operation might seriously endanger only focuses on the question of whether certain conduct constitutes a violation of the Convention, and not on the question of whether certain conduct would deprive a court of jurisdiction, it is true that the European institutions, arguably more than the ICCPR's HRC, appear not only to take into account the human rights dimension of a case, but also the other interest by which domestic courts are confronted, namely the importance of bringing suspects to justice. The following, above-mentioned words from the Öcalan case nicely illustrate this: individual liberty and security and indeed lead to arbitrary arrest and detention. Herewith the Court apparently adheres to the male captus bene detentus doctrine, notwithstanding efforts to prohibit abduction and even raise this prohibition to the level of peremptory norms of international law [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally the report Extradition. European standards. Explanatory notes on the Council of Europe convention and protocols and the minimum standards protecting persons subject to transnational criminal proceedings, Council of Europe, December 2006, pp. 112-113: "As regards extradition treaties between states, when both are parties to the European Convention on Human Rights, the issue of "continuity of criminal procedure" is more acute. The Court recently dealt with a case in which a violation of Article 5, paragraphs 2 and 4, arose regarding the extraditing state. However, it mentioned nothing relating to the issue of continuity in the sense of the maxim male captus, male detentus. More specifically, in the Chamaïev judgment, in which the Court had the chance to examine the responsibility of both the extraditing and the receiving states, it did not deal with this specific issue. One could infer from the Court's silence that the responsibility of the extraditing state arises under the respective articles, but the establishment of jurisdiction over the person concerned by the receiving state remains lawful. Following this interpretation, the principle of male captus, bene detentus seems to apply, but there are no straightforward arguments by the Court to support this reasoning unequivocally. On the contrary, given the fact that the procedural rights stipulated in Article 5, paragraphs 2 and 4, of the Convention are an integral part of the extradition procedure concerning the arrest and detention of the individual – even in the absence of a specific treaty between the states parties – in the event that they are not respected by the requested state, the lawfulness of the subsequent detention in the receiving state may be called into question. It would constitute a violation of the law of extradition of the requested state and, therefore, unlawful conduct under the European Convention on Human Rights. Room for this interpretation has been left opened by the Court in the Öcalan judgment, which stated that the question of the violation of the requested state's legislation would be examined only if the latter were a contracting state. There may, therefore, be a violation of Article 5, if the lawful conditions of arrest in the requested state are not complied with. Moreover, the European Convention on Human Rights is not a common multilateral treaty; on the contrary, it creates a space of "European public order" and the obligations created therein are "obligations erga omnes partes". This means that a state's obligations are not only to individuals under their jurisdiction, but also to the community of states that have signed the Convention. The right to inter-state petition itself stems from this particular nature of the Convention. Such a community of obligations would be endangered if gaps were to be left in cases of co-operation between the states parties; it would legitimise breaches of common obligations and at the same time it would undermine the inter-state petition system, in the sense that the receiving state would be estopped from using the inter-state petition scheme in view of its acceptance of an unlawful act by the extraditing state. Additionally, the dictum ex iniuria ius non oritur, which is part of the principle of good faith and refers to the rule of law, which is an inherent principle in the system of the Council of Europe, reinforces the argument of illegality of arrest and detention by the requesting state of a person in breach of international obligations; not only concerning sovereignty issues, but also international human rights commitments stemming from several sources. It, therefore, circumvents the maxim male captus, bene detentus [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

> Inherent in the whole of the Convention is a search for a fair balance between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. As movement about the world

---

> becomes easier and crime takes on a larger international dimension, it is increasingly in the interest of all nations that suspected offenders who flee abroad should be brought to justice. Conversely, the establishment of safe havens for fugitives would not only result in danger for the State obliged to harbour the protected person but also tend to undermine the foundations of extradition (…).[389]

2.2.5 Exception: war or other public emergency

If a State is at war or in another state of public emergency,[390] certain human rights may be curtailed under strict circumstances.[391] See in that respect, for example, Article 4, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR[392] and Article 15, paragraph 1 of the ECHR.[393]

---

[389] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 88. See also n. 341. For criticism with respect to such a balancing exercise in the context of Art. 5 of the ECHR, see De Sanctis 2004, p. 555. (Note that De Sanctis is not focusing here on para. 4 of this article, a crucial provision which will be returned to in this study.)

[390] One could hereby also think of actions taken in self-defence, see Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 74: "Human rights treaties contain derogation provisions for times of public emergency, including actions taken in self-defence."

[391] Note that in principle this does not go for humanitarian law obligations. See in that respect Meron 1989, pp. 215-216: "It is now generally accepted that humanitarian instruments, having been adopted to govern situations of armed conflict, are not subject to derogations on such grounds as public emergency except in the rather narrow context of such provisions as Article 5 of Geneva Convention No. IV ["Where in the territory of a Party to the conflict, the latter is satisfied that an individual protected person is definitely suspected of or engaged in activities hostile to the security of the State, such individual person shall not be entitled to claim such rights and privileges under the present Convention as would, if exercised in the favour of such individual person, be prejudicial to the security of such State. Where in occupied territory an individual protected person is detained as a spy or saboteur, or as a person under definite suspicion of activity hostile to the security of the Occupying Power, such person shall, in those cases where absolute military security so requires, be regarded as having forfeited rights of communication under the present Convention. In each case, such persons shall nevertheless be treated with humanity and, in case of trial, shall not be deprived of the rights of fair and regular trial prescribed by the present Convention. They shall also be granted the full rights and privileges of a protected person under the present Convention at the earliest date consistent with the security of the State or Occupying Power, as the case may be.", ChP] and Article 45(3) of Protocol I ["Any person who has taken part in hostilities, who is not entitled to prisoner-of-war status and who does not benefit from more favourable treatment in accordance with the Fourth Convention shall have the right at all times to the protection of Article 75 of this Protocol. In occupied territory, any such person, unless he is held as a spy, shall also be entitled, notwithstanding Article 5 of the Fourth Convention, to his rights of communication under that Convention.", ChP]. These provisions parallel the limitation clauses of human rights instruments [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[392] "In time of public emergency which threatens the life of the nation and the existence of which is officially proclaimed, the States Parties to the present Covenant may take measures derogating from their obligations under the present Covenant to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation, provided that such measures are not inconsistent with their other obligations under international law and do not involve discrimination solely on the ground of race, colour, sex, language, religion or social origin."

[393] "In time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation any High Contracting Party may take measures derogating from its obligations under this Convention to the extent strictly

This point may also be of relevance to the context of the international criminal tribunals, as many cases and situations considered by these tribunals take place during public emergencies and wars. This does not mean that the judges or prosecutors of these tribunals should be less concerned about certain rights because they are dealing with suspects possibly originating from a State which is in a state of public emergency or war,[394] but it may perhaps influence the legality of certain actions at the national level (on which the international tribunals, in turn, may depend).[395]

Should an illegal arrest by national forces in times of public emergency or war be looked at differently than an illegal arrest effected in times of (relative) peace? This may depend on the question of whether the right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained is a non-derogable human rights provision: although it is true that certain human rights can be curtailed in these harsh contexts, some rights are considered so important that they have a non-derogable status: they have to be respected at all times, even in the case of a public emergency or war.[396]

Which rights are non-derogable and is the right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily one of them?

In that connection, it is worth looking at paragraph 2 of the above-mentioned Articles 4 of the ICCPR and 15 of the ECHR. Article 4, paragraph 2 of the ICCPR states: "No derogation from articles 6,[397] 7,[398] 8 (paragraphs I[399] and 2),[400] required by the exigencies of the situation, provided that such measures are not inconsistent with its other obligations under international law."

---

[394] Cf. also Sluiter 2003 B, p. 938, writing on the conditions of derogation: "These conditions (…) concern the application of human rights within national societies and may not fit easily into the application of human rights by international criminal tribunals." See also ibid., p. 940: "[W]hereas States are permitted to derogate from certain human rights on limited and specific grounds, one can hardly imagine how these grounds could apply to the Tribunals [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally Stapleton 1999, p. 600, writing on the ICTY and ICC: "The concept of derogation, justifications for derogation, and the standards for review applied to derogation all rely on the premise that in a state of emergency a government must maintain the flexibility to deal with a crisis without losing control of the state. In the Decision on the Motion for Protective Measures [this is the criticised Tadić case, see n. 132 of Chapter VI, ChP], the ICTY implied that the fact that a national government can derogate from the rights of the accused in a state of emergency indicates that "these rights are not wholly without qualification." What the Tribunal does not say is that qualification of these rights is strictly limited to situations where national sovereignty is endangered and, even then, derogation is subject to review by international human rights bodies. Obviously, the ICC is not a state, and as such, it does not face the same dangers as a national government and cannot justify derogation [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[395] See also n. 202 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.

[396] Note that in the case of an international armed conflict/non-international (or internal) armed conflict, one must, of course, also look at the specific rules of international humanitarian law, such as the four Geneva Conventions of 1949 and Additional Protocol I of 1977 (international armed conflict) and common Art. 3 to the above-mentioned four Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II of 1977 (non-international/internal armed conflict). For example, and focusing here on an international armed conflict, if combatants of State A capture and detain a combatant of State B (the enemy of State A), then that deprivation of liberty must be executed in accordance with the provisions stemming from the Third Geneva Convention (related to the treatment of prisoners of war). See, for example, Art. 13 of that Convention: "Prisoners of war must at all times be humanely treated."

[397] The right to life. (Note that the following descriptions (from both the International and European treaty) are often summarised.)

11,[401], 15,[402] 16[403] and 18[404] may be made under this provision." The European paragraph states: "No derogation from Article 2,[405] except in respect of deaths resulting from lawful acts of war, or from Articles 3,[406] 4 (paragraph 1)[407] and 7[408] shall be made under this provision."

It thus seems that the right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily, even though it can be seen as having customary international law and general international law status (see Subsection 2.2), is not a non-derogable right and can be curtailed in times of emergency.[409]

And indeed, "[i]n the context of the "war on terror" the United Kingdom has derogated from Article 5 of the ECHR, as it did with regard to Article 9 of the ICCPR."[410]

Notwithstanding this, the HRC, in its General Comment No. 29 ('States of Emergency (Article 4)'), has also clarified:

> In those provisions of the Covenant that are not listed in article 4, paragraph 2, there are elements that in the Committee's opinion cannot be made subject to lawful derogation under article 4. Some illustrative examples are presented below. (...) (b) The prohibitions against taking of hostages, abductions or unacknowledged detention are not subject to derogation. The absolute nature of these prohibitions, even in times of emergency, is justified by their status as norms of general international law [emphasis added, ChP].[411]

---

[398] The right not to be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.
[399] The right not to be held in slavery.
[400] The right not to be held in servitude.
[401] The right not to be imprisoned merely on the ground of inability to fulfil a contractual obligation.
[402] The right not to be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed.
[403] The right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.
[404] The right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion.
[405] The right to life.
[406] The right not to be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.
[407] The right not to be held in slavery or servitude.
[408] The right not to be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed.
[409] See also Rodley 1999, pp. 342-343: "[U]nder the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, articles 9 (...) and 10 (humane treatment) are derogable. The same is true for the articles analogous to Covenant article 9 in the European Convention on Human Rights (article 5) and the American Convention on Human Rights (article 7)."
[410] De Zayas 2005, p. 22. Note, however, that this derogation was later deemed invalid by the House of Lords, see its ruling of 16 December 2004 (Belmarsh prison), see ibid.
[411] HRC's General Comment No. 29: 'States of Emergency (Article 4)' CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.11 of 31 August 2001, para. 13. It is interesting to note that the HRC qualifies the prohibition against abductions as an absolute prohibition, as a norm of general international law, even though there is no general treaty explicitly forbidding abductions as a method to bring a person before justice (see n. 187 and accompanying text).

An interesting document to which reference can be made here is the 1995 Declaration of Turku,[412] which > affirms minimum humanitarian standards which are applicable in all situations, including internal violence, disturbances, tensions, and public emergency, and which cannot be derogated from under any circumstances. These standards must be respected whether or not a state of emergency has been proclaimed.[413]

This declaration lists amongst these standards the prohibition of abduction[414] and also a specific part of the human right to liberty and security, namely the already briefly mentioned[415] right to habeas corpus: the right to challenge the lawfulness of one's detention and to be released if the detention is found to be unlawful, see, for example, Article 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR and Article 5, paragraph 4 of the ECHR (this right will be examined in more detail in Subsection 4.2).[416]

It seems logical to qualify this part of the right to liberty and security as non-derogable. After all, how can the fact that a person cannot challenge the lawfulness of his detention be viewed as "strictly required by the exigencies of the situation" (see footnotes 392 and 393)?

---

[412] Declaration of Minimum Humanitarian Standards, reprinted in Report of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities on its Forty-sixth Session, Commission on Human Rights, 51st Sess., Provisional Agenda Item 19, at 4, UN Doc. E/CN.4/1995/116 (1995) (Declaration of Turku), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/instree/1990b.htm.

[413] Art. 1 of the Declaration of Turku.

[414] Art. 3, para. 2 (d) of the Declaration of Turku.

[415] See n. 42 of Chapter II.

[416] See Art. 4, para. 3 of the Declaration of Turku: "Everyone who is deprived of his or her liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of the detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his or her release ordered if the detention is not lawful.". See also UN Economic and Social Council, UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/1996/19, 18 June 1996, Commission on Human Rights, Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, Forty-eighth session, Item 10 (a) of the provisional agenda: The Administration of Justice and the Human Rights of Detainees: Questions of Human Rights and States of Emergency, Ninth annual report and list of States which, since 1 January 1985, have proclaimed, extended or terminated a state of emergency, presented by Mr Leandro Despouy, Special Rapporteur appointed pursuant to Economic and Social Council resolution 1985/37, para. 13, where it is stated that the remedy of habeas corpus is "a guarantee which is not derogable at any time or under any circumstance". Although Rodley had already indicated that he viewed the general right to liberty and security to fall under general international law (see n. 198), he more explicitly confirms this with respect to the right to habeas corpus, see Rodley 1999, p. 340: "That the Covenant and at least two of the regional human rights conventions have the above elements in common is strong evidence that they express a rule of general international law. These elements may be defined as: (a) the right in criminal cases of a detained person to be brought promptly before a judge and (b) the right of anyone deprived of liberty to challenge the lawfulness of detention and to be released if the detention is found to be unlawful." These words of Rodley were confirmed by Zappalà 2003, p. 68. Cf. also Principle 32, para. 1 of the Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment (UNGA Res. 43/173 of 9 December 1988, available at: http://www2.ohchr.org/english/law/bodyprinciples.htm): "A detained person or his counsel shall be entitled at any time to take proceedings according to domestic law before a judicial or other authority to challenge the lawfulness of his detention in order to obtain his release without delay, if it is unlawful."

In the words of Rodley (writing on prolonged incommunicado detention and denial of the right to challenge the lawfulness of detention):

> [I]t may well be that measures are necessary to prevent an arrested or detained person from pursuing violent conspiracies, or colluding with alleged co-offenders, or warning them of the interest of the authorities; it may even be that administrative internment is not yet beyond the bounds of international law and that it may have a certain preventive utility, but none of this requires that the detained person be barred from all contact with the outside world, legal, medical, and family, or that the detention not be effected according to the terms and procedures established by the law authorizing it [original footnote omitted, ChP].[417]

Rodley explains that cases from the ECtHR "tend to confirm this approach",[418] but more explicit in that respect are the two Advisory Opinions of the IACtHR on this subject. In the first, of 30 January 1987, the Court held, unanimously, "[t]hat (...) the legal remedies guaranteed in Articles 7(6)[[419]] and 25(1)[[420]] of the Convention may not be suspended because they are judicial guarantees essential for the protection of the rights and freedoms whose suspension Article 27(2)[[421]] prohibits."[422] In the [417] Rodley 1999, p. 344. See also Nowak 1993, p. 85, who points to para. 70 of the 'Siracusa Principles' (UN, Economic and Social Council, UN Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, 'Siracusa Principles on the Limitation and Derogation of Provisions in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights', Annex, UN Doc. E/CN.4/1984/4 (1984)), which, among other things, stresses the fundamental importance of habeas corpus: "Although protections against arbitrary arrest and detention (Art. 9) and the right to a fair and public hearing in the determination of a criminal charge (Art. 14) may be subject to legitimate limitations if strictly required by the exigencies of an emergency situation, the denial of certain rights fundamental to human dignity can never be strictly necessary in any conceivable emergency. Respect for these fundamental rights is essential in order to ensure enjoyment of non-derogable rights and to provide an effective remedy against their violation. In particular: (…) (d) where persons are detained without charge the need of their continued detention shall be considered periodically by an independent review tribunal".

[418] Rodley 1999, p. 344. See on this point also De Londras 2007, pp. 253*ff*.

[419] "Anyone who is deprived of his liberty shall be entitled to recourse to a competent court, in order that the court may decide without delay on the lawfulness of his arrest or detention and order his release if the arrest or detention is unlawful. In States Parties whose laws provide that anyone who believes himself to be threatened with deprivation of his liberty is entitled to recourse to a competent court in order that it may decide on the lawfulness of such threat, this remedy may not be restricted or abolished. The interested party or another person in his behalf is entitled to seek these remedies."

[420] "Everyone has the right to simple and prompt recourse, or any other effective recourse, to a competent court or tribunal for protection against acts that violate his fundamental rights recognized by the constitution or laws of the state concerned or by this Convention, even though such violation may have been committed by persons acting in the course of their official duties."

[421] "The foregoing provision does not authorize any suspension of the following articles: Article 3 (Right to Juridical Personality), Article 4 (Right to Life), Article 5 (Right to Humane Treatment), Article 6 (Freedom from Slavery), Article 9 (Freedom from Ex Post Facto Laws), Article 12 (Freedom of Conscience and Religion), Article 17 (Rights of the Family), Article 18 (Right to a Name), Article 19 (Rights of the Child), Article 20 (Right to Nationality), and Article 23 (Right to Participate in Government), or of the judicial guarantees essential for the protection of such rights."

[422] IACtHR, Habeas Corpus in Emergency Situations, 'Advisory Opinion OC-8/87', 30 January 1987, Ser. A., No. 8 (1987), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/b_11_4h.htm, para. 44.

second, of 6 October 1987, the Court confirmed this reasoning, holding unanimously

> [t]hat the "essential" judicial guarantees which are not subject to derogation, according to Article 27(2) of the Convention, include habeas corpus (Art. 7(6)), amparo,[423] and any other effective remedy before judges or competent tribunals (Art. 25(1)), which is designed to guarantee the respect of the rights and freedoms whose suspension is not authorized by the Convention.[424]

Finally, the HRC has also confirmed the importance of habeas corpus in times of emergency. Here, one can refer to paragraph 16 of its above-mentioned General Comment No. 29:

> Safeguards related to derogation, as embodied in article 4 of the Covenant, are based on the principles of legality and the rule of law inherent in the Covenant as a whole. As certain elements of the right to a fair trial are explicitly guaranteed under international humanitarian law during armed conflict, the Committee finds no justification for derogation from these guarantees during other emergency situations. The Committee is of the opinion that the principles of legality and the rule of law require that fundamental requirements of fair trial must be respected during a state of emergency. Only a court of law may try and convict a person for a criminal offence. The presumption of innocence must be respected. In order to protect non-derogable rights, the right to take proceedings before a court to enable the court to decide without delay on the lawfulness of detention, must not be diminished by a State party's decision to derogate from the Covenant [original footnote omitted, ChP].[425]

Now that there is support for the idea that the right to habeas corpus not only has customary international law/general international law status, but can also be seen as non-derogable,[426] that other term often affiliated with non-derogability comes into sight: ius cogens (see also the last footnote). This term stems from Articles 53 and 64[427] of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. The first article reads:

---

[423] See ibid., para. 32: ""[A]mparo," (...) is a simple and prompt remedy designed for the protection of all of the rights recognized by the constitutions and laws of the States Parties and by the Convention."

[424] IACtHR, Judicial Guarantees in States of Emergency, 'Advisory Opinion OC-9/87', 6 October 1987, Ser. A., No. 9 (1987), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/b_11_4i.htm, para. 41 (1).

[425] HRC's General Comment No. 29: 'States of Emergency (Article 4)' CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.11 of 31 August 2001, para. 16.

[426] See also more generally De Londras 2007, pp. 250-251: "[C]ertain rights (including, but not limited to, jus cogens rights) are incapable of derogation. No international covenant expressly deems the right to challenge the lawfulness of detention as one that is non-derogable. That notwithstanding, international institutions have developed a position whereby this right appears to have become accepted as a non-derogable right as a result of both its role in ensuring the Rule of Law and principle of legality, and its fundamentality to the protection of individuals from the violation of their other expressly non-derogable freedoms. Thus, emergencies may justify the introduction of legislation allowing for a longer period of detention without charge, but cannot result in the absolute prohibition of a means to challenge the lawfulness of that detention."

[427] "If a new peremptory norm of general international law emerges, any existing treaty which is in conflict with that norm becomes void and terminates."

> A treaty is void if, at the time of its conclusion, it conflicts with a peremptory norm of general international law. For the purposes of the present Convention, a peremptory norm of general international law is a norm accepted and recognized by the international community of States as a whole as a norm from which no derogation is permitted and which can be modified only be a subsequent norm of general international law having the same character.

Although it thus seems that ius cogens can be equated with non-derogable rights, the latter category is arguably broader than the former: while every norm of ius cogens must be non-derogable (see the above-mentioned provision of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties), not every non-derogable right is ius cogens.[428] Although the right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily can arguably be seen as customary international law/general international law and part of that right as a non-derogable norm, it is unclear whether (parts of) the right to liberty and security can be seen as ius cogens as well, a term which requires not just any norm of general international law as such, but a peremptory norm of general international law. This is because this term has often been reserved for such core norms as the unlawful use of force, genocide, slave trading and piracy,[429] norms which makes one doubt whether (parts of) the right to liberty and security is also included.[430]

Notwithstanding this, the right to liberty and security has also been linked with the term ius cogens, although the exact threshold differs and is thus unclear. Seiderman, for instance, is of the opinion that arbitrary detention can be seen as a

---

[428] See Meron 1986, pp. 15-16: "The relationship between jus cogens and derogability is an interesting one. The principal human rights instruments (the Political Covenant, the American Convention, the European Convention) contain the same hard core of nonderogable rights, yet different lists of nonderogable rights. Rights that are nonderogable under such instruments are not necessarily jus cogens (e.g., the right not to be imprisoned merely on the ground of inability to fulfill a contractual obligation, which is stated in Article 11 of the Political Covenant, or perhaps the more important nonderogable right to participate in government, which is stated in Article 23 of the American Convention) and some of them may not even have attained the status of customary law. Conversely, can a right whose derogation is permitted by a primary international human rights agreement (the Political Covenant) be regarded as jus cogens in light of the statement of the principle of jus cogens in Article 53 of the Vienna Convention (a norm from which no derogation is permitted)?"

[429] See Shaw 2003, p. 117.

[430] See also the Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 85: "Article 53 of the 1969 Vienna Convention requires not merely that the norm in question should meet all the criteria for recognition as a norm of general international law, binding as such, but further that it should be recognized as having a peremptory character by the international community of States as a whole. So far, relatively few peremptory norms have been recognized as such. (...) Those peremptory norms that are clearly accepted and recognized include the prohibitions of aggression, genocide, slavery, racial discrimination, crimes against humanity and torture, and the right to self-determination [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Lamb 2000, p. 202 (writing on "individual rights such as liberty and due process" in the context of the ICTY): "Such due process rights of an accused, while doubtless important, are not of the same non-derogable or indelible character as are jus cogens or peremptory norms of international law [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

peremptory norm.[431] Arbitrary detention is also considered to be ius cogens by the Third Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States, but then only if it is prolonged.[432] Knoops argues more generally that "the right to liberty is recognized as a jus cogens norm"[433] and Blackmun is of the opinion, focusing on one specific male captus situation, that "kidnaping a foreign national flagrantly

[431] See Seiderman 2001, p. 121: "While the identification of jus cogens in the human rights has never approached an international consensus, it is possible to extract a minimum core by reference to analogous non-derogable treaty rights, international criminal law, and judicial and scholarly pronouncements. Thus, safely included among these peremptory norms are: the right to life, including the prohibitions against genocide, summary and extrajudicial executions and the application of the death penalty to juveniles and the prohibitions on torture; cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment; arbitrary detention; disappearances; racial and other forms of discrimination; slavery and the slave trade; and criminal violations of humanitarian law, including crimes against humanity and some war crimes."

[432] See American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third, Foreign Relations Law of the United States, 1987, para. 702 ('Customary International Law of Human Rights'), comment under 'n' ('Customary law of human rights and jus cogens'): "Not all human rights norms are peremptory norms (jus cogens), but those in clauses (a) to (f) of this section are, and an international agreement that violates them is void." Clauses (a) to (f) consist of: (a) genocide, (b) slavery or slave trade, (c) the murder or causing the disappearance of individuals, (d) torture or other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment, (e) prolonged arbitrary detention and (f) systematic racial discrimination. It may be interesting to note that para. 11 ('Human rights law and jus cogens') of the Reporters' Notes to the Restatement also goes into the just-discussed point that, on the one hand, prolonged arbitrary detention is considered ius cogens, but, on the other hand, is not recognised as a non-derogable norm. It explains: "It has been suggested that a human rights norm cannot be deemed jus cogens if it is subject to derogation in time of public emergency; see, for example, Art. 4 of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (...). Nonderogability in emergency and jus cogens are different principles, responding to different concerns, and they are not necessarily congruent. In any event, the rights recognized in clauses (a) to (f) of this section are not subject to derogation in emergency under the Covenant. Article 4 of the Covenant explicitly excludes from derogation the right to life and freedom from slavery and from torture, as well as from racial discrimination. Freedom from arbitrary detention is not included among the nonderogable provisions, but since derogation is permitted only "in time of public emergency which threatens the life of the nation," and only "to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation," detentions that meet those standards presumably would not be arbitrary." Although one can agree with the idea that some derogable provisions can still be ius cogens, the remark that a detention which meets the criteria "in time of public emergency which threatens the life of the nation" and "to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation" would presumably not be arbitrary can be criticised. Meron, for example, counters: "It is suggested that detentions occurring during a time of emergency and that comply with the requirements of Article 4 of the Political Covenant are not arbitrary. (…) But the requirements of Article 4 are addressed primarily to the conditions for the proclamation of an emergency, not the standards governing detention procedures (due process). The notion of arbitrariness must refer to the character of the procedures of detention themselves, rather than only to the legality of the state of emergency under which they are authorized." (Meron 1986, p. 15, n. 62.) Note that although the Restatement was still being drafted when Meron wrote his article, the above-mentioned reasoning of the Restatement is almost the same as in the draft. However, there is one important difference. Meron notes that the draft Restatement suggested that "detentions occurring during a time of emergency and that comply with the requirements of Article 4 of the Political Covenant are not arbitrary" whereas the Draft itself is more hesitant: "detentions that meet those standards presumably would not be arbitrary [emphasis added, ChP]."

[433] Knoops 2003, p. 220. See also Knoops 2002, p. 260: "The protection against forcible abduction and luring may figure as jus cogens arising from these international fundamental human rights norms."

violates peremptory human rights norms."[434] Finally, one could also refer to paragraph 11 of the above-mentioned HRC's General Comment No. 29:

> The enumeration of non-derogable provisions in article 4 is related to, but not identical with, the question whether certain human rights obligations bear the nature of peremptory norms of international law. The proclamation of certain provisions of the Covenant as being of a non-derogable nature, in article 4, paragraph 2, is to be seen partly as recognition of the peremptory nature of some fundamental rights ensured in treaty form in the Covenant (e.g., articles 6 and 7). However, it is apparent that some other provisions of the Covenant were included in the list of non-derogable provisions because it can never become necessary to derogate from these rights during a state of emergency (e.g., articles 11 and 18). Furthermore, the category of peremptory norms extends beyond the list of non-derogable provisions as given in article 4, paragraph 2. States parties may in no circumstances invoke article 4 of the Covenant as justification for acting in violation of humanitarian law or peremptory norms of international law, for instance by taking hostages, by imposing collective punishments, through arbitrary deprivations of liberty or by deviating from fundamental principles of fair trial, including the presumption of innocence [emphasis added, ChP].[435]

Given these mixed views, one may argue that it is perhaps still too early to assert unequivocally that the right to liberty and security has attained ius cogens status, but the fact that this position has nevertheless been supported underlines the importance of this right, a right of which it was already established that it had customary international law/general international law status.

2.3 The rule of law

The rule of law is a rather abstract concept and is differently used in literature and case law. For example, in her article 'Establishing a Rule-of-Law International Criminal Justice System', Bhattacharyya stated that

> [t]he rule of law is traditionally defined by four maxims: (1) freedom from the fear of arbitrary punishment, (2) formal justice, (3) due process of law, and (4) at a

[434] See n. 261. For another opinion, see US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, United States v. Matta-Ballesteros, 1 December 1995, No. 91-50336 (71 F.3d 754), p. 764, n. 5: "Kidnapping (…) does not qualify as a jus cogens norm, such that its commission would be justiciable in our courts even absent a domestic law. Jus cogens norms, which are nonderogable and peremptory, enjoy the highest status within customary international law, are binding on all nations, and can not be preempted by treaty. (…) While Art. 9 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights does state that no one "shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile," (...) kidnapping does not rise to the level of other jus cogens norms, such as torture, murder, genocide, and slavery."

[435] See also Paust 2003 pp. 13-14: "The Human Rights Committee has also recognized that freedom from arbitrary detention is a peremptory norm jus cogens and thus a right of customary, fundamental, and preemptive importance [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

> fundamental level, social existence non sub homine sed sub Deo et lege, that is, "not under men but under God and the law" [original footnote omitted, ChP].[436]

However, in the well-known Bennett case (which will be addressed in detail in Chapter V), Lord Bridge of Harwich wrote that there is > no principle more basic to any proper system of law than the maintenance of the rule of law itself. When it is shown that the law enforcement agency responsible for bringing a prosecution has only been enabled to do so by participation in violations of international law and of the laws of another state in order to secure the presence of the accused within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, I think that respect for the rule of law demands that the court take cognisance of that circumstance.[437]

Therefore, in this book, it will be used as a sort of safety net or residual category to assemble the arguments in male captus cases other than those specifically related to human rights and State sovereignty.

One could think here of the more general idea that the prosecuting authorities must respect (inter)national[438] (procedural) law/due process/fairness in general – such as respect for an applicable extradition treaty – and that the courts should respond in the case of non-compliance to ensure that the integrity of the executive and judicial process is not undermined.[439]

However, notwithstanding this 'delimitation', it is clear that one should not follow the different categories too strictly. After all, they have blurring boundaries; a certain violation can fit both the category of human rights and the more general category of the rule of law.[440]

---

[436] Bhattacharyya 1996, p. 62.

[437] House of Lords, Lord Bridge of Harwich, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 155.

[438] For the international dimension of the rule of law, see also Costi 2003, p. 96: "[T]he rule of law should not be interpreted as being confined solely to domestic boundaries. (…) [T]here is increasing recognition that the rule of law permeates the international sphere."

[439] Cf. also Michell 1996, p. 387: "The rule of law (…) is used in this Article to describe three related concepts. The first is a traditional concern with the prevention of executive unlawfulness under domestic law. Simply put, the courts must be prepared to exercise judicial review to ensure that the domestic executive acts according to the ordinary law of the land. The second strand of the rule of law embodies a concern that the domestic authorities comply with international legal norms. This element of the rule of law is the one most directly connected with the proposal that domestic courts must take more seriously their rule as agents of the international legal system. The third component of the rule of law relates to the concern domestic courts should display in ensuring that the domestic executive does not violate individual human rights, derived as they are from both international and domestic law." See also Choo 1994 B, p. 629: "Central to the decision of the House of Lords was the notion that a criminal court should not be concerned solely with accurate fact-finding or, to put it another way, the determination of the 'truth'. A court also has a duty to protect the moral integrity of the criminal process. The judiciary must – in the words of Lord Griffiths [see also n. 282 of Chapter V and accompanying text, ChP] 'accept a responsibility for the maintenance of the rule of law that embraces a willingness to oversee executive action and to refuse to countenance behaviour that threatens either basic human rights or the rule of law.'"

[440] See the previous footnote. Cf. also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9

Because of its linkage with the other values[441] and its rather vague scope, the rule of law (and possible exceptions to its violation) will not be further addressed in this chapter. Nevertheless, it will definitely be returned to in the remainder of the book.

3 WHO VIOLATES?

3.1 States/State officials

The duty to respect State sovereignty, human rights and the rule of law prima facie address States: it is up to States not to intervene in another State's sovereignty and up to the signatories of human rights treaties, namely States, to respect human rights of individuals under its control. In the previous pages, however, individuals did play a role in the different male captus situations. Recall in that respect, for example, the abduction of Nikolić by the individuals who handed him over to SFOR (see Subsection 1.1) and the roles of Jamal Hamdan and Köster in the luring cases of Yunis and Stocké respectively (see Subsections 1.4 and 2.2.4). This prompts two questions. The first and most controversial one is whether private individuals themselves can violate values such as State sovereignty and human rights (since these are the two clearest categories, the focus will be on them) (see Subsection 3.2) and the second is under which circumstances a State can be held responsible for conduct of private individuals more generally (see Subsection 3.3).

3.2 Private individuals

The question as to whether private individuals themselves can violate values like State sovereignty and human rights is not just some academic exercise. The above-mentioned Nikolić case illustrates this perfectly. In this case, part of the Defence's submissions was summarised by the Trial Chamber as follows:

> that the forcible removal of the Accused from the FRY [by the private individuals prior to the handing over to SFOR, ChP] entailed a breach of both the sovereignty of the FRY and the Accused's individual due process guarantees; and that although such breaches occurred prior to the delivery of the Accused into the custody of SFOR and the Tribunal, these breaches were of such magnitude that even absent the involvement of SFOR or Prosecution, the release of the Accused from the custody of this Tribunal and the dismissal of the indictment against him is the only appropriate remedy [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP].[442]

October 2002, para. 106: "The Defence also argues that the arrest and transfer of the Accused amounts to a violation of internationally recognised human rights and a violation of the fundamental principle of due process of law. (…) As both arguments are closely connected to each other, they will be discussed here together."

[441] See also Van der Wilt 2004, p. 282.

[442] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 25. It must be noted that the reference of the Trial Chamber (to para. 9 of the first Defence motion) is incorrect as that paragraph does not lead to these words. Notwithstanding this, one can indeed argue that the Defence

Thus, the Defence claimed that the kidnapping of Nikolić by the private individuals prior to the moment he was handed over to SFOR constituted not only a breach of the sovereignty of the FRY but also of Nikolić's personal (human) rights.[443] This may seem quite strange at first sight for it is normally believed that only States can violate such values. However, if the judge accepts the view that private individuals can indeed also violate them, then the consequences could be considerable. For example, and using the more specific example of the human right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily, it will be shown infra that one of the remedies in the case of a violation of this human right is release. It is clear that this is potentially a very interesting remedy for a suspect and that the latter will thus try to convince the judge that it is not so important who violated his human right but more the fact that his right was violated and thus that he is entitled to the remedy of release. However, the judge may also be of the opinion that the kidnappers of Nikolić, private individuals, cannot violate such a right and that what is involved here is 'merely' the domestic crime of kidnapping. Smeulers, in her was of the opinion that the acts of the private individuals constituted a violation of the FRY's sovereignty and of Nikolić's rights. With respect to the concept of State sovereignty, see the following words from the first Defence motion: "[T]he assumptive facts must amount to a violation of sovereignty". (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 17 May 2001, para. 11.) This was arguably confirmed in the Defence's second Motion, although it must be admitted that the following quotation is not very clear: "While evidence of direct or material complicity by a state in the abduction of an individual can, it is submitted, raise a legitimate action for the violation of state sovereignty, where the abduction has been perpetrated by private individuals, the law remains unsettled and thus, the remedy for (…) such a breach also remains unresolved." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001, para. 15.) However, taking into account the statement from the first Defence motion, it appears that the Defence is claiming that private individuals can violate the sovereignty of another State, but that it is unclear whether an abduction, executed by private individuals, can raise a legitimate action with respect to this violation. As a result, it is also unclear what kind of remedy for the violation of State sovereignty (the words "for (…) such a breach" also imply that private individuals can violate a State's sovereignty) should be granted. With respect to the concept of human rights, see, for example, the following passage from Nikolić's first Defence motion: "The central argument is that in this case, and any case involving, in effect, kidnapping, the taint of that degree of illegality and breach of fundamental human rights is so pernicious, and the dangers of the appearance of condoning it to any degree so much a hostage to unpredictable consequence and fortune, that a judicial body set up with, inter alios, the objectives of preserving human rights can have no proper option but to make it plain that jurisdiction will not be entertained in such circumstances." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 17 May 2001, para. 11.)

---

[443] Although the words 'human rights' are not explicitly mentioned in this excerpt ('only' the words "individual due process guarantees" are used (which seem to mean however the same)), it is clear that what is meant here is indeed human rights, see the previous footnote.

commentary to the ICTY Trial Chamber's decision in the Nikolić case, for example stated:

> [O]nly if violations can be attributed to State authorities can the infringements on a person's life and liberty be considered human rights violations. Infringements which cannot be attributed to State authorities should be considered ordinary criminal offences and not human rights violations.[444]

In that case (and assuming for a moment that the kidnapping could not be attributed to other entities possibly leading to a violation of the right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily), Nikolić would not be able to invoke the remedy of release as his right was not violated in the first place. Hence, it is clear that this question may have important practical ramifications and thus should be examined in more detail.

3.2.1 Human rights

Before trying to find an answer to the question as to whether private individuals themselves can violate human rights, it should be clearly understood that private individuals not only have international rights (think of all the human rights that can be found in documents such as the ICCPR) but also international duties. The clearest example of the latter idea can, of course, be found in the context of international criminal law.[445]

Now, it is true that human rights law has played and still does play an important role in this specific field of law, but the above-mentioned example of Nikolić's kidnapping (and the question of whether this operation is to be seen as a domestic crime or a human rights violation) has nothing to do with international criminal law but with human rights law in general.

What one should focus on here is whether private individuals can also violate provisions in the field of general human rights law (as can be found in, for example, the ICCPR).

As stated above, it is usually understood that such human rights provisions only operate in the relationship between State and individual (the vertical context) and thus that only States can violate human rights provisions.

This idea is founded on the assumption that the direct cause for the creation of these general human rights treaties (namely WW II in which millions of individuals suffered from mainly State action) implies that only States are their addressees.

---

[444] Smeulers 2007, p. 110. See, however, Michell 1996, pp. 484-485: "Where a fugitive is abducted from one state and brought to another by private individuals acting without the knowledge of the latter state, (…) there may be (…), of course, a possible violation of international human rights law".

[445] See, for example, Cryer et al. 2007, p. 5: "[T]he subject matter of international criminal law, as we use it, deals with the liability of individuals, irrespective of whether or not they are agents of a State. In the definition of the crimes which we take as being constitutive of substantive international criminal law, the status of the perpetrator is irrelevant, with the exception of the crime of aggression [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

In that view, individuals are to be seen as the beneficiaries of the rights mentioned in these documents whereas States, the signatories, have to provide these rights. As a consequence, only States can violate human rights.

The opposite view is that provisions of general human rights law can also operate in the relationship between non-State actors (for example individuals and corporations) and thus that these actors can also violate human rights provisions. This is often referred to as third-party applicability (or Drittwirkung) of human rights.[446]

There are two main arguments which can be used in this context.

The first is a linguistic one. In his article 'The Other Side of Right: Private Duties Under Human Rights Law', Paust claims that many of these human treaties in fact contain language showing that the drafters may not have intended to limit human rights obligations to States:

> [H]uman rights instruments demonstrate the existence of private duties in at least two ways. First, provisions in various instruments explicitly affirm, or at least imply, that individuals can owe duties. Second, rights are generally set forth without any reference to those who owe a corresponding duty and can be understood to impose duties on individuals. Courts that limit the scope of application of human rights instruments by adding limiting words, such as "the state" or "state action," improperly insert terms that the treatymakers did not choose [original footnote omitted, ChP].[447]

To start with the last assertion, it is indeed true that some rights are so generally drafted that the addressees are not very clear and may encompass individuals as well.[448]

With respect to the first assertion, it is also true that some provisions could be read to mean that private individuals can violate them.[449] On the other hand, it must

[446] For more information on this topic, see, for example, Alkema 1988, Van Dijk and Van Hoof 1998, pp. 22-26 and Jägers 2002, pp. 36-44 (writing about human rights obligations for that other well-known non-State actor: the corporation). Note that in this subsection, Drittwirkung is only viewed as horizontal applicability (and not horizontal enforceability) of certain norms. It will not be examined here whether a private individual can enforce a human rights norm against another person. The goal of this subsection is merely to find out whether (certain) human rights norms can be applied in the horizontal context and thus whether a private person can, for example, violate another person's human right to liberty and security. (Cf. Van Dijk and Van Hoof 1998, p. 23.)

[447] Paust 1992, pp. 52-53.

[448] An example from the ICCPR is Art. 8: "No one shall be held in slavery; slavery and the slave-trade in all their forms shall be prohibited." An interesting quote in this respect to which Paust refers comes from Chen('s book An Introduction to Contemporary International Law (1989, p. 215)): "[M]ost [human rights prescriptions] are documented in terms of the right of persons and not in terms of participation in or protection from the state. They are, in the words of the International Court of Justice, obligatio erga omnes (owing by and to all humankind)." (Paust 1992, p. 53, n. 12.)

[449] See, for example, Art. 30 of the UDHR ("Nothing in this Declaration may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person any right to engage in any activity or to perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms set forth herein.") and comparable articles in, for example, the ICCPR (Art. 5, para. 1) and ECHR (Art. 17). Jägers, referring to Van Dijk and Van Hoof, has, however, her doubts with respect to this provision: "This article is intended to protect against the abuse be stated as well that many human rights provisions are formulated in such a way that they are clearly not applicable to the horizontal context. An example is Article 13 of the ICCPR, a provision which deals with the expulsion of a lawfully present alien.[450] It is evident that this article only has a State as its addressee (for only States can expel a person). Here, Drittwirkung is not possible.

The second and probably stronger argument in favour of Drittwirkung has to do with the underlying purpose of these human rights treaties. One could argue that, even if the drafters of these treaties were probably not thinking about horizontal application of their provisions at all, this does not mean that, if one is confronted by an ambiguous provision, one may not take into account the purpose of human rights law when interpreting it. And looking at this purpose, which is arguably not limited to the fact that States should refrain from human rights violations but more that the individual is to be protected against human rights violations in general,[451] one could argue that it does not exclude the possibility of Drittwirkung for the simple reason of the right to complain. Prohibiting any abuse, however, cannot be equated with the general obligation for individuals to respect the rights of others in their private legal relations [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Jägers 2002, p. 44.) Attention may also be paid in this respect to the title of the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man and a passage from the Preamble of the ICCPR: "Realizing that the individual, having duties to other individuals and to the community to which he belongs, is under a responsibility to strive for the promotion and observance of the rights recognized in the present Covenant". Paust writes about these words: "Such private duties and responsibilities cannot be fulfilled if an individual violates the rights of other individuals or groups, and the preamble to the Covenant clearly states that, with respect to human rights, individuals have "duties to other individuals." Thus, at a minimum, an individual must not deny or violate the human rights of others." (Paust 1992, p. 55.)

---

[450] "An alien lawfully in the territory of a State Party to the present Covenant may be expelled therefrom only in pursuance of a decision reached in accordance with law and shall, except where compelling reasons of national security otherwise require, be allowed to submit the reasons against his expulsion and to have his case reviewed by, and be represented for the purpose before, the competent authority or a person or persons especially designated by the competent authority."

[451] The fact that the importance of the statal concept is diminishing in today's world may be additional fuel for this assertion. That the present-day situation can be taken into account when interpreting a (human rights) treaty was confirmed by the ICJ in ICJ, Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) Notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970), 'Advisory Opinion', 21 June 1971, when it wrote about the Covenant of the League of Nations: "Mindful as it is of the primary necessity of interpreting an instrument in accordance with the intentions of the parties at the time of its conclusion, the Court is bound to take into account the fact that the concepts embodied in Article 22 of the Covenant – "the strenuous conditions of the modern world" and "the well-being and development" of the peoples concerned – were not static, but were by definition evolutionary, as also, therefore, was the concept of the "sacred trust". The parties to the Covenant must consequently be deemed to have accepted them as such. That is why, viewing the institutions of 1919, the Court must take into consideration the changes which have occurred in the supervening half-century, and its interpretation cannot remain unaffected by the subsequent development of law, through the Charter of the United Nations and by way of customary law. Moreover, an international instrument has to be interpreted and applied within the framework of the entire legal system prevailing at the time of the interpretation." (Ibid., para. 53.) The word "moreover" shows that such a contemporary interpretation can thus also be used if the international instrument in question does not already contain non-static, evolutionary concepts such as "the modern world" and "development". See also Glashausser 2005, p. 1306 (n. 382).

that it will further enhance respect for human rights.[452] Van Dijk and Van Hoof, writing on the European Convention, state on this matter:

> It is beyond doubt that the problem of Drittwirkung was not taken into account when the Convention was drafted, if it played any part at all in the discussions. One can infer from the formulation of various provisions that they were not written with a view to relations between private parties. On the other hand, the subject-matter regulated by the Convention – the fundamental rights and freedoms – lends itself eminently to Drittwirkung. Precisely on account of the fundamental character of these rights it is difficult to appreciate why they should deserve protection in relation to the public authorities, but not in relation to private parties. It is submitted that it is not very relevant whether the drafters of the Convention had in mind Drittwirkung. Of greater importance is what conclusions may be drawn for the present situation from the principles set forth in the Convention, and specifically in its Preamble.[453]

If one concurs with that view, then one can interpret these provisions broadly, even if they originate from the above-mentioned statal context. In the words of Meron: "[B]road interpretations of rights are necessary for the effective protection of human dignity, which is the goal of human rights law."[454]

Other factors (alongside purpose and language) may also play a role here and it is clear that all these aspects should be looked at if one wants to find out whether a specific provision has Drittwirkung or not.[455]

What if these observations are applied to one of the most important human rights provisions for the context of this book, Article 9 of the ICCPR? Can this provision be violated by private individuals?[456] Whereas paragraphs 2,[457] 3,[458] 4[459] and 5[460] of [452] See also Jägers 2002, p. 51: "It is concluded that, in general, the object and purpose of the International Bill of Rights [the UDHR, the ICCPR and the ICESCR, ChP] is to promote the observance of and respect for human rights not only by States but also by non-State entities".

---

[453] Van Dijk and Van Hoof 1998, pp. 24-25.

[454] Meron 1989, p. 170. See also Alkema 1988, p. 33: "The principle of third-party effect is hardly controversial when human rights are considered as deriving from the law of nature. In that line of thought they are so fundamental and essential that they deserve protection against any encroachment, be it private or public."

[455] See Meron 1989, p. 169: "Whether a particular human right stated in an international human rights instrument must be respected not only by public but also by private actors depends on the interpretation of the provision, i.e. its language, context, purpose, and object."

[456] For an affirmative answer, see ibid., p. 162, where Meron confers Drittwirkung on the right to liberty and security on the basis of the purpose behind human rights law: "Although contemporary human rights law focuses on the duty of governments to respect the human rights of individuals, human rights violations committed by one private person against another (e.g. deprivation of life and liberty or the perpetration of acts of egregious discrimination) cannot be placed outside the ambit of human rights law if that law is ever to gain significant effectiveness [emphasis added, ChP]."

[457] "Anyone who is arrested shall be informed, at the time of arrest, of the reasons for his arrest and shall be promptly informed of any charges against him."

[458] "Anyone arrested or detained on a criminal charge shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release. It shall not be the general rule that persons awaiting trial shall be detained in custody, but release may be subject to guarantees to appear for trial, at any other stage of the judicial proceedings, and, should occasion arise, for execution of the judgement."

this article arguably address States/State organs (and hence cannot be violated by private individuals), paragraph 1 is less clear.

The first paragraph reads: "Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. No one shall be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as are established by law." The first of the three sentences is a general statement and could be addressed to any entity. However, the two other sentences seem to bring in a more statal dimension. That is clear with respect to the last sentence ("except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as are established by law") but one can also wonder whether the second sentence ("[n]o one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention") can be applied to the horizontal context. After all, words like (non-arbitrary) "arrest" and "detention" appear to have a statal connotation. Nowak, for example, explains that if one looks at their ordinary meaning, both arrest and detention "refer only to acts of State officials".[461] That would then also mean that paragraphs 4[462] and 5[463] of Article 9 of the ICCPR only apply to deprivations of liberty effected by State officials, for these paragraphs only speak about arrest and detention. According to Nowak, however, that cannot be right:

> However, this logical-systematic interpretation leads to absurd results, which do not comport with the object and purpose of this provision. In the 3d Committee of the GA, the French delegate mentioned that kidnapping by private persons represented a case of deprivation of liberty that was neither arrest nor detention (…). In other words, should a State law expressly permit cases of kidnapping by private security companies, these would be cases of deprivation of liberty that – even though arbitrary – are expressly allowed by Art. 9 and to which the guarantees under Art. 9(4) and (5) are inapplicable. (…) Even though it may be grammatically, logically and [459] "Anyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings before a court, in order that court may decide without delay on the lawfulness of his detention and order his release if the detention is not lawful."

[460] "Anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention shall have an enforceable right to compensation." Although one could argue that a private person can violate this provision as well, namely when he does not agree to pay compensation if he has unlawfully arrested or detained a person (whether this is possible in the first place will be addressed in a few moments). It seems, however, that this paragraph is far and foremost a procedural right. The word "enforceable" appears to be essential here. A victim of an unlawful arrest or detention (whoever committed it) has not just any right to compensation, it has an enforceable right to compensation, meaning that a victim has the right to go to court and demand that the responsible person will pay him compensation. In this view, para. 5 actually provides for a procedural mechanism. As this mechanism can only be made available by a State, the provision can arguably only be violated by a State (namely if the State does not provide a victim of an unlawful arrest or detention the mechanism to go to court and ask for compensation).

[461] Nowak 2005, p. 219. However, one can also argue that private individuals can also arrest and detain persons under certain circumstances, such as in flagrante delicto. Nevertheless, that would almost never be the case in the relevant case law of this book, in which the suspect is apprehended some time after (and not during the time) he allegedly committed the crimes. Cf. also Lamb 2000, p. 228, n. 218, writing on "citizen's arrest".

[462] See n. 459.

[463] See n. 460.

> systematically correct, such an interpretation is not compatible with the object and purpose of the Covenant in the sense of Art. 31(1) of the VCLT. It thus must be assumed that the narrow majority of 30 States (against 27) that voted in favour of the above-mentioned British motion in the 3d Committee of the GA supported a broad interpretation of the terms "arrest" and "detention" [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP].[464]

Hence, it may be that the words "arrest" and "detention" are the only possible deprivations of liberty according to Article 9 of the ICCPR, but then these words must include all sorts of deprivations of liberty, including kidnappings by private individuals:

> This means that Art. 9 does not recognize any other forms of deprivation of liberty beyond these two cases. Therefore, the holding of minors, mentally ill persons, alcohol or drug addicts or vagrants, as well as deprivation of liberty by private persons, are to be understood as arrest or detention, making the guarantees in paras. 1, 4 and 5 fully applicable. Only paras. 2 and 3 are of limited applicability. Any other interpretation would contradict the comprehensive protection afforded by the right to liberty and security of person in the first sentence of para. 1. The word "arrest" ("arrestation") refers to the act of depriving personal liberty and generally covers the period up to the point where the person is brought before the competent authority. The word "detention" ("détention"), on the other hand, refers to the state of deprivation of liberty, regardless of whether this follows from an arrest (custody, pre-trial detention), a conviction (imprisonment), kidnapping or some other act [first emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP].[465]

Paust chooses a middle position when he writes: "It should also be stressed that although the word "arrest" implies action by State officials, officers, or agents, arbitrary "detention" of individuals in violation of relevant human rights norms could be perpetrated by private actors."[466]

Hence, unfortunately, it is rather difficult to give a definite answer to the question as to whether private individuals can violate a provision such as Article 9 of the ICCPR. Although the first-mentioned remark by Smeulers (namely that private individuals cannot violate human rights) is clear and does not lead to any potential problems related to the correlation between a human rights violation and a violation of domestic criminal law,[467] the above-mentioned information has also shown some arguments why a provision such as Article 9 of the ICCPR could, under certain circumstances, be violated by private individuals as well.

---

[464] Nowak 2005, p. 220.
[465] Ibid., pp. 220-221.
[466] Paust 1993, p. 562, n. 48.
[467] Smeulers argues that a certain infringement is either a human rights violation (if the infringement can be attributed to the State) or a violation of domestic criminal law (if the infringement cannot be attributed to the State). If one believes that it is possible that a private individual violates a human right, then one has to sort out what this means for the domestic crime (which, after all, has not suddenly disappeared).

It appears that there is no clear-cut answer to this question and that much will also depend on one's view of the nature of these kinds of human rights provisions. Maybe both sides can use the above-mentioned information to sharpen their views on this difficult issue.

However, perhaps one does not need to take a certain stance. Focusing on the context of the tribunals now and the example that a suspect is kidnapped by private individuals before being handed over to the tribunal, one could also argue that, even if one is of the opinion that private individuals, in principle, cannot violate a person's right to liberty and security, it seems hard to view that abduction as purely private either. Because the abduction is the reason why the suspect is now standing before his judges, it has gained a certain public dimension, which is, for example, absent in the case of a father kidnapping his children, a situation in which the father has clearly only violated domestic criminal law and not human rights law. Thus, and without maintaining that the tribunal, in the above-mentioned example, has violated the person's right to liberty and security, one could argue that a violation of that person's right to liberty and security has nonetheless occurred, because he was not brought to justice as he should have been. If they want to avoid the above-mentioned and complicated discussion, the judges could also more generally argue that a wrong much akin to a violation of the right to liberty and security has occurred in the context of their case and that that should be taken into account. Before turning to the next subsection, it must be stressed that these observations, of course, do not mean that the judges cannot also take into account the fact that it was private individuals who abducted this person in the context of their case and that that may/should have an influence on the determination of the consequences of such a violation/wrong. This will be further discussed in Section 4.

3.2.2 State sovereignty

Another question, prompted by the earlier presented quotation from the ICTY Nikolić case, see footnote 442 and accompanying text, is whether private individuals can violate a State's sovereignty or whether this violation is 'reserved' for other States only.

Like the above-mentioned idea that human rights can be violated by private individuals, the idea that sovereignty can be violated by them is not uncontroversial either.[468] The standard view appears to be that the sovereignty of States can only be violated by other States. This may already have become clear in Subsection 2.1

[468] See also the doubt expressed by Smeulers: "[O]ne may doubt whether individuals acting on their own initiative can ever violate a State's sovereignty." (Smeulers 2007, p. 108.) Note that Michell, who was of the opinion that an abduction by private individuals could violate human rights (see n. 444), this time agrees with Smeulers that such an abduction would not violate the sovereignty of the 'injured' State, see Michell 1996, pp. 484-485: "Where a fugitive is abducted from one state and brought to another by private individuals acting without the knowledge of the latter state, there is no violation of customary international law. However, there may be a violation of the domestic law of the injured or abducting states, and, of course, a possible violation of international human rights law as well [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

where the internal and external dimension of State sovereignty was discussed and in which it was explained that the internal dimension means that State A is the only one having authority over the territory of State A (meaning, for example, that it does not have to tolerate authority over its territory by State B) and that the external aspect signifies that State A must also respect the sovereignty of other States, meaning that it cannot intervene in the domestic affairs of State B. Likewise, Steinberger notes:

> Sovereignty in the sense of contemporary public international law denotes the basic international legal status of a State that is not subject, within its territorial jurisdiction, to the governmental, executive, legislative, or judicial jurisdiction of a foreign State or to foreign law other than public international law. [469]

Nevertheless, it has also been argued that violations of State sovereignty are not merely 'reserved' for States, but can also be committed by private individuals. Seaman, in his article on bounty hunters,[470] for examples asserts:

> The injury that results from an abduction on foreign soil is one to the sovereignty of the asylum State. This injury will be the same whether committed by a State agent or a bountyhunter. (…) The same injury principle was recognized by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in Villareal v. Hammond. In this case, the court considered the extradition of a bountyhunter who had abducted a person on Mexican soil and returned him to the United States to stand trial for an alleged crime. The court held that the bountyhunter had violated Mexico's sovereignty and found it insignificant that the abductor was not a State agent. The Court recognized that injury to the sovereignty of the asylum State occurs regardless of the actor's status (…) [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[471]

Those in favour of that stance could perhaps use the same broad rationale which was also used in the human rights context: one could assert that the essence of sovereignty is not per se statal, but in essence means that State A has supreme/sovereign power over its territory and that, as a result of this, it more generally does not have to tolerate outside[472] interference in matters which are

---

[469] Steinberger 1987, p. 408.

[470] Note, however, that there is an important public dimension in the nature of the bounty hunter's work as well. See Supernor 2001, p. 232: "In the United States, in order to be released after arrest, most defendants hire a bail bondsman to post a bond with the court. The State then delivers custody of the defendant to the bail bondsman who must return the defendant to the court to receive a refund of his bond. When the State transfers custody of the defendant to the bail bondsman, it also transfers powers to search for and arrest the defendant. To guarantee a defendant's presence in court, bail bondsmen hire bountyhunters who are fully vested with the bail bondsmen's broad powers over the defendant [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[471] Seaman 1985, pp. 408-409. See also ibid., p. 400, n. 35: "Private persons are capable of violating sovereignty."

[472] Note that this does not mean that the kidnappers themselves may not come from the State where the suspect is residing, see n. 444 in Chapter VI. It may very well be that foreign actors use local persons to execute the kidnapping. Nevertheless, the final source of the kidnapping must come from abroad. See essentially that State's prerogative, whether that interference comes from a foreign State or from another foreign entity.[473] A kidnapping could then be seen as an outside interference into the executive prerogative of the State of residence to arrest and extradite a person according to the normal procedures. However, one could also counter this reasoning, arguing that "interference into the executive prerogative of the State of residence to arrest and extradite" implies that the interference itself is also of a public nature. See also in that respect the references in the previous footnotes to Steinberger and Kovac, who write about a certain authority.[474] This would mean that a truly private individual (not one backed up by some foreign authority), who kidnaps a person from another State, cannot violate that State's sovereignty (although his kidnapping can, of course, violate domestic law). In that view, there can only be a violation of State sovereignty if another State (or perhaps another entity with public force such as a tribunal)[475] is responsible for the kidnapping.

However, possibly, one could use the same solution here as presented in the human rights context. Recall in that respect the situation of the father kidnapping his children. If he were to kidnap his children in State B and bring them over to State A (a cross-border abduction), this would not be seen as a violation of State B's sovereignty but merely as a violation of domestic criminal law. However, and again focusing on the context of the tribunals, if private individuals kidnap a person from also Steinberger 1987, p. 397, writing on territorial sovereignty: "[J]urisdiction over a delimited territory to the exclusion of foreign authorities [emphasis added, ChP]."

---

[473] Cf. in that respect also the quite general definition of the term 'sovereignty' as introduced by Jean Bodin's famous book Les Six Livres De La République (1576). In the opening sentence of Book 1, Chapter 8, one can read: "La souveraineté est la puissance absoluë et perpetuelle d'une Republique". (Bodin 1986, p. 179.) ("Sovereignty is the absolute and perpetual power of a commonwealth". (Bodin 1992, p. 1.)) In the Latin translation of Bodin's book (entitled De republica libri sex (1586)) these words were translated as follows: "Maiestas est summa in cives ac subditos legibusque soluta potestas": "Sovereignty is supreme and absolute power over citizens and subjects". (Bodin 1992, p. 1.) See also Friedmann 1967, pp. 573-574: "Bodin, the founder of the modern doctrine of sovereignty, was mainly concerned with securing and consolidating the legislative power of the monarch in France against the rival claims of estates, corporations, and the Church." That would mean that the idea was created in order to enable a State to protect itself from any interference, whether it came from a statal or non-statal entity. (Note that the idea of sovereignty existed already before Bodin's famous book. See Steinberger 1987, p. 399: "The term "sovereign" and similar terms were already used in ancient times by Aristotle to identify the supreme authority within a community".) See further also Kovac 2002, p. 622: "As embodied in customary international law, the term "sovereignty" describes the power of a state to exercise supreme legal authority over all persons and activities within its borders, independent of any other authority [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." Cf. finally Van der Wilt 2004, p. 293, writing that the effort of others – States or private individuals – to exercise coercive criminal law measures within a State's territory constitutes a violation of that State's territorial integrity.

[474] See Steinberger 1987, p. 397, writing on territorial sovereignty: "[J]urisdiction over a delimited territory to the exclusion of foreign authorities [emphasis added, ChP]." See Kovac 2002, p. 622: "As embodied in customary international law, the term "sovereignty" describes the power of a state to exercise supreme legal authority over all persons and activities within its borders, independent of any other authority [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[475] One could also think here of terrorist organisations. (See in that respect also the discussion supra (n. 116) whether acts of terrorists can lead to an armed attack, as a result of which a State can exercise its right of self-defence.)

State B and bring him over to the jurisdiction of the tribunal, the abduction has arguably attained a certain public dimension. This is so even if the main reason for the abduction may have been private, for example, because the individuals were promised financial rewards.[476] Again stressing that this does not necessarily mean that the tribunal is responsible for the violation of State B's sovereignty, the judges could nevertheless argue that a violation of State sovereignty, or, if they want to play it safe, a wrong akin to a violation of State sovereignty, has occurred in the context of their case and that that should be taken into account. Likewise, it must be emphasised that the fact that such a violation/wrong has been perpetrated by private individuals may/should, of course, also be taken into account when determining the consequences of that violation/wrong, cf. the final words of Subsection 3.2.1.

Because this book will soon turn to the aftermath of Eichmann's kidnapping (in the context of explaining the matter of State responsibility for conduct of private individuals), it may be interesting to mention the following words from the Eichmann case, which also touch upon the issues addressed in this subsection.

During the discussions in the UNSC in the aftermath of Eichmann's abduction from Argentina, Israeli Foreign Minister Golda Meir stated, referring to the note of 3 June from the Israeli Ambassador in Argentina, Aryeh Levavi, to the Argentine Foreign Minister, Diogenes Taboada:

> I wish to say we recognize that the persons who took Eichmann from Argentina to Israel broke the laws of Argentina. For this the Israel Government has apologized to the Argentine Government in its note dated 3 June 1960 (…) stating: "If the volunteer group violated Argentine law or interfered with matters within the sovereignty of Argentina, the Government of Israel wishes to express its regret (…) [emphasis added, ChP]."[477]

This statement could be seen as evidence for the assertion that private individuals may indeed also violate a State's sovereignty,[478] but it could also be seen as a mere apology which does not prove anything, especially as it does not say that those volunteers did violate the sovereignty of Argentina, only that the Israeli Government

[476] See ns. 281-283 and accompanying text of Chapter VI (in the context of the Todorović case).

[477] UNSC OR, fifteenth year, 866th meeting, 22 June 1960, UN Doc. S/P.V. 866 (1960), para. 18 (p. 4), quoting from Levavi's note of 3 June.

[478] See also UNSC OR, fifteenth year, 865th meeting, 22 June 1960, UN Doc. S/P.V. 865 (1960), para. 24 (p. 5) where Mr Amadeo from Argentina (also in the aftermath of the Eichmann abduction) explained: "The State must punish and make reparation for violations of territorial sovereignty committed by its nationals abroad, even if they were acting for private reasons. For example, in the case of a girl who was kidnapped by her father, a Mr. His of Swiss nationality, in United States territory at the end of the nineteenth century, the United States Government protested to Switzerland and claimed that the kidnapping of the girl constituted a violation of the territorial sovereignty of the United States and that the United States was entitled to request the return of the child by the Swiss Government. The Swiss Government recognized the justice of the claim [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Although it must be noted that this may provide additional evidence for the idea that private individuals can violate another State's sovereignty, the point that a State must also make reparation for such a violation, not because it adopted or condoned the conduct but merely because it was a national of that State, is rather far-going.

wants to apologise for a possible violation. In addition, and to bring in a more Inspector Morse-like argument, it would not be that strange if the author of the note of 3 June 1960 (the Israeli Ambassador to Argentina, Aryeh Levavi) had been aware of the Mossad operation and hence was aware of the fact that those volunteers were not just private individuals with which the State of Israel had no connection, but were in fact agents of the State of Israel. That could mean that when Levavi wrote this note, he had the following information in the back of his head, namely that Eichmann's kidnappers were in fact agents of the State of Israel and that they had indeed, by kidnapping Eichmann from Buenos Aires, violated the sovereignty of Argentina. That may explain why Levavi did not stop where he, perhaps, should have stopped (namely after the words: "[i]f the volunteer group violated Argentine law" – private individuals can, of course, perfectly well violate the domestic laws of another State)[479] but (accidentally?) continued writing "or interfered with matters within the sovereignty of Argentina" – a violation which, according to many, is reserved for States only.

3.3 States through private individuals

In the previous subsection, the question as to whether private individuals, alongside States, could also violate values such as human rights and State sovereignty was addressed. In this subsection, a less controversial topic will be examined, namely how States can be held responsible for actions of private individuals. Although it is always possible that purely private persons resort to abduction (this may, for example, be the case when (family members of) victims of a suspect of international crimes feel that they must do something to bring that person to justice if the State of residence remains passive), one can assume that there will normally be a State behind those "private individuals". Nevertheless, it is also clear that this will very often be difficult to prove.[480]

[479] It may be interesting to note that Gold Meir herself did stop here, see Subsection 3.3.2 where the deliberations in the UNSC after the Eichmann abduction are discussed.

[480] Cf. also Townsend 1997, p. 661: "An "abducting" state may deny responsibility based on the apparent lack of a legal link between the abductor and the state, but in reality these are acts of de facto agents and attributable to the state. Often, de facto agents of the state abduct persons under the guise of being "volunteers," or private persons acting on their own initiative. Their true factual link to the state, should engage the state's responsibility. If the abductors, however, cover their tracks well enough, proving a factual link between them and the state may be nearly impossible, and the state may elude responsibility. Abductions are a particularly unclear area of state responsibility because of the obscure involvement of states' secret security agencies. The international community unfortunately cannot expect a state to reveal the involvement of its agents or organs safeguarding "national security." The state has a spurious alibi when its secret agents abduct enemies under the cloak of a "purely private" act." Cf. also Nsereko 2008, p. 61.

3.3.1 Draft articles on responsibility of States for internationally wrongful acts (Part I)

The central article of the DARS, Article 1, reads: "Every internationally wrongful act of a State entails the international responsibility of that State." What an internationally wrongful act is can be found in Article 2: "There is an internationally wrongful act of a State when conduct consisting of an action or omission: (a) Is attributable to the State under international law; and (b) Constitutes a breach of an international obligation of the State." Such an international obligation can consist of, for example, the already-mentioned duties to refrain from exercising police authority on a State's territory or the duty to respect the human rights of individuals under the State's control. To establish the international responsibility of the State, it is thus necessary to attribute conduct that violates such international obligations to the State. How conduct can be attributed to the State (and is thus to be seen as an act of State) can be found in Chapter II of the DARS.

The most evident article here is Article 4, which explains that "[t]he conduct of any State organ shall be considered an act of that State under international law". Consequently, acts by, for example, (agents of) the secret service of a State are to be seen as acts of that State.

Nevertheless, under certain conditions, other conduct can be considered an act of State as well. This can include acts of private individuals – see in that respect, for example, Articles 8 (conduct directed or controlled by a State) and 11 (conduct acknowledged and adopted by a State as its own) of the DARS:

> The conduct of a person or group of persons shall be considered an act of a State under international law if the person or group of persons is in fact acting on the instructions of, or under the direction or control of, that State in carrying out the conduct.[481]

> Conduct which is not attributable to a State under the preceding articles shall nevertheless be considered an act of that State under international law if and to the extent that the State acknowledges and adopts the conduct in question as its own.[482]

---

[481] Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 47. See in that respect also the well-known Nicaragua (ICJ) and Tadić (ICTY) cases in which the 'effective control' and the (less strict) 'overall control' test respectively, were addressed, see ICJ, Case Concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), 'Judgment', 27 June 1986, para. 115 and ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Duško Tadić, 'Judgement', Case No. IT-94-1-A, 15 July 1999, para. 145.

[482] Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 52. A famous case in that respect is the Tehran case, which dealt with the seizure of the US Embassy, including its personnel, in Tehran, Iran, by militants. The ICJ stated: "The approval given to these facts by the Ayatollah Khomeini and other organs of the Iranian State, and the decision to perpetuate them, translated continuing occupation of the Embassy and detention of the hostages into acts of that State. The militants, authors of the invasion and jailers of the

Interestingly, but surprisingly, the Eichmann case is used in the ILC's commentary to the latter article to explain the meaning of the words 'acknowledges and adopts the conduct as its own'. This means that the commentary views the kidnapping as an act by private individuals,[483] which, as was shown supra, is not accurate.[484] One should not look at Article 11 here but rather at Article 4 of the DARS.[485]

Notwithstanding this inaccuracy, it is, of course, true that at the time of the affair, it was not clear/admitted yet that State agents of Mossad had kidnapped Eichmann from Argentina. As shown in footnote 477 and accompanying text, the Israeli Ambassador in Argentina, Aryeh Levavi, spoke about a "volunteer group". As promised in footnote 10 of Chapter I (and in the previous subsection), the aftermath of the Eichmann's abduction in Argentina will now be examined in more detail to clarify these issues.

3.3.2 Intermezzo: the Eichmann case revisited

As stated supra, at the time of the capture, it was not clear yet that Israeli agents had kidnapped Eichmann from Argentina.

Nevertheless, that Israel was involved somehow in the operation was soon unveiled: on 23 May 1960, Israeli Prime Minister Ben-Gurion informed the Knesset, the Israeli Parliament, that Eichmann "was found by the Israel Security Services".[486] hostages, had now become agents of the Iranian State for whose acts the State itself was internationally responsible." (ICJ, Case Concerning United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (United States of America v. Iran), 'Judgment', 24 May 1980, para. 74.

---

[483] See Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 53: "[T]he capture and subsequent trial in Israel of Adolf Eichmann may provide an example of the subsequent adoption of private conduct by a State."

[484] There are more errors in this commentary, for example, the fact that the kidnapping took place on 10 May 1960 (this must be: 11 May 1960) and the fact that Eichmann was held in captivity in Buenos Aires for some weeks (see also Fawcett 1964, p. 182) before being flown to Israel. This must be: for a little more than nine days (Eichmann was kidnapped on 11 May 1960, some time after 20:05 (see Harel 1975, pp. 165-166), and the El Al plane carrying Eichmann and the Israeli agents left Buenos Aires on 21 May 1960 at 00:05, see Harel 1975, p. 261. See also Baade 1961, p. 400.

[485] Even if (quod non) the agents had acted ultra vires, beyond their powers, that would not have had any influence on this matter. After all, Art. 7 of the DARS explicitly states: "The conduct of an organ of a State or of a person or entity empowered to exercise elements of the governmental authority shall be considered an act of the State under international law if the organ, person or entity acts in that capacity, even if it exceeds its authority or contravenes instructions." One could, of course, argue that the kidnappers were perhaps agents from the Mossad but not acting in that capacity when seizing Eichmann, but even the website of the Mossad (see n. 3 of Chapter I) is clear on this: the Eichmann kidnapping was performed by the Mossad as such and not by mere Mossad agents acting privately.

[486] UNSC OR, fifteenth year, 868th meeting, 23 June 1960, UN Doc. S/P.V. 868 (1960), para. 11 (p. 3) (where Claude Corea (of Ceylon) quotes Ben-Gurion (from the Israel Digest of 10 June 1960): "I have to inform the Knesset that a short time ago one of the greatest of the Nazi war criminals, Adolf Eichmann, who was responsible together with the Nazi leaders for what they called 'the final solution of the Jewish question', i.e. the extermination of six million of the Jews in Europe, was found by the Israel Security Services"). See also Liskofsky 1961, p. 199: "On the following day, Police Inspector-General Joseph Nahamias, the head of Israel's security service, stated at a news conference that Eichmann had been traced and captured by his agents alone."

In addition, on 27 May 1960, the Israeli newspaper Davar published a letter from Ben-Gurion to Galili, an Israeli politician. Here, one could read the following words:

> In my opinion, the importance of the capture of Adolf Eichmann and his trial in Israel lies not in the extraordinary resource and skill of the staff of the Security Services (though it would be difficult to exaggerate the praise they have earned), but in the privilege – which has been afforded through them – of having the entire story of the holocaust revealed in an Israeli court.[487]

It was, however, not clear by that time where the capture had taken place. When Argentina learned from reports in the media that "volunteer groups" had in fact captured Eichmann from Argentina, the latter's Government asked the Israeli Government for information on this issue.[488]

On 3 June, the Israeli Ambassador to Argentina, Aryeh Levavi, sent a note to Diogenes Taboada, Foreign Minister of Argentina.[489]

Levavi explained that after WW II, "Jewish volunteers, including some Israelis began the search for Eichmann"[490] and that "[a] few months ago, one of these volunteer groups engaged in the search received information that Eichmann was hiding in Argentina".[491]

The volunteers traced him to his home, made contact with him and asked him whether he would be prepared to face justice in Israel.[492]

After Eichmann had agreed to this,[493] "[t]he volunteer group (…) removed Eichmann from Argentina with his full consent and handed him over to the Israel security services."[494]

On 23 May, the security services informed the Israel Government that Eichmann was in their custody.[495]

---

[487] O'Higgins 1961, p. 296.
[488] See 'Letter dated 15 June 1960 from the representative of Argentina to the President of the Security Council', UN Doc. S/4336, para. 1 of the Explanatory Memorandum.
[489] See Note verbale dated 3 June 1960 from the Embassy of Israel in Buenos Aires to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and Religion of the Argentine Republic (in: UN Doc. S/4342: 'Letter dated 21 June 1960 from the representative of Israel to the President of the Security Council').
[490] Ibid., para. 1.
[491] Ibid., para. 3.
[492] See ibid., para. 4.
[493] See ibid. Eichmann's letter goes as follows: "I, the undersigned, Adolf Eichmann, declare of my own free will that, since my true identity has been discovered, I realize that it is futile for me to attempt to go on evading justice. I state that I am prepared to travel to Israel to stand trial in that country before a competent court. I understand that I shall receive legal aid, and I shall endeavour to give a straightforward account of the facts of my last years of service in Germany so that a true picture of the facts may be passed on to future generations. I make this declaration of my own free will. I have been promised nothing, nor have any threats been made against me. I wish at last to achieve inner peace. As I am unable to remember all the details and am confused about certain facts, I ask to be granted assistance in my endeavours to establish the truth by being given access to documents and evidence." (Ibid., para. 6.)
[494] Ibid., para. 5.
[495] See ibid., para. 6.

"Not until later was the Government informed that Eichmann had come from Argentina."[496]

Levavi concluded, referring to the monstrousness of Eichmann:

> If the volunteer group violated Argentine law or interfered with matters within the sovereignty of Argentina, the Government of Israel wishes to express its regret. The Government of Israel requests that the special significance of bringing to trial the man responsible for the murder of millions of persons belonging to the Jewish people be taken into account, and asks that due weight be given to the fact that the volunteers, who were themselves survivors of that massacre, placed this historic mission above all considerations. The Government of Israel is fully confident that the Argentine Government will show understanding of these historical and ethical factors.[497]

This above-mentioned (see Subsection 3.2.2) explanation,[498] including the personal letter written by Ben-Gurion to Argentine President Frondizi on 7 June (in which one can find similar formulations),[499] constituted enough evidence for Argentina to

[496] Ibid.

[497] Ibid., para. 7.

[498] In which one can find the words "interfered with matters within the sovereignty of Argentina" (the possible slip of Levavi's pen, see the end of Subsection 3.2.2), "regret" and "historic mission".

[499] See Letter dated 7 June 1960 from Mr Ben-Gurion, Prime Minister of Israel, to Mr Frondizi, President of Argentina (in: UN Doc. S/4342: 'Letter dated 21 June 1960 from the representative of Israel to the President of the Security Council'): "This man, Eichmann, was the person directly responsible during the years of the Second World War for the execution of Hitler's orders for the "final solution" of the Jewish problem in Europe, i.e., for the physical destruction of any Jew whom the Nazis were able to seize in the vast areas of Europe which they had conquered. Six millions of our people were massacred, and it was Eichmann who organized this mass extermination on a gigantic and unprecedented scale throughout the whole of Europe." (Para. 3.) "It is practically impossible to find anywhere a Jew whose family does not include its victims of the Nazis. Hundreds of thousands of the survivors are living among us, and there are hundreds of Jews in Israel and other countries who had known no peace since the end of the War until the moment when the man who had directed these horrible massacres was found. The aim of their lives was to bring the man responsible for these unparalleled crimes to trial before the Jewish people; and such a trial can take place only here in Israel." (Para. 4.) "I do not underestimate the seriousness of the formal violation of Argentine law committed by those who at last ended their long search with the capture of Eichmann; but I am confident that there can be very few people in the world who have failed to understand the profound motives and the supreme moral justification for this act. This incident cannot be judged solely from a purely formal angle. The obligation of all countries to respect scrupulously the laws of other countries is beyond all doubt; but one cannot, nevertheless, fail to appreciate the lofty motives underlying the imperative moral force by which those who found Eichmann and with his consent brought him to Israel were impelled, or the depth of the feelings which moved them." (Para. 5.) "I am convinced that you will understand the supreme moral force of these aspects of the problem. You yourself fought dictatorship untiringly, and have constantly displayed your profound respect for human values. I am sure that no one will understand better than yourself our true feelings; that you will accept the expression of our most sincere regret for any violation of the laws of the Argentine Republic which may have been committed at the bidding of an irresistible inner moral force; and that, together with all friends of justice throughout the world, who view the trial of Eichmann in Israel as an act of supreme historical justice, you will see to it that the friendly relations between the Argentine Republic and Israel suffer no harm." (Para. 6.) It may be interesting to note that Arendt touched upon the issue of presumption of innocence in the context of the Eichmann case as follows when she wrote, commenting on Ben-Gurion's words mentioned in para. 3: "In contrast to normal arrests in ordinary criminal cases, where suspicion of guilt must be proved to hold Israel responsible for the operation, even if the men executing the operation were to be considered private individuals,[500] even if Eichmann had consented to his transportation to Israel (as both Levavi and Ben-Gurion had asserted)[501] and even if Eichmann was to be considered an illegal resident in Argentina.[502] As a result of this, Argentina, on 8 June be substantial and reasonable but not beyond reasonable doubt – that is the task of the ensuing trial – Eichmann's illegal arrest could be justified, and was justified in the eyes of the world, only by the fact that the outcome of the trial could be safely anticipated." (Arendt 1994, p. 210.) (Cf. also n. 25.)

---

[500] See UNSC OR, fifteenth year, 865th meeting, 22 June 1960, UN Doc. S/P.V. 865 (1960), para. 23 (p. 5) (Mr Amadeo from Argentina): "This justification of the incident and the need to apologize for it constitute a full confession of responsibility and make the production of further evidence unnecessary. No one feels obliged to apologize for an incident for which he does not consider himself responsible. This responsibility is not affected by the Government of Israel's contention that the act was done by private individuals who acted without prior consent." See also ibid., para. 25 (p. 5): As far as the present case is concerned, those involved had no doubt whatever about the illegality of the act, as is proved by the clandestine way they acted both in capturing Eichmann and in removing him from Argentine territory. Eichmann, once captured, was handed over to the Government of Israel, and from that moment – that is, the State of Israel's knowledge – of the illegal way in which he had been removed to Israel territory is incontestable. Thus, by accepting the act and by announcing its intention to try the prisoner, the Government of Israel ipso facto became an accessory to, and ultimately responsible for, the act itself. If we consider in addition the subsequent official expressions of approval of those who effected the capture, there is, we believe, no need for further proof."

[501] See ibid., paras. 26-27 (pp. 5-6): "Eichmann's supposed consent to his removal to Israel does not alter the fact that a violation of Argentine sovereignty was committed. I leave it to each of you to decide what weight is to be attached to the letter attributed to Eichmann giving his consent, and I cannot forbear from expressing my regret that such a document should have been included in a diplomatic note. But even if Eichmann gave his consent, it does not alter the fact that he was removed by force. In fact, Eichmann would have been taken to Israel whether he was willing or not. This is clear from Israel's attitude throughout the affair. Since he had no choice in the matter, the fact that he may have consented is completely irrelevant. This is the view taken by Professor Hambro, who has said that if Israel agents in fact seized Eichmann in Argentina, their action was in itself a violation of international law, since such a thing cannot be done without the consent of the other State. [It must be noted that Mr Amadeo here refers to a statement which assumes that Eichmann was kidnapped by agents of the State of Israel. However, from the previous footnote, it can be deduced that Mr Amadeo made the claim that Israel was responsible for the kidnapping, even if the kidnappers were private individuals. Because of that, one can wonder what the added value is of this reference to Professor Hambro's position. The same inconsistency is noted by Silving (1961, p. 315, n. 22) who writes: "Dr. Amadeo cites Professor Hambro's opinion "that if Israel agents in fact seized Eichmann in Argentina, their action was in itself a violation of international law, since such a thing cannot be done without the consent of the other State." (Doc S/P.V. 865, par. 26.) But how can this statement be taken to support Amadeo's contention, implied in the context in which the statement is used, that the same applies if the "abductors" were private citizens and not "Israeli agents."", ChP.] The Israel contention that Eichmann consented to his removal had therefore, in Professor's Hambro's opinion, no bearing on the question. It would therefore appear that the word "capture" was correctly used by Mr. Ben Gurion in his letter to President Frondizi [S/4342, sec. II] to refer to Eichmann's arrest, since it emphasizes the essentially coercive nature of the act. In fact, according to the dictionary definition, the word "capture" means the apprehension of a person who is, or is suspected to be, an offender. When an offender is apprehended, his consent – assuming that he gives his consent – is completely immaterial."

[502] See ibid., para. 28 (p. 6): "The fact that an inhabitant of the country may be living there in breach of its national laws is a purely domestic question which the Argentine authorities alone are empowered to investigate and adjudicate. No foreign Power has the right to take the place of the national authorities and to correct the situation by removing the illegal resident from the country. Any country that would > made the most formal protest against the illegal act committed to the detriment of a fundamental right of the Argentine State, and requested appropriate reparation for the act, namely the return of Eichmann, for which it set a time-limit of one week, and the punishment of those guilty of violating Argentine territory. The Argentine Government stated that, failing compliance with this request, it would refer the matter to the United Nations.[503]

When Argentina felt that reparation was not forthcoming through direct negotiations with Israel,[504] the Permanent Representative of Argentina to the UN, Mario Amadeo, on the instructions of his Government, requested the President of the UNSC > to call an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider the violation of the sovereign rights of the Argentine Republic resulting from the illicit and clandestine transfer of Adolf Eichmann from Argentine territory to the territory of the State of Israel, contrary to the rules of international law and the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and creating an atmosphere of insecurity and mistrust incompatible with the preservation of international peace.[505]

The UNSC discussions took place on 22 (meetings 865-866) and 23 (meetings 867-868) June 1960.

After having discussed the history of the affair and the reasons why it believed Israel was responsible for the abduction, Mr Amadeo submitted a draft resolution to the UNSC in which the violation of Argentina's sovereignty was recognised and in which Israel was requested to make appropriate reparation (but in which, importantly, the return of Eichmann was not explicitly mentioned).[506]

Then, it was time for Israel – in the person of its Foreign Minister Golda Meir – to react to Argentina's view on the case. Like Levavi's note of 3 June and Ben-Gurion's letter of 7 June, Meir defended the operation of the individuals, again referring to the monstrousness of Eichmann.

Some very illustrative examples of this reasoning can be found in the following excerpts:

> [M]y Government sincerely believes that this isolated violation of Argentine law must be seen in the light of the exceptional and unique character of the crimes attributed to Eichmann, on the one hand, and the motives of those that acted in this unusual tolerate such interference in its internal affairs would have ceased to be independent and worthy of respect."

---

[503] 'Letter dated 15 June 1960 from the representative of Argentina to the President of the Security Council', UN Doc. S/4336, para. 3 of the Explanatory Memorandum.

[504] See Baade 1961, p. 407.

[505] 'Letter dated 15 June 1960 from the representative of Argentina to the President of the Security Council', UN Doc. S/4336, para. 1.

[506] See UNSC OR, fifteenth year, 865th meeting, 22 June 1960, UN Doc. S/P.V. 865 (1960), paras. 46-47 (p. 10).

manner, on the other hand. These men belong, as do I, to a people whose tragedy in the Second World War is unmatched in history.[507]

This is 1960 – fifteen years after Nazi Germany was defeated. Is it not inconceivable that Eichmann has enjoyed freedom during all these years? That he has not been brought to trial? Is not this a violation of the sovereignty of the spirit of man and of humanity's conception of justice?[508]

What wonder that many Jews could find no rest until they ascertained whether he was alive and tracked him down.[509]

Jews, some of whom personally are the victims of his brutality, found no rest until they located him and brought him to Israel – to the country to whose shores hundreds of thousands of the survivors of the Eichmann horror have come home (…).[510]

Again I want to stress that if citizens of Israel broke the law of Argentina they broke it not in tracking down any ordinary criminal, but in tracking down Adolf Eichmann.[511]

The representative of Argentina expressed anxiety that this, if not dealt with by the Security Council, might constitute a precedent. But modern history knows of no such monster as Adolf Eichmann. The representative of Argentina has sought to contrast the norms of ordinary legal procedure, on the one hand, with resort to lynching and mob violence on the other. In so far as he sought, in the latter connexion, to draw an analogy to the apprehension of Eichmann, there is no analogy. Far from lynching Eichmann or hanging him on the nearest tree, those who pursued him over fifteen years and finally seized him have handed him over to the process and judgement of the courts of law. The reference to mob passions and lawless justice in this context, I must say, is unwarranted and provocative. This is not only my view and that of the Government of Israel; it is also shared by prominent people all over the world. In an article by a well-known Argentine publicist, Ernesto Sabato, published in the important newspaper El Mundo of 17 June, under the suggestive title "Sovereignty for Butchers", we read:

"How can we not admire a group of brave men who have, during the years, endangered their lives in searching throughout the world for this criminal and who had yet the honesty to deliver him up for trial by judicial tribunals instead of being impelled by an impulse of revenge to finish him off on the spot."[512]

Will not our Argentine friends see the exceptional nature and uniqueness of this case? I am sure that their conception of right and justice must place this isolated incident in its proper perspective. I again ask: is this a problem for the Security Council to deal with? This is a body that deals with threats to the peace. Is this a threat to peace –

[507] UNSC OR, fifteenth year, 866th meeting, 22 June 1960, UN Doc. S/P.V. 866 (1960), para. 19 (p. 4).
[508] Ibid., para. 36 (p. 8).
[509] Ibid., para. 39 (p. 8).
[510] Ibid., para. 40 (p. 9).
[511] Ibid., para. 42 (p. 9).
[512] Ibid., para. 43 (pp. 9-10).

> Eichmann brought to trial by the very people to whose total physical annihilation he dedicated all his energies, even if the manner of his apprehension violated the laws of Argentina? Or did the threat to peace lie in Eichmann at large, Eichmann unpunished, Eichmann free to spread the poison of his twisted soul to a new generation?[513]

Notwithstanding this, she clearly refused to accept the idea that the State of Israel had violated the sovereignty of Argentina:

> A considerable part of the address we heard this morning was devoted to elaborating the charge that the State of Israel has violated the sovereignty of Argentina. I emphatically deny this charge. The State of Israel has not violated the sovereignty of Argentina in any manner whatsoever, and there is nothing in the record to enable the Security Council to make any such findings. The Government of Israel has made clear in official communications to the Argentine Government, which appear now on the record of the Security Council, that certain of its nationals in the course of their efforts to bring Eichmann to justice may have committed infringement of the law of Argentina, and it has already twice expressed its regret for this. I wish to repeat in all solemnity before this Council my Government's regrets at any infringement of the law of Argentina which may have been committed by any national of Israel. But with the greatest respect for the representative of Argentina, I think that he is in complete error, as a basic legal proposition, in confusing the illegal actions of individuals, for which regrets have been expressed, with the non-existent intentional violation of the sovereignty of one Member State by another. This distinction is so fundamental and so well established in international law that I am at a complete loss to understand how it could be expected that the Security Council should make so far-reaching a finding as is implicit in the statement we heard this morning, without any adequate basis in fact and in law.[514]

Hence, in contrast to the (possible) slip of Levavi's pen (see the final words of Subsection 3.2.2), Golda Meir was clear in her opinion that the kidnappers might have violated the laws of Argentina but not the sovereignty of Argentina as that requires statal involvement. After Israel's speech, the views of the other members of the UNSC, of which many referred to both the seriousness of the crimes with which Eichmann was charged and the importance of the concept of State sovereignty, were heard at this 866th meeting and the two meetings (867 and 868) the next day.[515]

---

[513] Ibid., paras. 47-48 (p. 10).
[514] Ibid., para. 41 (p. 9).
[515] See, for example, the following words of Mr Sobolev (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics): "In order to understand the nature of the Argentine Government's complaint, the Security Council must, above all, bear in mind that this question is directly related to the case of one of the major Nazi war criminals who committed the most heinous crimes against humanity during the Second World War. (…) The peoples of the world, who have lived through the tragedy of the Second World War and have themselves felt the full weight of the Nazi crimes, have always vigorously demanded and continue to demand that all war criminals, without exception, be brought to justice. Obviously, this applies in full measure to the war criminal Eichmann, who has on his conscience the lives of some millions of human beings, including 6 million Jews. (…) As far for Argentina's complaint concerning the violation of its sovereignty by Israel, the Soviet delegation must make it clear that the Soviet Union has always stood for the strict observance of the universally recognized principle of sovereignty in relations between

Arguably one of the most interesting exposés on the matter was provided by Claude Corea of Ceylon,[516] who did not share Meir's view and who believed that Israel had violated the sovereignty of Argentina:

> The Foreign Minister of Israel has informed the Council that (...) Eichmann was in fact apprehended by "Jewish volunteers including some Israelis". We infer from that that these were not "agents" of the Israel Government. We concede that the acts of enthusiastic individual citizens cannot always properly be attributed to the Governments to whom they owe allegiance. We appreciate that sovereign Governments are seldom responsible for the conduct of isolated persons acting on their own accord, impelled by "the depth of the feelings which move them"; we understand the deep stirring in human souls which sometimes drives men to action regardless of the embarrassments they may cause to their Governments. These situations we understand and can even overlook. We cannot, however, completely overlook the express approval given by the Government of Israel to the actions of the individuals concerned in this case. The only reasonable inference we can draw from the statements of the various members of the Israel Government soon after the transfer of Eichmann is that the Government endorsed and condoned the act, thus adopting it more or less as its own. (...) It is a clear breach of international law for a State to send its agents to the territory of another State to apprehend persons accused of having committed a crime. We find it difficult to resist the logical inference from that proposition that it is just as much a breach of international law for a State to condone or endorse the acts of those who go into the territory of another State and there apprehend persons. For these reasons the Government of Ceylon cannot but subscribe to the view that there has been on the part of the Israel Government a violation of the sovereign rights of Argentina.[517]

States and deems inadmissible any action designed to violate this principle. On the question of sovereignty the Soviet Union shares the Argentine position, since the violation of State sovereignty is inadmissible under any circumstances and can in no way be justified." (Ibid., paras. 51, 62 and 68 (pp. 11, 12 and 13).) See also the following words of Mr Tsiang of China: "The case of Eichmann by itself may excuse to a certain extent the irregular methods of his captors, but here a great principle is involved, namely, the principle of respect for national sovereignty. If this principle should be weakened in any way, the consequences for international order would be very grave indeed. My delegation wishes to register its disapproval of the irregular methods used by the captors of Eichmann." (UNSC OR, fifteenth year, 868th meeting, 23 June 1960, UN Doc. S/P.V. 868 (1960), para. 28 (p. 7).)

[516] See ibid., paras. 2-23 (pp. 1-6).

[517] Ibid., paras. 10 and 12 (p. 3). With respect to the aspect of the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes, Corea warned (ibid., para. 18 (p. 5)): "[W]e hope we will be understood if we state definitely and categorically that we are not able to subscribe to a doctrine which would seek to justify a breach of a fundamental rule of law – a rule of law which is not a mere technicality but the very basis of the carefully constructed and delicate edifice of international order – on concepts as subjective and as indefinite as "historical justice" or "irresistible inner force". The case of Eichmann is of course so staggering in its wickedness and its criminality that it may furnish a strong case for the advocates of this doctrine. Yet cases which may follow, or indeed cases which have preceded this in the not-too-distant past, may not be so easy of classification in terms of moral imperatives. Could it not be argued that the "security" or "vital interests" of one State provide a moral justification for acts by it constituting a violation of another State's sovereign rights? Or that the kidnapping of a notorious traitor of one country who has escaped into another country, could be committed by patriotic citizens at the "bidding of an irresistible inner moral force"? Is this to be admitted? Who is to decide?"

After the USSR and US had battled out a small but typical cold-war fight on a completely different issue,[518] the Council adopted Resolution 138 of 23 June 1960. The UNSC declared that abductions, such as the one of Eichmann, violate the sovereignty of the suspect's State of residence. In addition, it requested Israel to make "appropriate reparation in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the rules of international law".[519] This implies that the abduction was indeed viewed as an internationally wrongful act from Israel. After all (and arguing a contrario): if Israel was not responsible, then reparation would, of course, not have been necessary.[520] Interestingly, even though the UNSC clearly condemned the abduction, it did not state that Eichmann had to be returned. The Council thus followed the draft Resolution suggested by Argentina, which did not ask for the return of Eichmann either. One can certainly assert that the seriousness of Eichmann's alleged crimes has played a role here, as evidenced by the following words from the Resolution's Preamble:

> Mindful of the universal condemnation of the persecution of the Jews under the Nazis, and of the concern of people in all countries that Eichmann should be brought to appropriate justice for the crimes of which he is accused, Noting at the same time that this resolution should in no way be interpreted as condoning the odious crimes of which Eichmann is accused (...) [emphasis in original, ChP].

Thus, it could be argued that the UNSC took Eichmann's alleged crimes into account to, in a way, condone the fact that he was now going to face justice in Israel, even though he was irregularly brought there.[521]

---

[518] Namely on the alleged occupation by ex-nazis of important positions in West Germany and NATO (according to the USSR) and Eastern Germany (according to the US). See ibid., paras. 69-88 (pp. 13-16).

[519] The entire resolution reads as follows: "The Security Council, Having examined the complaint that the transfer of Adolf Eichmann to the territory of Israel constitutes a violation of the sovereignty of the Argentine Republic, Considering that the violation of the sovereignty of a Member State is incompatible with the Charter of the United Nations, Having regard to the fact that reciprocal respect for and the mutual protection of the sovereign rights of States are an essential condition for their harmonious coexistence, Noting that the repetition of acts such as that giving rise to this situation would involve a breach of the principles upon which international order is founded, creating an atmosphere of insecurity and distrust incompatible with the preservation of peace, Mindful of the universal condemnation of the persecution of the Jews under the Nazis, and of the concern of people in all countries that Eichmann should be brought to appropriate justice for the crimes of which he is accused, Noting at the same time that this resolution should in no way be interpreted as condoning the odious crimes of which Eichmann is accused, 1. Declares that acts such as that under consideration, which affect the sovereignty of a Member State and therefore cause international friction, may, if repeated, endanger international peace and security; 2. Requests the Government of Israel to make appropriate reparation in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the rules of international law; 3. Expresses the hope that the traditionally friendly relations between Argentina and Israel will be advanced [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[520] See also Subsection 1.1 of Chapter I.

[521] See also Kovac 2002, p. 643: "Since the resolution emphasized the heinous nature of Eichmann's crimes (it also warned of the possibly destabilizing effects of such sovereignty violations if repeated), the UN resolution arguably amounted to implied conditional approval of Israel's action, in spite of its

3.3.3 Draft articles on responsibility of States for internationally wrongful acts (Part II)

Hence, taking the perspective from the time of the affair, when it was not yet clear that Israeli agents had kidnapped Eichmann from Argentina, Article 4 of the DARS should indeed not be used. Returning to the commentary to Article 11 of the DARS, the drafters explain that

> Security Council resolution 138 of 23 June 1960 implied a finding that the Israeli Government was at least aware of, and consented to, the successful plan to capture Eichmann in Argentina. It may be that Eichmann's captors were "in fact acting on the instructions of or under the direction or control of" Israel, in which case their conduct was more properly attributed to the State under article 8. But where there are doubts about whether certain conduct falls within article 8, these may be resolved by the subsequent adoption of the conduct in question by the State. [522]

The commentary continues by explaining that the phrase "acknowledges and adopts the conduct in question as its own" means more than mere support or endorsement.[523] What is required is "that the State identifies the conduct in question and makes it its own."[524] Nevertheless, this acknowledgment and adoption by a State does not need to be express; it may also be inferred from its conduct.[525]

This adoption theory seems to have been expanded by some legal writers. For example, Costi asserts that > while the responsibility of the state is not prima facie engaged following a private kidnapping, continued custody of the abducted individual and the ensuing prosecution does in fact entail ratification of the abduction by the state and the latter assumes responsibility for the violation of the sovereignty and integrity of the state of refuge [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[526]

By the same token, Mann argues:

> [A] State can only act through agents. Even if their activity is not authorized ab initio, it is the State that acts as soon as it fails to return the abducted person, but arrests and prosecutes him and thus ratifies the originally unauthorized acts. (...) Even if the person acting in the foreign territory is not a police officer but a private one, subsequent adoption by the State entails its responsibility. For this reason the suggestion that the infamous Eichmann was abducted by private volunteers is carefully worded language to the contrary [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Lasok 1962, p. 355.

---

[522] Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 53.

[523] See ibid.

[524] Ibid.

[525] See ibid., p. 54.

[526] Costi 2003, p. 63.

> irrelevant in law, for even if it had been factually correct (which it does not seem to have been), the essential fact is that Eichmann was imprisoned, prosecuted, convicted and executed by the State of Israel which thus endorsed the acts of any private person involved [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[527]

It appears as if the State of Ceylon's view on the idea of adoption within the context of State responsibility is more accurate than the views of Costi and Mann.[528] Ceylon explained that Israel was responsible for the 'private' abduction because it gave "express approval" to it. However, does a State also "acknowledge and adopt as its own" if it clearly rejects the abduction of a person by private individuals (but nevertheless continues the prosecution of the suspect because he is now in its custody)? This is arguably hard to accept.[529]

---

[527] Mann 1989, p. 408. See also Hamid 2004, pp. 83-84.

[528] The Prosecution in the still-to-discuss Nikolić case before the ICTY, see Subsection 3.1.4, did not agree with Mann's interpretation of the concept of adoption, which is also supported by Shen (1994, p. 63), and which was relied upon by the Defence in Nikolić (see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001, para. 15, n. 24) either, see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to "Defence Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72" filed 17 May 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 31 May 2001, para. 36 or (the almost identical words in) ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to Defence "Motion to Determine Issues as Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber…and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, His Arrest and Subsequent Detention", filed 29 October 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 12 November 2001, para. 7: "Nor should the fact that the Prosecutor subsequently proceeds to place the Accused on trial be construed as amounting to the de facto "adoption and approval" of any prior unlawful acts committed by other bodies, on the grounds that in so doing, the Prosecution does not ratify or endorse any international illegality but instead, merely carries out its ordinary mandated functions of subjecting those accused of serious violations of international humanitarian law to trial." The Trial Chamber in the end agreed with the Prosecutor's reasoning based on the DARS that the conduct of SFOR/OTP could not be seen as an adoption or acknowledgement of the illegal conduct of the private individuals (see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, paras. 66-67), a point which was attacked by the Defence on appeal, see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 6: "The Defence asserts that the Trial Chamber's use of the International Law Commission's (…) Draft Articles on State Responsibility to determine whether the conduct of third parties can be attributed to SFOR or the OTP was inappropriate because the Draft Articles are not recognised as customary or treaty law. The Defence argues that the Appeals Chamber should apply a different test. The Defence contends that SFOR knew that the Accused had been the victim of an unlawful and violent abduction and that by taking the Accused into custody, SFOR colluded in the original crime [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (The Appeals Chamber itself did not go into this matter as it found that the violations, even if they could be attributed to SFOR (here, one could perhaps read: "SFOR/OTP", see ibid., paras. 3 and 18), did not warrant the requested remedy, see ibid., paras. 27 and 33.)

[529] Cf. also Cazala 2007, pp. 846-847.

3.3.4 Due diligence

Another important concept through which a State can be held responsible in connection with private conduct is 'due diligence' (or 'due care'),[530] a concept which was not addressed by the ILC in the DARS. Blomeyer-Bartenstein, writing on the codification of State responsibility after WW II, explains:

> In the new round of codification which began in 1963, the draft rules were no longer limited to the responsibility of States for injuries caused on their territory to aliens; the future convention was designed to define the general rules governing the international responsibility of the State. The ILC decided for that purpose to strictly limit the draft articles to secondary rules, i.e. rules determining the legal consequences of a failure to fulfil obligations established by primary rules, customary as well as conventional. Due diligence was considered as an element of an obligation, i.e. a primary rule, and therefore banned from the draft.[531]

Notwithstanding this, the commentary to the DARS sporadically refers to its existence and meaning. See, for example, the following words, where it refers to the Tehran case:[532]

> [A] State may be responsible for the effects of the conduct of private parties, if it failed to take necessary measures to prevent those effects. For example a receiving State is not responsible, as such, for the acts of private individuals in seizing an embassy, but it will be responsible if it fails to take all necessary steps to protect the embassy from seizure, or to regain control over it [original footnote omitted, ChP].[533]

A State may not only become responsible in connection with acts such as a seizure of an embassy by private individuals, it may also become responsible in connection with acts related to human rights violations.

The already briefly mentioned[534] Velásquez Rodríguez case, which concerned the role of the State of Honduras in the abduction and subsequent disappearance of [530] See generally Pisillo-Mazzeschi 1993, Hessbruegge 2004 and Barnidge, Jr. 2006.

---

[531] Blomeyer-Bartenstein 1987, pp. 141-142. See also Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 34: "Whether responsibility is "objective" or "subjective" in this sense depends on the circumstances, including the content of the primary obligation in question. The articles lay down no general rule in that regard. The same is true of other standards, whether they involve some degree of fault, culpability, negligence or want of due diligence. Such standards vary from one context to another for reasons which essentially relate to the object and purpose of the treaty provision or other rule giving rise to the primary obligation."

[532] Which was also used in Subsection 3.3.1 to explain the term 'conduct acknowledged and adopted by a State as its own'.

[533] Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 39.

[534] See n. 205.

Honduran student leader Angel Manfredo Velásquez Rodríguez, may be illustrative here.

After having stated, as the HRC (see Subsection 2.2.2) and the ECmHR/ECtHR (see Subsection 2.2.4), that an abduction violates the human right to personal liberty,[535] the IACtHR examined whether it could be established in this particular case that Honduras had violated, among other things, this human right.[536] In its examination, the Court also turned to Article 1, paragraph 1 of the ACHR, the 'respect and ensure' provision,[537] and explained with regard to the 'ensure' part:

> The second obligation of the States Parties is to "ensure" the free and full exercise of the rights recognized by the Convention to every person subject to its jurisdiction. This obligation implies the duty of the States Parties to organize the governmental apparatus and, in general, all the structures through which public power is exercised, so that they are capable of juridically ensuring the free and full enjoyment of human rights. As a consequence of this obligation, the States must prevent, investigate and punish any violation of the rights recognized by the Convention and, moreover, if possible attempt to restore the right violated and provide compensation as warranted for damages resulting from the violation.[538]

The words "any violation of the rights recognized by the Convention [emphasis added, ChP]", of course, includes violations by State officials, but may not be limited to them. The State's due diligence obligation (to prevent, investigate and punish) also appears to apply to human rights violations caused by private actors:

> An illegal act which violates human rights and which is initially not directly imputable to a State (for example, because it is the act of a private person or because the person responsible has not been identified) can lead to international responsibility of the State, not because of the act itself, but because of the lack of due diligence to prevent the violation or to respond to it as required by the Convention.[539]

A few remarks should be made here. First, it should be noted that this case might have a broader scope than just an American one. Meron explains:

---

[535] IACtHR, Velásquez Rodríguez, 'Judgment', 29 July 1988, Ser. C., No. 4 (1988), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/b_11_12d.htm, para. 155: "The kidnapping of a person is an arbitrary deprivation of liberty, an infringement of a detainee's right to be taken without delay before a judge and to invoke the appropriate procedures to review the legality of the arrest, all in violation of Article 7 of the Convention which recognizes the right to personal liberty".

[536] See ibid., paras. 159-160.

[537] "The States Parties to this Convention undertake to respect the rights and freedoms recognized herein and to ensure to all persons subject to their jurisdiction the free and full exercise of those rights and freedoms, without any discrimination for reasons of race, color, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, economic status, birth, or any other social condition."

[538] IACtHR, Velásquez Rodríguez, 'Judgment', 29 July 1988, Ser. C., No. 4 (1988), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/b_11_12d.htm, para. 166.

[539] Ibid., para. 172.

> Because of the similarity of Article 1 of the American Convention to Article 2 of the Political Covenant and, in this context, to Article 1 of the European Convention, the jurisprudence of the American Court is of general importance for the international law of human rights.[540]

Secondly, it should be mentioned that in the last-quoted paragraph of the Velásquez Rodríguez case, one may find additional evidence for the view that private individuals can violate human rights (see Subsection 3.2.1).

The fact that the IACtHR talks about "[a]n illegal act which violates human rights" may be seen as such proof.[541] However, one may also disagree and argue that the IACtHR only states that the private individual can commit an illegal act (which in turns violates a human right) but that the private individual is not directly linked with the human rights violation itself. This notwithstanding, whether the private individual is directly or indirectly linked does not seem to matter. What matters is that because of an action from a private individual, a human right is violated.

In any case, it must be clearly understood that the State does not become responsible because of the initial human rights violation itself, but because of its inaction with respect to that violation; the State incurs responsibility because it breaches its own (due diligence) obligation to prevent or respond to the violation. Although in the Velásquez Rodríguez case, the IACtHR found that the disappearance of the Honduran student leader "was carried out by agents who acted under cover of public authority",[542] meaning that the State of Honduras itself violated, among other things, the human right to personal liberty,[543] it also clearly showed the difference between violating these specific human rights provisions and violating the general due diligence provision of Article 1, paragraph 1 of the American Convention:

> The Court is convinced, and has so found, that the disappearance of Manfredo Velásquez was carried out by agents who acted under cover of public authority. However, even had that fact not been proven, the failure of the State apparatus to act, which is clearly proven, is a failure on the part of Honduras to fulfill the duties it

[540] Meron 1989, p. 164.

[541] See for another example also IACtHR, Velásquez Rodríguez, 'Judgment', 29 July 1988, Ser. C., No. 4 (1988), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/b_11_12d.htm, para. 177: "Where the acts of private parties that violate the Convention are not seriously investigated, those parties are aided in a sense by the government, thereby making the State responsible on the international plane [emphasis added, ChP]." See in that respect also Meron 1989, pp. 163-164 (again referring to the underlying goal of human rights law): "Because the purpose of human rights law is to protect human dignity, and because some essential human rights are often breached by private persons, the obligation of states to observe and ensure respect for human rights and to prevent violations cannot be confined to restrictions upon governmental powers but must extend to at least some private 'interferences' with human rights [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[542] IACtHR, Velásquez Rodríguez, 'Judgment', 29 July 1988, Ser. C., No. 4 (1988), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/b_11_12d.htm, para. 182.

[543] See ibid., para. 185.

> assumed under Article 1 (1) of the Convention, which obligated it to ensure Manfredo Velásquez the free and full exercise of his human rights.[544]

In conclusion, a State violates the right to liberty and security itself if, for example, its own agents kidnap a person or if the kidnapping by private individuals can be attributed to the State (for example, because the State directed or controlled the private conduct or because it acknowledged and adopted the conduct as its own). In these cases, the kidnapping/violation of the right to liberty and security is attributed to the State: it can be seen as an act of State. Conversely, if private individuals kidnap a person (and the State has, for instance, not directed or controlled this conduct or acknowledged and adopted it as its own) the kidnapping/violation of the right to liberty and security itself is not attributed to the State. Nevertheless, if such a (truly private) kidnapping does occur and a State has done nothing to prevent it, or does nothing to punish the private kidnappers, the State can be held responsible anyway. In that case, it does not violate the right to liberty and security itself; it violates a due diligence provision as can, for example, be found in Article 1, paragraph 1 of the ACHR.[545]

4 WHAT ARE THE CONSEQUENCES OF SUCH VIOLATIONS?

Before turning to Part 3 of this book, to the actual male captus case law of courts and tribunals other than the ICC, only one further point still needs to be addressed. In this chapter, which male captus situations exist (Section 1), what is violated by these male captus situations (Section 2) and who violates (Section 3) has been examined.[546]

It will now be sorted out what the consequences are of such violations.

4.1 Reparation

The second part of the already discussed DARS ('Content of the international responsibility of a State') is devoted to the legal consequences of an internationally wrongful act of a State.

Besides the fact that the responsible State is under an obligation to cease that act and to offer guarantees of non-repetition,[547] it must also make full reparation for the

---

[544] Ibid., para. 182.

[545] See Wolfrum 1987, p. 275: "[W]hen there is a duty to exercise (...) due diligence in some particular respect, State responsibility may arise when the failure to exercise due diligence occurred in the context of violent acts by private individuals. Thus, the State is responsible only for the act or omission of its organs where they are guilty of not having done everything within their power to prevent the injurious act of the private individual or to punish it suitably if it has occurred. The State is responsible for having breached not the international obligation with which the individual's act might be in conflict, but the general or special obligation imposed on its organs to provide for protection."

[546] In addition, it was also explained (but not in a specific subsection) why these male captus situations may occur, see n. 25 and accompanying text.

[547] See Art. 30 of the DARS.

injury caused by the internationally wrongful act.[548] Article 33 explains in its first paragraph that the obligations of the responsible State arising from the second part of the DARS may be owed (only) to "another State, to several States, or to the international community as a whole". This entails, for example, that the obligation to make reparation is of a horizontal, inter-State nature[549] and that it cannot be invoked by a private individual. Nevertheless, paragraph 2 of Article 33 states that "[t]his Part is without prejudice to any right, arising from the international responsibility of a State, which may accrue directly to any person or entity other than a State." The idea formulated in this last quote will be addressed in the next subsection where the issue of remedies in international human rights law will be examined. Thus, when addressing the horizontal context (between States), the term 'reparation' will be used,[550] whereas the term 'remedies' will be used for the vertical context (between an individual and the State).[551]

[548] See Art. 31, para. 1 of the DARS.

[549] The relationship between the international community as a whole (which can be seen as a collection of States) and a State will – for reasons of clarity – also be viewed as a horizontal relationship.

[550] Thus, the word reparation is here connected with the entity invoking its right and not so much with the sort of violation. For example, State B can very well ask State A for reparation because State A causes harm to a national of State B (for instance, because of acts from a State A official or because of private acts which State A cannot prevent). According to the traditional doctrine in the law on State responsibility for injury to aliens (which "can be viewed as a precursor to international human rights law" (Shelton 2005, p. 59)), "a state that injures an individual indirectly injures the state of nationality [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.) However, international human rights law has changed this perspective as the purpose of human rights is "to guarantee the enjoyment of individual human beings of those rights and freedoms rather than to establish reciprocal relations between States". (IACtHR, "Other Treaties" Subject to the Consultative Jurisdiction of the Court, 'Advisory Opinion OC-1/82', 24 September 1982, Ser. A., No. 1 (1982), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/b_11_4a.htm, para. 24.) Shelton explains: "Traditional inter-state responsibility for breaches of international law, designed for reciprocal obligations, thus does not correspond exactly to the needs of the objective human rights regime. For example, when the state committing the breach does not directly injure another state, an issue arises of standing to make a claim. The International Law Commission has responded to this problem in its rules on state responsibility by expanding the concept of 'injured state' when the breach concerns a multilateral treaty or rule of customary international law created or established for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms. Every other state party to the convention or bound by the relevant rule is deemed affected by the interests protected by human rights provisions; hence all must be considered injured states in case of a breach of obligation [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Shelton 2005, p. 98.) Shelton notes, however, that "it is rare to find inter-state human rights complaints invoking the law of state responsibility because states often view the political and economic costs of complaints as too high in the absence of a specific injury. In addition, accusations of human rights violations may be deemed unfriendly acts." (Ibid., pp. 98-99.)

[551] Cf. ibid., pp. 7-8: "In the law of state responsibility, 'reparation' is most frequently used in the context of inter-state claims, and it is maintained for that purpose in this volume. (...) In this book, the terms 'remedies' and 'redress' refer to the range of measures that may be taken in response to an actual or threatened violation of human rights." Note, however, that a term like reparation is also often used in the context of an individual claiming to be the victim of a human rights violation. See, for example, the 'Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law'. (See the Annex to UNGA Res. 60/147 of 16 December 2005.) See also Art. 75 of the ICC Statute (entitled: 'Reparations to victims').

Returning to the subject of reparation, Article 34 of the DARS reads: "Full reparation for the injury caused by the internationally wrongful act shall take the form of restitution, compensation and satisfaction, either singly or in combination, in accordance with the provisions of this chapter." The very first form of reparation is restitution. In that case, the responsible State must > re-establish the situation which existed before the wrongful act was committed, provided and to the extent that restitution: (a) Is not materially impossible; (b) Does not involve a burden out of all proportion to the benefit deriving from restitution instead of compensation.[552]

The commentary to the DARS explains that restitution comes first among the forms of reparation because it "most closely conforms to the general principle that the responsible State is bound to wipe out the legal and material consequences of its wrongful act by re-establishing the situation that would exist if that act had not been committed".[553] This can also be derived from Article 36, paragraph 1 of the DARS which stipulates that "[t]he State responsible for an internationally wrongful act is under an obligation to compensate for the damage caused thereby, insofar as such damage is not made good by restitution [emphasis added, ChP]." The last form of reparation (not only in order but also in importance)[554] is satisfaction. This "may consist in an acknowledgement of the breach, an expression of regret, a formal apology or another appropriate modality."[555] One could hereby also think of the extradition or punishment of the persons responsible for the violation.[556]

Even though restitution is thus in theory the most appropriate form of reparation, the attitude of the injured State, among other things, may also play a role in determining which form of reparation should be granted in a specific case.[557]

---

[552] Art. 35 of the DARS.

[553] Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 96. (With reference to PCIJ, Case Concerning The Factory at Chorzów (Claim for Indemnity) (Merits), 'Judgment', 13 September 1928, Publications of the Permanent Court of International Justice, Series A. – No. 17, Judgment No. 13, p. 48.) Perhaps even more interesting is ibid., p. 47: "The essential principle contained in the actual notion of an illegal act – a principle which seems to be established by international practice and in particular by the decisions of arbitral tribunals – is that reparation must, as far as possible, wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and reestablish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that act had not been committed. Restitution in kind, or, if this is not possible, payment of a sum corresponding to the value which a restitution in kind would bear; the award, if need be, of damages for loss sustained which would not be covered by restitution in kind or payment in place of it – such are the principles which should serve to determine the amount of compensation due for an act contrary to international law."

[554] See Art. 37, para. 1 of the DARS: "The State responsible for an internationally wrongful act is under an obligation to give satisfaction for the injury caused by that act insofar as it cannot be made good by restitution or compensation [emphasis added, ChP]."

[555] Art. 37, para. 2 of the DARS.

[556] See Hamid 2004, pp. 82-83.

[557] See also the Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 97: "[T]here are often situations where Applying these considerations to the male captus technique which most clearly violates another State's sovereignty (abduction), this would mean that, in principle, a State which violates another State's territory by kidnapping a suspect therefrom should bring the situation back as it was before the kidnapping (the status quo ante)[558] implying that the suspect should be released[559] and returned to the State of residence.

This obligation to return is with the prosecuting State. Normally, the Executive will do what it is supposed to do and return the suspect. However, it can be argued that, if the Executive does not do so, the court now trying the case (which is, of course, also part of that prosecuting State) should take responsibility for the failures of its Executive, refuse jurisdiction and order the return of the suspect to the injured State.[560] In short, in such a situation, it appears that the court should issue a male captus male detentus decision. This point will be further discussed in the following chapters, when the actual male captus decisions will be addressed.

Although the obligation to return the abducted suspect would in principle thus be the most appropriate reaction of the prosecuting State, one must not forget that the attitude of the injured State should also be taken into account in determining which form of reparation is to be granted. One can assume that this means that the 'abducting' State would only be required to return the abducted suspect if the injured State protests the kidnapping and requests the return of the suspect.[561] Whether this assumption is correct will be examined in Chapter V in which the actual inter-State male captus decisions will be addressed.

---

restitution is not available or where its value to the injured State is so reduced that other forms of reparation take priority."

[558] See ibid., p. 96. A restitution by which a situation is brought back to the status quo ante is called a restitutio in integrum. See Jennings and Watts 1992, p. 388, Costi 2003, p. 62 and Shelton 2005, p. 65.

[559] Cf. Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part 2, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 96: "In its simplest form, (...) [restitution] involves such conduct as the release of persons wrongly detained".

[560] See also Shen 1994, p. 63: "Since an abducting State has a duty to return illegally abducted individuals to their country of refuge or residence, courts of the abducting State must refrain from exercising jurisdiction on the merits."

[561] A fortiori, the return would not be necessary if there was no violation in the first place, for example, because the wrongfulness of the violation is precluded by exceptions like self-defence and consent. Furthermore, a return would not be necessary either in the case of an abduction executed by private individuals if one is of the opinion that private individuals cannot violate another State's sovereignty (because in that case, there is, of course, no violation in the first place either), see Preuss 1936, p. 507: "When a fugitive has been kidnaped by private persons, and, having been brought by force to the territory of a foreign state, is there arrested, there appears to be no obligation to release the prisoner. International responsibility is incurred only through official complicity. A fortiori, there is no obligation to surrender the prisoner when officials of the state of asylum have participated in the irregular seizure or arrest [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." For another opinion, see, for example, Hamid 2004. He believes that "[f]orcible abductions conducted by purely private individuals without government involvement give rise to no violation of international law" (Hamid 2004, p. 83), but nevertheless argues that "in both government-sponsored and non-government-sponsored abductions, the offending State has the duty to return the abducted individual or order his return." (Ibid., p. 84.)

Only one case may already be mentioned here; the discussions in the UNSC on Eichmann's abduction, for instance, have shown that 'lesser' forms of reparation than restitution may also be accepted.[562] In the Council's discussion on the meaning of the term 'appropriate reparation' (to be found in its draft resolution), the US and British representatives stated, for example, that the final adoption of the resolution by the UNSC, including the apology by Israeli Foreign Minister Meir, constituted enough reparation.[563] The representative of the Soviet Union clearly stated that, whatever these words meant exactly, they could never result in the return of Eichmann to Argentina.[564] Notwithstanding these views, Argentina reserved its right to interpret the meaning of 'appropriate reparation' at a later stage:

> [M]y delegation does not consider that either Argentina or any other member of the Council has a special obligation to supply an interpretation of the resolutions adopted by the Council. We may each have our own interpretation of the texts placed before us. They will be personal interpretations and have legal force only for those who make them. Once a resolution has been adopted by the Security Council, the parties concerned will have to consider the question and take the necessary steps to ensure that it is interpreted properly and applied in accordance with law.[565]

---

[562] In her commentary to the ICTY Trial Chamber's decision in Nikolić, see n. 444 and accompanying text, Smeulers refers to the resolution of the Security Council in the aftermath of Eichmann's abduction to argue that "the return of the abducted person to the State whose rights have been violated (...) is (...) neither the most obvious [solution] nor a requirement under international law." (Smeulers 2007, p. 108.) See also ibid. where she states that the idea that the return of the person would be the only appropriate remedy in the case of a violation of State sovereignty "is not in line with national case law or State practice."

[563] UNSC, 15th Year, OR, 867th meeting, 23 June 1960, UN Doc. S/PV.867, para. 5 (pp. 1-2): "The United States considers that appropriate reparation will have been made by the expression of views by the Security Council in the pending resolution taken together with the statement of the Foreign Minister of Israel making apology on behalf of the Government of Israel. We therefore think that when we have adopted the pending resolution, appropriate resolution will have been made, and that the incident will then be closed. Normal, friendly relations between the two Governments can then progress." UNSC, 15th Year, OR, 868th meeting, 23 June 1960, UN Doc. S/PV.868, para. 36 (p. 8): "The representative of the United States has drawn attention to the important satisfaction which will be accorded to Argentina if this draft resolution is adopted by the Council. In addition, the regrets of the Government of Israel for any violation of Argentine laws are on the record. The United Kingdom delegation shares the view that these satisfactions can reasonably be regarded as appropriate reparation and should enable the incident before us to be terminated without danger to the relations, hitherto so amicable, between the two countries concerned."

[564] Ibid., para. 67 (p. 13): "I wish to make it quite clear that, like other members of the Council, we are entirely of the opinion that operative 2 of the Council's resolution can in no circumstances be interpreted as giving grounds for the submission of any claims for the return of Eichmann to the country in which for many years he has evaded just trial for the crimes he has committed. At the same time we cannot consider the deliberately vague wording of this paragraph satisfactory."

[565] Ibid., para. 42 (p. 9).

Although the diplomatic battle still raged 'behind the scenes' for quite some time, in the end – as was already mentioned above – Israel and Argentina declared the incident closed.[566]

It must be emphasised that although the discussions in the UNSC on the Eichmann abduction (and its aftermath) can indeed be seen as evidence for the fact that 'lesser' forms of reparation may be accepted in practice as well, one can argue that it does not seem to have imperilled the above-mentioned assumed rule that the suspect must be returned if the injured State protests and demands the return of the suspect; although Argentina did initially request "appropriate reparation for the act, namely the return of Eichmann [emphasis added, ChP]",[567] the specific demand for Eichmann's return was deleted in the context of the UNSC proceedings when Argentina, in its proposal for a UNSC resolution, asked merely for "appropriate reparation".[568] After the incident was closed and the case went to trial, the Israeli Judiciary no longer had, of course, an obligation to return Eichmann on the basis of the violation of Argentina's sovereignty because that matter had been settled.[569]

A final point must be made here and that is that the return of the suspect, especially if that suspect is charged with very serious crimes, should not be considered the same as impunity for that suspect. Hence, even though the Executive (or if that entity fails, the Judiciary) of the forum State is obliged to return the suspect after an abduction, the State of residence also has an obligation to prosecute suspects of international crimes. If that State is not willing or able to do so, his demand for return should fail.[570] However, that does not mean that the suspect

---

[566] See Liskofsky 1961, p. 204: "On June 28 Argentina sent Israel a note asking for an official statement of intent regarding the council's recommendation for "adequate reparation." On July 5, Israel replied with a note citing the "understanding" of the major supporters of the council resolution and asking that Argentina consider the case closed. On July 22, Argentina declared Israeli Ambassador Levavi persona non grata. On July 23, Israel expressed official "regret" over the expulsion of its ambassador. On July 25, Shabbethai Rosenne, legal adviser to the Israel Foreign Ministry, arrived in Argentina to try to rectify relations between the countries. On August [3], both governments issued a joint statement announcing that the "incident" between them was closed. The statement said that the two governments had been "animated by the wish to comply with the resolution of the Security Council of June 23, in which the hope was expressed that the traditional friendly relations between the two countries will be advanced." The statement made no reference to the "adequate reparation" that Argentina had been demanding. On October 17, 1960, diplomatic relations between Argentina and Israel were officially resumed after a four-month break, with Joseph Avidar as Israel's new ambassador to Argentina, and Rogelio Iristany as the new Argentine ambassador to Israel."

[567] See n. 503 and accompanying text.

[568] See n. 506 and accompanying text. See also De Schutter 1965, p. 106: "[T]he Argentine waived the most logical reparation and declared itself satisfied with the official Israel apology. The Argentine had a right to claim liberation on the grounds of its sovereign liberty and independence; on the grounds of the same liberty it waived this privilege. Therefore, the Eichmann incident doesn't alter this rule [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Baade notes that after the UNSC deliberations (and before the incident was finally settled in August 1960), "Argentina nevertheless repeatedly demanded the return of Eichmann". (Baade 1961, p. 407, n. 28.)

[569] See also Michell 1996, p. 422 who categorises the Eichmann case under the heading "The Injured State Does not Consent, But Does Not Request the Individual's Return".

[570] Cf. in that respect Fawcett 1964, pp. 199-200: "[I]t might perhaps be said, in the case of irregular capture and removal for trial of a criminal jure gentium, that the State, from which he is taken, may only should stay in the forum State because that jurisdiction, because of the male captus, has arguably forfeited its right to prosecute the suspect. It would be better in such a case to send the suspect to another jurisdiction which is willing and able to prosecute the suspect and which has nothing to do with the male captus.

Turning to that other male captus technique which may violate another State's sovereignty:[571] luring,[572] one could use the same arguments. If a luring operation violates another State's sovereignty, the injured State may protest and request the return of the suspect. In that case, one could argue, the 'luring' State (if not the Executive then the Judiciary) should also return the suspect to the injured State. However, even though this form of reparation has been supported,[573] it must also be recalled that luring is normally seen as a less serious violation of international law, which may perhaps have its effect on the exact form of reparation. This point should also be taken into account when looking at the luring cases of the following chapters.

---

demand his reconduction if two conditions are satisfied: that that State is the forum conveniens for his trial, and that it declares an intention to put him on trial. If these conditions are not satisfied, then the State must accept reparation in another form, since otherwise the interest of justice would be defeated."

[571] See Subsection 2.1.

[572] It is not necessary to discuss the technique of disguised extradition here as that technique does not lead to a violation of State sovereignty, see Subsection 2.1. Notwithstanding this, one may, of course, be of the opinion that also in the case of a disguised extradition, the suspect should be returned to the State from where he was deported, see Michell 1996, p. 392.

[573] See, for example, Preuss 1935, pp. 505-506 (who also confirms the above-mentioned assumed rule that the 'abducting' State must return the suspect to the injured State if that latter State protests and requests the return of the abducted suspect): "The clearest case of state responsibility is found where state agents have seized the individual by violence upon the territory of the state of asylum. Such a violation of foreign territory undoubtedly engages the responsibility of the state of arrest, which is under a clear duty to restore the prisoner and to punish or extradite the offending officers. This obligation appears to have been almost uniformly acknowledged in cases where the injured state has made a diplomatic reclamation. (…) There likewise appears to be an obligation to restore to the state of asylum a fugitive who has been arrested on its territory, or induced by fraud to leave its territory, by individuals acting with the complicity of agents of the arresting state [emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also the remaining words of the already partly quoted Resolution No. 9 relevant to the topic 'The Protection of Human Rights in International Cooperation in Criminal Matters' (unanimously approved at the closing session of the XV Congress of the International Association of Penal Law in Rio de Janeiro, 4-10 September 1994) (see n. 82 and accompanying text): "Abducting a person from a foreign country or enticing a person under false pretences to come voluntarily from another country in order to subject such a person to arrest and criminal prosecution is contrary to public international law and should not be tolerated and should be recognized as a bar to prosecution [emphasis added, ChP]." (Schomburg 1995, p. 105.) Note that this quotation is rather far-reaching in that it views luring in general (whether agents from State A are operating on State B's territory or not) as a violation of State B's territory.

4.2 Remedies

Returning to the human rights context[574] and specifically the human right to liberty and security and the right not to be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention, two remedies in the case of violations are discernible.[575]

The first is financial compensation and can be found in, for example, paragraph 5 of Article 9 of the ICCPR[576] and of Article 5 of the ECHR.[577] Looking at the language of these almost identical[578] provisions, it seems clear that in each and every case of an unlawful arrest/detention, compensation must be given (see the words: "shall").

The second is release and can be found in paragraphs 4 of both articles which are also virtually identical.[579] These paragraphs start with the right of a person to go to court. The words that follow are somewhat different, but they both stipulate the same, namely that that court 1) must decide on the lawfulness of (the arrest (see infra) and) the detention and 2) must release the person if (the arrest or) the detention is deemed unlawful.

These provisions regulate what is called in common law habeas corpus. This term was already briefly mentioned in footnote 42 of Chapter II and has been addressed earlier in the present chapter as well, see Subsection 2.2.5. Although the ICCPR paragraph speaks of "may" ("in order that that court may decide…"), it is clear that a person has not only the right to go to court but consequently that court [574] While not forgetting, however, that human rights violations can also fit in the inter-State 'tool' of reparation, see the previous subsection.

---

[575] Note also the more general right to an effective remedy, as can be found in, for example, Art. 2, para. 3 (a) of the ICCPR: "Each State Party to the present Covenant undertakes: (a) To ensure that any person whose rights or freedoms as herein recognized are violated shall have an effective remedy, notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity (…)." See also Art. 13 of the ECHR: "Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."

[576] "Anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention shall have an enforceable right to compensation."

[577] "Everyone who has been the victim of arrest or detention in contravention of the provisions of this article shall have an enforceable right to compensation."

[578] The only difference is that para. 5 of Art. 9 of the ICCPR speaks of "[a]nyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention" whereas para. 5 of Art. 5 of the ECHR speaks of "[e]veryone who has been the victim of arrest or detention in contravention of the provisions of this article". See Nowak 2005, p. 238: "Whereas the analogous provision in Art. 5(5) of the ECHR guarantees compensation only in the event of a violation of Art. 5, the claim set down in Art. 9(5) is available to every victim of unlawful arrest or detention ("victime d'arrestation ou de détentions illégales"). Arrest or detention is unlawful when it contradicts one of the provisions in Art. 9(1) to (4) and/or a provision of domestic law [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[579] Art. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR reads: "Anyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings before a court, in order that that court may decide without delay on the lawfulness of his detention and order his release if the detention is not lawful." Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR reads: "Everyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful."

has discretion as to whether or not to review the lawfulness of his (arrest or) detention. See in that respect also the description by Nowak, which confirms that the ICCPR states that a judge must review the lawfulness of the detention: "All persons who have been deprived of their liberty of person are – regardless of the reasons – entitled to a right to have the detention reviewed in court without delay [emphasis added, ChP]."[580] (It does not say: to possibly have the detention reviewed if the court deems this appropriate.) In that respect, the ECHR paragraph is much clearer: "proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court [emphasis added, ChP]". In any case, once the court reviews the lawfulness of the detention, it must release a person if his detention is found to be unlawful.[581] It is important to understand that this remedy is not discretionary in nature but part of the human right to liberty and security, a right which is applicable to everyone. This means that in principle,[582] any person, whether he is charged with fraud or genocide, must be released if the judge finds that that person's (arrest and) detention is unlawful.

To come back to all the brackets supra in which one could find the word "arrest" (see also the last sentence), it is submitted that the judge must not only decide on the lawfulness of the detention but also on the lawfulness of the arrest and, furthermore, that he must release a person not only if his detention is unlawful but also if his arrest is unlawful.[583] Such an interpretation is supported by the whole context of this article, in which not only the detention but in fact the deprivation of liberty in general, thus including the arrest, is considered.[584]

---

[580] Nowak 2005, p. 235.

[581] See, for example, Rodley 1999, p. 338: "[I]n the event that the detention is found to be unlawful, the court must order release [emphasis added, ChP]." See also Swart 2001 pp. 204 ("Article 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR and Article 5, paragraph 4 of the ECHR require that a court order the release of the person deprived of his liberty where that person's detention is not lawful [emphasis added, ChP].") and 206: "[B]oth Article 9 of the ICCPR and Article 5 of the ECHR make it imperative that a person be released if his detention was unlawful."

[582] Nevertheless, see Subsection 4.4 for problems surrounding this remedy and a proposal to evade them.

[583] Such an interpretation can also be found in a document preceding the ICCPR. In the 1964 UN Commission on Human Rights' 'Study of the Right to Everyone to be Free from Arbitrary Arrest, Detention and Exile' (see also n. 216), the Commission prepared so-called "Draft Articles" on the right to be free from arbitrary arrest and detention. These Draft Articles were sent to UN Member States for commentary. Quite some provisions were acceptable to all the 48 States submitting comments. One of these provisions was summarised by Maki as follows: "Anyone who is arrested or detained shall be entitled to initiate proceedings before an authority in order to challenge the legality of his arrest or detention and obtain his release from that authority without delay if it is unlawful [emphasis added, ChP]." (Maki 1980, p. 295.) Maki notes on the same page: "It is significant that none of the countries submitting comments to the Draft Articles suggested that the result of the proceeding be anything but the detainee's release, if the arrest or detention is unlawful [emphasis added, ChP]."

[584] Note, however, that old interpretations of the concept of habeas corpus indeed seemed to be focused on the legality of the detention alone. See in that respect also the already-mentioned (see Chapter II) Scott case from 1829 in which Brougham and Platt showed cause and argued: "On the return to a writ of habeas corpus, the gaoler [this is the jailer, ChP] is only bound to shew [this means to show, ChP] the warrant for the detention of the party, and not the caption." (Court of King's Bench, Lord Chief Justice Tenterden, Ex parte Susannah Scott, 19 May 1829, 9 Barnewall & Cresswell's King's Bench Reports (1829), p. 447; 109 English Reports (1829), p. 166.).

In his commentary to the ICCPR provisions, Nowak arguably supports this view as well. In the context of the more general concept of deprivation of liberty (which covers both the arrest and detention),[585] he states:

> The decision in remand proceedings relates exclusively to the lawfulness of deprivation of liberty. If this is not the case [namely when the deprivation of liberty is unlawful, ChP], then the court must order the immediate release of the person concerned [emphasis in original, ChP].[586]

Indeed, in the ACHR's version of this article,[587] one can read: "Anyone who is deprived of his liberty shall be entitled to recourse to a competent court, in order that the court may decide without delay on the lawfulness of his arrest or detention and order his release if the arrest or detention is unlawful [emphasis added, ChP]".[588]

---

[585] Although the word deprivation, in an earlier quotation, appears to be more linked with the concept of 'detention' (see Nowak 2005, p. 221: "The word "arrest" ("arrestation") refers to the act of depriving personal liberty (…). The word "detention" ("détention"), on the other hand, refers to the state of deprivation of liberty (…) [emphasis in original, ChP]."), it is clear that the deprivation of liberty also encompasses the arrest in the following quotation. When writing about Art. 9, para. 5 of the ICCPR (which stipulates that "[a]nyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention shall have an enforceable right to compensation"), Nowak (ibid., p. 237) refers to "[t]he claim to compensation for unlawful deprivation of liberty".

[586] Nowak 1993, p. 179. (This passage is arguably clearer than the one from Nowak's book in 2005. There, he states: "The decision in remand proceedings relates exclusively to the lawfulness of deprivation of liberty, i.e., the compatibility of the detention with domestic and international law. If the court finds that detention is unlawful, it is under an obligation to order the immediate release of the person concerned [emphasis in original, ChP]." (Nowak 2005, p. 236.) Although he writes here that a court must order the release of a person in the case of an unlawful detention (and not in the case of an unlawful deprivation of liberty), the word detention is linked in the previous sentence to the deprivation of liberty, which, in turn, encompasses not only the detention, but also the arrest, see the previous footnote.) See also Knoops 2003, p. 216, writing on the European provision: "Where someone has been deprived of his or her liberty, he or she is entitled by Article 5, paragraph 4, to a speedy decision by a national court as to whether the deprivation of liberty is lawful and to an order for his or her release if it [namely the deprivation of liberty, ChP] is not lawful [emphasis in original, ChP]." See, likewise, Dhont 2004, p. 350 (also writing on Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR): "If the judge is of the opinion that the deprivation of liberty [she uses the Dutch term vrijheidsberoving here, ChP] is not lawful, the person in question must be released immediately [own translation, ChP]." See finally also more generally (and writing about arbitrariness) De Zayas 2005, p. 22: "The above international norms [De Zayas refers here to international and regional human rights protecting the liberty and security of person, ChP] reflect a universal consensus that an individual cannot be deprived of liberty except pursuant to specific legislative authority and with respect for procedural safeguards. Nevertheless, the reality is that not only military dictatorships but also democracies detain political opponents, refugees and aliens, sometimes indefinitely, under a variety of pretexts. It is for domestic and international tribunals to test the legality of such detentions and to ensure the release and compensation of persons who have suffered arbitrary arrest and detention [emphasis added, ChP]."

[587] Note that "[t]he ACHR is substantially modelled on the ICCPR". (De Londras 2007, p. 239, n. 111.)

[588] Art. 7, para. 6 of the ACHR ('right to personal liberty'). For a concrete example, see IACtHR, Castillo Páez, 'Judgment', 3 November 1997, Ser. C., No. 34 (1997), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/C/34-ing.html. El Zeidy (2006, p. 455, n. 28) explains that in this case, the Court "found violation of Art. 7 of the American Convention on Human Rights on several bases including unlawful arrest of the accused and consequently a violation of the domestic law which required the release of the accused in accordance with Art. 7(6)". See finally also Garner 2004, p. 728

Thus, what is arguably important is that the judge looks at the deprivation of liberty in general (arrest and detention)[589] and that he releases a person who is unlawfully deprived of his liberty. Articles 9 of the ICCPR and 5 of the ECHR probably only mention detention in the final words of their paragraphs 4[590] because it has to be seen as the most important part of the deprivation of liberty.[591] Now, it can very well be that there is nothing wrong with the arrest but that the detention is unlawful (in that case the person unlawfully detained must, of course, be released) but if the arrest is unlawful, then the detention should be automatically seen as unlawful as well (leading to a release).[592] In conclusion, a judge must review the lawfulness of a person's deprivation of liberty,[593] including the arrest,[594] and release that person if the arrest/detention/deprivation of liberty is deemed unlawful.

(writing about habeas corpus): "A writ employed to bring a person before a court, most frequently to ensure that the party's imprisonment or detention is not illegal (…). (…) In addition to being used to test the legality of an arrest or commitment, the writ may be used to obtain review of (…) [emphasis added, ChP]."

[589] Cf. in that respect also the view of ICTY Judge Robinson in his separate opinion to the still-to-discuss (see Subsection 3.1.2 of Chapter VI) Todorović case where he stated that "[i]t is immaterial whether SFOR's action is characterised (…) as a detention, rather than an arrest; its action resulted in a deprivation of liberty, and it is the legality of that deprivation which is being challenged." (ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Separate Opinion of Judge Robinson', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 5.)

[590] Note, however, that these paragraphs (and the same goes for their paras. 5) do mention the word "arrest" in the beginning.

[591] The arrest in that sense is only the act of deprivation of liberty whereas the detention is the state of deprivation of liberty immediately following the arrest. See Nowak 2005, p. 221 for the difference between an arrest and a detention in the context of the ICCPR. (See ns. 465 and 585.)

[592] Note that one could argue that this reasoning contravenes the idea of the maxim male captus bene detentus. After all, an unlawful arrest (male captus) does not automatically lead to an unlawful detention (male detentus). Two remarks should be made here. First, the above-mentioned definition of male captus bene detentus is much more literal than the one followed in this study. Arguably the 'real' meaning behind male captus bene detentus is that a judge can exercise jurisdiction over a suspect (bene detentus), even if that suspect was irregularly brought within the jurisdiction of the now prosecuting court (male captus). Hence, the captus can encompass in fact any pre-trial irregularity and is not limited to the arrest; it can also include an unlawful detention. (See also Subsection 1.1 of this chapter.) Thus, the remark that an unlawful arrest should automatically lead to an unlawful detention is not in any way denying the existence of the maxim male captus bene detentus for in some jurisdictions, a pre-trial irregularity (whether it is an unlawful arrest or detention) does indeed not lead to a refusal to exercise jurisdiction. Secondly, even if the person is released, one can wonder whether this is actually the same as the counterpart of male captus bene detentus: ex iniuria ius non oritur (or male captus male detentus). This important point will be further addressed in Subsection 4.4.

[593] See also ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Brogan and Others v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 11209/84; 11234/84; 11266/84; 11386/85, 'Judgment', 29 November 1988, para. 65 (writing on Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR): "By virtue of paragraph 4 of Article 5 (art. 5-4), arrested or detained persons are entitled to a review bearing upon the procedural and substantive conditions which are essential for the "lawfulness", in the sense of the Convention, of their deprivation of liberty."

[594] Cf. also ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Van Droogenbroeck v. Belgium, Application No. 7906/77, 'Judgment', 24 June 1982, para. 48: "[F]or the purposes of Article 5 par. 4 (art. 5-4), the "lawfulness" of an "arrest or detention" has to be determined in the light not only of domestic law but also of the text of the Convention, the general principles embodied therein and the aim of the restrictions permitted by Article 5 par. 1 (art. 5-1) (…) [emphasis added, ChP]". See also ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Brogan and Others v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 11209/84; 11234/84; 11266/84; 11386/85, 'Judgment',

It is hereby also submitted that the words arrest and detention should have extraterritorial effect, an interpretation which, as was shown earlier in Celiberti de Casariego v. Uruguay and Sergio Ruben Lopez Burgos v. Uruguay, see Subsection 2.2.2, has been supported by the HRC.[595]

A judge should not only release a person who has been unlawfully arrested or detained in his own State but also if the male captus occurred abroad. Any other interpretation would lead to the danger of a legal vacuum.[596] Suppose a person is unlawfully arrested or detained in State B by agents of State A (for example by kidnapping) and brought to State A, where he is officially/formally arrested and detained and brought to court. If a judge then finds the arrest and detention of this person to be lawful, he in a way profits from the fact that the deprivation of liberty was fragmented over two systems. The suspect should not become the victim of this fragmentation.

---

29 November 1988, para. 65 (writing on Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR): "[W]hether an "arrest" or "detention" can be regarded as "lawful" has to be determined in the light not only of domestic law, but also of the text of the Convention, the general principles embodied therein and the aim of the restrictions permitted by Article 5 para. 1 (art. 5-1) (…) [emphasis added, ChP]."

[595] Although the ECtHR (in Öcalan) and the ECmHR (in Stocké) also held that the ECHR can have extraterritorial effect, the European institutions – it was already explained earlier (see n. 388) – nevertheless seem more focused on the national arrest and detention procedures, hereby providing room for the male captus bene detentus principle to flourish, see Trechsel 2005, p. 432 (referring to Stocké, Öcalan and Barbie cases): "Until now, the question whether a deprivation of liberty was 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law' was only examined with regard to the law of the Contracting State where the applicant had been deprived of his or her liberty. What if a person is detained in state B after having been apprehended in state A in a way which is not in accordance with the law of that state? In other words, does the Convention support the thesis of male captus been detentus (or judicatus)? It would seem that it does [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[596] Nevertheless, in male captus bene detentus cases, courts which were confronted by a habeas corpus claim (see, for instance, the Scott and Elliott cases, see Subsection 1.1 of Chapter V) have argued that the (arrest and) detention in the State of the now prosecuting court was perfectly legal (and that they did not have to look into the manner as to how the suspect was brought into their jurisdiction). See also generally Kiss (1965, p. 936), commenting on the decision of the Court of State Security in the Re Argoud case (see Subsection 2.1 of Chapter V), where the same reasoning was followed, even though Argoud did not file a habeas corpus claim (a concept which, it is reminded, stems from the common law context): "La Cour (...) évoque la jurisprudence en Grande-Bretange où, dit-elle, malgré l'invocation de l'habeas corpus les juges décident que la capture à l'étranger d'un citoyen britannique ne les prive pas du droit et de la compétence de le juger, en citant à l'appui l'affaire Elliott de 1949. Cette jurisprudence, affirme la Cour, est encore constamment celle des Etats-Unis où les tribunaux la formulent sous l'adage male captus, bene detentus. (...) En définitive, la Cour constate que l'accusé a été trouvé sur le territoire français et mis en état d'arrestation au vu du mandat d'arrêt régulier dont il était l'objet. Cette arrestation sur le territoire français était donc légale et la Cour de sûreté de l'Etat est légalement saisie de la poursuite." See finally Cowling 1992, p. 244 (discussing some older male captus cases): "It would (...) appear that in the interests of international relations there is a tendency on the part of courts conveniently to turn a blind eye to blatant irregularities that might have been perpetrated in order to bring a fugitive offender before a criminal court. Arrest is interpreted extremely narrowly to embrace only the final act of the official taking into custody a fugitive once the latter has been returned to the territory of the requesting State (...). What went on before this is considered to be irrelevant [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

It is submitted that the judge should be mainly concerned with the way the actual, and not the official/formal deprivation of liberty by the State agents took place.[597]

Furthermore, it must also be clarified that the reviewing judge of paragraph 4 does not need to review every detail of a person's detention.[598]

For example, if the decision-making authority, in its discretion, has decided that the most appropriate place of detention for a certain person is facility A, then it is not up to the reviewing judge to query that discretionary decision.[599]

The "lawfulness" of paragraph 4 is in fact the same as the "lawfulness" of paragraph 1 (whose exact scope was already earlier examined).[600] Hence, the reviewing judge, on the basis of both national and international law (such as the ECHR[601] or the ICCPR)[602] must check the essential[603] points concerning the [597] It is to be noted that this stance is not a rejection of the male captus bene detentus reasoning. As will be explained in Subsection 4.4, a release on the basis of habeas corpus does not preclude the re-arrest of a person (and is thus not the same as a male detentus: a refusal of jurisdiction).

[598] See ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Ashingdane v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 8225/78, 'Judgment', 28 May 1985, para. 52: "Article 5 para. 4 (art. 5-4) does not guarantee a right to judicial control of the legality of all aspects or details of the detention (…)."

[599] See ECtHR (Chamber), Case of X. v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 7215/75, 'Judgment', 5 November 1981, para. 58 ("Article 5 par. 4 (art. 5-4) (…) does not embody a right to judicial control of such scope as to empower the court, on all aspects of the case, to substitute its own discretion for that of the decision-making authority.") and ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Van Droogenbroeck v. Belgium, Application No. 7906/77, 'Judgment', 24 June 1982, para. 49: "It is true that Article 5 par. 4 (art. 5-4) does not guarantee a right to judicial control of such scope as to empower the court, on all aspects of the case, including questions of pure expediency, to substitute its own discretion for that of the decision-making authority." See finally ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Ashingdane v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 8225/78, 'Judgment', 28 May 1985, para. 52: "[I]n his domestic litigation the applicant did not challenge the legal basis for his detention as a person of unsound mind under the 1959 Act or seek his release from the reality of detention: he was claiming an entitlement to accommodation and treatment in the more "appropriate" conditions of a different category of psychiatric hospital, a matter not covered by para. 1 (e) of Article 5 (art. 5-1-e) (…)."

[600] See ibid.: "The scheme of Article 5 (art. 5), when read as a whole as it must be, implies that in relation to one and the same deprivation of liberty the notion of "lawfulness" should have the same significance in paragraphs 1 (e) [this was the specific sub-paragraph under discussion in this part of the decision, ChP] and 4 (…)." See also ECtHR (Chamber), Case of X. v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 7215/75, 'Judgment', 5 November 1981, para. 57: "Article 5 (art. 5) must be read as a whole and there is no reason to suppose that in relation to one and the same deprivation of liberty the significance of "lawfulness" differs from paragraph 1 (e) (art. 5-1-e) [this was the specific sub-paragraph under discussion in this part of the decision, ChP] to paragraph 4 (art. 5-4)." See finally also ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Brogan and Others v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 11209/84; 11234/84; 11266/84; 11386/85, 'Judgment', 29 November 1988, para. 65: "According to the Court's established case-law, the notion of "lawfulness" under paragraph 4 (art. 5-4) has the same meaning as in paragraph 1 (art. 5-1) (…)."

[601] See ECtHR (Chamber), Case of X. v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 7215/75, 'Judgment', 5 November 1981, para. 57: "Although X had access to a court which ruled that his detention was "lawful" in terms of English law, this cannot of itself be decisive as to whether there was a sufficient review of "lawfulness" for the purposes of Article 5 par. 4 (art. 5-4). In paragraph 1 (e) of Article 5 (art. 5-1-e) as interpreted by the Court (…), the Convention itself makes the "lawfulness" of the kind of deprivation of liberty undergone by X subject to certain requirements over and above conformity with domestic law." See also ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Van Droogenbroeck v. Belgium, Application No. 7906/77, 'Judgment', 24 June 1982, para. 48: "[F]or the purposes of Article 5 par. 4 (art. 5-4), the lawfulness of the deprivation of liberty, namely 1) are there substantive grounds for the deprivation;[604] 2) is the deprivation in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law[605] and 3) is the deprivation non-arbitrary?[606]

"lawfulness" of an "arrest or detention" has to be determined in the light not only of domestic law but also of the text of the Convention, the general principles embodied therein and the aim of the restrictions permitted by Article 5 par. 1 (art. 5-1) (…)." (See also n. 605.) See finally also ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Brogan and Others v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 11209/84; 11234/84; 11266/84; 11386/85, 'Judgment', 29 November 1988, para. 65 (writing on Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR): "[W]hether an "arrest" or "detention" can be regarded as "lawful" has to be determined in the light not only of domestic law, but also of the text of the Convention, the general principles embodied therein and the aim of the restrictions permitted by Article 5 para. 1 (art. 5-1) (…)." (See also n. 604.)

[602] See Nowak 2005, p. 236: "In a number of decisions, the [ICCPR's Human Rights] Committee has found a violation of Art. 9(4): "Judicial review of the lawfulness of detention under article 9, paragraph 4, is not limited to mere compliance of a detention with domestic law but must include the possibility to order release if the detention is incompatible with the requirements of the Covenant, in particular those of article 9, paragraph 1 [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[603] For example, a small technical error in the arrest warrant will not lead to an unlawful arrest. Cf. in that respect also the Brima case before the SCSL, where Judge Itoe clarified that "having been taken into custody, a mere technical flaw in the warrant of arrest neither renders the said arrest nor the detention based on that arrest, illegal." (SCSL, Trial Chamber, The Prosecutor against Tamba Alex Brima, 'Ruling on the Application for the Issue of a Writ of Habeas Corpus Filed by the Applicant', Case No. SCSL-03-06-PT, 22 July 2003, p. 14.) Cf. also Van der Kruijs (in his practical book on pre-trial detention in the Netherlands), who explains that detention is not often labelled as unlawful in the first place: "The investigating/examining judge (rechter-commissaris) does not often feel inclined to qualify the detention as unlawful. Many irregularities are deemed to be too minor to meet that qualification. The criterion appears to be that one must have acted flagrantly in violation of (the meaning of) the law [own translation, ChP]." (Van der Kruijs 2004, p. 8.) Although one can understand that small technical flaws should not lead to the qualification 'unlawful arrest/detention', the test that one must have acted flagrantly in violation of (the meaning of) the law appears to be too strict. In fact, one can argue that if the prosecuting authorities have acted flagrantly in violation of (the meaning of) the law, the judge should not only qualify the detention as unlawful (leading to a mere release which does not preclude an immediate new arrest, see Subsection 4.4); it must in fact dismiss the case, leading to the real ending of the case. If the investigating/examining judge has no such power (the power to dismiss a case may be reserved for proper courts), then he should arguably advise the court to dismiss the case. See also n. 617.

[604] It is not very clear whether Knoops (2003, p. 217) is of the opinion that only this point should be examined by the reviewing judge when he states: "In the view of the European Court, Article 5, paragraph 4, only requires a review of the essential grounds of a detention."

[605] After the quotation of the Van Droogenbroeck case in n. 601, the ECtHR refers to para. 57 of the case X. v. the United Kingdom, to be read in conjunction with paras. 39 and 45 of the Winterwerp case. These paragraphs show 1) the already explained point that the word "lawfulness" in Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR is the same as the one in Art. 5, para. 1 of the ECHR (see the quotation in para. 57 of the case X. v. the United Kingdom as presented in n. 600 and 2) that "lawfulness" in Art. 5, para. 1 of the ECHR (and thus also the word "lawfulness" in Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR) includes both substantive and procedural lawfulness and non-arbitrariness: "The next issue to be examined is the "lawfulness" of the detention for the purposes of Article 5 para. 1 (e) (art. 5-1-e). [In this part of the decision, Art. 5, para. 1 (e) of the ECHR was being examined, ChP.] Such "lawfulness" presupposes conformity with the domestic law in the first place and also (…) conformity with the purpose of the restrictions permitted by Article 5 para. 1 (e) (art. 5-1-e); it is required in respect of both the ordering and the execution of the measures involving deprivation of liberty (…). As regards the conformity with the domestic law, the Court points out that the term "lawful" covers procedural as well as substantive rules. There thus exists a certain overlapping between this term and the general requirement stated at the beginning of Article 5 para. 1 (art. 5-1), namely observance of "a procedure prescribed by law" (…). Indeed, these two

For example, "a failure to promptly inform the person of the reasons for his arrest and of any charges against him makes his detention illegal",[607] which will thus lead to a release.[608]

4.3 Abuse of process

The exact contours of this concept, which originated from the common law context and which can also – cf. the concept of rule of law – be seen as a sort of residual category,[609] will be discussed in the following chapters. However, for now, it suffices to mention the often-used definition of Lord Lowry in the English Bennett case:

> [A] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2)

---

expressions reflect the importance of the aim underlying Article 5 para. 1 (art. 5-1) (…): in a democratic society subscribing to the rule of law (…), no detention that is arbitrary can ever be regarded as "lawful". The Commission likewise stresses that there must be no element of arbitrariness (…). The Court for its part considers that the words "in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law" essentially refer back to domestic law; they state the need for compliance with the relevant procedure under that law. However, the domestic law must itself be in conformity with the Convention, including the general principles expressed or implied therein. The notion underlying the term in question is one of fair and proper procedure, namely that any measure depriving a person of his liberty should issue from and be executed by an appropriate authority and should not be arbitrary." (ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Winterwerp v. The Netherlands, Application No. 6301/73, 'Judgment', 24 October 1979, paras. 39 and 45.) See also ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Brogan and Others v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 11209/84; 11234/84; 11266/84; 11386/85, 'Judgment', 29 November 1988, para. 65 (writing on Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR): "By virtue of paragraph 4 of Article 5 (art. 5-4), arrested or detained persons are entitled to a review bearing upon the procedural and substantive conditions which are essential for the "lawfulness", in the sense of the Convention, of their deprivation of liberty."

[606] See the quotation of the Winterwerp case in the previous footnote. That the prohibition of arbitrariness falls under the concept of the lawfulness in the context of the ECHR (which does not contain an explicit reference to non-arbitrariness) was already established. At first sight, this may be different for the ICCPR which contains an explicit prohibition of non-arbitrariness. It could be asserted, now that paras. 4 and 5 of Art. 9 of the ICCPR only refer to "lawfulness", that a court does not need to release or compensate a person who has been the victim of an arbitrary (but lawful) arrest and detention. However, that view, of course, would contradict the whole purpose of Art. 9 of the ICCPR which is to fight not only unlawful, but also arbitrary arrests and detentions. Thus, the word "lawfulness" in paras. 4 and 5 of Art. 9 of the ICCPR arguably also includes non-arbitrariness. In the words of Nowak (writing on para. 5): "Arrest or detention is unlawful when it contradicts one of the provisions in Art. 9(1) [which encompasses the prohibition of arbitrariness, ChP] to (4) and/or a provision of domestic law. (…) [A]n arrest may be consistent with domestic laws but nevertheless unlawful under international law, regardless of whether this is arbitrary or in violation of the procedural guarantees in paras. 2 to 4 [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Nowak 2005, p. 238.) Hence, if a person is 'merely' arbitrarily arrested or detained, he can also seek his release or claim compensation under the ICCPR.

[607] Swart 2001, p. 204 (writing on both Art. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR and Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR).

[608] See ibid.

[609] See also Van Sliedregt 2001 B, p. 78, connecting the concepts of rule of law and abuse of process.

> because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case.[610]

Hence, the – discretionary – abuse of process doctrine can be used by judges to stop the proceedings because continuing with the case would amount to an abuse of the judges' own process. That would be the case in two situations, namely 1) where the suspect can no longer receive a fair trial (in the strict sense of the word) or 2) where a fair trial (in the strict sense) would be possible, but where the judges are nevertheless of the opinion that to continue the case, considering certain circumstances, would offend the court's sense of justice and propriety/the concept of a fair trial more broadly perceived. Thus, in the latter situation, the situation on which this book will focus (as one can argue that a male captus will normally not jeopardise the fairness of the trial in the courtroom), some pre-trial irregularities, which may have violated any concept addressed in this chapter (State sovereignty/human rights/due process/the rule of law more generally), may have occurred which are deemed so serious that the judges cannot proceed with the case, even if the suspect can still receive a fair trial in court. In short, in such cases, the judges do not refuse jurisdiction because the suspect would be unfairly tried, but because it would be unfair to try the suspect in the first place.

4.4 The final outcome: bene detentus or male detentus (or something in between)?

Whether a male captus leads to either a bene detentus or a male detentus (or to something in between) depends on many aspects which cannot be addressed in one short subsection. The following chapters of this book will examine all the different observations from judges confronted by a male captus to find out the circumstances that made them choose bene detentus, male detentus, or something in between.

For now, it suffices to clarify the relationship between the different male detentus-like consequences which have been reviewed in this chapter (release (violation of the right to liberty and security), return (violation of State sovereignty) and a stay of the proceedings as a result of the abuse of process doctrine (violation of the rule of law)) and the real male detentus outcome, which means that, because of a serious male captus, a court lacks jurisdiction to try the case. It can be argued that the male detentus outcome entails the final ending of the case before the court in question (in that the Prosecutor cannot restart the case in the future). After all, it would be very strange if the judge would first decide, because of the serious male captus involved, that jurisdiction must be refused but that, after the suspect is released from custody, the case can be restarted anew.

Now, a release pursuant to Article 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR or Article 5, paragraph 4 of the ECHR may have a male detentus 'look' – this is also because a male detentus will always lead to a release because, of course, one cannot continue to detain a suspect if one has decided that jurisdiction cannot be exercised in the suspect's case – but such a release does not preclude a new arrest on the spot and a new exercise of jurisdiction by the court. This is because the provisions simply speak of a release (as such) and not of, for example, a release/dismissal of the case with prejudice to the Prosecutor (meaning that the Prosecutor is barred from starting a new trial against the suspect after the latter's release).[611]

[610] House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161.

A male detentus, however, will definitely lead to the ending of the case because the judge is of the opinion that jurisdiction in this case cannot be exercised (a statement which, it must be repeated, would become meaningless if the person were immediately re-arrested and brought to trial anew).[612] However, it is also true that

---

[611] See, for example, the following discussion of the Prosecution in the still-to-discuss (see Subsection 3.2.2 of Chapter VI) Semanza case before the ICTR on this remedy: "In the Barayagwiza Decision, the Appeals Chamber cited Article 9 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) as a source of established international law. That article provides for three remedies: release, release with guarantees [for the remedy 'release with guarantees', see Article 9, para. 3 of the ICCPR: "Anyone arrested or detained on a criminal charge shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release. It shall not be the general rule that persons awaiting trial shall be detained in custody, but release may be subject to guarantees to appear for trial, at any other stage of the judicial proceedings, and, should occasion arise, for execution of the judgement [emphasis added, ChP].", ChP], and compensation, as the remedies available if a person is not tried within a reasonable time or if the detention is not lawful. Nowhere in the ICCPR is dismissal with prejudice mentioned as a remedy. (...) In the Barayagwiza Decision, the Appeals Chamber also cited Article 5 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), being a regional treaty, as a source of persuasive authority. The article provides for the same three remedies: release, release with guarantees, and compensation, as the remedies available if a person is not tried within a reasonable time or if the detention is not lawful. Nowhere in that convention is dismissal with prejudice mentioned as a remedy. (...) The Chamber also cited Article 7 of the American Convention on Human Rights (ACHR) in the Barayagwiza Decision. Paragraph 5 of that article provides for release and release with guarantees as the remedies available to a person who is not tried within a reasonable time. Paragraph 5 ["Any person detained shall be brought promptly before the judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to be released without prejudice to continuation of the proceedings. His release may be subject to guarantees to assure his appearance for trial.", ChP] specifically negates dismissal with prejudice as a remedy. Paragraph 6 provides that release is the remedy for unlawful arrest or detention. Nowhere in that convention is dismissal with prejudice provided as a remedy. (...) As can be seen from the above, dismissal with prejudice is not provided for, in fact is not even mentioned, in major sources of international law cited by the Chamber. Dismissal with prejudice is even specifically prohibited by the American Convention on Human Rights [emphasis in original, ChP]." (TPIR, Chambre d'Appel, Le Procureur contre Laurent Semanza, 'Réponse du Procureur au Mémoire Préalable [à] l'Appui de l'Acte d'Appel du 12 Octobre 1999 contre l'Ordonnance du 6 Octobre 1999 de la Chambre de Premi[è]re Instance III Relative [à] la Requête de la Défense en Annulation de la Procédure d'Arrestation et de Détention de Laurent Semanza pour Cause d'Illégalité', Affaire No. ICTR-97-20-I, 21 janvier 2000, pp. 22-25, 214*bis* – 211*bis*. (Section D ("Choice of Remedy") of this French response was written in English due to the short time available to the Prosecution, see also ibid., p. 19, 217*bis*.))

[612] Cf. for this difference also Zappalà 2003, pp. 71-72 (writing on the still-to-discuss ICTY cases of Dokmanović, Todorović and Nikolić): "Does a violation of the rights of the defendant at the stage of arrest imply that the Tribunals forfeit their jurisdiction? (...) In all instances the defendants sought the dismissal of their cases on the grounds that their rights had been violated. Their submissions were incorrect and inappropriate for two main reasons. First, none of those alleged violations was really imputable to the Tribunal, unless one proved that the order of the Tribunal implied the need to resort to unlawful methods. Secondly, from a procedural viewpoint, the accused was at most entitled to release both consequences are related. Not only the above-mentioned fact that a male detentus decision will always lead to a release plays a role in that respect, but one can also assume that a judge may very well state that he will refuse jurisdiction (male detentus) because a serious[613] male captus has occurred and that that male captus may consist of a serious violation of the above-mentioned human rights provisions. Hence, although the release of Article 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR or Article 5, paragraph 4 of the ECHR does not preclude a re-arrest, a serious violation of these human rights provisions may nevertheless lead to a male detentus result, not because these provisions say so but because the judge may decide so in his discretion in finding the most appropriate remedy.[614] and/or, where applicable exclusion of the evidence collected in violation of fundamental rights; instead, he had no right to dismissal of the proceedings [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

---

[613] Here, the intent may also play a role, see Swart 2001, p. 206: "Dismissal of criminal cases as a result of official misconduct is a remedy accepted by the courts of many States. There is, of course, considerable variation in the way national legal systems make use of that remedy. Among other things, the choice will depend on the availability of other effective remedies for correcting the wrongs done to the accused. Usually, a relevant consideration is also whether unlawful conduct on the part of law officers shows an intent to prejudice the rights of the accused or instead constituted negligence."

[614] See also ibid: "To date, international human rights conventions and the subsequent case law of international bodies have had surprisingly little to say about the dismissal of criminal cases as a remedy for the violation of human rights. Meanwhile, both Article 9 of the ICCPR and Article 5 ECHR make it imperative that a person be released if his detention was unlawful. I take it for granted that, in the case of more serious violations of these Articles, the nature of this particular remedy rules out any possibility of re-arresting the suspect or the accused." In that respect, one cannot agree with Zappalà (see n. 612) that the submissions of the three ICTY suspects were incorrect and inappropriate. A judge may very well agree with the suspect filing the submission that the latter, if his right to liberty and security has been seriously violated (irrespective of who was responsible for these violations), should not only be released; the judge may also be of the opinion that jurisdiction in that case should be refused, thus leading to the real ending of the case. Cf. also Rayfuse 1993, p. 882, who argues that certain (serious) violations of these human rights must lead to a male detentus outcome (even though these human rights do not mention this outcome): "It will be argued that State-sponsored abductions are a violation of the internationally recognised fundamental human rights to liberty and security of the person and freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention and that courts lack jurisdiction to try defendants who are brought before them in violation of these rights." Rayfuse founds her arguments on an analogy to the "poison fruit" doctrine, see ibid., pp. 894*ff*. Although the word used is rather neutral ("liberate"), it appears that Frowein would also be of the opinion that an abduction would have to lead to a male detentus outcome, see Frowein 1997, p. 294: "There is no doubt that the abduction of a person from foreign territory by state organs is a violation of the right to personal liberty, since only the organs of that foreign state can lawfully deprive the person of his or her liberty. As soon as national courts are willing to enforce these rules of international law by reaching the only possible conclusion, namely to liberate the person, the practice of state-organized abduction will become less attractive." Note finally that Zappalà (2003, p. 72) also admits that refusal of jurisdiction may be appropriate, but only in the specific situation where the problem has become structural: "Of course, the problem would be far more serious if one could prove a consistent pattern of violations of the rights of individuals by State or international authorities performing arrests at the request of ad hoc Tribunals. In this case it could be argued that the Tribunals should react vigorously, for example by adopting a specific rule providing for the quashing of proceedings based on arrests inconsistent with individual rights [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

It can be argued that the remedy of release pursuant to paragraph 4 of Articles 9 of the ICCPR and 5 of the ECHR is not without its problems; if a person has been the victim of an unlawful arrest/detention (but not one which is so serious that it leads to the ending of the case), he must, strictly speaking, be released. However, as explained, that does not preclude re-arrest on the spot and being brought to trial.[615] (This will especially be the case if the suspect is charged with serious crimes and prosecution is considered to be of utmost importance.) In such a case, the prosecuting authorities could assert that this 'remedy' (the 'release') has repaired the initial iniuria of the irregularity and that the trial can continue as normal. However, in that case, the suspect would only be granted a pro forma remedy which [615] Cf. also the following words from Lord Lowry in the still-to-discuss Bennett case, seemingly writing about a 'normal' unlawful arrest: "A person wrongfully arrested here can seek release by applying for a writ of habeas corpus but, once released, can be lawfully arrested, charged and brought to trial. His earlier wrongful arrest is not essentially connected with his proposed trial and the proceedings against him will not be stayed as an abuse of process." (House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 164.) This may be different when the judge in question does not only decide that the suspect, because of the human rights violations, has to be released, but also that he suspect must be permitted to leave the prosecuting State. In cases where the suspect is not charged with serious crimes or in cases where one can wonder whether there should have been a trial in the first place, this release will then constitute a de facto male detentus outcome, for one can imagine that this release will be the ending of the case, see, for example, the cases of Celiberti de Casariego and Lopez Burgos before the HRC, where the Committee stated that Uruguay, among other things, had to release Celiberti de Casariego and Lopez Burgos and to permit her/him to leave Uruguay.

does not comport with the idea that a remedy must be real and effective, see also Article 2, paragraph 3 (a) of the ICCPR and Article 13 of the ECHR.[616]

In addition, the pro forma release does not take account of the exact seriousness of the irregularity. In other words: it is not only a pro forma remedy but also an over-simplified remedy.

It would arguably be better if a judge would therefore avoid this problematic remedy of release and would, if he determines that a person's arrest/detention is unlawful, simply grant the most appropriate remedy which takes into account all the specifics of the case, not only the seriousness of the male captus, but also the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes and the importance of having the case continued.[617] If one follows that route, then one can still satisfy the common sense

[616] See also the still-to-discuss (see Subsection 3.2.1 of Chapter VI) Barayagwiza case where the ICTR judges held: "[T]o order the release of the Appellant without prejudice – particularly in light of what we are certain would be his immediate re-arrest – could be seen as having cured the prior illegal detention. That would open the door for the Prosecutor to argue (assuming arguendo the eventual conviction of the Appellant) that the Appellant would not then be entitled to credit for that period of detention (...) on the grounds that the release was the remedy for the violation of his rights. The net result of this could be to place the Appellant in a worse position than he would have been in had he not raised this appeal. This would effectively result in the Appellant being punished for exercising his right to bring this appeal." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 110.) Cf. also the following discussion in the still-to-discuss (see Subsection 3.1 of Chapter V) Sinclair case. In this case, the Lord Justice-Clerk (Lord MacDonald) argued: "I fail to see what benefit the complainer could obtain by being liberated. There is nothing to prevent him from being re-apprehended at once." (High Court of Justiciary, Sinclair v. Her Majesty's Advocate and Another, 20 March 1890, 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 42, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 8.) Lord Adam, however, replied: "I cannot say that I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the suspender would be no better if we granted this suspension. The same reasons which would have moved us to that course might be sufficient to prevent his re-apprehension, and so enable him to get off altogether. I think he would be entitled to have sufficient time allowed him to return to the place from which he had been illegally brought." (Ibid., p. 9.) Such a release and permission to leave the forum State is reminiscent of the HRC's position in the cases of Celiberti de Casariego and Lopez Burgos (see the previous footnote). (Note that Lord Adam, however, does not preclude that the suspect might be re-arrested if he stays in the forum State: "After a certain time, no doubt, he would be held to be staying here of his own free will, and so liable to be apprehended." (Ibid., p. 9.)) The third and final lord, Lord M'Laren argued: "I may say further that, as the Lord Advocate might have the suspender immediately re-apprehended, I should on this ground also be indisposed to sustain this bill, because the liberation obtained under it would not be effective. If the suspender were liberated now he would be in the same position as that of an accused person under an indictment that had been found irrelevant, or which had been deserted pro loco et tempore." (Ibid., p. 10.)

[617] Cf. in that respect the remarks of Groenhuijsen and Knigge 2004, writing more generally on the legal consequences of illegalities in the Dutch criminal investigation (in the context of their research project Criminal Procedure 2001). They state (at pp. 153-155 [the following is a(n unofficial) translation of the most important points from the original Dutch text, ChP]) that already because of the divergent aims of connecting consequences to the observation that certain rules have been violated (such as reparation, prevention and compensation), it is not obvious to create, in the law, an abstract balancing of interests and to apply fixed sanctions to the non-compliance of certain formal requirements. Moreover, there will also be several circumstances of the individual case which should play a role in determining the most appropriate reaction to such non-compliance. Groenhuijsen and Knigge then turn to the study written by Baaijens-van Geloven (see Baaijens-van Geloven 2004, p. 341*ff*) and note that it considered, among other things, the following factors to be of importance: - the nature of the formal requirement, the interest served by the requirement, the suspect's concrete defence interest, the nature and seriousness of the violation (which is determined by, among other things, the length and degree by which the principles of proper procedure have been infringed), the seriousness of the criminal offence (which is of importance in view of assessing the proportionality and subsidiarity of the investigative acts), the extent to which the investigative agency in question can be reproached (did one act intentionally or with gross negligence of official duty or did one act bona fides) and the causal connection between the unlawful act and the result of investigation. [The last factor specifically dealt with 'tainted' evidence and will hence not be mentioned here. Before returning to the words of Groenhuijsen and Knigge, it must be noted that they mention the factor 'seriousness of the criminal offence' here in the context of assessing the proportionality and subsidiarity of the investigative acts. However, that has to do with the question as to whether, in view of the seriousness of the alleged crimes, the investigative acts can be seen as lawful. That is, of course, a very important point (some far-going investigative acts can only be lawfully applied to suspects of serious crimes), but not the point in which this study is interested, namely whether one can take into account the seriousness of the alleged crimes when determining the consequences of (established) unlawful conduct. However, it can be argued that Groenhuijsen and Knigge take the seriousness of the alleged crimes also into account in the context of that second question. This can not only be deduced from the study by Baaijens-van Geloven, which mentions (see Baaijens-van Geloven 2004, pp. 358-359, see also n. 160 of Chapter VII) the factor in the context of both questions (when determining the consequences of established unlawful conduct and when determining whether the investigative acts can be seen as proportional/subsidiary/lawful), and to which Groenhuijsen and Knigge refer, but also from the remainder of their text, see the italicised words infra, ChP.] On the basis of these factors, it is to be assumed that the judge needs to determine, on a case-by-case-basis, the most appropriate sanction for an established illegality. However, Groenhuijsen and Knigge continue, this balancing of applicable interests must then be legally 'pre-structured'. In the system of the Dutch Code of Criminal Procedure, the judge needs to have a tool which ensures that the outcome of a concrete case is both predictable and understandable. According to Groenhuijsen and Knigge, this tool is included, in particular, in the so-called decision-scheme of Artt. 348 and 350 of the Dutch Code of Criminal Procedure. [For those proficient in Dutch, these articles read: "De rechtbank onderzoekt op den grondslag der telastlegging en naar aanleiding van het onderzoek op de terechtzitting de geldigheid der dagvaarding, hare bevoegdheid tot kennisneming van het telastegelegde feit en de ontvankelijkheid van den officier van justitie en of er redenen zijn voor schorsing der vervolging." (Art. 348.) "Indien het onderzoek in artikel 348 bedoeld, niet leidt tot toepassing van artikel 349, eerste lid [This provision reads (again in Dutch): "Indien het onderzoek in het voorgaande artikel bedoeld, daartoe aanleiding geeft, spreekt de rechtbank uit de nietigheid der dagvaarding, hare onbevoegdheid, de niet-ontvankelijkheid van den officier van justitie of de schorsing der vervolging." ChP.], beraadslaagt de rechtbank op den grondslag der telastlegging en naar aanleiding van het onderzoek op de terechtzitting over de vraag of bewezen is dat het feit door den verdachte is begaan, en, zoo ja, welk strafbaar feit het bewezen verklaarde volgens de wet oplevert; indien wordt aangenomen dat het feit bewezen en strafbaar is, dan beraadslaagt de rechtbank over de strafbaarheid van den verdachte en over de oplegging van straf of maatregel, bij de wet bepaald." (Art. 350.), ChP.] This leads to the following points of departure. The idea behind the immediate re-arrest mentioned above, namely that suspects of serious crimes must be prosecuted if possible – although a male detentus must, of course, also not be excluded for these suspects – but one will also avoid the strange pro forma release and immediate re-arrest and replace it with real remedies, such as a reduction of the sentence and/or compensation. The judge can then take the exact seriousness of the irregularity into account – including, perhaps, the fact that it was inadmissibility of the Prosecution is especially then the appropriate answer when the non-compliance entails that one can no longer speak of a fair trial. Groenhuijsen and Knigge are of the opinion that the question is not whether the non-compliance seriously violates the principles of proper procedure but whether initiating or continuing a prosecution in spite of such non-compliance would violate fundamental principles of law. In this context, a suspect's right to a fair trial and the principle of fair balancing emerge as central criteria. [Groenhuijsen and Knigge then turn to the sanction of exclusion of evidence, but this is less interesting for the present study, ChP.] Another possibility is a reduction of the sentence, which can be seen as a sort of residual sanction and which can be applied if the rights of the suspect have been violated by illegality, but not to such an extent that one needs to resort to the inadmissibility of the Prosecution. This can, for example, be the case because the investigating authorities have acted bona fides, or because the non-compliance of the legal requirements or the violation of the principles of proper procedure are of minor gravity in view of the criminal offence. [See the argument made supra that Groenhuijsen and Knigge also take the seriousness of the alleged crimes into account when determining the consequences of unlawful conduct, ChP.] Finally, one must let in the possibility of connecting no concrete legal consequence whatsoever to a legal error in the pre-trial phase. Such a declaratory statement is not without importance, but as it does not bring about redress or reparation, the judge should acknowledge this option with some restraint. It must be clarified that the above-mentioned information from Groenhuijsen and Knigge, which applies to Dutch courts, will, in principle, not be used in the context of arrest (aanhouding) and police custody (inverzekeringstelling) as in the Netherlands, it is not the court, but the examining/investigating judge (rechter-commissaris) who is supervising the legality of those means of coercion. (See Baaijens-van Geloven 2004, p. 347. See also the critical remarks of Franken 2004, pp. 18-19 on this point.) The examining judge, if he is of the opinion that a person's detention is unlawful, can only release the suspect. (Cf. Art. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR and Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR.) Nevertheless, as already stated, such a release does not preclude an immediate new arrest. It is submitted that if that happens, if the examining judge releases a suspect and that suspect is immediately re-arrested, or if the examining judge, after such an order for release has been ordered, nevertheless decides to continue to detain the suspect on the basis of another request from the Prosecution, for example, because of the seriousness of the alleged crimes, the court in the end trying the case should take into account the findings of the examining judge on the unlawful arrest/detention (which may include international, cross-border elements) and should grant an appropriate remedy. If the court would not do so, then irregularities are arguably not properly remedied. Cf. in that respect the following words (again unfortunately only in Dutch) from a rather recent (and purely domestic) case before the District Court of Rotterdam: "Gelet op het voorgaande en het feit dat de verdachte in laatstgenoemde belangen wel degelijk is geschaad dient de inverzekeringstelling onrechtmatig te worden geoordeeld en dient de verdachte (in formeel juridische zin) onmiddellijk in vrijheid te worden gesteld. Gezien het feit dat thans echter ook een vordering tot inbewaringstelling voorligt, de ernst van de in die vordering omschreven strafbare feiten, alsmede de daarin door de officier van justitie opgevoerde (onderzoeks)gronden wordt feitelijk van de invrijheidstelling van de verdachte afgezien en wordt overgegaan tot de (rauwelijkse) inbewaringstelling van de verdachte. Met vooromschreven gang van zaken wordt in strikt juridische zin door de volgens vaste jurisprudentie daartoe bij uitstek geschikt geachte functionaris, de rechter-commissaris, het juiste en enig mogelijke rechtsgevolg, de onmiddellijke invrijheidstelling, verbonden aan een verzuim dat kleeft aan een bevel tot toepassing van een vrijheidsbenemend dwangmiddel. Hierdoor ontstaat echter ook de op zichzelf genomen onwenselijke situatie dat het verzuim (thans) de facto zonder enig rechtsgevolg blijft." (District Court of Rotterdam, Section Criminal Law, 1 June 2007, LJN: BA6232, Rechtbank Rotterdam, 10/610093-07.)

---

perpetrated by private individuals (see the final words of Subsection 3.2.1) – in determining how much the sentence should be reduced or how much compensation one should accord the suspect. Such a solution would arguably be fairer to the suspect and more capable of putting flexibility into the system.

Furthermore, this solution also avoids the (justified) criticism one may expect from various actors if a suspect of serious crimes is released for an irregularity which is not so serious as to lead to the ending of the case (in such serious cases, the public must understand that the court has no option but to refuse jurisdiction and to release (but now in a 'real' way) the suspect), but which nevertheless ensures that the detention must be qualified as unlawful[618] and that, strictly speaking, the suspect must be released. Even if that suspect, given his alleged serious crimes, will probably be re-arrested on the spot, one can assume that the public/the international community/the victims will not grasp how, for example, a suspect of genocide can be released because he has not been promptly informed of the reasons for his arrest, especially if that person is not re-arrested and flees.[619]

As will be shown in the remainder of this book, these important points will often recur.

Returning to the second consequence (return in the case of a violation of State sovereignty) and its relationship with the male detentus outcome, a judge may order the return of the suspect to his State of residence if that State has protested the abduction[620] executed by agents of the forum State and has demanded the suspect's return and if the Executive of the forum State has not yet returned the person itself. This will normally lead to the ending of the case before that court of the forum State as one can imagine that the State which was injured by the abduction, the State of residence, will not readily cooperate with the forum State, the State which abducted the suspect without consent from the territory of the State of residence, in a new handover.[621] In addition, it may also be the case that extradition is not possible (this may have been the reason why the forum State had resorted to abduction in the first place). And even if that State had nevertheless been capable of handing the suspect over, had forgiven the forum State's actions and had transferred the suspect back to the forum State, the judges in the latter State may still be of the opinion that the [619] Note that this does not mean, however, that such a suspect cannot be released in certain cases (besides the situation that he is released because the judge is of the opinion that the case must be stopped). If a judge reviewing a suspect's detention feels that the suspect will appear at trial, there is no longer a need to hold him in detention while awaiting trial. In such a case, the suspect can, of course, be provisionally released pending trial, with or without conditions.

[618] Swart, for example, explains that "a failure to promptly inform the person of the reasons for his arrest and of any charges against him makes his detention illegal." (Swart 2001, p. 204.)

[620] As explained, a judge may, of course, also order the return of the suspect who has been the victim of a luring operation, but one can imagine that judges will do so less often than in the case of an abduction as the violation of international law in the latter case can be seen as more serious than in the case of a luring operation (if there was a violation of State sovereignty at all).

[621] Nevertheless, it can, of course, be tried, see also Rayfuse 1993, p. 896 (writing on an individual whose presence has been secured in violation of international law): "Principle therefore suggests that the individual must be returned to the place from whence he came and from whence his presence before the courts of the "abducting" State can be sought by legal means."

return of the suspect to his State of residence may have healed the wrong against the State of residence, but not the violations of the suspect's human rights and the due process requirements, and that as a result of that, they must again refuse jurisdiction.

With respect to the third consequence: although the words stay/discontinue (the proceedings) strictly speaking may not mean a final end to the case, one can assume, if a court decides, for example, to stay the proceedings because of a serious male captus, for instance, a violent abduction executed by authorities from the forum State, that that stay is normally final and does mean the absolute ending of the case.[622] This may, however, be different with respect to other irregularities which are more easily reparable. In those cases, the stay of the proceedings can be conditional and may be lifted.[623]

---

[622] See, for example, the following words from the still-to-discuss (see Subsection 1.2 of Chapter V) Latif case: "[P]roceedings may be stayed in the exercise of the judge's discretion not only where a fair trial is impossible but also where it would be contrary to the public interest in the integrity of the criminal justice system that a trial should take place." (House of Lords, Lord Steyn, Regina v. Latif; Regina v. Shazad, 18 January 1996, 1 W.L.R. 112-113 [1996].) If the judges have established that a fair trial is impossible or that it would be contrary to the public interest in the integrity of the criminal justice system that a trial should take place, then a suspect cannot, of course, be tried anew after being released from custody. After all, that would arguably contradict the entire rationale why he was released in the first place. See also these words from the still-to-discuss (see also Subsection 1.2 of Chapter V) Bennett case: "[A] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case." (House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161.) (See also n. 610 and accompanying text.)

[623] Cf. also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber I entitled "Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Article 54(3)(e) agreements and the application to stay the prosecution of the accused, together with certain other issues raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008"' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 OA 13, 21 October 2008, para. 75: "It is clear that the Trial Chamber intended to impose a stay that was conditional and therefore potentially only temporary: as set out above, the Trial Chamber imposed the stay of the proceedings because it had come to the conclusion that in the circumstances of the case, where a large number of potentially exculpatory information or information material to the preparation of the defence had neither been disclosed to the accused person nor to the Chamber, there was no prospect of a fair trial. The Trial Chamber acknowledged, however, that circumstances might change, in particular should the information providers alter their position and give their consent to the disclosure of the documents in question. At paragraph 91 of the Impugned Decision, the Trial Chamber underlined that "on the information before the Chamber, [there is no prospect] that the present deficiencies will be corrected" (emphasis added). At paragraph 94 of the Impugned Decision, the Trial Chamber referred to its "authority or legal competence" to lift the stay. The Trial Chamber also stated at paragraph 97 of the Impugned Decision that it would address certain other issues that had been pending "if the stay of the proceedings is lifted hereafter". Already at the status conference on 10 June 2008, the Presiding Judge of the Trial Chamber distinguished "a final decision halting the proceedings ... forever" from "imposing a stay ... which doesn't terminate the proceedings once and for all but which recognises [that] at present it is not possible for there to be a fair trial, but in due course, depending on changed circumstances, it may be possible for there to be a fair trial" (ICC-01/04-01/06-T-89-ENG, page 40, lines 8 to 13). Thus, the Trial Chamber envisaged that the stay it imposed may not be irreversible and absolute." Choo (1993, p. 7) writes on the nature of the stay: "A stay typically takes the form of an order that an indictment remain on file with the instruction that it not be proceeded with. A stay is not

A final point which must be stressed in this chapter is that a male captus male detentus outcome is indeed the ending of the case before the court of the forum State, but this is not the same as impunity for the suspect as he might be tried before a court in another State which has nothing to do with the male captus. Although a transfer to another jurisdiction would heal the problem that the State whose authorities were involved in the male captus takes advantage of their wrongdoing, it will probably not be of much help to the suspect, whose only 'remedy' for the male captus would be that he is tried by another court. One could therefore argue that in such cases, it would be appropriate if the new trying forum would also take into account the fact that the suspect had earlier been the victim of a male captus, even if the authorities of the State of that court had nothing to do with the male captus.

technically an acquittal, although for all practical purposes it may have the same effect. The revival of a stayed prosecution, without the leave of the court, is likely itself to be considered an abuse of process and to be stayed accordingly [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

PART 3

MALE CAPTUS BENE DETENTUS IN PRACTICE

CHAPTER IV
INTRODUCTION

In contrast to the other parts of this book, Part 3 needs a separate introduction to explain in more detail how this part, the biggest part of the book,[1] is to be tackled

[1] Admittedly, the following two chapters contain many cases and the most important ones are very extensively examined, following the original texts of the decisions as often as possible. However, there is a reason for this. Overviews of male captus case law by national courts and tribunals are often criticised for being selective/not complete enough or simply incorrect(ly summarised). See in that respect, for example, Sloan (2006, p. 328), criticising the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in the Nikolić case (which will be discussed in Chapter VI): "It is, of course, perfectly appropriate for the ICTY to turn to national law where there are gaps in international criminal law – a relatively young part of international law – and it has done so many times in the past. But it must be acknowledged that this gap-filling process vests in the ICTY judges a tremendous discretion in deciding what national jurisdictions to consult (it would be impractical to consult the national jurisdictions of each and every state in the world), what the characteristics of national law in the jurisdictions consulted are and which particular aspects of this national law are applicable to the ICTY in view of its many differences from a national system. While this discretion is necessary and desirable, with it must come a duty on the part of the judges to be balanced and comprehensive (or at least relatively so) in their analysis of the national law and clear in their reasoning as to why the law of one national jurisdiction is apposite – and why that of another is not. Unfortunately, in the Nikolić decision the Appeals Chamber's treatment of national case law was flawed; it was neither comprehensive – giving the impression of selectivity – nor clearly reasoned, at times relying on cases that are either inappropriate or controversial, and at times failing to cite a source at all [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., p. 338: "[T]he analysis of the Appeals Chamber regarding the impact on its jurisdiction of the violation of sovereignty and of human rights is inadequate. It leaves the impression of selectivity. Of course, an Appeals Chamber is not in a position to consult every jurisdiction of the world before filling the gaps that exist in international criminal law. But a more thoroughgoing approach is called for, particularly as regards such an important and controversial issue." See further the following comments of Sluiter with respect to the ICTY Trial Chamber's decision in the Dokmanović case (which will also be discussed in Chapter VI): "In terms of international law, the ad hoc Tribunals are bound by those domestic rules and practices which may be considered general principles of law recognized by civilized nations[.] If the Chamber wishes to establish the existence of such principles with respect to the arrest of indicted persons, it has not succeeded through this comparative legal exercise. The Trial Chamber believed that [s]trong support for a certain view could be derived from national systems. What followed, however, was a very rudimentary and selective analysis of domestic jurisprudence, in which the focus lay with jurisprudence from one particular jurisdiction, that of the United States." (Sluiter 2001, p. 155.) As will also be shown in the following pages, this study is often critical of such overviews as well. Nevertheless, it must also be understood that judges (and their staff) have many cases to decide and do not have as much time as the author of this study has had to delve into this topic. Because the aim of this study is not to criticise but to help judges struggling with the male captus problem, it is to be hoped that a very extensive and detailed methodologically.[2] Part 3 is devoted to the question of how other courts than the ICC have dealt with the dilemmas male captus cases can engender. It is submitted that, on the basis of the material presented in this part, one should be able to make a comparative assessment of the ICC's current male captus position. However, which courts should be looked at here? As already stated in the first chapter of this study, the two main categories are courts dealing with inter-State cases and international and internationalised (or hybrid) criminal tribunals other than the ICC.

The second category is the least problematic: as their 'stock' of male captus cases appears to be limited, an analysis of all the 'real'[3] male captus cases from this context will be undertaken. This will be done in Chapter VI.

The first category is a different question, though, as there is a huge amount of case law discernible here. Hence, although it might be regrettable from the point of view of thoroughness, it is necessary from the point of practical feasibility to make a selection.[4] This study has chosen to look mainly at the (adversarial) common law system and the (inquisitorial) romano-germanic or civil law system.[5]

The prime reason for this choice is that the common and civil law systems are not only the main legal families in the world,[6] but they are arguably also (or perhaps because of the fact that they are the main legal families in the world?) the two legal overview of male captus case law from both the inter-State context and the context of the international(ised) criminal tribunals, following the original texts of the decisions as often as possible, may be useful for judges who do not have much time but who are nevertheless in need of more information on the male captus discussion. Although this study, of course, cannot guarantee that Chapter VII, which presents the principles distilled from Chapters V and VI, is faultless, it has in any case tried to minimize the risk of making mistakes by addressing many cases (in considerable detail).

---

[2] See also n. 55 of Chapter I.

[3] That is: the cases where the alleged male captus played an important role in the proceedings (whether or not the tribunal in question determined that there was a male captus). As will be shown in Chapter VI, however, a number of unlawful arrest/detention claims was withdrawn or immediately rejected and no longer paid attention to, see, for example, ns. 138, 801 and 1286 of that chapter. These cases cannot and thus will not be addressed in the same manner as the 'real' male captus cases, although some attention may nevertheless be paid to them.

[4] In the words of Zweigert, Kötz and Weir: "[A]lthough making a selection may be painful, it is unavoidable on practical grounds." (Zweigert, Kötz and Weir 1998, p. 42.) This remark was made in the context of their own field of research, namely comparative law (methodology).

[5] See Zappalà 2003, p. 16 for more information on these two models.

[6] See Raimondo 2008, pp. 179 and 194. See also Zappalà 2003, p. 17: "It is true that there are forms of criminal procedure other than those based on these two models. In this respect it may be admitted that the choice made is not necessarily acceptable. However, the main reasons for this choice are the belief and awareness that these are the most common paradigms in legal science. (…) At present the accusatorial-inquisitorial dichotomy still prevails [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Although this study has principally chosen for these systems, it is aware of the fact that such a categorisation may be viewed to be a little artificial as countries' legal systems nowadays are often a mix of common and civil law. See also Swart 2002 B, pp. 1598-1599: "Simplifying matters considerably, one may say that, in the present world, two models of conducting criminal proceedings dominate the international scene: the adversarial model of common-law systems of justice and the inquisitorial model of civil-law systems. (...) [C]ommon-law systems do not form a monolithic block, and the same is even more true for civil-law systems [emphasis added, ChP]." That is also the reason why this study does not want to look at cases which clearly derive from these two systems only; it will also look at interesting cases not clearly falling within one of these systems, see Section 3 of Chapter V.

systems most interesting for the purpose of comparison with the ICC.[7] See in that respect the following words of Schabas:

> The procedural regime of the International Criminal Court is largely a hybrid of two different systems: the adversarial approach of the English common law and the inquisitorial approach of the Napoleonic code and other European legislations of the Romano-Germanic tradition (often described as the 'civil law' system).[8]

The reviews of the common – in particular[9] – and civil law systems will not only look at more recent cases but also at some older ones in the hope of seeing more clearly whether the maxim is developing in a certain direction or not. In addition, attention will be paid to both 'ordinary' suspects and suspects of the more serious

[7] See also Zappalà 2003, p. 17: "[T]hese models have to an overwhelming extent dominated the debates in the relevant international fora in which the Statutes and Rules of the Tribunals and the Court were drafted."

[8] Schabas 2004, p. 117. See also Arsanjani 1999, p. 25 ("[T]he provisions dealing with general principles and procedural issues are a hybrid of the common and the civil law.") and Gallant 2003 B, p. 557, n. 16: "[T]he International Criminal Court will use a hybrid of common law and civil law processes". See in that respect also the Appeals Chamber's decision in the Lubanga Dyilo case (see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006) where the judges, after having discussed the common law concept of abuse of process, looked at the Romano-Germanic systems of law. Note finally that there are also writers such as Kress who do not believe that the ICC's procedural law is a hybrid of these two legal systems but that the former is a truly unique, sui generis system. Nevertheless, even in that case, Kress, in his efforts to grasp the nature of this unique system, still compares the ICC system with the common/adversarial and civil/inquisitorial law systems: "I would suggest that neither common law nor civil law can be seen as the main reference point for establishing the law governing the procedure before the ICC. Moreover, I would also argue that there actually is no other major point of reference outside the law of the ICC. The ICC negotiators neither copied any of the so-called mixed adversarial – inquisitorial systems that one increasingly finds all over the world, nor did they choose to follow the hybrid process that has evolved over time before the ICTY and ICTR. Taken as a whole, the procedural law of the ICC is, thus, not only new but also truly unique. (…) Where, then, on the sliding scale between the pure models of adversarial and inquisitorial proceedings can we locate ICC procedural law [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]?" (Kress 2003, p. 605.)

[9] See Cassese 1999, p. 168: "Although the common law system has been basically adopted, a number of fundamental elements typical of the civil law approach have been incorporated." See also Stapleton 1999, p. 551. See further Swart 2002 B, p. 1601: "A comparison of the Rome Statute with the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals reveals that in the Statute, too, there is a mixture of adversarial and inquisitorial elements. Again, the adversarial elements largely prevail, although there is stronger contribution of the inquisitorial tradition, especially where the structure of pre-trial investigations is concerned." See also ibid., p. 1604: "[T]he Rome Statute has in common with the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals that proceedings are predominantly shaped after the example of adversarial systems." See further Zappalà 2002 B, p. 1320: "International criminal law has been deeply influenced by the adversarial system, which is generally considered the most appropriate system in terms of protection of the rights of defendants. The systems of the Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals, as well as the UN ad hoc Tribunals, essentially hinged on the adversarial model. The ICC model, although some elements of the inquisitorial model are present, is also essentially adversarial." See finally Sluiter 2006 C, p. 616 (and 2007, p. 8). The more practical reason that one will find much more cases and literature in the common law context than in the civil law context on the male captus problem has also played a role here.

international crimes such as torture, terrorism, war crimes and crimes against humanity. This will be done in order to see whether judges react differently when confronted by suspects of different 'qualities'.[10] Furthermore, addressing a considerable number of decisions from supreme courts will be attempted as those decisions have de iure and de facto the most legal authority (although important cases from the male captus discussion which were not decided by a supreme court (a good example is the Toscanino case) will, of course, also be examined). Moreover, with respect to the different male captus situations introduced in Chapter III, an attempt will be made to cover them all. Nevertheless, most attention will hereby be paid to the cases dealing with irregular arrests such as (alleged) kidnappings.

Although Chapter V will focus on cases from the common and civil law systems, it will also look, as a sort of safety net, at cases which do not clearly fall under both legal systems but which are nevertheless often mentioned in the male captus discussion (see also footnote 6).

Finally, it should be noted that Chapters V and VI, as well as describing and analysing the male captus decisions, will also discuss, where necessary for a better understanding of the problem, reactions from doctrine and from other States regarding these decisions.

After the review of these two categories – the cases from the inter-State context (whether decided by national or international institutions) and the cases from the context of the international and internationalised (or hybrid) criminal tribunals – the final chapter of this part, Chapter VII, will summarise and discuss the principles derived from these overviews.

[10] Cf. also Shaw 2003, p. 605: "A final distinction may be drawn as between cases depending upon the type of offences with which the offender is charged, so that the problem of the apprehension interfering with the prosecution may be seen as less crucial in cases where recognised international crimes are alleged [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

CHAPTER V
CASES BETWEEN STATES

1 CASES FROM THE COMMON LAW SYSTEM

1.1 Older cases

In Section 4 of Chapter II, the English case Ex Parte Susannah Scott[1] from 1829 was presented to the reader. When the English police officer Ruthven apprehended Scott, who was indicted for perjury, in Brussels, Scott vainly applied to the English Ambassador in that city for assistance. In England, Judge Tenterden of the Court of King's Bench refused her discharge (release), stating:

> The question, therefore, is this, whether if a person charged with a crime is found in this country, it is the duty of the Court to take care that such a party shall be amenable to justice, or whether we are to consider the circumstances under which she was brought here. I thought, and still continue to think, that we cannot inquire into them. If the acts complained of were done against the law of a foreign country, that country might have vindicated its own law. If it gave her a right of action, she may sue upon it [emphasis added, ChP].[2]

Thus, an irregular arrest abroad will not imperil the exercise of jurisdiction in another State for it is not within the power of the judges (see the word "cannot") to examine the circumstances of the apprehension. What one can see here is that the judge does not deny that something irregular may have happened abroad, but that this is not something this judge can look into. Perhaps the person who claims to have been unlawfully arrested can sue the arresting actor[3] and perhaps the State

[1] Court of King's Bench, Lord Chief Justice Tenterden, Ex parte Susannah Scott, 19 May 1829, 9 Barnewall & Cresswell's King's Bench Reports (1829), pp. 446-448; 109 English Reports (1829), pp. 166-167.

[2] Ibid., 9 Barnewall & Cresswell's King's Bench Reports (1829), p. 448; 109 English Reports (1829), p. 167.

[3] A very interesting example of this reasoning can also be found in the following case. Although this decision should not be included in the overview itself because the suspect was not brought from one national jurisdiction to another, the more general (and 'international') quotation of the judge is very illustrative for the present discussion and hence deserves to be mentioned here. In the 1867 case R. v. Nelson and Brand (Facts from this case have been taken from Wood Renton 1898, pp. 403*ff.*), Lord whose laws were breached by the arrest can demand the extradition of the arresting party, but these are separate proceedings with which this judge has nothing to do. One could call this the non-inquiry doctrine:[4] the judge will not look at the way in which a person came into the power of the now prosecuting State. The reason for this may be found in the fact that many judges in those days[5] were of the opinion that the judge should only focus on the regularity of the proceedings in the courtroom, hence adhering to an arguably rather restricted version of the concept of fair trial,[6] namely excluding entirely how the suspect came into the jurisdiction of

Chief Justice Sir Alexander Cockburn was asked to instruct the Grand Jury at the Central Criminal Court in London concerning the 1865 Morant Bay Rebellion in Jamaica. In reaction to this revolt, the Governor of Jamaica, John Edward Eyre, proclaimed the whole county in which the rebellion occurred under martial law, with the exception of its capital Kingston. One of the alleged leaders of the uprising was George William Gordon who normally lived just outside Kingston but stayed in the capital during the events. When warrants for his arrest were issued, he went to the house of the Governor in Kingston and gave himself up. After the Governor and the Custos (the principal magistrate of Kingston) had apprehended him (in a place where martial law was not declared), Gordon was put on a war steamer and brought to Morant Bay (where martial law was in force). There, by the orders of Colonel Nelson, he was tried before a court martial, presided over by Lieutenant Brand. Gordon was convicted, sentenced to death and hanged. This event and the cruelly way in which the revolt was suppressed aroused public opinion in England, where both Nelson and Brand were indicted for murder. Although Cockburn instructed the Jury to ignore the bill of indictment against Nelson and Brand ("[O]n the grounds that there was no evidence that they had acted from a corrupt and dishonest desire to get rid of an obnoxious individual, that the initiative had been taken by the Governor and the Custos, and that the sentence of death passed upon Gordon had received official ratification." (Wood Renton 1898, p. 405)), he sharply criticised the way in which the prosecution of Gordon had been conducted. Nevertheless, in the context of the issue whether a court martial has jurisdiction when the person tried is brought within its jurisdiction in violation of municipal law (see O'Higgins 1961, p. 285), Cockburn said: "Suppose a man were to commit a crime in this country, say murder, and that before he can be apprehended he escapes into some country with which we have not got an extradition treaty, so that we could not get him delivered up to us by the authorities, and suppose that an English police officer were to pursue the malefactor, and finding him in some place where he could lay his hands upon him, and from which he could easily reach the sea, got him on board a ship and brought him before a magistrate, the magistrate could not refuse to commit him. If he were brought here for trial, it would not be a plea to the jurisdiction of the Court that he had escaped from justice, and that by some illegal means he had been brought back. It would be said, 'Nay, you are here; you are charged with having committed a crime, and you must stand your trial. We leave you to settle with the party who may have done an illegal act in bringing you into this position; settle that with him' [emphasis added, ChP]." (Ibid.) That such a remedy may not be very effective became clear in the extradition case of Xavier Auguste Parisot (Queen's Bench Division, In re Parisot, 9 March 1889, 5 T.L.R. 344-345, British International Law Cases, Vol. 5: the individual in international law (continued) aliens: extradition: fugitive offenders (1967), pp. 314-315.). In this case, in which the Scott reasoning was upheld with respect to extradition procedures, Baron Huddleston "mentioned a case in which he was counsel many years ago, in which the well-known officers, the Foresters, had illegally arrested criminals in Brussels without any extradition treaty, and they were tried at the Old Bailey, before Mr. Justice Maule, and were loud in their complaints of the illegality of their custody. But the judge said, "No doubt you may have a good action of trespass, and after the end of your 20 years' transportation, to which I propose to sentence you, you may bring your action."" (Ibid., 5 T.L.R. 344, British International Law Cases, Vol. 5: the individual in international law (continued) aliens: extradition: fugitive offenders (1967), p. 314.)

[4] Cf. also Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 645-646, Borreli 2004, p. 354 and Birkett 1991, pp. 609-610.

[5] See, however, the still-to-discuss Jolis case (from the civil law system).

[6] See also the first traditional rationale of the male captus bene detentus rule presented by Michell 1996, p. 392 (the other two will follow in a moment): "First, the rule satisfies domestic due process the now prosecuting State in the first place.[7] The judges, in their opinion, could not sensibly comment on what happened abroad. As a result, they were also not to look into the violations which allegedly occurred there. They simply had to ensure that suspects of crimes were tried.[8]

On a more normative note: one can understand that judges cannot be experts in the laws of foreign States and thus cannot (and in fact, should not) pronounce on the question whether certain conduct indeed constituted a violation of a foreign law system.[9] However, in such cases, judges could, of course, invoke the help of foreign judges to determine these issues. It would then be up to the now prosecuting judge to decide whether or not certain irregularities abroad (if any) should have an effect on the proceedings in the forum State.[10] Nevertheless, besides this question of foreign law, there is, of course, also the question of international law. One can argue that every judge should know that if a police officer of the forum State arrests a suspect on the territory of another State without that latter State's consent, a violation of international law has occurred. The judge in Scott can be criticised for not having looked into the international law violation which seemed[11] to have occurred in his case.[12] (Note, however, that this does not necessarily mean that the guarantees. According to this view, a criminal defendant is entitled only to a fair trial, and forcible abduction does not affect the fairness of the trial itself." See also Rayfuse 1993, p. 883.

---

[7] Nevertheless, this focus does not exclude that the judge will not look at pre-trial irregularities at all and that the judge is hence only concerned about what happens in the courtroom. The Scott reasoning does not exclude the possibility that a judge may look at pre-trial irregularities in England itself. It only states that a judge will not look at the way a person was brought into the State which is now prosecuting the case: "The question, therefore, is this, whether if a person charged with a crime is found in this country, it is the duty of the Court to take care that such a party shall be amenable to justice, or whether we are to consider the circumstances under which she was brought here [namely "into this country", ChP]." (Court of King's Bench, Lord Chief Justice Tenterden, Ex parte Susannah Scott, 19 May 1829, 9 Barnewall & Cresswell's King's Bench Reports (1829), p. 448; 109 English Reports (1829), p. 167.) See also the still-to-discuss (see Subsection 3.2) Vervuren case where it was stated that "the approach adopted by the United Kingdom courts in the past was that it was irrelevant how a person arrived on the airport tarmac: all that mattered was, once the person was in the United Kingdom, was he subject to due process, to fair proceedings. All the courts had been concerned about was the propriety of the domestic procedure." (High Court of Justiciary, HM Advocate v. Vervuren, 12 April 2002, 2002 S.L.T. 558.)

[8] See also the second traditional rationale of the male captus bene detentus rule presented by Michell 1996, p. 392 (the first was already mentioned in n. 6): "Second, there is a strong public interest in the prosecution of crime. The rule ensures that alleged offenders are brought to trial."

[9] See also n. 149 and accompanying text.

[10] See also n. 150 and accompanying text.

[11] It may, of course, be the case that there was consent from the Netherlands (which was by that time in charge of the State now known as Belgium, see also n. 46 of Chapter II), with the result, see Chapter III, that there was no violation of international law, but this cannot be derived from the (short) report of this case, see also Morgenstern 1953, p. 273, n. 2.

[12] See also ibid., p. 273: "[T]here is a residue of cases in which there has been a seizure of a fugitive by authorized officials of the pursuing state on the territory of the state of refuge in clear violation of one of the most fundamental rules of customary international law. The fact that some courts have in this connexion also refused to consider the manner in which an accused individual was brought before them has sometimes been due to an imperfect appreciation of the implications of the exercise of jurisdiction after an illegal seizure. In the early English case Ex parte Susannah Scott the accused had been arrested in Brussels by a British police officer. The alleged illegality of the seizure was raised at the trial. Lord judge should also refuse jurisdiction and return the suspect to the injured State. As explained in Chapter III, it is assumed that a judge must only return the suspect to the injured State if that latter State protests and requests the return of the suspect (and the Executive does not do what it should do).[13] If there is no protest, the violation of State sovereignty would not hinder the trial. Nevertheless, in that case, the judge can, of course, still refuse jurisdiction on other grounds not related to the violation of State sovereignty, for example on grounds related to due process/human rights considerations.) Perhaps, the judge in Scott was of the opinion that matters related to alleged violations of another State's sovereignty had to be resolved at the political level, between the Executives of the two States,[14] or that, now that there did not appear to be any protest from the Netherlands, this issue had become insignificant.[15]

The non-inquiry rule from Scott was also upheld (albeit for other reasons) in the next male captus bene detentus decision, that of Ker v. Illinois, which was decided by the US Supreme Court in 1886.[16]

In this case, a US citizen, Frederick M. Ker, fled to Lima, Peru, after he had been charged in the Criminal Court of Cook County, Illinois, with larceny and embezzlement from a Chicago bank. The following is what Ker argued happened subsequently. After Ker's flight, Governor Hamilton of Illinois made a requisition to Tenterden held that the Court could not inquire into the circumstances of the arrest. It is significant, however, that the learned Judge seems to have thought only in terms of a violation of Belgian law, not of international law [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Note again that in 1829, the State of Belgium did not exist yet (but was part of the Netherlands).

---

[13] See ns. 560-561 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[14] See also the third and last traditional rationale of the male captus bene detentus rule presented by Michell 1996, p. 392 (the first two were already mentioned in ns. 6 and 8, respectively): "Finally, the judiciary traditionally has held the view that courts are not the appropriate forum to adjudicate alleged violations of public international law by the executive. Instead, courts have adopted the position that any difficulties arising from an irregular arrest are best resolved diplomatically."

[15] And, as already explained, it could also be the case that there was no violation of international law at all (because of a possible consent from the Netherlands, see n. 11).

[16] US Supreme Court, Ker v. Illinois, 6 December 1886 (119 US 436). This case is part of the so-called Ker-Frisbie doctrine which, at least until the still-to-discuss Alvarez-Machain case of 1992, was seen as the US version of the male captus bene detentus rule. (Cf., for example, Cherif Bassiouni 1999, p. 253 and Wilske 2000, p. 261.) Note that the other case of the Ker-Frisbie doctrine, the 1952 case Frisbie v. Collins (US Supreme Court, Frisbie v. Collins, 10 March 1952, No. 331 (342 US 519)), will not be discussed here in detail as it concerned a case within one and the same country (namely the US). Be that as it may, the most famous words of this case (from Justice Black, delivering the opinion of the Court) go as follows: "This Court has never departed from the rule announced in Ker v. Illinois (…) that the power of a court to try a person for crime is not impaired by the fact that he had been brought within the court's jurisdiction by reason of a "forcible abduction." No persuasive reasons are now presented to justify overruling this line of cases. They rest on the sound basis that due process of law is satisfied when one present in court is convicted of crime after having been fairly apprized of the charges against him and after a fair trial in accordance with constitutional procedural safeguards. There is nothing in the Constitution that requires a court to permit a guilty person rightfully convicted to escape justice because he was brought to trial against his will [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., p. 522.) Reading the text, one cannot escape the conclusion that Frisbie adheres to a very restricted idea of a fair trial/due process, namely a fair trial in the courtroom. Nevertheless, it has also been argued that Frisbie's view of the concept of due process may, in fact, also encompass a pre-trial dimension, see n. 23.

the US Secretary of State for an extradition warrant.[17] The latter agreed and on 1 March 1883, US President Arthur issued the warrant which was directed to Henry G. Julian, an agent from the Pinkerton Detective Agency hired by the Chicago bank,[18] "to receive the defendant from the authorities of Peru, upon a charge of larceny, in compliance with the treaty between the United States and Peru on that subject".[19] Probably because of the chaotic situation in Peru caused by the War of the Pacific,[20] Julian, > without presenting [the necessary papers] to any officer of the Peruvian government, or making any demand on that government for the surrender of Ker, forcibly and with violence arrested him, placed him on board the United States vessel Essex (…), kept him a close prisoner until the arrival of that vessel at Honolulu, where after some detention, he was transferred in the same forcible manner on board another vessel (…) to San Francisco, in the State of California.[21]

From California, he was extradited to Illinois where he was tried in Cook County for embezzlement and larceny. Ker protested, of course, to what had happened and brought forward, among other things, the following objections.

The first was that his arrest in Peru and subsequent extradition were not in accordance with due process of law.[22] The Supreme Court assumed that Ker hereby implicitly referred to Section 1 of Amendment XIV of the US Constitution, which states:

---

[17] See US Supreme Court, Ker v. Illinois, 6 December 1886 (119 US 436), p. 438.
[18] See Lowenfeld 1990, p. 460.
[19] US Supreme Court, Ker v. Illinois, 6 December 1886 (119 US 436), p. 438.
[20] See DiMento and Geis 2006, p. 50. This war, also called the Saltpeter War, was fought between Chile on the one hand and Bolivia and Peru on the other hand between 1879 and 1884. See also Fairman 1953, p. 685, quoting Hunt, the Attorney General of the State of Illinois: "At this time, a state of things existed in Peru which rendered the treaty between the United States and that government inoperative. There was no Peru. The government had a nominal existence at Ariquipa, back in the mountains, eighty-five miles from Lima, but General Lynch, of the Chilian forces, was in military occupation of the capital. Pinkerton's man had no passport to go through the lines to present our demand at the mountain camp of the Peruvian government, but did what was perhaps the best thing, applied to General Lynch. This officer, doubtless thinking that security to criminals was no part of his mission in Peru, dispatched an officer to aid the detective in putting Ker on his way back to the United States." Fairman argues that, if this account is indeed true, the apprehension of Ker was actually not breaching the sovereignty of Peru at all: ""The authority of the legitimate power having in fact passed into the hands of the occupant," the military governor was indeed the authority competent to surrender a fugitive present in the occupied territory. It is obvious that to obtain custody of a fugitive one deals with the power that can put its hands upon him. If that power is willing to make delivery, it is immaterial whether there is a treaty obligation to do so, or whether the receiving government would be in a position to reciprocate. Accepting as accurate the factual recital of the Attorney General, there was no invasion of Peruvian sovereignty or other breach of international law [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Fairman 1953, pp. 685-686.) See also n. 102 and accompanying text of Chapter III where it was explained that no sovereignty can be violated if there is no effective government present in the country where the alleged kidnapping took place.
[21] US Supreme Court, Ker v. Illinois, 6 December 1886 (119 US 436), p. 438.
[22] See ibid., p. 439.

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States*; nor shall any state deprive any person of* life*, liberty*, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws [emphasis added, ChP].

Justice Miller, who delivered the opinion of the Supreme Court, pointed out that this section may indeed have a pre-trial dimension,[23] but that a suspect could not argue that, because of "mere irregularities in the manner in which he may be brought into the custody of the law"[24] (which thus includes the forcible abduction of this case), he should not be tried at all.[25]

Hence, even though judges can look at pre-trial irregularities abroad (in that sense, this case is different from the Scott case), they will not look at them within the context of the question as to whether the forcible abduction should lead to a male detentus, for this is futile. After all, such an abduction will never lead to a male detentus. Interestingly, Justice Miller also referred to the seriousness of the charge,

---

[23] In that respect, this case seems to be different from the Frisbie v. Collins case, see n. 16. However, it has also been noted in the same footnote that it has been argued that Frisbie may also be viewed as a case recognising that the concept of due process encompasses a pre-trial dimension, see Anonymous 1975, p. 816: "Ker and Frisbie reflect a judgment not that due process is limited to the guarantee of a fair trial, but that interstate or international abduction is not misconduct sufficiently egregious to justify releasing the defendant [original footnote omitted, ChP]." The author explains with respect to Frisbie (ibid., p. 817, n. 22): "In Frisbie the Court did use language to the effect that due process is satisfied by a fair trial, 342 U.S. at 522, but that language was immediately followed by the assertion that "[t]here is nothing in the Constitution that requires a court to permit a guilty person rightfully convicted to escape justice because he was brought to trial against his will." Id. That the broad language in Frisbie limiting the scope of due process should be read in light of the specific factual situation before the Court in that case is supported by the fact that the Court had advanced a very different view of due process some months earlier in Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952) (due process requires exclusion of evidence derived from police misconduct which shocks the conscience)."

[24] US Supreme Court, Ker v. Illinois, 6 December 1886 (119 US 436), p. 440.

[25] See ibid.: "The "due process of law" here guaranteed is complied with when the party is regularly indicted by the proper grand jury in the State court, has a trial according to the forms and modes prescribed for such trials, and when, in that trial and proceedings, he is deprived of no rights to which he is lawfully entitled. We do not intend to say that there may not be proceedings previous to the trial, in regard to which the prisoner could invoke in some manner the provision of this clause of the Constitution, but, for mere irregularities in the manner in which he may be brought into the custody of the law, we do not think he is entitled to say that he should not be tried at all for the crime with which he is charged in a regular indictment. He may be arrested for a very heinous offence by persons without any warrant, or without any previous complaint, and brought before a proper officer, and this may be in some sense said to be "without due process of law." But it would hardly be claimed, that after the case had been investigated and the defendant held by the proper authorities to answer for the crime, he could plead that he was first arrested "without due process of law." So here, when found within the jurisdiction of the State of Illinois and liable to answer for a crime against the laws of that State, unless there was some positive provision of the Constitution or of the laws of this country violated in bringing him into court, it is not easy to see how he can say that he is there "without due process of law," within the meaning of the constitutional provision."

hereby implicitly suggesting that this reasoning is especially relevant for suspects charged with serious crimes (who should thus in any case be tried).[26]

The second objection of Ker was that he could only have been forcibly removed from Peru in accordance with the provisions of the 1870-1874 Extradition Treaty between Peru and the US,[27] thereby asserting a right (of asylum)[28] under this treaty.[29]

The Supreme Court, however, deemed this argument to be absurd as the treaty was not drafted to provide a safe haven for fugitives from justice.[30]

It thereby made a clear distinction with the United States v. Rauscher case,[31] decided on the very same day (6 December 1886), in which the fugitive Rauscher could rely on a right deriving from an extradition treaty (in this case the 1842 Ashburton Treaty between Great Britain and the US), namely the right not be tried for offences other than those for which extradition was sought (this is an articulation of the well-known speciality rule in extradition proceedings).[32]

If formal extradition proceedings had been instigated to deliver Ker to the US, he might have used the Rauscher argument.[33] However, in this case, the extradition

[26] See also Anonymous 1975, pp. 816-817, n. 23: "The Court warned in Ker that it did "not intend to say that there may not be proceedings previous to the trial, in regard to which the prisoner could invoke in some manner … [the due process clause]; but for mere irregularities in the manner in which he may be brought into the custody of the law, we do not think he is entitled to say that he should not be tried at all …" 119 U.S. at 440. This warning hardly suggests that the Court considered due process to be limited to the guarantee of a fair trial; it does suggest that the Court doubted the wisdom of allowing one who has committed a serious offense to avoid trial altogether because his arrest was constitutionally defective [emphasis added, ChP]."

[27] The treaty was negotiated in 1870 but only proclaimed by the US President in 1874, see US Supreme Court, Ker v. Illinois, 6 December 1886 (119 US 436), p. 439.

[28] The use of the word asylum is rather odd and may have helped the US Supreme Court in quashing Ker's argument. See also Fairman 1953, p. 681.

[29] See US Supreme Court, Ker v. Illinois, 6 December 1886 (119 US 436), p. 441.

[30] See ibid., p. 442: "There is no language in this treaty, or in any other treaty made by this country on the subject of extradition, of which we are aware, which says in terms that a party fleeing from the United States to escape punishment for crime becomes thereby entitled to an asylum in the country to which he has fled; indeed, the absurdity of such a proposition would at once prevent the making of a treaty of that kind. (…) The right of the government of Peru voluntarily to give a party in Ker's condition an asylum in that country, is quite a different thing from the right in him to demand and insist upon security in such an asylum. The treaty, so far as it regulates the right of asylum at all, is intended to limit this right in the case of one who is proved to be a criminal fleeing from justice, so that, on proper demand and proceedings had therein, the government of the country of the asylum shall deliver him up to the country where the crime was committed. And to this extent, and to this alone, the treaty does regulate or impose a restriction upon the right of the government of the country of the asylum to protect the criminal from removal therefrom." See, however, the Spanish Fiscal v. Samper case, to be discussed in Subsection 2.1.

[31] US Supreme Court, United States v. Rauscher, 6 December 1886 (119 US 407). Rauscher was extradited for murder but tried for cruel and unusual punishment. See Rogers 1887 for more information on his case.

[32] See US Supreme Court, Ker v. Illinois, 6 December 1886 (119 US 436), p. 443. See, however, Michell 1996, pp. 395-396, who is of the opinion that Ker contradicts the reasoning of Rauscher.

[33] See US Supreme Court, Ker v. Illinois, 6 December 1886 (119 US 436), p. 443: "If Ker had been brought to this country by proceedings under the treaty of 1870-74 with Peru, it seems probable, from the statement of the case in the record, that he might have successfully pleaded that he was extradited treaty was not to be looked at at all. This was because Julian acted not under the authority of the US Government and its treaty with Peru, but in fact on his own accord.[34]

Turning to the abduction itself, the Supreme Court made the following male captus bene detentus statement, referring, among other things, to Scott:

> The question of how far his forcible seizure in another country, and transfer by violence, force, of fraud, to this country, could be made available to resist trial in the State court, for the offence now charged upon him, is one which we do not feel called upon to decide, for in that transaction we do not see that the Constitution, or laws, or treaties, of the United States guarantee him any protection. There are authorities of the highest respectability which hold that such forcible abduction is no sufficient reason why the party should not answer when brought within the jurisdiction of the court which has the right to try him for such an offence, and presents no valid objection to his trial in such court.[35]

As already shown above, one can see here that judges can perhaps look at pre-trial irregularities abroad, but that they will not consider the question as to what extent such pre-trial irregularities can bar the trial altogether as a male captus will never lead to a male detentus.

Like Judge Tenterden in Scott, the Supreme Court emphasised, however, that this did not mean that Ker or Peru did not have any remedy at all, for Ker could sue for larceny, and convicted by the verdict of a jury of embezzlement; for the statement in the plea is, that the demand made by the President of the United States, if it had been put in operation, was for an extradition for larceny, although some forms of embezzlement are mentioned in the treaty as subjects of extradition."

---

[34] See ibid., pp. 442-443: "In the case before us, the plea shows, that, although Julian went to Peru with the necessary papers to procure the extradition of Ker under the treaty, those papers remained in his pocket and were never brought to light in Peru; that no steps were taken under them; and that Julian, in seizing upon the person of Ker and carrying him out of the territory of Peru into the United States, did not act nor profess to act under the treaty. In fact, that treaty was not called into operation, was not relied upon, was not made the pretext of arrest, and the facts show that it was a clear case of kidnapping within the dominions of Peru, without any pretence of authority under the treaty or from the government of the United States." The exact status of Julian himself is unclear. He was a private detective, hired by a Chicago bank, and is as such often characterised as a private kidnapper. (See, for example, the dissenting opinion of Justice Stevens in the Alvarez-Machain case, to be discussed infra: US Supreme Court, United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 15 June 1992, No. 91-712 (504 US 655), pp. 670*ff*, see n. 213 and accompanying text.) However, it should also be mentioned that Julian received the arrest warrant for Ker from US President Arthur and that Wilske argues that Julian, in light of modern international law, can in fact be seen as a de facto State organ: "Als „de facto Staatsorgan" müßte nach heutigem Völkerrechtsverständnis auch der Pinkteron-Detektiv Julian verstanden werden, der von der US-Bundesregierung 1883 beauftragt wurde, die Auslieferung von Frederick Ker aus Peru zu bewirken. Bei der Detektivagentur Pinkerton handelte es sich um ein privates Unternehmen, das als Vorläufer des US-amerikanischen Geheimdienstes verstanden werden kann. Die Agentur hatte ein weitgespanntes Tätigkeitsfeld, das von militärischer Aufklärungsarbeit im Sezessionskrieg, über die Bekämpfung von Streiks, Schutz von Politikern, der Mafiabekämpfung bis hin zur Verfolgung legendärer Eisenbahnräuber wie der James-Younger Gang und den „Wild Bunch Riders" um Butch Cassidy und Sundance Kid reichte [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Wilske 2000, p. 73.)

[35] US Supreme Court, Ker v. Illinois, 6 December 1886 (119 US 436), p. 444.

Julian for trespass and false imprisonment and Peru could demand the extradition of Julian to have him tried in Peruvian courts for kidnapping.[36]

This case shows very clearly that an irregular arrest abroad, even though it may have some influence on the court, is no sufficient reason for the suspect not to be tried at all, for the court to opt for a refusal of jurisdiction, a male detentus. In this case, the judges did not argue, as Tenterden did in Scott, that they could not look at the pre-trial irregularities. They could (and these irregularities may even have some influence on the court), but they were also convinced that such irregularities would never lead to a refusal of jurisdiction. Hence, the question as to whether such irregularities should lead to a male detentus was irrelevant. As a consequence, they did not find it useful to consider it.[37]

Hence, the non-inquiry rule is founded on (at least) two rationales. A judge may state that he will not look at pre-trial irregularities abroad because he cannot look at them or because he may have the power to do so but does not want to examine them, for example, because he deems this to be a futile exercise.[38]

In contrast to the Scott case, where one could argue, although that is not certain either,[39] that a violation of the injured State's sovereignty had occurred (and thus that one could criticise Lord Tenterden for not having looked into that matter), there does not seem to have been a violation of Peru's sovereignty in this case.

This was not only because one can have one's doubts as to whether there was actually a Peru at that time,[40] but also because one could argue, although that is – again – not certain either, that Julian must be considered a private individual (an entity which is normally not viewed as being able to violate a State's sovereignty)[41] and not a State organ.[42]

Hence, it is uncertain how the Supreme Court would have reacted if there had been such a violation (and a protest and request for the return of Ker).[43]

---

[36] See ibid.

[37] See the words "which we do not feel called upon to decide". (See n. 35 and accompanying text.) Cf. also Pearlman 1963, pp. 108-109.

[38] See also Lord M'Laren's judgment in the still-to-discuss, see Subsection 3.1, 1890 Scottish Sinclair case, where he seemingly combined the two rationales, stating: "With regard to the competency of the proceedings in Portugal, I think this is a matter with which we really have nothing to do. The extradition of a fugitive is an act of sovereignty on the part of the state who surrenders him. Each country has its own ideas and its own rules in such matters. Generally it is done under treaty arrangements, but if a state refuses to bind itself by treaty, and prefers to deal with each case on its merits, we must be content to receive the fugitive on these conditions, and we have neither title nor interest to inquire as to the regularity of proceedings under which he is apprehended and given over to the official sent out to receive him into custody [emphasis added, ChP]." (High Court of Justiciary, Sinclair v. Her Majesty's Advocate and Another, 20 March 1890, 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 43, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 9.)

[39] See n. 11.

[40] See n. 20.

[41] See Subsection 3.2.2 of Chapter III.

[42] See n. 34.

[43] See also Sheely 2003, p. 432: "[T]he common law basis for the Ker opinion, and the Ker opinion itself, left open the question of valid jurisdiction in the face of a violation of international law [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

Nevertheless, it may very well be possible that in such a situation, the judges would have also adhered to the non-inquiry rule and would have stated that this was not something they were going to look into as these matters should be resolved at the political level, between the Executives of the two States concerned.

Another old well-known male captus bene detentus case which should be discussed here is the 1949 case R. v. O./C. Depot Battalion, R.A.S.C., Colchester, Ex parte Elliott.

This case is about the British deserter Richard Arthur Elliott, who was arrested in Antwerp, Belgium, by British officers accompanied by Belgian policemen.

> On Dec. 22, 1948, the applicant applied for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that he was not the person subject to military law and that he was wrongfully held in custody. The writ issued, and on the return it was submitted that the arrest and subsequent detention of the applicant by the military authorities was illegal because (i) he was arrested in Belgium contrary to Belgian law and (ii) his arrest was not in compliance with the provisions of s. 154 of the Army Act. It was also contended that the delay in bringing the applicant to trial was oppressive.[44]

Chief Justice Lord Goddard of the King's Bench Division, after having confirmed the Scott case and the Sinclair case,[45] which will be discussed in Subsection 3.1, stated that although the unlawful arrest abroad may not lead to a release,[46] it may nevertheless have some influence on the court:

---

[44] King's Bench Division, R. v. O./C. Depot Battalion, R.A.S.C., Colchester, Ex parte Elliott, 18 and 19 January 1949, [1949] 1 All England Law Reports 373.

[45] "It shows that the law of both countries is exactly the same on this point and that we have no power to go into the question, once a prisoner is in lawful custody in this country, of the circumstances in which he may have been brought here. The circumstances in which the applicant may have been arrested in Belgium are no concern of this court." (Ibid., pp. 377-378.) Note, however, that there is a tiny difference discernible between the views of the English and Scottish judges in this respect. In the Scott case, Chief Justice Lord Tenterden stated that judges cannot investigate these pre-trial irregularities. As will be shown in the discussion of the Sinclair case, this reasoning was followed by Lord MacDonald ("[W]e cannot be the judges of the wrongdoing of the Government of Portugal" (High Court of Justiciary, Sinclair v. Her Majesty's Advocate and Another, 20 March 1890, 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 41, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 8)) and Lord Adam ("I am of opinion with your Lordship that we cannot go behind the perfectly regular warrant under which the suspender was apprehended and brought before a competent court. If there was anything irregular and illegal in the mode in which the suspender was brought here, he will have his remedy against the wrongdoer" (Ibid., 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 42-43, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 9)). However, another Lord in the Sinclair case, Lord M'Laren, stated that the judges had neither title nor interest to inquire into the way a person came into the power of the court. (See also n. 38.)

[46] See King's Bench Division, R. v. O./C. Depot Battalion, R.A.S.C., Colchester, Ex parte Elliott, 18 and 19 January 1949, [1949] 1 All England Law Reports 376: "If a person is arrested abroad and he is brought before a court in this country charged with an offence which that court has jurisdiction to hear, it is no answer for him to say, he being then in lawful custody in this country: "I was arrested contrary to the laws of the State of A or the State of B where I was actually arrested." He is in custody before the court which has jurisdiction to try him. What is it suggested that the court can do? The court cannot dismiss the charge at once without its being heard. He is charged with an offence against English law, the law applicable to the case."

> If he has been arrested in a foreign country and detained improperly from the time that he was first arrested until the time he lands in this country, he may have a remedy against the persons who arrested and detained him, but that does not entitle him to be discharged, though it may influence the court if they think there was something irregular or improper in the arrest [emphasis added, ChP].[47]

Nevertheless, also here, the exact scope of this quotation is not clear as Lord Goddard also stated in a more straightforward way a few sentences later:

> [W]e have no power to go into the question, once a prisoner is in lawful custody in this country, of the circumstances in which he may have been brought here. The circumstances in which the applicant may have been arrested in Belgium are no concern of this court.[48]

It is quite difficult to deduce clear conclusions from these three cases as they appear to send out different signals, but generally speaking, one could possibly assert that judges felt that they either had no power or simply were not interested in an examination of the way in which a person was brought from one jurisdiction to another. Perhaps the court could provide some redress but whether this would also encompass a male detentus outcome is not entirely clear (and arguably not very likely). It is also important to stress that Ker (and the same goes for Elliott) cannot be seen as evidence for the idea that courts can try suspects captured in violation of the injured State's sovereignty because in these cases, no such violation appears to have occurred.[49] (As already explained, this point is not entirely clear with respect to the Scott case, see footnote 11 and accompanying text.) Thus, it is uncertain how the judges would have reacted in the case of a clear international law violation. Nevertheless, as already explained, given their preference for the non-inquiry rule, it would not be very surprising if they had refused to look into these matters as well and had stated that these are to be resolved by the Executives of the two States involved.[50]

---

[47] Ibid. One could hereby think of a provisional release pending trial. The quotation is namely followed by the following sentence (ibid.): "Once he is before the court, it can hold him to bail until his trial and conviction." See also ibid., p. 373: "[I]f, in military proceedings, there had been such delay in bringing a man to trial as to amount to oppression the High Court could interfere, and admit him to bail."

[48] Ibid., pp. 377-378.

[49] Cf. also Morgenstern 1953, pp. 269-270 and 273 (making this point with respect to the Ker case). In that respect, one cannot agree with, for example, Lamb when she writes, referring, among other things, to "Eliot[t]" (Lamb 2000, p. 230, n. 230), that "[t]he courts of some States have been willing to exercise jurisdiction over a defendant who has been forcibly abducted by agents of the forum State from the territory of another State, in violation of the sovereignty of that State." (Ibid., p. 230.)

[50] Cf. also Michell 1996, p. 450 (writing on the Scott, Sattler (see for more information on this case the end of this footnote), Sinclair (this case will be discussed in Subsection 3.1) and Elliott cases): "[I]n all four cases, there was little awareness or discussion of the international law dimension to the abductions at issue. No effort was made to determine whether the foreign state had protested, although in each case the fact that the abduction had been made in concert with local police [it must be noted that this is unclear with respect to the Scott case, ChP] suggests that the abductions were made with the consent of the respective foreign states. Certainly, there was no mention of a protest by the foreign state in any of

1.2 More recent cases

In the 1974 United States v. Toscanino case,[51] the first real crack in the fundament of the US version of the male captus bene detentus rule (the Ker-Frisbie doctrine)[52] seemed to appear. Francisco Toscanino, an Italian citizen, alleged that US agents were responsible for the fact that he was kidnapped in Uruguay, brought to Brazil (where he was detained, interrogated and tortured for nearly three weeks) and again abducted to the US.[53] In America, he was charged with conspiracy to import them. There would thus seem to have been no violation of international law. [As explained, this is not entirely sure with respect to the Scott case, ChP.] Moreover, the cases echo the American approach in their view that resolution of any international conflict was best achieved at the diplomatic level. A very different result might have obtained had one of the arrests been followed by a protest and demand for the return of the abducted individual. It is also important to note that none of the cases provide support for Alvarez-Machain [a case which will be discussed in Subsection 1.2, ChP]; not one affirms a court's jurisdiction to try the defendant in the face of a foreign protest." To provide some information on the Sattler case: in this case (Court for Crown Cases Reserved, Regina v. Christian Sattler, 23 January 1858, Dears. & Bell 525 and 539-547, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 576 and pp. 582-586), the foreigner Christian Sattler committed larceny in England and fled to Hamburg. "The owner of the property gave information to the London police, and the deceased [the remainder of the case will clarify this word, ChP], who was a detective officer of that force and an English subject, proceeded to Hamburgh and there, with the assistance of the Hamburgh police, arrested the prisoner and brought him against his will on board an English steamer trading between Hamburgh and London in order that he might be tried for larceny." (Ibid., Dears. & Bell 539, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 582.) The Court for Crown Cases Reserved held: "[W]here a foreigner, who was arrested in a foreign town and forced on board an English ship, while kept in custody in such ship on the high seas, killed the officer who arrested him out of malice prepense and not with a view to escape, it was held that, even assuming such arrest and detention to be illegal, he was guilty of murder, and was properly tried for such offence at the Central Criminal Court within whose jurisdiction he was brought." (Ibid., Dears. & Bell 525, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 576.) Note, however, that it was not discussed in this case whether the potentially illegal arrest and detention had any effect on the exercise of jurisdiction with respect to the original charge of larceny. See in that respect also Michell 1996, p. 449: "The court did not determine whether Sattler could be tried for larceny; indeed, it is arguable that his illegal arrest would prevent his trial on the count of larceny." One can wonder whether Michell's words after the semicolon are correct. In the question presented by Baron Samuel Martin to the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, one can namely read: "The question which I desire to be answered is, whether there was any jurisdiction to try the prisoner at the Old Bailey Sessions. If the answer be in the affirmative, the judgment which has been already given is to be affirmed. If in the negative, the judgment is to be reserved; but the prisoner is to remain in custody to be tried on the indictment which has been found by the grand jury for the larceny." (Court for Crown Cases Reserved, Regina v. Christian Sattler, 23 January 1858, Dears. & Bell 539, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 582.)

---

[51] US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267).

[52] See n. 16. One could add the (still-to-discuss) Alvarez-Machain case here, see also Knoops 2002, p. 247.

[53] See US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), pp. 268-270. As will be shown infra, the alleged involvement of US agents in the operation is quite important in this case. The Court of Appeals summarised Toscanino's allegations in that respect as follows: "He contends that the court acquired jurisdiction over him unlawfully through the conduct of American agents who kidnapped him in Uruguay, used illegal electronic surveillance, tortured him and abducted him to the United States for the purpose of prosecuting him here [emphasis added, ChP]." (Ibid., p. 268.) Here are some examples of Toscanino's own allegations with respect to narcotics into the US[54] and sentenced to, among other things, 20 years' imprisonment.[55] Judge Mansfield, writing the opinion of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, compared the due process concept under the old Ker-Frisbie doctrine[56] with the new concept[57] and concluded, after having stated that "[s]ociety the US role in his abduction and torture: ""On or about January 6, 1973 Francisco Toscanino was lured from his home in Montevideo, Uruguay by a telephone call. This call had been placed by or at the direction of Hugo Campos Hermedia. Hermedia was at that time and still is a member of the police in Montevideo, Uruguay. In this effort, however, and those that will follow in this offer, Hermedia was acting ultra vires in that he was the paid agent of the United States government (...) [emphasis added, ChP]."" (Ibid., p. 269.) (As explained in n. 101 and accompanying text of Chapter III, such a situation (in which local officials cooperate (ultra vires) in the abduction can arguably not lead to valid consent from the State where the abduction took place.) ""Toscanino was placed in another vehicle and whisked to the border. There by pre-arrangement and again at the connivance of the United States government, the car was met by a group of Brazilians who took custody of the body of Francisco Toscanino [emphasis added, ChP]."" (Ibid., pp. 269-270.) ""Later that same day Toscanino was brought to Brasilia (...). For seventeen days Toscanino was incessantly tortured and interrogated. Throughout this entire period the United States government and the United States Attorney for the Eastern District of New York prosecuting this case was aware of the interrogation and did in fact receive reports as to its progress. Furthermore, during this period of torture and interrogation a member of the United States Department of Justice, Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs was present at one or more intervals and actually participated in portions of the interrogation (...) [emphasis added, ChP]."" (Ibid., p. 270.) ""Incredibly, these agents of the United States government attached electrodes to Toscanino's earlobes, toes, and genitals. Jarring jolts of electricity were shot throughout his body, rendering him unconscious for indeterminate periods of time but again leaving no physical scars. Finally on or about January 25, 1973 Toscanino was brought to Rio de Janeiro where he was drugged by Brazilian-American agents and placed on Pan American Airways Flight #202 destined for the waiting arms of the United States government. (...) At no time during the government's seizure of Toscanino did it ever attempt to accomplish its goal through any lawful channels whatever. From start to finish the government unlawfully, willingly and deliberately embarked upon a beazenly [this should probably be "brazenly", ChP] criminal scheme violating the laws of three separate countries [emphasis added, ChP]."" (Ibid., p. 270.)

---

[54] See ibid., p. 268.

[55] See ibid.

[56] See ibid., p. 272: "Thus, under the [s]o-called "Ker-Frisbie" rule, due process was limited to the guarantee of a constitutionally fair trial, regardless of the method by which jurisdiction was obtained over the defendant. Jurisdiction gained through an indisputably illegal act might still be exercised, even though the effect could be to reward police brutality and lawlessness in some cases."

[57] See ibid.: "Since Frisbie the Supreme Court, in what one distinguished legal luminary describes as a "constitutional revolution," (…) has expanded the interpretation of "due process." No longer is it limited to the guarantee of "fair" procedure at trial. In an effort to deter police misconduct, the term has been extended to bar the government from realizing directly the fruits of its own deliberate and unnecessary lawlessness in bringing the accused to trial." Judge Mansfield hereby also referred to the very famous words of Justice Brandeis in his dissenting opinion in the case Olmstead v. United States (US Supreme Court, Olmstead et al. v. United States (No. 493), Green et al. v. Same (No. 532) and McInnis v. Same (No. 533), 4 June 1928 (277 US 438). As the words are quite generally drafted, it may be good to reproduce them here as well, although it should also be noted that this case was not about an unlawful arrest but about unlawfully obtained evidence: "Decency, security and liberty alike demand that government officials shall be subjected to the same rules of conduct that are commands to the citizen. In a government of laws, existence of the government will be imperilled if it fails to observe the law scrupulously. Our Government is the potent, the omnipresent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example. Crime is contagious. If the government becomes a lawbreaker, it breeds contempt for law; it invites every man to become a law unto himself; it invites anarchy. To declare that in the administration of the criminal law the end justifies the means – to declare that the government is the ultimate loser when, in order to convict the guilty, it uses methods that lead to decreased respect for the law":[58]

> Faced with a conflict between the two concepts of due process, the one being the restricted version found in Ker-Frisbie and the other the expanded and enlightened interpretation expressed in more recent decisions of the Supreme Court, we are persuaded that to the extent that the two are in conflict, the Ker-Frisbie version must yield. Accordingly we view due process as now requiring a court to divest itself of jurisdiction over the person of a defendant where it has been acquired as the result of the Government's deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights.[59]

Although it must be stressed that the judges in Ker (and the same may be argued for Frisbie) in fact recognised that the concept of due process also had a pre-trial dimension,[60] the quotation from Toscanino, of course, goes much further in that it argues that such pre-trial irregularities may lead to the ending of the case.

Reading the decision, one can argue that this new concept of due process does not mean that a court can only refuse jurisdiction if a person is kidnapped by the government and, in the course of that kidnapping, was seriously mistreated (as was the case here). The threshold is that jurisdiction must be refused "where it has been acquired as the result of the Government's deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights". That appears also to be the case when a person has been the victim of a 'normal' abduction (without any serious mistreatment). See in that respect the following words of the Court of Appeals just before it presented its new concept of due process:

> [W]e are satisfied that the Ker-Frisbie rule cannot be reconciled with the Supreme Court's expansion of the concept of due process, which now protects the accused against pretrial illegality by denying to the government the fruits of its exploitation of any deliberate and unnecessary lawlessness on its part. (…) [W]e must be guided by the underlying principle that the government should be denied the right to exploit its own illegal conduct (…) and when an accused is kidnapped and forcibly brought may commit crimes in order to secure the conviction of a private criminal – would bring terrible retribution. Against that pernicious doctrine this court should resolutely set its face." (US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), p. 274, referring to Justice Brandeis in Olmstead v. United States.)

---

[58] Ibid. This famous phrase is sometimes said to stem from the case United States v. Archer (US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Archer, 12 July 1973, Nos. 1039, 1040, 1041, Dockets 73-1527, 73-1528, 73-1711 (486 F.2d 670)), see, for example, the still-to-discuss (see Subsection 3.2) case: Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004 (available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf), p. 129. However, this is incorrect. It was Judge Mansfield from the Toscanino case himself who expressed these words, words which will not be found in United States v. Archer.

[59] US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), p. 275.

[60] See n. 23 and accompanying text.

> within the jurisdiction, the court's acquisition of power over his person represents the fruits of the government's exploitation of its own misconduct. Having unlawfully seized the defendant in violation of the Fourth Amendment, which guarantees "the right of the people to be secure in their persons . . . against unreasonable . . . seizures," the government should as a matter of fundamental fairness be obligated to return him to his status quo ante [original footnote omitted, ChP].[61]

Thus, even though Toscanino was the victim of an abduction involving serious mistreatment, the male detentus test stemming from this decision does not seem to require such a high standard.

This can be welcomed for it would be rather strange to demand from a suspect who has been abducted by authorities which can be linked to the prosecuting forum that he also needs to prove that he was seriously mistreated in the course of that abduction. The fact that these authorities resorted to the method of abduction (whether or not that abduction included serious mistreatment) should alone be enough for the judge to refuse jurisdiction if he still cares about, for example, the integrity of his court, which arguably demands such illegal practices should not be condoned by continuing the case.

Alongside this (on constitutional law/due process/rights of the accused focused) reason for refusing jurisdiction, the Court of Appeals also stated more generally that it could rely on its "supervisory power over the administration of criminal justice in the district courts within our jurisdiction",[62] holding that "a federal court's criminal process is abused or degraded where it is executed against a defendant who has been brought into the territory of the United States by the methods alleged here."[63] This quotation shows that the facts of this case would in any case lead to the ending of the case, but it is unclear whether this would also go for a 'normal' abduction (without serious mistreatment). However, given the above-mentioned words in the context of the concept of due process, one might think that the Court of Appeals would also refuse jurisdiction on this abuse of process basis in the case of a 'normal' abduction.

The third reason to dismiss jurisdiction would also point in that direction. This third reason was linked to international law[64] and here, the case can be clearly discerned from the older above-mentioned cases.

---

[61] US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), p. 275.

[62] Ibid., p. 276: "In any event, since Ker and Frisbie involved state court convictions only, the views expressed in those cases would not necessarily apply to the present case, which is an appeal from a judgment entered by a federal district court. Here we possess powers not available to a federal court reviewing a state tribunal's resolution of constitutional issues. In this case we may rely simply upon our supervisory power over the administration of criminal justice in the district courts within our jurisdiction."

[63] Ibid.

[64] See also Anonymous 1975, pp. 814-815: "The decision that the district court was bound to dismiss the case for lack of jurisdiction if defendant's allegations of kidnapping and torture [one can wonder, given the remarks mentioned in the main text and the (correct) explanation of the three reasons to dismiss jurisdiction mentioned in the remainder of this quotation from the anonymous author, whether

Judge Mansfield explained that "international kidnappings such as the one alleged here violate the U.N. Charter".[65]

He hereby referred to the Eichmann case, stating that the UNSC Resolution 138 of 23 June 1960, discussed in Chapter III, "merely recognized a long standing principle of international law that abductions by one state of persons located within the territory of another violate the territorial sovereignty of the second state and are redressable usually by the return of the person kidnapped."[66]

This is correct; 'normal' abductions violating international law, not necessarily those accompanied by serious mistreatment, can lead to the ending of the case. However, it must be repeated (see also Chapter III) that it would seem that a return would only be necessary if the injured State protests and requests the return of the suspect.

The Eichmann case does not contradict this view as in that case, Argentina, ultimately (in the context of the UNSC proceedings) did not request the return of Eichmann.

As there was apparently no protest and request for the return of Toscanino in this case, the Court of Appeals would not have been required to dismiss the case from the standpoint of the violation of State sovereignty.[67]

Nevertheless, as already explained, that does not mean that there are not reasons enough to refuse jurisdiction on the basis of other considerations, such as those related to due process, a concept which this decision seemingly considers to be already violated in the case of a 'normal' abduction.[68]

Toscanino also had to proof the torture part, ChP] were substantiated was based on three alternative holdings: that due process requires dismissal where jurisdiction has been acquired as a result of a "deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights," that federal courts should, as a matter of proper administration of criminal justice, decline to accept jurisdiction that is the fruit of illegal government action, and that American courts may not accept jurisdiction obtained as a result of the Government's violation of a treaty guaranteeing the sovereignty of another nation [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[65] US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), p. 277. Assuming that Toscanino's allegations were in fact true (see, however, infra), one could argue that Toscanino's abduction indeed violated Uruguayan sovereignty (and hence the UN Charter). For example, Toscanino argued that the central Government of Uruguay did not consent to the operation. (See ibid., pp. 269-270.) Although consent from local officials (even acting ultra vires) may be enough, it was explained in n. 101 and accompanying text of Chapter III (see also n. 53 of the present chapter) that this would not be the case in a situation where a local official cooperated ultra vires in the operation for, for example, financial reasons. In such a case, the local official is not acting with the idea on his mind that he is operating on behalf of his State. In fact, he knows that he is operating on behalf of another State.

[66] Ibid., p. 278.

[67] See also Anonymous 1975, p. 823: "Because Uruguay did not request Toscanino's return, there was no reason to refuse jurisdiction in the interest of international harmony."

[68] See also the concurring opinion of Judge Anderson, who argues that a violation of the standards laid down in the US-Uruguay Extradition Treaty or the Charters of the OAS and the UN is "indicative of the denial of due process". (US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), pp. 281-282.)

In the end, the Court of Appeals remanded the case to the District Court "for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion".[69] More specifically, it stated:

> Our remand should be construed as requiring an evidentiary hearing with respect to Toscanino's allegations of forcible abduction only if, in response to the government's denial, he offers some credible supporting evidence, including specifically evidence that the action was taken by or at the direction of United States officials. Upon his failure to make such an offer the district court may, in its discretion, decline to hold an evidentiary hearing.[70]

This is exactly what happened. The District Court for the Eastern District of New York refused to hold a hearing as it was not convinced that there was enough evidence to believe that US officials participated in the abduction of Toscanino.[71]

Although this ruling was welcomed by, for example, the still-to-discuss Ebrahim case as one supporting principles which "testify to a healthy legal system of high standard",[72] its scope has been seriously narrowed down by, for instance, the case United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler,[73] also decided by the (differently constituted) US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit. The facts of this case, which, according to Chief Judge Kaufman, "present elements one might expect to encounter in a grade-B film scenario",[74] centred around the Argentine citizen Julio Juventino Lujan, who was charged "with conspiracy to import and distribute a large quantity of heroin".[75]

---

[69] Ibid., p. 281.
[70] Ibid.
[71] Strangely, the summary by the District Court of the allegations in the affidavit of Toscanino is quite different than Toscanino's allegations in the decision of the Court of Appeals (and indeed may not evidence the participation of US agents in the abduction and mistreatment of Toscanino), see US District Court, Eastern District of New York, United States v. Toscanino, 10 July 1975, No. 73 CR 194 (398 F.Supp. 916), p. 917: "In his affidavit, defendant alleges that he was abducted from his home in Montevideo, Uruguay on January 6, 1973, by members of the [Uruguayan] police, who were disguised as guerilla fighters. It is then alleged that this group crossed the Brazilian border. Defendant says he was lodged in a prison cell in the City of Porto Alegre, and apparently turned over to the Brazilian police. The affidavit alleges that he was then taken to a prison in Brazilia where he was alternately interrogated and tortured. The affidavit relates that [he] was then taken to an office where 'high police or army officials' were present, and he was then told that they had made a mistake. According to defendant, these officials advised him that he could not return to Uruguay, but that he could return to Italy. He claims that he was sedated and flown to the United States in the company of two Brazilian policemen. When he arrived in the United States, he was placed in the custody of special agents of the Drug Enforcement Administration. Assuming all the allegations of the affidavit to be true, there is no claim of participation by United States officials in the abduction of torture of the defendant. The defendant has not submitted any credible evidence which would indicate any participation on the part of United States officials prior to the time the defendant arrived in this country. Nor is there any evidence which shows that the abduction was carried out at the direction of United State officials. The court declines to hold an evidentiary hearing."
[72] Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 896.
[73] US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 8 January 1975, No. 449, Docket 74-2084 (510 F.2d 62).
[74] Ibid., p. 63.
[75] Ibid.

An arrest warrant for him was issued but enforced in a rather "unconventional manner"[76] as he was lured from Argentina to Bolivia from where he was abducted to the US.[77] After the Court of Appeals had decided the above-mentioned Toscanino case, Lujan saw his chance and challenged the way he was brought to the US as well.[78] The Court of Appeals, however, dismissed his motion after having concluded that the alleged facts in Toscanino were very different and much more serious[79] than the alleged facts in Lujan. The Court clarified:

[76] Ibid.

[77] See ibid. for more factual information: "Accepting, as we must for purposes of this appeal, that Lujan's allegations are true, the arrest warrant was enforced in an unconventional manner. Lujan, a licensed pilot, was hired in Argentina by one Duran to fly him to Bolivia. Although Duran represented that he had business to transact there with American interests in Bolivian mines, he in fact had been hired by American agents to lure Lujan to Bolivia. When Lujan landed in Bolivia on October 26, 1973, he was promptly taken into custody by Bolivian police who were not acting at the direction of their own superiors or government, but as paid agents of the United States. Lujan was not permitted to communicate with the Argentine embassy, an attorney, or any member of his family. On the following day the Bolivian police, commanded by Police Major Guido Lopez, took Lujan from Santa Cruz to La Paz, where he was held until November 1, 1973. On that date a Lieutenant Terrazas and other Bolivian police, acting together with American agents, brought Lujan to the airport and placed him on a plane bound for New York. Upon his arrival at Kennedy Airport Lujan was formally arrested by federal agents."

[78] See ibid.

[79] A part of the alleged mistreatment of Toscanino has already been mentioned earlier (see n. 53) but this is the entire story of what Toscanino alleged to have happened to him, see US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), pp. 269-270: "On or about January 6, 1973 Francisco Toscanino was lured from his home in Montevideo, Uruguay by a telephone call. This call had been placed by or at the direction of Hugo Campos Hermedia. Hermedia was at that time and still is a member of the police in Montevideo, Uruguay. In this effort, however, and those that will follow in this offer, Hermedia was acting ultra vires in that he was the paid agent of the United States government. (...) The telephone call ruse succeeded in bringing Toscanino and his wife, seven months pregnant at the time, to an area near a deserted bowling alley in the City of Montevideo. Upon their arrival there Hermedia together with six associates abducted Toscanino. This was accomplished in full view of Toscanino's terrified wife by knocking him unconscious with a gun and throwing him into the rear seat of Hermedia's car. Thereupon Toscanino, bound and blindfolded, was driven to the Uruguayan-Brazilian border by a circuitous route. (...) At one point during the long trip to the Brazilian border discussion was had among Toscanino's captors as to changing the license plates of the abductor's car in order to avoid detection by the Uruguayan authorities. At another point the abductor's car was abruptly brought to a halt, and Toscanino was ordered to get out. He was brought to an apparently secluded place and told to lie perfectly still or he would be shot then and there. Although his blindfold prevented him from seeing, Toscanino could feel the barrel of the gun against his head and could hear the rumbling noises of what appeared to be an Uruguayan military convoy. A short time after the noise of the convoy had died away, Toscanino was placed in another vehicle and whisked to the border. There by pre-arrangement and again at the connivance of the United States government, the car was met by a group of Brazilians who took custody of the body of Francisco Toscanino. (...) Once in the custody of Brazilians, Toscanino was brought to Porto Alegre where he was held incommunicado for eleven hours. His requests to consult with counsel, the Italian Consulate, and his family were all denied. During this time he was denied all food and water. Later that same day Toscanino was brought to Brasilia. (...) For seventeen days Toscanino was incessantly tortured and interrogated. (...) (Toscanino's) captors denied him sleep and all forms of nourishment for days at a time. Nourishment was provided intravenously in a manner precisely equal to an amount necessary to keep him alive. Reminiscent of the horror stories told by our military men who returned from Korea and China, Toscanino was forced to walk up and down a hallway for seven or eight

> [I]n recognizing that Ker and Frisbie no longer provided a carte blanche to government agents bringing defendants from abroad to the United States by the use of torture, brutality and similar outrageous conduct, we did not intend to suggest that any irregularity in the circumstances of a defendant's arrival in the jurisdiction would vitiate the proceedings of the criminal court.[80]

The Court in Lujan then[81] referred to passages from the cases Rochin v. California and United States v. Russell,[82] which were also used by the Court in Toscanino (namely in its presentation of the first reason why a court could refuse jurisdiction) and in which one can indeed find words which may be seen as requiring a higher threshold to refuse jurisdiction than the words "the Government's deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights"[83] may suggest: "conduct that shocks the conscience"[84] (Rochin) and "conduct so hours at a time. When he could no longer stand he was kicked and beaten but all in a manner contrived to punish without scarring. When he would not answer, his fingers were pinched with metal pliers. Alcohol was flushed into his eyes and nose and other fluids (...) were forced up his anal passage. Incredibly, these agents of the United States government attached electrodes to Toscanino's earlobes, toes, and genitals. Jarring jolts of electricity were shot throughout his body, rendering him unconscious for indeterminate periods of time but again leaving no physical scars. Finally on or about January 25, 1973 Toscanino was brought to Rio de Janeiro where he was drugged by Brazilian-American agents and placed on Pan American Airways Flight #202 destined for the waiting arms of the United States government. On or about January 26, 1973 he woke in the United States, was arrested on the aircraft, and was brought immediately to Thomas Puccio, Assistant United States Attorney."

---

[80] US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 8 January 1975, No. 449, Docket 74-2084 (510 F.2d 62), p. 65.

[81] See ibid.

[82] The 1952 case Rochin v. California (US Supreme Court, Rochin v. California, 2 January 1952, No. 83 (342 US 165) was a case about illegally obtained evidence: "[S]tate police officers had frustrated a defendant's efforts to swallow two morphine capsules in his possession by taking the defendant, handcuffed, to a hospital where a doctor was induced to force "an emetic solution through a tube into (the defendant's) stomach against his will." When the solution produced vomiting the capsules were recovered and subsequently introduced at defendant's trial." (US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), p. 273.) Here, the Supreme Court, in the words of Justice Frankfurter stated: "Regard for the requirements of the Due Process Clause 'inescapably imposes upon this Court an exercise of judgment upon the whole course of the proceedings (resulting in a conviction) in order to ascertain whether they offend those canons of decency and fairness which express the notions of justice of English-speaking peoples even toward those charged with the most heinous offenses.'" "Applying these general considerations to the circumstances of the present case, we are compelled to conclude that the proceedings by which this conviction was obtained do more than offend some fastidious squeamishness or private sentimentalism about combating crime too energetically. This is conduct that shocks the conscience." (US Supreme Court, Rochin v. California, 2 January 1952, No. 83 (342 US 165), pp. 169 and 172.) In the 1973 case United States v. Russell (US Supreme Court, United States v. Russell, 24 April 1973, No. 71-1585 (411 US 423)), the Supreme Court approved alleged entrapment activities by the US Government, explaining: "While we may some day be presented with a situation in which the conduct of law enforcement agents is so outrageous that due process principles would absolutely bar the government from invoking judicial processes to obtain a conviction, cf. Rochin v. California (…), the instant case is distinctly not of that breed." (Ibid., pp. 431-432.)

[83] See n. 59 and accompanying text.

[84] US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), p. 273 (referring to the Rochin case). See also US Court of Appeals, Second outrageous that due process principles would absolutely bar the government from invoking judicial processes to obtain a conviction"[85] (Russell). However, it must be noted that Toscanino also referred in this context to the 1973 case United States v. Archer: "In United States v. Archer (…), while basing our decision on other grounds, we referred to Olmstead and Rochin for the proposition that due process principles might be invoked to bar prosecution altogether where it resulted from flagrantly illegal law enforcement practices [emphasis added, ChP]."[86] In addition, less extreme words were also used in the Rochin case, see the following words of Justice Frankfurter in that case: "Due process of law, as a historic and generative principle, precludes defining, and thereby confining, these standards of conduct more precisely than to say that convictions cannot be brought about by methods that offend a 'sense of justice.'"[87] Hence, even though the words "shocking" and "outrageous" may be seen as requiring a higher threshold than the words "the Government's deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights" may suggest, one can find support in the Toscanino case that serious illegal enforcement practices, such as a 'normal' forcible abduction (not necessarily one accompanied by serious mistreatment)[88] falls within its male detentus test.

However, the Court in Lujan clearly restricted this male detentus test by focusing on the specifics of the Toscanino case, which, as was shown, allegedly involved serious mistreatment:

> The cruel, inhuman and outrageous treatment allegedly suffered by Toscanino brought his case within the Rochin principle (…). But the same cannot be said of Lujan. It requires little argument to show that the government conduct of which he complains pales by comparison with that alleged by Toscanino. Lacking from Lujan's petition is any allegation of that complex of shocking governmental conduct sufficient to convert an abduction which is simply illegal into one which sinks to a violation of due process. Unlike Toscanino, Lujan does not allege that a gun blow knocked him unconscious when he was first taken into captivity, nor does he claim that drugs were administered to subdue him for the flight to the United States. Neither is there any assertion that the United States Attorney was aware of his abduction, or of any interrogation. Indeed, Lujan disclaims any acts of torture, terror, or custodial interrogation of any kind. (…) We scarcely intend to convey approval of illegal government conduct. But we are forced to recognize that, absent a set of incidents like that in Toscanino, not every violation by prosecution or police is so egregious

---

Circuit, United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 8 January 1975, No. 449, Docket 74-2084 (510 F.2d 62), p. 65.

[85] US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), p. 274 (referring to the Russell case). See also US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 8 January 1975, No. 449, Docket 74-2084 (510 F.2d 62), p. 65.

[86] US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), p. 274.

[87] Ibid., p. 273 (quoting Justice Frankfurter in the Rochin case).

[88] See n. 59 and accompanying text.

> that Rochin and its progeny requires nullification of the indictment [original footnote omitted, ChP].[89]

Hence, the Court in Lujan restricted the male detentus test from Toscanino (which, reading its decision, could include a 'normal' abduction, without serious mistreatment) to a test which would demand an abduction with serious mistreatment.

The Court in Lujan also looked at another reason for the Toscanino Court to dismiss the case, namely the violation of international law. However, after it had stated that the Court in Toscanino had suggested that "a defendant might be able to interpose the violations of those charters [the Charters of the OAS and of the UN, ChP] as a defense to a criminal prosecution",[90] it opined that "unlike Toscanino, Lujan fails to allege that either Argentina or Bolivia in any way protested or even objected to his abduction [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[91] As explained earlier, one must clearly differentiate between a violation of State sovereignty/a violation of international law and the idea that a State must return the suspect to the injured State in the case of a protest and request for the return of the suspect. That Argentina or Bolivia did not protest/object to the abduction does not mean that there was no violation of international law in this case. Whether there was a violation of State sovereignty here depends on the question as to whether it can be said that the operation took place without the consent of these two States. If there was no valid consent, one must assume a violation of international law, whether or not the injured States protested/objected to the operation. However, it is true that a State would only be required to return the suspect (and thus to dismiss the case) on the basis of the violation of another State's sovereignty if there had been a protest and request for the return of the abducted suspect (which does not seem to have occurred in this case), although the fact that there might, nevertheless, have been a violation of international law may influence the judge in arguing that other concepts, such as due process, have been violated[92] and hence that a dismissal of the case is in order.

Of course, one can wonder how the Court would have reacted if it had been of the opinion that there was a violation of international law. Would that, in itself, have been enough to divest jurisdiction, even if Lujan was not the victim of serious mistreatment?

As stated before, there is support in the Toscanino decision for a 'normal' abduction, not accompanied by serious mistreatment which violates international law[93] – and in fact, also one which does not violate international law[94] – to lead to

---

[89] US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 8 January 1975, No. 449, Docket 74-2084 (510 F.2d 62), p. 66.
[90] Ibid., p. 67.
[91] Ibid.
[92] See n. 68.
[93] See the Toscanino Court's third reason to dismiss jurisdiction.
[94] See the Toscanino Court's first reason to dismiss jurisdiction. It is very well be possible that the prosecuting authorities execute an abduction without violating traditional (inter-State) international law. As explained in Chapter III, although this book focused on the traditional abduction without the consent of the State of residence, the latter State could also cooperate in an abduction operation, circumventing the ending of the case. Even though one can argue that a violation of international law as such (without a protest and request for the return of the suspect) would not require a judge to refuse jurisdiction, the fact that the prosecuting authorities resorted to a method which violated another State's sovereignty may convince the judge that the authorities have brought this case to trial without due process of law and hence that jurisdiction must be refused. However, the Court in Lujan did not want to pronounce on this matter:

> We do not have to decide here whether, in the absence of a claim of torture or of similar reprehensible conduct, the violation of international law alone would require dismissal of an indictment. We hold only that given Lujan's failure to allege that Argentina or Bolivia protested his abduction or that the abduction involved abuse of the type we condemned in Toscanino, there is no justification for ordering the district court to divest itself of jurisdiction over him [original footnote omitted, ChP].[95]

Hence, Lujan did not overrule the idea which can arguably be found in the Toscanino decision, namely that an abduction violating international law (but not one involving serious mistreatment) may also lead to the ending of the case, for it simply did not look into that matter. However, it did not agree with the idea, not taking into account the international law dimension now,[96] that resort to the method of abduction as such (without serious mistreatment) would already be enough to violate a concept such as due process to such an extent that jurisdiction must be refused. This stance of Lujan – and it has, in fact, been asserted that this was also the stance of the judges in Toscanino itself[97] – can be criticised for it basically means all the legal procedures but not violating traditional (inter-State) international law, see the term official abduction and ns. 21 and 63 of that chapter. See also n. 782 of the present chapter.

---

[95] US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 8 January 1975, No. 449, Docket 74-2084 (510 F.2d 62), p. 68.

[96] See n. 94: authorities may also resort to the method of abduction without violating (traditional inter-State) international law.

[97] See the concurring opinion of Circuit Judge Anderson in the Lujan case: "The discussion in the majority opinion in Toscanino of the due process issue, as well as the mention of this court's supervisory power over the administration of criminal justice in this Circuit read, in my opinion, as if the kidnapping from his own country and the forcible delivery into the United States of a non-fugitive foreign national, standing alone, would be sufficient to deprive the district court of jurisdiction (…). After Toscanino was decided, however, a motion was made for a hearing in banc. A majority of the active members of the court voted to deny the petition for a hearing in banc, three judges dissenting. In so doing the majority obviously interpreted the decision in Toscanino as resting solely and exclusively upon the use of torture and other cruel and inhumane treatment of Toscanino in effecting his kidnapping and it rejected the proposition that a kidnapping of a foreign national from his own or another nation and his forcible delivery into the United States against his will, but without torture, would itself violate due process." (US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 8 January 1975, No. 449, Docket 74-2084 (510 F.2d 62), pp. 68-69.) That may, of course, very well be the case, but then the judges in Toscanino can be criticised for having written their decision in such a general way that it can easily be interpreted as holding that a normal abduction (not necessarily one accompanied by serious mistreatment) might also lead to the ending of the case. However, even if Judge Anderson is right, it must not be forgotten that Lujan has not overruled Toscanino with respect to the international law argument. Hence, an abduction violating international law (which the 'normal' abductions will do) may still lead to the ending of the case.

that a court cannot refuse jurisdiction in the case of an abduction, which 1) does not violate international law (because the State of residence consented to the operation); 2) does not involve serious mistreatment but 3) nevertheless flouts all the regular procedures in obtaining custody over a person.[98] It can be argued that a judge should also be able to refuse jurisdiction in 'normal' abduction cases (not necessarily those in which serious mistreatment has taken place) if it wants, for example, to deter the prosecuting authorities from resorting to illegal methods and to protect the integrity of its own proceedings.[99]

Whatever may be the true meaning and scope of Toscanino, Michell explains that

> [s]ubsequent decisions held that a fugitive must establish three elements for the Toscanino prohibition against the exercise of jurisdiction to apply. First, the governmental conduct in question, i.e., the abduction, must amount to "grossly cruel and unusual barbarities" or "shock the conscience." Second, the abduction must have been the work of state agents.[[100]] Third, there must be a protest by the injured state[[101]] [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[102]

---

[98] See also the following words of Circuit Judge Anderson (concurring with the outcome of Lujan): "[W]henever a foreign national is abducted or kidnapped from outside of the United States and is forcibly brought into this Country by United States agents by means of torture, brutality or similar physical abuse the federal court acquires no jurisdiction over him because of a violation of due process. Otherwise the holdings of the Supreme Court in Ker v. Illinois (…) and Frisbie v. Collins (…) govern." (Ibid., p. 69.)

[99] It may be interesting to note that Mann (1989, p. 409) believed that the Lujan opinion "is likely to count among the least ingenuous judicial pronouncements ever made."

[100] See in that respect, for example, the Yousef case. In this terrorism case, one of the suspects of, among other things, the first attack on the World Trade Center in New York City (on 26 February 1993), Ramzi Ahmed Yousef, claimed in an affidavit dated 15 January 1996 that he was kidnapped in Pakistan in November 1994, that he was tortured during his detention before being turned over to US officials in Islamabad in February 1995 and that this torture could be attributed to the US "because the Pakistanis who captured and tortured him were acting as agents to the United States or, in the alternative, because the United States and Pakistan were engaged in a joint venture to "track and trap" him." (US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Yousef, 4 April 2003, Docket Nos. 98-1041L, 98-1197, 98-1355, 99-1544, 99-1554 (327 F.3d 56), p. 138.) According to Yousef, as a result of this Toscanino/'shock the conscience' exception, his indictment had to be dismissed. (See ibid.) However, the District Court and the Court of Appeals rejected the torture allegations as incredible. Furthermore, the Court of Appeals found that there was no error in the District Court's conclusion that "even taking Yousef's factual assertions as true, Yousef had failed to allege United States involvement in his kidnapping, captivity, or torture sufficient to make them attributable to the United States." (Ibid., p. 139.) See also the still-to-discuss Yunis case (see n. 104 and n. 176 and accompanying text).

[101] Note that Toscanino did not appear to request a protest, see the discussion in that case of the Court's third reason to dismiss jurisdiction. See also Michell 1996, p. 403, n. 99: "Some commentators suggest that this requirement is difficult to find in Toscanino itself." See finally also Shen 1994, p. 76: "[A] fair reading of the Toscanino case does not lead to the conclusion that the court intended to divest itself of jurisdiction only where the offended State had lodged a protest [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[102] Michell 1996, pp. 402-403. See also the still-to-discuss (see Subsection 3.1.4 of Chapter VI) ICTY Trial Chamber's decision of 9 October 2002 in the Nikolić case: "The Toscanino rule therefore appears to apply only when (i) the abduction itself amounts to "grossly cruel and unusual barbarities" or "shock the conscience", (ii) the abduction was the work of State agents, and (iii) there was a protest by the

Although it is true that the aftermath of Toscanino can be summarised by the rule that, if there is no abduction by State agents accompanied by serious mistreatment, and no protest from the injured State (one could call this the Toscanino exception), the trial can go ahead, it is arguably not so that the suspect, if there were a protest from the injured State, would also have to prove that he was seriously mistreated (by State agents) during the abduction (as the presentation of these three requirements seem to suggest). After the third requirement, Michell refers to cases such as Lujan, but these cases only support the idea that, as there was no protest from the alleged injured State, the international law dimension did not have to be looked at.[103] However, those cases can arguably not be used to assert that, if there were a protest from the injured State, the suspect would also have to prove that he was seriously mistreated during his abduction (by State agents).[104]

---

injured State [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 81.)

[103] See Michell 1996, p. 403, n. 99. Another case referred to by Michell is Reed, but also in that case, the Lujan test was applied, meaning that international law did not have to be looked at because there was no protest from the Bahamas (from where Reed was allegedly abducted). See US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Reed, 27 January 1981, Nos. 224, 227 and 228, Docket 80-1236, 80-1240 and 80-1264 (639 F.2d 896), p. 902: "The Bahamian government has not sought his return or made any protest nor is it likely to, since Reed is an American citizen. As we pointed out in Lujan, absent protest or objection by the offended sovereign, Reed has no standing to raise violation of international law as an issue."

[104] However, Michell (1996, p. 403) also notes that "several cases have suggested in dicta that evidence of a protest by a foreign state would preclude application of the Ker-Frisbie rule [original footnote omitted, ChP]." That would mean that a protest alone would be enough to divest jurisdiction, even if the suspect was not seriously mistreated. He refers here to US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 22 July 1991, No. 88-5462 (939 F.2d 1341), where it was decided (see ibid., pp. 1342-1343): "This case presents the question whether the United States breaches its obligations under its extradition treaty with Mexico if it authorizes or sponsors the forcible taking of a Mexican national from that country without the consent of the Mexican government. We hold that it does. We further hold that if the Mexican government formally objects to the treaty breach and a defendant timely raises that breach in a pending criminal proceeding the courts of the United States may not exercise personal jurisdiction over that defendant, provided the Mexican government is willing to accept repatriation. In short, under such circumstances a district court may not subject the defendant to trial, and a conviction obtained must be vacated." See also ibid., pp. 1346 ("[N]umerous cases have suggested that were the government of the country from which an individual was kidnapped to lodge a formal protest with the United States, that protest might defeat jurisdiction") and 1349: "[T]he (...) view of Ker does not apply to cases in which the government of the nation from which a defendant has been kidnapped protests the kidnapping [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally also the still-to-discuss Yunis case for a presentation of the Toscanino threshold not mentioning the third requirement: "Although most circuits have acknowledged the exception carved out by Toscanino, it is highly significant that no court has ever applied it to dismiss an indictment. They have uniformly treated Toscanino as a very narrow exception to Ker-Frisbie. (...) Two distinct grounds have been relied upon in refusing to dismiss an indictment under the Toscanino exception: either courts conclude that the torturous activity did not rise to the level of outrageousness warranting dismissal, or conclude that United States officials were not directly involved in the torturous activity. (...) Several of the above cases involved serious allegations of torture and abuse. The fact that not one of the courts relied on Toscanino to dismiss the indictment highlights the extreme narrowness of that exception and underscores the force of the Ker-Frisbie doctrine [emphasis in original, ChP]." (US District Court,

Be that as it may and not looking at the international law question for now, it can be repeated that it is arguably strange (and, perhaps,[105] also in violation of some reasonings in the Toscanino decision) that a suspect would have to prove that he was seriously mistreated during his abduction.[106] It is submitted that resorting to the reprehensible method of abduction alone should already be enough to divest jurisdiction. In addition, it may also be possible that a court may want to refuse jurisdiction if a suspect had been seriously mistreated before being brought into the jurisdiction of the court, whether this serious mistreatment was committed by State agents or other entities. To again quote Michell (after his presentation of the three requirements):

> [T]hese later interpretations suggest incorrectly that Toscanino was primarily a "torture" case rather than a "forcible abduction" case. This view imposes a virtually insuperable evidentiary burden upon the fugitive, as he will rarely be able to advance conclusive evidence of torture, or to demonstrate that government agents were directly responsible for his abduction. More importantly, it is entirely unclear why a fugitive should have to demonstrate that he was tortured [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[107]

One can wonder how a court, on the one hand, can accept the Lujan outcome and, on the other hand, assert that it wishes to deter illegal governmental conduct.[108] The outcome of Lujan might very well encourage enforcement agents not to use regular extradition proceedings but to use other, less burdensome/costly/complicated ways to bring a suspect into the jurisdiction of another State (as long as they do not seriously mistreat that suspect). This is arguably to be avoided as these ways still circumvent the normal procedures. The Court could have brought in more flexibility by stating that illegal pre-trial conduct would not be tolerated and be remedied via another route if the illegality was not so serious as to refuse jurisdiction. However, as stated, one can even wonder if the sole fact that US agents kidnap a person from abroad (even if there is no serious mistreatment of the abductee and even if there is no protest from the State where the arrest took place) is not already serious enough for a court to refuse jurisdiction. After all, the person was not brought into the jurisdiction of the now prosecuting State through the official channels available.

District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909), pp. 919-920.)

[105] See, however, n. 97.

[106] See also US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, United States v. Lovato, 14 July 1975, No. 74-3088 (520 F.2d 1270), p. 1271: "The Lujan case makes it clear that even in the light of Toscanino, the Second Circuit continues to follow the Ker-Frisbie line of cases unless the person claiming that he was kidnapped makes a strong showing of grossly cruel and unusual barbarities inflicted upon him by persons who can be characterized as paid agents of the United States."

[107] Michell 1996, p. 403.

[108] See US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 8 January 1975, No. 449, Docket 74-2084 (510 F.2d 62), p. 66: "We scarcely intend to convey approval of illegal government conduct."

A couple of years after the US Toscanino and Lujan cases, another common law Court of Appeal(s) was confronted by a male captus situation. In the 1977 New Zealand R v. Hartley case,[109] a certain Hartley was charged with murder. In the context of this case, the police of New Zealand interviewed a man called Bennett (not to be confused with the suspect from the 1993 English case, see infra),[110] whom they believed was an accomplice of Hartley.[111] However, during the interview, the policemen "learned nothing from him and agreed that there was no reason why he should not proceed with plans he had made to leave the Auckland district with his wife for a short holiday."[112] After his holiday and his return to Auckland, he went to Melbourne, Australia, to stay with his wife's sister and to "think things out" until his return to New Zealand – he claimed that he wished to recommence his work some two weeks after his stay in Australia.[113] However, within two days of his arrival in Australia, he was apprehended by local Australian policemen who were instructed by their colleagues in New Zealand to put him aboard the first flight back to New Zealand.[114] He was taken into custody in Wellington and interrogated at length.[115] After that, he was tried by a trial chamber and convicted for murder. Bennett appealed his conviction and presented the following two claims:

> First, that by reason of his arbitrary and unlawful detention in Australia and removal from that country back to New Zealand the Courts did not have, or should have declined, jurisdiction to accept the indictment and have him brought forward for trial. This was supplemented at the hearing by adopting the suggestion that, assuming there was jurisdiction, nevertheless the Court should have discharged the accused in the exercise of a discretion to prevent abuse of its own process. Second, that in any event the oral and written statements made by him to the police in New Zealand after his return should have been excluded in terms of fairness and justice either because of

[109] Court of Appeal, R v. Hartley, 5 August 1977, [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 199 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), pp. 330-335).
[110] See ibid., [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 213 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 331).
[111] See Court of Appeal, R v. Hartley, 5 August 1977, International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 330.
[112] Court of Appeal, R v. Hartley, 5 August 1977, [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 213 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 331).
[113] See ibid.
[114] See ibid. See also ibid., [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 214 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 332): "Concerning the method and manner adopted by the police to remove him from Australia and have him returned to New Zealand there is evidence by a detective inspector who appears to have been in charge of the police inquiries. He said quite plainly that he "was instrumental in having Bennett returned to this country from Australia". He said that on Tuesday 6 January he had become aware that Bennett had left New Zealand and was then in Melbourne; that he had telephoned the criminal investigation branch at Melbourne to tell officers there "of our interest in him"; and that as a result of his discussions action was taken by the Australian police to ensure that Bennett would be returned to New Zealand. He also said that after those arrangements were made he gave instructions for Bennett to be met by police officers at the Wellington airport."
[115] See ibid., [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 213 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 331). For more information on this point, see ibid., [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 213-214 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), pp. 331-332).

> breach of the Judges' Rules or because of the illegality in bringing him back to New Zealand and thus obtaining evidence; or for both reasons in combination.[116]

The Court of Appeal, whose judgment was delivered by Judge Woodhouse, disapproved of the way in which Bennett was brought into the jurisdiction of New Zealand.

After having explained the regular proceedings through which a person is to be brought from one Commonwealth country to another,[117] it criticised the "illegal transaction"[118] in this specific case, stating:

> [O]n the present occasion all the relevant statutory precautions were blithely disregarded by the police in both countries. Not a move was made to get lawful authority for what was contemplated. Indeed in the absence of any direct admission by Bennett before he had left for Melbourne it is probable that the police in New Zealand could not have obtained the warrant which alone could initiate any lawful proceedings for his extradition from Victoria. So a telephone call to Melbourne was used instead. And as a result the man was removed from his bed and bustled back to the New Zealand police on the next flight.[119]

Notwithstanding the unlawful way in which Bennett was brought into the jurisdiction of the now prosecuting Court, the latter was also of the opinion that Bennett was lawfully arrested in New Zealand and thus that the Court had jurisdiction to try him, hereby referring to the already-discussed observations of Lord Goddard (in the Elliott case)[120] and the still-to-discuss[121] observations of Lord M'Laren (in the Sinclair case).[122]

---

[116] Ibid., [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 214-215 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 333).

[117] See ibid., [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 214 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 332: "The lawful means by which a person may be extradited or delivered from one Commonwealth country to another is provided by the Fugitive Offenders Act 1881 (UK). (As to which see now the Fugitive Offenders Amendment Act 1976 enacted in New Zealand on 15 July 1976.) The statute permits a rather simpler procedure than is usually applicable in the case of extradition to or from a foreign State; but as one would expect it specifically provides safeguards that are intended to give ample protection to individual citizens against any possible risk of arbitrary arrest or any unwarrantable interference by officials or others with their right to liberty and to move about freely. If for the purposes of extradition a man is to be lawfully arrested or detained or surrendered there must be the sanction of an endorsed or provisional warrant; and every step taken in the one country or the other must have the authority of processes recognised by the Courts".

[118] Ibid.

[119] Ibid.

[120] See n. 46.

[121] See Subsection 3.1 (but see also n. 45 and accompanying text).

[122] See Court of Appeal, R v. Hartley, 5 August 1977, [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 215 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), pp. 333-334): "[W]e are of the opinion that if a person is found within New Zealand and is then lawfully arrested and brought before the Court it must follow, considering the matter merely in terms of jurisdiction, that he can certainly be tried. (…) As to the bare question of jurisdiction, we think that the observations of Lord Goddard and of Lord M'Laren must be accepted as applicable to this country. It is the presence within the territorial boundaries that is the answer to the initial question of jurisdiction. In the present case, although Bennett was brought here unlawfully, he

Thus, this case seems to repeat the old male captus bene detentus rule.

However, the New Zealand Court was not finished yet. It noted that Lord MacDonald, in the Sinclair case, had focused on alleged irregularities committed by foreigners, for example, when he stated that "[t]here has been no improper dealing with the complainer by the authorities in this country, or by their officer".[123] Woodhouse explained: "It may be implicit in those last remarks that if there had been evidence of improper dealings by the authorities in Scotland then the Court might well have take some appropriate action in regard to the matter."[124]

One can wonder whether this is correct as it will be shown infra that Lord MacDonald also argued that the Court should continue to exercise jurisdiction, even if there was something irregular about the proceedings in Scotland.[125]

Be that as it may, it is obvious that Woodhouse wanted to emphasise that in the Hartley case, it was clearly the New Zealand's own Executive that had done something wrong and that that had to be the focus of this case.[126]

After having referred, among other things, to the consideration of Lord Devlin in the English case Connelly v Director of Public Prosecutions[127] about the "inherent jurisdiction of the Court to prevent abuse of its own process",[128] Woodhouse stated:

> There are explicit statutory directions that surround the extradition procedure. (…) And in our opinion there can be no possible question here of the Court turning a blind eye to action of the New Zealand police which has deliberately ignored those imperative requirements of the statute. Some may say that in the present case a New Zealand citizen attempted to avoid a criminal responsibility by leaving the country: that his subsequent conviction has demonstrated the utility of the short cut adopted by the police to have him brought back. But this must never become an area where it will be sufficient to consider that the end has justified the means. The issues raised by this affair are basic to the whole concept of freedom in society.[129] was eventually lawfully arrested within the country and then by due process of law he was brought before the Court. The Court was accordingly in a position to exercise jurisdiction in respect of him."

---

[123] Ibid., [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 216 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 334). See also n. 615.

[124] Ibid.

[125] See n. 616.

[126] See Court of Appeal, R v. Hartley, 5 August 1977, [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 216 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 334: "[I]f the Courts are faced, as in this case, by a deliberate decision of one of the executive arms of Government to promote in a direct way the very illegality that has had a person returned to this country, then the question does arise as to what might be done." See also Cowling 1992, p. 250 (commenting on the Hartley case): "[I]t appears that the discretion not to exercise jurisdiction will not apply in regard to irregularities and illegalities on the part of authorities in the surrendering state (...). Thus the enquiry is restricted to the actions of the receiving state".

[127] See Court of Appeal, R v. Hartley, 5 August 1977, [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 216 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 334: "Are the courts to rely on the Executive to protect their process from abuse? Have they not themselves an inescapable duty to secure fair treatment for those who come or are brought before them? To questions of this sort there is only one possible answer. The courts cannot contemplate for a moment the transference to the Executive of the responsibility for seeing that the process of law is not abused".

[128] Ibid.

[129] Ibid., [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 216-217 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 335).

It is clear that this male detentus test is much broader than, for example, the one accepted in the aftermath of the Toscanino case and can therefore be applauded. Woodhouse concluded that "if application had been made at the trial on this ground (…) the Judge would probably have been justified in exercising his discretion (…) to direct that the accused be discharged."[130]

However, as that was not the case,[131] the Court proceeded to the other claim of Bennett (the one related to the admissibility of evidence) and finally quashed his conviction for that reason.[132] However, because of that, it is not sure whether the Court of Appeal would also have nullified the conviction on the discretionary ground alone.[133]

Nine years after this case, New Zealand's neighbouring State Australia was confronted by the male captus case Levinge v Director of Custodial Services, Department of Corrective Services.[134]

In this case, Walter Alexander Levinge, who was facing "a large number of charges for crimes of dishonesty"[135] in Australia, was apprehended in Mexico by Mexican officers, deported to the US, where he was arrested by FBI agents, and from there extradited to Australia.[136] Although Levinge also claimed that his extradition from the US to Australia was unlawful,[137] his main argument focused on the role of the Australian officials in his unlawful removal from Mexico to the US. He argued that "the relevant Australian authorities were aware of, connived in and at the very least took the fruits of"[138] the illegal operation in Mexico, during which he was also submitted to "extreme physical and mental trauma".[139] As a result of this, he

---

[130] Ibid., [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 217 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 335).
[131] See ibid.
[132] See ibid.
[133] See ibid. In that respect, the following views of the ICTY Trial Chamber in Nikolić ("The Court used its discretionary power to stay the case as it considered the conduct of the police to be an abuse of power", ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 88) and the ICTR Appeals Chamber in Barayagwiza ("In R. v. Hartley, the Wellington Court of Appeal relied on the abuse of process doctrine in quashing a conviction that rested on an unlawful arrest and the illegally obtained confession that followed [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP].", ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', 3 November 1999, para. 75) are incorrect. Who is correct, however, is Schabas (2000, p. 567), when he writes in his commentary to the Barayagwiza case that "contrary to what the appeals chamber contends, a conviction was not quashed based on abuse of process. Although the Court of Appeal of Wellington was harsh in its criticism of an illegal rendition, the court explicitly refrained from ordering a stay for abuse of process, and overturned the conviction because of an illegally obtained confession [original footnote omitted, ChP]."
[134] New South Wales Court of Appeal, Levinge v Director of Custodial Services, Department of Corrective Services, 23 July 1987, 89 FLR 133.
[135] Ibid., p. 134.
[136] See ibid., p. 133.
[137] See ibid., p. 134.
[138] Ibid., p. 138.
[139] Ibid., p. 137.

> sought an order from the Court (…) that he be immediately released from custody and permitted to leave the jurisdiction. Alternatively, he sought an order prohibiting the continuance of the proceedings against him on the ground that they were an abuse of process of the Court.[140]

President Kirby of the New South Wales Court of Appeal first examined the two versions of exactly what had happened in Mexico (besides the uncontested facts)[141] and concluded that he did not believe Levinge's "inherently improbable"[142] account.[143] With respect to the alleged Australian involvement in the operation, Kirby noted that, although it was likely that the Australian inspector in charge of returning Levinge to Australia (Detective Chief Inspector Adams) "would have been in the closest contact"[144] with the FBI agents, a cablegram from the US to Australia on which Levinge relied[145] in no way showed that Australian officials knew of the

[140] Ibid., p. 134.

[141] See ibid., p. 135: "This much appears clear. The appellant was resident in Mexico on 25 January 1985. At about 11.00 am on that day he was taken into custody by Mexican police. Soon thereafter three persons identified as FBI agents, one of whom was Mr W [Lamar], arrived at the police station in Mexico where the appellant was being held. Thereafter the appellant was taken in one car driven by the Mexican officers, the FBI agents following in another car. It seems that the border was a very short distance from the police station. At the border, the appellant was handed over to the custody of the FBI agents."

[142] Ibid., p. 137.

[143] See for the account of FBI agent Lamar ibid., p. 136: "Mr Lamar's declaration asserted that the Mexican State judicial police had advised him that they were going to take the appellant and his daughter to the international border crossing at San Ysidro, California "and deport him from Mexico as an undesirable citizen" (sic). Mr Lamar denied that any instructions or directions were given by himself or other FBI agents to Mexican police. He stated that he and other United States federal agents had simply followed the car carrying the Mexican police, the appellant and his daughter, in a separate vehicle. He concluded: "[At no stage] during the period when Levinge was subject to observation by United States Federal agents while in Mexican custody, was there any indication of mistreatment by Mexican authorities. Furthermore, no United States Federal agent spoke with Levinge during this period. Special agents of the FBI neither directed nor ordered the Mexican officials to conduct any type of activity. The actions of the Mexican police, including Levinge's deportation, were initiated by them with United States involvement."" See for the account of Levinge himself, ibid., p. 137: "The appellant claimed that, following his arrest, he was denied contact with a legal representative. He stated that his amparo known as a "writ of protection" (apparently an internal passport) was torn up by the Mexican Chief of Police. (...) He also stated that he observed Mr Lamar go to the boot of the FBI car. From it he saw him take an attach[é] case which he opened and passed to a named Mexican official a sum of money claimed to be $40,000 United States currency. Immediately thereafter the appellant stated that he was taken to his car, again denied access to lawyers, submitted to "extreme physical and mental trauma" and delivered across the United States border against his will. He stated that he was refused inspection of any warrant and specifically refused extradition procedure under Mexican law or the protection of the Mexican Constitution whose protection he claimed by reference to his amparo."

[144] Ibid., p. 139.

[145] See ibid., p. 137: "Most important is a cable apparently issued from Los Angeles on 21 [this should probably be 25, see n. 146 ("cable, sent on the very day of the appellant's arrest") and n. 141 (which clarifies that the arrest was on 25 January 1985), ChP] January 1985 and directed for action to the federal police in Australia. The relevant parts of this cable read: "Further to refcable of 23 January 1985 Detective Inspector Adams met with case officers handling the inquiry into the whereabouts of Levinge ... at the San Diego office of the FBI. It has now been established that Levinge is identical with the person Roessler. The likelihood of Roessler (Levinge) being in Mexico presents some foreseen operation itself.[146] Kirby admitted that this did not dismiss the fact that the removal of Levinge from Mexico to the US was in contravention of the regular extradition procedures[147] but this was only interesting for the question as to whether the arrest and detention of Levinge in the US was lawful. As the courts in the US, now that the Toscanino exception did not apply (in that there was no abduction by State agents accompanied by serious mistreatment, and no protest from the 'injured' State),[148] could rely on the Ker-Frisbie doctrine (and as it was not up to the Australian courts to review whether the US courts were in fact justified to do so),[149] this problem was now taken care of. Nevertheless, what happened in Mexico and the US was not totally irrelevant in the courts of Australia either.[150] As a result, Kirby examined more generally whether an irregularity in the process of bringing a suspect to court had any impact on the court's exercise of jurisdiction. After a review of case law from common law countries other than the US,[151] showing both views of how to react to an irregularity in the process of bringing a suspect to justice,[152] Kirby concluded:

---

difficulties on the question of extradition, however it is considered probable by the FBI agents that he commutes regularly across the Mexican border through Tijuana into San Diego where he is known to have a number of associates and therefore a decision has been taken at this time to allow inquiries to proceed along the present lines of attempting to secure their [his] arrest in the United States."" (Ibid.)

[146] See ibid., p. 139: "So far as the cable is concerned, it will be remembered that it simply indicated that the FBI had reported that the appellant crossed the border into the United States from time to time so that the decision was made to secure his arrest at some time when he was in the United States. Nothing in the terms of the cable, sent on the very day of the appellant's arrest, indicates that the dramatic delivery of the appellant was imminent. On the contrary, the cable is entirely consistent with a decision by Detective Chief Inspector Adams to wait patiently until the appellant came across the Mexican border into the United States. As this could be anticipated from time to time, because of the clear connections the appellant had with the United States, why would the Australian authorities promote, participate in or condone the telescoping of the procedures which were readily available?"

[147] See ibid., p. 139.

[148] See the discussion of the aftermath of the Toscanino case.

[149] See New South Wales Court of Appeal, Levinge v Director of Custodial Services, Department of Corrective Services, 23 July 1987, 89 FLR 140: "It would be absurd for this Court to decide that, notwithstanding the considered judgment of the United States appellate judges, who have so much closer knowledge and understanding of the relevant United States law, that the appellant had been denied due process of law in the United States, anterior to his extradition here. That is not a question with which we are legitimately concerned. Our only concern is whether relief will be granted in this Court according to the law applicable in this jurisdiction. It is true that what has occurred in Mexico and the United States forms the factual background against which the application of our law will be considered. But it is erroneous to suggest that we have some function to reconsider the reasoned conclusions of the United States courts in the application of their law. No reason being shown as to why we should do so, we should not tread that uncertain path. For it leads to no relevant destination." See also n. 9 and accompanying text.

[150] See the previous footnote: "It is true that what has occurred in Mexico and the United States forms the factual background against which the application of our law will be considered." See also n. 10 and accompanying text.

[151] See New South Wales Court of Appeal, Levinge v Director of Custodial Services, Department of Corrective Services, 23 July 1987, 89 FLR 140-143.

[152] See ibid., pp. 140-141: "Some such decisions suggest that, once a person is within the jurisdiction, a court should not be troubled to examine how he came there; but should proceed to the substance of the matters before the Court. (...) On the other hand there is another line of authority, in several common

> Where a person, however unlawfully, is brought into the jurisdiction and is before a court in this State, that court has undoubted jurisdiction to deal with him or her. But it also has a discretion not to do so, where to exercise its discretion would involve an abuse of the court's process. Such an abuse may arise by reason of delay on the part of prosecuting authorities. But delay is only one variety of unfair or wrongful conduct on the part of those authorities. Other such conduct may exist, including wrongful and even unlawful involvement in bypassing the regular machinery for extradition and participating in unauthorised and unlawful removal of criminal suspects from one jurisdiction to another.[153]

Kirby, also explaining the two possible rationales behind this abuse of process doctrine,[154] decided that in this particular instance, the judge first dealing with Levinge's arguments was justified in having decided not to refuse jurisdiction.[155] Nevertheless, it is clear that his male detentus test is much broader than the one accepted in the aftermath of the Toscanino case.

Kirby's colleagues, Judge of Appeal McHugh[156] and Acting Judge of Appeal McLelland,[157] also dismissed the appeal. Interestingly, McHugh, in his examination law jurisdictions which suggests that courts will assume the obligation, when asked, to scrutinise the circumstances by which a person was brought into the jurisdiction and, where appropriate, offer relief if it is shown that the means used to get him there were unlawful or otherwise wrongful."

---

[153] Ibid., p. 142.

[154] See ibid., pp. 142-143: "It still remains to be determined whether the conceptual basis of the relief (...) is to prevent prosecuting authorities from taking or securing advantage from their own misconduct or that of their servants or agents or is to assert the entitlement of the courts to protect the integrity of their own process and to uphold that integrity and the perception of it in the eyes of the parties, of the community and of the judges themselves. The first view has, as its conceptual basis, a principle akin to estoppel. The second view is grounded more fundamentally in a conception of the necessary purity of the "temples of justice" and the undesirability that the administration of justice itself should become contaminated by involvement (or the perception of involvement) in unlawful or wrongful activities on the part of the authorities (...). Most of the case law appears to be expressed in terms of the former justification. For my own part, I incline towards a preference for the latter. Perhaps the two concepts are simply dual aspects of the one consideration. However that may be, it is not necessary to resolve that controversy in this case."

[155] See ibid., p. 143: "It is sufficient to dispose of the appeal by saying that, whilst the Court has jurisdiction over the appellant and may provide him with relief of the kind he has sought, no proper basis has been shown to indicate that Smart J erred in declining to exercise that relief in this case. Upon the same facts I would reach the same conclusion as his Honour did."

[156] Who also stressed the fact that the prosecuting authorities had to be, in some way or another, involved in the alleged male captus, see ibid., p. 151: "[T]he Court has the power in an appropriate case to stay proceedings on the ground that the accused has been brought unlawfully into the jurisdiction. However, before a stay can be granted the prosecution must have been either a party to the unlawful conduct or connived at it." See also ibid.: "In the present case there is no evidence that the Australian police were involved in or connived at the expulsion of the plaintiff from Mexico. His Honour found that, shortly after the plaintiff's arrest in the United States, the Australian police officers became aware of the fact that he had been expelled from Mexico as a consequence of the FBI informing Mexican officials that he was wanted in the United States for extradition to Australia. But there is no evidence that before his arrest by the FBI the Australian officers knew that the expulsion of the plaintiff from the United States was the result of the payment of bribes by FBI officers or that his expulsion was unlawful." (See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 89: "The Court held that it has a right to stay proceedings in order to prevent an abuse of

of the case, looked at the role of the seriousness of the charges in the context of the abuse of process doctrine. He hereby made a distinction between cases in which delay had prejudiced the fairness of the trial itself and irregularities not necessarily prejudicing the fairness of the trial (strictly viewed).

> [I]n the "delay" cases there is not in my opinion any question of weighing up competing aspects of the public interest. If by reason of the conduct of the prosecution or complainant the fair trial of the defendant is prejudiced by delay to the extent that it constitutes an abuse of the process of the court, it is irrelevant that there is a strong case against the accused or that he is the subject of a serious charge or complaint. However, in the case of a "forcible abduction" there is no unfairness in the trial itself. So it is necessary to balance the public interest in preventing the unlawful conduct against the public interest in having the charge or complaint determined. This is not to say that the end can justify the means and that the more serious the charge the greater is the scope for the prosecution to engage in unlawful conduct. But conduct which might be regarded as constituting an abuse of process in respect of a comparatively minor charge may not have the same character in respect of a serious matter.[158]

One can indeed agree with this reasoning. In principle, the abuse of process doctrine is a discretionary remedy, meaning that the judges can take every element of the case into account (including the seriousness of the alleged crimes) when deciding whether or not jurisdiction should be refused.[159] However, this discretion is relative in certain cases. For example, when it is clear that the suspect can no longer receive a fair trial in the strict sense of the word (this is the first situation as explained in Subsection 4.3 of Chapter III), a judge should refuse jurisdiction, whether the person tried is charged with very serious crimes or not. After all, a trial which is not fair is process by the executive or to protect the integrity of the court processes. This, however, according to the Court, should be done only where the executive had been a direct or indirect party to the unlawful conduct. As an involvement of the Australian executive could not be identified, the Court decided not to stay the proceedings against him.")

---

[157] Who, like his colleagues, also emphasised the importance of the involvement of the prosecuting authorities in the male captus, see New South Wales Court of Appeal, Levinge v Director of Custodial Services, Department of Corrective Services, 23 July 1987, 89 FLR 153: "It is impossible to conclude from the evidence in this case that any New South Wales or Federal police officer was involved in any illegality or irregularity which may have occurred in the means by which the appellant was taken from Mexico to the United States. In these circumstances there is in my opinion no factual basis for the invocation of the proposition for which R v Hartley; R v Bow Street Magistrates; Ex parte Mackeson and R v Guildford Magistrates' Court; Ex parte Healy are relied on, to the effect that improper activities on the part of the prosecuting authorities in procuring an alleged offender to be brought within the jurisdiction to answer criminal charges could be the basis of a finding that continuation of the prosecution is an abuse of process."

[158] Ibid., p. 151.

[159] This is in principle different for the context of the habeas corpus human rights provisions – applicable to anyone – which dictate the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention. However, it was explained in Subsection 4.4 of Chapter III that this remedy is problematic and that because of that, it would be better if the judge avoids it and simply grants the most appropriate remedy, taking every single aspect of the case into account (comparable with the abuse of process doctrine).

not a proper trial and only proper trials can be held in a society based on law. However, there is more room to weigh the seriousness of the alleged crimes in the second situation (see again Subsection 4.3 of Chapter III), the situation in which this book is mostly interested. If a suspect is the victim of a male captus situation, this fact does normally not affect the fairness of the trial in the strict sense (in court). After all, the male captus only has to do with how that suspect arrived in the court, not with the proceedings in the courtroom themselves. As a result, the judges must determine, taking all the elements of the case into account (including the seriousness of the alleged crimes), whether it would undermine the court's integrity/the judges' sense of justice/the concept of a fair trial broadly perceived to continue the case notwithstanding that male captus. Nevertheless, also here, the abuse of process doctrine can be relative. This is because it can be argued that if the prosecuting forum's own authorities are involved in a serious male captus, such as an abduction, the judges should refuse jurisdiction, even if the suspect is charged with serious crimes and even if the fairness of his trial in the courtroom is not jeopardised by this abduction. This argument will be returned to infra.

A male captus situation that has not so far been mentioned very often in this overview is the method of luring. The Yunis case,[160] decided by the US District Court in the District of Columbia one year after Levinge, is an interesting example of (the position of a US court towards) this technique. In Subsection 1.4 of Chapter III, the luring operation of Yunis was briefly addressed, but it will be repeated here as an introduction to the more substantive issues of the case.

In Yunis, the US Government sought to arrest and bring to justice the leader of a group of men who hijacked and later blew up a Jordanian aircraft in Beirut.[161] After months of investigation, the US identified Lebanese citizen Fawaz Yunis as the leader of this group.[162] It was with help of a former friend of Yunis and now US informant, Jamal Hamdan, that this identification was made possible.[163] A detailed plan was made to lure Yunis, under the promise of a lucrative narcotics deal, from Lebanon to a location in international waters off the coast of Cyprus.[164] On 13 September 1987, the FBI-led operation 'Goldenrod' began: that morning, Hamdan and Yunis boarded a small motor boat off the coast of Cyprus which brought the men to a motor yacht anchored in international waters.[165]

> Immediately upon boarding the yacht, defendant was greeted, given a routine pat down and then offered a beer by one of the FBI agents. S.A. [Special Agent, ChP] George Gast, who assumed the role of one of the narcotic contacts, escorted Yunis to the stern of the boat where he and Yunis joined S.A. Donald Glasser. At a prearranged signal – a slight nod – the two agents, who were then positioned

[160] US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909).
[161] See ibid., p. 912.
[162] See ibid.
[163] See ibid.
[164] See ibid.
[165] See ibid. pp. 912-913.

> alongside Yunis, engaged in a "take down". Together, they grasped the defendant's arms, "kick[ed] his feet out from underneath him, and [took] him down to the deck and put handcuffs on him [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[166]

This 'taking down' caused fractures to Yunis' wrists.[167] Yunis' counsel argued, among other things, that the indictment against Yunis, who was charged with hostage taking and aircraft piracy,[168] had to be dismissed on two grounds: "first, the government's actions contravened its extradition treaty obligations with Lebanon and Cyprus, and second, the government used excessive and outrageous force when arresting defendant in violation of his fifth amendment rights to due process."[169] The Court held that individuals alone are not empowered to enforce extradition treaties (neither Lebanon nor Cyprus objected to the operation).[170] As a result, the issue of the possible extradition treaty violations did not have to be looked at.[171] With respect to Yunis' claims regarding his fifth amendment rights, the Court concluded that the Constitution indeed does apply abroad to aliens. However, it then examined, among other things, the (now probably well-known) Ker-Frisbie doctrine and the serious mistreatment exception of Toscanino.[172] In doing so, it gave some very interesting examples of cases where this exception had not been applied.[173] From

---

[166] Ibid., p. 913.
[167] See ibid., p. 913.
[168] See ibid., p. 911.
[169] Ibid., p. 915.
[170] See ibid., p. 916.
[171] See ibid., p. 915. It must be noted that if Lebanon and Cyprus had objected to the operation, this would not necessarily have led to a refusal of jurisdiction (as is arguably the only appropriate form of reparation in the case of an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the abducted suspect). Although the sovereignty of Lebanon might indeed have been violated by this luring operation, it was stated in Chapter III that a luring operation is normally viewed as a less serious violation of international law than, for example, an abduction. This may also have its effect on the exact form of reparation.
[172] The Court hereby noted that "[a]lthough most circuits have acknowledged the exception carved out by Toscanino, it is highly significant that no court has ever applied it to dismiss an indictment [emphasis in original, ChP]." (Ibid., p. 919.) (See also n. 104.)
[173] See ibid., p. 919: "U.S. v. Rosenthal, 793 F.2d 1214, 1232 (11th Cir.1986), cert. denied, --- U.S. ----, 107 S.Ct. 1377, 94 L.Ed.2d 692 (1987) (defendant abducted from Bahamas on narcotic charges, the court declined to adopt the Toscanino exception but even if applicable, found no evidence of conduct which shocked the conscience); U.S. v. Darby, 744 F.2d 1508 (11th Cir.1984), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1004, 105 S.Ct. 2322, 2323, 85 L.Ed.2d 841 (1985) (Honduran citizen abducted from Honduras, driven at gunpoint to airport, and forced on plane for trial in United States; court held that defendant had not "alleged the sort of cruel, inhuman and outrageous treatment" to warrant dismissal); U.S. v. Reed, 639 F.2d 896 (2d Cir.1981) (Bahamian defendant, residing in the Bahamas, deceitfully enticed by CIA agents to board a plane bound for Bimini; agents placed cocked gun at his head and forced him to lie on aircraft floor for the duration of the flight and then twisted his arm as he exited plane; court found that use of revolver and threatening language not "gross mistreatment" warranting dismissal) [this case was already briefly mentioned earlier, see n. 103, ChP]; U.S. v. Cordero, 668 F.2d 32 (1st Cir.1981) (defendants arrested, abducted in Venezuela to face drug charges in Puerto Rico. In refusing to dismiss the indictment, the court concluded that although defendants were subjected to poor treatment, insulted and slapped when abducted and while in jail were poorly fed and forced to sleep on the floor, those conditions "are a far cry from deliberate torture warranting dismissal") [emphasis in original, ChP]."

these cases, one can conclude that what is apparently needed before the indictment can be dismissed is actual torture, in other words severe mistreatment intentionally inflicted upon the person. 'Normal' abductions in which, for example, the suspect is poorly treated or slapped are not serious enough to dismiss the indictment. Luring cases as such, in which no violence but only tricks are used to bring a suspect from one jurisdiction to another, are even less troublesome.[174] Nevertheless, Yunis also appears to show that if a luring case were accompanied by Toscanino-like serious mistreatment, a court may also refuse jurisdiction. In that respect, even though this exception, because of the facts of the Toscanino case, was linked in the previous pages with the male captus situation abduction, it could be argued that other male captus situations (such as luring and disguised extradition), accompanied by serious, Toscanino-like mistreatment, may also lead to the ending of the case.[175] This can also be derived from the following, rather generally formulated, test in Yunis:

> Two distinct grounds have been relied upon in refusing to dismiss an indictment under the Toscanino exception: either courts conclude that the torturous activity did not rise to the level of outrageousness warranting dismissal, or conclude that United States officials were not directly involved in the torturous activity.[176]

In the end, the Court concluded that the arrest of Yunis did not warrant the dismissal of the case:

> In this action, there is no dispute that United States law enforcement officers were fully involved in the planning and execution of defendant's arrest. However, defendant has failed either to allege or to show any actions committed by these officers that meet the standard of outrageousness established by Toscanino and its progeny requiring this Court to divest itself of jurisdiction. The record in this proceeding has been reviewed with care and the Court fails to find the type of cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino.[177]

---

[174] See ibid., p. 920: "In cases where defendants have urged the court to dismiss the indictment solely on the grounds that they were fraudulently lured to the United States, courts have uniformly upheld jurisdiction."

[175] The other Toscanino exception (violation of State sovereignty followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect) will probably not so easily lead to a male detentus. This is because a disguised extradition cannot lead to a violation of the sovereignty of the State of residence and because a luring operation, even if it can (it was argued in Chapter III that this might be possible under certain circumstances), is often seen as a less serious violation of international law, which may also have its effect on the exact form of reparation.

[176] US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909), p. 919. The Court also explained the reason behind the latter requirement, see ibid., p. 920: "The purpose underlying the Toscanino rule is to deter police misconduct by barring the government from using the fruits of its deliberate lawlessness. When the United States is not involved in the torturous activity, no purpose would be served by dismissing the indictment." See also ns. 100 and 104.

[177] Ibid., p. 920.

The Court hereby noted that the fact that Yunis' arrest may have involved too much force, that Yunis may not have received the best or even adequate medical attention for his broken wrists and that the way in which Yunis was transported to the US was in extreme confinement did not change that conclusion.[178] Notwithstanding this, the Court concluded that the operation had been executed in a far from perfect manner. It concluded that "the FBI failed to comply fully with constitutional restraints and precedential Supreme Court decisions."[179] As a result of this, Yunis' confession made after his arrest had to be suppressed.[180]

The most important male captus case in the US[181] came four years later, when the US Supreme Court decided the (in)famous Alvarez-Machain case.[182] In this case, the respondent, a Mexican citizen called Humberto Alvarez-Machain, was indicted > for participating in the kidnap and murder of United States Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) special agent Enrique Camarena-Salazar and a Mexican pilot working with Camarena, Alfredo Zavala-Avelar. The DEA believes that the respondent, a medical doctor, participated in the murder by prolonging Agent Camarena's life so that others could further torture and interrogate him [original footnote omitted, ChP].[183]

---

[178] See ibid., pp. 920-921: "That is not to say that the Court accepts the government's representations in its December 1, 1987 response to defendant's pretrial motion that Yunis "was treated with the greatest care and with due deference to whatever personal requests he made during the voyage from the Mediterranean to the United States." Even the government has admitted that "there may well have been in hindsight too much force brought upon Mr. Yunis' wrists" when he was forced down and thrown to the deck during the course of his arrest. (…) Indeed, the two agents immediately involved believed that the amount of force and method used in effectuating the arrest were necessary to ensure that the defendant did not attempt to jump overboard. Similarly, although the defendant may not have been given the best or even adequate medical care, the treatment provided was not so poor as to be "cruel and inhumane." (…) Finally, even if the procedure employed in transporting the defendant by airplane from the Saratoga [this is the carrier from which Yunis was flown to the US, ChP] to the United States was extremely confining, it did not rise to the level of outrageousness that shocks the conscience. S.A. David Johnson, who was primarily responsible for the hostage rescue team, testified that it was necessary to tranquilize the defendant and place him in the Stokes litter [See ibid., p. 912, n. 4: "A Stokes litter is commonly used by the Navy to carry injured personnel. Occupants are strapped into the litter and immobilized in a prone position.", ChP.] due to the size of the plane and the need to protect the aircraft and the personnel on board. (…) Even if the Court were to accept each and every allegation of excessiveness made by the defendant, taken together, they simply do not rise to the deliberate torture and abuse alleged in Toscanino."

[179] Ibid., p. 929.

[180] See ibid.

[181] See also Michell (1996, p. 404), who called it "the leading U.S. case on forcible abduction by government agents". See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 82 (referring to Michell).

[182] US Supreme Court, United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 15 June 1992, No. 91-712 (504 US 655).

[183] Ibid., p. 657.

On 2 April 1990, Alvarez-Machain was abducted from Mexico by six armed men[184] and, after being held in a motel for one night, flown to El Paso, Texas, where he was arrested by DEA officials.[185] Although the latter were not involved in the actual kidnapping, the District Court concluded that they were nevertheless responsible for it.[186] Mexico protested the violation of its sovereignty and demanded that Alvarez-Machain be returned to Mexico.[187] This element was not present in the Lujan case. As a result, it is interesting to see how the Court coped with this international law issue and how it might affect the US male captus discussion.

Alvarez-Machain himself argued that his indictment had to be dismissed, claiming that the abduction constituted outrageous governmental conduct and that the District Court had no jurisdiction to try him because the abduction was a violation of the extradition treaty between the US and Mexico.[188]

Although Alvarez-Machain's former point was rejected by the District Court, the latter was accepted.[189] Hence, the Court discharged Alvarez-Machain and ordered his repatriation to Mexico.[190]

The Court of Appeals concurred with this reasoning, hereby relying on its decision in the already briefly mentioned (see footnote 104) case United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez.[191] This is arguably the proper interpretation of the Lujan case: even though Alvarez-Machain was not seriously mistreated during his abduction, the exercise of jurisdiction could still be refused because of a violation of international law.

---

[184] One of these was a man called Sosa, a former Mexican policeman who was hired by the DEA. (The name Sosa can be found back in the civil suit filed by Alvarez-Machain after the criminal case, see infra).

[185] See US Supreme Court, United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 15 June 1992, No. 91-712 (504 US 655), p. 657.

[186] See ibid.

[187] See ibid., pp. 670-671: "Mexico has formally demanded on at least two separate occasions that he be returned to Mexico, and has represented that he will be prosecuted and, if convicted, punished for his offense [original footnote omitted, ChP]." In addition, Mexico requested the extradition of two of Alvarez-Machain's alleged kidnappers, see ibid., p. 669, n. 16.

[188] See ibid., p. 658.

[189] See ibid.

[190] See ibid.

[191] See ibid. See also ibid., pp. 658-659 for information on the Verdugo case: "United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d 1341 (CA9 1991), cert. pending, No. 91-670. 946 F.2d 1466 (1991). In Verdugo, the Court of Appeals held that the forcible abduction of a Mexican national [who was also indicted for the murder of Camarena, see US Supreme Court, United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 15 June 1992, No. 91-712 (504 US 655), p. 658, n. 3, ChP] with the authorization or participation of the United States violated the Extradition Treaty between the United States and Mexico. Although the Treaty does not expressly prohibit such abductions, the Court of Appeals held that the "purpose" of the Treaty was violated by a forcible abduction, 939 F.2d, at 1350, which, along with a formal protest by the offended nation, would give a defendant the right to invoke the Treaty violation to defeat jurisdiction of the District Court to try him. The Court of Appeals further held that the proper remedy for such a violation would be dismissal of the indictment and repatriation of the defendant to Mexico [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

Chief Justice Rehnquist, delivering the "surprisingly curt judgment"[192] of the majority of the Supreme Court Justices, discussed, among other things, the Ker case[193] and noted that

> [t]he only differences between Ker and the present case are that Ker was decided on the premise that there was no governmental involvement in the abduction (…) and Peru, from which Ker was abducted, did not object to his prosecution [original footnote omitted, ChP].[194]

Rehnquist observed that Alvarez-Machain (like the Court of Appeals in the case United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez) found these differences dispositive as they showed that his prosecution violated the implied terms of a valid extradition treaty.[195]

Hence, Rehnquist continued,

> our first inquiry must be whether the abduction of respondent from Mexico violated the Extradition Treaty between the United States and Mexico. If we conclude that the Treaty does not prohibit respondent's abduction, the rule in Ker applies, and the court need not inquire as to how respondent came before it.[196]

This appears to contradict earlier cases discussed, for if the Supreme Court were not to find the abduction to constitute a violation of the extradition treaty (which would arguably be very strange), one could still assert that the Court would have to examine whether the abduction violated (customary) international law (namely through the violation of the sovereignty of Mexico) and if not, that it would still have to determine whether Alvarez-Machain was the victim of serious mistreatment during his abduction, see Lujan. (The fact that the District Court and the Court of Appeals did not believe that Alvarez-Machain was the victim of outrageous governmental conduct does not mean that the Supreme Court could not have a different opinion on this.)[197]

Be that as it may, Rehnquist first noted that: 1) "[t]he Treaty says nothing about the obligations of the United States and Mexico to refrain from forcible abductions of people from the territory of the other nation, or the consequences under the

---

[192] Rayfuse 1993, p. 886.
[193] See US Supreme Court, United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 15 June 1992, No. 91-712 (504 US 655), pp. 660-661.
[194] Ibid., p. 662.
[195] See ibid.
[196] Ibid.
[197] With respect to the alleged physical abuse of Alvarez-Machain, see, for example, Aceves 1996, pp. 107-108: "During his capture and detention, Alvarez was physically and verbally abused. Alvarez testified that he was "shocked six or seven times through the soles of his shoes with 'an electric shock apparatus'" and "injected twice with a substance that made him feel 'light-headed and dizzy'" [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

Treaty if such an abduction occurs";[198] 2) the mechanism in the extradition treaty "does not purport to specify the only way in which one country may gain custody of a national of the other country for the purposes of prosecution"[199] and 3) "[t]he history of negotiation and practice under the Treaty also fails to show that abductions outside of the Treaty constitute a violation of the Treaty."[200]

He then turned to the question of "whether the Treaty should be interpreted so as to include an implied term prohibiting prosecution where the defendant's presence is obtained by means other than those established by the Treaty"[201] and examined the argument of Alvarez-Machain "that the Treaty must be interpreted against the backdrop of customary international law, and that international abductions are "so clearly prohibited in international law" that there was no reason to include such a clause in the Treaty itself."[202]

Although this seems obvious, the majority of the Court, amazingly, did not agree:

> [T]o imply from the terms of this Treaty that it prohibits obtaining the presence of an individual by means outside of the procedures the Treaty establishes requires a much larger inferential leap, with only the most general of international law principles to support it. The general principles cited by respondent simply fail to persuade us that we should imply in the United States-Mexico Extradition Treaty a term prohibiting international abductions.[203]

Thus, even though the judges focused on the treaty, they also indirectly looked at international law more generally, namely to find out whether it was so strong on this particular topic that it had to be read into the treaty. That was not the case, although that did not mean that international law was not violated at all. That could very well have been the case:

> Respondent and his amici may be correct that respondent's abduction was "shocking," (...), and that it may be in violation of general international law principles. Mexico has protested the abduction of respondent through diplomatic notes (...), and the decision of whether respondent should be returned to Mexico, as a matter outside of the Treaty, is a matter for the Executive Branch. We conclude, however, that respondent's abduction was not in violation of the Extradition Treaty between the United States and Mexico, and therefore the rule of Ker v. Illinois is fully applicable to this case. The fact of respondent's forcible abduction does not therefore prohibit his trial in a court in the United States for violations of the criminal laws of the United States [original footnote omitted, ChP].[204]

---

[198] US Supreme Court, United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 15 June 1992, No. 91-712 (504 US 655), p. 663.
[199] Ibid., p. 664.
[200] Ibid., p. 665.
[201] Ibid., p. 666.
[202] Ibid.
[203] Ibid., p. 669.
[204] Ibid., pp. 669-670.

Hence, because the abduction did not violate the extradition treaty, the Supreme Court did not find it necessary to look further into the international law dimension. It held that the violation of international law, if there was any – this is, of course, obvious, given the fact that Mexico did not consent to the abduction for which the US was responsible – had to be solved at the political level. Furthermore, the other element of the Toscanino exception prima facie did not appear relevant at all. After all, the Court issued a male captus bene detentus decision while holding that "[r]espondent and his amici may be correct that respondent's abduction was "shocking"". This is also the reason why some commentators believe that Alvarez-Machain effectively quashed the Toscanino exception.[205] If this is indeed true (which, however, can be seriously doubted),[206] then this would be very alarming for [205] See, for example, Rayfuse 1993, p. 893 (focusing on the mistreatment element): "[T]he Supreme Court ruled in Machain that regardless of the "shocking" nature of the government's acts, Machain was subject to the jurisdiction of the US courts and any relief to be afforded was at the discretion of the executive branch only. The "shocking and outrageous" exception thus appears to have been put to rest by the Supreme Court, once and for all." See also ibid., p. 896. See also Sheely 2003, p. 439: "The Supreme Court in Alvarez-Machain reaffirmed the application of the Ker-Frisbie doctrine to an abduction that was, arguably, both "shocking" and in violation of international law, seemingly disavowing the "Toscanino Exception." Later, in United States v. Matta-Ballesteros, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit commented upon both the applicability of the Ker-Frisbie doctrine to cases in which the manner a defendant is brought before the court is questioned and upon the very limited holding and questionable precedential value of Toscanino. In Matta-Ballesteros, a Honduran national was kidnapped from his home [by the 'Cobras' (Honduran special troops) and US Marshals, see US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, United States v. Matta-Ballesteros, 1 December 1995, No. 91-50336 (71 F.3d 754), p. 761, ChP] and flown to Illinois where he was subsequently tried and convicted on narcotic charges. One of Matta-Ballesteros' challenges to his conviction was that his abduction was "shocking," invoking the "Toscanino Exception." ["Matta-Ballesteros claims that while being transported bound and hooded to the United States Air Force Base he was beaten and burned with a stun gun at the direction of the Marshals. He claims that during his flight he was once again beaten and tortured by a stun gun applied to various parts of his body, including his feet and genitals." (Ibid.), ChP.] The court dismissed this allegation, noting that "[i]n the shadow cast by Alvarez-Machain, attempts to expand due process rights into the realm of foreign abductions, as the Second Circuit did in United States v. Toscanino (…), have been cut short." (Ibid., p. 763.) It may finally be interesting to note that Matta-Ballesteros, like Alvarez-Machain, was also charged with being involved in the Camarena case. In fact, many more were charged in connection with the case of the murdered DEA agent: 22 persons were charged, of whom seven were tried in federal court. Three of those seven (namely Alvarez-Machain, Matta-Ballesteros and the already discussed Verdugo-Urquidez) were abducted from their home countries and brought to the US. (See US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, Alvarez-Machain v. United States et al. (No. 99-56762) and Alvarez-Machain v. Sosa et al. (No. 99-56880), 3 June 2003 (331 F.3d 604), p. 623, n. 23.) The Alvarez-Machain and the Matta-Ballesteros cases differ in at least two important points and that is that 1) the Mexican Government did protest the abduction of Alvarez-Machain, whereas the Honduran Government did not protest the abduction of Matta-Ballesteros and 2) the US had not sought extradition from Mexico whereas the US had tried to have Matta-Ballesteros extradited from Honduras to the US before it abducted him. (For this last point, see US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, United States v. Matta-Ballesteros, 1 December 1995, No. 91-50336 (71 F.3d 754), p. 761 and Nadelmann 1993, p. 871.) For more information on the Matta-Ballesteros case, see, for example, Michell 1996, pp. 430-434.

[206] Although the words from Matta-Ballesteros mentioned in n. 205 ("In the shadow cast by Alvarez-Machain, attempts to expand due process rights into the realm of foreign abductions, as the Second Circuit did in United States v. Toscanino (…), have been cut short.") do not support this assertion, the judges in Matta-Ballesteros seemed to be of the opinion that jurisdiction can be refused in Toscanino- it would mean that a court in the US could continue a case, even if that abduction may have been accompanied by serious mistreatment and even if that abduction was in violation of the sovereignty of another State which protested and requested the return of the suspect. The only avenues leading to the ending of the case would then be if the Extradition Treaty/or another treaty signed between the two States were to explicitly forbid an abduction[207] or if the Executives of the two States are of the like circumstances nonetheless, namely in the context of another concept (the concept of supervisory powers), see US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, United States v. Matta-Ballesteros, 1 December 1995, No. 91-50336 (71 F.3d 754), p. 764: "The only way we could exercise our supervisory powers in this particular case is if the defendant could demonstrate governmental misconduct "of the most shocking and outrageous kind," so as to warrant dismissal. (…) Matta-Ballesteros has not. His alleged treatment, even if taken as true, does not meet this rigorous standard, and the acts alleged were not nearly as egregious as those committed in Toscanino." Thus, one can assert that US courts, in Toscanino-like circumstances, would still refuse jurisdiction, even after Alvarez-Machain. See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 83: "The Court [in Matta-Ballesteros, ChP] did not exclude the possible application of the Toscanino rule but held that the circumstances of the accused's abduction did not meet the level of seriousness required." Note finally that the Toscanino exception thus appears to be extremely high. After all, in Matta-Ballesteros, the judges stated that the suspect's treatment, "even if taken as true" (it is reminded, see n. 205, that Matta-Ballesteros claimed that he was beaten and tortured by a stun gun), does not meet the required standard.

---

[207] See Sheely 2003, p. 438. See also ibid., p. 437: "The majority opinion of Alvarez-Machain was later cited as standing for the proposition that, in order for a defendant to successfully rely upon an extradition treaty to divest jurisdiction, the treaty must affirmatively state that citizens of a signator country will not be seized by another signator country [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Sheely hereby refers to the Noriega case, where Judge Kravitch wrote: "Under Alvarez-Machain, to prevail on an extradition treaty claim, a defendant must demonstrate, by reference to the express language of a treaty and/or the established practice thereunder, that the United States affirmatively agreed not to seize foreign nationals from the territory of its treaty partner." (US Court of Appeals, Eleventh Circuit, United States v. Noriega, 7 July 1997, Nos. 92-4687, 96-4471 (117 F.3d 1206), p. 1213.) Noriega was a special male captus case because General Noriega, the commander of the Panamanian Defence Forces, was brought to the US after that latter State had intervened militarily in Panama. This military invasion was triggered by Noriega's declaration on 15 December 1989 that a state of war existed between Panama and the US. Less than a week later, on 20 December 1989, "President Bush ordered U.S. troops into combat in Panama City on a mission whose stated goals were to safeguard American lives, restore democracy, preserve the Panama Canal treaties, and seize General Noriega to face federal drug charges in the United States." (US District Court, Southern District of Florida, United States v. Noriega, 8 June 1990, No. 88-79-CR (746 F.Supp. 1506), p. 1511.) In the US, Noriega was subsequently tried and convicted for involvement in cocaine trafficking. An important dictum of the Noriega case which should be mentioned here is that it followed the already discussed Eichmann and still-to-discuss Argoud cases in arguing that a person cannot plead a violation of classical international law, see ibid., p. 1533: "As a general principle of international law, individuals have no standing to challenge violations of international treaties in the absence of a protest by the sovereign involved." Returning to the Alvarez-Machain case and the point made supra, it may finally be interesting to note (see also n. 187 of Chapter III) that after the Alvarez-Machain case, a treaty on transborder abductions was, in fact, drafted, see Baker 2004, pp. 1389-1390: "[N]egotiations between the United States and Mexico led to the signing of the Transborder Abduction Treaty in 1994, which suggests an effort by both countries towards improvement in extradition policies. Most importantly, the remedy for a violation of the Treaty is repatriation of the abductee [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." This Treaty Between the Government of the United Mexican States and the Government of the United States of America to Prohibit Transborder Abductions (which can be found in Abbell 2001, at A-303-A-306) stipulates (in Art. 5, para. 2) that there is no obligation to repatriate "if (a) the Requesting Party does not make an explicit request for opinion that international law demands that the suspect must be returned to the injured State, in which case, of course, the judge cannot exercise jurisdiction.

As expected, the decision attracted a lot of criticism from around the world. The first reaction came, however, from the US itself, through the dissenting opinion of Justice Stevens (writing for the minority). He stated that "[t]he Government's claim [upheld by the Supreme Court, ChP] that the Treaty is not exclusive, but permits forcible governmental kidnaping, would transform (…) provisions [of the extradition treaty, ChP] into little more than verbiage."[208] To clarify this, Justice Stevens ridiculed the Court's a contrario reasoning that because the treaty does not say that kidnapping is not allowed, it is in fact allowed to kidnap:

> If the United States, for example, thought it more expedient to torture or simply to execute a person rather than to attempt extradition, these options would be equally available, because they, too, were not explicitly prohibited by the Treaty [original footnote omitted, ChP].[209]

According to Stevens, "[i]t is shocking that a party to an extradition treaty might believe that it has secretly reserved the right to make seizures of citizens in the other party's territory [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[210]

He used the same word when referring to the Court's "disdain for customary and conventional international law principles",[211] which, as was shown already in Chapter III, stipulate that it is a breach of international law to perform acts of sovereignty on a State's territory without the latter's consent and that the forum State must repatriate the abductee if the injured State protests and requests his return.[212] repatriation, or (b) the abducted person opposes repatriation." (Ibid., A-305.) As explained earlier, although both Mexico and the US signed the treaty on 23 November 1994, it was never submitted to the US Senate for advice and consent to ratification. As a result, it has never entered into force.

---

[208] US Supreme Court, United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 15 June 1992, No. 91-712 (504 US 655), p. 673. See also ibid., pp. 673-674: "For example, provisions requiring "sufficient" evidence to grant extradition (Art. 3), withholding extradition for political or military offenses (Art. 5), withholding extradition when the person sought has already been tried (Art. 6), withholding extradition when the statute of limitations for the crime has lapsed (Art. 7), and granting the requested Country discretion to refuse to extradite an individual who would face the death penalty in the requesting country (Art. 8), would serve little purpose if the requesting country could simply kidnap the person. As the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit recognized in a related case, "[e]ach of these provisions would be utterly frustrated if a kidnapping were held to be a permissible course of governmental conduct." United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 939 F.2d 1341, 1349 (1991). In addition, all of these provisions "only make sense if they are understood as requiring each treaty signatory to comply with those procedures whenever it wishes to obtain jurisdiction over an individual who is located in another treaty nation." Id., at 1351."

[209] Ibid., p. 674.

[210] Ibid., pp. 678-679.

[211] Ibid., pp. 685-686: "The Court's admittedly "shocking" disdain for customary and conventional international law principles (…) is (…) entirely unsupported by case law and commentary."

[212] See ibid., pp. 680-681. Stevens hereby referred, among other things, to Oppenheim's International Law ("A State must not perform acts of sovereignty in the territory of another State. ..… It is … a breach of International Law for a State to send its agents to the territory of another State to apprehend persons accused of having committed a crime. Apart from other satisfaction, the first duty of the

Stevens, distinguishing Alvarez-Machain from Ker[213] and explaining that a feeling of vengeance should not lead to a misinterpretation of the law,[214] even used stronger words in the following passage, which have now become famous:

> I suspect most courts throughout the civilized world (…) will be deeply disturbed by the "monstrous" decision the Court announces today. For every nation that has an interest in preserving the Rule of Law is affected, directly or indirectly, by a decision of this character [original footnote omitted, ChP].[215] offending State is to hand over the person in question to the State in whose territory he was apprehended.") and to a quotation by the chief reporter for the American Law Institute's Third Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States: "When done without consent of the foreign government, abducting a person from a foreign country is a gross violation of international law and gross disrespect for a norm high in the opinion of mankind. It is a blatant violation of the territorial integrity of another state; it eviscerates the extradition system (established by a comprehensive network of treaties involving virtually all states)."

---

[213] See ibid., p. 682: "A critical flaw pervades the Court's entire opinion. It fails to differentiate between the conduct of private citizens, which does not violate any treaty obligation, and conduct expressly authorized by the Executive Branch of the Government, which unquestionably constitutes a flagrant violation of international law, and in my opinion, also constitutes a breach of our treaty obligations. Thus, at the outset of its opinion, the Court states the issue as "whether a criminal defendant, abducted to the United States from a nation with which it has an extradition treaty, thereby acquires a defense to the jurisdiction of this country's courts." (…) That, of course, is the question decided in Ker v. Illinois (…); it is not, however, the question presented for decision today [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., pp. 684-685: "The arresting officer in Ker did not pretend to be acting in any official capacity when he kidnaped Ker. As Justice Miller noted, "the facts show that it was a clear case of kidnapping within the dominions of Peru, without any pretence of authority under the treaty or from the government of the United States." (…) The exact opposite is true in this case". See also n. 34.

[214] See ibid., pp. 686-688: "As the Court observes at the outset of its opinion, there is reason to believe that respondent participated in an especially brutal murder of an American law enforcement agent. That fact, if true, may explain the Executive's intense interest in punishing respondent in our courts. Such an explanation, however, provides no justification for disregarding the Rule of Law that this Court has a duty to uphold. That the Executive may wish to reinterpret the Treaty to allow for an action that the Treaty in no way authorizes should not influence this Court's interpretation. Indeed, the desire for revenge exerts "a kind of hydraulic pressure . . . before which even well settled principles of law will bend," (…), but it is precisely at such moments that we should remember and be guided by our duty "to render judgment evenly and dispassionately according to law, as each is given understanding to ascertain and apply it." (…) As Thomas Paine warned, an "avidity to punish is always dangerous to liberty" because it leads a nation "to stretch, to misinterpret, and to misapply even the best of laws." To counter that tendency, he reminds us: "He that would make his own liberty secure must guard even his enemy from oppression; for if he violates this duty he establishes a precedent that will reach to himself" [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[215] Ibid., pp. 687-688.

Alongside the dissent of the minority, "[t]he judgement was criticised in legal literature,[216] condemned by most states and denounced by international human rights organizations[217] [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."[218]

[216] See, for example, the following articles with the much-saying titles: 'The Supreme Court Sanctions Transborder Kidnapping in United States v. Alvarez-Machain: Does International Law Still Matter?' (Schneebaum 1992), 'International Abduction and the United States Supreme Court: The Law of the Jungle Reigns' (Rayfuse 1993), 'Monstrous Decision. Kidnapping is Legal' (Ruiz-Bravo 1993), '"The Treaty Doesn't Say We Can't Kidnap Anyone" – Government Sponsored Kidnapping as a Means of Circumventing Extradition Treaties' (Ré 1993) and 'A Global Paradigm Shattered: The Jurisdictional Nihilism of the Supreme Court's Abduction Decision in Alvarez-Machain' (Strauss 1994). For another sound, see, for example, the article 'In Defense of the Supreme Court Decision in Alvarez-Machain' (Halberstam 1992).

[217] For a good overview of the reactions from foreign governments and international organisations (and also from within the US), see Zaid 1997. To give three examples of positions from international organisations, the Inter-American Juridical Committee of the OAS noted, among other things: "a) By upholding the jurisdiction of United States courts to try the Mexican citizen, Humberto Alvarez Machain, forcibly abducted from his country of origin, the United States is ignoring its obligation to return him to the country from whose jurisdiction he was abducted. b) By maintaining that it is free to try persons abducted by the action of its government in the territory of another state, unless this is expressly prohibited by a treaty in effect between the United States and the country in question, the United States is ignoring a fundamental principle of international law which is respect for the territorial sovereignty of states." (OAS, Inter-American Juridical Committee, 'Legal Opinion on the Decision of the Supreme Court of the United States', 15 August 1992, Rio de Janeiro, 4 Criminal Law Forum (1993), pp. 119-134, at p. 125.) Interesting for this study is also the following remark of the Juridical Committee (not mentioned, for example, by Zaid, who also refers to the above-mentioned words from the Juridical Committee, see Zaid 1997, pp. 845-855, n. 133): "The Committee should likewise underscore the incompatibility of the practice of abduction with the right of due process to which every person is entitled, no matter how serious the crime they are accused of, a right protected by international law [emphasis added, ChP]." (OAS, Inter-American Juridical Committee, 'Legal Opinion on the Decision of the Supreme Court of the United States', 15 August 1992, Rio de Janeiro, 4 Criminal Law Forum (1993), pp. 119-134, at p. 125.) See in that respect also the 'Explanation of Concurring Vote of Doctor Jorge Reinaldo A. Vanossi', who tries to offer a solution for the problems by suggesting the establishment of an "international or regional criminal court with full jurisdiction to take up and rule on criminal cases involving extremely serious crimes against humanity, such as terrorism and drug trafficking (furthermore, crimes that are closely interrelated)". (Ibid., p. 129.) He then writes (ibid., p. 130): "[T]he end does not justify the means. Accordingly, the struggle for justice against these crimes against humanity should unfold through law, developing and perfecting existing mechanisms (such as extradition treaties) and creating others with both imagination and decisiveness (for example, an inter-American or an international court for criminal matters). Once again, we adduce as truth the overwhelming fact that this warning about the ends and the means contains. In the struggle against cannibals, we are not allowed to eat the cannibals! In effect, if cannibalism were fought with cannibalism, we would lose the moral legitimacy for our struggle against this crime." In the second international organisation to be mentioned here, the UNGA, it was agreed, among other things, that: "(1) international law prohibits a state from exercising its criminal jurisdiction beyond its territory as contrary to the sovereign equality and territorial integrity of states, unless the other state concerned has given its consent; (2) the use of unilateral measures, such as the abduction of a suspected criminal from another state for trial before the national courts of the abducting state, undermines existing mechanisms for international cooperation in the apprehension and prosecution of criminal offenders, as well as treaty obligations to prosecute or extradite such offenders". (Morris and Bourloyannis-Vrailas 1994, p. 357.) The third organisation which could be mentioned here is the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, which concluded that Alvarez-Machain's deprivation of liberty was arbitrary because it was in violation of the extradition treaty between the US and Mexico (see Commission on Human Rights, Fiftieth session, Item 10 of the provisional agenda, Question of the Human Rights of All Persons

This means that not only was the fact that US authorities had resorted to the tool of abduction criticised, but also the fact that the Supreme Court, by upholding jurisdiction in these circumstances, legally 'approved' this technique.[219]

This implies that many States are thus seemingly of the opinion that the Supreme Court should not have stated that the exercise of jurisdiction be continued in the case of a situation in which it was clear that there was an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect by the injured State.

Subjected to Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment, Report of the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, UN Doc. E/CN.4/1994/27, 17 December 1993, Decision No. 48/1993 (United States of America), p. 138) and because it was in violation of customary international law (see ibid., p. 139 and n. 74 of Chapter III). Next to these inter-State considerations, the Working Group also looked at the human rights dimension (see ibid., pp. 139-140) and concluded that Alvarez-Machain's detention was arbitrary. Note that the Working Group, in its decision, also made the following intriguing statement. After having addressed the two (inter-State) elements which had to be taken into account in determining whether Alvarez-Machain's deprivation of liberty was to be considered arbitrary or not (namely "(1) Whether international treaty law governing relations between the United States of America and Mexico permits or prohibits the abduction of one person from the territory of one country to the territory of another, in order for him to be tried; (2) If the matter is not resolved in treaty law, whether customary international law permits or prohibits abduction of this kind." (Ibid., pp. 136-137.)), the Working Group stated: "It should however be noted that those two issues arise only in the context of acts of abduction of persons accused of common crimes and not when such acts are committed against persons accused of crimes against humanity, as accepted by the international community." (Ibid., p. 137.) What this means is not very clear. It appears that the UN Working Group is of the opinion that in the case of suspects of crimes against humanity, other elements play a role in determining whether a deprivation of liberty is arbitrary or not. This is very much reminiscent of the statement of Paust, as presented in Chapter III (see n. 224 and accompanying text of that chapter), that "[w]hat is "arbitrary," otherwise "unlawful," or "unjust" will have to be considered in context and with reference to other legal policies at stake. (…) [I]t may not be incompatible with principles of justice, "unjust," "unlawful" or otherwise "arbitrary" to abduct or capture an international criminal in a context when action is reasonably necessary to assure adequate sanctions against egregious international criminal activity [original footnote omitted, ChP]". However, as also argued in that chapter, although one can imagine that the same legal arrest is non-arbitrary in one case and arbitrary in the other, it is allegedly not so that an operation, which is so often labelled as unlawful and arbitrary that one may assert that it is always, in every case, unlawful or arbitrary (such as an abduction) may become less unlawful or arbitrary under certain circumstances. With respect to the inter-State context (in which context this statement of the Working Group was made), one can argue the same, namely that an abduction violating another State's sovereignty does not become less arbitrary because one is dealing with suspects of crimes against humanity. The Working Group should not forget its own reference to the Eichmann case (which involved a suspect who was charged, among other things, with crimes against humanity) that "intervention by one Power in the territory of another is not only a breach of international law but, in addition, if it is repeated, it may "endanger international peace and security" (United Nations Security Council, Claim by Argentina in the Eichmann case, resolution 138 (1960))." (Ibid., p. 139, see also n. 74 of Chapter III.) Thus, an abduction of a suspect charged with crimes against humanity is not less arbitrary than an abduction of a suspect charged with ordinary crimes, although the 'quality' of the suspect may influence the question as to how the arbitrariness must be repaired.

[218] Costi 2003, pp. 86-87. Bush (1993, p. 941) notes that only "[f]ar-right columnists and a handful of major papers supported the decision [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[219] See also Loan 2005, p. 281: "The abduction of Alvarez-Machain by the United States and the subsequent decision by the Supreme Court in 1992 received international condemnation [emphasis added, ChP]."

One could assert the same with respect to the idea expressed above that Alvarez-Machain may have meant the end of the mistreatment exception of Toscanino, but one can seriously doubt whether Alvarez-Machain quashed that male detentus situation in the first place, see footnote 206.

In other words, one can assert that the mistreatment exception of Toscanino is probably still valid in US courts, but to the extent that States are of the opinion that Alvarez-Machain has quashed both male detentus situations, one can argue that the immense criticism towards this decision in general is proof of the idea that many States are of the opinion that in those two situations (an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect and an abduction accompanied by serious mistreatment), jurisdiction must be refused.[220] See in that respect also Baker, who writes that "most of the criticisms revolved around the fact that the United States domestic legal system should have provided a defensive remedy for Alvarez-Machain by dismissing the indictment."[221]

Notwithstanding this criticism, the Alvarez-Machain case is still to be considered "the leading U.S. case on forcible abduction by government agents".[222]

Following the Supreme Court's decision, the case proceeded to trial, but after the Government's case was heard, Alvarez-Machain was acquitted due to a lack of sufficient evidence to support a guilty verdict.[223]

Back in his homeland Mexico, and contemplating the words of the Justices of the Supreme Court that "[r]espondent and his amici may be correct that respondent's

---

[220] Although much criticism was general in nature (meaning that the decision in its totality was attacked, including the possible quashing of the mistreatment exception of Toscanino), it must be noted that most criticism was directed towards the situation most clearly present in that case, namely an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect by the injured State, see Canada's amicus curiae brief in the Alvarez-Machain case: "Canada and its component governments do not hold to a policy of abductions from American territory, and if abductions occur, they could not reasonably expect the United States to acquiesce in Canadian courts' disrespect of U.S. sovereignty through exercise of jurisdiction over abducted individuals. The Government of Canada would, upon protest, cooperate to obtain the return of an abducted fugitive." (US Supreme Court: Brief of the Government of Canada as Amicus Curiae in Support of Respondent in United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 4 March 1992, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), pp. 923-924.) See also ibid., p. 924: "[H]ereafter, we set forth the law, customs and usages of civilized nations which suggest that official abductions [note that the term 'official abduction' is used differently in this study, see ns. 21 and 63 of Chapter III and ns. 94 and 782 of the present chapter, ChP] are unlawful and require restitution of the status quo ante. (...) Hereafter, Canada sets forth a survey of some of the incidents and expressions of policy which show the understanding in international law that abducted persons must be returned to a nation when it protests the infringement of its sovereignty." See also ibid., p. 925: "[T]he Canadian Department of External Affairs queried competent officials of other nations and requested their comments concerning official transborder abductions. (…) If an abducted person were returned to their territory, and brought before their courts, Austria, Finland, The Netherlands, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland would consider that the abducted person should be returned."

[221] Baker 2004, p. 1375.

[222] Michell 1996, p. 404.

[223] US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, Alvarez-Machain v. United States et al. (No. 99-56762) and Alvarez-Machain v. Sosa et al. (No. 99-56880), 3 June 2003 (331 F.3d 604), p. 610. See ibid.: "The court concluded that the case against Alvarez was based on "suspicion and ... hunches but ... no proof," and that the government's theories were "whole cloth, the wildest speculation."" abduction was "shocking," (...), and that it may be in violation of general international law principles", Alvarez-Machain decided to file a civil suit against his abductors (among whom was a man called Sosa, whose name is now used to refer to the civil case of Alvarez-Machain), the responsible DEA agents and the US Government.

Although this study focuses on criminal cases, the civil case of Alvarez-Machain may nevertheless be interesting to examine in greater detail as it addressed, in contrast to its criminal counterpart, the international law dimension of a phenomenon central in this study: kidnapping.

In addition, it has already been mentioned earlier that male captus bene detentus courts have claimed that the remedy of setting aside jurisdiction may not be appropriate but that the suspect could always sue his kidnappers in a civil case. For once, it may be interesting to look into these matters in more detail.

Alvarez based his civil suit on the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA)[224] and the Alien Tort Claims Act (ATCA), and alleged a number of conventional and constitutional torts claims such as kidnapping, torture and false arrest.[225]

Because of its international law dimension, the ATCA (which was enacted as early as 1789) is the most interesting one for this study. It reads: "The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States."[226] The exact scope of this provision (including the words "the law of nations") was an important issue in this case.

The District Court entered summary judgment against Sosa with respect to Alvarez-Machain's ATCA claims for kidnapping and arbitrary detention,[227] thereby [224] The FTCA consists of US Code, Title 28, Section 1346(b)(1) ("Subject to the provisions of chapter 171 of this title, the district courts, together with the United States District Court for the District of the Canal Zone and the District Court of the Virgin Islands, shall have exclusive jurisdiction of civil actions on claims against the United States, for money damages, accruing on and after January 1, 1945, for injury or loss of property, or personal injury or death caused by the negligent or wrongful act or omission of any employee of the Government while acting within the scope of his office or employment, under circumstances where the United States, if a private person, would be liable to the claimant in accordance with the law of the place where the act or omission occurred.") and Chapter 171 (Sections 2671-2080) of the same title (explaining the Tort Claims Procedure), see US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, Alvarez-Machain v. United States et al. (No. 99-56762) and Alvarez-Machain v. Sosa et al. (No. 99-56880), 3 June 2003 (331 F.3d 604), p. 608.

[225] Ibid., p. 610. See ibid., n. 1: "Specifically, Alvarez alleged the following conventional tort claims: (1) kidnapping; (2) torture; (3) cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment; (4) arbitrary detention; (5) assault and battery; (6) false imprisonment; (7) intentional infliction of emotional distress; (8) false arrest; (9) negligent employment; and (10) negligent infliction of emotional distress. Alvarez alleged constitutional torts under the Fourth, Fifth, and Eighth Amendments for the acts of kidnapping, torture, cruel and inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment, denial of adequate medical treatment, and arbitrary detention."

[226] US Code, Title 28, Section 1350. See ibid., p. 608.

[227] See ibid., p. 610.

holding "that both state-sponsored, transborder abductions and arbitrary detentions violated customary international law [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[228]

The reasoning behind this holding was that Alvarez-Machain's kidnapping violated the sovereignty of Mexico, that this was a violation of "the law of nations" and finally that Alvarez-Machain could personally invoke this violation of sovereignty under the ATCA.[229]

The other ATCA claims, for example, those related to the physical abuse, were, however, rejected.

In addition to this, Alvarez-Machain's FTCA claims were dismissed; the Court concluded "that Alvarez's apprehension was privileged and was not a false arrest under California law."[230]

The Court of Appeals, which saw the term 'customary international law' (and not the more restrictive term used by Sosa: ius cogens)[231] as a direct descendent of the term 'law of nations'[232] and which recalled that it had earlier limited "actionable violations to those international norms that are "specific, universal, and obligatory"",[233] first looked at the approved (by the District Court) contention of Alvarez-Machain that his kidnapping violated the sovereignty of Mexico, that it was a violation of "the law of nations" under the ATCA and hence that he was entitled to a remedy.[234] The Court of Appeals disagreed. Although Alvarez-Machain's kidnapping indeed might have been a violation of the well-known international law principle that a State cannot perform acts of sovereignty on the territory of another State without the latter's consent, Alvarez-Machain himself had no standing to invoke this matter.[235] Although this may seem logical, it should be stressed that it is not always the case that an individual does not have ius standi to make such a claim,

---

[228] Ibid. The Court also held "that Alvarez could recover damages under the ATCA only for his detention in Mexico prior to his arrival in the United States." (Ibid., p. 611.)

[229] See ibid., p. 615: "Alvarez claims that his arrest violated Mexico's sovereign rights because Mexico had not granted the United States permission to exercise police power on its soil. Because such an encroachment on Mexico's sovereignty violates "the law of nations" within the meaning of the ATCA, Alvarez reasons, he is entitled to relief under that statute. The district court agreed and rejected Sosa's objection that Alvarez lacks standing to invoke Mexico's sovereignty rights."

[230] Ibid., p. 611.

[231] See ibid., pp. 612-614.

[232] See ibid., p. 613.

[233] Ibid., p. 612, referring to p. 1475 of the case "Hilao v. Estate of Marcos (In re Estate of Marcos, Human Rights Litig.) ("Marcos II"), 25 F.3d 1467 (9th Cir.1994)". (Ibid.)

[234] See US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, Alvarez-Machain v. United States et al. (No. 99-56762) and Alvarez-Machain v. Sosa et al. (No. 99-56880), 3 June 2003 (331 F.3d 604), p. 615.

[235] See ibid., pp. 616-617: "The legal rights on which Alvarez bases his claim, and which the ATCA recognizes, are those that protect the individual from tortious conduct. By its terms, the ATCA provides only for suits by individual aliens; it does not allow for an individual to vindicate the rights of a foreign government. To allow state-on-state injuries like the one Alvarez alleges here to be vindicated by a third party not only would read too much into the ATCA, but would lead to the judiciary's intrusion into matters that are appropriately reserved for the Executive branch. Although international human rights litigation under the ATCA inevitably raises issues implicating foreign relations, sovereigns' prerogatives are ordinarily and traditionally handled through diplomatic channels. The right of a nation to invoke its territorial integrity does not translate into the right of an individual to invoke such interests in the name of the law of nations [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

although the success of this claim, of course, depends on the reaction of the State whose sovereignty was violated.[236] Secondly, the Court of Appeals looked at Alvarez-Machain's alternative theory, > that, notwithstanding any infringements upon Mexico's sovereignty, the act of transborder kidnapping was, in itself, a violation of customary international human rights law. This norm, as defined by Alvarez, creates a personal right under the law of nations.[237]

That argument was also unsuccessful. The Court of Appeals found that there was no clear and universally recognised norm prohibiting transborder abduction under customary international human rights law.[238] Nevertheless, the third point of Alvarez-Machain was accepted: according to the Court of Appeals, there was such a norm with respect to the prohibition of arbitrary arrest and detention[239] and "[t]he unilateral, nonconsensual extraterritorial arrest and detention of Alvarez were arbitrary and in violation of the law of nations under the ATCA."[240]

Thus, the Court of Appeals affirmed Sosa's liability under the ATCA, but on other grounds.[241]

Although the Court of Appeals may have been correct in stating that, in contrast to the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily, there is no explicit human right in customary international law which prohibits a transborder abduction and which

---

[236] See also n. 186 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[237] US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, Alvarez-Machain v. United States et al. (No. 99-56762) and Alvarez-Machain v. Sosa et al. (No. 99-56880), 3 June 2003 (331 F.3d 604), p. 617.

[238] See ibid., pp. 619-620: "[O]ur review of the international authorities and literature reveals no specific binding obligation, express or implied, on the part of the United States or its agents to refrain from transborder kidnapping. Nor can we say that there is a "universal" consensus in the sense that we use that term to describe well-entrenched customs of international law. (…) Because a human rights norm recognizing an individual's right to be free from transborder abductions has not reached a status of international accord sufficient to render it "obligatory" or "universal," it cannot qualify as an actionable norm under the ATCA. This is a case where aspiration has not yet ripened into obligation [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[239] See ibid., p. 620: "Unlike transborder arrests, there exists a clear and universally recognized norm prohibiting arbitrary arrest and detention. This prohibition is codified in every major comprehensive human rights instrument and is reflected in at least 119 national constitutions." This statement, of course, constitutes additional evidence for the assertion made in Chapter III of this book that the prohibition of arbitrary arrest/detention has attained customary international law status. The fact that this norm has also been included in such a great number of constitutions shows that the norm might be seen as a general principle of law as well.

[240] Ibid. See also ibid., p. 631: "Wishful thinking is no substitute for clear congressional authority. Congress surely knows how and when to expand the reach of its laws beyond our borders. There is little doubt that Congress has the authority to do so; there is also little doubt that it has not done so here. Thus, although we recognize that the kidnapping and murder of DEA agents abroad necessitates the exercise of extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction, absent a clear directive, we cannot conclude that Congress has given the DEA unlimited enforcement powers abroad. Finding no basis in law for the DEA's actions, and left only with a warrant issued by a United States court, we conclude that Alvarez's arrest, and hence his detention, were arbitrary because they were not "pursuant to law." Consequently, Alvarez established a tort committed in violation of the law of nations."

[241] See ibid., p. 641.

may be of use in ATCA litigation,[242] one can argue more generally that there is an implicit human right with customary international law status prohibiting transborder kidnapping.[243]

A short explanation for this assertion: there is a general human right to liberty and security/a right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily.[244] That right has arguably customary international law/general international law status (see also Chapter III, where some authorities were presented which even qualified this right as a ius cogens norm). Any violation of that right is hence, at least, a violation of customary international law. There are many ways to violate this right, but one of the possibilities is to kidnap a person from the territory of another State without the latter's consent. (Here, one can see the connection between inter-State law and human rights law:[245] because of a violation of the inter-State norm against non-intervention, an arrest is deemed to be unlawful or arbitrary under human rights law.) As already shown, the HRC has qualified an abduction, even irrespective of the attitude of the 'injured' State, as an arbitrary arrest and detention, violating Article 9, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR.[246] Hence, such kidnappings constitute violations of customary international law. This arguably means that it is not necessary to look if there exists an additional right in customary international law not to be kidnapped for this right is already part of the human right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily.

With respect to Alvarez-Machain's FTCA claims, the Court of Appeals, in contrast to the District Court, ruled that Alvarez-Machain could seek a remedy pursuant to the FTCA because DEA agents had authorised a false arrest against Alvarez-Machain.[247] Although the FTCA has a so-called 'foreign activities'

---

[242] See also ibid., p. 618: "[N]o authority cited by Alvarez recognizes an explicit prohibition against forcible abduction [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[243] Cf. also Loan (2005, p. 255), arguing that individuals have a customary international law right to be free from extraterritorial abduction. See also ibid., p. 282: "While the international denunciation of forcible abductions will often focus on any breach of state sovereignty, there is sufficient state practice and opinio juris to suggest that a customary norm exists whereby the human rights of an individual require states to refrain from extraterritorial abduction. Cumulatively, the decisions by the Human Rights Committee and the European Court of Human Rights, the recognition of international human rights instruments, and the practice of states provide enough evidence of consistent state practice and opinio juris to establish a customary norm protecting individuals from extraterritorial abduction." Cf. also n. 188 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[244] See also US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, Alvarez-Machain v. United States et al. (No. 99-56762) and Alvarez-Machain v. Sosa et al. (No. 99-56880), 3 June 2003 (331 F.3d 604), p. 618, where the right to freedom of movement is mentioned as well.

[245] Cf. also Loan (2005, p. 269): "[T]he international law prohibition on violating state sovereignty through the use [of] extraterritorial abduction is relevant to the issue of whether individuals possess an international right to be free from abductions."

[246] See also Michell 1996, p. 442: "The Committee reinforced the customary international law rule prohibiting forcible abduction and transplanted the rule into the human rights context, protecting individuals qua individuals." See also n. 261 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[247] See US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, Alvarez-Machain v. United States et al. (No. 99-56762) and Alvarez-Machain v. Sosa et al. (No. 99-56880), 3 June 2003 (331 F.3d 604), pp. 640-641: "Our earlier discussion of liability under the ATCA applies with equal force to our analysis of the FTCA claims against the United States. (…) [A]s we have discussed, the DEA agents here had no authority, statutory exception, which "bars recovery for "[a]ny claim arising in a foreign country"",[248] the Court of Appeals held that "a claim can still proceed under the headquarters doctrine if harm occurring in a foreign country was proximately caused by acts in the United States."[249] According to the Court of Appeals, that was the case here.[250]

Then, it was again up to the Supreme Court.[251]

Twelve years after its decision in the criminal case, it reversed the decision of the Court of Appeals[252] on both the ATCA (the Supreme Court used another abbreviation here: ATS (Alien Tort Statute)) and FTCA points.[253]

The FTCA point was dismissed because the Supreme Court overruled the headquarters doctrine,[254] holding that the "FTCA's foreign country exception bars all claims based on any injury suffered in a foreign country, regardless of where the tortious act or omission occurred."[255]

With respect to the ATS point, the Justices of the Supreme Court first delved into the past.

---

or otherwise, to effect an extraterritorial arrest. Nor did their minions across the border, who could no more claim a lawful privilege to arrest Alvarez than could the DEA agents themselves under the same circumstances. The district court that issued Alvarez's arrest warrant had no jurisdiction to issue a warrant for an arrest in Mexico. (…) Accordingly, the DEA agents authorized a false arrest against Alvarez."

[248] Ibid., p. 638.

[249] Ibid.

[250] See ibid., pp. 638-639: "Alvarez's abduction fits the headquarters doctrine like a glove. Working out of DEA offices in Los Angeles, Berellez and his superiors made the decision to kidnap Alvarez and, through Garate, gave Barragan precise instructions on whom to recruit, how to seize Alvarez, and how he should be treated during the trip to the United States. DEA officials in Washington, D.C., approved the details of the operation. After Alvarez was abducted according to plan, DEA agents supervised his transportation into the United States, telling the arrest team where to land the plane and obtaining clearance in El Paso for landing. The United States, and California in particular, served as command central for the operation carried out in Mexico." With respect to another FTCA exception, the 'intentional tort' exception, the Court found: "Although the waiver of sovereign immunity under the FTCA excludes intentional torts such as false arrest, this exclusion (…) does not apply if the intentional tort is committed by an "investigative or law enforcement officer." (Ibid., p. 639.) That was also the case here, see ibid., p. 640: "The DEA agents who orchestrated Alvarez's arrest are law enforcement officers as defined by the FTCA because they are "empowered by law to execute searches, to seize evidence, or to make arrests for violations of Federal law." (…) Because the primary tortious act was the initiation and planning of Alvarez's abduction by the DEA agents, his claim falls squarely within this law enforcement proviso, and thus the intentional tort exclusion does not apply."

[251] See US Supreme Court, Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-339) and United States v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-485), 29 June 2004 (542 US 692).

[252] According to Loan (2005, p. 254), "the decision was substantially influenced by the current war on terrorism." See also ibid., pp. 290*ff*.

[253] Arguably, the duration of these proceedings also shows that the civil remedy (which is often referred to by those who are in favour of the male captus bene detentus rule) may not always be very easy to pursue. See also n. 3 of this chapter (and the reference to the Parisot case).

[254] See US Supreme Court, Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-339) and United States v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-485), 29 June 2004 (542 US 692), p. 710, where the Court stated that the "headquarters analysis should have no part in applying the foreign country exception".

[255] Ibid., p. 712.

After having referred to the three 'Blackstone crimes', the sort of violations that were probably on minds of those who drafted the ATS in the 18th century,[256] the Supreme Court stated:

> [W]e think courts should require any claim based on the present-day law of nations to rest on a norm of international character accepted by the civilized world and defined with a specificity comparable to the features of the 18th-century paradigms we have recognized.[257]

Recalling the previously mentioned formula that "[a]ctionable violations of international law must be of a norm that is specific, universal, and obligatory",[258] and focusing on customary international law,[259] the Supreme Court refused to look at the norm against transborder abduction altogether[260] and rejected Alvarez-

[256] See ibid., p. 715: "There was, finally, a sphere in which (…) rules binding individuals for the benefit of other individuals overlapped with the norms of state relationships. Blackstone referred to it when he mentioned three specific offenses against the law of nations addressed by the criminal law of England: violation of safe conducts, infringement of the rights of ambassadors, and piracy. (…) It was this narrow set of violations of the law of nations, admitting of a judicial remedy and at the same time threatening serious consequences in international affairs, that was probably on minds of the men who drafted the ATS with its reference to tort."

[257] Ibid., p. 725.

[258] Ibid., p. 732. See also n. 233 and accompanying text. It is worth mentioning that the Supreme Court thus seems to agree, with the Court of Appeals, that the ATS, in contrast to what is often argued (see, for example, the arguments of Sosa (and the rejection of these arguments by the Court of Appeals) at the end of this footnote), is hence not restricted to ius cogens norms. See Steinhardt 2004, pp. 2265-2267: "The Supreme Court's analysis in Alvarez-Machain II forecloses (…) the argument that the category of actionable claims under the ATS is limited to violations of jus cogens, or peremptory norms of international law from which no derogation is permitted. (…) The very language of the ATS, with its reference to "the law of nations or a treaty of the United States" shows that Congress adopted a high, but not the highest and most controversial, jurisdictional threshold. No court that has been offered the jus cogens gloss on the statute has adopted it, other than to observe that a jus cogens violation may be sufficient to satisfy the "specific, universal, and obligatory" standard, but is not a necessary precondition for the actionability of the norm. To the contrary, the "specific, universal, and obligatory" standard enables courts to distinguish genuinely customary norms from merely idiosyncratic or aspirational norms, and the first courts to articulate that test did so precisely to guide these sometimes difficult judgments [original footnotes omitted, ChP." For Sosa's arguments (and the rejection of these arguments by the Court of Appeals), see US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, Alvarez-Machain v. United States et al. (No. 99-56762) and Alvarez-Machain v. Sosa et al. (No. 99-56880), 3 June 2003 (331 F.3d 604), pp. 612-613: "Sosa urges a narrow reading of the "law of nations" and a correspondingly strict interpretation of the "specific, universal, and obligatory" requirement. He argues that only violations of jus cogens norms, as distinguished from violations of customary international law, are sufficiently "universal" and "obligatory" to be actionable as violations of "the law of nations" under the ATCA. We decline to embrace this restrictive reading, as we are guided by the language of the statute, not an imported restriction."

[259] Alvarez-Machain also relied on international instruments (such as the UDHR and the ICCPR) but that part of Alvarez-Machain's argument was quickly disposed of, see US Supreme Court, Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-339) and United States v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-485), 29 June 2004 (542 US 692), pp. 734-735.

[260] See ibid., p. 734: "Here, it is useful to examine Alvarez's complaint in greater detail. As he presently argues it, the claim does not rest on the cross-border feature of his abduction [original footnote omitted, ChP]." The omitted footnote (24) reads: "Alvarez's brief contains one footnote seeking to incorporate

Machain's claim with respect to the prohibition of arbitrary arrest and (non-prolonged) arbitrary detention.[261] Warning that the practical implications of an acceptance of such a prohibition would be far-reaching[262] and relying on the words of the Third Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States,[263] the Court held:

> Any credible invocation of a principle against arbitrary detention that the civilized world accepts as binding customary international law requires a factual basis beyond relatively brief detention in excess of positive authority. Even the Restatement's limits are only the beginning of the enquiry, because although it is easy to say that some policies of prolonged arbitrary detentions are so bad that those who enforce them become enemies of the human race, it may be harder to say which policies cross that line with the certainty afforded by Blackstone's three common law offenses. In any event, the label would never fit the reckless policeman who botches his warrant, even though that same officer might pay damages under municipal law. (…) Whatever may be said for the broad principle Alvarez advances, in the present, imperfect world, it expresses an aspiration that exceeds any binding customary rule having the specificity we require. Creating a private cause of action to further that aspiration would go beyond any residual common law discretion we think it by reference his arguments on cross-border abductions before the Court of Appeals. (…) That is not enough to raise the question fairly, and we do not consider it."

---

[261] See ibid., p. 736: "Alvarez thus invokes a general prohibition of "arbitrary" detention defined as officially sanctioned action exceeding positive authorization to detain under the domestic law of some government, regardless of the circumstances. (…) Alvarez cites little authority that a rule so broad has the status of a binding customary norm today [original footnote omitted, ChP]." For criticism on this presentation of Alvarez's claim, see Steinhardt 2004, p. 2253: "Nor was the Court convinced that the prohibition of arbitrary arrest as applied to Alvarez-Machain had attained the status of customary international law. To arrive at this conclusion it had to deploy a strategic recharacterization of Alvarez-Machain's claim, viewing it as the assertion that the arrest was arbitrary solely because no applicable law authorized it and not because it infringed the sovereignty of Mexico".

[262] See US Supreme Court, Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-339) and United States v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-485), 29 June 2004 (542 US 692), pp. 736-737: "Alvarez thus invokes a general prohibition of "arbitrary" detention defined as officially sanctioned action exceeding positive authorization to detain under the domestic law of some government, regardless of the circumstances. (…) He certainly cites nothing to justify the federal courts in taking his broad rule as the predicate for a federal lawsuit, for its implications would be breathtaking. His rule would support a cause of action in federal court for any arrest, anywhere in the world, unauthorized by the law of the jurisdiction in which it took place, and would create a cause of action for any seizure of an alien in violation of the Fourth Amendment (…). It would create an action in federal court for arrests by state officers who simply exceed their authority; and for the violation of any limit that the law of any country might place on the authority of its own officers to arrest." See also ibid., pp. 732-733: "[T]he determination whether a norm is sufficiently definite to support a cause of action should (and, indeed, inevitably must) involve an element of judgment about the practical consequences of making that cause available to litigants in the federal courts [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[263] See ibid., p. 737: "Alvarez's failure to marshal support for his proposed rule is underscored by the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law of the United States (198[7]), which says in its discussion of customary international human rights law that a "state violates international law if, as a matter of state policy, it practices, encourages, or condones ... prolonged arbitrary detention." (…) Although the Restatement does not explain its requirements of a "state policy" and of "prolonged" detention, the implication is clear." See on this point also n. 432 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

> appropriate to exercise. It is enough to hold that a single illegal detention of less than a day, followed by the transfer of custody to lawful authorities and a prompt arraignment, violates no norm of customary international law so well defined as to support the creation of a federal remedy [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[264]

It is not entirely clear what the Supreme Court means here. On the one hand, it asserts that a relatively brief illegal detention cannot be seen as a violation of the principle against arbitrary detention that the civilised world accepts as binding customary international law. However, on the other hand, it makes the remark that such a detention cannot be seen as a violation of customary international law so well defined that it can be used in the context of the ATS. It may indeed be true that a brief illegal detention does not reach the threshold of the ATS (although the latter speaks of "the law of nations", the exact scope of the act appears to be primarily a matter of domestic law) but to the extent that the Supreme Court claims that a brief illegal arrest or detention does not violate customary international law, the Court (and the same goes for the Restatement)[265] is arguably incorrect. After all, the right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily – a right with customary international law status – does not require a temporal element.[266] Hence, any – and not only a prolonged – violation of this right (whether this is caused by a simple illegal/arbitrary arrest within a State or through a crossborder abduction violating the international law principle that a State cannot violate another State's sovereignty without the latter's consent) constitutes a violation of customary international (human rights) law.

---

[264] Ibid., pp. 737-738.

[265] See American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third, Foreign Relations Law of the United States, 1987, para. 702 ('Customary International Law of Human Rights'), comment under 'b' ('State policy as violation of customary law'): "The violations of human rights cited in this section (...) [which includes prolonged arbitrary detention, ChP] are violations of customary international law only if practiced, encouraged, or condoned by the government of a state as official policy." See also ibid., comment under 'h' ('Prolonged arbitrary detention'): "A single, brief, arbitrary detention by an official of a state party to one of the principal international agreements might violate that agreement; arbitrary detention violates customary law if it is prolonged and practiced as state policy."

[266] See also US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, Alvarez-Machain v. United States et al. (No. 99-56762) and Alvarez-Machain v. Sosa et al. (No. 99-56880), 3 June 2003 (331 F.3d 604), p. 621: "Sosa acknowledges the prohibition against arbitrary arrest and detention, but he contends that for ATCA liability to attach, Alvarez's detention must be "prolonged" in addition to being arbitrary. We can divine no such requirement in our precedent or in the applicable international authorities. Rather, as the language of the international instruments demonstrates, the norm is universally cited as one against "arbitrary" detention and does not include a temporal element. Other authorities reflect this understanding." See also ibid., p. 622: "We simply hold, consistent with international law, that there is no freestanding temporal requirement nor any magical time period that triggers the norm." See finally also Paust 1993, p. 563: ""Prolonged arbitrary detention" is the curious phrase found in the Restatement, but, as recognized in federal court opinions, both customary and treaty-based human rights law prohibit "arbitrary detention" as such [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Note, however, that the prolonged period can be of influence but then in another context: a legal detention can become arbitrary if it is unduly prolonged, see De Zayas 2005, pp. 16-17: "In its jurisprudence the United Nations Human Rights Committee, the body responsible for monitoring compliance by States party to the ICCPR, has made it clear that detention which may be initially legal may become "arbitrary" if it is unduly prolonged or not subject to periodic review [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

To give a few examples: as already shown earlier, the HRC has held that the act of abduction as such (which may take less than a day) constitutes an arbitrary arrest and detention and a violation of Article 9, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR, arguably (a provision with) customary international law (status).[267]

The UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention has also examined Alvarez-Machain's deprivation of freedom from a human rights perspective, see also footnote 217.

Although it looked at the total amount of time involved in the case (987 days), starting with Alvarez-Machain's abduction on 8 April 1990[268] and ending with his release on 14 December 1992,[269] it stated that > no legal basis whatsoever can be found to justify the deprivation of freedom from the date of the abduction – 2 April 1990 – until his release on 14 December 1992 since this deprivation of freedom took place without the orders of any authority whatsoever and, indeed, both the District Court and the Court of Appeals declared it unlawful. In the circumstances, the deprivation of freedom is a breach of article 9 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and article 9 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and principle 2 of the Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment. Accordingly, the detention is arbitrary (...) [emphasis added, ChP].[270]

Hence, even though the Working Group is of the opinion that Alvarez-Machain's entire deprivation of freedom was arbitrary, it also notes that it was already arbitrary on day one ("from the date of the abduction – 2 April 1990").[271]

---

[267] See, for example, the cases of Lopez Burgos and Celiberti de Casariego. Although in these cases, the victims were detained for longer periods before and after the cross-border abduction, the HRC qualified "the act of abduction into Uruguayan territory" (thus arguably irrespective of its duration) as an arbitrary arrest and detention and hence as a violation of Art. 9, para. 1 of the ICCPR (see para. 13 of the Lopez Burgos communication and para. 11 of the Celiberti de Casariego communication).

[268] The reference to 8 April 1990 as the starting point of this period is a little odd. Although this reference may be explained by the fact that the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention refers to Alvarez-Machain's complaint that his abduction took place on 7 April (however, in that case, one can wonder why the period did not start on that day and only on the day after), the UN Working Group on Arbitrary Detention itself uses another date, see Commission on Human Rights, Fiftieth session, Item 10 of the provisional agenda, Question of the Human Rights of All Persons Subjected to Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment, Report of the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, UN Doc. E/CN.4/1994/27, 17 December 1993, Decision No. 48/1993 (United States of America), p. 135, where the Working Group writes that Alvarez-Machain was abducted "on 2 April 1990 (the complaint says 7 April), at his medical office in Guadalajara, Mexico, and forcibly taken to the United States". (See also ibid., p. 139.)

[269] See ibid., p. 136. See also ibid., p. 139.

[270] Ibid.

[271] The Supreme Court was, however, not impressed: "Alvarez also cites (…) a finding by a United Nations working group that his detention was arbitrary under the Declaration, the Covenant, and customary international law. See Report of the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, UN Doc. E/CN.4/1994/27, pp. 139-140 (Dec. 17, 1993). That finding is not addressed, however, to our demanding standard of definition, which must be met to raise even the possibility of a private cause of action. If Alvarez wishes to seek compensation on the basis of the working group's finding, he must

In the past, the ATS has been accepted to cover such serious violations as torture, genocide and war crimes.[272]

It is clear that a simple illegal detention (for example, caused by a "reckless policeman who botches his warrant", to use the words of the Supreme Court) is not as serious as those violations.

Nevertheless, if the Supreme Court wants the ATS to be restricted to these kinds of violations, it should clearly say so. Conversely, if it argues more broadly that "[a]ctionable violations of international law must be of a norm that is specific, universal, and obligatory", then it should not be surprised that norms with customary international law status (such as the right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily) may enter the ATS nevertheless.[273]

Returning to the criminal law context and crossing the Atlantic: after some lack of clarity with respect to the modern position of the law of England towards male captus bene detentus,[274] the law was (somewhat) illuminated by the House of Lords in Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another.[275] address his request to Congress." (US Supreme Court, Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-339) and United States v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-485), 29 June 2004 (542 US 692), p. 738, n. 30.)

---

[272] See, for example, US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, Alvarez-Machain v. United States et al. (No. 99-56762) and Alvarez-Machain v. Sosa et al. (No. 99-56880), 3 June 2003 (331 F.3d 604), p. 611: "Although enacted in 1789 as part of the first Judiciary Act, the ATCA received little attention until 1980 when the Second Circuit, in a comprehensive analysis of the statute, held that the ATCA provided subject matter jurisdiction over an action brought by Paraguayan citizens for torture – a violation of the law of nations – committed in Paraguay. See Filartiga v. Pena-Irala (Filartiga I), 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir.1980). Since the Filartiga I decision, the ATCA has been invoked in a variety of actions alleging human rights violations. See, e.g., Abebe-Jira v. Negewo, 72 F.3d 844 (11th Cir.1996) (affirming judgment under ATCA against former Ethiopian official for torture and cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment); Kadic v. Karadzic, 70 F.3d 232 (2d Cir.1995) (concluding that alleged war crimes, genocide, torture, and other atrocities committed by a Bosnian Serb leader were actionable under the ATCA) [original footnote omitted, ChP]".

[273] See also Roth 2004, p. 803: "The Sosa decision seems to have been calculated to bring a sharp halt to the expansion of the scope of ATS-enabled claims. It nonetheless appears to confirm the main current of ATS jurisprudence that has been allowed to develop without Supreme Court review in the lower courts over the course of twenty-four years. The precise consequences of Sosa for future Filártiga litigation are unclear. The Court emphasized that any norm actionable under the ATS must have levels of specificity and acceptance comparable to norms that were understood to be actionable in the eighteenth century. The decision might thus be read as repudiating human-rights-era innovations in international law methodology that have given more weight to the rhetorical practice of international organisations. Nonetheless, the Court cast no aspersions on the overall pattern of Filártiga-inspired human rights decisions that have issued from the lower federal courts. Indeed, Justice Scalia complained that the Court's endorsement of "the very formula that led the Ninth Circuit to its result" – the requirement that actionable norms be "specific, universal, and obligatory" – "hardly seems to be a recipe for restraint in the future" [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[274] In the 1981 case Mackeson (Court of Appeal, Divisional Court, R v. Bow Street Magistrates ex parte Mackeson, 25 June 1981 (1982) 75 Cr. App. R. 24, see generally Choo 1994 B, p. 627), the Court applied Elliott (that the Court had in principle jurisdiction) and Hartley (that the Court had a discretion not to exercise this jurisdiction) and granted the application of the suspect (a UK citizen sought for fraud charges) to stop the hearing of the committal proceedings against him because his return from Zimbabwe-Rhodesia to the UK had to be seen as an "extradition by the back door" (Court of Appeal, Divisional Court, R v. Bow Street Magistrates ex parte Mackeson, 25 June 1981 (1982) 75 Cr. App. R. 24, p. 30). (It is interesting to note that the Court held that the police had acted "due to an excess of

Paul James Bennett, a New Zealand citizen, was accused of having purchased a helicopter by a series of false pretences in England in 1989 and of having defaulted on the repayments.[276]

The English police traced Bennett and his helicopter to South Africa but as there were no formal extradition provisions in force between the two countries, no proceedings for his extradition were initiated, even though special extradition arrangements could have been made under Section 15 of the Extradition Act 1989:[277] "It is the appellant's case that, having taken the decision not to employ the extradition process, the English police colluded with the South African police to have the appellant arrested in South Africa and forcibly returned to this country against his will."[278]

Lord Griffiths first noted that this account was indeed to be assumed in this case.[279] He then recapitulated the lack of clarity in present-day English law[280] and noted the position of the English authorities concerning the role of the judge in the criminal process, namely that he should only focus on the forensic process, and concerning the concept of abuse of process, namely that a judge must only ensure enthusiasm, certainly not due to any conscious intent to do wrong". (Ibid., p. 33.) This shows that even the non-intentional circumvention of regular extradition procedures may lead to the ending of the case.) This case was followed by the Divisional Court in the case R v Guilford Magistrates' Court, ex p Healy [1983] 1 WLR 108. In this case, the Court accepted the idea in Mackeson that a court has a discretion not to exercise its jurisdiction. Nevertheless, the fact of the case did not warrant this outcome as "there had been no attempt in Healy to circumvent the provisions of the relevant extradition treaty." (Choo 1994 B, p. 627.) Thus, the aspect 'intention' (to circumvent the procedures) became important again: "Following Healy, therefore, where extradition had been deliberately avoided at the instigation of British authorities, the courts could exercise their discretion, but not otherwise." (Gilbert 1998, p. 356.) The authority of Mackeson and Healy was, however, broken down by the decision of the Queen's Bench Division in R. v Plymouth Magistrates' Court and others, ex parte Driver (see generally Choo 1994 B, p. 628). In this case, the Queen's Bench Division followed Scott, Sinclair and Elliott and concluded "that the court has no power to inquire into the circumstances in which a person is found in the jurisdiction for the purpose of refusing to try him." (Queen's Bench Division, R. v Plymouth Magistrates' Court and others, ex parte Driver, 3 April 1985 [1985] 2 All England Law Reports 697.) The Court was of the opinion that Mackeson and Healy had been decided per incuriam (a decision which a subsequent court finds to be a mistake, and therefore not of binding precedent). See for more information on these cases, for example, Michell 1996, p. 462-464 and Gilbert 1998, pp. 354-356.

---

[275] See House of Lords, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 138*ff*.

[276] See House of Lords, Lord Griffiths, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 141.

[277] See ibid.

[278] Ibid.

[279] See ibid., p. 142: "It is not for your Lordships to pass judgment on where truth lies at this stage of the proceedings, but for the purpose of testing the submission of the respondents that a court has no jurisdiction to inquire into such matters it must be assumed that the English police took a deliberate decision not to pursue extradition procedures but to persuade the South African police to arrest and forcibly return the appellant to this country, under the pretext of deporting him to New Zealand via Heathrow so that he could be arrested at Heathrow and tried for the offences of dishonesty he is alleged to have committed in 1989. I shall also assume that the Crown Prosecution Service were consulted and approved of the behaviour of the police."

[280] See n. 274.

that the process of the court is not abused such that the trial itself is unfair.[281] After that, he presented the position of Bennett, with which he agreed:

> Your Lordships are now invited to extend the concept of abuse of process a stage further. In the present case there is no suggestion that the appellant cannot have a fair trial, nor could it be suggested that it would have been unfair to try him if he had been returned to this country through extradition procedures. If the court is to have the power to interfere with the prosecution in the present circumstances it must be because the judiciary accept a responsibility for the maintenance of the rule of law that embraces a willingness to oversee executive action and to refuse to countenance behaviour that threatens either basic human rights or the rule of law. My Lords, I have no doubt that the judiciary should accept this responsibility in the field of criminal law. (...) [I]f it comes to the attention of the court that there has been a serious abuse of power it should, in my view, express its disapproval by refusing to act upon it.[282]

[281] See House of Lords, Lord Griffiths, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 148: "Your Lordships have been urged by the respondents to uphold the decision of the Divisional Court and the nub of its submission is that the role of the judge is confined to the forensic process. The judge, it is said, is concerned to see that the accused has a fair trial and that the process of the court is not manipulated to his disadvantage so that the trial itself is unfair; but the wider issues of the rule of law and the behaviour of those charged with its enforcement, be they police or prosecuting authority, are not the concern of the judiciary unless they impinge directly on the trial process."

[282] Ibid., p. 150. Note that Lord Griffiths' position is different with respect to magistrates (who deal with small cases and who may not even have had a legal training): "I would (…) affirm the power of the magistrates, whether sitting as committing justices or exercising their summary jurisdiction, to exercise control over their proceedings through an abuse of process jurisdiction. However, in the case of magistrates this power should be strictly confined to matters directly affecting the fairness of the particular accused with whom they are dealing, such as delay or unfair manipulation of court procedures. (…) [I]f a serious question arises as to the deliberate abuse of extradition procedures a magistrate should allow an adjournment so that an application can be made to the Divisional Court, which I regard as the proper forum in which such a decision should be taken." (Ibid., p. 152.) Cf. also House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 169: "It would (…) be convenient (as well as correct, in my view) if the examining magistrates could not stay for abuse of process [emphasis in original, ChP]". See for criticism on this view, Choo 1994 B, pp. 634-635: "It is submitted that, contrary to the view of Lord Griffiths, magistrates (whether sitting in committal proceedings or summary proceedings) should have the power to stay proceedings even if no 'fair trial' issue is involved. The distinction which Lord Griffiths attempts to draw between situations in which stays are ordered because a fair trial is impossible, and other cases, is not as clear-cut as might first appear. Lord Griffiths appears to have assumed, for example, that the sole reason for staying proceedings on account of delay is to ensure that the accused is afforded a fair trial. Yet, as I have argued elsewhere, proceedings brought after a delay may be stayed to ensure a fair trial and/or to protect the moral integrity of the criminal process. Thus, even if there is no danger of wrongful conviction, the delay may, by causing the accused to suffer oppression, anxiety and concern, have compromised the moral integrity of the criminal process to such an extent that a stay of the proceedings is justified. (…) To put an accused through the delay of applying to the Divisional Court for a stay, rather than allowing the accused the simple expedient of seeking a stay from the magistrates, ignores the fact that 'a plea of abuse should be open to the accused subject at the earlier opportunity' [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

After having detailed on the specific context of extradition,[283] he concluded as follows:

> The courts, of course, have no power to apply direct discipline to the police or the prosecuting authorities, but they can refuse to allow them to take advantage of abuse of power by regarding their behaviour as an abuse of process and thus preventing a prosecution. In my view your Lordships should now declare that where process of law is available to return an accused to this country through extradition procedures our courts will refuse to try him if he has been forcibly brought within our jurisdiction in disregard of those procedures by a process to which our own police, prosecuting or other executive authorities have been a knowing party.[284]

Although the threshold presented here by Lord Griffiths seems quite clear[285] (if the Executive had been a knowing party to a process which disregards the proper extradition proceedings, the courts would refuse jurisdiction), the automatism captured in the words "will refuse" is replaced by a discretion a couple of sentence later[286] (showing that judges should arguably try harder to write in such a way that the message they want to get across also gets across).

Lord Bridge of Harwich agreed with Lord Griffiths. However, it can be argued that his test is a little stricter, as, in his view, the domestic authorities really have to do something irregular (and not only be a knowing party to the irregular conduct by, for example, foreign authorities).[287]

After having stressed the importance of the Judiciary protecting the law,[288] he wrote the following (and now oft-quoted) words:

---

[283] See House of Lords, Lord Griffiths, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 150-151: "Let us consider the position in the context of extradition. Extradition procedures are designed not only to ensure that criminals are returned from one country to another but also to protect the rights of those who are accused of crimes by the requesting country. (...) If a practice developed in which the police or prosecuting authorities of this country ignored extradition procedures and secured the return of an accused by a mere request to police colleagues in another country they would be flouting the extradition procedures and depriving the accused of the safeguards built into the extradition process for his benefit. It is to my mind unthinkable that in such circumstances the court should declare itself to be powerless and stand idly by".

[284] Ibid., p. 151.

[285] It is, however, not clear from these words whether the non-use of the extradition procedures has to be intentional or not. It seems however that it has. See, for example, the words "serious abuse of power" (see the final sentence of n. 282 and accompanying text) and the words "deliberate abuse of extradition procedures" (see n. 282).

[286] See House of Lords, Lord Griffiths, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 152: "The High Court in the exercise of its supervisory jurisdiction has power to inquire into the circumstances by which a person has been brought within the jurisdiction and if satisfied that it was in disregard of extradition procedures it may stay the prosecution and order the release of the accused [emphasis added, ChP]."

[287] See also Arnell 2004, p. 257: "The position in England and Wales (...) appears to be that the courts will inquire into renditions where UK authorities have participated in wrongdoing and, perhaps, where they had knowledge of it."

[288] See House of Lords, Lord Bridge of Harwich, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 155: "In the Connelly case [Connelly v DPP [1964] 2 ALL ER [All England Law Reports, ChP] 401 at 442, [1964] AC 1254 at 1353] Lord Devlin

> There is, I think, no principle more basic to any proper system of law than the maintenance of the rule of law itself. When it is shown that the law enforcement agency responsible for bringing a prosecution has only been enabled to do so by participating in violations of international law[289] and of the laws of another state in order to secure the presence of the accused within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, I think that respect for the rule of law demands that the court take cognisance of that circumstance. To hold that the court may turn a blind eye to executive lawlessness beyond the frontiers of its own jurisdiction is, to my mind, an insular and unacceptable view. Having then taken cognisance of the lawlessness it would again appear to me to be a wholly inadequate response for the court to hold that the only remedy lies in civil proceedings at the suit of the defendant or in disciplinary or criminal proceedings against the individual officers of the law enforcement agency who were concerned in the illegal action taken. Since the prosecution could never have been brought if the defendant had not been illegally abducted, the whole proceeding is tainted. (…) It is apt, in my view, to describe these circumstances (…) as an 'abuse of the criminal jurisdiction in general' or indeed (…) as a 'degradation' of the court's criminal process. To hold that in these circumstances the court may decline to exercise its jurisdiction on the ground that its process has been abused may be an extension of the doctrine of abuse of process but is, in my view, a wholly proper and necessary one.[290]

The third Lord, Lord Oliver of Aylmerton, disagreed with the first two.

He was of the opinion that a person whose rights were violated by executive action has a civil remedy, and that this remedy, even though it may not be an ideal one, an easy available one or an adequate one, is the one provided by the law.[291] The way of repairing these wrongs proposed by Bennett, namely by refusing jurisdiction, would in his eyes lead to undesirable results.[292]

(…) said that "the courts cannot contemplate for a moment the transference to the Executive of the responsibility for seeing that the process of law is not abused" … Those remarks involve an important statement of constitutional principle. They assert the independent strength of the judiciary to protect the law by protecting its own purposes and function. It is essential to keep in mind that it is "the process of law", to use Lord Devlin's phrase, that is the issue. It is not something limited to the conventional practices or procedures of the Court system. It is the function and purpose of the Courts as a separate part of the constitutional machinery that must be protected from abuse rather than the particular processes that are used within the machine. It may be that the shorthand phrase "abuse of process" by itself does not give sufficient emphasis to the principle that in this context the Court must react not so much against an abuse of the procedure that has been built up to enable the determination of a criminal charge as against the much wider and more serious abuse of the criminal jurisdiction in general." (See for the Connelly case also n. 127 and accompanying text.)

[289] Michell notes that Lord Bridge of Harwich's point concerning the violation of international law "suggests an international human rights dimension to the case [original footnote omitted, ChP]" (Michell 1996. p. 472) because the case itself "involved no violations of either customary international law or of a treaty". (Ibid.)

[290] House of Lords, Lord Bridge of Harwich, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 155-156. See also n. 437 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[291] See ibid., p. 156.

[292] See ibid.: "The results of the assumption of such a jurisdiction are threefold; and they are surprising. First, the trial put in train by a charge which has been properly laid will not take place and the person

He thereby specifically focused on the public interest in the prosecution and punishment of crime, a point which is reminiscent of Judge Schermers' dissenting opinion in the Bozano case, see Subsection 2.2.4 of Chapter III.[293]

The exact position of this Lord, like Lord Griffiths, is not clear, however.

On the one hand, he seems to indicate that, notwithstanding the above-mentioned arguments, there may be a cogent reason that justifies a refusal of jurisdiction (but that only in this case, such a reason was not present).[294] On the other hand, however, he makes a general remark which undermines that thought:

> I do not consider that, either as a matter of established law or as a matter of principle, a criminal court should be concerned to entertain questions as to the propriety of anterior executive acts of the law enforcement agencies which have no bearing upon the fairness or propriety of the trial process or the ability of the accused to defend himself against charges properly brought against him.[295]

As this idea is expressed in other words elsewhere in his opinion,[296] one can assume (although it is, due to the 'cogent reason' statement mentioned above, not entirely charged (if guilty) will escape a just punishment; secondly, the civil remedies available to that person will remain enforceable; and thirdly, the public interest in the prosecution and punishment of crime will have been defeated not by a necessary process of penalising those responsible for executive abuse but simply for the purpose of manifesting judicial disapproval. It is, of course, axiomatic that a person charged with having committed a criminal offence should receive a fair trial and that, if he cannot be tried fairly for that offence, he should not be tried for it at all. But it is also axiomatic that there is a strong public interest in the prosecution and punishment of crime."

---

[293] See also Michell 1996, p. 444.

[294] See House of Lords, Lord Oliver of Aylmerton, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 156: "Absent any suggestion of unfairness or oppression in the trial process, an application to the court charged with the trial of a criminal offence (…), whether that application be made at the trial or at earlier committal proceedings, to order the discontinuance of the prosecution and the discharge of the accused on the ground of some anterior executive activity in which the court is in no way implicated requires to be justified by some very cogent reason. Making, as I do, every assumption in favour of the appellant as regards the veracity of the evidence which he has adduced and the implications sought to be drawn from it, I discern no such cogent reason in the instant case."

[295] Ibid.

[296] See ibid., pp. 157-160: "It is not, of course, in dispute that the court has power to prevent the abuse of its own process and that must, I would accept, include power to investigate the bona fides of the charge which it is called upon to try and to decline to entertain a charge instituted in bad faith or oppressively (…). (…) Where, however, there is no suggestion that the charge is other than bona fide or that there is any unfairness in the trial process, the duty of the criminal court is simply to try the case and I can see no ground upon which it can claim a discretion, or upon which it ought properly to be invited, to discontinue the proceedings and discharge an accused who is properly charged simply because of some alleged anterior excess or unlawful act on the part of the executive officers concerned with his apprehension and detention. That is not for a moment to suggest that such abuses, if they occur, are unimportant or are to be lightly accepted; but they are acts for which, if they are unlawful, the accused has the same remedies as those available to any other citizen whose legal rights have been infringed. If they are not only unlawful but are criminal as well, they are themselves remediable by criminal prosecution. That a judge may disapprove of or even be rightly outraged by the manner in which an accused has been apprehended or by his treatment whilst in custody cannot, however, provide a ground for declining to perform the public duty of insuring that, once properly charged, he is tried fairly clear) that this is in fact his opinion on these matters, namely that a judge should not look at alleged pre-trial irregularities which have nothing to do with the fairness of the trial itself.

The next Lord, Lord Lowry, began his opinion with the words:

> I accept the conclusion of my noble and learned friends, Lord Griffiths and Lord Bridge of Harwich, that the court has a discretion to stay as an abuse of process criminal proceedings brought against an accused person who has been brought before the court by abduction in a foreign country participated in or encouraged by British authorities.[297]

Although one can wonder whether that was indeed the conclusion reached by Lord Griffiths,[298] it is immediately clear what Lord Lowry's position is.

---

according to law. (…) Experience shows that allegations of abusive use of executive power in the apprehension of those accused of criminal offences are far from rare. (…) So far as there is substance in such allegations, such abuses are disgraceful and regrettable and they may, no doubt, be said to reflect very ill on the administration of justice in the broadest sense of that term. But they provide no justification nor, so far as I am aware, is there any authority for the proposition that wrongful treatment of an accused, having no bearing upon the fairness of the trial process, entitles him to demand that he be not tried for an offence with which he has been properly charged. Indeed, any such general jurisdiction of a criminal court to investigate and adjudicate upon antecedent executive acts would be productive of hopeless uncertainty. It clearly cannot be the case that every excessive use of executive power entitles the accused to be exonerated. But then at what point and at what degree of outrage is the criminal court to undertake an inquiry and, if satisfied, to take upon itself the responsibility of refusing further to try the case? (…) [T]he arrest and detention of the accused are not part of the trial process upon which the criminal court has the duty to embark. Of course, executive officers are subject to the jurisdiction of the courts. If they act unlawfully, they may and should be civilly liable. If they act criminally, they may and should be prosecuted. But I can see no reason why the antecedent activities, whatever the degree of outrage or affront they may occasion, should be thought to justify the assumption by a criminal court of a jurisdiction to terminate a properly instituted criminal process which it is its duty to try."

[297] House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 160. It is because of these words that Arnell (see n. 287) argues that Bennett probably supports the idea that the authorities in the UK must actually have done something improper themselves: "The term "knowing party" [see the quotation of Lord Griffiths at n. 284 and accompanying text, ChP] can be construed as referring to only the situation where the authorities participated in the wrongdoing or where they merely knew of wrongdoing as well. Lending weight to the former interpretation is the slightly different formulation suggested by Lord Lowry (...) "that the court has a discretion to stay as an abuse of process criminal proceedings brought before the court by abduction in a foreign country participated in or encouraged by British authorities"." (Arnell 2004, p. 257, n. 31.)

[298] As mentioned supra, Lord Griffiths does not only refer to a discretion (House of Lords, Lord Griffiths, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 152: "The High Court in the exercise of its supervisory jurisdiction has power to inquire into the circumstances by which a person has been brought within the jurisdiction and if satisfied that it was in disregard of extradition procedures it may stay the prosecution and order the release of the accused [emphasis added, ChP].") but also to an automatism, see ibid., p. 151: "In my view your Lordships should now declare that where process of law is available to return an accused to this country through extradition procedures our courts will refuse to try him if he has been forcibly brought within our jurisdiction in disregard of those procedures by a process to which our own police, prosecuting or other executive authorities have been a knowing party [emphasis added, ChP]." The summary of Lord Lowry is, however, in conformity with the conclusion reached by Lord Bridge of Harwich, who indeed

Lord Lowry, who first explained that abuse of process means "abuse of the process of the court which is to try the accused",[299] proposed the following, and indeed already presented (see footnote 610 and accompanying text of Chapter III), test:

> [A] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case.[300]

Lord Lowry hereby noted, however, that this discretion must be sparingly exercised – and that he is confident that this will happen[301] – and that it should not be relied upon to disapprove of certain executive misconduct.[302] (Nevertheless, one can understand that certain misconduct may offend the court's sense of justice to be only referred to a discretion: "To hold that in these circumstances the court may decline to exercise its jurisdiction on the ground that its process has been abused may be an extension of the doctrine of abuse of process but is, in my view, a wholly proper and necessary one [emphasis added, ChP]." (House of Lords, Lord Bridge of Harwich, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 155-156.) See also Michell 1996, p. 471: "[T]he Law Lords were ambiguous as to whether there is a duty to refuse to exercise jurisdiction over an individual who has been brought unlawfully before a court, or merely a discretion to do so."

[299] House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 160.

[300] Ibid., p. 161.

[301] See also ibid., p. 163: "I regard it as essential to the rule of law that the court should not have to make available its process and thereby indorse (on what I am confident will be a very few occasions) unworthy conduct when it is proved against the executive or its agents, however humble in rank. And, remembering that it is not jurisdiction which is in issue but the exercise of a discretion to stay proceedings, while speaking of 'unworthy conduct', I would not expect a court to stay the proceedings of every trial which has been preceded by a venial irregularity. If it be objected that my preferred solution replaces certainty by uncertainty [cf. the words of Lord Oliver of Aylmerton in n. 296, ChP], the latter quality is inseparable from judicial discretion. And, if the principles are clear and, as I trust, the cases few, the prospect is not really daunting." Note, however, that Lord Lowry also makes a remark which implicitly accepts that the possibility that judicial refusals to exercise jurisdiction may occur more often than his expectations reflect here (but that it is entirely up to the Executive to stop these by acting correctly): "No 'floodgates' argument applies because the executive can stop the flood at source by refraining from impropriety." (Ibid.) Finally, it is worth mentioning that Michell (1996, p. 499), writing about the for this study very interesting factor 'seriousness of the charges' (in deciding whether or not there is an abuse of process) notes that this factor "might be implied from Lord Lowry's suggestion that not every "venial irregularity" should result in a stay [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Although that might indeed be the case, it seems, however, that Lord Lowry is not focusing here on the seriousness of the suspect's charges but rather on the seriousness of the irregularity itself.

[302] See House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161: "I agree that prima facie it is the duty of a court to try a person who is charged before it with an offence which the court has power to try and therefore that the jurisdiction to stay must be exercised carefully and sparingly and only for very compelling reasons. The discretion to stay is not a disciplinary jurisdiction and ought not to be exercised in order to express the court's disapproval of official conduct. Accordingly, if the prosecuting authorities have been guilty of culpable delay but the prospect of a fair trial has not been prejudiced, the court ought not to stay the proceedings merely 'pour encourager les autres'." See also Choo 1994 B, p. 629.

asked to try the accused and furthermore that a stay of the proceedings will be seen as a disapproval of such misconduct.)[303]

Hence, if the judges feel that to continue to exercise jurisdiction, even if there has been some executive misconduct, does not amount to an abuse of the court's own process (for example, because a fair trial is still possible or because it does not offend the court's sense of justice to be asked to try the accused in these circumstances), the judges can indeed continue to exercise jurisdiction.

A final point of Lord Lowry's opinion which should be mentioned here is that he, after having repeated the rationale behind the idea that a court has a discretion to refuse jurisdiction in certain cases,[304] stressed the protection of international law in this matter.[305]

Because this case involved neither a violation of an extradition treaty (although it could be seen as a circumvention of extradition arrangements) nor a violation of State sovereignty, this reasoning has to be viewed generally and not related to the specifics of this case. Nevertheless, one could argue that it could perhaps be seen as evidence for the idea that their Lordships are thinking about international human rights law here.[306]

The last Lord, Lord Slynn of Hadley, was very concise and simply agreed > with Lord Griffiths that the question should be answered in the way he proposes. It does not seem to me to be right in principle that, when a person is brought within the

[303] See House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 163: "If proceedings are stayed when wrongful conduct is proved, the result will not only be a sign of judicial disapproval but will discourage similar conduct in future and thus will tend to maintain the purity of the stream of justice."

[304] See ibid., pp. 162-163: "[T]he court, in order to protect its own process from being degraded and misused, must have the power to stay proceedings which have come before it and have only been made possible by acts which offend the court's conscience as being contrary to the rule of law. Those acts by providing a morally unacceptable foundation for the exercise of jurisdiction over the suspect taint the proposed trial and, if tolerated, will mean that the court's process has been abused. Therefore, although the power of the court is rightly confined to its inherent power to protect itself against the abuse of its own process, I respectfully cannot agree that the facts relied on in cases such as the present case (as alleged) 'have nothing to do with that process' just because they are not part of the process. They are the indispensable foundation for the holding of the trial."

[305] See ibid., p. 163: "The implications for international law, as represented by extradition treaties, are significant. If a suspect is extradited from a foreign country to this country he cannot be tried for an offence which is different from that specified in the warrant and, subject always to the treaty's express provisions, cannot be tried for a political offence. But, if he is kidnapped in the foreign country and brought here, he may be charged with any offence, including a political offence. If British officialdom at any level has participated in or encouraged the kidnapping, it seems to represent a grave contravention of international law, the comity of nations and the rule of law generally if our courts allow themselves to be used by the executive to try an offence which the courts would not be dealing with if the rule of law had prevailed. It may be said that a guilty accused finding himself in the circumstances predicated is not deserving of much sympathy, but the principle involved goes beyond the scope of such a pragmatic observation and even beyond the rights of those victims who are or may be innocent. It affects the proper administration of justice according to the rule of law and with respect to international law." From ns. 289-290 and accompanying text, it became already clear that Lord Bridge of Harwich referred to the importance of respect for international law (through the concept of 'rule of law').

[306] Cf. also Michell 1996, pp. 472-473 (see also n. 289).

> jurisdiction in the way alleged in this case (which for present purposes must be assumed to be true) and charged, that the court should not be competent to investigate the illegality alleged, and if satisfied as to the illegality to refuse to proceed to trial.[307]

As a result, the appeal of Bennett was allowed and the case was remitted to the Divisional Court for further consideration (it should be remembered that their Lordships decided this case on the basis of assumed facts only).[308]

Although the opinions of the concurring Lords are not entirely identical – as was shown above, Lord Griffiths also suggested a mandatory sanction in that the courts must refuse jurisdiction in circumstances comparable to those of this case[309] – it can be asserted that Lord Lowry's statement that > a court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case.[310]

---

[307] House of Lords, Lord Slynn of Hadley, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 169.

[308] See n. 279. Michell (1996, p. 469) notes that "[i]n in the Divisional Court, the fugitive's allegations were subsequently made out, although the court's decision is rather unsatisfactory [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Hence, the male captus in this case – a deliberate circumvention of the extradition procedures in which the authorities which can be connected to the prosecuting forum were involved – led to the refusal of jurisdiction. As a result, it can be argued that even though the decision quite often speaks of a discretion, a situation like the one here will, probably, normally lead to the ending of the case. See also Jones and Doobay 2004, p. 95: "Although the majority use the framework of the abuse of process doctrine, in which the word "discretion", rightly or wrongly, is frequently employed, the trenchant words of Lord Griffiths and Lord Bridge, and to a lesser extent Lord Lowry, appear to leave little or no room for the operation of a discretion or balancing exercise, where an abduction abroad in breach of extradition procedures has been found." (It must be emphasised that the observations in the Bennett case leave room for the view that this is so, even if one cannot speak of a proper abduction (without the consent of the injured State), which did not occur here.) Be that as it may, because Bennett also faced fraud charges in Scotland, a Scottish arrest warrant was issued against him and remained outstanding "after it was determined that the finding of the English divisional court on the merits of Bennett's allegations did not bind a Scottish court. The Scottish court, while acknowledging the weakness of the male captus bene detentus rule after Bennett (…), interpreted the facts of the case differently than the English divisional court [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Michell 1996, p. 470.) Hence, it did not believe that there had been collusion between the English and the South African authorities. "Moreover, even had the English authorities acted improperly, there was no evidence that the Scottish authorities had also acted improperly. The unlawfulness of the actions of the English police under English law could not affect Scottish proceedings. Bennett's jurisdictional challenge was dismissed." (Ibid., p. 471.) This last position affirms that the prosecuting State's own authorities must have done something irregular, see also n. 313 and accompanying text.

[309] See House of Lords, Lord Griffiths, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 151. See also Choo 1994 B, p. 631.

[310] House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161.

may come close to the core of the Bennett case.[311]

However, this statement is still rather generally formulated. A summary of the Bennett case[312] showing more concretely what is needed was formulated in the 1998 Westfallen case, discussed by Warbrick:

> The question is … whether it appears that the police or the prosecuting authorities have acted illegally or procured or connived at unlawful procedures or violated international law or the domestic law of foreign States or abused their powers in a way that should lead this court to stay the proceedings against the applicants [original footnote omitted, ChP].[313]

According to the ICTY Trial Chamber in the 2002 Nikolić case (see Subsection 3.1.4 of the next chapter), which used the summary of the All England Law Reports to clarify what their Lordships decided in this case,[314] the Bennett approach "is now generally considered to be the ruling principle for cases where representatives of a State have been involved in a violation of international law and which amount to a violation of the rule of law."[315] That may indeed be the case, but it is arguably only a small part of what Bennett stands for (see the summary from the Westfallen case).

---

[311] See, for example, ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Slobodan Milošević, 'Decision on Preliminary Motions', Case No. IT-99-37-PT, 8 November 2001, para. 49. (See Subsection 3.1.3 of the next chapter for the discussion of this case.)

[312] Note, however, that this summary takes into account not only the English Bennett case but also the Scottish Bennett case, see n. 308.

[313] Warbrick 2000, p. 492, referring to the words of the Lord Chief Justice in this case. See also ibid., p. 493: "In his concurring judgment [to the Westfallen case, ChP], Hooper J suggested that collusion between national authorities to circumvent extradition proceedings was the minimum threshold for a successful application under the Bennett principle [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See, however, Currie 2007, pp. 357-358: "The Law Lords concluded that by way of the abuse of process doctrine, courts may inquire into the manner in which an accused was brought before them and may stay the prosecution if the circumstances warrant. In this case, the authorities' deliberate flouting of the extradition arrangements, inter alia, rendered such a remedy appropriate. It seems clear, however, that it was not the subverting of extradition procedures itself that was so offensive to the court; rather, the matter was one of respect for the rule of law in the global sense [original footnote omitted, ChP]".

[314] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 87 or House of Lords, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 138-139: "[t]he maintenance of the rule of law prevailed over the public interest in the prosecution and punishment of crime where the prosecuting authority had secured the prisoner's presence within the territorial jurisdiction of the court by forcibly abducting him or having him abducted from within the jurisdiction of some other state in violation of international law, the law of the state from which he had been abducted and his rights under the laws of that state and in disregard of available procedures to secure his lawful extradition to the jurisdiction of the court from the state where he was residing. It was an abuse of process for a person to be forcibly brought within the jurisdiction in disregard of extradition procedures available for the return of an accused person to the United Kingdom … [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[315] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 87. The statement of Lord Lowry is rather broad and can arguably encompass more situations than mere circumventions of extradition procedures (as was the case in this specific situation). See also Sloan 2003 A, p. 101, n. 119.

However, the following words of the Trial Chamber, namely that "[t]he rule of law is clearly interpreted here [namely in the Bennett case, ChP] as demanding only a fair trial for an accused",[316] are arguably incorrect as the rule of law may also be violated when the accused can still enjoy a fair trial but when "it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case", see the above-mentioned quotation of Lord Lowry at footnote 310 and accompanying text.

One point in this case still needs to be discussed. Although their Lordships state that judges may stay the proceedings if certain misconduct amounts to an abuse of process, they do not really clarify which aspects will probably be taken into account by the judges in their balancing exercise whether or not to stay the proceedings.

In literature however, such forecasts have been made. Choo, in his commentary of the case, for example, predicts:

> If a stay were discretionary, the court would, in deciding whether to order a stay, presumably take into account considerations such as: (i) whether the illegal extradition of the accused was accompanied by physical violence (if so, this would weigh heavily in favour of a stay); (ii) whether the police were acting in circumstances of urgency (if so, this would weigh against a stay); and (iii) the seriousness of the offence with which the accused is charged (the more serious the offence, the less likely the court would be to stay the proceedings).[317]

It is clear that this last argument, which Choo repeats when discussing the possible position of Lord Griffiths that a stay should always be ordered when a person has been illegally extradited,[318] is, of course, very interesting for the context of the international criminal tribunals (see the next chapter) which have to deal with suspects of very serious crimes.

---

[316] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 87. As will be shown in the next chapter, the ICTY Trial Chamber itself followed the correct test, recognising that jurisdiction can also be refused, even if the suspect can still enjoy a fair trial, see ibid., para. 111 and n. 528 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[317] Choo 1994 B, p. 631.

[318] See ibid., p. 632: "It is possible, of course, that what Lord Griffiths meant to suggest in Bennett was that circumvention by the police of proper extradition procedures is such heinous misconduct that there are no circumstances in which it should ever be excused. Illegal extradition, it may be argued, can never be considered a venial irregularity. Thus, while in a normal case all relevant considerations ought to be weighed up to determine whether the proceedings should be stayed on account of the pre-trial executive impropriety, cases involving illegal extradition are sui generis. This is an attractive argument, but it is not entirely clear that there can never be situations where the heinousness of illegal extradition appears insignificant when viewed against the heinousness of the offence with which the accused is charged. We have seen that the Crown case against Bennett was that he had raised the finance to purchase a helicopter by a series of false pretences and had defaulted on the repayments. One wonders how willing a court would be to stay a prosecution for mass murder on the basis that the English police circumvented the relevant extradition procedures in securing the return of the accused to England. Yet a stay is precisely what Lord Griffiths would seem to require even in this situation [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

Indeed, one should not forget that Bennett was merely charged with fraud. Would their Lordships have come to the same conclusion if Bennett was, for example, charged with mass murder or genocide?[319] Choo believes that it is inappropriate "to hold that a mandatory stay should be ordered in every case where a prosecution has been commenced in consequence of an illegal extradition [emphasis in original, ChP]",[320] that a discretionary approach in which all the relevant considerations can be weighed is hence to be preferred[321] and that two considerations in particular may lead to a bene detentus outcome:

> (i) the offence charged may be an especially heinous one; and (ii) it may be possible to excuse the illegal extradition of suspects whose continued freedom was considered to pose 'a grave threat to national security (the foreign leader plotting for war against us, or the active terrorist).' [original footnotes omitted, ChP][322]

However, that this view can be found in literature is one thing, but does it also appear in actual case law? It seems that it does.

In the 1995 male captus bene deditus case In Re Schmidt,[323] the way in which Norbert Schmidt was brought to England was the subject of proceedings. This German national, who was charged by the German authorities with serious drug offences,[324] was lured from Ireland to England before being extradited to Germany to stand trial there. Schmidt, of course, protested, arguing that > the ruse adopted by D.S. Jones [the English Detective Sergeant who set up the luring operation, ChP] to persuade him to come to the United Kingdom was an abuse of power by the executive and an abuse if process of the courts of England and Wales which vitiated the whole extradition proceedings.[325]

---

[319] See the previous footnote (where Choo speculates about the position of Lord Griffiths in such a case). See also D. Baragwanath, 'Liberty and Justice in the Face of Terrorist Threats to Society', Address to Alumni, University of Auckland, 4 March 2006, available at: http://www.law.auckland.ac.nz/uoa/fms/default/law/news/docs/Terrorism_March%2006.pdf, p. 4: "But should the Horseferry Road case, which concerned simple dishonesty over acquiring a helicopter, be applied to an Eichmann?" See finally also McNeal and Field 2007, pp. 516-517.

[320] Choo 1994 B, p. 633.

[321] See ibid.

[322] Ibid.

[323] House of Lords, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 339*ff*. (Decision of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division: pp. 342-362. Decision of the House of Lords: pp. 362*ff*.)

[324] See House of Lords, Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 380: "The 58 German charges outstanding against the applicant suggest that he may be a substantial international dealer in drugs."

[325] Ibid., p. 369. See ibid., pp. 368-369 for more information on the operation: "The appellant applicant, who is a German national, is accused by the prosecuting authorities in Mannheim of having on some 58 occasions in Germany supplied and possessed cannabis which he had imported from Holland to a total of more than 386 kilograms between 1987 and 1991. Having moved his place of abode from Germany to Ireland he was arrested in the latter country on 12 August 1991 and charged with being in possession of drugs. On 13 August 1991 an international warrant of arrest was issued by the court in Mannheim and the German authorities proceeded to set in motion procedure in Ireland for extradition. On 24 September 1991 the applicant was convicted of the drugs charge and later released. On 29 October 1991 the Irish

Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle, with whom all the other Lords concurred, first stated that the Bennett principle was not valid in the circumstances of this case in which a person was not brought to England to stand trial but merely to be held there before being extradited to a third country. Although Schmidt argued that the House of Lords had to be aware not to create "an anomaly between a person who is kidnapped and brought into the country to be tried here and a person who is brought here not to be tried here",[326] Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle, following the reasoning of the respondents,[327] stated:

> My Lords, I am satisfied that Bennett has no such general application as the applicant contends. The issue in that case was whether the English courts should decline to try the accused by staying the prosecution. That the power to intervene, which was held to exist in the High Court, was related only to a trial is abundantly clear from the passages in the speeches to which I have referred. Indeed, there was no reason in that case to consider the power in any other context. (...) In my view the position in relation to a pending trial in England is wholly different to that in relation to pending proceedings for extradition from England. In the former case the High Court in its supervisory jurisdiction is the only bulwark against any abuse of process resulting in injustice or oppression which may have resulted in the accused being brought to trial in England. In the latter case, not only has the Secretary of State power to refuse to surrender the accused in such circumstances but the courts of the requesting authority are likely to have powers similar to those held to exist in Reg. v. Horseferry Road authorities informed the German authorities that the extradition warrant was not in order. No further steps towards extradition were thereafter taken by the German authorities. During 1992 New Scotland Yard received information that the applicant was living in Waterford and was making frequent visits to the United Kingdom using false British and E.E.C. passports to conceal his true identity. There was also information that he had visited Italy and Belgium using such passports. In September 1992 Detective Sergeant Jones, an officer of the extradition squad of the International and Organised Crime Branch of the Metropolitan Police, decided to investigate whether the applicant might be involved in terrorist activities and had committed offences in connection with forged passports. It is accepted that there was no evidence to connect the applicant with terrorist activities. D.S. Jones also obtained the authority of a senior officer to pass himself off as an officer investigating cheque fraud in the hope that he could thereby persuade the applicant to meet him in England, where the applicant could be arrested on a provisional warrant if the German Government were to request his extradition. Thereafter D.S. Jones telephoned the applicant and his solicitor in Ireland and explained that he was investigating a cheque fraud allegedly committed by a Mr. N. Schmidt and that he was anxious to exclude the applicant from his inquiries. He invited the applicant to come to England to be interviewed and on being asked by his solicitor what would happen if the applicant did not attend the interview he said that it would be the normal practice to circulate his name as that of a suspect and that he would be arrested when his presence in the United Kingdom next came to the notice of the authorities. The respondents accept that there was no truth in the cheque fraud suggestion and that this was simply a device to persuade the applicant to enter the United Kingdom. On 17 November 1992 D.S. Jones met the applicant's solicitor by arrangement in Green Park and shortly thereafter he met the applicant who accompanied him to Charing Cross Police Station where he was arrested on a provisional warrant issued that morning."

---

[326] House of Lords, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 364. Schmidt hereby referred to an older decision, which, according to him, their Lordships were not to follow.

[327] Who argued that "[t]here is (...) nothing anomalous in the submission that Reg. v. Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, Ex parte Bennett [1994] 1 A.C. 42 does not apply to extradition proceedings, where, unlike domestic criminal proceedings, the courts are not called on to make any final determination of guilt or innocence." (Ibid., p. 366.)

> Magistrates' Court, Ex parte Bennett.[328] An accused fugitive is thus likely to have not one but two safeguards against injustice and oppression before being brought to trial in the requesting state. It must also be remembered that the extradition procedures to which this appeal relates flow from the European Convention on Extradition and are designed to facilitate the return of accused or convicted persons from one contracting state to another. The removal of the requirement that the requesting state should provide prima facie evidence of the alleged crime demonstrates that extradition proceedings between contracting states were intended to be simple and speedy, each state accepting that it could rely upon the genuineness and bona fides of a request made by another one.[329] (...) To confer on the High Court a power such as the applicant contends for would be to inhibit the carrying out of this intention.[330]

Although one will understand that a trial court is not the same as an 'extraditing' court, one can wonder whether the idea behind the above-mentioned passage may not lead to unfair situations. One can agree with Justice Sedley (of the Divisional Court in this case) that all courts (whether trial courts or 'extraditing' courts) have an obligation to prevent abuse of their process.[331] If that were not the case, then a court would be powerless to stop the extradition of a person who was clearly abducted from another country before being brought before the 'extraditing' court. It can be argued that these situations need to be avoided.[332]

Even though the above-mentioned conclusion of Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle was in itself enough to dismiss Schmidt's appeal, Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle also looked at the hypothetical situation that the Court would have a Bennett-like discretion. In other words: would the luring operation in this case call for a stay of [328] One can seriously wonder whether that would then lead to a dismissal of the case. It is not hard to agree with Michell when he writes: "Lord Jauncey's argument that a court of the requesting state would take into account the manner in which the fugitive came before it is (...) open to some doubt. In Schmidt II, it would seem unlikely that a German court would stay the proceedings against the fugitive in Germany unless he could show that the German authorities had been responsible for his allegedly unlawful return to England." (Michell 1996, p. 480.) See also Choo 1995, p. 874.

---

[329] This makes Michell wonder whether this means that judges should have more power to investigate these issues in cases where there is no such a system (of trust): "It may be (...) that Schmidt II is limited in its application to extradition proceedings under the European Convention on Extradition. In a case where extradition is sought by a non-Convention state there may be less room for the trust in the quality of foreign justice expressed in Schmidt. As a corollary, there should be a greater willingness on the part of the extraditing court to consider the circumstances by which the fugitive came before it [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Michell 1996, p. 478.)

[330] House of Lords, Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 377-378. Note that the Supreme Court of Ireland had earlier ruled in the case The State (Trimbole) v. The Governor of Mountjoy Prison (Supreme Court of Ireland, The State (Trimbole) v. The Governor of Mountjoy Prison, 26 March 1985 [1985] I.R. 550) that the illegal arrest of an Australian citizen had tainted (and stopped) the subsequent extradition process to Australia. ("[T]he Irish authorities had arrested him before they had established a legal basis to extradite him [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Michell 1996, p. 481).) See for more information on this case and its relationship with In Re Schmidt: Michell 1996, pp. 480-481.

[331] See House of Lords, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 359 (Decision of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, Justice Sedley).

[332] See also Michell 1996, p. 479.

the proceedings if the Court had that discretionary power? Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle first examined the opinions of Lord Justice Roch and Justice Sedley (of the Divisional Court in this case) on this issue.

Although Lord Justice Roch stated that "a serious or grave abuse of power by the executive" fell under the Bennett principle and that this could even include a technique in which no force is used (for example, if threats or inducements of a serious and grave nature have been made),[333] the technique adopted in this case did not meet that threshold.[334] Before reaching that conclusion, however, Roch clearly referred to the seriousness of Schmidt's charges:

> If there has to be a balancing between the gravity of the alleged offences for which the applicant is wanted by the German authorities and the improper conduct of the police, then the smuggling of substantial quantities of drugs across borders is a serious matter indeed.[335]

Justice Sedley was of the opinion that subterfuge, even if that technique as such was possible in view of "the reality of police work in a dangerous and complex

---

[333] See House of Lords, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 353 (Decision of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, Lord Justice Roch): "In my opinion what has to exist before the court will intervene on the grounds of abuse of process is a serious or grave abuse of power by the executive as typified by kidnapping or forcible abduction in the territory of the foreign state as a means of circumventing extradition procedures which the executive could and should have used. The principle will not be confined to cases where there has been an application of physical force to the person of the detainee in the foreign country, but will embrace cases where there have been threats or inducements of a serious and grave nature." (It is arguably not clear from these words whether Lord Justice Roch would only refuse jurisdiction in case an agent would, for example, visit the suspect and, while holding him at gunpoint, order him to come with him to the forum State – this would amount to an abduction – or also in case an agent from another State, for example, over the telephone, would seriously threaten him in an effort to induce him to come to the forum State – this can more likely be seen as a luring operation.) Cf. also House of Lords, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 357 (Decision of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, Justice Sedley): "I do not accept his argument [the argument of the respondents' QC, ChP] that only the use of physical force passes the threshold. Lawlessness can take many forms. In my judgment what the doctrine of Bennett's case strikes at is an act on the part of the executive government of the United Kingdom: (a) which violates the laws of the foreign state, international law or the legal rights of the individual within that state, and thus offends against the principle of comity; (b) which circumvents extradition arrangements made with that state; (c) which instead brings the suspect by coercion into the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom's courts; and (d) but for which the domestic proceedings could not have been initiated. (…) In total, the decision of the House of Lords enlarges the concept of abuse of process to embrace serious abuses of power where it is only by the abuse of power that legal process has become possible. It articulates the supervisory obligation of the High Court to maintain the rule of law as something different from and greater than the maintenance of individual rules of law." (This quotation could arguably more easily include a luring operation from abroad (a violation of international law is not necessarily required), although the luring operation would then have to be accompanied by coercion, see also the main text. This point is reminiscent of the discussion in the context of the Stocké case where it was wondered whether a luring operation can be seen as an operation against the will of the suspect, see Subsection 2.2.4 of Chapter III.)

[334] See House of Lords, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 354 (Decision of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, Lord Justice Roch).

[335] Ibid. See also Michell 1996, p. 499 (n. 569). See also ibid., pp. 475-478.

world",[336] should not amount to coercion. That, according to him, had occurred in this case.[337] Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle, however, did not agree:

[336] House of Lords, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 359 (Decision of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, Justice Sedley).

[337] As Justice Sedley's opinion may be interesting for one's views concerning the (il)legality of certain luring operations, it is worth displaying it here in its entirety, see ibid., pp. 358-359: "In my view the way in which the applicant was induced to come to England (...) is within the mischief to which the principle in Bennett's case is directed. But for the deception practised on him, the applicant would not have come to England and so made his arrest and extradition possible. This deception amounted to more than temptation (to use D.S. Jones' word) or inducement: it amounted to coercion, because it deliberately led the applicant to believe that D.S. Jones had sufficient evidence to justify his arrest for cheque frauds if and when he next entered the United Kingdom, but that by coming here voluntarily and surrendering himself to D.S. Jones he could clear himself. Since Jones knew that the whole cheque fraud story was bogus, he knew too that this was an offer that the applicant could not refuse: either he could come and establish what both he and Jones knew was his innocence of cheque frauds, or he could (so Jones led him to believe) face the prospect of arrest and possible trial for the frauds whenever he next chose to come to the United Kingdom, as he periodically did. To offer an ostensible choice between a serious limitation on movement (whether by having to stay away from the United Kingdom or by facing arrest for cheque frauds on entry) and a simple and certain way of removing that bogus limitation was in my judgment coercive both in intention and in effect. It was a baited trap, but it was a trap into which the applicant was driven by a mendacious threat of adverse consequences if he did not take the bait. To change the metaphor, without the use of the stick the carrot would have been of no help. The subterfuge was intended precisely to ensure that the applicant believed he had no worthwhile choice but to come to the United Kingdom and deliver himself to D.S. Jones, and that is what he did. (...) What is objectionable about fraud, actual or constructive, is that it robs the victim of the power of autonomous decision and action as surely as does physical coercion. In my judgment a fraud practised in and contrary to the law of a sovereign state, as this fraud was, and but for which the applicant would not and could not have been arrested on a provisional warrant as and when he was, would entitle this court to intervene to stay consequent criminal proceedings by parity of reasoning with Bennett's case. Comparably, if the applicant were to have been present in the United Kingdom for another reason (including an invitation, true or false, from D.S. Jones to meet him in order, say, to discuss kites [In Ireland, Schmidt had a business in kites and model aeroplanes, ChP]) the objection would fall away because the element of coercion would be absent. Whatever the moral objections to the use of pure subterfuge, they have to be matched against the reality of police work in a dangerous and complex world (...). But the limit placed upon this by the House of Lords in Bennett's case [1994] 1 A.C. 42, on grounds of constitutional principle, is that the use of subterfuge must not be such as to violate the rule of law by substituting coercion for established extradition procedures." With respect to this last part, the circumvention of extradition procedures, it must be noted that the Detective Sergeant in charge of the operation stated that he did not intend to circumvent the extradition procedures between Ireland, Germany and the UK. (A possible circumvention could perhaps be deduced from the fact that Schmidt had been earlier arrested in Ireland for being in possession of drugs but that an attempt of the German authorities to have Schmidt extradited from Ireland to Germany was unsuccessful because the Irish authorities found that the extradition warrant was not in order, see House of Lords, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 345 (Decision of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, Lord Justice Roch): "D.S. Jones adds that he did not believe that the ruse he was suggesting would circumvent any extradition arrangements between the Republic of Eire, Germany and the United Kingdom as he was not intending to tempt the applicant to enter the United Kingdom in circumstances where he would never otherwise have come here. He was simply trying to persuade the applicant to get in touch with him when he came to the United Kingdom for his own purposes." Note that "[n]o legal process existed by which the applicant could have been brought from Eire within the jurisdiction of this court for the purpose of being extradited to Germany", see ibid., p. 354.)

> The only sanction attached to the ruse was that the applicant, if he did not attend a meeting with D.S. Jones in England, would be arrested when his presence in England was next detected by the authorities. In these circumstances to suggest that he had no alternative but to come to this country and was thereby coerced seems to me to be unrealistic. Had he chosen to remain in Ireland, there was nothing that the authorities here could have done about it. At the very worst, he was tricked into coming to England but not coerced.[338]

Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle also looked, although perhaps not as clearly as Lord Justice Roch of the Divisional Court (who used the word "balancing"), at the seriousness of the crimes with which Schmidt was charged before condoning the police conduct. After having referred to the findings of Lord Griffiths in another drug case (Somchai Liangsiriprasert v. Government of the United States of America),[339] he concluded:

> The 58 German charges outstanding against the applicant suggest that he may be a substantial international dealer in drugs. As such, his frequent visits to England are unlikely to be in the public interest. To bring such a person to justice the police and other drug enforcement agencies may from time to time have to tempt him to enter their fief. In my view, what was done by D.S. Jones was far more akin to the enticement of the drug enforcement agent in Liangsiriprasert than to the [forcible] abduction in Reg. v. Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, Ex parte Bennett [1994] 1 A.C. 42. I agree with Roch L.J. that the detective sergeant's conduct was not so grave or serious as would have warranted the intervention of the High Court had it possessed such a power.[340]

---

[338] House of Lords, Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 379.

[339] Ibid., pp. 379-380: "In Somchai Liangsiriprasert v. Government of the United States of America [1991] 1 A.C. 225, a drug dealer was persuaded by a United States drug enforcement agent to travel from Thailand to Hong Kong in order to receive payment for drugs exported from Thailand to the United States. There was no extradition between the two countries for drug offences. On arrival in Hong Kong the applicant was arrested and proceedings for his extradition to the United States were commenced. He submitted, inter alia, that it would be oppressive and an abuse of process for a government agency to entice a criminal to a jurisdiction from which extradition was available. In answer to this submission Lord Griffiths said, at pp. 242-243: "As to the suggestion that it was oppressive or an abuse of process the short answer is that international crime has to be fought by international co-operation between law enforcement agencies. It is notoriously difficult to apprehend those at the centre of the drug trade; it is only their couriers who are usually caught. If the courts were to regard the penetration of a drug dealing organisation by the agents of a law enforcement agency and a plan to tempt the criminals into a jurisdiction from which they could be extradited as an abuse of process it would indeed be a red letter day for the drug barons.... In the present case the applicant and S.C. [Sutham Chokvanitphong, the cousin of Somchai Liangsiriprasert, ChP] came to Hong Kong of their own free will to collect, as they thought, the illicit profits of their heroin trade. They were present in Hong Kong not because of any unlawful conduct of the authorities but because of their own criminality and greed. The proper extradition procedures have been observed and their Lordships reject without hesitation that it is in the circumstances of this case oppressive or an abuse of the judicial process for the United States to seek their extradition.""

[340] Ibid., p. 380.

As a result of this, Schmidt's appeal was dismissed. Reading his words, it is not entirely clear whether Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle was of the opinion that every luring operation cannot lead to the ending of the case, or whether this specific luring operation (in which, according to him, no coercion had been used) could not lead to the ending of the case. After all, although he stated that the conduct was not so grave or serious as to warrant intervention (implying that the conduct may have been irregular, but not irregular enough to activate a stay), Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle also found the conduct in In Re Schmidt to be more akin to the enticement operation in Somchai Liangsiriprasert v. Government of the United States of America than to the captus of Bennett – and it should be remembered that in Somchai Liangsiriprasert v. Government of the United States of America, Lord Griffiths stated that the suspects came to the jurisdiction of the arresting officers "not because of any unlawful conduct of the authorities".[341] In addition, and given the fact that it seems (although this is, in contrast to the position of Lord Justice Roch, not that clear) that Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle looked at the seriousness of Schmidt's charges before concluding that the conduct was not so grave or serious as to warrant intervention, it is not plain either whether their Lordships would approve a luring operation (such as the ones executed in In Re Schmidt and Somchai Liangsiriprasert v. Government of the United States of America) in any case brought before them or only if the 'lured' suspect is charged with serious crimes (such as in the two above-mentioned cases).[342]

Before turning to the civil law context, it may be worth pointing out that also in English cases after Schmidt, the seriousness of the suspects' alleged crimes were taken into consideration in the balancing exercise of the judges confronted by a male captus situation. Two such cases are the 1996 case R. v. Latif and the 1999 case R. v. Mullen.[343] It is not necessary to examine these cases in detail, but a few interesting quotations certainly deserve to be mentioned here. In the first case, R. v. Latif,[344] where a person suspected of serious drug offences was lured from Pakistan to the United Kingdom, Lord Steyn (providing the opinion of the House of Lords) very clearly spelled out why the strict application of both the male captus bene detentus and the male captus male detentus maxims in the context of entrapment (luring) would be undesirable:

---

[341] Ibid., p. 379, referring to Lord Griffiths in the case Somchai Liangsiriprasert v. Government of the United States of America. See also n. 339.

[342] Note that Michell (1996, pp. 475-476) makes the general statement – not only focused on suspects of serious crimes – that "[i]n Schmidt II, the House of Lords determined that an individual who has been lured into England from abroad by the police under false pretenses may be lawfully extradited to face criminal charges in a third state. Schmidt II is also significant because Lord Jauncey left little doubt that the position he adopted in that case would also apply to the propriety of a criminal trial where an individual has been lured into the jurisdiction by fraud [original footnote omitted, ChP]." However, he concedes that Lord Justice Roch, in the first Schmidt case (at the Divisional Court) did consider the seriousness of the suspect's charges to constitute a factor to be taken into account, see Michell 1996, p. 499.

[343] See also Warbrick 2000.

[344] House of Lords, Regina v. Latif; Regina v. Shazad, 18 January 1996, 1 W.L.R. 104-117 [1996].

> If the court always refuses to stay such proceedings, the perception will be that the court condones criminal conduct and malpractice by law enforcement agencies. That would undermine public confidence in the criminal justice system and bring it into disrepute. On the other hand, if the court were always to stay proceedings in such cases, it would incur the reproach that it is failing to protect the public from serious crime. The weakness of both extreme positions leaves only one principled solution. The court has a discretion: it has to perform a balancing exercise. If the court concludes that a fair trial is not possible, it will stay the proceedings. That is not what the present case is concerned with. It is plain that a fair trial was possible and that such a trial took place. In this case the issue is whether, despite the fact that a fair trial was possible, the judge ought to have stayed the criminal proceedings on broader consideration of the integrity of the criminal justice system. The law is settled. Weighing countervailing considerations of policy and justice, it is for the judge in the exercise of his discretion to decide whether there has been an abuse of process, which amounts to an affront to the public conscience and requires the criminal proceedings to be stayed: Reg. v. Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, Ex parte Bennett [1994] 1 A.C. 42.[345] Ex parte Bennett was a case where a stay was appropriate because a defendant had been forcibly abducted and brought to this country to face trial in disregard of extradition laws. The speeches in Ex parte Bennett conclusively establish that proceedings may be stayed in the exercise of the judge's discretion not only where a fair trial is impossible but also where it would be contrary to the public interest in the integrity of the criminal justice system that a trial should take place. An infinite variety of cases could arise. General guidance as to how the discretion should be exercised in particular circumstances will not be useful. But it is possible to say that in a case such as the present the judge must weigh in the balance the public interest in ensuring that those that are charged with grave crimes should be tried and the competing public interest in not conveying the impression that the court will adopt the approach that the end justifies any means.[346]

Applying these considerations to the facts of the case, Lord Steyn found that the allegations of the suspect had to be rejected.[347] However, the balancing exercise may also turn out in favour of the suspect.

---

[345] See also Shaw 2003, p. 606, who notes that the approach in Bennett was extended in Latif to cover entrapment. Note that the term 'entrapment' is often used for the national context only. However, in that case, entrapment must be discerned from luring, a real male captus situation involving how a person came from one jurisdiction to the other.

[346] House of Lords, Lord Steyn, Regina v. Latif; Regina v. Shazad, 18 January 1996, 1 W.L.R. 112-113 [1996].

[347] See ibid., p. 113: "In my view the judge took into consideration the relevant considerations placed before him. He performed the balancing exercise. He was entitled to take the view that Shahzad was an organiser in the heroin trade, who took the initiative in proposing the importation. It is true that he did not deal with arguments about the criminal behaviour of the customs officer. That was understandable since that was not argued before him. If such arguments had been put before him, I am satisfied that he would still have come to the same conclusion. And I think he would have been right. The conduct of the customs officer was not so unworthy or shameful that it was an affront to the public conscience to allow the prosecution to proceed. Realistically, any criminal behaviour of the customs officer was venial compared to that of Shahzad. In these circumstances I would reject the submission that the judge erred in refusing to stay the proceedings."

The 1999 decision of R. v. Mullen[348] involved the disguised extradition of a suspect accused of (IRA) terrorism from Zimbabwe to England. In this case, Lord Justice Rose, referring to Latif, mentioned a few elements to be taken into account here, starting with the seriousness of the Mullen's crimes (Mullen had already been convicted and sentenced to 30 years' imprisonment for his crimes when he appealed his conviction on the basis of his pre-trial disguised extradition from Zimbabwe to England).[349] Another important element Rose took into account was "the nature of the conduct of those involved in the deportation on behalf of the British Government".[350] Rose was clearly very critical of this conduct:

> [T]he British authorities initiated and subsequently assisted in and procured the deportation of the defendant, by unlawful means, in circumstances in which there were specific extradition facilities between this country and Zimbabwe. In so acting they were not only encouraging unlawful conduct in Zimbabwe, but they were also acting in breach of public international law.[351]

However, was this conduct to be seen as conduct – to use the words of Lord Steyn, quoted above in the Latif case, see footnote 347 – "so unworthy or shameful that it was an affront to the public conscience to allow the prosecution to proceed"?[352] Lord Justice Rose, balancing these two above-mentioned elements, ultimately concluded that it was:

> This court recognises the immense degree of public revulsion which has, quite properly, attached to the activities of those who have assisted and furthered the violent operations of the I.R.A. and other terrorist organisations. In the discretionary exercise, great weight must therefore be attached to the nature of the offence involved in this case. Against that, however, the conduct of the security services and police in procuring the unlawful deportation of the defendant in the manner which has been described represents, in the view of this court, a blatant and extremely serious failure to adhere to the rule of law with regard to the production of a defendant for prosecution in the English courts. The need to discourage such conduct on the part of those who are responsible for criminal prosecutions is a matter of public policy to which, as appears from Reg. v. Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, Ex parte Bennett [1994] 1 A.C. 42 and Reg. v. Latif [1996] 1 W.L.R. 104, very considerable weight must be attached. (…) In these circumstances, we have no doubt that the discretionary [348] Court of Appeal, Criminal Division, Regina v. Mullen, 4 February 1999, [2000] Q.B. 520*ff.*

[349] See Court of Appeal, Criminal Division, Lord Justice Rose, Regina v. Mullen, 4 February 1999, [2000] Q.B. 534: "As a primary consideration, it is necessary for the court to take into account the gravity of the offence in question. In the present case, the substance of the offence was the facilitating of a bombing campaign in the United Kingdom, which, but for the discovery by the police of the Battersea explosives and armaments cache, might well have caused loss of life and injury to members of the public and, more probably, substantial damage to property in this country. The sentence of 30 years' imprisonment reflects the gravity of the offence. Although it was not at the very top of the range of seriousness of criminal activity, it was undeniably at a very high level in that range."
[350] Ibid.
[351] Ibid., p. 535.
[352] Ibid.

> balance comes down decisively against the prosecution of this offence. This trial was preceded by an abuse of process which, had it come to light at the time, as it would have done had the prosecution made proper voluntary disclosure, would properly have justified the proceedings then being stayed.[353]

As a result, the Court concluded that "the prosecution and therefore the conviction of the defendant were unlawful".[354] In doing so, it emphasised, however, that the balancing exercise may turn out differently in other cases as everything depends on the exact circumstances.[355]

2 CASES FROM THE CIVIL LAW SYSTEM

2.1 Older cases

In a number of old French cases, the judges held that the male captus in question could not lead to a trial. For example, the Court of Appeal of Douai decided on 15 April 1891 in the Nollet case that the arrest of a certain Nollet, executed by French gendarmes on Belgian territory, was deemed not to have occurred.[356]

Likewise, in the 1904 Jabouille case, where an accused, who had taken refuge in Spain, was expelled to France before he could be extradited, the Court of Appeal of Bordeaux held that "Jabouille could lawfully be apprehended only following extradition requested and obtained in the terms provided for by international agreements or after his voluntary return to the country."[357]

One case which is often mentioned in the male captus discussion is the 1933 In re Jolis case.[358]

On 9 July 1933, a thirsty Belgian citizen, Pierre Jolis, visited a bar in the French town of Louvroil.[359] However, Jolis was perhaps more than thirsty for after he left, it was discovered that 2200 francs were missing.[360] The owner of the bar called two

---

[353] Ibid., pp. 535-536.
[354] Ibid., p. 536.
[355] See ibid., pp. 536-537: "In arriving at this conclusion we strongly emphasise that nothing in this judgment should be taken to suggest that there may not be cases, such as Reg. v. Latif [1996] 1 W.L.R. 104, in which the seriousness of the crime is so great relative to the nature of the abuse of process that it would be a proper exercise of judicial discretion to permit a prosecution to proceed or to allow a conviction to stand notwithstanding an abuse of process in relation to the defendant's presence within the jurisdiction. In each case it is a matter of discretionary balance, to be approached with regard to the particular conduct complained of and the particular offence charged."
[356] See Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 106 (Report of M. le Conseiller Comte).
[357] Ibid.
[358] See Tribunal Correctionnel d'Avesnes, In re Jolis, 22 July 1933, Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, Vol. 7 (1933-1934), Case No. 77, pp. 191-192.
[359] See ibid., p. 191.
[360] See ibid.

gardes-champêtres, French village constables,[361] and accompanied them to Mons (Belgium) where Jolis had apparently gone.[362] It was there that the three arrested him on 10 July 1933.[363] After having him brought back to France, he was imprisoned in Avesnes and charged with theft.[364]

The Belgian Government, however, protested and demanded the return of Jolis because he had been illegally arrested on Belgian territory by French officers.[365]

The Tribunal Correctionnel d'Avesnes (a criminal court of first instance)[366] concurred with this view; on 22 July 1933, it stated: "The Court (…) declares null and void the whole of the proceedings of July 10, 1933, especially the commitment to prison and the remand order; and orders the immediate release of Jolis, unless detained for any other matter."[367]

Although it is not clear from the report in the Annual Digest itself whether the French Court hereby relied on international law considerations,[368] the fact that the French Court followed the (international law) view of the Belgian Government points to the fact that it did.[369] In addition, one may also refer to the note of Professor Rousseau to this case who explained that "[t]he exercise by a State of any of its coercive powers in foreign territory, unless based on international convention, is prohibited by the law of nations."[370]

However, this male captus male detentus stance was not followed in the famous 1964 re Argoud case by the French Supreme Court, a case which will now be addressed in more detail.[371]

---

[361] See District Court of Jerusalem, The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann, 'Judgment', 12 December 1961, Criminal Case No. 40/61, para. 48 (36 International Law Reports 1968, p. 68).

[362] See Tribunal Correctionnel d'Avesnes, In re Jolis, 22 July 1933, Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, Vol. 7 (1933-1934), Case No. 77, p. 191.

[363] See ibid.

[364] See ibid.

[365] See ibid.

[366] See District Court of Jerusalem, The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann, 'Judgment', 12 December 1961, Criminal Case No. 40/61, para. 48 (36 International Law Reports 1968, p. 68).

[367] Tribunal Correctionnel d'Avesnes, In re Jolis, 22 July 1933, Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, Vol. 7 (1933-1934), Case No. 77, pp. 191-192.

[368] See, however, ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 91: "The Court considered that this was a violation of international law and released the person [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[369] See also Wilske 2000, p. 327: "Nicht ausdrücklich angesprochen wurde dabei die Frage, ob diese Rechtsfolge dem Völkerrecht oder dem nationalem Recht entnommen wurde. Es liegt aber nahe anzunehmen, daß die Rechtsfolge unmittelbar dem Völkerrecht entnommen wurde, da ein entsprechender Rechtssatz der nationalen Rechtsordnung nicht zitiert wurde und wohl auch nicht existiert. In früher entschiedenen Fällen [and here, Wilske refers to Nollet and Jabouille, ChP] war auch wegen Umgehung des Auflieferungsverfahrens die französische Gerichtsbarkeit verneint worden [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[370] Tribunal Correctionnel d'Avesnes, In re Jolis, 22 July 1933, Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, Vol. 7 (1933-1934), Case No. 77, p. 192.

[371] This book has chosen to follow – as much as possible – a chronological order in this chapter, but as one will see, after the discussion of the Re Argoud case, one older case of the civil law context will be

Antoine Argoud was an ex-colonel in the French Army who had been sentenced to death in absentia by the French High Military Court on 11 July 1961 for illegal political activities.[372] As the convicted Argoud continued his activities, a new investigation was opened "for conspiracy against the authority of the State and complicity, by provocation and by giving instructions, in attempts against that authority."[373] In the context of this investigation, an arrest warrant was issued on 9 December 1961. However, Argoud could not be apprehended.[374]

> Then, on 26 February 1963, the police, alerted by an anonymous telephone call, discovered Argoud in a motor-van parked on Quai de l'Archevêché, Paris. His face was swollen and his hands were handcuffed. According to his statements – which the judgment under appeal appears to find correct – he had been abducted during the course of the previous night, by some unidentified persons,[[375]] from a hotel in Munich, the city where he was living under a false name, and transported by force into France.[376]

Argoud was subsequently brought before the Court of State Security where he argued that the Court was without jurisdiction because of his male captus.[377] The Court, however, rejected his arguments; in an incidental decision of 28 December 1963, the Court of State Security found that it had jurisdiction for a number of reasons, one of them being that Argoud "lacks the right or capacity to plead in judicial proceedings a violation of international law, a fortiori when the State addressed. The reason for the fact that Re Argoud is mentioned already now is that the In re Jolis and Re Argoud cases are often mentioned together in (legal) comparisons.

---

[372] See Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 90 (summary) and p. 98 (Report of M. le Conseiller Comte). Argoud was member of the OAS (Organisation de l'Armée Secrète), an insurrectional movement which tried to prevent the independence of Algeria and, in this context, attempted to assassinate, for example, the French President Charles De Gaulle.

[373] Ibid.

[374] See ibid.

[375] Wilske and Schiller explain that "there was no evidence that the French government participated in the abduction." (Wilske and Schiller 1998, p. 227.) That may be the case, but there are, nevertheless, also signs that French officials might have been involved in the operation. For example, Lucchini (1964, p. 190), writes first that "le Procureur général de Munich a, dès le mois de mars, rendu publics les noms de cinq Français soupçonnés d'être les auteurs de l'enlèvement [emphasis in original, ChP]." Then, he turns to a letter written by Argoud himself, addressed to Chancellor Erhard: "[L]'enquête menée avec beaucoup de zèle dès ses premiers jours par les services fédéraux, a permis de préciser l'identité et les adresses de mes agresseurs. Des renseignements recueillis par la suite ont confirmé la participation à l'opération des services de la sécurité militaire française de Baden et de Strasbourg". (Ibid.) See also Doehring 1965, pp. 209-210. See further De Schutter 1965, p. 101: "[T]he German authorities officially mentioned the name of Bernard Germès as the leader of the kidnapping. According to some papers the man in question was a member of the French Security Service. The intervention of the so-called "barbouzes" [French special intelligence agents used in the fight against the OAS, see n. 372, ChP] has also been mentioned, whereas Argoud, in his message to Chancellor Erhard, cites the French military security service of Baden and Strasbourg as co-responsible [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[376] Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 98 (Report of M. le Conseiller Comte).

[377] See ibid., p. 90 (summary).

concerned [this is the Federal Republic of Germany, ChP] makes no claim [emphasis in original, ChP]."[378] On 30 December 1963, the Court of State Security sentenced Argoud to life imprisonment "for the direction and organization of an insurrectional movement, conspiracy against the authority of the State and complicity in attempts against that authority."[379] Argoud appealed his case so the French Cour de Cassation ultimately had to consider the matter.[380]

The French Supreme Court agreed with the above-mentioned finding of the Court of State Security, stressing that > [i]n the circumstances, on the plane of international law Argoud is still less well-founded in complaining since he was living in Germany under a false name. The right of asylum pleaded by him is debatable, and 'formal assurance has been given [today] by the Ministère public that the Minister for Foreign Affairs has received no note from the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany asking for the return to the German authorities of ex-Colonel Argoud, although he has been detained in France for more than ten months [emphasis in original, ChP].'[381]

However, the italicised quotation to which the Supreme Court refers (these are the words of the Court of State Security from its incidental decision of 28 December

---

[378] Ibid., p. 94.

[379] Ibid., p. 91. It is recalled that Argoud was a member of the OAS, see n. 372.

[380] It must be remarked that in one of the submissions of Argoud, the latter explains the (in his eyes incorrect) male captus bene detentus view of the Court of State Security as follows: "The final ground [of the Court of State Security, ChP] was that the capture of a citizen abroad did not deprive the courts of his country of the right and competence to judge him." (Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 95.) It can be argued that these words from Argoud, explaining the reasoning of the Court of State Security, have, however, been incorrectly presented by the ICTY Trial Chamber's decision in Nikolić (see Subsection 3.1.4 of the following chapter) as the words of the Supreme Court itself, see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 91: "In re Argoud, (…) the Court (…) held that "[l]a capture à l'étranger d'un citoyen ne priverait pas les tribunaux de son pays du droit et de la compétence de le juger [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[381] Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 94. Lucchini (1964, pp. 190-191) explains that there had been some demands for clarification from the Government and protests from the Parliament but no formal (written) protests and demands for the return of Argoud from the Government: "En dépit de quelques timides demandes d'explications, le Gouvernement allemand n'a pas présenté aux autorités françaises de demande de restitution d'Antoine Argoud. Pourtant le Procureur général de Munich a, dès le mois de mars, rendu publics les noms de cinq Français soupçonnés d'être les auteurs de l'enlèvement. Plus tard, le Parlement allemand a exprimé le 6 novembre 1963, la volonté qu'Argoud soit restitué aux autorités allemandes. Cette résolution adoptée à l'unanimité a été renvoyée à la Commission des Affaires étrangères et à celle de l'Intérieur. Mais cette manisfestation de volonté était tempérée par la déclaration faite le 18 novembre par le Ministre ouest allemand de la Justice, selon laquelle, si Argoud était renvoyé en Allemagne, "La République aurait à le rendre à la France" (Le Monde, 24 nov. 1963). (…) Au cours du procès, s'est produit un événement d'importance, qui menaçait de ruiner la thèse française. Le Gouvernement allemand s'était-il décidé à faire une demande officielle de restitution? La demande avait bien été formulée, mais verbalement et non pas selon la procédure diplomatique classique, qui aurait exigé la remise d'une note écrite du Ministère des Affaires étrangères allemand acheminée au Quai d'Orsay par les soins de l'ambassadeur de France à Bonn, M. de Margerie [emphasis in orginal, ChP]."

1963), were attacked by the Defence in a hearing of 30 December 1963 (the day the Court of State Security sentenced Argoud to life imprisonment); it argued that "evidence [would be] given today of official representations made by the Government of the Federal Republic contrary to the statements of the Minister of Foreign Affairs".[382] Nevertheless, these submissions were rejected by the Court of State Security. Although the Supreme Court did not agree with the reasons as to why the Court of State Security rejected these submissions,[383] this would not help Argoud in his appeal

> since, in their previous decision, the judges fundamentally based themselves in justifying the regularity of the submission of the case to them, on other grounds (…) and which, in any case, would retain their validity even if the Court had decided to withdraw all or part of its first statements on the issue of fact in dispute.[384]

Hence, this means that the Supreme Court was of the opinion that, even if it could be established that the Germans had officially protested the abduction and requested the return of Argoud, this would not have helped Argoud.[385]

Although this point is not clearly[386] addressed in the text of the decision itself, the report of rapporteur Comte[387] does examine it in more detail.

---

[382] Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 94. De Schutter (1965, p. 90, n. 7) notes that on 30 December 1963, the German Government brought the matter to the attention of the French Government via a written note. On p. 106 of his article, he clarifies that this note contained a request for restitution and on p. 107, he writes about "Germany's request for returning Argoud". See also Doehring 1965, p. 210, who remarks that the note consisted of a request to Rückführung (return). The French Government, however, refused: "[D]e Gaulle has clearly implied that handing back the accused has never been considered". (De Schutter 1965, p. 102.) "This is shown in the answer to the note of Bonn, December 30 and received in Paris on December 31, the day after the conviction of Argoud." (Ibid., p. 102, n. 61.)

[383] See Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), pp. 94-95: "It was not correct for the judges, in rejecting those submissions, to declare that their preceding decisions 'could not be revoked, since the State Security Court is not an appellate jurisdiction in respect of its own decisions. A supervening new fact cannot be examined by the criminal jurisdiction which rendered the decision complained of, and it is only capable, under Article 622 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, of permitting an action for revision'. In fact, the Security Court was not bound by the considerations of pure fact which were given in the decision rendered previously. It retained full power until the hearings had been terminated to revise, in the light of such new information as might be produced, its statements of the material circumstances in question, which, moreover, did not imply any finding on the existence of the elements of the offence in law or as to the guilt of the accused. Secondly, the reference made in the judgment to Article 622 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and to the possible institution of a later action for revision, was clearly without any bearing on the question at issue."

[384] Ibid., p. 95.

[385] See also US Supreme Court: Brief of the Government of Canada as Amicus Curiae in Support of Respondent in United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 4 March 1992, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 925: "French courts also subscribe to the principle that official transborder abductions must be judicially rectified. (...) But see Re Argoud (...)."

[386] Nevertheless, the Supreme Court did argue that "whatever be the decision which the Court will be led to pronounce with regard to Argoud, such as deprivation of liberty, that sentence could not be an obstacle to a future agreement between the Governments concerned on the fate of the accused." (Court

However, before going into that issue, it is appropriate to first consider the Supreme Court's explicit considerations with respect to the rejection of Argoud's male captus claim.

The Supreme Court looked at Argoud's complaint from two perspectives, one focusing on international law and one focusing on domestic French law.[388] With respect to international law, the Court observed that > the State which is entitled to complain of damage suffered by one of its nationals or protected persons in violation of its territorial sovereignty exercises its own right when it claims reparation. Individuals have no capacity to plead in judicial proceedings a contravention of international law. The putting in issue of international responsibilities concerns only relations between State and State, without individuals being entitled to intervene.[389]

Hence, Argoud could not complain about a possible violation of the sovereignty of the Federal Republic of Germany.

This stance was defended earlier (see Eichmann)[390] and later (see Noriega)[391] but was not accepted, see also the next chapter, in the context of the international criminal tribunals.[392]

However, with respect to internal law, the Court found that the domestic law violations involved in the male captus of Argoud[393] may indeed have consequences.[394] Nevertheless, "[s]uch an irregularity (…) is not of such a character as of itself to involve the nullity of the prosecution."[395] It hereby also referred to the

---

of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 95.) This means that States may agree whatever they would like to agree with respect to the fate of Argoud, but it also implies that the Court can do its task without having to look at protests from foreign States; this is something those foreign States should solve with the Executive of the State under whose jurisdiction this court operates, see also ibid.: "The putting in issue of international responsibilities concerns only relations between State and State".

[387] This is the man who made the remark that male captus bene detentus "is certainly not from Virgil", see n. 7 and accompanying text of Chapter II.

[388] See also Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 102 (Report of M. le Conseiller Comte).

[389] Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 96.

[390] See n. 178 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[391] See n. 207 of this chapter.

[392] See n. 178 of Chapter III.

[393] The Court noted that "[t]he acts of force of which the accused complains and which consisted in seizing his person and taking him, under constraint, across the frontier, are characterized as a violation of Article 124 of the Code of Criminal Procedure concerning the execution of warrants of the investigating magistrate." (Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 97.)

[394] See ibid.: "Such an irregularity, which is penalized by Article 136 (…) engages the responsibility – even the criminal responsibility – of those who have committed it".

[395] Ibid. In addition, "none of the other provisions of that Code, which provide for the nullity of investigatory proceedings pursued in violation of the requirements which it decrees, is applicable to this case." (Ibid.) M. le Conseiller Comte also emphasises that the irregularity involved here cannot lead to a male detentus and then states rather sweepingly about the penal prosecution that it is "always possible in fact that the proceedings themselves (in court) were not seriously hampered by the male captus, thus paying tribute to the restricted notion of a fair trial.[396] As a result of these considerations, Argoud's appeal was dismissed.

It is now worth returning to the report of rapporteur Comte and the kind of effect a protest from the Federal Republic of Germany would have had.

In his report, in which it is made clear, incidentally, that the French judges also referred to male captus bene detentus case law such as Scott,[397] R. v. Nelson and Brand,[398] Elliott[399] and Eichmann,[400] Comte explains that that would also have been irrelevant:

> [T]he Court of State Security, when the defence asked it to recognise the existence of the alleged official communications of the German Government regarding the Argoud case (…) could have limited itself to replying in the following terms: 'Perhaps, but that changes nothing in the problem. For that would involve a purely diplomatic act which concerns the French Government and which is for it, and it alone, to envisage the consequences. The Court is here to judge a man, and for nothing but that, in accordance with the rules of French criminal law, which the protests of a foreign Government can neither change nor sway. The difference which has arisen between the two States arose outside our competence; it will be settled without our intervention. It cannot require, directly or indirectly, our decision any more than our responsibility.'[401]

This indeed confirms more clearly what the Supreme Court appears to argue when it states that "[t]he putting in issue of international responsibilities concerns only relations between State and State"; perhaps a foreign State can complain, but it is not up to the court now trying the case to consider these international issues.[402] (However, the other side of the coin is also accepted by the Court: if the two Governments/Executives want to make an agreement on the fate of Argoud, the Court can do nothing about that either.)[403]

---

the case of acts of violence, infringements of liberty or abuse of authority…." (Ibid., p. 104 (Report of M. le Conseiller Comte).)

[396] See Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 98: "[T]he circumstances in which an accused person who is the subject of a lawful prosecution (…) has been apprehended on a lawful warrant for arrest and handed over to justice, even if they constituted an infringement of the criminal law or the traditional principles of our law, are not of a character – however deplorable they may appear – to entail of themselves the nullity of the prosecution. For the investigation and the establishment of the truth are not fundamentally vitiated, nor is the defence placed in a position in which it is impossible for it to exercise its rights before the jurisdictions of investigation and judgment."

[397] See Subsection 1.1 of this chapter.

[398] See n. 3 of this chapter.

[399] See Subsection 1.1 of this chapter.

[400] See Subsection 3.1 of this chapter.

[401] Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 104 (Report of M. le Conseiller Comte).

[402] See also De Sanctis 2004, p. 537.

[403] See n. 386.

This stance, that the Court can continue its case even if the Federal Republic of Germany had made an official protest and request for the return of Argoud, is reminiscent of the Alvarez-Machain case and arguably represents the position of the old-fashioned and 'provincial' court which does not want to be involved in international law issues, even if it profits from the origin of these problems.

It is submitted that a court, as a part of one of the many States which form the international community, should take up its responsibility as one of the many guardians of the fragile international legal order based on the equality of States and should indeed take into account international law.[404]

This also means that a court, if 1) it is clear that the prosecuting State has violated another State's sovereignty and thus international law,[405] 2) the injured State has protested and requested the return of the suspect[406] and 3) the Executive of the prosecuting State has not done what it should have done (namely return the suspect to the injured State),[407] should refuse jurisdiction and order the return of the [404] These international law elements, of course, also include international human rights law but that concept, important as it is, has nothing to do with the concept under discussion here: the equality of States. (Note, by the way, that the concept of human rights law had not yet been developed to such an extent that it could play a role in Re Argoud.) See on the role of domestic courts as guardians of the international legal order Michell 1996, pp. 386-387. (See also n. 560 and accompanying text of Chapter III.)

[405] Note that this is not clear in this case given the fact that it was uncertain whether the kidnapping could be attributed to France, see n. 375.

[406] Although in this case, this only happened after the case was decided by the Court of State Security (see n. 382), the Supreme Court was arguably of the opinion that even if it could be established that the Germans had officially protested the abduction and requested the return of Argoud, this would not have helped Argoud either.

[407] There is another old and famous case from the civil law context which should be mentioned here in that respect, but as it did not lead to a decision of a judicial body, it will not be addressed in the overview itself, but merely here, in this footnote. In this 1935 Jacob-Salomon case, "an ex-German citizen, Herr Jacob-Salomon, was kidnaped on Swiss territory and taken to Germany, where he was held for trial on a charge of treason." (Preuss 1936, p. 123.) In an article written one year earlier, Preuss gives a detailed account of the spectacular kidnapping: "According to the Swiss version of the case, Herr Jacob-Salomon, an ex-German political émigré, on March 9, 1935, came to Basel upon the invitation of one Dr. Hans Wesemann, a German national, who had gained his confidence through taking some of his articles for the English journals. At Basel, Jacob met Wesemann and another German national, who induced him to enter an automobile with them for the ostensible purpose of driving to the home of the latter at Riehen, Switzerland. As they approached the frontier at Petit-Huningue, the chauffeur, disregarding the order of the Swiss customs guards to stop, accelerated his speed to seventy kilometers per hour and dashed over the line into German territory. The barriers on the German side were open, although they were customarily closed before the hour (8:50 p.m.) at which the car crossed. Two hundred meters beyond the frontier, Jacob was arrested by German functionaries who had been awaiting his arrival [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Preuss 1935, p. 503.) The Swiss Government protested this alleged violation of its sovereignty, arguing "that German secret agents had participated in the seizure and that the police officers who made the arrest had been forewarned of the plan to kidnap Jacob [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Preuss 1936, p. 123.) Furthermore, the Swiss Government "demanded the immediate return of Jacob, the punishment of the guilty functionaries, and the taking of steps necessary to prevent the recurrence of like incidents." (Preuss 1935, p. 503.) However, the Germans refused to return the suspect, denying official complicity in the case. (See ibid., p. 504.) One could argue that this implies that the Germans were also of the opinion that they would have to return the suspect if they were officially involved in the kidnapping (see also the assumed rule derived from suspect.[408] One can assume (or, at least, hope) that such a harsh consequence may perhaps make the government in question think twice before it tries to undermine the fragile international legal order again.

In that respect, the (genuinely provincial!) Court in In re Jolis, a 'mere' court of first instance in a small commune of Avesnes in northern France, has arguably acted less provincially than the metropolitan Supreme Court of France.[409]

However, it must not be forgotten that, perhaps also here, the seriousness of Argoud's charges (even if this point is not mentioned by the Supreme Court) may

---

Chapter III that the 'abducting' State (if not the Executive then the Judiciary) must return the abducted person to the injured State if that State protests and requests the return of the suspect). The Swiss Government subsequently "re-affirmed its position and requested arbitration of the dispute". (Preuss 1935, p. 504.) Germany agreed with the request of the Swiss to have the case arbitrated (See Preuss 1936, p. 123), as a result of which an arbitral tribunal was established, consisting of two national judges and three neutral judges. (See ibid.) Its mandate was to establish the exact circumstances of Jacob's male captus and to determine whether the territorial sovereignty of Switzerland had indeed been violated by Germany. (See ibid.) If so, then it could also address the question of reparation. (See ibid.) However, when the proceedings began and Germany had received the (probably irrefutable) mémoire of the Swiss, it started to get anxious about the whole undertaking. (See ibid.) In any case, it proposed to abandon the arbitral procedure and to settle the case among the two States themselves. (See ibid.) On 18 September 1935, the Swiss issued a communiqué whose last words read that the mémoires of the Swiss and the German Governments "have established the regrettable fact that a German functionary has acted in an inadmissible manner in this case, for which he was punished disciplinary some time ago. In these circumstances the two Governments are in accord in terminating the arbitral procedure by an agreement. Jacob has been surrendered to Swiss authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Preuss 1936, pp. 123-124.) It must be stressed that the "German functionary" referred to above was not one of the actual kidnappers; Preuss notes that, because Germany apparently refused to acknowledge that the actual kidnappers where German agents, "[t]he agreement may be construed only as an admission of responsibility for acts of complicity by State agents within their own territory in illegal seizures by private individuals on foreign soil." (Ibid., p. 124.)

[408] Cf. also (the more general) statement of Shen 1994, p. 45: "This article advises that all domestic courts, being a part of the government of the State, should take judicial notice of and give effect to the rules and principles of both customary and conventional international law, and should refrain from exercising jurisdiction over individuals seized or abducted by means in violation of international law." See also ibid., pp. 83-84.

[409] It may be interesting to note that Morgenstern (1953, p. 267) submitted that the In re Jolis case "is the only attitude consonant both with the requirements of international law and with the principles of the municipal law of most states regarding the enforcement of international law in municipal courts." See also ibid., p. 279: "Principle demands that municipal courts should decline to exercise jurisdiction over persons or property which have been seized in violation of international law. In acting thus the courts would enforce the rule of international law prohibiting the seizure, and give effect to the general jurisprudential maxim ex injuria jus non oritur." See further Garcia-Mora 1957, pp. 447-448. See also the criticism of Kiss (1965, pp. 937-938) towards the Argoud case: "Les vues qu'exprime cet arrêt semblent être contraires à la pratique française qui a toujours nié la validité des arrestations opérées en territoire étranger, même en l'absence de toute protestation émanant de l'Etat dont la compétence territoriale a été lésée. Elle sont aussi contraires à la conception de la supériorité du droit international sur le droit interne, conception pourtant affirmée par la Constitution de 1958 – à moins d'admettre que le droit international ne contient que des règles conventionnelles. Une infraction aux règles du droit international public existe indépendamment de la qualité de celui qui la dénonce – ou ne la dénonce pas. La circonstance qu'elle ne sera peut-être pas sanctionnée ou qu'aucune réclamation n'en naîtra sur le plan international est indifférente à ce point de vue. La violation du droit est là et il est curieux de vouloir prétendre fonder une situation de droit sur l'infraction à une règle [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

have played a role; it should be remembered that Pierre Jolis was only suspected of having stolen 2200 francs whereas an investigation was opened against Argoud "for conspiracy against the authority of the State and complicity, by provocation and by giving instructions, in attempts against that authority." This point is also reflected in the following words of Comte, where he, arguably in contrast to his earlier observation that international law problems will be settled without the intervention of the judges, asserts that courts must recognise the sovereignty of States:

> Rarely – perhaps never – has a problem more difficult, more complex, more disturbing, been put before the conscience of the judiciary. Account must be taken of the need for repression which the exceptional gravity of the crimes makes in the highest degree imperative; the maintenance of the principles sanctifying the rights of the human person and the liberty of the individual, of which the courts are the guardians and the guarantors, must be safeguarded; the sovereignty of States must be recognized and the nature and the limits of the sanctions which it postulates must be made explicit. Above all, it is necessary (…) to preserve the independence and the dignity of French justice [emphasis in original, ChP].[410]

Wilske and Schiller also argue that there is another difference discernible, namely the fact that in In re Jolis, French officials undoubtedly played a role in the male captus, whereas this was not clear in the case of Argoud.[411]

> While it might be argued that Argoud stands for the proposition that a defendant cannot point to the circumstances of his apprehension to defend against the exercise of jurisdiction unless the State from which he was abducted makes an objection, it has not been interpreted that way. French legal authorities cite Argoud primarily as an example of a case in which jurisdiction was exercised over a defendant who was abducted by private parties and hold that the rule pronounced in Jolis regarding abductions by agents of the state is good law in France. This would mean that no jurisdiction may be exercised over a person abducted from abroad [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP].[412]

However, one can doubt whether this is in fact true (besides the fact, of course, that it was indeed not very clear whether French agents were involved in the male captus, which was obviously the case in In re Jolis). After all, the Supreme Court argued that international law issues are the concern of States. Hence, even if there were a clear-cut violation of international law (for example, because it was established without a doubt that Argoud's kidnappers were indeed agents of France, acting in that capacity,[413] and violating the sovereignty of the Federal Republic of

---

[410] Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 107 (Report of M. le Conseiller Comte).
[411] See ns. 375 and 405.
[412] Wilske and Schiller 1998, p. 227.
[413] As already explained earlier (see n. 485 of Chapter III), only conduct of agents acting in that capacity shall be considered an act of State which may lead to State responsibility. See also the following words of the Court of State Security: "Attendu (...) que les ravisseurs d'Argoud seraient-ils Germany), this would, according to the Supreme Court, have to be resolved by the Governments of the two States involved.[414] Argoud cannot intervene in this and the same goes for the Court, which should only be concerned with applying French law.[415] In fact, as was explained a few moments ago, it appears to be the opinion of the Supreme Court that even if the Federal Republic of Germany had made a formal protest, this would not have changed the matter either; it would be up to the French Executive (and not the French Judiciary) to solve the international law problem.

Another older case from the civil law context which should be mentioned here is the case Fiscal v. Samper, decided by the Spanish Supreme Court in 1934.[416] Although this case appears to be a normal rule of speciality decision in the context of extradition (comparable with the already-mentioned (see Subsection 1.1 of this chapter) Rauscher case), the Supreme Court's reasoning seems to go a little further than merely holding that Samper's conviction had to be overturned because he was tried for offences other than those for which extradition was sought.

---

des ressortissants français ou même, comme l'accusé le soutient, des agents soumis à l'autorité de l'Etat français, ce ne sont pas leurs actes mais seulement le fait que les organes étatiques n'auraient pas dans ce cas fonctionné conformément au droit des gens qui entraînerait la responsabilité de cet Etat". (Lucchini 1964, p. 191.) Nevertheless, as was also explained in Chapter III of this book, acts of private individuals can lead to the responsibility of a State as well. According to De Schutter (1965, pp. 101-102), that was the case here: "[E]ven if the intervention of agents of the State or officers or nationals acting on order or with permission of their government is not fully evident, there is not the slightest doubt about the responsibility of the French Government. The conduct of these individuals is approved by the French authorities, no attempt has been made to find the culprits or to grant reparation. Moreover, de Gaulle has clearly implied that handing back the accused has never been considered, which is a public and manifest approval of the breach; and for its part the Court evades the question. France thereby assumed full responsibility towards Germany for the kidnapping of Antoine Argoud [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[414] See Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 97: "[E]ven accepting that Argoud had been abducted on the territory of the Federal Republic of Germany in violation of the rights of that country and of its sovereignty [which would be the case if French agents had been involved in the operation, ChP], it would be for the Government of the injured State alone to complain and demand reparation."

[415] Cf. in that respect Lucchini (1964, p. 192), commenting on the 28 December decision of the Court of State Security (which, like the Supreme Court, was also of the opinion that international law issues had to be resolved at the level of States): "Ainsi la Cour fonde essentiellement son raisonnement sur le fait que si toute mesure de contrainte d'un Etat sur le territoire d'un autre Etat présente un caractère d'illicéite, c'est à l'Etat victime de cette mesure d'apprécier en toute liberté s'il doit ou non présenter une réclamation. Autrement dit, l'enlèvement d'Argoud, même s'il a été accompli par des agents des services secrets français, constitue une violation de la souveraineté territoriale de la République fédérale, mais l'absence par l'Allemagne de toute plainte ou de toute demande officielle de restitution ôte toute qualité à un individu pour faire valoir ce manquement à une règle du droit de gens [emphasis in original, ChP]." See also Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), p. 102 (Report of M. le Conseiller Comte): "Following the defence up to a point and accepting for the purposes of discussion that Argoud had been abducted by French agents, the situation would remain the same. The responsibility of the French State could then be examined, but only at the request of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, in the name of a nation whose sovereignty had been infringed and which was entitled to plead the violation of a traditional principle governing relations between States."

[416] Supreme Court, Fiscal v. Samper, 22 June 1934, Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, Vol. 9 (1938-1940), Case No. 152, pp. 402-405.

In this case, Samper, the manager of the Federación Catòlica Agraria, a Madrid company in financial problems, > drew eleven bills of exchange for a total of 327,635 pesetas payable to the Federation, with forged signatures and acceptances of persons who owed nothing to the Federation. He deposited them in the bank account of the Federation and entered them as assets in its books in order to make it appear in good financial condition so that he might continue as its manager.[417]

Samper subsequently fled to Portugal where he was detained. When Spain requested his extradition for falsification of bills of exchange, Portugal refused, but when Spain asked for his extradition for falsification of a private document as a mean of swindling, extradition was granted.[418] In Spain, "Samper was tried and found guilty by a Spanish Court in 1933 for the crime of falsification of a mercantile document which did not cause property loss to anyone and sentenced to imprisonment for two years."[419] Samper appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing, among other things, "that he had been convicted of a crime different from that for which he had been extradited."[420] The Supreme Court agreed with this point and discharged Samper, reasoning that

> [t]his is so because delinquents who take refuge in a foreign country relying on a legislation which promises them protection have acquired a true right, disregard of which would tend to weaken the law of nations and to introduce lack of confidence into international relations.[421]

Selleck notes that this reasoning "rejects the traditional Anglo-American rule that jurisdiction is not impaired by the circumstances attending a defendant's arrest and capture on foreign territory."[422] Furthermore, "the court discarded the idea that individuals cannot plead a right of asylum or protection under an extradition treaty [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[423] It should be remembered that this 'right of asylum' was also asserted by Ker in Ker v. Illinois, but was found to be absurd by the US Supreme Court.[424]

The final decision which should be mentioned here is that of the Zurich Higher Court (Obergericht) of 11 April 1967 described by Wilske.[425] In this case, a Swiss businessman who was suspected of forgery of documents and who was living abroad was lured by private individuals into Switzerland where he was subsequently

[417] Ibid., p. 403.
[418] See ibid.
[419] Ibid.
[420] Ibid.
[421] Ibid., p. 405.
[422] Selleck 1985, p. 259.
[423] Ibid.
[424] See ns. 28-30.
[425] See Wilske 2000, pp. 323-324. See also Wilske and Schiller 1998, p. 228.

arrested by the (in the meantime informed) Swiss authorities.[426] The Obergericht, following the opinion of Professor Hans Schultz,[427] refused to exercise jurisdiction over the person, finding "that the defendant's apprehension violated national due process and principles of extradition law under which apprehension of a person by means of force or ruse was prohibited."[428] The Court found a limited form of cooperation by the Swiss authorities already enough to attribute the conduct of the private individuals to the State of Switzerland: "Ausreichend sei bereits, wenn die Strafverfolgungsorgane von dem Vorgehen der Privatpersonen Kenntnis gehabt und die so geschaffene Gelegenheit, den Angeklagten zu verhaften, ausgenützt hätten [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[429] It is, therefore, already enough if the

[426] See Wilske 2000, p. 323.
[427] See Schultz 1967.
[428] Wilske and Schiller 1998, p. 228. See also Wilske 2000, p. 323: "[D]er Zugriff auf eine Person [kann] nur statthaft sein (…), wenn dieser sich aus völlig freien, nicht durch Drohung oder List beeinflusstem Willen in den Bereich der hiesigen Gerichtsgewalt begeben hat." (Referring to "Zürcher Obergericht, II. Strafkammer, App., 11 April 1967, Blätter für Zürcherische Rechtsprechung 65 (1967), Nr. 119, 248, 250.") It may be interesting to note that Schultz, who defends the idea that judges cannot continue to exercise jurisdiction in the case of a serious male captus case violating international law (see Schultz 1967, p. 81: "Daraus folgt, daß die schweizerischen Gerichte eine Verletzung grundlegender Regeln des Völkergewohnheitsrechtes, wie das Gebot, Eingriffe in die Gebietshoheit eines fremden Staates durch Behörden zu unterlassen, berücksichtigen und diesen Grundsätzen widersprechende Handlungen schweizerischer Behörden als rechtswidrig betrachten müssen. Infolgedessen kann der Angeschuldigte in dem gegen ihn eingeleiteten Verfahren eine das allgemeine Völkerrecht verletzende Prozeßhandlung rügen und das gericht hat von Amtes wegen zu prüfen, ob ein solcher Mangel vorliegt. Gilt das allgemeine Völkerrecht als Teil der eigenen Rechtsordung, so ist damit unvereinbar, wenn ein in krasser Verletzung dieser Regeln begründetes Strafverfahren unbekümmert um diesen Mangel weitergeführt wird.") and who defends the ex iniuria ius non oritur rule (see ibid., p. 83: "Gerade wenn der Staat Recht sprechen und demjenigen Strafe auferlegen will, der gegen das Recht verstieß, so muß er sich davor hüten, daß seinem Verfahren Unrecht anhafte. Nicht der Grundsatz, daß auf welche Weise auch immer jeder möglicherweise Schuldige zur Rechenschaft gezogen werden kann, ist die oberste Maxime wirklicher Strafrechtspflege, sondern der richtige Leitsatz lautet, daß die strafrechtliche Verantwortung nur den Grundsätzen des Rechts folgend geltend gemacht werden soll. Ex iniuria ius non oritur. Dies ist so wahr, daß, welche Ziele der Strafrechtspflege auch gesetzt werden, eine nicht selber streng das Recht achtende Strafjustiz diese Ziele nie erreichen wird.") wondered whether another rule would be applicable in the context of more serious suspects such as perpetrators of crimes against humanity. However, unfortunately, he did not find this necessary to examine in further detail as this case did not deal with such a suspect, see ibid., p. 82: "Ob für die Urheber von Verbrechen gegen die Menschheit andere Regelen zu gelten haben, welche sich aus der völkerrechtlichen Eigenart dieser Straftaten ableiten, kann unerörtert bleiben, weil es such hier einzig um die Verfolgung gewöhnlicher Straftaten handelt." However, in his article from 1984 (in which he comments on the still-to-discuss, see Subsection 2.2, 1982 decision of the Swiss Federal Court in the case of X), Schultz does make a general statement against male captus methods in which he mentions the fact that the suspects against whom such methods are used may be charged with serious crimes, see Schultz 1984, pp. 110-111: "Vorkommnisse, wie sie sich in dem hier geschilderten Auslieferungsfall abspielten, sind nicht nur eines Staates, der sich als Rechtsstaat ausgibt, unwürdig. Sie sind außerdem überaus bedauerlich, weil sie allen denen Auftrieb geben, die der zwischenstaatlichen Rechtshilfe jeder Art mit Mißtrauen begegnen und überall Mißbrauch wittern. Der kurzfristige Vorteil, einmal einen ins Ausland entwischten Angeschuldigten, der schwerer Delikte bezichtigt wird, auf eine solche Weise zur Strecke zu bringen, wiegt die dadurch hervorgerufene, lange nachwirkende Erschütterung des Vertrauens in dieses wichtige Mittel zwischenstaatlicher Zusammenarbeit nie auf [original footnote omitted, ChP]."
[429] Wilske 2000, p. 324. See also Schultz 1967, pp. 72-73.

prosecuting authorities were aware of the conduct of the private individuals and had used the arising opportunity to arrest the accused. Because the Court already decided not to exercise jurisdiction in this case on the basis of domestic law[430] (which was, however, interpreted in light of international law),[431] it did not have to look at the 'real' international law dimension of this case.[432]

2.2 More recent cases

The first more recent male captus case from the civil law context which should be mentioned here is the Dutch Menten case from 1977. In 1976, the media in the Netherlands reported on the role allegedly played by Pieter Menten, a Dutch national, in the execution of a number of Jewish citizens in 1941 in what was then a Polish region.[433] However, the day before the Public Prosecutor wished to start criminal proceedings, Menten fled to Switzerland.[434] On 6 December 1976, Menten was arrested by the Swiss authorities and a little more than two weeks later, he was handed over to the Netherlands where he was charged with a war crime and/or a crime against humanity before the Extraordinary Penal Chamber of the District Court of Amsterdam.[435]

Counsel for Menten, referring to an article written by Orie (who is now, among other things, a judge at the ICTY),[436] argued that the Swiss and Dutch Governments had acted unlawfully in bringing Menten to justice and that as a result, the legal proceedings now being conducted were unacceptable.[437] However, the District

---

[430] See Wilske 2000, p. 324: "Folge dessen sei ein so schwer wiegender Verstoß gegen grundlegende rechtsstaatlichen Regeln, daß die derart begründete Gerichtsgewalt als nicht bestehend angesehen werden müsse [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[431] See Wilske and Schiller 1998, p. 228.

[432] See Wilske 2000, p. 324. See also Schultz 1967, p. 85.

[433] See District Court of Amsterdam, Extraordinary Penal Chamber; Supreme Court; District Court of [T]he Hague, Extraordinary Penal Chamber; Supreme Court; District Court of Rotterdam, Extraordinary Penal Chamber; Supreme Court, Public Prosecutor v. Menten, 14 December 1977; 29 May 1978; 4 December 1978; 22 May 1979; 9 July 1980; 13 January 1981, International Law Reports, Vol. 75 (1987), pp. 331-332 (summary).

[434] See ibid., p. 332 (summary).

[435] See ibid. See also ibid.: "[T]hat on 7 July 1941, at Podhorodce, alone or together and in conjunction with one or more other persons, he intentionally and after calm consideration and quiet deliberation, in any case intentionally, took the life of at least one or more of approximately twenty or thirty, in any case a number of persons (…), all of whom belonged to the civilian population of this area, by shooting them dead or by shattering their skulls, or by burying them alive or at least having them buried by others after having fired at them or injured them otherwise. He was also charged with the murder of 125 to 200 persons, the majority of them of Jewish origin, at Urycz on 27 August 1941."

[436] See Orie 1978. See also Frowein 1994, p. 176: "When a Dutch national suspected of war-crimes during World War II was arrested in Switzerland in 1976, apparently the Netherlands Minister of Justice travelled to Bern. No formal request for extradition seems to have been presented to the Swiss authorities. The person concerned was subsequently expelled from Swiss territory and handed over to the Netherlands authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally Poort 1988, p. 71: "The case of the war criminal Pieter Menten (…) is a clear example of a disguised extradition."

[437] See District Court of Amsterdam, Extraordinary Penal Chamber, Public Prosecutor v. Menten, 14 December 1977, International Law Reports, Vol. 75 (1987), p. 343.

Court of Amsterdam was not of the opinion that a male captus had occurred. As a result, it was not necessary to determine the effect of the alleged male captus on the jurisdiction of the Court. In addition, it found that the present proceedings were not the appropriate place to discuss these matters:

> [T]he conclusion in Orie's opinion does not go beyond the view, formed after 'brief investigation', that the transfer of the accused from Switzerland to the Netherlands in December 1976 'was almost certainly accomplished illegally' because Switzerland had acted contrary to the operative rules of extradition and aliens law. A reservation is made as regards the possibility, doubted by the author, that the accused had been given an opportunity to 'orientate' himself towards another destination. Apart from this possibility, the Netherlands was alleged to have acted as an 'instigator of' or as an 'accomplice in' Switzerland's unlawful conduct. Subsequently the question is raised – but left unanswered – of whether the judge who is now considering the offences charged must draw the conclusion that the prosecution which is based, inter alia, on this unlawful conduct, should equally be regarded as unlawful, and if so to what decision such a conclusion should lead. However, the Court has not reached this question since it has not been established that the accused's transfer from Switzerland to the Netherlands was unlawful. Nor is it relevant to consider the question of unlawfulness within the limits of the present prosecution. This would require a procedure in which the State of the Netherlands was in a position to defend itself against the alleged unlawful conduct otherwise than through the Public Prosecutor, and in which it should above all be established whether Switzerland's conduct towards the accused was unlawful and, if so, whether the conduct of the Netherlands should also be qualified as unlawful.[438]

It must be said that it is a pity that the Court does not motivate its decision on these points. The Court, notwithstanding Orie's article, can, of course, be of the opinion that it has not been established that Menten's transfer to the Netherlands was unlawful, but on which basis does it found its conclusion?[439] Furthermore, it can be argued that the Court's motivation as to why the State, in these criminal proceedings and through the Public Prosecutor, cannot defend itself properly against the allegations of Menten, is also insufficient; cases discussed in this book show that both the Defence and the Prosecution could amply argue and defend their case with respect to alleged pre-trial irregularities, also in criminal cases in which the suspect (and not the alleged wrongdoing State) is the subject of the proceedings.

In the other Menten decisions following that of the District Court of Amsterdam,[440] the point of his male captus did not return.

However, when Menten went to Strasbourg after the Dutch courts had pronounced themselves on his case, he complained "about the conditions under which he was expelled from Switzerland and that the expulsion was in fact a

[438] Ibid.
[439] Cf. also the criticism of Orie (1978, pp. 154-157) in the 'Post Scriptum' of his article (written after the District Court had issued its decision).
[440] See n. 433.

disguised extradition which enabled the Swiss authorities to disregard a number of judicial safeguards."[441]

The ECmHR, however, declared his application inadmissible,[442] explaining that Menten > has failed to show that the above complaint has been submitted to the Netherlands courts in the context of the criminal proceedings instituted against him and in particular to claim the illegality of his arrest, and can therefore not be considered having exhausted the remedies available to him under Dutch law. Moreover, an examination of the case does not disclose the existence of any special circumstances which might have absolved the applicant, according to the generally recognised rules of international law, from exhausting the domestic remedies at this disposal.[443]

The second case to be discussed here also has a link with Switzerland. After the Swiss Federal Court (Bundesgericht) had arguably issued a male captus bene deditus decision in the Bozano case (see footnote 276 and accompanying text of Chapter III), namely that Bozano could indeed be extradited to Italy, notwithstanding his alleged male captus – a disguised extradition – from France to Switzerland,[444] the same Court in Switzerland issued a male captus male deditus decision two years later, in the case of X.[445] [441] Nederlandse Jurisprudentie 1982, 142, 'Europese Commissie voor de rechten van de mens, 11 december 1981, nr. 9433/81' under complaint 6. (The document available via the ECtHR's database Hudoc (available at: http://www.echr.coe.int/ECHR/EN/Header/Case-Law/HUDOC/HUDOC+database), see ECmHR (Plenary), X. v/The Netherlands, Application No. 9433/81, 'Decision of 11 December 1981 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 27, pp. 233-242) is incomplete and does not mention Menten's male captus submission.)

---

[442] See also Swart 2002 C, p. 1655, n. 48.

[443] Nederlandse Jurisprudentie 1982, 142, 'Europese Commissie voor de rechten van de mens, 11 december 1981, nr. 9433/81' under the European Commission's point 6.

[444] Nevertheless, the Swiss Court did not see it that way. It noted that the view that ex iniuria ius non oritur takes precedence over male captus bene detentus had indeed been defended in doctrine, but that this point was not relevant in this case as there had been no manifest violation of human rights in the first place, see Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, IIe Cour de droit public, arrêt du 13 juin 1980 dans la cause Lorenzo Bozano contre Ministère public de la Confédération (opposition à une demande d'extradition), BGE 106 (1980), p. 406: "L'opinion a (...) été soutenue en doctrine qu'en cas d'enlèvement illicite dans un pays pour livrer la personne enlevée à un Etat étranger, ou en cas de recours à la procédure d'expulsion pour éluder les règles d'extradition, le principe traditionnel "male captus bene judicatus" devrait le céder devant la maxime "ex injuria jus non oritur"; l'Etat de jugement serait dès lors tenu d'examiner l'illicéité de l'extradition intervenue au regard du droit étranger et du droit des gens (...) On peut se dispenser en l'espèce de se déterminer sur les problèmes ainsi posés. En effet, tant le Tribunal fédéral que les auteurs susmentionnés subordonnent l'éventuelle application des principes qu'ils évoquent aux cas où les circonstances dans lesquelles l'intéressé est traduit devant la justice de l'Etat poursuivant constituent une violation manifeste du droit des gens (...), ce qui n'est nullement démontré en l'occurrence. En outre, ainsi que cela sera examiné plus bas, l'expulsion à l'égard d'un Etat tiers ne devrait en soi pas être tenue en droit des gens pour un succédané illicite de l'extradition." Notwithstanding this, as was already explained in n. 273 and accompanying text of Chapter III, the ECtHR decided afterwards that Bozano had indeed been the victim of a disguised extradition, violating his human right to liberty and security.

[445] Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, P 1201/81/fs, Urteil der II. öffentlichrechtlichen Abteilung vom 15. Juli 1982, X, belgischer Staatsangehöriger, gegen Bundesanwaltschaft, Eidg. Justiz-

In this case, German officials tried to apprehend a Belgian national residing in Belgium, who was accused of fraud and forgery of documents.[446] However, because Belgium does not extradite its own nationals, an extradition request would not have led to any result.[447]

Hence, with help of a few telephone calls and under the pretext of arranging a business deal, a German agent lured X, who could not reckon that he was going to be arrested abroad,[448] from Belgium to Zurich, Switzerland, where he was arrested by the Swiss authorities.[449] Shortly afterwards, the Germans asked for his extradition.[450] The Swiss Federal Court, basing itself on international law,[451] refused, however, holding "that Germany had violated the territorial sovereignty of Belgium, and therefore, Switzerland would be an accessory after the fact if it approved Germany's extradition request."[452] Looking at the already in Chapter III

---

und Polizeidepartement, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 1983, pp. 435-438. See also Schultz 1984.

[446] See Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, P 1201/81/fs, Urteil der II. öffentlichrechtlichen Abteilung vom 15. Juli 1982, X, belgischer Staatsangehöriger, gegen Bundesanwaltschaft, Eidg. Justiz- und Polizeidepartement, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 1983, p. 435.

[447] See Wilske and Schiller 1998, p. 228, n. 118.

[448] See Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, P 1201/81/fs, Urteil der II. öffentlichrechtlichen Abteilung vom 15. Juli 1982, X, belgischer Staatsangehöriger, gegen Bundesanwaltschaft, Eidg. Justiz- und Polizeidepartement, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 1983, p. 437: "Dass der Einsprecher mit seiner Verhaftung im Ausland hätte rechnen müssen, ist auszuschliessen, wusste er doch nichts von dem gegen ihn erhobenen Strafverfahren in der Bundesrepublik under der Existenz des Haftbefehls vom …".

[449] See ibid., p. 435.

[450] See ibid.

[451] See Wilske 2000, p. 326: "Das Urteil des Schweizerischen Bundesgerichts vom 15. Juli 1982 argumentiert ausschließlich völkerrechtlich."

[452] Wilske and Schiller 1998, p. 228. See for the original text: Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, P 1201/81/fs, Urteil der II. öffentlichrechtlichen Abteilung vom 15. Juli 1982, X, belgischer Staatsangehöriger, gegen Bundesanwaltschaft, Eidg. Justiz- und Polizeidepartement, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 1983, p. 437: "Wird die verfolgte Person mittels der erwähnten Vorkehren in eines Drittstaat gelockt, von dem daraufhin die Auslieferung des Betreffenden verlangt wirde, trägt der ersuchte Staat mit der Auslieferung zum Erfolg, nämlich der Behändigung des Verfolgten under Missachtung der Souveränität, mindestens mittelbar bei. Der Grundsatz der Souveränität gilt indes absolut, d. h. gegen jedermann. Als Verletzung dieses Grundsatzes muss dehalb auch gelten, wenn der Staat, dessen Souveränität nicht verletzt wird, das völkerrechtswidrige Vorgehen dadurch begünstigt, dass er den Verfolgten ausliefert. Diesfall macht sich der ersuchte Staat zum Gehilfen der Souveränitätsverletzung. (…) Sinn und Geist der verschiedenen Abkommen verbieten dem ersuchten Staat daher, Personen auszuliefern, die unter Umgehung der allein massgebenden inner- und zwischenstaatlichen Auslieferungsbestimmungen und unter Verwendung völkerrechtswidriger Mittel ins Ausland gelockt wurden." It must be noted that the Swiss Federal Court was hence also of the (arguably rather far-reaching, see ns. 79-80 and 82 and accompanying text of Chapter III) opinion that Belgium's sovereignty had been violated by the telephone calls setting in motion the luring operation (an operation which did not involve police activities of foreign agents on the territory of Belgium in the strict sense), see ibid.: "Nach den Grundsätzen des Völkerrechts ist jeder Staat verpflichtet, die Souveränität anderer Staaten zu beachten; Handlungen eines Staates auf fremdem Staatsgebiet sind daher unzulässig. Soweit eine verfolgte Person sich im Ausland befindet, kann sie dem verfolgenden Staat nur mittels eines hoheitlichen Aktes des Staates, auf dessen Gebiet sie sich befindet, überstellt werden; werden Organen des verfolgenden Staates ohne Bewilligung auf dem Gebiet eines anderen Staates tätig, bemächtigen sie sich insbesondere des Verfolgten mittels Gewalt, List oder Drohung, verletzen sie die Souveränität (…). Nicht entscheidend ist, dass derjenige, der die Souveränität verletzt, sich auf dem Gebiet des discussed DARS, such a refusal could now, under certain circumstances, perhaps be founded on Article 16 ('Aid or assistance in the commission of an internationally wrongful act'), which stipulates:

> A State which aids or assists another State in the commission of an internationally wrongful act by the latter is internationally responsible for doing so if: (a) that State does so with knowledge of the circumstances of the internationally wrongful act; and (b) the act would be internationally wrongful if committed by that State.[453]

Wilske and Schiller note that Schultz, in his legal opinion for X,[454] "is of the opinion that this decision implicitly follows the principle ex iniuria ius non oritur and rejects the male captus, bene detentus principle [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[455]

This case is rather special as it seems to be the only case in this overview (until now) where a court connects the non-continuation of the case with a male captus not executed by the authorities of the court's own State.[456]

However, it must also be noted that the continuation of the case was not linked with a trial in Switzerland itself, but with proceedings to determine whether or not extradition had to be granted to a third State. One could argue that, if the interests of the Swiss had been stronger (for example, if they sought to prosecute this person themselves for alleged crimes committed in Switzerland), the result might have been different.

Nevertheless, one could also assert that the Swiss Court wished to send a signal on how to bring suspects to justice and that that signal not only applies if the court in question 'merely' has to decide on whether or not extradition should be granted, but that it applies a fortiori when that court seeks to prosecute the suspect itself.[457]

Before turning to the next case in this overview, the 1983 French case of Barbie, it may be appropriate to mention that in other, more recent Swiss alleged male betreffenden Staates betätigt; es genügt, dass sein Verhalten den Taterfolg im Ausland bewirkt [emphasis added, ChP]."

---

[453] See also n. 353 of Chapter III.

[454] See Schultz 1984.

[455] Wilske and Schiller 1998, p. 228. See also Schultz 1984, p. 105: "Mit seinem Urteil vom 15. Juli 1982 folgte das Bundesgericht, ohne es ausdrücklich zu sagen, dem Grundsatz ex iniuria ius non oritur und erteilte dem Grundsatze male captus bene deditus eine deutliche Absage [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[456] In the 1967 Swiss case, see the final case of Subsection 2.1, the Zurich Higher Court refused jurisdiction because of a male captus – a luring operation – executed by private individuals. As such, it seems to fall within the category of this 1982 case as well. However, in the 1967 case, the Court found that there had been some involvement of the Swiss authorities, although it must be admitted that the test regarding the level of cooperation between the authorities and the private individuals was very low: "Ausreichend sei bereits, wenn die Strafverfolgungsorgane von dem Vorgehen der Privatpersonen Kenntnis gehabt und die so geschaffene Gelegenheit, den Angeklagten zu verhaften, ausgenützt hätten [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (See also n. 429 and accompanying text.) Hence, the prosecuting authorities only had to be aware of the conduct of the private individuals so that they could use the arising opportunity to arrest the accused.

[457] In any case, Mann (1989, p. 415) is of the opinion that "[t]his is a decision expressive of an exemplary sense of international morality and respect for international law."

captus cases from 2000[458] and 2007,[459] the general 1982 reasoning[460] was upheld.[461] However, in both cases, the allegations by the victim of the alleged male captus were rejected.

In the 2000 case, in which the suspect claimed that he had been lured into Switzerland, it was stressed that the 1982 case and the present one were different in that in the first one, the Belgian suspect could not reckon that he was going to be arrested abroad[462] whereas the suspect of the 2000 case could. Notwithstanding this, the latter freely agreed to accompany the Swiss customs officers from German territory (where the customs office, at which the suspect's car was stopped, was located)[463] to Swiss territory to make a statement regarding the arrest of his female companion. Because of this, the Court held, he could not rightfully argue that he was lured into Switzerland.[464]

---

[458] See Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, 6P.64/2000/hev, Kassationshof in Strafsachen, 5. Dezember 2000, X. gegen Staatsanwaltschaft des Kantons Aargau, Obergericht des Kantons Argau, available at: http://www.polyreg.ch/d/informationen/bgeunpubliziert/Jahr_2000/Entscheide_6P_2000/6P.64__2000.html.

[459] See Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, T 0/2 1B_87/2007/fun, Urteil vom 22. Juni 2007, I. öffentlichrechtliche Abteilung, X. gegen Staatsanwaltschaft III des Kantons Zürich, Bezirksgericht Zürich, available at: http://jumpcgi.bger.ch/cgi-bin/JumpCGI?id=22.06.2007_1B_87/2007.

[460] "Nach den Grundsätzen des Völkerrechts ist jeder Staat verpflichtet, die Souveränität anderer Staaten zu beachten; Handlungen eines Staates auf fremdem Staatsgebiet sind daher unzulässig. Soweit eine verfolgte Person sich im Ausland befindet, kann sie dem verfolgenden Staat nur mittels eines hoheitlichen Aktes des Staates, auf dessen Gebiet sie sich befindet, überstellt werden; werden Organen des verfolgenden Staates ohne Bewilligung auf dem Gebiet eines anderen Staates tätig, bemächtigen sie sich insbesondere des Verfolgten mittels Gewalt, List oder Drohung, verletzen sie die Souveränität". See also n. 452.

[461] See Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, 6P.64/2000/hev, Kassationshof in Strafsachen, 5. Dezember 2000, X. gegen Staatsanwaltschaft des Kantons Aargau, Obergericht des Kantons Argau (available at: http://www.polyreg.ch/d/informationen/bgeunpubliziert/Jahr_2000/Entscheide_6P_2000/6P.64__2000.html), under (D) (3) (a) and Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, T 0/2 1B_87/2007/fun, Urteil vom 22. Juni 2007, I. öffentlichrechtliche Abteilung, X. gegen Staatsanwaltschaft III des Kantons Zürich, Bezirksgericht Zürich (available at: http://jumpcgi.bger.ch/cgi-bin/JumpCGI?id=22.06.2007_1B_87/2007) under (D) (2.5.1).

[462] See also n. 448 and accompanying text.

[463] See Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, 6P.64/2000/hev, Kassationshof in Strafsachen, 5. Dezember 2000, X. gegen Staatsanwaltschaft des Kantons Aargau, Obergericht des Kantons Argau (available at: http://www.polyreg.ch/d/informationen/bgeunpubliziert/Jahr_2000/Entscheide_6P_2000/6P.64__2000.html), under (A): "Das Zollamt [Stein/Bad Säckingen, ChP] befindet sich aufgrund des Abkommens zwischen der Schweizerischen Eidgenossenschaft und der Bundesrepublik Deutschland über die Errichtung nebeneinanderliegender Grenzabfertigungsstellen und die Grenzabfertigung in Verkehrsmitteln während der Fahrt vom 1. Juni 1961 (…) auf deutschem Gebiet".

[464] See ibid., under (D) (3) (a): "Daraus ergibt sich aber, dass auch dem guten Glauben dessen, der angeblich mit List ins Inland gelockt worden ist, entscheidende Bedeutung zukommt. Rechnete er mit einer möglichen Verhaftung, oder musste er damit rechnen, hat er selber auf den ihm zustehenden Schutz verzichtet und kann sich nicht mehr auf das Verhalten der Behörden berufen. So wurde die Einsprache im erwähnten Bundesgerichtsentscheid von 1982 nur geschützt, weil der Einsprecher nicht mit seiner Verhaftung rechnen konnte (BGE vom 15. Juli 1982, in EuGRZ 1983 S. 437 (…)). Nach den willkürfreien Feststellungen des Obergerichts wusste der Beschwerdeführer von der Durchsuchung

In the 2007 case, the suspect in question, a German citizen charged with investment fraud in Switzerland and other countries, was arrested on 9 August 2006 in his place of residence, Santo Domingo (Dominican Republic), and was brought to Switzerland by Swiss police officials on 19 August 2006.[465]

The suspect claimed that his case should be dismissed and that he should be released on the ground that he was abducted from Santo Domingo.[466] He hereby referred to a report of Professor Wohlers from the University of Zurich, who concluded that, on the basis of the present findings, it was uncertain whether or not the handing over of the suspect was unlawful[467] but that "[e]s spreche allerdings einiges dafür, dass die Überstellung als eine völkerrechtswidrige Entführung und die Inhaftierung damit als gegen Art. 5 Ziff. 1 Satz 2 EMRK verstossend einzustufen sei."[468]

Wohlers explained that the handing over had to be qualified as unlawful if the police authorities of the Dominican Republic, through actual conduct, had thwarted the regular extradition and deportation procedures and if the Swiss authorities had foreseen this and had exploited the resulting situation.[469] Nevertheless, according to him, if this were indeed established, it does not lead to an obstacle to exercise jurisdiction, but 'merely' to a release.[470] This point was already explained in Subsection 4.4 of Chapter III: according to human rights law, a violation of Article 5 of the ECHR leads to a release, but not necessarily to the ending of the case, although granting the released person the opportunity to leave the State (see footnote 470) may de facto lead to the ending of the case, see also footnote 615 of Chapter III. In addition, serious human rights violations can convince the judge that the male captus is so serious that jurisdiction must nonetheless be refused.

---

seines Mietwagens und musste demzufolge mit der Entdeckung des versteckten Geldes und auch der Verhaftung rechnen (…). Gleichwohl erklärte er sich freiwillig bereit, auf den Polizeiposten Stein mitzugehen, um eine Aussage zur Verhaftung seiner Begleiterin zu machen. Damit kann er nicht mehr vorbringen, mittels einer völkerrechtswidrigen List in die Schweiz gelockt worden zu sein."

[465] See Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, T 0/2 1B_87/2007/fun, Urteil vom 22. Juni 2007, I. öffentlichrechtliche Abteilung, X. gegen Staatsanwaltschaft III des Kantons Zürich, Bezirksgericht Zürich (available at: http://jumpcgi.bger.ch/cgi-bin/JumpCGI?id=22.06.2007_1B_87/2007), under (A).

[466] See ibid., under (D) (2.1).

[467] See ibid., under (D) (2.3).

[468] Ibid.

[469] See ibid.: "Unrechtmässig sei die Überstellung dann, wenn die Polizeibehörden der Dominikanischen Republik gehandelt hätten, um die Regelung des Auslieferungs- und Ausweisungsrechts durch faktisches Verhalten zu unterlaufen. Soweit das Verhalten der Polizeibehörden der Dominikanischen Republik die Voraussetzungen für ein völkerrechtliches Delikt begründe und dies für die Strafverfolgungsbehörden der Schweiz erkennbar gewesen sei, führe das Ausnutzen dieser Situation dazu, dass auch das Handeln der schweizerischen Behörden als völkerrechtswidrig und damit unrechtmässig im Sinne von Art. 5 Ziff. 1 Satz 2 EMRK einzustufen wäre."

[470] See ibid.: "Erweise sich die Überstellung als völkerrechtswidrige Entführung, bestehe nach Auffassung des Gutachters zwar kein Prozesshindernis, wohl aber ein Hafthinderungsgrund. Damit sei der Beschwerdeführer aus der Haft zu entlassen und sei ihm die Möglichkeit zu geben, die Schweiz zu verlassen. Soweit ihm dies mangels eigener finanzieller Ressourcen nicht möglich sein sollte, wäre er diesbezüglich zu unterstützen, da die Schweiz verpflichtet sei, einen von ihr mitverursachten rechtswidrigen Zustand zu beseitigen."

The Court noted that the Swiss authorities had asked the authorities in Santo Domingo in March 2006 if the suspect could be extradited to Switzerland if he were to be arrested there. If so, Swiss officials would come to Santo Domingo to accompany the suspect back to Switzerland. On 9 August 2006, Interpol Santo Domingo sent a fax to Interpol Bern in which it was made clear that the suspect was in custody and that he would be deported, partly because there was no extradition treaty between the two States. However, according to Interpol Santo Domingo, Dominican officials had to escort the suspect back to Switzerland otherwise the suspect could argue that he had been kidnapped.[471] On 14 August, the Swiss authorities notified their colleagues in Santo Domingo that the suspect could also be picked up at any time in Santo Domingo and one day later, Interpol Santo Domingo informed the Swiss:

> Dear colleagues, in ref. to your message dated Aug. 14/2006 please be advised that X._____ was taken to court today because his lawyers filed for a "Habeas Corpus" procedure for the judge to determine if the a/m person's imprisonment was legal or not. The judge ruled in our favor and Mr. X._____ imprisonment was declared legal as of today. You have to send an escort team to pick up the fugitive as soon as possible because his lawyers are preparing an appeal to rule out the judge's decision. We can only guarantee detainment of Mr. X._____ for 4 to 5 more days. After that we can't guarantee that Mr. X._____ remains under custody because if his lawyers file for an appeal, he might be set free. Please advise your opinion on this matter.[472]

As a result of this, on 18 August 2006, three Swiss police officials went to Santo Domingo and one day later, brought the suspect back to Switzerland.[473] The Court, referring, among other things, to the already discussed Öcalan case before the ECtHR,[474] explained that the Swiss authorities had not violated the sovereignty of the Dominican Republic.[475] Furthermore, it was of the opinion that the Swiss could be accused of mala fide conduct neither.[476] It would be different if the Swiss authorities, with the intent to circumvent an extradition procedure, had asked the [471] See ibid., under (D) (2.4): "Dear colleagues, please be advised that today at 08.25 local time Mr. X._____, born on ..., and wanted by the economic fraud section of the Zurich cantonal district attorney, was apprehended while coming out of his residence. He [is] actually under custody at Interpol's office. Since he doesn't have documents that can prove his legal status in our territory and there's no extradition treaty between our nations a deportation is imminent. We were told that Swiss officers are to escort Mr. X._____ back to Switzerland. Bear in mind that if a deportation procedure is made [D]ominican officers have to escort him back to Switzerland otherwise Mr. X._____ could say it was a kidnapping. Let us know your comments on this matter. We can hold him under custody for 48 hours after which we have to send him to the immigration facility so that he can wait there for the deportation procedure to be completed."

---

[472] Ibid.

[473] See ibid.

[474] See ibid., under (D) (2.5.2).

[475] See ibid., under (D) (2.6).

[476] See ibid.

Dominican officials to deport the suspect to Switzerland instead.[477] However, that was not the case here: "Vielmehr haben die dominikanischen Behörden von sich aus mitgeteilt, der Beschwerdeführer werde ausgewiesen."[478] In addition, there were not sufficient reasons for the Swiss authorities to assume that the conduct of the Dominican officials was evidently unlawful pursuant to the law of that State: "Dass ein Staat das Recht hat, Ausländer ohne gültige Aufenthaltspapiere auszuweisen, liegt auf der Hand und brauchte bei den schweizerischen Behörden keinen Argwohn zu erwecken." [479] In these circumstances, there was no obstacle to the suspect's arrest.[480] Although the Court agreed with Schultz that the maxim ex iniuria ius non oritur must be followed (see footnote 428), the Swiss authorities had not committed any iniuria.[481]

The next case to be discussed here is the 1983 French Barbie case. In 1952 and 1954, Klaus Barbie, head of the Gestapo in Lyon from November 1942 to August 1944, was sentenced to death in absentia for war crimes.[482] After a number of years, it was discovered that he had fled to Bolivia but a request for his extradition by the French Government was rejected by the Supreme Court of Bolivia on 11 December 1974 as there was no extradition treaty between the two States.[483] In February 1982, new proceedings were instituted against Barbie, this time for crimes against humanity,[484] and on 3 November 1982, an arrest warrant was issued.[485] When a new Bolivian President was elected in December 1982, "the Bolivian authorities decided to expel Barbie on the ground that he had used a false identity to obtain Bolivian

[477] See ibid.
[478] Ibid.
[479] Ibid.
[480] See ibid.: "Entscheidend ist, dass die Schweiz die Souveränität der Dominikanischen Republik beachtet und weder Zwang, List, Drohung noch sonst wie einen "üblen Polizeitrick" (…) angewandt hat, um des Beschwerdeführers habhaft zu werden. Bei dieser Sachlage ist ein Hafthinderungsgrund zu verneinen."
[481] See ibid.: "Wie Hans Schultz ausführt, muss der Staat, gerade wenn er Recht sprechen und demjenigen Strafe auferlegen will, der gegen das Recht verstiess, sich davor hüten, dass seinem Verfahren Unrecht anhafte. Nicht der Grundsatz, dass auf welche Weise auch immer jeder möglicherweise Schuldige zur Rechenschaft gezogen werden kann, ist die oberste Maxime wirklicher Strafrechtspflege, sondern der richtige Leitsatz lautet, dass die strafrechtliche Verantwortung nur den Grundsätzen des Rechts folgend geltend gemacht werden soll. Es gilt der Satz: Ex iniuria ius non oritur [the Court refers here to Schultz 1967, p. 83, see n. 428, ChP]. Dem ist uneingeschränkt zuzustimmen. Nach dem Gesagten haben die schweizerischen Behörden jedoch kein Unrecht begangen, um den Beschwerdeführer verhaften und ihn – wie die Mitangeschuldigten – dem hiesigen Strafverfahren zuführen zu können. Wesentlich ist der gute Glaube der schweizerischen Behörden (…). Dafür, dass ihnen dieser gefehlt hätte, enthalten die Akten keine Anhaltspunkte."
[482] See Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Barbie, 6 October 1983 and 26 January 1984, Fédération Nationale des Déportés et Internés Résistants et Patriotes and Others v. Barbie, 20 December 1985, International Law Reports, Vol. 78 (1988), p. 125 (summary).
[483] See ibid.
[484] See ibid.: "Barbie was accused of murder, torture and arbitrary arrests, detentions and imprisonment. In Lyons alone he was alleged to have been responsible for the murder of 4,342 persons, the deportation of 7,591 Jews and the arrest and deportation of 14,311 members of the French Resistance."
[485] See ibid.

citizenship."[486] His deportation took place on 3 February 1983, when he was put on a plane bound for French Guiana, where he was subsequently arrested by French airport police and flown to metropolitan France.[487] It was there that Barbie argued that he was the victim of a disguised extradition and that, as a result of that, the proceedings against him had to be stopped.[488] The Chambre d'accusation of the Court of Appeal in Paris refused to release Barbie as a consequence of his disguised extradition. First, it noted that there could not be a disguised extradition as there was no extradition treaty between France and Bolivia.[489] Then, it turned to the (seriousness of the) crimes with which Barbie was charged. The Supreme Court explained the reasoning of the Court of Appeal as follows:

> [The Court of Appeal held] that, by reason of their nature, the crimes against humanity with which Barbie is indicted do not simply fall within the scope of French municipal criminal law, but are subject to an international criminal order to which the notions of frontiers and extradition rules arising therefrom are completely foreign.[490]

This quotation appears to mean that because of the seriousness of the crimes with which Barbie is charged, normal rules do not apply.

If this general observation (not limited to this specific case) entails, for example, that States should be able to prosecute international crimes even if there is no clear jurisdictional link with the State, comparable to the universality principle, then the words quoted above are, of course, to be welcomed.

However, they may also be interpreted more broadly to mean that suspects of international crimes are to be apprehended, irrespective of the means. That could mean even without the consent of the State where that suspect is residing and hence in disrespect of that State's territorial sovereignty, see the notion that these crimes "are subject to an international criminal order to which the notions of frontiers (…) arising therefrom are completely foreign."[491] This point was arguably also raised by

---

[486] Ibid.
[487] See ibid.
[488] See ibid.
[489] See Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Barbie, 6 October 1983, International Law Reports, Vol. 78 (1988), p. 128: "[The decision of the Court of Appeal was based] on the grounds that the execution of an arrest warrant against a person who has taken refuge abroad is not subject to his voluntary return to France or to the setting in motion of extradition proceedings. The accused certainly claims that his arrest was the result of a fraud arising from a concerted agreement between the French and Bolivian Governments for his disguised extradition. Disguised extradition is characterized, however, by the violation of the provisions of a treaty and there is no extradition treaty between France and Bolivia."
[490] Ibid.
[491] Cf. also Michell 1996, p. 423, n. 205: "A possible "Eichmann exception" to the rule against the exercise of police power within another state's territory might be grounded in the universality principle, which permits states to prescribe certain crimes and to try persons for them, regardless of where the offenses were committed, or the nationality of the offenders. (…) Although the universality principle is the basis for prescriptive and not enforcement jurisdiction, in cases where the fugitive is accused of war crimes or crimes against humanity, it is arguable that the presumption against enforcement jurisdiction within the territory of another state may be realigned. States may be able to abduct a fugitive from Barbie himself. After attacking the first point of the Court of Appeal,[492] he stated that > the French Government is not empowered to express its adhesion to an international criminal order other than in accordance with constitutional rules. For its part the judiciary, as protector of individual freedom, is required by Article 66 of the Constitution to ensure respect for the principle that no one shall be arbitrarily detained. The judiciary is required to ensure respect for this principle under conditions laid down by the law and not by enforcing a so-called informal international law which has no permanent organizational structures and which furthermore, following the disappearance of temporary organizational structures which had been established, formally remitted the prosecution and judgment of crimes against humanity to the municipal legal orders of the States concerned. [The applicant therefore concludes] that, in relying on … the informal principles of a so-called "international criminal order to which the notion of frontiers and the extradition rules arising therefrom are completely foreign", the Court of Appeal violated the provisions mentioned above.[493]

However, the Supreme Court agreed with the findings of the Court of Appeal.[494] With respect to the first point, it noted that another state and charge him with crimes under international law without incurring international responsibility for the violation of the latter's territorial sovereignty, particularly where the asylum state has refused to either extradite or prosecute a fugitive accused of an international crime. (…) The abducting state's violation of the injured state's territorial sovereignty may be outweighed by both the abducting state's and injured state's jus cogens obligation to prosecute the fugitive for international crimes. (…) Such an approach is implied in Barbie (…)."

---

[492] See Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Barbie, 6 October 1983, International Law Reports, Vol. 78 (1988), p. 129: "[The applicant contends] however that, in the absence of any treaty, the conditions, procedure and effects of extradition are determined by the Law of 10 March 1927 (Article 1) [this Law is called 'Loi du 10 mars 1927 relative à l'extradition des étrangers', is available at: http://ledroitcriminel.free.fr/la_legislation_criminelle/anciens_textes/loi_extradition.htm and its Art. 1 reads: "En l'absence de traité, les conditions, la procédure et les effets de l'extradition sont déterminés par les dispositions de la présente loi. La présente loi s'applique également aux points qui n'auraient pas été réglementés par les traités.", ChP] so that disguised extradition is present not only where a treaty has been violated but also where the provisions of the Law in question have been violated. It is not contested that the operation carried out corresponds exactly to the definition of extradition, which involves the surrender of an individual by the Government of the State of refuge to another Government which has requested his surrender, either to inflict a penalty upon him or to try him. By failing to examine, in application of Article 23 of the Law, whether the extradition of the applicant was a nullity [this article states, among other things: "L'extradition obtenue par le Gouvernement français est nulle, si elle est intervenue en dehors des cas prévus par la présente loi.", ChP], in which case an order for his release would have been required under Article 25 [this article states: "Dans le cas où l'extradition est annulée, l'extradé s'il n'est pas réclamé par le gouvernement requis, est mis en liberté et ne peut être repris, soit à raison des faits qui ont motivé son extradition, soit à raison des faits antérieurs, que si, dans les trente jours qui suivent la mise en liberté, il est arrêté sur le territoire français.", ChP], the Court of Appeal failed, in the applicant's view, to give a proper legal basis to its decision."

[493] Ibid., p. 130.

[494] See ibid.: "The Chambre d'accusation [of the Court of Appeal] held that it was competent to examine the submissions made in the application, according to which the detention of Barbie was a nullity since it was the result of a 'disguised extradition'. The Court of Appeal held that "In the absence of any

> [e]xtradition proceedings had not been started at the time of the expulsion of Barbie by the Bolivian authorities. Furthermore, the acts for which he was sought are not excluded from the ambit of extradition by the Law of 10 March 1927 so that Articles 23 and 25 of that Law[[495]] cannot be applied. There is therefore no obstacle to the bringing of a prosecution against the accused on national territory provided that the rights of the defence are fully and freely ensured before both the examining magistrate and the trial court.[496]

Hence, the fact that normal extradition procedures (on the basis of an extradition treaty) had not been initiated between Bolivia and France does not preclude the prosecution of Barbie in France, because the acts for which Barbie are sought are not excluded by the French extradition law of 1927, which applies when no extradition treaty can be relied upon. This statement seems to imply that the Court – which, incidentally, appears to be especially interested in the concept of fair trial in the courtroom ("provided that the rights of the defence are fully and freely ensured before both the examining magistrate and the trial court"), cf. its decision in Argoud almost 20 years earlier (which, however, seems to go even further, see footnote 396 and accompanying text) – is of the opinion that the transfer of Barbie from Bolivia to France can nevertheless be seen as a form of extradition as it argues that the law regulating extradition if there is no extradition treaty in place has not been violated and hence does not block a further prosecution. Thus, it seems that the Court is not asserting that it had jurisdiction, notwithstanding the fact that Barbie was the victim of a disguised extradition, but that it had jurisdiction because there was no disguised extradition.

With respect to the second point, the Supreme Court referred to a number of provisions stemming from documents dealing with the prosecution of international crimes[497] and explained that extradition request, the execution of an arrest warrant on national territory, against a person who has not [this negation must be deleted, see also n. 489, ChP] previously taken refuge abroad, is not subject to his voluntary return to France or to the institution of extradition proceedings. Furthermore, by reason of their nature, the crimes against humanity with which Klaus Barbie, who claims German nationality, is charged in France where those crimes were committed, do not simply fall within the scope of French municipal law but are subject to an international criminal order to which the notions of frontiers and extradition rules arising therefrom are completely foreign." In giving this ruling … the Court of Appeal gave a proper legal basis to its decision, without inadequacy or contradiction." It must be remarked that very often (see, for example, the ICTY's Appeals Chamber's decision of 5 June 2003 in the Nikolić case (see Subsection 3.1.4 of the following chapter), para. 23, n. 28, Lamb 2000, p. 227, n. 215 or Ülgen 2003, p. 458, n. 88), the decision 'Fédération Nationale des Déportés et Internés Résistants et Patriotes and Others v. Barbie' is mentioned as the source of this quotation. However, that case was decided on 20 December 1985 and, reading its summary (which only starts at p. 136 of Vol. 78 of the International Law Reports), does not contain that quotation.)

---

[495] See n. 492.

[496] Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Barbie, 6 October 1983, International Law Reports, Vol. 78 (1988), pp. 130-131.

[497] See, for example, UNGA Res. 3 (I) of 13 February 1946 ('Extradition and Punishment of War Criminals'). In this resolution, the UNGA recommended "that Members of the United Nations forthwith take all the necessary measures to cause the arrest of those war criminals who have been responsible for or have taken a consenting part in the above crimes, and to cause them to be sent back to the countries in

> [i]t results from these provisions that "all necessary measures" are to be taken by the Member States of the United Nations to ensure that war crimes, crimes against peace and crimes against humanity are punished and that those persons suspected of being responsible for such crimes are sent back "to the countries in which their abominable deeds were done in order that they may be judged and punished according to the laws of those countries".[498]

It can be argued that several positions can be discerned from the above-mentioned observations of the Supreme Court, which does not make it easy to distil the opinion of the Supreme Court on this issue.

First, because it emphasises the importance of fair proceedings in the courtroom and because it notes that it is very important that persons such as Barbie, persons charged with very serious crimes, are brought to justice, it seems to argue that problems in the pre-trial phase (for example, a disguised extradition) are not really to be looked at in these kinds of cases.[499] Nevertheless, there is arguably also room for the idea that the Supreme Court is of the opinion that there was nothing wrong with Barbie's transfer[500] and that it can in fact be seen as a sort of extradition (or in any case as a transfer not prohibited by the French extradition law of 1927).[501] Swart which their abominable deeds were done, in order that they may be judged and punished according to the laws of those countries". With respect to the "governments of States which are not Members of the United Nations", the UNGA called upon them "also to take all necessary measures for the apprehension of such criminals in their respective territories with a view to their immediate removal to the countries in which the crimes were committed for the purpose of trial and punishment according to the laws of those countries."

---

[498] Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Barbie, 6 October 1983, International Law Reports, Vol. 78 (1988), p. 131. For a more refined resolution, see, for example, UNGA Res. 170 (II) of 31 October 1947 ('Surrender of war criminals and traitors'): "The General Assembly (…) Recommends Members of the United Nations, which desire the surrender of alleged war criminals or traitors (…) by other Members in whose jurisdiction they are believed to be, to request such surrender as soon as possible and to support their request with sufficient evidence to establish that a reasonable prima facie case exists as to identity and guilt".

[499] Sluiter notes, for example, that "the French Cour de Cassation in the Barbie case recognised disguised extradition as lawful in relation to crimes against humanity, where the "ordinary extradition rules do not apply" [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 648-649.) It must be noted that these exact words ("ordinary extradition rules do not apply") will not be found in this decision. Nevertheless, this does not seem to have been Sluiter's position as the original text of his (misprinted) article (see on this point also n. 187 of Chapter VIII) does not contain double (but only single) quotation marks, which points to a paraphrase rather than to an exact quotation. See also Lamb 2000, p. 239: "It (...) appears that, implicitly at least, the basing of Barbie's guilt upon crimes against humanity assisted the French court in overlooking any irregularities in Barbie's arrest [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally Conforti 1993, p. 157, referring to Barbie and writing: "[D]omestic case-law suggests that punishment may be carried on even if the culprit was illegally captured abroad, in breach of the sovereignty of the State where the capture took place". Note however that in this case, no breach of sovereignty occurred.

[500] Cf. the opinion of the Court of Appeal on this point in n. 489 where it states that Barbie had not been the victim of a disguised extradition.

[501] Sloan (2006, p. 330), for example, is of the opinion that the Court "was not asserting that somehow, due to the universally condemned nature of the crimes attributed to the accused, the French courts would be less troubled by irregular capture or the violation of state sovereignty. Indeed, in Barbie there was no illegal interstate capture [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., n. 78: "Counsel for the appears to take a middle position when he states that "on 6 October 1983, the French Cour de Cassation invoked Resolution 3(I) in ruling that the expulsion of Barbie from Bolivia to France did not amount to disguised extradition contrary to French law".[502]

Barbie also filed a complaint with the ECmHR, but as was already explained in Chapter III, his application was declared inadmissible.

The next case under examination is the German 1985 Stocké case. To a certain extent, the decisions of the ECmHR and ECtHR in this case have already been discussed earlier, see Subsection 2.2.4 of Chapter III, but before the case went to Strasbourg, the German Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht) examined the case as well. The Court noted that the lower court, the Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof), > konnte (…) davon ausgehen, daß eine allgemeine regel des Völkerrechts nicht besteht, derzufolge die Durchführung eines Strafverfahrens gegen eine Person gehindert wäre, die unter Verletzung der Gebiethoheit eines fremden Staates in den Gebietsstaat verbracht worden ist (…).[503]

Hence, the German Constitutional Court was of the opinion that there was no international law rule stating that a court cannot exercise jurisdiction in the case of a defence argued that because the crimes in question were not provided for in French law, they lacked a proper legal basis and the defendant could not be charged with them. Rejecting this assertion, the court emphasised the universal nature of the crimes attributed to the accused." (See also Currie 2007, p. 370, n. 101, referring to Sloan 2006, p. 330, n. 77 (this must be: n. 78).) However, as was also shown in the main text, the Supreme Court did not only seem to link the seriousness of the crimes with the French jurisdiction ratione materiae; there are also signs that this element was connected with the French jurisdiction ratione personae.

---

[502] Swart 2002 C, p. 1646, n. 19. It may be interesting to note that Swart (ibid.) remarks after these words that "[a] similar ruling was given by the Buenos Aires Court of First Instance in the case of Jan Durcansky" (with reference to L.C. Green's article 'Political Offences, War Crimes and Extradition', International and Comparative Law Quarterly, Vol. 11 (1962), p. 347.) However, it seems that this Court decided exactly the opposite of the Barbie Court, namely that extradition had to be refused notwithstanding these UNGA Resolutions, see Green's article at p. 347: "The Buenos Aires Court of First Instance rejected a Czechoslovak request for the extradition of an individual charged with participating in mass murders of civilians in Czechoslovakia between November 1944 and the end of the war. (…) The fact that there had been Resolutions on the subject by the General Assembly of the United Nations affected the Argentine Court as much as it did the United States Court of Appeals in Karadzole v. Artukovic." Namely: not at all. See the following observation by the US Court of Appeals in Karadzole v. Artukovic (as presented by Green at p. 344 of his article): "Appellant in essence argues that by virtue of resolutions taken in 1946 and 1947 by the United Nations General Assembly as to the surrender of alleged war criminals, it is incumbent on this court to hold that Artukovic is charged with an offence which is extraditable. We have examined the various United Nations Resolutions and have concluded that they have not sufficient force of law to modify long standing judicial interpretations of similar treaty provisions. Perhaps changes should be made as to such treaties" [original footnote omitted, ChP]." However, perhaps, Swart is not making the comparison here between the Durcansky and Barbie cases but between the Durcansky and the Kardzole v. Artukovic cases. (Swart, at the beginning of his footnote, also refers to this latter case.)

[503] BVerfG (1. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 17.7 1985 – 2 BvR 1190/84. NJW 1986, Heft 22, p. 1428.

male captus violating the territorial sovereignty of a foreign State. It would be different if one could point to a general State practice and opinio iuris that the freedom of States in that respect is limited because of international law.[504] However, that was not the case according to the Constitutional Court:

> Ein Blick auf die Staatenpraxis zeigt, daß Gerichte es nur dann allgemein ablehnen, ein Strafverfahren gegen einen völkerrechtswidrig Entführten zu betreiben, wenn der durch die Entführung verletzte Staat gegen die Unrechtshandlung protestiert und die Rückgabe des Entführten gefordert hat (…).[505]

Thus, according to the Constitutional Court, State practice showed that courts generally only refuse to exercise jurisdiction in a case of an abduction violating international law if the injured State has protested the wrong and has demanded the return of the abducted person (which was not the case here).

Nevertheless, after having referred to a few male captus bene detentus cases to support its stance,[506] it also admitted that courts have decided male captus male detentus cases (in which no formal protest and request for the return of the suspect could be identified).

However, this practice, the Court continued, is not sufficiently widespread as to amount to an established practice, limiting the jurisdiction of a State. Furthermore, it does not express with the necessary clarity the conviction that the discontinuation of the criminal proceedings against the person abducted in violation of international law is required because of international law; in several cases, it is rather explicitly

---

[504] See ibid., p. 1428: "Eine solche Regel bestünde als allgemeine Regel nur, wenn eine entsprechende Staatenpraxis nachweisbar wäre, die allgemein und in der Überzeugung geübt würde, daß die Freiheit der Staaten, die in ihrem Hoheitsbereich befindlichen Personen ihrer Strafgerichtsbarkeit in bezug auf Sachverhalte zu unterwerfen, die eine gewisse Mindestbeziehung zum eigenen Hoheitsberech aufweisen, von Völkerrechts wegen in der genannten Weise eingeschränkt ist."

[505] Ibid.

[506] The Court mentioned the cases of Eichmann and Argoud and stated that "[d]ie genannten Entscheidungen stimmen schließlich auch mit der Rechtsprechung britischer und amerikanischer Gerichte überein, die in zahlreichen Entscheidungen die Auffassung vertreten haben, daß die Umstände, unter denen ein Angeklagter vor die Schranken des Gerichts gelangt sie, die Durchführung des Verfahrens gegen ihn nicht hinderten". (Ibid.) The reference to Eichmann is correct. It must be emphasised again (see also Chapter III) that, even though Argentina initially requested the return of Eichmann, it dropped its demand in the context of the UNSC deliberations. Thus, there was no need for the Israeli Executive to return Eichmann to Argentina. Furthermore, this issue had become insignificant when the Israeli Judiciary examined the case because by that time, the incident on the violation of the sovereignty of Argentina had been closed. (See also ibid., p. 1428: "Zwar hat der Gerichtshof seine Entscheidung auch auf die Erwägung gestützt, eine mögliche Völkerrechtsverletzung im Zusammenhang mit der Verbringung Eichmanns nach Israel sei durch einen Verzicht Argentiniens auf allfällige Ansprüche im Rahmen einer gemeinsamen Erklärung der Regierungen beider Staaten geheilt (…). Daß eine völkerrechtlichen Pflicht zur einstellung des Verfahrens gegen Eichmann bestanden hätte, wenn eine solche Erklärung nicht abgegeben worden wäre, hat der Gerichtshof indessen nicht festgestellt.") However, the reference to the male captus bene detentus case of Argoud is less convincing because that case even went a step further when it arguably held that Argoud could be tried, even if the injured State had demanded the return of the abducted person.

stated that the principles of domestic law (rule of law, due process of law) are the ones obstructing the conduct of the proceedings.[507]

Here, the Court referred to the previously mentioned (see Subsection 2.1) decision of the Swiss Obergerichts of 11 April 1967 (which, by the way, involved a luring operation and not an abduction) and to the 1974 Toscanino decision. As was shown earlier, the Swiss Court indeed focused on domestic law but the judges in Toscanino also based their decision on international law aspects.[508]

Nevertheless, and taking into account that this study primarily focused on the practice of courts alone (although the reactions of other statal organs were sometimes also examined, see, for example, the reactions of governments in the context of the Alvarez-Machain case), there are indications that the German Court's statement that there is evidence in State practice that courts will generally refuse jurisdiction in the case of an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect, appears to be correct.

The Constitutional Court also looked, among other things, into the human rights context and argued, as has been done in this book (and in the above-mentioned Swiss case from 2007), that a violation of the right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily does not automatically lead to the ending of the proceedings (but merely to a release).[509]

Finally, the Court examined whether Stocké's trial was barred because of domestic considerations, namely those related to the rule of law and to Article 1, paragraph 1 of the German Grundgesetz (Basic Law (or Constitution)), which states: "Human dignity shall be inviolable. To respect and protect it shall be the duty of all state authority."[510] It found that the opinion of the Bundesgerichtshof, that the rule of law and Article 1, paragraph 1 did not oppose the conviction of the suspect, even if German State officials had acted unlawfully with respect to the events of Stocké's

[507] See ibid.: "Zwar sind in mehreren Staaten entscheidungen ergangen, denen offenbar die Ansicht zugrunde liegt, daß der mit einer Entführung verwirklichte Unrechtstatbestand ein Verfahrenshindernis zu begründen geeignet sei. Diese Praxis ist indessen weder hinlänglich verbreitet, um als gefestigte, die staatliche Gerichtsbarkeit einschränkende Übung angesehen werden zu können, nocht bringt sie mit der notwendigen Deutlichkeit die Überzeugung zum Ausdruck, daß die Einstellung eines Strafverfahrens gegen einen in völkerrechtswidriger Weise Entführten von Völkerrechts wegen geboten sei; in einigen Entscheidungen wird vielmehr ausdrücklich festgestellt, daß es Grundsätze des internen Rechts (Rechtsstaatlichkeit, due process of law) seien, die eine Verfahrensführung hinderten [emphasis in original, ChP]".

[508] See n. 64 and accompanying text.

[509] See BVerfG (1. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 17.7 1985 – 2 BvR 1190/84. NJW 1986, Heft 22, p. 1428: "Schließlich bestanden und bestehen auch keine nach Art. 100 II GG ["Ist in einem Rechtsstreite zweifelhaft, ob eine Regel des Völkerrechtes Bestandteil des Bundesrechtes ist und ob sie unmittelbar Rechte und Pflichten für den Einzelnen erzeugt (Artikel 25), so hat das Gericht die Entscheidung des Bundesverfassungsgerichtes einzuholen.", ChP.] erheblichen Zweifel daran, daß sich aus einem menschenrechtlichen Verbot der willkürlichen Festnahme Einzelner nicht schon eine Pflicht zur Einstellung eines Strafverfahrens gegen einen solchermaßen Festgenommenen ergibt." (GG stands for Grundgesetz, the German Basic Law/Constitution, see also the main text in a few moments.)

[510] Basic Law for the Federal Republic of Germany. Promulgated by the Parliamentary Council on 23 May 1949 as amended up to June 2008. Published by German Bundestag, Administration, Public Relations Division, Berlin, 2008, available at: https://www.btg-bestellservice.de/pdf/80201000.pdf.

male captus on 7 November 1978, can in any case, and taking everything into account, not be criticised.[511]

A bar to the proceedings can at most be resorted to in extremely exceptional cases ("in extreme gelagerten Ausnahmefällen"),[512] such as an excessively long trial (recall the first situation of the abuse of process doctrine in Bennett: "because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial"), which is not the case here according to the Constitutional Court.[513]

After all, the Court continued, assuming his account is accurate, Stocké was not brought to Germany with help of measures involving physical force (but with help of a trick), his arrest by German police officials did not take place on French territory (but in Germany), at the time of his arrest, a legally valid arrest warrant was issued against him, and finally, that according to the Public Prosecutor's investigation regarding the possible cooperation of German State organs in the male captus of Stocké, the operation involved conduct of officials from a subordinate police station acting on their own authority, the conduct of which was made possible because of inadequate official supervision has not been established.[514] In short, one cannot deduce from the Constitution that in these circumstances, the criminal claim of the State can be considered forfeited.[515]

It should be noted that these avenues to the male detentus outcome are reminiscent of the Toscanino exception, although the domestic male detentus possibility of the latter concept appears to be more specific (a male captus

[511] See BVerfG (1. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 17.7 1985 – 2 BvR 1190/84. NJW 1986, Heft 22, p. 1429: "Die Auffassung des BGH, das Rechtsstaatsprinzip oder Art. 1I GG hätten einer Verurteilung des Bf. auch dann nicht entgegengestanden, wenn sich Träger deutscher Hoheitsgewalt im Zusammenhang mit den Ereignissen vom 7. 11. 1978 strafbar gemacht haben sollten, ist jedenfalls im Ergebnis nicht zu beanstanden." The formulation of such a hypothetical situation ("auch dann nicht (…) wenn sich Träger deutscher Hoheitsgewalt (…) strafbar gemacht haben sollten") arguably shows that the Court is of the opinion that German State officials did not do anything wrong in this case. However, n. 514 (and accompanying text) seems to imply that German officials may have done something wrong, but that this point is immaterial as those officials came from a subordinate police station and were acting on their own authority.

[512] Ibid.

[513] See ibid.: "Denn ein solches Verfahrenshindernis könnte allenfalls in extrem gelagerten Ausnahmefällen eingreifen (in diesem Sinne auch der zuständige Vorprüfungsausschuß des Senats in einem Beschluß vom 24. 11. 1983 betreffend die überlange Dauer eines Strafverfahrens (…); einer wertende Betrachtung aller Gesichtspunkte, die für die Beurteilung des vom BGH als möglich understellten Hergangs der Ergreifung des Bf. von Bedeutung sind, ergibt indessen, daß ein solcher Fall hier nicht vorliegt."

[514] See ibid.: "Der Bf. wurde – sein Vorbringen als zutreffend understellt – nicht mit Hilfe von Maßnahmen körperlichen Zwangs, sondern mittels List in die Bundesrepublik Deutschland verbracht; seine Festnahme durch deutsche Polizeibeambte erfolgte nicht auf französischem Hoheitsgebiet, sondern in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland. Zum Zeitpunkt der Ergreifung des Bf. lag ein rechtswirksamer Haftbefehl vor (…). Hinzu kommt, daß es sich nach den Ermittlungen der Staatsanwaltschaft bei der möglichen Beteiligung staatlicher Organe an der Verbringung des Bf. in die Bundesrepublik Deutschland um ein eigenmächtiges Verhalten von Beamten einer untergeordneten Polizeidienststelle handelte; daß dieses Verhalten durch unzulängliche dienstliche Aufsicht ermöglicht worden wäre, ist nicht festgestellt worden."

[515] See ibid.: "Dem Grundgesetz kann nicht entnommen werden, daß auch bei einer solchen Lage der Dinge der Strafanspruch des Staates als verwirkt anzusehen wäre."

accompanied by serious mistreatment)[516] than the rather general words employed here (extremely exceptional cases). Nevertheless, the German Court may very well have been thinking about situations which can be compared with the assumed facts of the Toscanino case.[517]

As explained earlier, the case also went to the European human rights institutions but these did not take an explicit stance on the male captus bene/male detentus discussion, although they did not reject the statements on the male captus issue of the German Constitutional Court as presented at footnotes 503, 505 and 507 and accompanying text either.[518]

The (national) Stocké judgment was followed one year later by the Constitutional Court deciding a case in which a German citizen was allegedly abducted from the Netherlands.[519]

After having concluded that international law did not lead to an obstruction of the proceedings,[520] the Constitutional Court looked at the domestic law context (rule of law and Article 1, paragraph 1 of the German Grundgesetz) and stated that this case was also not extremely exceptional, even though, in contrast to Stocké, "[d]er Bf. wurde (…) mit Hilfe von Maßnahmen körperlichen Zwangs auf niederländischem Hoheitsgebiet unter Verletzung seines strafrechtlich geschützten Freiheitsrechts (…) festgenommen."[521] Interestingly, in establishing whether or not there was such an extremely exceptional case which could lead to the ending of the case, it examined the concept of rule of law (Rechtsstaatsprinzip) and the [516] It is to be recalled that although Toscanino involved an abduction, the serious mistreatment exception does not seem to be confined to this male captus situation (see also Yunis). For example, if a luring operation would be accompanied by serious, Toscanino-like mistreatment, courts may decide to refuse the case. Notwithstanding this, it can be argued that the criticism towards the Alvarez-Machain case (which involved an abduction case) shows that it is only certain with respect to the male captus situation of abduction that courts around the world appear to be of the opinion that jurisdiction must be refused in these circumstances.

[517] See also Wilske 2000, p. 334, n. 413: "[D]as Gericht hatte hier möglicherweise die schweren Folterungen im Toscanino-Fall im Auge." See also Grams 1994, pp. 70-71.

[518] See ECmHR (Plenary), Walter Stock[é] against the Federal Republic of Germany, Application No. 11755/85, Report of the Commission (Adopted on 12 October 1989), para. 162: "The Federal Constitutional Court (...) found no general rule in international law according to which prosecution of a person was barred in a State to whose territory the person concerned had been taken in violation of the territorial sovereignty of another State." See also ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Stocké v. Germany, Application No. 11755/85, 'Judgment', 19 March 1991, para. 37: "The [German Constitutional] court held that there was no rule of international law to prevent a State's courts from prosecuting a person brought before them in breach of the territorial sovereignty of another State or of an extradition treaty. It was apparent from American, Israeli, French and British case-law that in such an event a court did not decline jurisdiction unless the other State had protested and sought the return of the person concerned. The fact that there were a few decisions in which courts had ordered that the proceedings should be stayed was not sufficient to establish a real practice to that effect."

[519] BVerfG (3. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 3.6 1986 – 2 BvR 837/85. NJW 1986, Heft 48, pp. 3021-3022.

[520] See ibid., p. 3021: "Die Niederlande haben weder die unverzügliche Rücklieferung des Bf. gefordert noch einen vergleichbaren Anspruch geltend gemacht."

[521] Ibid., p. 3022.

importance of effective prosecution in that respect.[522] (This, again, is reminiscent of the abuse of process doctrine and the idea that even the smallest aspect, including the importance of prosecution – which, of course, weighs heavier in the context of serious crimes – should be taken into account when determining whether a certain irregularity must lead to the ending of the case or not. However, it must also be stressed that certain male captus techniques, such as the one here of an abduction by one's own agents, are intrinsically so serious that jurisdiction should be refused, even if dealing with suspects of serious crimes.) [523] However, the Court even went a step further, when it appeared to weigh the wrong of the 'kidnapping' against the culpability (Schuld) of the suspect, an arguably rather unfortunate choice of words given the basic principle of the presumption of innocence, even if the suspect's more general 'criminal energy' had already been proven by his previous convictions.[524]

This case confirms the resemblance between the Stocké case and the Toscanino exception noted above and even specifies that not only a luring situation (Stocké) but also an abduction (as such) may not necessarily have to lead to the ending of the case. This seems to imply that German courts, in a case involving abduction, would only refuse jurisdiction if the abduction 1) is followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from the injured State[525] or 2) is accompanied by serious mistreatment/serious human rights violations. (This last possibility is not clear but one can assume that such an abduction would fall under the concept of "extremely exceptional case".)[526]

The penultimate case to be discussed here is the already briefly mentioned (see Subsection 2.2.4 of Chapter III) 1995 French case of Illich Ramirez Sánchez. Ramirez Sánchez, better known as Carlos the Jackal,[527] > alleged that, while he was staying lawfully in Khartoum, Sudanese police officers had seized, bound, drugged and hooded him and handed him over to French police

[522] See ibid.

[523] Cf. also the criticism of Oehmichen (2007, pp. 230-231) on this case. In fact, Oehmichen, referring to the presumption of innocence, has serious reservations as concerns the element 'seriousness of the alleged crimes' in general (see ibid.).

[524] See BVerfG (3. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 3.6 1986 – 2 BvR 837/85. NJW 1986, Heft 48, p. 3022: "Der (…) strafrechtliche Unrechtsgehalt der „Entführung" wiegt weniger schwer gegenüber der Schuld des Bf. dessen hohe kriminelle Energie auch seine erheblichen Vorstrafen belegen."

[525] Note that the German Court in the 1986 case did not explicitly confirm the reasoning it had made one year earlier in the Stocké case as it did not find it necessary to go into this point now that the Netherlands had not requested the return of the suspect, see ibid., p. 3021: "Die Niederlande haben weder die unverzügliche Rücklieferung des Bf. gefordert noch einen vergleichbaren Anspruch geltend gemacht. Offenbleiben kann daher die Frage, ob eine allgemeine Regel des Völkerrechts besteht, wonach die Durchführung eines Strafverfahren gegen eine Person, die in völkerrechtswidriger Weise in den Gerichtsstaat verbracht worden ist, gehindert ware, wenn der verletzte Staat ihre unverzügliche Rücklieferung fordert oder einen vergleichbaren Anspruch geltend macht".

[526] See again (see also n. 517) Wilske 2000, p. 334, n. 413: "[D]as Gericht hatte hier möglicherweise die schweren Folterungen im Toscanino-Fall im Auge." See also again Grams 1994, pp. 70-71.

[527] It may be interesting to note that this nickname was given to him, not because he was the man on whom Frederick Forsyth based his famous novel The day of the Jackal but merely because, reportedly, a copy of this book was found among Ramirez Sánchez's belongings.

> officers, who had put him, by force, into a French military plane bound for Villacoublay military base (…).[528]

However, in France, where "[h]e was charged with being an accessory to causing criminal damage to real and personal property (…), thereby killing one person and permanently maiming others, and also with murder and grievous bodily harm",[529] the Indictments Division of the Paris Court of Appeal (Chambre d'accusation de la Cour d'Appel de Paris) issued a male captus bene detentus decision on 7 November 1994.

The Court first admitted that it appeared that Ramirez Sánchez "was indeed deported to France without any judicial extradition proceedings".[530] However, as there was no extradition treaty between France and Sudan, the Court continued, "it has not been established that the applicant was handed over by Sudan in breach of the provisions of a treaty, nor that he was the subject of a disguised extradition."[531] The Court then repeated the Argoud reasoning[532] that "the ability to take criminal proceedings against, and apply the criminal law in France to, someone who has fled abroad is not dependent on that person returning voluntarily to France or on extradition proceedings being taken"[533] and explained that Ramirez Sánchez could not challenge the sovereign expulsion/deportation decision of Sudan before French courts.[534] Subsequently, the Court presented the clearest male captus bene detentus reasoning of this decision, stating:

> Moreover, case-law also provides that the circumstances in which someone, against whom proceedings are lawfully being taken and against whom a valid arrest warrant has been issued, has been apprehended and handed over to the French legal authorities are not in themselves sufficient to render the proceedings void, provided that they have not vitiated the search for and process of establishing the truth, nor made it impossible for the defence to exercise its rights before the investigating authorities and the trial courts.[535]

As a result, the application of Ramirez Sánchez was dismissed.

'Carlos the Jackal' appealed, however, to the Supreme Court, arguing that it was too simple to consider the transfer of him to France as a sovereign act of Sudan which France had nothing to do with.[536]

---

[528] ECmHR (Plenary), Illich Sánchez Ramirez v/France, Application No. 28780/95, 'Decision of 24 June 1996 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 86-B, p. 156.
[529] In fact, Ramirez Sánchez has already been convicted in absentia two years earlier "on several counts of murder and one of attempted murder and sentenced to life imprisonment." (Ibid.)
[530] Ibid., p. 157.
[531] Ibid., p. 158.
[532] See ns. 489 and 494.
[533] ECmHR (Plenary), Illich Sánchez Ramirez v/France, Application No. 28780/95, 'Decision of 24 June 1996 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 86-B, p. 158.
[534] See ibid.
[535] Ibid.
[536] See ibid., p. 159: "The applicant had alleged, inter alia, that there had been a violation of Article 5 of the [European] Convention [on Human Rights] on the grounds that, "the court could not pretend to

Nevertheless, the Supreme Court, in its decision of 21 February 1995, agreed with the above-mentioned quotation of the Court of Appeal,[537] reiterated other male captus bene detentus reasonings[538] and rejected the appeal.[539] A subsequent application filed with the ECmHR was also unsuccessful, as became already clear in Chapter III.

The final case to be discussed in this subsection dealing with more recent civil law decisions is Al-Moayad, a German terrorism case from 2003 involving luring.[540]

The suspect, the Yemeni citizen Al-Moayad,[541] was "an adviser of the Yemeni Minister for Religious Foundations in the rank of an undersecretary of state and imam of the Al-Ihsan Mosque in Sanaa/Yemen"[542] and was arrested in Frankfurt am believe that an acting Chief Superintendent of the DST [the French Intelligence Service (Direction de la surveillance du territoire), see ibid., p. 156, ChP] had learned, at the very last moment, 'from his superiors' that the appellant was at Villacoublay, where he could be apprehended, without dealing with the appellant's submissions (which, for good reason, have not been disputed) that he was not arrested at Villacoublay, but in Khartoum; that despite the absence of any international arrest warrant, he was handed over, on Sudanese territory, by the Sudanese police to French police officers flown over specially for that purpose by French military aeroplane; and that the appellant, while still under arrest, was put onto the aeroplane and taken, under guard, to Villacoublay military airbase where an arrest warrant valid within French territory was served on him. Thus, the court avoided ruling on the lawfulness of the appellant's being held under arrest by representatives of the French State from Khartoum to Villacoublay. Yet this was precisely the ground on which it had been argued that Sánchez Ramirez's detention was arbitrary. (…)""

---

[537] See ibid., p. 160: "In so holding, the court [below] gave legal grounds for its decision and did not commit the errors alleged by the appellant in his grounds of appeal." The final original French words of the Supreme Court preceding the words "[i]n so holding, …" ("[a]ttendu qu'en statuant ainsi, …") were not printed in Decisions and Reports, No. 86-B, but they go as follows: "Que, selon l'arrêt, les conditions dans lesquelles une personne, faisant l'object d'une poursuite régulière et d'un titre légal d'arrestation, a été appréhendée et livrée à la justice française ne sont pas de nature à entraîner par elles-mêmes la nullité des poursuites dès lors que la recherche et l'établissement de la vérité ne s'en sont pas trouvés viciés ni la défense mise dans l'impossibilité d'exercer ses droits devant la jurisdiction d'instruction et de jugement". (Bulletin criminel 1995, No. 74 (21 février 1995, No. 94-85.626), p. 178.)

[538] See ECmHR (Plenary), Illich Sánchez Ramirez v/France, Application No. 28780/95, 'Decision of 24 June 1996 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 86-B, p. 160: "It was correct in stating that the ability to take criminal proceedings against, and apply the criminal law to, a person who has fled abroad is in no way dependent on that person returning voluntarily to France or on extradition proceedings being taken. (…) Moreover, the national courts have no jurisdiction to examine the circumstances in which a person is arrested abroad by the local authorities, acting alone and in the exercise of their sovereign powers, and handed over to French police officers." This is a good repetition of the position of the Court of Appeal but the Court of Cassation does arguably not really go into the complaint of Ramirez Sánchez that it cannot be maintained that the Sudanese authorities organised the entire operation themselves.

[539] See ibid.

[540] See German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), pp. 774-788.

[541] Although his full name was not mentioned in the German decision, it can be found in the ECtHR's decision of this case, which will be discussed after the national case.

[542] German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03, A., I., para. 1), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 774.

Main on 10 January 2003 on the basis of a US arrest warrant.[543] The US prosecution authorities charged Al-Moayad "with having provided money, weapons and communications equipment to terrorist groups, in particular Al-Qaeda and Hamas, and with having recruited new members for these groups, between October 1997 and his arrest"[544] and transmitted a request to the German authorities to have him extradited to the US.[545]

Al-Moayad challenged this extradition for several reasons. The most interesting one for this study[546] was that he claimed that he had been abducted from Yemen to Germany (as one will see in a few moments, the operation in question should rather be seen as luring and not as abduction) and that because of that, his extradition to the US should be declared inadmissible.[547] His State of residence, the State of Yemen, also protested the 'abduction' and requested that Al-Moayad be repatriated to Yemen.[548] What had happened exactly? The decision explains:

> Instrumental in making the complainant travel to Germany were conversations that a Yemeni citizen maintained with the complainant in Yemen in an undercover mission of the United States investigation and prosecution authorities. The confidential informant convinced the complainant that he could bring him into contact with another person abroad who was willing to make a major financial contribution. In this context, it is controversial for what purposes the money was supposed to be donated. According to the statement made by the complainant's secretary [who was arrested together with Al-Moayad, ChP] in his interrogation by the German investigation authorities in which he was heard as a person charged with a criminal offence, the decision to travel to Germany was based on the complainant's voluntary decision.[549]

The Frankfurt am Main Higher Regional Court (Oberlandesgericht) found his extradition admissible and was not impressed by Yemen's protests and requests for repatriation because those had to be dealt with on a political and not on a judicial

[543] See ibid.
[544] Ibid.
[545] See ibid.
[546] Another one was focused on the future, on what he feared would happen to him in the US, see ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, A., I., para. 6 a)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 775: "He (...) alleged that an extradition to the United States infringed the minimum standards that international law requires for a state governed by the rule of law. According to the complainant, United States authorities use, in the case of persons who are charged with an offence and who are suspected of terrorism, methods of interrogation that fall under the ban on torture pursuant to Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Article 1 of the United Nations Convention against Torture."
[547] See ibid.: "[T]he complainant sought to achieve (...) that the extradition (…) be declared inadmissible. The complainant put forward that he had been abducted from Yemen to Germany contrary to international law in order to circumvent Yemeni law on extradition."
[548] See ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, A., I., para. 4), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 775: "In several diplomatic notes, the last one of which is dated 27 March 2003, the Embassy of the Republic of Yemen expounded to the Federal Foreign Office (Auswärtiges Amt) its opinion that the complainant had been abducted from Yemen to Germany contrary to international law, and circumventing the Yemeni constitution's ban on the extradition of Yemen's own citizens. The federal government was requested to repatriate the complainant to Yemen." [549] Ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, A., I., para. 1), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 774.

level.[550] The Court explained (as paraphrased by the German Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht), which considered Al-Moayad's constitutional complaint in this case):

> Even if the use of a Yemeni citizen in Yemen as a covert investigator of the United States were to be regarded as a violation of Yemen's sovereignty that was contrary to international law, this would not be contrary to the complainant's criminal prosecution. No general rule of international law existed that would oblige the state of the forum to withdraw the charge if a person had been induced to commit the offence, and to enter the state of the forum, by an agent provocateur, by means of trickery, and violating the territorial sovereignty of a foreign state. Such a rule would require the existence of a state practice to this effect. In state practice, however, different opinions concerning the legal consequences of an abduction that is contrary to international law could be found. This appraisal was confirmed by the existing literature on international law.[551]

In this quotation, the Court did not go into the (un)desirability of the luring operation itself – it merely focused on the effect of such an operation on a court's jurisdiction – but immediately after these words, it became clear that the Court was in fact in favour of such methods when the stakes are high and that national law dictated that it would only refuse jurisdiction in exceptional cases. This reference to the seriousness of the crimes with which Al-Moayad was charged is, of course, very interesting for this study and should thus be mentioned here as well:

> The court further stated that the use of confidential informants had not infringed the principle of a state governed by the rule of law and also not Article 1.1 of the Basic Law.[[552]] The use of such methods of investigation was necessary and required for the prosecution of particularly dangerous offences that were difficult to resolve. An obstacle precluding proceedings could only be assumed in extreme and exceptional cases if it became evident that considering all circumstances, requirements that are indispensable in a state governed by the rule of law had not been complied with. The present case was no such exceptional case.[553] [550] Ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, A., I., para. 6 b)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 776: "The court further held that the request for repatriation that had been made by the Republic of Yemen in a diplomatic note to the federal government did not affect the admissibility of extradition. Because possible claims for reparation under international law exclusively existed between the two states."

---

[551] Ibid.

[552] Art. 1, para. 1 of the Basic Law (or Grundgesetz) for the Federal Republic of Germany reads: "Human dignity shall be inviolable. To respect and protect it shall be the duty of all state authority." (Basic Law for the Federal Republic of Germany. Promulgated by the Parliamentary Council on 23 May 1949 as amended up to June 2008. Published by German Bundestag, Administration, Public Relations Division, Berlin, 2008, available at: https://www.btg-bestellservice.de/pdf/80201000.pdf.) See also n. 510 and accompanying text.

[553] German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03, A., I., para. 6 b)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 776.

A few remarks should be made about these statements. Confidential informants may, of course, be necessary in the fight against terrorism and States should definitely be able to use them in their own State and, if one cooperates with the State in which one is interested, in that latter State.

However, neither must one forget that what confidential informants do is police work. And one State cannot do police work on another State's territory without that State's consent. That leads to a violation of State sovereignty and international law. If the work of the foreign confidential informants leads not to mere intelligence but to an arrest (even if that arrest did not take place on the territory of the injured State), the injured State may find out, protest and request the return of the suspect. If the police work on the other State's territory leads to an apprehension on that territory (this is an abduction), then the 'abducting' State has to return the suspect. And if the Executive does not do what it should do in the aftermath of a violation of international law, the Judiciary should take its responsibility as guardian of the international law system, refuse jurisdiction and order the return of the suspect.

It appears from the previous cases that this rule, which was already assumed in Chapter III,[554] has quite some support in the practice of courts. The Alvarez-Machain case can be seen as a clear break with that rule, but one should doubt whether that decision has really quashed the strength of that rule, at least in the rest of the world, given the immense criticism vented against that decision.

However, the case may be different with respect to the technique of luring. As explained in Subsection 2.1 of Chapter III, this technique, in certain circumstances, could also be seen as violating another State's sovereignty. That, in turn, would also mean that if the injured State protests and requests the return of the suspect, the 'luring' State must repair the violation of State sovereignty, the most appropriate form, according to the DARS, being to bring the situation back as it was before the luring, namely to return the suspect to the injured State. Although there is some support for this view,[555] it cannot be denied that luring is normally seen as a less serious violation of international law and that States and courts, as a result, may have turned to other, less far-reaching forms of reparation, even if the return would, according to the DARS, still be the most appropriate form of reparation for the violation of international law.

In that respect, the German Court may be right in asserting that there is no general rule of international law obliging the forum State to withdraw the charge after a luring operation.[556]

---

[554] See ns. 560-561 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[555] See n. 573 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[556] Note, however, that courts may nevertheless refuse jurisdiction if they are of the opinion that the luring operation, even if it did not violate another State's sovereignty (so seriously), may constitute such reprehensible conduct under national law that it cannot be legally 'approved' by continuing the case. See, for example, the Schmidt case in which context Lord Sedley was of the opinion that subterfuge (which would not necessarily have to violate international law) could lead to the ending of the case: "I do not accept his argument [the argument of the respondents' QC, ChP] that only the use of physical force passes the threshold. Lawlessness can take many forms. In my judgment what the doctrine of Bennett's case strikes at is an act on the part of the executive government of the United Kingdom: (a)

However, in the case of abductions, followed by a protest and request for the return of the injured State, it appears that most courts around the world would refuse jurisdiction and order the return of the suspect if the Executives of the 'abducting' States have not already done so. (Note, however, that this is not to say that a general rule of international law exists in that respect. It only means that State practice indicates that courts would refuse jurisdiction in such cases. This matter, the correlation between State practice and a general rule of international law, will be returned to infra.)

A final point which must be made here is that the obligation to return on the basis of the violation of the sovereignty of Yemen would in principle only be valid for the abducting/luring State and not for Germany.

However, as explained, that does not mean, of course, that the German Court may not be able to examine the way in which Al-Moayad came into its power and to refuse jurisdiction on the basis of national law if it is of the opinion that the pre-trial phase must be qualified as so irregular (even if Germany was not involved in it) that the judges, in their good conscience, cannot proceed with the case. In addition, the judges could also argue, if they are of the opinion that the US violated the sovereignty of Yemen, that they should not extradite the suspect to the former State for they would then support, in a way, that violation from the US, cf. also the 1982 Swiss case of X and Article 16 of the DARS (discussed in that case).[557] which violates the laws of the foreign state, international law or the legal rights of the individual within that state, and thus offends against the principle of comity; (b) which circumvents extradition arrangements made with that state; (c) which instead brings the suspect by coercion into the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom's courts; and (d) but for which the domestic proceedings could not have been initiated." (House of Lords, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 357 (Decision of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, Justice Sedley).) (Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle, in a hypothetical exercise that he could use the Bennett discretion in the context of extradition procedures, did not refuse jurisdiction in the end, but it is not clear from his words whether he is of the opinion that every luring operation cannot lead to the ending of the case or whether this specific luring operation (in which, according to him, no coercion had been used) could not lead to the ending of the case.) However, even though courts may thus refuse jurisdiction if they are of the opinion that the luring operation, even if it did not violate another State's sovereignty (so seriously), may constitute such reprehensible conduct under national law that it cannot be legally 'approved' by continuing the case, there have also been courts which were of the opinion that luring, not looking at international law issues now, cannot lead to the ending of the case (unless in the case of Toscanino-like mistreatment situations). See, for example, the following words from Yunis (explaining the US position on this technique): "In cases where defendants have urged the court to dismiss the indictment solely on the grounds that they were fraudulently lured to the United States, courts have uniformly upheld jurisdiction." (US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909), p. 920.) A court, in determining whether jurisdiction must be refused or not, may hereby also look at human rights considerations. See in that respect also the discussion in the context of the Stocké case in Chapter III and the question as to whether a luring operation can be seen as a technique against the will of the suspect (this may lead to a human rights violation).

---

[557] See n. 453 and accompanying text. See also German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 2, 43 International Legal Materials (2004), pp. 781-782: "On the German side, an obstacle precluding extradition could possibly result from this if the action of the Yemeni confidential informant on behalf of the United States investigation authorities were to be regarded as being contrary to

Al-Moayad, of course, did not agree with the outcome of his case before the Frankfurt am Main Higher Regional Court. As a result, he filed a constitutional complaint with the German Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht).

He thereby pointed to the 1982 case of the Swiss Federal Court mentioned earlier in this chapter because this Court, according to Al-Moayad, had confirmed the existence of a "general rule of international law pursuant to which no one may be extradited who has been abducted from his or her state of origin to the requested state in order to circumvent the ban on extradition that is valid in the state of origin".[558]

In its examination of whether the general rule of international law as alleged by Al-Moayad existed, the Court first explained what a general rule of international law in fact is and how it can be found.

---

international law. The territorial sovereignty of a state, which is an expression of its sovereignty, prohibits, in principle, sovereign acts by other states or by organs of state authority, on the territory of the state affected. In this context, private individuals' acts can be attributed to a state if, for instance, such acts are controlled by this state. Tortious action on the part of the United States would establish their responsibility under international law vis-à-vis Yemen. In such a case, there would be the risk that by extraditing the complainant, Germany would support a United States' action that is possibly contrary to international law, which would make Germany itself responsible under international law vis-à-vis Yemen. That such state responsibility can, under specific preconditions, be established by the support of third parties' action that is contrary to international law is shown by Article 16 of the International Law Commission's Draft Convention on State Responsibility, which codifies customary international law in this field".

[558] Ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, A., II., para. 1), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 778. Cf. also n. 452 where one can read: "Nach den Grundsätzen des Völkerrechts ist jeder Staat verpflichtet, die Souveränität anderer Staaten zu beachten; Handlungen eines Staates auf fremdem Staatsgebiet sind daher unzulässig. Soweit eine verfolgte Person sich im Ausland befindet, kann sie dem verfolgenden Staat nur mittels eines hoheitlichen Aktes des Staates, auf dessen Gebiet sie sich befindet, überstellt werden; werden Organen des verfolgenden Staates ohne Bewilligung auf dem Gebiet eines anderen Staates tätig, bemächtigen sie sich insbesondere des Verfolgten mittels Gewalt, List oder Drohung, verletzen sie die Souveränität (…). Wird die verfolgte Person mittels der erwähnten Vorkehren in eines Drittstaat gelockt, von dem daraufhin die Auslieferung des Betreffenden verlangt wirde, trägt der ersuchte Staat mit der Auslieferung zum Erfolg, nämlich der Behändigung des Verfolgten under Missachtung der Souveränität, mindestens mittelbar bei. Der Grundsatz der Souveränität gilt indes absolut, d. h. gegen jedermann. Als Verletzung dieses Grundsatzes muss dehalb auch gelten, wenn der Staat, dessen Souveränität nicht verletzt wird, das völkerrechtswidrige Vorgehen dadurch begünstigt, dass er den Verfolgten ausliefert. Diesfall macht sich der ersuchte Staat zum Gehilfen der Souveränitätsverletzung. (…) Sinn und Geist der verschiedenen Abkommen verbieten dem ersuchten Staat daher, Personen auszuliefern, die unter Umgehung der allein massgebenden inner- und zwischenstaatlichen Auslieferungsbestimmungen und unter Verwendung völkerrechtswidriger Mittel ins Ausland gelockt wurden." (Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, P 1201/81/fs, Urteil der II. öffentlichrechtlichen Abteilung vom 15. Juli 1982, X, belgischer Staatsangehöriger, gegen Bundesanwaltschaft, Eidg. Justiz- und Polizeidepartement, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 1983, p. 437.)

It stated that "[t]he general rules of international law are primarily customary international law that is of universal validity and that is complemented by accepted general principles of law".[559]

It then explained in more detail the two elements of customary international law, where it used a broad concept of practice (not limited to State practice):

> [I]ts evolution depends on two preconditions: firstly, on conduct that is continuous in time and as uniform as possible, and which takes place with a broad and representative participation of states and other subjects of international law with law-making authority; secondly on the opinion that is behind this practice "to act in the framework of what is required and permitted or necessary under international law" (opinio iuris sive necessitatis (...)).[560]

Focusing on State practice, the Court explained that one could, for example, look at the acts of courts "to the extent that their conduct is directly relevant under international law".[561] In addition, it stated that it would examine the "acts of bodies of international organisations, and in particular of international courts".[562] Although it may appear rather odd to look at the decisions of international courts to find out what States do, decisions of international courts often include overviews of national case law, for example, if the international judges want to find out whether a certain rule has support in State practice. It is, of course, unproblematic if those overviews (and hence the decisions which contain those overviews) are examined by judges to find out the position of States regarding a certain rule. However, decisions of international courts as such (which do not delve into the practice of States) arguably have nothing to do with State practice, although they may show how international practice more generally (a practice in which more actors that just States are active, see also the quotation from the Court at footnote 560 and accompanying text) copes with a certain rule.

It is not entirely clear whether the Federal Constitutional Court acts correctly in that respect as there are indications that the Court, when addressing the concept of State practice,[563] is not only interested in the references – in international decisions – to national case law[564] but also in decisions of international courts as such.[565]

---

[559] German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 a)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 782.

[560] Ibid.

[561] Ibid.: "The Federal Constitutional Court ascertains the existence and scope of general rules within the meaning of Article 25 of the Basic Law ["The general rules of international law shall be an integral part of federal law. They shall take precedence over the laws and directly create rights and duties for the inhabitants of the federal territory.", ChP] by consulting the relevant state practice".

[562] Ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 a)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 783.

[563] See ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 b), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 783: "The examination of state practice shows that the general rule of international law that is alleged by the complainant does not exist."

[564] The first two times the Federal Constitutional Court refers to international decisions are: 1) "[C]f International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolic, Decision of 5 June 2003 – IT-94-2-AR73, Appeals Chamber, numbers 24 et seq. with reference to the decision of the

Be that as it may, the German Federal Constitutional Court concluded that "[t]he examination of state practice shows that the general rule of international law that is alleged by the complainant does not exist"[566] because case law regarding the question of whether luring is an obstacle to extradition is heterogeneous.[567]

It also made a more general statement on the status of male captus bene detentus, asserting that "[t]he majority of decisions even does not regard the circumstances that preceded the arrest as an obstacle precluding criminal prosecution in the state of the forum",[568] although it also admitted that there is an exception with respect to the

---

U.S. Federal Court of Appeal, United States v. Toscanino, 500 Federal Reporter, Second Series 267 [1974]" (ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 b) aa)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 783) and 2) "After a comprehensive examination of state practice (...), the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia came to the conclusion that the criminal prosecution of a person who had been persuaded by deception to enter an area that was accessible to seizures by foreign organs of criminal prosecution can, in state practice, at any rate only be regarded as a violation of international law or of individual fundamental rights if an effective extradition treaty was circumvented or if the prosecuted person was subjected to the use of force in an unjustifiable manner (International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Prosecutor v. Dokmanovic [Motion for Release], Trial Chamber, decision of 22 October 1997 - IT-95-13a-PT -, International Law Reports Vol. 111 [1998], p. 459 [at p. 490]; International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolic, Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest of 5 June 2003, IT-94-2-AR73, numbers 20 et seq.)." (Ibid., B., I., para. 3 b) bb) (1), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 784.)

[565] After all, some references are so general and indeterminate that they could also be seen as including the views of international decisions as such. For example, although para. 24 of the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in the Nikolić case (see the previous footnote) refers to the conclusions reached by the ICTY after having reviewed national State practice, and although the following paragraphs of that decision (25, 26 and 27) continue on these conclusions, they also contain views of the ICTY itself. See also the explicit reference by the Federal Constitutional Court to para. 26 of the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in the Nikolić case (the third time the Federal Constitutional Court refers to an international decision): "Moreover, recent state practice also takes the seriousness of the crime with which the person is charged into account, which means that in this respect, it takes proportionality into consideration. The protection of high-ranking legal interests, which has been intensified on an international level in recent years, can lend itself to justifying the violation of a state's personal sovereignty that possibly goes along with the use of trickery (cf. International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolic, loc. cit., number 26)." (German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 b) bb) (3)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 785.) It must be noted that the two decisions in the Nikolić case which the ICTY uses to back its view that the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged is relevant in the male captus discussion are the Eichmann and Barbie cases which date from 1962 and 1983, respectively. One can wonder whether the Federal Constitutional Court is referring to these cases (whose recentness can be doubted, see also n. 590) when it says that recent State practice takes the seriousness of the crime with which the person is charged into account or whether it is in fact referring to the 2003 ICTY case itself. Again, it is unproblematic to refer to such international decisions as such if one is interested in international practice more generally (see n. 560 and accompanying text) but one can arguably not refer to these decisions as such if one is examining the concept of State practice.

[566] German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 b)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 783.

[567] See ibid.

[568] Ibid.

male captus situation of abduction (which, however, was not applicable in this luring case):

> In this context, it need not be decided whether a national obstacle precluding criminal proceedings or extradition results from customary international law if the prosecuted person has been taken from his or her state of origin to the state of the forum or to the requested state by use of force. Admittedly, more recent state practice, in particular as a consequence of dealing with the U.S. Supreme Court decision in the Alvarez-Machain case (…) indicates that the principle male captus, bene detentus is rejected at any rate if the state of the forum got hold of the prosecuted person by committing serious human rights violations, and if the state whose territorial sovereignty was violated protested against such procedure (cf. International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolic, Decision of 5 June 2003 – IT-94-2-AR73, Appeals Chamber, numbers 24 et seq. with reference to the decision of the U.S. Federal Court of Appeal, United States v. Toscanino, 500 Federal Reporter, Second Series 267 [1974]; see also Wilske, Die völkerrechtliche Entführung und ihre Rechtsfolgen, 2000, pp. 272 et seq., at p. 336, with further references). The facts of the present case, however, differ from these cases in important details.[569]

Before turning to the remainder of this decision, it is interesting to examine in greater detail the Court's conclusion on the status of the male captus bene detentus maxim. It appears that the Court is of the opinion that State practice shows that there are two distinct grounds which must lead in any event to the rejection of the male captus bene detentus rule.

At first, the words "against such procedure" seem to refer to the words "if the state of the forum got hold of the prosecuted person by committing serious human rights violations". That would mean that there is only one situation which leads to the male captus male detentus result, namely when the State of the forum gets hold of the prosecuted person by committing serious human rights violations and the State whose territorial sovereignty was violated (by this male captus, which engendered serious human rights violations) protested against this male captus (which engendered serious human rights violations and which violated its territorial sovereignty). However, it can be argued that "against such procedure" does not refer to the words "if the state of the forum got hold of the prosecuted person by committing serious human rights violations", but to the words "if the prosecuted person has been taken from his or her state of origin to the state of the forum or to the requested state by use of force" mentioned earlier (see the first sentence of the quotation). That would mean that the more recent State practice indicates that there are two situations which, in any event, must lead to a male captus male detentus result, namely in the case of 1) an abduction (the taking of the person from his State of residence/origin to the forum/requested State by use of force) accompanied by serious human rights violations (as one could argue that an abduction as such can already be seen as a serious violation of the human right to liberty and security, the [569] Ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 b) aa)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 783.

Court probably means serious violations/mistreatment in the course of the abduction here) or 2) an abduction followed by a protest from the injured State.

The Court's sources support the idea that the German judges assume the existence of two situations here. With respect to the reference to Toscanino (in the still-to-discuss (see Chapter VI) Nikolić case): until the Alvarez-Machain case was issued, US courts, confronted by an abduction, were arguably of the opinion that Toscanino and its aftermath stood for the idea that a court had to refuse jurisdiction in two situations, namely if that abduction 1) was followed by a protest (and a request for the return of the abducted person) from the injured State, see, for example, Verdugo-Urquidez[570] or 2) was accompanied by serious mistreatment, whether or not there was a protest from the injured State, see, for example, Lujan.[571]

It is true that Alvarez-Machain (in which the Supreme Court did not refuse jurisdiction in the case of an abduction which was followed by a protest and request for the return of Alvarez-Machain and about which the judges even stated that it may be "shocking") quashed the male detentus situation of Toscanino with respect to an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect by the injured State.

Although the word "shocking" is reminiscent of the second male detentus situation of Toscanino (namely an abduction accompanied by serious mistreatment),

[570] See also, more generally, American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third, Foreign Relations Law of the United States, 1987, para. 432 ('Measures in Aid of Enforcement of Criminal Law'), comment 'c' ('Consequences of violation of territorial limits of law enforcement'): "If a state's law enforcement officials exercise their functions in the territory of another state without the latter's consent, that state is entitled to protest and, in appropriate cases, to receive reparation from the offending state. If the unauthorized action includes abduction of a person, the state from which the person was abducted may demand return of the person, and international law requires that he be returned. If the state from which the person was abducted does not demand his return, under the prevailing view the abducting state may proceed to prosecute him under its laws." Note that this specific male captus male detentus situation was also already recognised by the German Federal Constitutional Court 17 years earlier in the Stocké case: "Ein Blick auf die Staatenpraxis zeigt, daß Gerichte es nur dann allgemein ablehnen, ein Strafverfahren gegen einen völkerrechtswidrig Entführten zu betreiben, wenn der durch die Entführung verletzte Staat gegen die Unrechtshandlung protestiert und die Rückgabe des Entführten gefordert hat". (BVerfG (1. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 17.7 1985 – 2 BvR 1190/84. NJW 1986, Heft 22, p. 1428.)

[571] See also, more generally, American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third, Foreign Relations Law of the United States, 1987, para. 433 ('External Measures In Aid Of Enforcement Of Criminal Law: Law Of The United States', para. 2: "A person apprehended in a foreign state, whether by foreign or by United States officials, and delivered to the United States, may be prosecuted in the United States unless his apprehension or delivery was carried out in such reprehensible manner as to shock the conscience of civilized society." Cf. also the 1986 decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court (BVerfG (3. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 3.6 1986 – 2 BvR 837/85. NJW 1986, Heft 48, pp. 3021-3022), which involved an abduction without a protest and request for the return of the abducted suspect from the injured State. Here, the Court stated that jurisdiction could also be refused under domestic law if the situation could be qualified as an "extremely exceptional case". The meaning of this rather general concept is not clear, but one may argue that it involves Toscanino-like circumstances, see also Wilske 2000, p. 334, n. 413 (commenting on this concept): "[D]as Gericht hatte hier möglicherweise die schweren Folterungen im Toscanino-Fall im Auge." See also Grams 1994, pp. 70-71.

it is arguably not so that that exception is no longer valid in US courts, see footnote 206.

However, to the extent that States are of the opinion that Alvarez-Machain has quashed both male detentus situations, one can argue that the immense criticism towards this decision in general is proof of the idea that many States are of the opinion that in those two situations (an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect, and an abduction accompanied by serious mistreatment) jurisdiction must be refused.

Before turning to the reference to Wilske, it must again be emphasised that the serious mistreatment exception may also be applied to other male captus situations, meaning that a luring operation accompanied by serious mistreatment may perhaps also lead to the ending of the case, see, for example, Yunis.[572]

However, even if there are courts which will refuse to exercise jurisdiction in the case of a luring operation accompanied by serious mistreatment – arguably a good thing – it is less clear whether there is also general support in State practice for that idea. The Alvarez-Machain case does not shed further light on this issue for that case did not involve a luring, but an abduction operation.

With respect to the reference to page 336 of Wilske's book: on this page, where the author writes about the worldwide protests against the Alvarez-Machain case (in whose aftermath the German Court seems also very interested),[573] one can read:

> Gerade diese Entscheidung [namely the Alvarez-Machain decision, ChP] ist der Schlüssel zu einer geänderten Staatenpraxis, die die male captus, bene detentus-Regel zumindest im Fall eines Staatenprotestes wie auch bei schweren Menschenrechtsverletzungen eindeutig ablehnt.[574]

Hence, Wilske also concludes that there are two situations in more recent State practice which, in any event, must lead to the male captus male detentus outcome, namely if the male captus (Wilske arguably refers here to an abduction) 1) is followed by a protest from the injured State or ("wie auch") 2) engenders serious human rights violations.

In addition, the point mentioned above, that the Court probably writes about 'serious mistreatment in the course of the abduction' (when it refers to "if the state of the forum got hold of the prosecuted person by committing serious human rights violations") not only finds support in the Toscanino exception, but also in Wilske. Although his above-mentioned words do not indicate this ("bei schweren

[572] See also the 1985 Stocké case, which involved a luring case and where the German Federal Constitutional Court stated that jurisdiction would be refused under national law if the situation could be seen as an "extremely exceptional case". As explained in the previous footnote, although the meaning of this concept is not clear, one may argue that it involves Toscanino-like circumstances, see again Wilske 2000, p. 334, n. 413 (commenting on this concept): "[D]as Gericht hatte hier möglicherweise die schweren Folterungen im Toscanino-Fall im Auge." See also again Grams 1994, pp. 70-71.

[573] The German Court namely writes about "more recent state practice, in particular as a consequence of dealing with the U.S. Supreme Court decision in the Alvarez-Machain case".

[574] Wilske 2000, p. 336.

Menschenrechtsverletzungen" is still rather general), another (and broader!)[575] formulation of Wilske's conclusion, which, again, stresses that there are two male detentus situations, is clearer in that respect: "Ein Strafverfahrenshindernis aus Völkerrechts ist immer dann anzunehmen, wenn der verletzte Staat protestiert hat. Dies gilt aber auch, wenn die Entführung von schweren Menschenrechtsverletzungen begleitet war [emphasis added, ChP]."[576]

It must be emphasised that the above-mentioned situations concern cases where male captus bene detentus is rejected at any rate, in any event. That does not mean, however, that courts may not utilise a lower male captus male detentus threshold. There have also been male captus cases (not necessarily involving abductions) where the court refused/would refuse jurisdiction where the suspect was not seriously mistreated and where there was no protest from the injured State, see, for example, the cases of Hartley, Levinge, Bennett and the still-to-discuss cases of Ebrahim and Beahan. And rightly so (to add a normative note here). After all, why should a suspect have to prove, for example, that the injured State protested the abduction if it has been established that he was abducted by agents from the now prosecuting State? Likewise, why should a suspect have to prove that he was seriously mistreated during this abduction, or that he was abducted at all? Should the fact that authorities of a State have resorted to a serious male captus (one should not limit oneself to an abduction here) in circumvention of available procedures not already suffice to divest jurisdiction, whether or not there was a protest from the injured State and whether or not the suspect was seriously mistreated in the course of this male captus?[577] Is not the fact that State agents have turned to such illegal methods already enough for a court to refuse jurisdiction?[578] One could argue that the (lower) tests produced by Hartley, Levinge, Bennett, Ebrahim and Beahan are much more appropriate if the court wants to protect values like State sovereignty, human rights, due process of law/the rule of law, including the integrity of the judicial and executive proceedings. Only a lower male detentus standard can effectively deter the prosecuting authorities from using dubious methods in bringing

[575] After all, on p. 336 of his book (see the previous footnote and accompanying text), Wilske writes about State practice (which, it is reminded, is only one element of customary international law) whereas on p. 340 (and p. 349) of his book (see the next footnote and accompanying text), he argues that these two situations are not only recognised by more recent State practice, but in fact by international (customary) law more generally. (Wilske uses the word "Völkerrecht" here, but it is clear that he means "Völker*gewohnheits*recht". See, for example, Wilske 2000, p. 338: "Ziel der hier dargestellten Staatenpraxis war, eine Antwort auf die Frage zu erhalten, ob Völker*gewohnheits*recht einem Strafverfahren gegen völkerrechtswidrig entführte Personen entgegensteht [emphasis added, ChP].")

[576] Wilske 2000, p. 340. See also ibid., p. 349: "Nach Auswertung der Staatenpraxis ist ein Strafverfahrenshindernis aus Völkerrechts immer dann anuznehmen, wenn der verletzte Staat protestiert hat oder wenn die Entführung von schweren Menschenrechtsverletzungen begleitet war [emphasis added, ChP]."

[577] See also Michell 1996, p. 403.

[578] See also Hamid 2004, p. 85: "It is a long established legal principle that an illegal act does not give rise to any right; ex injuria jus non oritur. Since the act of abduction itself is illegal and invalid under international law, the abducting State does not have a right to subject the abducted individual to its laws and proceedings following such illegal abduction."

a suspect to trial. However, it must also be remarked that these tests assume the involvement of the prosecuting State's authorities in the male captus. One can imagine that there might also be judges who will refuse jurisdiction if they deem the male captus so serious that they feel that jurisdiction must be refused, even if the authorities from the now prosecuting State were not involved in the male captus (for example, if the suspect were seriously mistreated in the process of his arrest and detention).

Returning to the decision in Al-Moayad itself (which seemingly rejected an earlier decision from 19 October 1994),[579] as explained in the final sentence of the Court's quotation mentioned above, the judges were of the opinion that this case did not meet the two situations which State practice recognises as undisputed male detentus avenues. This was because both situations require at least an abduction by the forum State, which was not the case here (Al-Moayad was lured but not abducted from Yemen and in addition, Germany was not responsible for the male captus).[580] According to the German Court, "[i]t cannot be ascertained that a [579] In that decision, the German Federal Constitutional Court did not identify a general rule of international law, forbidding the exercise of jurisdiction in the case of a luring operation followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect by the injured State (the Netherlands). That reasoning is still in conformity with the earlier-mentioned German cases and this case of Al-Moayad, which, after all, at least demand an abduction. However, the Court also noted, in an obiter dictum: "Selbst bei Vorliegen einer völkerrechtswidrigen Entführung, die wegen der Gewaltanwendung einen stärkeren Eingriff in die Gebietshoheit des Aufenthaltsstaates darstellen dürfte als das Herauslocken mit List, bestehen sowohl in der Staatenpraxis wie auch in der völkerrechtlichen Literatur unterschiedliche Auffassungen zu der Frage, ob bei Protest des verletzten Staates die völkerrechtswidrige Ergreifung ein Strafverfahren im Gerichtsstaat aus Gründen des Völkerrechts hindert". See Wilske 2000, p. 335, with reference to BVerfG NStZ 1995, 96. (Oehmichen (2007, p. 236) also refers to this case, with the reference BVerfG 2 BvR 435/87, 48 NJW 651 f (1995).) However, Wilske notes that the judges referred here to literature stemming from the 1980s (with the exception of a 1992 study from Oppenheim) which do not shed light on the more recent State practice, in particular the reactions from States in the aftermath of the Alvarez-Machain decision. (See Wilske 2000, p. 335.) Nevertheless, the German Court did look at the US decision itself and commented that "[o]bwohl im Verfahren auch die Frage einer das Strafverfahren hindernden Norm des Völkergewohnheitsrechts aufgeworfen wurde, ging der Supreme Court in seiner Entscheidung nicht vom Bestehen einer solchen Regel aus". See ibid. Wilske notes (see ibid., p. 336) that this is not correct as the Supreme Court only looked at the treaty and not at customary international law. However, even though the Supreme Court indeed focused on the treaty, it did seemingly also indirectly look at international law, namely to find out whether international law was so strong on this particular topic that it had to be read into the treaty. As that was not the case, there was no treaty violation and it was deemed not necessary to look at the international law dimension more generally, see n. 203 and accompanying text. Notwithstanding this, one can agree with Wilske that it is surprising that the German Court did not take into account the "weltweiten Protestes gegen diese Entscheidung" (ibid.).

[580] See German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 b) aa)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 783: "The facts of the present case, however, differ from these cases in important details. Because the complainant's decision to leave Yemen was based on the complainant's voluntary decision. According to the statement of his secretary, the complainant himself suggested Frankfurt am Main as the venue of a meeting that was supposed to serve fundraising on account of the favourable visa regulations for Yemeni citizens in Germany and of the good traffic connections. Admittedly, the complainant has been deceived by trickery so that the motives for which he travelled to Germany were based on practice under international law has evolved for these facts of the case that would make the extradition appear to be an infringement of customary international law."[581]

This, again, appears to be a correct observation of the law. Several (international) cases show that luring as such and not committed by the forum State is no obstacle to a subsequent extradition or criminal prosecution.[582]

Although at least one case can be mentioned which contradicts that view, namely the 1982 Swiss case of X, the German Federal Constitutional Court is arguably correct when it states that "[s]uch practice (...) is not sufficiently widespread as to be regarded as consolidated practice that creates customary international law."[583]

However, even though the situations which must definitely lead to the ending of the case do not apply in this case, one can wonder whether the luring operation of Al-Moayad did not involve a violation of international law and whether that violation, if any, should then not lead to another, less far-reaching remedy. The Court also touched upon this point, stating:

> [I]t cannot be left out of consideration that it is even doubtful under which preconditions the luring of a prosecuted person out of his or her state of residence by means of trickery – unlike the use of force – can be regarded as an act that is contrary to international law at all (...). To the extent that in the case of the use of trickery, the prosecuted person's intended border crossing is also motivated by his or her own interests, and to the extent that the possibility exists that the prosecuted person decides against departure, the prosecuted person, as a general rule, is not object of state coercion. Admittedly, the boundary between luring someone out of a state by means of trickery and breaking someone's will by the use of force can be fluid in a deception. However, he was not subjected to direct force aimed at bending his will, and he was also not threatened with the use of force, and the trickery did not facilitate a subsequent forceful abduction. The acts of deception were not performed by German authorities, and they are also not attributable to them. Finally, there are no indications that would permit the assumption that the German authorities cooperated with the United States criminal prosecution and investigation authorities in a collusive manner in order to induce the complainant to travel exactly to Germany."

---

[581] Ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 b) bb)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 783.

[582] See also ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 b) bb) (1)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), pp. 783-784. Cases mentioned by the German Federal Constitutional Court are the English Schmidt case (see Subsection 1.2), the US United States v Wilson case (see the end of this footnote for more information), the Canadian Hartnett case (see again the end of this footnote for more information) and two cases from the ICTY, namely the Dokmanović (see Subsection 3.1.1 of the following chapter) and Nikolić (see Subsection 3.1.4 of the following chapter) case. Although this latter case did not involve a luring operation, the decision did refer to, among other things, the luring cases of Stocké and Dokmanović. For more information on the Wilson and Hartnett cases, see ibid., p. 784: "In the United States v Wilson case, the U.S. Federal Court of Appeal upheld the indictment of the prosecuted person, who had been persuaded by an agent to leave his refuge in Libya on the grounds that he had merely become the victim of "a non-violent trick" (U.S. Federal Court of Appeal, 721 Federal Reporter, Second Series 967 [1983]). The Canadian Ontario High Court of Justice ruled in the Hartnett proceedings that the arrest of two United States citizens for fraud-related offences, who had been invited to Canada under the pretext of being examined as witnesses there, did not justify the assumption of an obstacle precluding proceedings (Ontario High Court of Justice, Re Hartnett and the Queen, decision of 20 September 1973, 14 Canadian Criminal Cases 6)."

[583] Ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 b) bb) (2)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 784.

> borderline area, for instance if someone is deluded into believing something that has the effect of an irresistible coercion on the person affected. Such circumstances, however, do not exist here. Instead, the complainant travelled to the federal territory on account of an autonomous decision in order to pursue specific own interests there.[584]

It is, of course, true that luring operations differ and that an operation in which coercion is used and in which someone leaves his State of residence clearly against his will can be seen as more serious than a luring operation in which a person comes to another State because he has merely been deceived. This may more easily lead to a violation of someone's human rights[585] and even to a court's refusal to exercise jurisdiction.[586] However, this does not mean that in each case, the sovereignty of a State (and hence classical international law) may not have been breached.

It is arguably very well possible that a luring operation is non-coercive in nature, but nevertheless violates the sovereignty of the State where the 'luring' agent was executing the police work which ultimately led to the arrest outside of the territory of the injured State.[587] As explained above, the most appropriate reparation in the case of a violation of another State's sovereignty is restitution and would hence mean the return of the lured suspect if the injured State protests and requests his return. However, it is also clear that there does not seem to be a general rule in the practice of courts that judges refuse jurisdiction after a luring operation, arguably because luring is not seen as such a serious violation of international law that a return is required. However, in that case, it would arguably be appropriate if the court now handling the case would nevertheless repair the wrong caused by this violation of State sovereignty. (In addition to granting remedies to the suspect if his human rights were violated by the luring operation.)

Although the German Federal Constitutional Court was of the opinion that both situations which must in any event lead to a rejection of male captus bene detentus were not applicable here and although it can be assumed, see the first words of the quotation at footnote 584 and accompanying text, that the Court would not refuse jurisdiction in the case of normal luring executed by German agents (and perhaps followed by a protest), one still wonders how the German Court would react in the case of a normal abduction executed by German agents but without a protest from the injured State and not accompanied by serious violations/mistreatment, or in the case of a luring operation executed by German agents and accompanied by serious mistreatment. Perhaps, the two earlier German cases from 1985 (Stocké) and 1986 (see footnote 519 and accompanying text) may provide the answers here. The first can be read to imply that a luring operation executed by German agents and accompanied by serious mistreatment could lead to the ending of the case whereas [584] Ibid., 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 b) bb) (3)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), pp. 784-785.

---

[585] See the discussion on this issue in the context of the Stocké case.
[586] See the discussion on this issue in the context of the Schmidt case.
[587] See Subsection 2.1 of Chapter III.

the case from 1986 entails that an abduction as such, without protest or mistreatment, would not lead to a refusal.

Very interestingly, the German Federal Constitutional Court also referred to the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged as an element to take into consideration in the male captus discussion. Although a court is, of course, entitled to deem such an element important – in fact there is no reason why a judge should not take that important aspect of the case into account if some generally accepted rule does not already dictate a certain remedy in the case of a violation (which does not seem the case here) – the Court's references to back its view are arguably weak. It stated:

> [R]ecent state practice also takes the seriousness of the crime with which the person is charged into account, which means that in this respect, it takes proportionality into consideration. The protection of high-ranking legal interests, which has been intensified on an international level in recent years, can lend itself to justifying the violation of a state's personal sovereignty that possibly goes along with the use of trickery (cf. International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolic, loc. cit., number 26). To the extent that the fight of most serious crimes such as the support of international drugs trade and of terrorism is concerned, luring someone out of a state's territorial sovereignty by means of trickery is not, at any rate to the extent that would be required to demonstrate state practice, regarded as an obstacle precluding criminal prosecution. Nothing different can apply as regards the existence of an obstacle precluding extradition.[588]

Although the German Federal Constitutional Court speaks of "recent state practice", paragraph 26 of the Appeals Chamber's decision in the Nikolić case[589] essentially concerns the ICTY's own views on this problem.

As already stated, see footnote 565, one can wonder whether the views of the ICTY can be seen as evidence of State practice but perhaps, the German Federal Constitutional Court is mainly interested in the cases on which the ICTY relies to support its view.

However, in that case, one might wonder whether the word "recent (state practice)" is well chosen as the two cases mentioned by the ICTY were not decided that recently (namely in 1962 (the Eichmann case) and 1983 (the Barbie case)).[590] In addition to this, although it was shown that there are indeed indications that the [588] German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 b) bb) (3)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 785.

[589] Although it must be noted that this case did not involve a luring operation, the observation made here is arguably of a more general nature.

[590] It is to be noted that this book is also of the opinion that Barbie is not a recent case. The fact that it nevertheless has been included in the subsection 'more recent cases' (note, however, that the subsection is not called 'recent cases') must be seen in light of the fact that there are many (very) old male captus cases and that the Toscanino case of 1974 has been chosen as the dividing line between the older cases and the more recent cases.

Supreme Court of France may have taken into account the seriousness of the crimes with which Barbie was charged in its decision whether or not jurisdiction had to be declined, it will be shown in Subsection 3.1 of this chapter and Subsection 3.1.4 of the next chapter that the ICTY's reliance on the Eichmann case is incorrect as the Israeli courts did not continue with the exercise of jurisdiction because of Eichmann's alleged heinous crimes, but because the male captus bene detentus maxim was in those days an accepted rule of law, applicable to anyone, whether that 'anyone' was charged with fraud or with crimes against humanity.

It must be noted that one could argue, now that the ICTY Appeals Chamber's reference to the Eichmann case (as support for the idea that the seriousness of the alleged crimes must be taken into account in the male captus discussion) is found to be incorrect, that the German Court's reference to Nikolić is also incorrect.

However, as already explained,[591] the ICTY Appeals Chamber also made some observations of its own concerning this issue, after it had discussed the inter-State context. And there is, of course, no problem if the German Court wants to refer to those observations if it is interested in international practice more generally, see also footnote 560 and accompanying text. (Note, however, that in that case, it should not refer to "recent state practice".)

Finally, the Court also rejected Al-Moayad's claims that German law was violated by the operation, hereby again referring to the seriousness of the crimes with which he was charged.[592]

On the same day that his extradition to the US was authorised by the German Government (14 November 2003),[593] Al-Moayad lodged an application with the ECtHR, in which he, among other things, claimed that his detention pending extradition was unlawful pursuant to Article 5, paragraph 1 of the ECHR, "as his placement under surveillance in and abduction from Yemen had breached public international law",[594] and that for the same reasons the extradition proceedings in [592] See, for example, German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03, B., IV., para. 3, 43 International Legal Materials (2004), pp. 786-787: "Also against the standards of German law, the use of confidential informants in order to prevent or to resolve criminal offences with a terrorist background does not meet with reservations with a view to the proportionality of the means employed (as concerns the prosecution of particularly serious crimes, which are difficult to resolve, in particular in the drugs trade".

[591] See n. 565.

[593] In the US, Al-Moayad was sentenced by the US District Court for the Eastern District of New York "to 75 years' imprisonment, the statutory maximum sentence, for conspiracy to support Al Qaeda and Hamas, for having provided material support to Hamas and for having attempted to provide material support to Al Qaeda." (ECtHR (Fifth Section), 'Decision as to the Admissibility of Application No. 35865/03 by Mohammed Ali Hassan Al-Moayad against Germany', 20 February 2007, para. 28.) However, on 2 October 2008, the US Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit overturned the conviction, arguing that the District Court had improperly admitted evidence during the trial which had prejudiced the jury. Almost a year later, on 7 August 2009, a plea agreement was reached: Al-Moayad pleaded guilty to conspiring to provide financial support to Hamas and was subsequently sentenced to time served. As a result, Al-Moayad (and the same goes for his secretary) were released and deported back to Yemen.

[594] Ibid., para. 50.

Germany had not been fair and were to be considered a breach of Article 6, paragraph 1 of the ECHR.[595]

The Court, which rendered its decision a little more than three years later,[596] first confirmed its Illich Ramirez Sánchez and Öcalan jurisprudence (see Subsection 2.2.4 of Chapter III) that "[t]he fact that a fugitive has been handed over as a result of cooperation between States does not in itself make the arrest unlawful or, therefore, give rise to any problem under Article 5".[597]

However, the Court also reiterated its views in cases such as Bozano and Stocké (see again Subsection 2.2.4 of Chapter III) that "lawfulness" also implies absence of any arbitrariness and hence that > extra-territorial measures of a respondent State resulting in the applicant's detention which entailed clear violations of international law, for instance in the case of forcing an applicant against his will to enter the respondent State in a manner that is inconsistent with the sovereignty of his host State, raise an issue under Article 5 § 1 of the Convention (…).[598]

With respect to this specific case, the Court noted that the German Federal Constitutional Court, "in a thoroughly reasoned decision",[599] had disagreed with Al-Moayad and secondly that it (the European Court itself), "[h]aving reviewed the national courts' finding that domestic law, including the rules of public international law applicable in the respondent State, authorised the applicant's detention pending extradition",[600] discerned "no issues that raise doubts about the compatibility of the applicant's detention with German law."[601]

However, it also looked at what had happened prior to Al-Moayad's arrest and detention in Germany, see also the above-mentioned quotation at footnote 598 and accompanying text.[602]

---

[595] See ibid.
[596] See ECtHR (Fifth Section), 'Decision as to the Admissibility of Application No. 35865/03 by Mohammed Ali Hassan Al-Moayad against Germany', 20 February 2007.
[597] Ibid., para. 80.
[598] Ibid., para. 81.
[599] Ibid., para. 84.
[600] Ibid., para. 85.
[601] Ibid., para. 85.
[602] See ibid., para. 86: "With "lawfulness" under Article 5 implying also the absence of arbitrariness, the Court moreover attaches weight to the circumstances which led to the applicant's arrest and detention". The Court referred here to para. 59 of its 2002 decision in Čonka v. Belgium (ECtHR (Third Section), Case of Čonka v. Belgium, Application No. 51564/99, 'Judgment', 5 February 2002), where it stated: "The Court reiterates its case-law whereby collective expulsion, within the meaning of Article 4 of Protocol No. 4, is to be understood as any measure compelling aliens, as a group, to leave a country, except where such a measure is taken on the basis of a reasonable and objective examination of the particular case of each individual alien of the group (…). That does not mean, however, that where the latter condition is satisfied the background to the execution of the expulsion orders plays no further role in determining whether there has been compliance with Article 4 of Protocol No. 4 [emphasis added, ChP]." See also ibid., paras. 41-42, where this point also comes back in the more specific context of Art. 5 of the ECHR: "[A]cts whereby the authorities seek to gain the trust of asylum-seekers with a view to arresting and subsequently deporting them may be found to contravene the general principles stated or

Two aspects were highlighted in that respect, namely the non-involvement of Germany in the luring operation[603] and the absence of the use of force.[604] It was already noted earlier that some decisions from the European institutions could be seen as support for the male captus bene detentus rule.[605] However, it was only now, in this case of Al-Moayad, that the Court explicitly pronounced itself on the status of the maxim in State practice (albeit in a case of bene deditus rather than in a case of bene detentus); it agreed with the German Federal Constitutional Court's position that "if a State apprehends a suspect by committing serious human rights violations and if the State whose territorial sovereignty is violated protests, State practice indicates that there is an obstacle to extradition and, consequently, to detention pending extradition."[606]

Furthermore, it found that "[i]n such cases, the detention also raises an issue under Article 5 § 1 of the Convention."[607]

Nevertheless, as no abduction occurred in this case, and as Germany was not involved in the male captus, the German Court's test which must in any event lead to the rejection of male captus bene detentus (and which assumes the existence of, at least, an abduction executed by the forum State) was not met here.

As Germany was not involved in the male captus, it could not be asserted either that Germany violated the human rights of Al-Moayad. (It should be remembered that this is an additional point, alongside the question of whether or not jurisdiction had to be refused, which can be examined.)

Furthermore, "[t]he cooperation between German and US authorities on German territory pursuant to the rules governing mutual legal assistance in arresting and detaining the applicant do not in itself give rise to any problem under Article 5".[608] As a result, this part of Al-Moayad's application was rejected.[609]

It must be stressed that because the European Court, like the German one, focuses on the situation where there is an obstacle to extradition in any event, it is not clear whether it would also accept a refusal of extradition/jurisdiction in a less implicit in the Convention. (…) [A] conscious decision by the authorities to facilitate or improve the effectiveness of a planned operation for the expulsion of aliens by misleading them about the purpose of a notice so as to make it easier to deprive them of their liberty is not compatible with Article 5 [emphasis added, ChP]."

---

[603] See ECtHR (Fifth Section), 'Decision as to the Admissibility of Application No. 35865/03 by Mohammed Ali Hassan Al-Moayad against Germany', 20 February 2007, para. 87: "It observes in the first place that it was not the respondent State itself – or persons for whose actions it must be deemed responsible – which had taken extraterritorial measures on Yemen's territory aimed at inciting the applicant to leave that country."

[604] See ibid., para. 88: "Moreover, the present case does not concern the use of force. The applicant was tricked by the US authorities into travelling to Germany. (…) [T]he use of force on the territory of a third-party State in violation of its territorial sovereignty in order to remove a suspect from his or her State of origin to the respondent State was not alleged in the present case."

[605] See ns. 388 and 595 of Chapter III.

[606] ECtHR (Fifth Section), 'Decision as to the Admissibility of Application No. 35865/03 by Mohammed Ali Hassan Al-Moayad against Germany', 20 February 2007, para. 88.

[607] Ibid.

[608] Ibid.

[609] See ibid., para. 89.

serious case than an abduction 1) accompanied by serious human rights violations/serious mistreatment or 2) followed by a protest from the injured State.

Finally, with respect to Al-Moayad's complaints under Article 6, paragraph 1 of the ECHR, the ECtHR stated that this provision does not apply to the extradition procedures in Germany.[610] As a result, that part of Al-Moayad's application was also rejected.[611]

3 INTERESTING CASES NOT (CLEARLY) FALLING UNDER EITHER SYSTEM

3.1 Older cases

There are several cases which do not clearly fall under either the common or civil law system but which still merit to be mentioned in any male captus bene/male detentus discussion. The first case which should be examined in this subsection is the already briefly mentioned[612] Scottish[613] Sinclair case. In this case, Matthew Sinclair, who was charged with the crime of breach of trust and embezzlement in Scotland, argued > that he had been arrested and imprisoned in Portugal by the Portuguese authorities without a warrant; that he had been put by them on board an English ship in the Tagus, and there had been taken into custody by a Glasgow detective-officer without production of a warrant; that during the voyage to London the vessel had been in the port of Vigo, in Spain, for several hours; that the complainer had demanded to be allowed to land there but had been prevented by the officer; that on arriving in London he was not taken before a magistrate, nor was the warrant endorsed, but he was brought direct to Scotland, and there committed to prison, and that no warrant whatever was produced or exhibited to him.[614]

---

[610] See ibid., paras. 93-94: "The Court reiterates that extradition proceedings do not concern a dispute ("contestation") over an applicant's civil rights and obligations (...) It further recalls that the words "determination ... of a criminal charge" in Article 6 § 1 of the Convention relate to the full process of examining an individual's guilt or innocence in respect of a criminal offence, and not merely, as is the case in extradition proceedings, to the process of determining whether or not a person may be extradited to a foreign country (...). Therefore, Article 6 is not applicable to the present case in so far as the applicant complained about the fairness of the extradition proceedings before the German courts." (Note, however, that the concept of fair trial in exceptional cases can play a role in extradition proceedings, namely in the case of a 'Soering circumstance' (see also n. 174 of Chapter VIII), "where the fugitive has suffered or risks suffering a flagrant denial of a fair trial in the requesting country". (Ibid., para. 100.) However, that was not the case here, see ibid., para. 107.)

[611] See ibid., para. 108.

[612] See ns. 38 and 45.

[613] The Scottish legal system is a mixture of civil and common law, see the extremely helpful 'Alphabetical Index of the Political Entities and Corresponding Legal Systems' of JuriGlobe, a research group from the Law Faculty of the University of Ottawa, available at: http://www.juriglobe.ca/eng/sys-juri/index-alpha.php.

[614] High Court of Justiciary, Sinclair v. Her Majesty's Advocate and Another, 20 March 1890, 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 39, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), pp. 5-6.

The first Justice to give his opinion was the Lord Justice Clerk (Lord MacDonald). He stated that judges cannot look at what other governments may have done wrongly in the process of bringing a person to Scotland[615] but if a Scottish official committed pre-trial irregularities, he can be held liable. Notwithstanding this, such irregularities will not lead to a male detentus, no matter what happened in this pre-trial period.[616] Lord Adam simply agreed with this.[617] The third Justice, Lord M'Laren, first combined the two reasons of the non-inquiry rule (see footnote 38) with respect to the proceedings of foreign governments.[618] He then explained that

> I am of opinion with your Lordships that, when a fugitive is brought before a magistrate in Scotland on a proper warrant, the magistrate has jurisdiction, and is bound to exercise it without any consideration of the means which have been used to bring him from the foreign country into the jurisdiction. In a case of substantial [615] See ibid., 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 41, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 7: "As regards the proceedings abroad and where the complainer was arrested, they may or may not have been regular, formal, and in accordance with the laws of Portugal and Spain, but we know nothing about them. What we do know is that two friendly powers agreed to give assistance to this country with a crime. If the Government of Portugal or of Spain has done anything illegal or irregular in arresting and delivering over the complainer his remedy is to proceed against these Governments. That is not a matter for our consideration at all, and we cannot be the judges of the regularity of such proceedings." See also ibid., 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 41, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 8: "It is said that the Government of Portugal did something wrong, and that the authorities in this country are not to be entitled to obtain any advantage from this alleged wrongdoing. As I have said, we cannot be the judges of the wrongdoing of the Government of Portugal. What we have here is that a person has been delivered to a properly authorised officer of this country, and is now to be tried on charge of embezzlement in this country. He is therefore properly before the court of a competent jurisdiction on a proper warrant. I do not think we can go beyond this. There has been no improper dealing with the complainer by the authorities in this country, or by their officer".

[616] See ibid., 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 41, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 7: "If there was any irregularity in the granting or execution of these warrants the person committing such irregularity would be liable in an action of damages if any damage was caused. But that cannot affect the proceedings of a public authority here." See also ibid., 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 42, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 8: "No irregularity, then, involving suspension can be said to have taken place on his arrival in London and on his journey here. But even if the proceedings here were irregular I am of opinion that where a court of competent jurisdiction has a prisoner before it upon a competent complaint they must proceed to try him, no matter what happened before, even although he may have been harshly treated by a foreign government, and irregularly dealt with by a subordinate officer."

[617] See ibid., 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 42-43, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 9: "I am of opinion with your Lordship that we cannot go behind the perfectly regular warrant under which the suspender was apprehended and brought before a competent court. If there was anything irregular and illegal in the mode in which the suspender was brought here, he will have his remedy against the wrongdoer".

[618] See ibid., 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 43, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 9: "With regard to the competency of the proceedings in Portugal, I think this is a matter with which we really have nothing to do. The extradition of a fugitive is an act of sovereignty on the part of the state who surrenders him. Each country has its own ideas and its own rules in such matters. Generally it is done under treaty arrangements, but if a state refuses to bind itself by treaty, and prefers to deal with each case on its merits, we must be content to receive the fugitive on these conditions, and we have neither title nor interest to inquire as to the regularity of proceedings under which he is apprehended and given over to the official sent out to receive him into custody [emphasis added, ChP]."

> infringement of right this Court will always give redress, but the public interest in the punishment of crime is not to be prejudiced by irregularities on the part of inferior officers of the law in relation to the prisoner's apprehension and detention.[619]

The exact scope of this quotation is not very clear. Because Lord M'Laren states not only that a magistrate is obliged to exercise jurisdiction "without any consideration of the means which have been used to bring him from the foreign country into the jurisdiction" but also that the Court will always give redress "[i]n a case of substantial infringement of right" one may think that these infringements are hence not connected to the way in which a suspect was brought from one jurisdiction to another. (After all, how can these infringements be connected to the means by which a suspect was brought from one jurisdiction to another if a magistrate cannot consider these means in the first place?) Thus, what is probably meant here is an infringement of right during the proceedings in the courtroom. If that infringement is substantial, then the court must give redress, although it is not clear what this entails exactly (for example, whether it also encompasses a refusal of jurisdiction). Although this is still quite understandable, the last part of the second sentence states that "the public interest in the punishment of crime is not to be prejudiced by irregularities on the part of inferior officers of the law in relation to the prisoner's apprehension and detention". This makes one wonder whether irregularities related to the arrest and detention committed by superior officers can prejudice the proceedings. However, if that were the true meaning of this part of the quotation, then it contradicts the first sentence of the quotation (namely that a magistrate must exercise jurisdiction "without any consideration of the means which have been used [emphasis added, ChP]" to bring a suspect from one jurisdiction to another).

It thus seems that the only certainty about the scope of this quotation is that it is uncertain.[620]

Therefore, it is quite hard to agree with Michell who rather straightforwardly states that Lord M'Laren "argued that the court would intervene to prevent the exercise of criminal jurisdiction where there had been "substantial infringement of right" [emphasis added, ChP]."[621] As one can see in the quotation mentioned above, Lord M'Laren only generally observes that the Court, in serious cases, will give redress, not that it will allow the more specific (and rather far-reaching) remedy of refusal of jurisdiction. A few sentences later, Michell writes that "Lord McLaren's suggestion that courts would refuse to allow criminal proceedings in certain circumstances suggests that the male captus bene detentus doctrine was not absolute."[622] Michell hereby connects the "substantial infringement of right" (in his eyes: a refusal of jurisdiction) to the male captus context, to the pre-trial context of arrest and detention. However, it is still doubtful whether this can in fact be done, given the fact that the first sentence of the quotation states that a magistrate must [619] Ibid., 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 44, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 10.

[620] Cf. also Jones and Doobay 2004, p. 82.
[621] Michell 1996, p. 449.
[622] Ibid.

exercise jurisdiction without any consideration of the means by which a person was brought into the now prosecuting jurisdiction.

The most well-known inter-State male captus case is, of course, the 1961/1962 Israeli[623] Eichmann case. Many aspects of this case have already been addressed earlier in this book, but one important point, which has also already been briefly mentioned, see Subsection 1.2 of Chapter I and Subsection 2.2 of this chapter (in the context of the Al-Moayad case), still needs to be addressed in further detail. It is often said (see also the next chapter and the discussion of the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić), that the Israeli courts applied the male captus bene detentus principle because of the seriousness of Eichmann's alleged crimes.[624]

As Sloan has correctly previously observed,[625] it is true that the District Court of Jerusalem/the Israeli Supreme Court proceeded with Eichmann's case (bene detentus) notwithstanding the fact that Eichmann was abducted from Argentina (male captus).

However, the judges did not apply this male captus bene detentus rule because Eichmann was accused of very serious crimes; the Israeli judges were of the opinion that "[i]t is an established rule of law that a person being tried for an offence against the laws of a State may not oppose his trial by reason of the illegality of his arrest or of the means whereby he was brought within the jurisdiction of that State [emphasis added, ChP]."[626] Hence, according to them, the rule was applicable to any person standing trial, not necessarily a person charged with very serious crimes. Admittedly, the seriousness of Eichmann's crimes did play a role for the Israeli judges, but not to defend the "established rule of law" summarised by male captus bene detentus; it played a role to defend the judges' usage of the universality [623] The Israeli legal system is a mixture of civil, common, Jewish and Muslim law, see again (see n. 613) JuriGlobe's 'Alphabetical Index of the Political Entities and Corresponding Legal Systems', available at: http://www.juriglobe.ca/eng/sys-juri/index-alpha.php. Another mixed legal system involving Muslim law, to also pay some attention to States with that legal background, is Egypt (mixture of Muslim and civil law), see again JuriGloves' Index. It may be interesting to note that El Zeidy has written about a decision of the Supreme Court of Egypt which upheld a decision of the public prosecutor (which has powers comparable with an investigating judge in the civil law system) to dismiss a case of unlawful arrest, see El Zeidy 2006, p. 455, n. 28, referring to "Egyptian Court of Cassation, Criminal Appeal No. 1762, Judicial Year 31, 10 April 1962".

[624] See also Michell 1996, p. 499: "It is also argued that the more serious the alleged offense, the less appropriate it is that a stay should be ordered. Conduct on the part of the domestic authorities amounting to an abuse of process in the case of a lesser offense might not amount to such an abuse where the alleged offense was more serious. There was no explicit mention of this factor in Bennett II itself, although it might be implied from Lord Lowry's suggestion that not every "venial irregularity" should result in a stay. [See, however, n. 301, ChP.] Roch, L.J., in Schmidt I did consider it a factor, however. [See n. 335 and accompanying text, ChP.] It emerges more clearly from cases such as Eichmann [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Van der Wilt 2004, p. 279 and Mohit 2006, p. 144.

[625] See Sloan 2006, pp. 329-330 or Sloan 2005, p. 494, n. 14.

[626] District Court of Jerusalem, The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann, 'Judgment', 12 December 1961, Criminal Case No. 40/61, para. 41 (36 International Law Reports 1968, p. 59). This observation was confirmed by their colleagues in the Israeli Supreme Court, see n. 15 of Chapter I. See also the last sentence of the quotation in n. 629.

principle,[627] whose rationale is that some crimes are so serious that even a State with no direct jurisdictional link can try a suspect charged with these serious crimes so that the latter can never escape justice. By using the universality principle, the Israeli judges claimed that they had the laws enabling them to exercise jurisdiction over Eichmann. However, as already explained in Subsection 1.2 of Chapter III, to start a trial, one must have not only the legal means, but also the person himself (jurisdiction ratione personae).[628] These are two separate issues and it is only in relation to the second where the problem of male captus bene/male detentus comes in.[629]

With respect to the application of the male captus bene detentus rule, it may in conclusion be interesting to mention that the District Court, whose judgment was far more extensive than that of the Supreme Court, not only referred to the well-known British and American male captus bene detentus cases such as Scott and Ker but also to, for example, the following two cases decided by the Supreme Court of Palestine,[630] cases which are also reviewed every now and then in the male captus discussion.

---

[627] See Supreme Court of Israel, Adolf Eichmann v. The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel, 'Judgment', 29 May 1962, Criminal Appeal No. 336/61, para. 12 (36 International Law Reports 1968, p. 304): "Not only do all the crimes attributed to the appellant bear an international character, but their harmful and murderous effects were so embracing and widespread as to shake the international community to its very foundations. The State of Israel therefore was entitled, pursuant to the principle of universal jurisdiction and in the capacity of a guardian of international law and an agent for its enforcement, to try the appellant [emphasis added, ChP]."

[628] Except, of course, in the case of a trial in absentia.

[629] See Supreme Court of Israel, Adolf Eichmann v. The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel, 'Judgment', 29 May 1962, Criminal Appeal No. 336/61, para. 13 (36 International Law Reports 1968, pp. 306-307): "The appellant is a "fugitive from justice" from the point of view of the law of nations, since the crimes attributed to him are of an international character and have been condemned publicly by the civilized world (…) and therefore, by virtue of the principle of universal jurisdiction, every country has the right to try him. This jurisdiction was automatically vested in the State of Israel on its establishment in 1948 as a sovereign State. Accordingly, in bringing the appellant to trial, it has functioned as an organ of international law and has acted to enforce the provisions of that law through its own laws. (…) Indeed, counsel for the appellant has here confused the question of the substantive penal jurisdiction of the State of Israel with the question whether his client enjoys immunity from the exercise of that jurisdiction against him by reason of the fact of his abduction. These two questions are entirely separate from one another. As has been indicated, the moment it is conceded that the State of Israel possesses criminal jurisdiction both according to local law and according to the law of nations, the Court is no longer bound to investigate the manner and legality of the appellant's detention, as indeed may be gathered from the judgments upon which the District Court has rightly relied [emphasis in original, ChP]."

[630] Although this Court was, of course, heavy influenced by British law (Britain officially controlled Palestine from 1923 to 1948 (when the State of Israel was created), 'the Mandate period'), it also applied local, Palestine law; British law and Palestine law were thus not similar. See also Baade 1961, who first notes on pp. 403-404 that "[i]t has been held in England that English courts "have no power to go into the question, once a prisoner is in lawful custody in this country, of the circumstances in which he may have been brought here [original footnote omitted, ChP]"" and then explains that this English rule from the Elliott case (see also Scott) "was received into the law of Palestine during the Mandate period [emphasis added, ChP]." (Ibid., p. 404, n. 12.) Baade consequently referred to the two cases which will now be mentioned very briefly in the main text.

The first is the 1941 case Yousef Said Abu Dourrah v. The Attorney-General.[631] In this case, the Court noted that the Defence of the appellant, who was extradited from Trans-Jordan to Palestine, brought before the Assize Court in Jerusalem and charged with murder, had argued "that the extradition proceedings were improper and that therefore the Assize Court had no jurisdiction to try the man".[632] The Court stated, however, that, if the Government was satisfied that the correct procedures of the extradition arrangement had been complied with, "that, we think, must be the end of the matter, except that possibly the courts of this country are not entitled to try the man for an offence different from that on which his extradition was obtained".[633] Furthermore, the Court also remarked with respect to the appellant's claim that his case concerned a political offence that "even supposing it were a political murder, nothing prevents the man, if he is within the jurisdiction of this country, from being tried for it".[634]

The second case is Afouneh v. Attorney-General from 1942.[635] In this case, the suspect, accused of (and later convicted for) murder had fled to Syria, where he was arrested by a British sergeant,[636] who subsequently brought him – against his will – to the frontier where he was arrested on the Palestinian side of the border.[637] There was an extradition treaty between Palestine and Syria and extradition papers had in fact been sent to Syria, but they only arrived there after Afouneh was brought to Palestine.

The Court was, however, of the opinion that he could be tried, even if no extradition had taken place:

> If there is an extradition agreement between two countries and a request for extradition is made, the government to whom the request is made must satisfy themselves that the formalities of the agreement have been complied with. It is a matter for them and not for the government which is making the application. When once the accused person has been handed over to the requesting government, the position would seem to be that, subject to the limitation that he cannot be tried for an offence other than that for which he was extradited, he cannot avail himself of the plea that the government to whom the request was made should not have extradited him at all because certain irregularities of procedure had occurred.[638]

---

[631] Supreme Court of Palestine (sitting as a Court of Criminal Appeal), Yousef Said Abu Dourrah v. The Attorney-General, 20 January 1941, Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, Vol. 10 (1941-1942), Case No. 101, pp. 331-332.
[632] Ibid., p. 331.
[633] Ibid.
[634] Ibid., p. 332.
[635] Supreme Court of Palestine (sitting as a Court of Criminal Appeal), Afouneh v. Attorney-General, 11 February 1942, Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, Vol. 10 (1941-1942), Case No. 97, pp. 327-328.
[636] At that time, Syria was occupied by the Allied Forces, see ibid., p. 327.
[637] See ibid.
[638] Ibid., pp. 327-328.

In making this male captus bene detentus statement, the Court referred to the Scott case and also to a quotation which is not from, but which can be traced back to, the decision of the US Supreme Court in Ker.[639]

3.2 More recent cases

Before turning to the first real case of this subsection, it must first be noted that the Eichmann reasoning was also upheld in Israel in more recent times. An example of this can be found in the case Vanunu, which, however, will not be addressed here in detail as the complete decisions of the Israeli courts in this case could not be consulted.[640]

However, what can be said about this case is that in late September 1986, Mordechai Vanunu, a former employee of the Israeli Negev Nuclear Research Center, was lured from London to Rome and from there abducted to Israel by the Mossad, after he had spoken with a journalist from the London newspaper The Sunday Times about Israel's nuclear capabilities.[641] In Israel, Vanunu objected to his abduction – note that the UK did not file a protest[642] but that Italy did object to the abduction[643] – but the Israeli courts were not impressed and rejected his claims.[644] On 27 February 1988, the Israeli District Court sentenced him to 18 years' imprisonment for treason and espionage and on 27 May 1990, Vanunu's appeal before the Israeli Supreme Court was dismissed.[645] This judgment was heavily [639] See ibid., p. 328: "Where a fugitive is brought back by kidnapping, or by other irregular means, and not under an extradition treaty, he cannot, although an extradition treaty exists between the two countries, set up in answer to the indictment the unlawful manner in which he was brought within the jurisdiction of the court. It belongs exclusively to the government from whose territory he was wrongfully taken to complain of the violation of its rights." As explained in the main text, these words will not be found in the Ker decision itself; they can be found in J.B. Moore's A digest of international law as embodied in diplomatic discussions, treaties, and other international agreements, international awards, the decisions of municipal courts, and the writings of jurists, and especially in documents, published and unpublished, issued by Presidents and Secretaries of State of the United States, the opinions of the Attorneys-General, and the decisions of courts, Federal and State, Vol. 4, Government printing office: Washington D.C. 1906, p. 311, where reference is made to the Ker case.

[640] See also Wilske and Schiller 1998, p. 226: "He was convicted of treason and espionage in a closed criminal proceeding; only the guilty verdict and sentence were made public [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[641] The Sunday Times published its story on 5 October 1986, a couple of days after Vanunu had disappeared, see Cherif Bassiouni 1987, p. 199. About the operation itself, The Sunday Times "later reported that Vanunu was lured by a female Mossad agent to Rome, "where he was attacked by two men and held down while she injected him with a powerful anesthetic. He was chained and smuggled out of Italy in a cargo ship."" (J. Cohen and N. Solomon, 'U.S. Media Still Ignoring Journalist Held in Israeli Cell', The Seattle Times, 30 December 1994, available at: http://community.seattletimes.nwsource.com/archive/?date=19941230&slug=1949829.)

[642] See Cherif Bassiouni 1987, p. 199.

[643] See Wilske 2000, p. 321.

[644] See Cherif Bassiouni 1987, p. 199: "At a hearing before the Jerusalem district court, on Dec. 21, 1986, Vanunu raised the issue of his kidnapping, but the court dismissed it." See also Quigley 1993, pp. 726-727 (n. 23).

[645] See Wilske and Schiller 1998, p. 226.

criticised by the European Parliament[646] which recalled that Vanunu "was kidnapped in Rome by the Israeli authorities, in order to stand trial"[647] and which reminded "the Government of Israel that the kidnapping (...) was a gross violation of the sovereignty of a Member State of the European Community".[648]

The first real case to be discussed here is the clearest example of a strict male captus male detentus decision ever pronounced by a judge (and as a result will be addressed here quite extensively): the already briefly mentioned[649] 1991 South African[650] Opinion in State v. Ebrahim case.[651]

Although South Africa had followed the traditional male captus bene detentus line in the past,[652] the Ebrahim case is a clear rupture with that tradition. In this case, the Appellate Division of the South African Supreme Court unanimously set aside the conviction by a South African trial court of South African citizen Ebrahim Ismail Ebrahim, who was charged with treason in 1987 and sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment. What had happened?

In 1964, Ebrahim, a member of Umkhonto We Sizwe (the military wing of the African National Congress (ANC)),[653] was convicted of several acts of sabotage and was sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment.[654] After his release in 1979, his movements were restricted to the magistrate's district of Pinetown in Natal.[655] Notwithstanding his restriction order, he fled to Swaziland on 19 December 1980 where, according to the South African Government, he became, among other things, active in anti-South African activities.[656] On 15 December 1986, Ebrahim was forcibly abducted from Swaziland to South Africa by two men who informed him

---

[646] See ibid.
[647] European Parliament, 'Resolution on the kidnapping and imprisonment of Mr Mordechai Vanunu', 14 June 1990, OJ C 175, 16 July 1990, p. 168, under C.
[648] Ibid., under 2.
[649] See Chapter II.
[650] The South African legal system is a mixture of civil law and common law, see again (see n. 613) JuriGlobe's 'Alphabetical Index of the Political Entities and Corresponding Legal Systems', available at: http://www.juriglobe.ca/eng/sys-juri/index-alpha.php. See also Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 892 where editor John Dugard explains: "The South African common law is Roman-Dutch law, comprising principles of Roman law and Germanic custom, as developed in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries by the writings of jurists and the decision of the courts in Holland and its associated provinces in the United Netherlands. It has been strongly influenced during the past two hundred years by the English common law."
[651] In this chapter, both the edited and abbreviated English translation in International Legal Materials, prepared by John Dugard (Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), pp. 888-899) and the English translation of the case in 95 International Law Reports (1994), pp. 417-445 were used.
[652] See, for example, the cases Abrahams v. Minister of Justice and R v. Robertson, see Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 895. See n. 685 for more information. See for more cases Dugard 1991, p. 200.
[653] See 95 International Law Reports (1994), p. 419.
[654] See Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 890.
[655] See ibid.
[656] See ibid.

that they were South African police officers.[657] Near the border, Ebrahim was picked up by armed men who brought him to Pretoria. During this trip, Ebrahim was questioned, among other things, about the ANC. From this, he inferred that they were members of the security police.[658] In Pretoria, Jan Cronjé, head of the security branch of the South African Police in the Northern Transvaal, was informed that Ebrahim was in Pretoria.[659] He arranged for Ebrahim to be brought to the police headquarters where Cronjé officially arrested him.[660] Ebrahim, who was subsequently charged with treason, then applied for release, submitting that his "abduction in Swaziland took place with the authority and knowledge of the South African Police or other agents of the South African state".[661] The South African police, however, denied that it had anything to do with the kidnapping.[662] Ebrahim's alternative allegation, namely that the kidnappers were South African agents, was left unanswered by the police.[663] Be that as it may, the above-mentioned Trial Court rejected the application[664] and Ebrahim was tried, convicted and sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment.

Because of the denials of the South African police, the Supreme Court – in the words of Judge Steyn who wrote the opinion of the Court – stated that it had to be [657] See ibid. The opinion of the Supreme Court did not say anything about the level of violence used against Ebrahim (except that he was "forcibly abducted"). In addition, the opinion informs that "[h]e was bound, blindfolded and gagged". (Ibid., p. 890.) In 95 International Law Reports (1994), where one can find more details on the abduction itself, one can read that Ebrahim's kidnappers "pointed guns at him and warned him that they would kill him if he screamed or made a noise." (95 International Law Reports (1994), p. 420.)

[658] See ibid., p. 421.

[659] See Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 891.

[660] See ibid. It may be rather amusing within the context of this academic study to note that Cronjé was accompanied by two other senior police officers and that, when Ebrahim complained to one of them, namely Brigadier Willem Schoon, that he had been abducted from Swaziland, that Schoon replied that he was now in South Africa and "that his alleged abduction was therefore of academic interest only". (95 International Law Reports (1994), p. 422.) As will be shown infra, the Supreme Court clearly disagreed with Schoon.

[661] Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 891.

[662] See ibid.

[663] See ibid.

[664] Ebrahim sought the following orders: "1. Directing and holding that the applicant is not amenable to the criminal jurisdiction of the Court in respect of the indictment referred to in paragraph 3. 2. Declaring that the applicant's apprehension and abduction in the Kingdom of Swaziland on 15 December 1986 and his subsequent transportation to the Republic of South Africa and purported arrest and detention pursuant thereto is in breach of international law and wrongful and unlawful. 3. Declaring that the applicant has not properly and lawfully been arrested and properly and lawfully been arraigned before a court of competent jurisdiction for the purposes of trying him on the indictment proffered by the prosecution against the applicant and two other persons. 4. Declaring that the applicant is entitled to be discharged from his imprisonment and detention at present pending his trial on the said indictment. 5. Granting to the applicant further or alternative relief." (95 International Law Reports (1994), pp. 418-419.)

accepted that they were indeed not involved in the abduction.[665] Nevertheless, it also had to be accepted that it was very likely that the kidnappers were South African State agents.[666] Taking this into account, the Supreme Court looked at the basic arguments of Ebrahim "that the abduction was a violation of the applicable rules of international law, that these rules are part of our law, and that the violation of these rules deprived the trial court of competence to hear the matter".[667] Ebrahim hereby focused on traditional international (namely inter-State) law and not, for example, on human rights law:

> It will be submitted that, having regard to all the facts, the appellant was not amenable to the criminal jurisdiction of the Court a quo, alternatively that if such jurisdiction in fact existed in theory, the Court a quo had a discretion as to whether the appellant should be tried and should, in the exercise of that discretion, have refused to exercise its jurisdiction in circumstances where there had been a fundamental breach of those rules of acceptable behaviour which govern the comity of nations.[668]

The Supreme Court subsequently made clear that it would not look at international law but at "our common law"[669] to resolve the issue.[670]

As already explained in footnote 650, this common law is a mixture of Roman-Dutch law and English common law. Hence, what the Supreme Court had to do was to examine the perspective of Roman law, Roman-Dutch law and South African law (which has been strongly influenced by English common law) on the present problem.

In its review of Roman law, the Supreme Court mentioned exactly the same three rules from the Digest as already presented in Chapter II of this study, namely D.1.18.3,[671] D.2.1.20[672] and D.48.3.7.[673] The Court then explained that

---

[665] See Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 891.

[666] See ibid., p. 891: "All the circumstances surrounding the abduction point very strongly to an involvement of the state in the abduction. This is confirmed by the failure of the police to disclose the identity of the abductors to the court despite the fact that their identity must have been known to the police. The appeal must therefore be decided on the basis that the appellant was abducted by agents of the South African state."

[667] Ibid., p. 892.

[668] Ibid.

[669] Ibid.

[670] See ibid.

[671] "The governor of a province has authority only over the people of his own province, and that only while he is in the province. For the moment he leaves it, he is a private citizen. Sometimes he has power even in relation to non-residents, if they have taken direct part in criminal activity. For it is to be found in the imperial warrants of appointment that he who has charge of the province shall attend to cleansing the province of evil men; and no distinction is drawn as to where they may come from." (D.1.18.3 (from Paul, Sabinus, book 13).) See Mommsen, Krueger and Watson 1985 A, pp. 34-35 and Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), pp. 892-893.

[672] "One who administers justice beyond the limits of his territory may be disobeyed with impunity". (D.2.1.20 (from Paul, Edict, book 1).) See Mommsen, Krueger and Watson 1985 A, p. 42 and Supreme

> [t]his limitation on the legal powers of Roman provincial governors and lawgivers is understandable and was unavoidable in the light of the great number of provinces comprising the Roman Empire in classical times, with their ethnic and cultural diversity, and their different legal systems which the politically pragmatic Romans allowed to remain largely in force in their conquered territories. Until late in the history of the Roman Empire certain provinces were controlled by the Senate and others by the Emperor. Intervention by one province in the domestic affairs of another was a source of potential conflict. In order to maintain sound mutual relations, a practice developed among provincial governors relating to the arrest and extradition of offenders.[674]

After having clarified that this practice became law in Justinian's Novellae Constitutiones,[675] the Supreme Court argued:

> It is inconceivable that the Roman authorities would recognize a conviction and sentence, and allow them to stand, when they were the result of an abduction of a criminal from one province on the order or with the co-operation of the authority of another province. This would not only have been an approval of illegal conduct, and therefore a subversion of authority, but would also have threatened the internal inter-provincial peace of the Empire.[676]

One can wonder, as was already explained in Chapter II, whether this is correct. After all, the fact that an inter-State abduction was forbidden in antiquity does not

---

Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 892.

[673] "It is customary for the governors of provinces in which an offense has been committed to write to their colleagues [in whose provinces] the perpetrators are alleged to live, requesting that they be returned along with those who are to prosecute them; this also is laid down in a number of rescripts." (D.48.3.7 (from Macer, Duties of the Governor, book 2).) See Mommsen, Krueger and Watson 1985 B, p. 801a and Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 893. (Note that the Ebrahim case speaks of "Macer, Duties of the Governor, book 1" here, but this is incorrect.)

[674] Ibid.

[675] See ibid. See Novella 134, Chapter 5: "When any one of the criminals whom we have just mentioned conceals himself, or leaves the province in which he has committed the offence, We order the judge to call him into court by the publication of lawful edicts, and if he does not obey, the judge shall proceed in the manner prescribed by the laws. If it should be ascertained that the guilty party is living in some other province, We order the judge of the district in which the offence was committed to notify the judge of the province in which the delinquent resides, by means of a letter, to arrest him on his own responsibility and that of his court, and to send the accused to him. When the judge who has received a public letter of this kind fails to do what We have stated, and his court does not surrender the criminal, or if it does not execute the orders given it, We decree that the said magistrate shall pay a fine of three pounds in gold, and his court an equal amount. If, induced by a desire for gain, a judge, or any officer of his court, does not arrest a person of this description, or if, after having arrested him, he does not deliver him up, he shall, after conviction, be deprived of his office, and sent into exile."

[676] Ibid., p. 894.

necessarily mean that the judges in those days could not opt for a male captus bene detentus outcome.[677] (This point will be further examined shortly.)

In its examination of Roman-Dutch law, the South African Supreme Court referred to several Roman-Dutch jurists from the 16th to the 19th century to conclude that "it is clear that the unlawful removal of a person from one jurisdiction to another was regarded as an abduction and as a serious breach of the law in Roman-Dutch law".[678]

However, this still does not say anything about the consequences of such an illegality on the jurisdiction of the court.[679]

This was the next point to be examined by the Supreme Court. It explained:

> A further question is whether a conviction and sentence following such an abduction, in the jurisdiction to which the person was abducted, had any legal validity in Roman-Dutch law. In other words, did the court before which the abducted person was brought to trial have the competence to try him? One would expect that it was not competent for the same reasons advanced in respect of the Roman Empire. Furthermore, it would have been pointless to have a strict prohibition on the violation of territorial sovereignty if it could be simply ignored without any adverse consequences in the ensuing legal proceedings.[680]

After referring to a 17th-century case in Brabant (the Netherlands), where two Dutch lawyers indeed deemed a court order following an abduction to be invalid, the Supreme Court concluded: "It is therefore clear that in Roman-Dutch law a court of one state had no jurisdiction to try a person abducted from another state by agents of the former state."[681] Although one can doubt whether it was really that certain that a

---

[677] It may be good to refer here again to the Eichmann analogy: even though the UNSC did indeed condemn the inter-State abduction of Eichmann, it did not lead to the refusal of exercising jurisdiction in the Israeli courts, where the judges applied male captus bene detentus.

[678] Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 894.

[679] Note, however, that the Supreme Court also explains that one of these Roman-Dutch jurists, Johannes Voet (a law professor at Leiden University) in turn referred to the 16th-century Spanish jurist Gomezius (Antonio Gomez) and that this Gomez did speak about the consequences of an abduction. According to the Supreme Court, he "stated that a judge might not order or effect the arrest of a criminal in another's territory and that if this was done the arrested person was to be immediately released." (Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 894.)

[680] Ibid., p. 895. The last point is especially strong in case a weaker State does not complain against a violation of its sovereignty by a more powerful State. In that case, only the judge can enforce the prohibition on inter-State abductions. See also Dugard 1991, p. 201: "The international law rule prohibiting cross-border abductions can be enforced in two ways. First, the state whose sovereignty has been violated may seek to secure the return of the abductee by means of diplomatic protest and pressure. Secondly, the courts of the state in whose territory the abductee is brought to trial may decline to exercise jurisdiction. The first method has proved to be ineffective in the South African context as states have generally failed to protest against the actions of their more powerful neighbour. Thus Swaziland failed to protest against the arrest of Ebrahim (…). The second method is potentially much more effective as it removes the object of the abduction and serves to discourage future abductions."

[681] Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 895.

court did not have jurisdiction following an abduction by State agents, it cannot be denied that logic and the case mentioned by the Supreme Court[682] are more in favour of a male captus male detentus than a male captus bene detentus outcome.

The last category the Supreme Court had to examine was the common law of South Africa, which "is still substantially Roman-Dutch law as adjusted to local circumstances".[683] After explaining that neither statutory nor case law exclude the possibility of applying the Roman-Dutch rule, the Supreme Court clarified that previous "judgments dealing with the effect of abduction from another state on the jurisdiction of our courts to try an abducted person are based either on facts that differed materially from the present or failed to consider the question in the light of the common law".[684] Although it may be true that these cases did not look at Roman-Dutch law, one can wonder whether the cases were factually really that different from the present one.[685] In addition to this, the English common law was disposed of quite easily, even though Dugard had argued that the South African common law "has been strongly influenced during the past two hundred years by the English common law".[686] Reading the opinion of the Supreme Court, one gets the impression that the Supreme Court wants to reach a certain outcome, even if the legal avenue in reaching that outcome is arguably not without its flaws. Be that as it may, the Supreme Court concluded that the Roman-Dutch rules were still part of the South African law.[687]

---

[682] Note also the consequence of release put forward by Gomez, see n. 679.

[683] Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 895.

[684] Ibid.

[685] See, for example, the cases R v. Robertson 1912 TPD 10 and Abrahams v. Minister of Justice 1963 (4) SA 452 (C), see Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), pp. 895-896: "In Abrahams v. Minister of Justice 1963 (4) SA 542 (C) the applicant applied for habeas corpus on the ground that he was abducted from Bechuanaland (as Botswana was then known) by members of the South African Police and taken to Gobabis in South West Africa (now Namibia) where he was duly arrested. Relying on the authority of R v. Robertson 1912 TPD 10 and R v. Officer Commanding Depot Battalion, Colchester: Ex parte Elliot[t] [1947] 1 ALL ER 373, the court decided that where a lawful arrest took place within a state's own borders the circumstances under which the accused was brought into the state were irrelevant. In Robertson's case it was argued that a person who had been unlawfully arrested in Natal and brought to the Transvaal could not be subjected to extradition proceedings in the Transvaal in answer to an extradition request from Britain to stand trial in Scotland. The argument was dismissed by the court as follows: "The applicant was brought into the Transvaal. Whether he was brought here legally or illegally, this Court has nothing to do with: as a fact he was brought here, and thereafter he was arrested, on the 10th October, on a valid warrant which had been issued in Scotland, and which in my opinion was duly endorsed. That being so, it is not necessary to go into the other points which have been raised" (at 12-13) [emphasis in original, ChP]."

[686] See n. 650. See Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 896: "Elliot[t]'s case was also an application for habeas corpus. (…) The case was decided according to the principles of the English common law. It is consequently not relevant (…) [emphasis in original, ChP]." See also Semmelman 1993, p. 134.

[687] See Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 896.

After these reviews of the different legal systems, the Supreme Court made an assessment of the above information in which it again confirmed the above-mentioned impression that the Supreme Court wanted to break with the (legal) past and install new legal principles for the reborn State of South Africa.[688] Although many of them are indeed exemplary of a healthy system of law and hence cannot but be applauded, one can wonder whether they also have the solid basis in the (Roman-Dutch law influenced) law of South Africa as claimed by the Supreme Court.

An example is the introduction of the concept of the protection and promotion of human rights which was not mentioned at all in the Supreme Court's overview of Roman-Dutch rules.[689]

> Several fundamental legal principles are contained in these [Roman-Dutch] rules, namely the protection and promotion of human rights, good inter-state relations and a healthy administration of justice. The individual must be protected against illegal detention and abduction, the bounds of jurisdiction must not be exceeded, sovereignty must be respected, the legal process must be fair to those affected and abuse of law must be avoided in order to protect and promote the integrity of the administration of justice. This applies equally to the state. When the state is a party to a dispute, as for example in criminal cases, it must come to court with "clean hands". When the state

[688] At that moment in time, South Africa was transforming from a State of apartheid into a democratic country. See in that respect also Dugard 1991, commenting on the case, on pp. 200, 202 and 203: "In the 'bad old days' when 'instruments' of the South African state frequently crossed into neighbouring territories to arrest (or kill) anti-apartheid 'operatives', South African courts readily assumed jurisdiction over kidnapped persons, relying on English decisions (…) and the decision of the Israeli Supreme Court in Attorney-General, Israel v Eichmann (…) which studiously followed Anglo-American precedent." "Ebrahim is a welcome decision. It is a great judgment which emphasises the importance of respect for fair standards of criminal justice, due process of law, human rights and international law and warns against the abuse of law by the state. It is unfortunate that such a decision was not handed down when it was most needed and that instead state lawlessness was often condoned by the courts in the interests of apartheid. Had judgments of this kind been given in the days of apartheid our courts would not have faced the crises of legitimacy that confronts them today." "What is to become of Roman-Dutch law in a post-apartheid society? Is it to be replaced by a code? Is it to fall into disuse until it is replaced by a South African version of the English common law? Or is it to keep its place as a proud, enlightened system, forming the most significant component of the South African common law? To do so, it needs to be rescued by the courts from the reputation it acquired under the system of apartheid. Judgments such as Ebrahim are an essential part of this rescue operation." Semmelman (1993, p. 133) is even more outspoken: "The Ebrahim case provides an interesting contrast with Alvarez. While the two opinions are readily distinguishable doctrinally, the unusual holding in Ebrahim and the Court's apparent eagerness to reach its conclusion suggest that the political situation in South Africa may have played a crucial role in the decision." See also ibid., pp. 136-137.

[689] See, however, Dugard 1991, p. 203: "During the past 40 years the entire South African legal system has been permeated by apartheid. Unfortunately Roman-Dutch law did not escape his contagion as the failure of the Appellate Division, under the leadership of LC Steyn, N Ogilvie Thompson, F L H Rumpff and P J Rabie [these were the chief justices of the Appellate Division between 1959 and 1989, ChP] to apply the principles of Roman-Dutch law in disputes between individual and state inevitably created the impression that Roman-Dutch law either had nothing to say on human rights issues or was a silent collaborator in the apartheid system."

> itself is involved in an abduction across international borders, as in the present case, its hands are not clean.[690]

The Supreme Court, also mentioning that "[s]igns of this development appear increasingly in the municipal law of other countries",[691] concluded that "according to our common law, the trial court had no jurisdiction to hear the case against the appellant. Consequently his conviction and sentence cannot stand."[692]

Although the legal methodology of this decision is arguably not without its flaws, the case is still important for many reasons.

First, it must be noted that the State from which Ebrahim was abducted (Swaziland) did not protest against the abduction.[693] This means that the Supreme Court argues that even if there is no actual friction between two States, a 'normal' abduction (without serious mistreatment) performed by State agents must not lead to a trial. This, in turn, means that the focus should not be only on traditional international (inter-State) law[694] but also on other aspects such as human rights protection and a healthy administration of justice.

Secondly, the Supreme Court argues that in the case of an international abduction performed by State agents,[695] a court has no jurisdiction to hear the case.[696]

This means that there is no discretion for judges in deciding whether or not they should exercise jurisdiction: they automatically have no jurisdiction in these kinds

---

[690] Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 896.

[691] Ibid. Note, however, that the Supreme Court hereby only referred to the already discussed Toscanino case (and cases mentioned therein). It did not address the aftermath of Toscanino, such as the Lujan case. For criticism on this point, see Semmelman 1993, p. 136.

[692] Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 899. Note that next to this male captus male detentus outcome, Ebrahim received compensation in a civil case, see Baker 2004, p. 1388.

[693] See Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 891: "There was no suggestion made in the application that the government of Swaziland protested to the South African government over appellant's abduction."

[694] Although it is true that the Supreme Court decided this case on the basis of national law only, the judges clearly underscored the importance of respect for international law. See also Dugard 1991, p. 200 and Cowling 1992, pp. 248-250.

[695] See for criticism on this point Nsereko 2008, p. 61: "While the court's decision is salutary, its value is somewhat diminished by the distinction that the court drew between action by private and official agents. The distinction is unfortunate as it allows the court to ignore the illegal actions of private agents, however outrageous, and enables the state of prosecuting authorities to benefit from them." Cf. also Costi 2003, p. 90.

[696] Cowling (1992, p. 255) also refers to another important aspect of this case: "Akehurst remarks that the number of extradition treaties has declined recently, and the reason for this could well be that states prefer to enjoy a free hand in this respect and hence not be tied to any obligations or procedures. This is why it is necessary for the courts to step in to provide assistance to individuals by ensuring that basic standards of due process across international boundaries are maintained and that extradition is not to be regarded exclusively as facilitating inter-state co-operation in action against crime. Ebrahim's case represents a landmark in this respect, since the Appellate Division was prepared to come to the assistance of the individual without relying on the existence of an extradition treaty [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

of pre-trial irregularities. Because of this automatism, this case is the most perfect example of the male captus male detentus reasoning, which, after all, also encompasses an automatism (in the case of a male captus, a male detentus will follow.) However, it is clear that the rigidity of this ruling will be difficult to accept in the world of judges, who arguably wish to have at least some room and flexibility in weighing all the different interests at stake. Practice after Ebrahim has also confirmed this. In the words of Michell:

> The South African courts have (...) gone a considerable distance in elaborating the framework first set out in Ebrahim. The subsequent decisions, however, have been surprisingly inconsistent, given Ebrahim's strict rule against transnational forcible abduction. Part of the explanation for the murky state of the South African law after Ebrahim may simply be the reluctance of some judges to let go of the male captus bene detentus rule. This reluctance may also be inspired by the strictness of the Ebrahim doctrine itself, which requires that courts divest themselves of jurisdiction. Where the facts are not as stark as in Ebrahim, judges may seek to avoid having to apply such a strict rule.[697]

Another interesting case often mentioned in the male captus discussion is the Zimbabwean[698] Beahan case.[699] Beahan, a resident of the Republic of South Africa and a UK citizen,[700] "had planned with others to assist convicted prisoners serving sentences in Zimbabwe to escape".[701] However, when Beahan wanted to enter Zimbabwe to carry out his plan, it became clear that his vehicle was going to be searched by the customs officials.[702] As a result of that, he fled into Botswana where he was arrested a day later.[703] A couple of days passed during which Beahan "was not taken before a court or given access to legal representation"[704] and then, "the Botswana Police handed the appellant over to the Zimbabwe Police at the border. There was no extradition treaty between Botswana and Zimbabwe."[705] In Botswana, Beahan "was charged with having attempted to commit an act of terrorism or sabotage by conspiring with others to release convicted prisoners from Zimbabwean prisons".[706] Beahan claimed "that the Court lacked jurisdiction, because he had been unlawfully removed from Botswana, that his removal had not complied with

---

[697] Michell 1996, p. 458.
[698] The Zimbabwean legal system is a mixture of civil, common and customary law, see JuriGlobe's 'Alphabetical Index of the Political Entities and Corresponding Legal Systems' available at: http://www.juriglobe.ca/eng/sys-juri/index-alpha.php.
[699] Supreme Court, Beahan v. State, 4 September 1991, International Law Reports, Vol. 103 (1996), pp. 203-224.
[700] See ibid., p. 206.
[701] Supreme Court, Beahan v. State, 4 September 1991, International Law Reports, Vol. 103 (1996), p. 203 (summary).
[702] See ibid.
[703] See ibid.
[704] Ibid.
[705] Ibid. This was because "[m]embers of the Botswana Police Force became aware that the accused was wanted by the Zimbabwe Republic Police". (Ibid., p. 207.)
[706] Ibid., p. 203 (summary).

Botswana laws regulating deportation and that it was, in effect, an extradition in which the proper procedures had not been followed".[707]

The Supreme Court, in the words of Chief Justice Gubbay who delivered the judgment, first reiterated what the High Court (whose decision was now under appeal before the Supreme Court) had decided on this point:

> [W]hile the Court has jurisdiction to try a person properly brought before it regardless of the means used to secure his presence before the Court nevertheless the Court can decline to exercise that jurisdiction in respect of a person irregularly or illegally brought before it and can decline to exercise jurisdiction as a mark of disapproval of the abuse of process (…).[708]

Then, Justice Gubbay tried to find out whether this "middle path" solution[709] was correct. In doing so, it made an overview of many cases, several of which have also been reviewed in this book, such as the cases of Ebrahim,[710] Scott, Elliott, Driver, Ker, Frisbie, Toscanino[711] and Lujan. Then, he concluded:

> In my opinion it is essential that in order to promote confidence in and respect for the administration of justice and preserve the judicial process from contamination, a court should decline to compel an accused person to undergo a trial in circumstances where his appearance before it has been facilitated by an act of abduction undertaken by the prosecuting state. There is an inherent objection to such a course both on grounds of public policy pertaining to international ethical norms and because it imperils and corrodes the peaceful co-existence and mutual respect of sovereign nations. For abduction is illegal under international law, provided the abductor was not acting on his own initiative and without the authority or connivance of his government. A contrary view would amount to a declaration that the end justifies the means, thereby encouraging states to become law-breakers in order to secure the conviction of a private individual.[712]

It is clear from this statement that Gubbay, who also focuses on the international law dimension and who does not seem to demand a protest from the injured State either

---

[707] Ibid.
[708] Ibid., pp. 208-209.
[709] See ibid., p. 209.
[710] Of which Justice Gubbay stated: "This decision commends itself and I respectfully agree with it. Not only is it founded on the inherited principles of common law which this country shares with South Africa, it has the added quality of being in accord with justice, fairness and good sense." (Ibid., p. 211.)
[711] Of which Justice Gubbay stated: "It is refreshing to note (…) that a departure from the restricted concept embodied in the Ker-Frisbie rule is expressed in the bold judgment of Mansfield Circuit Judge in United States v Toscanino". (Ibid., p. 213.) Although he also noted (ibid.) that "[t]his dictum does not, of course, accurately reflect the law of the United States", he found that "[n]onetheless, it signifies to me a realistic and responsive approach for the need to recognise and enforce fair standards of criminal justice towards which every legal system should strive." (Ibid., p. 214.) Given this remark and the remark he made in the context of the Ebrahim case (see the previous footnote), it is clear that Gubbay is more in favour of the male captus male detentus reasonings. This is also evidenced by his conclusion which will now be cited in the main text.
[712] Ibid.

(cf. Ebrahim), is in favour of the male captus male detentus reasoning, although he does not go that far as the Ebrahim case in holding that a court is automatically deprived of jurisdiction in such cases; courts should refuse jurisdiction.[713] However, this reasoning was not really of any help to Beahan as "the circumstances under which the appellant was brought to this country from Botswana cannot be likened to an abduction by agents of the government of Zimbabwe".[714]

Only two further cases need to be discussed in this overview, first the 2002 Scottish case Vervuren and second the 2004 Namibian[715] case Mushwena.

In the Vervuren case,[716] a Dutch national was "charged (...) with the importation and supplying of a controlled drug, namely amphetamine".[717]

On 30 May 2001, Vervuren was arrested and detained in Portugal.[718] After being extradited to Scotland, he appeared before a Scottish court on 27 July 2001, where he claimed that his arrest and the extradition proceedings in Portugal had violated Articles 5 and 6 of the ECHR because he had not received effective legal assistance at the extradition hearings in Portugal, because he had not been informed promptly, in a language which he understands, of the reasons for his arrest and of any charge against him and because he had signed the relevant documentation under undue pressure.[719] Vervuren, who – because of these circumstances – had signed the relevant documentation for his accelerated extradition procedure "Under protest",[720] submitted that the (already discussed, see Subsection 3.1) Scottish male captus bene detentus Sinclair case was no longer good law and that Bennett had to be followed:[721]

---

[713] Note that Justice Gubbay was "prepared to assume that a discretion vested in the learned judge a quo to refuse to exercise jurisdiction [under the abuse of process doctrine, ChP]". (Ibid., p. 216.)

[714] Ibid., p. 214. This was because the male captus of Beahan "did not constitute a violation of international law for it involved no affront to the sovereignty of a foreign state. (…) The immutable fact is that the appellant was recovered from Botswana without any form of force or deception being practised by the agents of this country. The decision to convey him to Zimbabwe was made, and could only have been made, by the Botswana police in whose custody he was. Where agents of the state of refuge without resort to extradition or deportation proceedings surrender the fugitive for prosecution to another state, that receiving state, since it has not exercised any force upon the territory of the refuge state and has in no way violated its territorial sovereignty, is not in breach of international law". (Ibid., with reference to, among other things, Morgenstern 1953, pp. 270-271.)

[715] The Namibian legal system is a mixture of common and civil law, see JuriGlobe's 'Alphabetical Index of the Political Entities and Corresponding Legal Systems' available at: http://www.juriglobe.ca/eng/sys-juri/index-alpha.php.

[716] High Court of Justiciary, HM Advocate v. Vervuren, 12 April 2002, 2002 S.L.T. 555.

[717] Ibid., p. 556.

[718] See ibid. Note that that other male captus case from Scotland (Sinclair) also involved, among other things, alleged irregularities in Portugal.

[719] See ibid.

[720] Ibid., p. 557.

[721] See ibid., p. 559: "Senior counsel submitted that the case of Sinclair v HM Advocate was no longer good law. The court should prefer the views expressed in the House of Lords in R v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, ex p Bennett. The court should also take into account the preamble to the ECHR, and the need to preserve the integrity of the rule of law: cf dicta of Lord Griffiths in Horseferry. Counsel submitted that what had occurred in (...) [the court in Portugal, ChP] fell within the definition "serious abuse of power" referred to by Lord Griffiths at p 62. (...) There was no need for the United Kingdom to

> [F]irst, that the British authorities had a duty, when making an extradition request to a country such as Portugal, to be satisfied that no illegality occurred in the subsequent Portuguese extradition proceedings. Secondly, even if that proposition was wrong, and there was no positive duty upon Britain to vet the Portuguese extradition proceedings, the British government and authorities could not turn a blind eye to irregularities in the Portuguese extradition proceedings once these irregularities had been brought to their attention (...). The Lord Advocate, on becoming aware of the illegality (...), should not raise proceedings by way of indictment against the minuter [this is Vervuren, ChP].[722] Thirdly, the British authorities could not collude with a foreign state in order to benefit from a person's presence in the United Kingdom: in other words, the end could not justify the means.[723]

With respect to his first proposition, Lady Paton, writing the opinion, noted that "[s]enior counsel could point to no authority supporting such a proposition"[724] and then made the following (and already-mentioned, see footnote 7) explanation that > the approach adopted by the United Kingdom courts in the past was that it was irrelevant how a person arrived on the airport tarmac: all that mattered was, once the person was in the United Kingdom, was he subject to due process, to fair proceedings. All the courts had been concerned about was the propriety of the domestic procedure.[725]

Although senior counsel for Vervuren submitted "that some authority for his submission that a positive duty of checking rested upon the United Kingdom have been involved in such serious abuse of power: the United Kingdom had merely to be aware of the abuse of power." Although counsel accepted that the facts in Bennett (where "the accused had in effect been kidnapped: there had been no court proceedings, no extradition proceedings" (ibid.)) were graver than in the present case, he "argued that, in the present case, the extradition procedure had been disregarded by the Portuguese authorities, and that the authorities in the United Kingdom ought to know of this either through exercising due diligence and actively checking the procedures (the first argument) or by becoming aware of the illegality as a result of the minute in the current proceedings (the second argument)." (Ibid.) See also ibid.: "[C]ounsel argued that the sentiments and principles in Horseferry, together with the advent of the Human Rights Act, placed constraints upon the Lord Advocate, and required the court to look at the procedure by which the minuter came to be in a Scottish court. The court could not support or turn a blind eye to an illegality. Signatory states could not allow other signatories to the ECHR to abuse their rights."

---

[722] See also ibid., p. 558: "Senior counsel submitted that if there appeared to be a substantial infringement of the minuter's human rights, this court should give redress by prohibiting the Lord Advocate from acting further. Reference was made to s 57 of the Scotland Act 1998. By continuing with these criminal proceedings against the minuter, the Lord Advocate was acting incompatibly with the Convention, and was attempting to benefit from the illegality perpetrated by the Portuguese authorities. The current proceedings against the minuter should be discharged in the exercise of the court's supervisory power. Alternatively, if the case was not one falling within s 57 (2), the court itself was a public authority, with a duty to preserve the integrity of the High Court: the proceedings should be discharged on that basis also. Alternatively the court could order that an inquiry be made into whether the proceedings should be discharged, founded as they were on the illegality of another state."

[723] Ibid., pp. 556-557.

[724] Ibid., p. 558.

[725] Ibid.

Government could be found in the preamble to the European Convention on Human Rights",[726] he "accepted that his first proposition seemed to run contrary to a line of established authority".[727]

Lady Paton did not comment on the second proposition, but she did attack the third because "there was no evidence to suggest that there had been a positive act by United Kingdom Government agents colluding with an illegality in the Portuguese courts".[728]

As a result of this, counsel dropped his third proposition.[729]

Lady Paton divided her opinion in two categories, namely 1) if the Sinclair case, where it was decided "that Scottish courts should not inquire into the circumstances whereby an accused person comes to be in Scotland, facing trial there",[730] is still authoritative[731] and 2) if the Sinclair case is no longer authoritative.[732]

Paton noted with respect to the first situation that Vervuren's arguments had to be dismissed because Sinclair "has not been reviewed by a larger court, nor formally disapproved, nor overturned. Technically therefore it is still a binding authority."[733] Although it may, of course, be the case that Sinclair is still good law in Scotland, it seems strange to then also hypothesise this situation: if Paton is indeed of the opinion that Sinclair is still binding authority, then why does she use a heading stating "[i]f the case of Sinclair is still authoritative"?[734]

With respect to the second situation, Paton noted that because of the Bennett case (both the one decided by the House of Lords and the one decided by the Scottish court which noted the weakness of the Sinclair/male captus bene detentus rule after Bennett, see footnote 308) and the ECHR now in force, "it may be necessary that I give a view on the assumption that Sinclair might now be regarded as a doubtful authority".[735]

Paton then returned to the three arguments of Vervuren already mentioned above and rejected the first argument > to the effect that any ECHR signatory state has a duty to adopt a proactive role in relation to another ECHR state's extradition proceedings, including checking the [726] Ibid.

[727] Ibid.
[728] Ibid. See also ibid.: "There was no suggestion that the British authorities had procured the minuter's signature on the form, or that the British authorities had placed the minuter under any pressure, or that the British authorities had provided the interpreter. Accordingly there was no suggestion that the United Kingdom came to court with unclean hands, or that the state had acted in bad faith. The United Kingdom had merely made a request under the Extradition Act in the normal manner."
[729] See ibid.
[730] Ibid., p. 560.
[731] See ibid., pp. 560-561.
[732] See ibid., pp. 561-562.
[733] Ibid., p. 561. It must be noted that the House of Lords is the final court of appeal on points of law for the UK (including Scotland) for civil cases only (and that Bennett was a criminal case). The highest criminal court for Scotland is the Scottish High Court of Justiciary.
[734] Ibid., p. 560.
[735] Ibid., p. 561.

> regularity and legality of any foreign extradition proceedings initiated as a result of a United Kingdom request for extradition.[736]

As already clarified above, the third argument was dropped because counsel for Vervuren had conceded that there was "no question of inappropriate actings or collusion on the part of the British authorities in the present case".[737] However, Paton noted that both the Prosecution and the Defence agreed that if that had nevertheless been the case, then the following solution could have been relied upon: "if the United Kingdom authorities were guilty of some form of collusion, and did not come to court with clean hands, the courts were entitled to respond by, for example, sustaining a plea in bar of trial."[738] This in a way resembles the statement of Lord Bridge of Harwich in Bennett that

> [w]hen it is shown that the law enforcement agency responsible for bringing a prosecution has only been enabled to do so by participating in violations of international law and of the laws of another state in order to secure the presence of the accused within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, I think that respect for the rule of law demands that the court take cognisance of that circumstance. To hold that the court may turn a blind eye to executive lawlessness beyond the frontiers of its own jurisdiction is, to my mind, an insular and unacceptable view.[739]

Then, Paton turned to the second and final argument of Vervuren which suggested a broader responsibility[740] for the authorities in the UK, namely that > once an illegality or irregularity in foreign extradition proceedings had been brought to the attention of the United Kingdom authorities (including the courts), those authorities could not turn a blind eye to them. Once the United Kingdom authorities were aware of either non-existent proceedings, or proceedings which had themselves thrown up an illegality (for example, because the truncated proceedings could not truly be regarded as due process), the United Kingdom authorities were disabled from benefiting from the illegality.[741]

---

[736] Ibid. See also ibid., pp. 561-562: "It seems to me that any ECHR signatory state is entitled, in the absence of any sign or evidence to the contrary, to the presumption omnia rite acta esse. [All things are presumed to be done in due form, ChP.] Moreover, as each state has its own laws and procedures, about which British lawyers, uninstructed in the foreign law, have little or no knowledge or expertise, it would in my view prove a time consuming task were every foreign extradition (made in response to a United Kingdom request) to undergo a full scrutiny by the United Kingdom. There would probably be a need to obtain expert opinion from lawyers about the law of the extraditing state. The resultant procedure would be lengthy, expensive, and cumbersome."

[737] Ibid., p. 562.

[738] Ibid.

[739] House of Lords, Lord Bridge of Harwich, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 155.

[740] See also n. 287 and accompanying text where it was written that Lord Bridge of Harwich agreed with Lord Griffiths but his test is arguably a little more strict as in his view, the domestic authorities really have to do something irregular (and not only be a knowing party to the irregular conduct from, for example, foreign authorities).

[741] High Court of Justiciary, HM Advocate v. Vervuren, 12 April 2002, 2002 S.L.T. 562.

This rather broad 'knowing but doing nothing' standard[742] resembles the statement of Lord Griffiths in Bennett that > [i]n my view your Lordships should now declare that where process of law is available to return an accused to this country through extradition procedures our courts will refuse to try him if he has been forcibly brought within our jurisdiction in disregard of those procedures by a process to which our own police, prosecuting or other executive authorities have been a knowing party.[743]

Paton accepted "that there may be circumstances where information is placed before a Scottish court which that court could not but regard as prima facie evidence of an irregularity or illegality meriting some further investigation before any trial should be proceeded with".[744] However, "[w]hether or not that investigation might lead to the sustaining of a plea in bar of trial would depend on the circumstances of the case."[745]

Paton then made a comparison with the Bennett case, which could be used "as an illustration of the sort of facts which a Scottish court might regard as worthy of investigation",[746] but did not accept that the fact that Vervuren had written "Under protest" on the documents enabling his accelerated extradition from Portugal was sufficient in itself "to demonstrate to a Scottish court some irregularity or illegality or lack of genuine or voluntary consent to the accelerated extradition proceedings".[747]

Hence, the words "Under protest" did not merit further investigation by the Scottish court into the regularity of the Portuguese proceedings.[748] In addition, matters were not altered by the fuller information provided by the Defence.[749] As a result, Paton concluded:

> Taking the minuter's assertions at their highest, as I am invited to do by counsel for the minuter, I do not accept that there may have been in this case the sort of irregularity or illegality contemplated by their Lordships in R v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, ex p Bennett, and therefore meriting further investigation. Nor prima facie does there appear to have been a breach of art 5 or 6 of the Convention.[750]

In short, even if Bennett and not Sinclair was the case to follow here, the arguments of Vervuren had to be rejected.[751]

---

[742] Arnell (2004, p. 255) uses the interesting expression of "clean hands" but no "clear conscience".
[743] House of Lords, Lord Griffiths, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 151.
[744] High Court of Justiciary, HM Advocate v. Vervuren, 12 April 2002, 2002 S.L.T. 562.
[745] Ibid.
[746] Ibid.
[747] Ibid.
[748] See ibid.
[749] See ibid.
[750] Ibid.
[751] See ibid.

Although Paton, because of the two decisions in Bennett and the growth of human rights law, also looked at the hypothetical situation that the male captus bene detentus case of Sinclair was no longer good law,[752] it appears that she is of the opinion that this latter case still represents the law in Scotland, something which has been sharply criticised in literature.[753]

The final case in this chapter is Mushwena, also known as the 'Caprivi treason trial',[754] decided by the Supreme Court of Namibia in 2004.[755] In this case, the 13 respondents (including Moses Limbo Mushwena) and 117[756] other persons > were facing 278 charges of which the most serious are high treason, murder, attempted murder[,] seduction [this should probably be "sedition", ChP],[[757]] robbery with aggravating circumstances, public violence[,] unauthorized possession of firearms and ammunition, theft and malicious damage to property.[758]

All these charges were connected to just one incident, namely an attack by groups of armed men on several Namibian governmental institutions on 2 August 1999 in Katima Mulilo (Namibia), as a result of which several people died and property was damaged.[759] It was explained that "[t]he respondents and their co-accused were part of an exodus of people from the Caprivi Region [of which Katima Mulilo is the administrative centre, ChP] into neighbouring countries that took place as a result of and prior to the incident."[760]

In Botswana, to where the respondents had fled, they were granted asylum and put in refugee camps.[761] However, at various times during 1999, all the respondents (except for one) left these camps again and seemingly went to Zambia – another neighbouring country of Namibia – because it was there that they were subsequently apprehended and detained by Zambian authorities and later handed over to the Namibian authorities.[762] "All the [respondents] claimed in their affidavits that they

---

[752] See n. 735 and accompanying text.

[753] See Arnell 2004, p. 251 (abstract): "Scots law adheres to the rule male captus bene detentus*. It was recently applied in* H.M. Advocate v Vervuren*, where it was held that no account could be taken by the court of alleged irregularities in an accused's extradition to Scotland. The rule is bad. Human rights and the rule of law stand in opposition to it. It is time for Scots law to limit the scope of* male captus bene detentus [emphasis in original, ChP]."

[754] See Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004 (available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf), p. 249.

[755] Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004 (available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf).

[756] Acting Justice of Appeal O'Linn mentions the number of 107, however, see ibid., p. 48.

[757] See ibid., p. 48.

[758] Ibid., p. 2.

[759] See ibid.

[760] Ibid.

[761] See ibid.

[762] See ibid., pp. 2-3. The one who had not left the refugee camps was handed over to Namibia by the Botswana authorities, see ibid., p. 3.

were abducted by the Namibian authorities and unlawfully surrendered to Namibia."[763] Namibia argued, however, that the suspects were deported to Namibia with no involvement of the Namibian authorities.[764]

When the case was brought before the High Court in Grootfontein, Judge Hoff decided to release the suspects. Although he did not believe that this case involved abduction comparable with, for example, the Ebrahim case,[765] he was of the opinion that another male captus technique, namely disguised extradition, had been used to bring 12 of the 13 suspects into the jurisdiction of the Court and that because of this male captus, in which the Namibian authorities had been involved,[766] the Court did not have jurisdiction to try the suspects (male detentus).[767]

---

[763] Ibid. One of the clearest accounts of what had happened was provided by Charles Mafenyaho Mushekwa, see ibid., pp. 3-4: "We were separated and placed in different camps in Botswana. Others and myself were taken to Dukwe Refugee Camp. Although we had been granted political asylum we still reported to the Police Station three times a day (…). I was not happy with the treatment I received in the camp including the continuous routine of reporting to the Police Station. We were not given enough food so we were starving. Because of these difficulties I decided to leave the country to Zambia. I left with my friend (…). (…) When we were in Zambia we went to the Police Station and reported ourselves there. This was on the 18 of June 1999. We informed the police that we were claiming political asylum. (…) We were later transferred to Mongu Prison. At Mongu prison we were interviewed by members of Zambian Intelligence Office. (…) While we were being interviewed by the State Security Officers, the Namibian Police came and wanted to take us back to Namibia. The Commander of the Zambian Police refused. (…) On the 7th of August we were called by the prison officers to the prison reception where we were handed to an officer from the Office of the President of Zambia. We were initially asked to collect all our belonging as we were made to believe we were being taken to Europe. We then proceeded to the Zambian Airport. We boarded the plane. But before we boarded the plane we enquired whether the plane was suitable to take us all the way to Europe. The plane was a military plane and we were sure that it could not manage to fly all the way to Europe. The pilot assured us that we were right in thinking that the plane would not reach Europe on a single flight, but told us that we would be making a stop over in a number of countries to refuel and that our first stop was Uganda. When we were airborne we saw that we were going in the wrong direction. We landed at Sesheke Air Strip. [This is still Zambian territory, ChP.] We found the Zambian Police had surrounded the Air Strip. A few minutes later Namibia Police also arrived. At that time we were six of us. After disembarking from the plane we were surrounded by both Zambian and Namibian Police. One of my colleagues asked the Zambian Police why they had lied. The Zambian Police said that it was not their problem. The Namibian Police then forcibly took us into their custody. The Namibian Police then forcibly marched us to the Namibian side [emphasis in original, ChP]."

[764] See ibid., p. 7.

[765] See ibid., p. 8. See also ibid., p. 63.

[766] In reaching that conclusion, Hoff took into account the role played by the Namibian Major General Shali who had asked the Zambian authorities to hand over the suspects, see ibid., pp. 23-24: "In my view on the facts of this case, the deportation of twelve of the accused persons (…) was indeed a disguised extradition. Major General Shali requested his counterparts in Zambia to immediately hand over specific fugitives they were looking for and according to his testimony the Zambians did exactly what they were asked to do. (…) In my view the protest by the Namibian authorities that they had no part in irregularities which occurred during the deportation procedures in Zambia and Botswana, in itself, cannot come to their rescue since their own initial conduct, by informally requesting the handing over of fugitives and thus bypassing formal extradition proceedings tainted those very deportation proceedings they now want to put at a distance. Even if one accepts, in favour of the State, that the accused persons had been arrested by the respective neighbouring authorities, a decision had not been

The State appealed this decision, ensuring that the Supreme Court had to address the issue. The first judge, Acting Justice of Appeal Mtambanengwe, upheld the State's appeal because he was not convinced that a disguised extradition had occurred in this case (or in any case not a male captus in which the Namibian authorities were involved):

> I go along with appellant's counsel's submission that the court a quo erred both in fact and in law in reaching its conclusion that the acts of the Namibian authorities in securing the return of the respondents were tainted, more particularly given the fact that the court concluded that no conspiracy or connivance was established between Namibian authorities and Zambian or Botswana authorities. This is so because the evidence does not establish that either Botswana or Zambia rendered the fugitive respondents because of the request by Mayor General Shali;[768] no causal link is shown to have existed between the request and the handing over of the respondents by Zambia or Botswana. The inference sought to be drawn by respondents' counsel from the evidence, and drawn by the court a quo, from the fact that some of the respondents had been arrested by respective neighbouring countries authorities and a decision had not been taken and they had not been deported until after the Namibian authorities had requested their return, is not warranted on a proper review of the evidence.[769]

In his judgment, Mtambanengwe stressed that practice shows that courts around the world both defend and reject the male captus bene detentus principle. However, the courts which opt for male captus male detentus only do so when the prosecuting State's own authorities are involved in the male captus.[770] A conclusion which taken and they had not been deported until some time after the Namibian authorities had requested their return [emphasis in original, ChP]."

---

[767] See ibid., p. 8. See also ibid., pp. 21 and 62. According to Hoff, one of the suspects (Charles Samboma) had not been the victim of a disguised extradition, but was nevertheless irregularly brought into the jurisdiction of the Court because there was no proper consent in his removal from Zambia to Namibia.

[768] See n. 766.

[769] Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004 (available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf), p. 24.

[770] See ibid., p. 33: "The important point that clearly emerges from cases such as (…) Mackeson (…)[,] Bennett (…), (…) Ebrahim (…), (…) Hartley (…) and Beahan (…) is that the court will exercise its power to decline jurisdiction where the prosecuting authorities, the police or executive authorities have been shown to have been directly or indirectly involved in a breach of international law or the law of another state or their own municipal law. In Prosecutor v Dragan Nikolic (…) the Trial Chamber of the [ICTY] discussed the principle 'male captus bene detentus' as applied or formally applied in various jurisdiction[s]. The cases cited or referred to in that discussion also illustrate the point above in jurisdictions that have moved away from that principle. (…) In that case the Trial Chamber held that misconduct, by somebody other than the prosecution did not form a basis of a successful challenge to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal." As will be shown in Subsection 3.1.4 of the next chapter, this is an incorrect interpretation of the judges' reasoning as the Trial Chamber also held "that, in a situation where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subjected to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment to the exercise of jurisdiction over such an accused. This would certainly be the case where persons acting indeed seems to be correct.[771] Then, he made two very interesting references to observations stemming from the still-to-discuss ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in the Nikolić case, see Subsection 3.1.4 of the following chapter, and from the already discussed ECtHR's decision in the Öcalan case, see Subsection 2.2.4 of Chapter III, namely "that even if the activities of the abductors could be attributed to the UN Officers (…) this by itself would not remove the Tribunal's jurisdiction to hear the matter"[772] because the rights of the suspect must be balanced against the fact that he is charged with very serious crimes and that his prosecution is needed (Nikolić, cf. the German case Al-Moayad) and that one must fairly balance "between the demand[s] of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights [emphasis in original, ChP]"[773] (Öcalan).

Hence, Mtambanengwe was of the opinion that the Namibian authorities were not involved in the alleged male captus and arguably also that even if they were, the seriousness of the suspects' charges could nevertheless lead to a bene detentus outcome. This can be derived not only from the fact that Mtambanengwe refers to the quotations from the Nikolić[774] and Öcalan cases but also from the fact that he made the following statement in the context of human rights:

---

for SFOR or the Prosecution were involved in such very serious mistreatment. But even without such involvement this Chamber finds it extremely difficult to justify the exercise of jurisdiction over a person if that person was brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal after having been seriously mistreated. This, the Chamber observes, is in keeping with the approach of the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza case, according to which in cases of egregious violations of the rights of the Accused, it is "irrelevant which entity or entities were responsible for the alleged violations of the Appellant's rights" [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 114.) Mtambanengwe's observation on the same p. 33 of the Mushwena judgment that "the Appeal[s] Chamber in the Prosecutor v Dragan Nikolic case (…) upheld the above decision" is also incorrect in that respect as the Appeals Chamber (as will also be shown in Subsection 3.1.4 of the following chapter) held more generally that "certain human rights violations are of such a serious nature that they require that the exercise of jurisdiction be declined." (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 30. See also n. 619 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.) Such a general statement could, of course, be interpreted as meaning that the Appeals Chamber does not necessarily require the involvement of the Tribunal in the violations to refuse jurisdiction in certain cases. Note, however, that in the addendum to his judgment, Mtambanengwe refers to the opinion of Acting Justice of Appeal O'Linn who cites – not very accurately by the way – the last words of the above-mentioned quotation from the ICTY Trial Chamber's decision in Nikolić, see Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004 (available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf), p. 38.

[771] Note, however, that in the 1982 Swiss case of X, the Swiss Federal Court issued a male deditus decision (but no male detentus decision) as a consequence of a male captus in which no Swiss authorities had been involved, see n. 445 and accompanying text.

[772] Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004 (available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf), p. 33.

[773] Ibid., p. 34. See also n. 341 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[774] As also explained in the context of the Al-Moayad case, it must be noted that one could argue, now that the ICTY Appeals Chamber's reference to the Eichmann case (as support for the idea that the

> [W]hen one considers the question of human rights care must be taken to balance the rights of accused against these of the victims of their [alleged!, ChP] actions. We have in this case antecedent circumstances where some people lost their lives and property was destroyed as a result of the incident at Katima Mulilo on 2 August 1999. The public interest that those responsible must be brought to justice i[s] a very weighty counter in the balance.[775]

Acting Justice of Appeal O'Linn also reviewed, among other things, the Nikolić and Öcalan cases.

With respect to the Öcalan case, he agreed with the general statement at footnote 341 and accompanying text of Chapter III,[776] but only as support for his observation that

> [t]he answer it seems to me is for states to enact fair but effective procedures, simplified if necessary, for extradition and/or deportation in the exercise of their sovereignty. Then to give effect to due process and the rule of law as laid down by their own laws and that of democratic countries the world over and to intensify and expedite international cooperation to this end.[777]

However, he arguably did not see the Öcalan statement as evidence for the idea that, for example, one can weigh the rights of suspects against (the rights of the victims of) their alleged crimes, as was suggested by Mtambanengwe.

Proof of that assertion can be found in the following remark by O'Linn with respect to the Nikolić case:[778]

> I have been referred to the following quotation from the Appeal[s] Chamber, which[,] so it is argued, requires the balancing of "rights of the accused[''], against "the crimes seriousness of the alleged crimes must be taken into account in the male captus discussion), is incorrect, that Mtambanengwe's reference to Nikolić is also incorrect. However, as already explained earlier (see n. 565), the ICTY Appeals Chamber also made some observations of its own concerning this issue (after it had discussed the inter-State context). And to those observations, Mtambanengwe can, of course, refer. (Indeed, it can be argued that Mtambanengwe is especially interested in the observations of the ICTY judges themselves.)

---

[775] Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004 (available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf), p. 37.

[776] See also n. 773 and accompanying text.

[777] Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004 (available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf), p. 114.

[778] Of which case he also noted that the ICTY held that it agreed with the finding of the ICTR in Barayagwiza "according to which in cases of egregious violations of the rights of the Accused, it is "irrelevant which entity or entities were responsible for the alleged violations of the Appellant's rights" [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 114.) See Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004 (available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf), p. 123 and the last words of n. 770.

> committed". The passage however does not do so. What it purports to balance is "international justice" against "infringing to a limited extent in the sovereignty of states."[779]

It appears that O'Linn is thus of the opinion that although the balancing exercise of "international justice" on the one hand and "infringing to a limited extent in the sovereignty of states" on the other may be justified at the level of the international criminal tribunals, this may not be the case at the inter-State level where the concept of State sovereignty plays quite a different role.

O'Linn namely explains that the ICTY in the Nikolić case did not deal with a situation, as in this Mushwena case, > where each and every provision of the laws of the affected countries were contravened and thereby not only the fundamental rights of the accused, and their protection provided by those laws, but also an abuse of those laws amounting to a breach of the sovereignty of the states whose sovereign parliaments enacted those laws in the exercise of their sovereignty. (...) In the case of the International Court, the purpose is to try persons who are accused of international crimes against humanity such as genocide where states are enjoined and required to cooperate and assist the Tribunal in its functions: There are special procedures. One of the most important differences is that sovereign national states, can if they so wish, enact laws with mandatory provisions in regard to extradition and deportation. This was done by Namibia, Botswana and Zambia.[780]

---

[779] Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004 (available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf), p. 124. Although the passage to which O'Linn refers ("[T]he damage caused to international justice by not apprehending fugitives accused of serious violations of international humanitarian law is comparatively higher than the injury, if any, caused to the sovereignty of a State by a limited intrusion in its territory, particularly when the intrusion occurs in default of the State's cooperation. Therefore, the Appeals Chamber does not consider that in cases of universally condemned offences, jurisdiction should be set aside on the ground that there was a violation of the sovereignty of a State, when the violation is brought about by the apprehension of fugitives from international justice, whatever the consequences for the international responsibility of the State or organisation involved." (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 26.)) does not mention human rights indeed, the passage is preceded by the following words: "Universally Condemned Offences are a matter of concern to the international community as a whole. There is a legitimate expectation that those accused of these crimes will be brought to justice swiftly. Accountability for these crimes is a necessary condition for the achievement of international justice, which plays a critical role in the reconciliation and rebuilding based on the rule of law of countries and societies torn apart by international and internecine conflicts. This legitimate expectation needs to be weighed against the principle of State sovereignty and the fundamental human rights of the accused [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., paras. 25-26.)

[780] Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004 (available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf), pp. 123-124.

Hence, at the inter-State level, it is, of course, also important to pay attention to the public interest that suspects are prosecuted; but it is never in the public interest to, in doing so, violate, among other things, the sovereignty of other States:

> To see that justice is done not only to accused persons, but also to the victims of crime is part of the aim of the Rule of Law and the public interest. Nevertheless, there is no good reason why the State's officials should flout the constitution and laws of their own country and those of neighbouring states. Such abuse of process in countries which subscribe to the Rule of Law, can never be in the public interest.[781]

In contrast to Mtambanengwe, O'Linn was of the opinion that that was what had happened here; the Namibian authorities were involved in the irregular transfer[782] of the 12 suspects to Namibia:[783]

> On the evidence before Court, Namibia was, if not the main instigator, at least a "knowing party", in the words of Lord Griffiths in the Bennet[t] decision. Lord Griffiths also made it clear that a situation where "a practice developed where the police or prosecuting authorities in this country ignored extradition procedures by a mere request to police colleagues in another country, they would be flouting the extradition procedures and depriving the accused of the safeguards built into the extradition process for his benefit. It is to my mind unthinkable that the Court should declare itself to be powerless and stand idly by,…" The case now under consideration is precisely such a case.[784]

---

[781] Ibid., p. 165. See also ibid., p. 203: "I must also point out that the "public interest" is not an interest apart from or in opposition to the Rule of Law, due process and the fundamental rights of the accused. It is in the public interest to uphold the fundamental rights of the accused persons, just as it is in the public interest to protect victims and the law-abiding citizens at large. (...) I need to emphasize: Nothing in this judgment is intended to discourage cooperation between police, military and immigration officials of the Namibian State with their counterparts in neighbouring states. What cannot be allowed however, is cooperation in taking short cuts in conflict with the express provisions of the domestic law of these countries and even of International Law, because such actions will gravely undermine the Rule of Law, entrenched in the Namibian Constitution, which is the Supreme Law of Namibia. Such actions cannot be justified as in the public interest."

[782] Although O'Linn speaks of an 'official abduction' (an abduction in which the authorities of Zambia cooperated with their Namibian colleagues, see also ns. 21 and 63 of Chapter III and n. 94 of the present chapter), he does not find the exact label to be very important, see ibid., p. 187. Cf. the final words of Section 1 of Chapter III.

[783] However, in contrast to Judge Hoff, he was of the opinion that the 13th suspect (Charles Samboma) validly consented to his transfer from Zambia to Namibia. As a result, his presence before the Namibian courts was lawful. See ibid., pp. 188-189.

[784] Ibid., p. 180. See also ibid., p. 186: "So what we have is that Namibian officials illegally took of[f] the accused prisoner inside Zambia and Botswana, illegally detained them and illegally removed them across the Namibian border. To do this, the Zambians and the Namibians were dependant on each other and the illegal deed was done by cooperation between them." See finally ibid., pp. 193-194. Again (see also n. 766), the role of Mayor General Shali appeared to be crucial, see ibid., p. 185: "The purpose of the handing over of the "terrorists" by army personnel in Zambia to army personnel in Namibia was so that they "could be brought to book in Namibia" and because General Shali asked for their immediate handover for that very purpose. The handover, when it happened was clearly at the initiative of General Shali and other Namibian military and police officials. In this context the purpose and motive was neither legal extradition nor legal deportation. At least General Shali and the other Namibian Defence

As a result, the Court had to divest jurisdiction. It is interesting to note that O'Linn argues that it is unnecessary to solve the question as to whether a court has a discretion in refusing to exercise jurisdiction or whether it is automatically divested of jurisdiction (see Ebrahim) because the result would still remain the same in this case (no jurisdiction).[785] In his judgment, one can find both words which might be seen as evidence for the fact that he supports the first position,[786] but also that he supports the second position.[787]

The third Acting Justice of Appeal, Gibson, agreed with Mtambanengwe. After after referring to the now often-mentioned dictum of the ECtHR in Öcalan,[788] she stated:

> [T]he fugitives were collected from Zambia and Botswana without any form of collusion or deception by the agents of Namibia but explicitly at the request of the two foreign countries.[[789]] Even if it were found that Zambia and Botswana in doing so acted in breach of their own municipal laws that was not a matter for the concern of Namibia.[[790]] Therefore there is no justification for holding that Namibia's hands were not clean on account of the above circumstances.[791]

Force and police officials influenced the handing over, or knowingly cooperated [emphasis in original. ChP]."

[785] See ibid., p. 197.

[786] See ibid.: "[I]n my respectful view, it was not necessary for the presiding judge to expressly state that he was exercising a discretion, although it would have been prudent to do so."

[787] See ibid., p. 174: "[M]y view is that a total disregard of the laws of the relevant states in regard to extradition and/or deportation and even of international law, is in fact "a wrongdoing of the most serious kind". Such wrongdoing is also "exceptional" and falls within its own distinct class or category of gross illegality and abuse, which without more, will require a criminal court to decline jurisdiction [emphasis added, ChP]." See also ibid., p. 197: "It follows if the Court a quo followed Ebrahim, and thus the Namibian common law, he would not have been required to exercise the "discretion" referred to." See finally ibid., p. 209: "The "balancing" would certainly be relevant if the Court was not as in Ebrahim, Wellem and Buys, bound to apply the Roman Dutch Common Law, which requires the Court to refuse jurisdiction, when it is proved that the applicable legal procedures were not followed [emphasis in original, ChP]." This quotation also mentions two other cases in which the strict male captus male detentus reasoning of Ebrahim was followed but other cases after Wellem and Buys overruled these two cases, both implicitly and explicitly, see ibid., p. 160. See also Michell 1996, p. 458, who notes that after Ebrahim, "[t]he subsequent decisions (...) have been surprisingly inconsistent". (See also n. 697 and accompanying text.)

[788] See Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004 (available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf), p. 245.

[789] The request by Mayor General Shali was deemed not to be relevant here, see ibid., p. 246: "In the instant case, the actions of the Namibia officials which were censured by the trial Court as having "tainted" the process of procuring the fugitives from Botswana and Zambia only consist of a request by the officer commanding the Namibian forces to his counterpart in Zambia and nothing further is suggested by this request."

[790] This would, however, be different in the case of "a breach of international law or gross invasion of human rights." See ibid., p. 223. Apparently, Gibson was of the opinion that this had not occurred here.

[791] Ibid., pp. 247-248.

The penultimate Justice to give his opinion was Acting Chief Justice Strydom.

Although he was of the opinion that, because of the cooperation between the authorities of the States involved, no international law had been violated (thereby arguably adopting a rather old-fashioned (inter-State) version of the concept of international law),[792] he did agree with Justice O'Linn that the way 12 of the 13 suspects were brought from Zambia and Botswana into Namibia was nevertheless irregular, that Namibian authorities were actively involved in this irregular transfer[793] and hence that the Court had no jurisdiction to try them.[794]

The final Justice was Acting Justice of Appeal Chomba who concurred with the views of Mtambanengwe and Gibson, as a result of which the final outcome of this case was – three Justices for and two Justices against – that the appeal of the State was granted and that jurisdiction could be exercised. In his judgment, Chomba, referring to the Öcalan case, categorically and arguably also rather bluntly, opted for the importance that suspects of serious crimes are prosecuted, even if irregularities[795] had occurred in the way they were brought into the jurisdiction of the now prosecuting court:

> I readily concede that there are many celebrated decided cases in many countries including South Africa and the United Kingdom in which the plea of lack of jurisdiction by courts of trial has succeeded grounded on the principle that the accused's rendition to the country of trial was unlawful in as much as the laws of deportation or extradition had not been complied with by the surrendering countries. However, in the situation which presents itself in the appeal before us, to use that rationale would not, in my considered opinion, meet the tenets of justice. In this day and age when the world has been and continues to be ravaged by terrorist activity it is otiose to apply that rationale. In my view the rationale on which those celebrated cases are predicated sends wrong signals to potential terrorists. All you have to do is terrorize a state and when you are about to be apprehended by the authorities you cross territorial borders if you have the means to do so and you will be safe unless and until the country of refuge catches up with you and either deports or extradites you under the law. Meanwhile any of your collaborators who were unable to make a cross border escape can face the consequences of the law alone. Furthermore, I think that the human rights of fugitives from the law should not be considered by courts to be of [792] See ibid., p. 255: "In the instant case there was clear co-operation between the officials and forces of Namibia and Zambia and Botswana (...). I have therefore come to the conclusion that in the present instance there was no breach of international law as far as the handing over of the respondents was concerned."

[793] See ibid., p. 266: "Because of the involvement of the Namibian police and/or members of the defence force, the respondents were denied any rights they may have had in terms of the deportation laws and extradition laws of Zambia and Botswana and also Namibia. (...) The unlawful action of the Namibian police and defence force members therefore consists in [their] active participation in the handing over of the 12 respondents despite and contrary to reciprocal legislation providing for a procedure and safeguards in such handing over and thereby causing the circumventing of those procedures and rights which the respondents had in terms of that legislation."

[794] With respect to the 13th suspect, Charles Samboma, Strydom agreed with O'Linn that he had validly consented to his transfer from Zambia to Namibia and thus that he could be tried, see ibid., p. 265.

[795] Note, however, that Chomba was not of the opinion that international law had been violated in this case, see ibid., p. 271.

prior concern over those of victims of terrorism whose security remains endangered as long as the fugitives remain at large.[796]

[796] Ibid., pp. 268-269.

CHAPTER VI
CASES BETWEEN STATES AND INTERNATIONAL(ISED) CRIMINAL TRIBUNALS

1 INTRODUCTION

In this chapter, alleged male captus cases between States and international(ised) criminal tribunals will be discussed.[1]

After having briefly examined (in Section 2) the main characteristics of the cooperation and transfer regime between States and the two most important international criminal tribunals (other than the ICC), namely the UN ad hoc Tribunals, the ICTY and ICTR, attention will be paid (in Section 3) to the male captus cases which occurred in the context of these two Tribunals. After that, the system of legal assistance in the context of international*ised* (or hybrid) criminal tribunals (Section 4) and the male captus case law stemming from these tribunals (Section 5) will be touched upon. Lastly, Section 6 will address a few final interesting observations stemming from this last context of the internationalised criminal tribunals. It should be noted that in Section 4, only a few general remarks will be devoted to the system of legal assistance in the context of the internationalised criminal tribunals as it is unnecessary for the purpose of this study to explain all the different cooperation regimes of these tribunals in detail. A final point which should be explained is that this chapter will start with the ICTY and ICTR and not with the first international criminal tribunals established after WW II, the IMTs of Tokyo and Nuremberg.[2] This is because it appears that those Tribunals

[1] It is assumed that general information on the international(ised) criminal tribunals and the conflicts which engendered their existence is known to the reader. Such information, which can be found in books such as Romano, Nollkaemper and Kleffner 2004 and Schabas 2006, will thus not be presented here again.

[2] Although there were no international tribunals established after WW I, one (rather unknown) story stemming from this context is that fascinating that it still needs to be mentioned in this book, even if it did not lead to a male captus situation in the end. In Art. 227 of the Treaty of Versailles (of 28 June 1919, available at: http://avalon.law.yale.edu/subject_menus/versailles_menu.asp), one can read that the Allied and Associated Powers sought to try the German Emperor William II "for a supreme offence against international morality and the sanctity of treaties" before "[a] special tribunal", "composed of five judges, one appointed by each of the following Powers: namely, the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan." However, William II fled to the Netherlands and found refuge in the country estate of Count Bentinck at Amerongen. (See also Meron 2006, p. 557.) Then, in early 1919, "the kaiser briefly faced danger from a group of American soldiers who tried to spirit him off to Paris.

never considered a true male captus claim – in any case, literature on the male captus issue is silent in this context.[3] One explanation for this may be the fact that many suspects were already in allied custody after the war. Hence, there was no need to come up with dubious male captus methods of capturing them and bringing them into the power of the Tribunals: they were already in the de facto power of these Tribunals.[4]

Colonel Luke Lea, former United States senator and publisher of the Nashville Tennessean, suspected that the British did not really intend to "hang the Kaiser" and thought that if the kaiser were brought to Paris public opinion would force action. "The capture, trial, and punishment of the Kaiser," he said, "was to the American doughboy the object which inspired him" to fight. Lea undoubtedly wanted to be remembered as the man who achieved the soldier's fantasy, the man who bagged "Kaiser Bill." Lea led six soldiers to Amerongen just after New Year's Day. They planned to seize the kaiser by surprise and roar off to Paris, daring the Dutch to shoot while the kaiser was held prisoner in their car. (...) What had begun as a serious undertaking consequently turned into a semicomic confrontation. The Americans determined to persuade the kaiser to go with them voluntarily to face his accusers manfully. They continued on to the Bentinck estate on the night of January 5, bluffed their way inside the house, and demanded to see Wilhelm II. After a two-hour standoff, during which the kaiser refused to meet with the Americans, Dutch troops surrounded the estate with spotlights and machine guns, forcing Colonel Lea and his men to depart. Subsequently, Allied governments had no more success in getting the kaiser out of the Netherlands than did the venturesome American soldiers [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Willis 1982, pp. 100-101.) (Two requests for the surrender of William II, in January and February 1920, were refused by the Dutch authorities. "In doing so the Dutch government invoked principles of national constitutional law as well as a secular tradition of granting asylum." (Swart 2002 C, pp. 1642-1643.))

[3] Although it had nothing to do with an international male captus situation, it may, however, be interesting to note that Julius Streicher claimed that he was mistreated after being arrested and before being brought to the IMT of Nuremberg. This claim was, however, not accepted by the Tribunal, see the following quote of Streicher, responding to the American psychiatrist Goldensohn in Nuremberg when the latter asked him about his defence: "The main thing I tried to stress was how badly I was treated in the American camp at Freising, but the American prosecutor and the judges ruled that my comments on my poor treatment there had to be expunged from the record because it was irrelevant. I don't think it is irrelevant when we National Socialists are accused of war crimes and of murdering 5 million Jews and millions of other innocent people such as partisans, hostages, war prisoners. Therefore, I should have been allowed to insert into the record of this trial how badly I was treated personally as a prisoner of war, after the war was over, mind you, in Freising." (Gellately 2004, p. 260.)

[4] See Gallant 1994, p. 557 ("Unlike the victors' war crimes tribunals at Nuremberg and Tokyo, the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 will probably not find most of its defendants already captured and ready to be tried."), Wald 2001, p. 96 ("the vast majority of the defendants were already in allied hands before trials began") and Zappalà 2002 A, p. 1186 (or – for an almost identical text – Zappalà 2003, p. 67): "It is well known that the Allies, both in Nuremberg and in Tokyo, held defendants in custody before the issue of the indictments. Most of them had been arrested even before the decision to establish an international tribunal was taken and were detained by national contingents. Detention was the general rule and there were no exceptions. Moreover, it seems that there was no chance to argue for provisional release, nor was there any right to challenge the legality of arrest. The reasons for the adoption of this solution are clearly linked to the unique character of those jurisdictions. The Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals were international military organs created by victor powers to judge persons responsible for the most heinous crimes. Naturally, the combination of the gravity of the crimes, the international character of the proceedings, and the post-conflict situation created a solid background of reasons to try to prevent any attempt to escape [original footnote omitted, ChP]."). As will be shown in this chapter and in Chapter VIII, the element 'gravity of the crimes' also (indirectly) plays a role in the context of the ICTY/ICTR/ICC to justify provisional

2 MAIN CHARACTERISTICS OF THE COOPERATION AND TRANSFER REGIME IN THE CONTEXT OF THE ICTY AND ICTR

In Chapter III of this book, in which the different male captus situations were examined, it was explained that inter-State cooperation is usually achieved by means of extradition, "the official surrender of a fugitive from justice, regardless of his consent, by the authorities of the State of residence to the authorities of another State for the purpose of criminal prosecution or the execution of a sentence".[5] Although the fugitive lacks consent by this method, this is not the case with respect to the States involved: they work together because they consent to work together, because they want to work together. Adjectives which may typify the relationship of States in this context are 'equal', 'reciprocal' and 'horizontal'.[6] Such a relationship "emphasizes state sovereignty and, correspondingly, attributes decisive weight to the interests of the requested state if they are at variance with the execution of the request [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[7]

This is completely different in the context of cooperation between States and the ICTY and ICTR.

This cooperation regime can be seen as vertical in nature:[8] it is based on superiority and non-equality: States[9] must cooperate with the hierarchically higher Tribunal,[10] whether they want to or not.[11] detentions, hence leading to a context in which provisional release is indeed the exception to the rule (of provisional detention).

---

[5] Stein 1995, p. 327.

[6] It is submitted that horizontal, even though it is often (and correctly) connected with the inter-State context, is not necessarily a feature which is only applicable to the inter-State context. Horizontal is here understood to mean equal. And, of course, a working relationship based on equality can also very well be applicable to non-statal entities. One could hereby think of a cooperation agreement between two international organisations which consent to cooperate on a reciprocal basis. This also goes the other way around. It is very well possible that a relationship which is often seen as vertical in nature (for example, between a State and an international tribunal) may contain horizontal elements. This will be discussed in more detail when addressing the arrest and surrender regime of the ICC in Chapter VIII.

[7] Kaul and Kreß 2000, p. 158.

[8] The first time the horizontal-vertical distinction was used in a decision was in the ICTY Blaškić case, see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Tihomir Blaškić, 'Judgement on the Request of the Republic of Croatia for Review of the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 18 July 1997', Case No. IT-95-14, 29 October 1997, para. 47: "The International Tribunal is an international criminal court constituting a novelty in the world community. Normally, individuals subject to the sovereign authority of States may only be tried by national courts. If a national court intends to bring to trial an individual subject to the jurisdiction of another State, as a rule it relies on treaties of judicial cooperation or, if such treaties are not available, on voluntary interstate cooperation. Thus, the relation between national courts of different States is "horizontal" in nature. In 1993 the Security Council for the first time established an international criminal court endowed with jurisdiction over individuals living within sovereign States, be they States of the former Yugoslavia or third States, and, in addition, conferred on the International Tribunal primacy over national courts. By the same token, the Statute granted the International Tribunal the power to address to States binding orders concerning a broad variety of judicial matters (including the identification and location of persons, the taking of testimony and the production of evidence, the service of documents, the arrest or detention of persons, and the surrender or transfer of indictees to the International Tribunal). Clearly, a "vertical" relationship was thus established, at least as far as the judicial and injunctory powers of the International Tribunal are concerned (whereas in the area of

Where does this obligation to cooperate originate?

In his report on the ICTY Statute, the UNSG explained, after having suggested that the ICTY needed to be established by a decision of the UNSC acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter:

> 23. This approach would have the advantage of being expeditious and of being immediately effective as all States would be under a binding obligation to take whatever action is required to carry out a decision taken as an enforcement measure under Chapter VII. (...)
>
> 28. In this particular case, the Security Council would be establishing, as an enforcement measure under Chapter VII, a subsidiary organ within the terms of Article 29 of the Charter, but one of a judicial nature. (...)
>
> 125. As pointed out in paragraph 23 above, the establishment of the International Tribunal on the basis of a Chapter VII decision creates a binding obligation on all States to take whatever steps are required to implement the decision. In practical terms, this means that all States would be under an obligation to cooperate with the International Tribunal and to assist it in all stages of the proceedings to ensure compliance with requests for assistance in the gathering of evidence, hearing of witnesses, suspects and experts, identification and location of persons and the service of documents. Effect shall also be given to orders issued by the Trial Chambers, such as warrants of arrest, search warrants, warrants for surrender or transfer of persons, and any other orders necessary for the conduct of the trial.
>
> 126. In this connection, an order by a Trial Chamber for the surrender or transfer of persons to the custody of the International tribunal shall be considered to be the enforcement the International Tribunal is still dependent upon States and the Security Council)." See also ibid., para. 54, Cassese 1998, p. 13 and Swart and Sluiter 1999, pp. 97-101.

---

[9] Note that 'State' in the context of the ICTY must be read extensively, see Rule 2 (A) of its RPE: "In the Rules, unless the context otherwise requires, the following terms shall mean: (…) State: (i) A State Member or non-Member of the United Nations; (ii) an entity recognised by the constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina, namely, the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Republic Srpska; or (iii) a self-proclaimed entity de facto exercising governmental functions, whether recognised as a State or not". See also Furuya 1999, pp. 659-660. (The RPE of the ICTR do not contain a definition of the term State.)

[10] See also Art. 9, para. 2 of the ICTY Statute ("The International Tribunal shall have primacy over national courts") and Art. 8, para. 2 of the ICTR Statute ("The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the primacy over the national courts of all States").

[11] Such an obligation can, of course, be justified by several considerations, see Swart 2002 B, p. 1594: "First, while in the vast majority of criminal cases, national courts do not need international cooperation in order to be able to function properly, the international tribunals entirely depend on cooperation in every single criminal case. The mandatory and unconditional duty for States to cooperate with the Tribunals is, moreover, explained by the fact that the international crimes within their jurisdiction violate peremptory norms of international law, in the repression of which all States have an equal interest. Thirdly, it is the function of the Tribunals, as creatures of the Security Council, to contribute to the preservation or restoration of the peace that is endangered by these crimes." See also Kaul and Kreß 2000, p. 158: "The vertical approach departs from traditional interstate concepts of cooperation in that it attaches greater weight to the community interest in an international criminal prosecution than in conflicting interests of the requested state."

> application of an enforcement measure under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.[12]

One can read two justifications here as to why States must cooperate with orders of the ICTY (and the same would go for those of the ICTR).

The first (to be found in paragraphs 28 and 126) is that the ICTY is a subsidiary organ of the UNSC and that all its decisions (including, for example, an order of surrender) can thus be seen as indirect decisions taken by the UNSC on the basis of Chapter VII of the UN Charter. Article 25 of the UN Charter stipulates that "[t]he Members of the United Nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with the present Charter."[13] Hence, all UN Member States must cooperate with a request or order of the Tribunal. This justification does not pose any problems.

The second justification (to be found in paragraphs 23 and 125) does not speak of the status of the ICTY as a subsidiary organ of the UNSC but states more generally that the fact that the UNSC decides (on the basis of Chapter VII) to establish an international tribunal means that States thus have an obligation to cooperate with that tribunal. The duty of cooperation in that case is hence based on the idea that States, according to Article 25 of the UN Charter, must "accept and carry out" the decision of the UNSC to establish the ICTY. Now, it is true that States are under an obligation to carry out and implement the decision of the UNSC to establish a tribunal, but strictly speaking, that would arguably only involve 'start up' support such as finding an appropriate location to accommodate the tribunal. The duty to cooperate with the tribunal in matters of arrest and the like does not seem to have anything to do with the establishment of the tribunal; it has to do with the daily functioning of the tribunal.

Hence, it can be argued that States must indeed cooperate with the Tribunal in matters of arrest and surrender but this arguably cannot be derived from the decision of the UNSC to establish a tribunal as such. It can, however, be derived from the actual content of the decision by which the Tribunal was established, in which one can clearly find the more specific decision of the UNSC that States must cooperate with the Tribunal.[14] It is therefore submitted that the fact that the UNSC decides to

---

[12] Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), UN Doc. S/25704, 3 May 1993, paras. 23, 28 and 125-126.

[13] Reading this text, one could argue that in fact any decision of the UNSC (whether it is based on Chapter VII of the UN Charter or not) is binding on all UN Member States. There is much controversy about this issue (see Shaw 2003, p. 1102) but this interesting discussion is not relevant for the present one (there is no doubt whatsoever that a Chapter VII decision is binding on all UN Member States) and as a result will not be examined here.

[14] For the ICTY, see UNSC Res. 827 of 25 May 1993: "The Security Council, (...) Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, (...) 2. Decides hereby to establish an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia between 1 January 1991 and a date to be determined by the Security Council upon the restoration of peace (...); (...) 4. Decides that all States shall cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and its organs in accordance with the present resolution and the Statute of the International Tribunal and that consequently all States shall take any establish an international tribunal does not automatically mean that States have to cooperate with it in matters of arrest and surrender, but that this depends on the actual content of the decision.

UNSC Resolution 1593 of 31 March 2005 appears to support the above-mentioned argument. In this resolution, the UNSC referred the situation in Darfur, Sudan, to the ICC. Were one to adhere to the interpretation of the UNSG mentioned above, one could argue that the fact that Article 25 of the UN Charter stipulates that States must accept and carry out/implement the decision of the UNSC (to refer the situation in Darfur to the ICC) in practice means that all States must cooperate with the ICC. After all, that would be the only way the ICC could effectively deal with the situation in Darfur. In the words of Condorelli and Ciampi:

> It is perfectly conceivable that the Security Council could adopt a resolution having as its sole object the decision that all Member States shall cooperate with the Court. It would even seem natural that a decision to this effect be included in a resolution where the Security Council decides to refer a situation to the ICC. One could even argue that one of the implications of a SC referral is that all states are automatically measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the present resolution and the Statute, including the obligation of States to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued by a Trial Chamber under Article 29 of the Statute; (...) [underlined emphasis in original and italicised emphasis added, ChP]." This duty can also be found in Art. 29 of the ICTY Statute: "1. States shall cooperate with the International Tribunal in the investigation and prosecution of persons accused of committing serious violations of international humanitarian law. 2. States shall comply without undue delay with any request for assistance or an order issued by a Trial Chamber, including, but not limited to: (a) the identification and location of persons; (b) the taking of testimony and the production of evidence; (c) the service of documents; (d) the arrest or detention of persons; (e) the surrender or the transfer of the accused to the International Tribunal." For the ICTR, see UNSC Res. 955 of 8 November 1994: "The Security Council, (...) Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, 1. Decides hereby (...) to establish an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994 (...) ; 2. Decides that all States shall cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and its organs in accordance with the present resolution and the Statute of the International Tribunal and that consequently all States shall take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the present resolution and the Statute, including the obligation of States to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued by a Trial Chamber under Article 28 of the Statute, and requests States to keep the Secretary-General informed of such measures; (...) [underlined emphasis in original and italicised emphasis added, ChP]." This duty can also be found in Art. 28 of the ICTR Statute: "1. States shall cooperate with the International Tribunal for Rwanda in the investigation and prosecution of persons accused of committing serious violations of international humanitarian law. 2. States shall comply without undue delay with any request for assistance or an order issued by a Trial Chamber, including but not limited to: (a) The identification and location of persons; (b) The taking of testimony and the production of evidence; (c) The service of documents; (d) The arrest or detention of persons; (e) The surrender or the transfer of the accused to the International Tribunal for Rwanda." Note finally that the duty to cooperate has also been worked out in other documents, such as the RPE and (for the ICTY) the Dayton Peace Agreement of 14 December 1995. See for more information on this topic in the context of the ICTY Mundis 2002, pp. 121*ff*. Note finally that the word "request" in Artt. 29, para. 2 of the ICTY Statute and 28, para. 2 of the ICTR Statute "is misleading since it implies an element of discretion on the part of the state". (Henquet 1999, p. 979.)

---

> put under an international obligation to comply with requests for cooperation by the Court [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP].[15]

However, as has been argued above, whether States have a duty of cooperation or not arguably does not stem from the decision of the UNSC to establish a tribunal or to refer a situation to a tribunal, but from the actual content of this decision.[16] Even though it would be logical for the UNSC to decide in such a decision that all States must cooperate with the ICC – after all, one can imagine that the UNSC, if it truly finds that a certain situation constitutes a threat to international peace and security, will appeal to every member of the international community to support the institution in trying to cope with this international problem – the UNSC may nevertheless decide differently.[17] UNSC Resolution 1593, for example, reads:

---

[15] Condorelli and Ciampi 2005, p. 593. See also Swart 2002 C, p. 1677: "Some remarks should also be made here with regard to the referral of a situation to the Court by the Security Council pursuant to Article 13 of the Statute. The fact that the Security Council, in doing so, is acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations has a number of important consequences for the system of surrender. The obligations arising out of Parts 5 and 9 [of the ICC Statute, ChP] for States in the matter of arrest and surrender thereby become obligations for all Member States of the United Nations regardless of whether or not they are Parties to the Statute."

[16] See also Gallant 2003 B, p. 587 (writing on the ICC): "Where (…) a matter is referred by the Security Council, Chapter VII of the UN Charter may place a UN member state under a legal obligation to co-operate with the Court even where the state is not a party to the ICC Statute [emphasis added, ChP]".

[17] See also Sluiter who, writing at a time when it was still uncertain how the UNSC would deal with this issue, does also recognise the possibility that not every State will be obliged to cooperate with the ICC after a UNSC referral under Chapter VII of the UN Charter (even though he is of the opinion that this possibility, for the very same reasons mentioned above, would be an unlikely option): "In case the Council will in the future decide to trigger the ICC's jurisdiction, it is possible to distinguish grosso modo three alternative modes of submitting a matter. First of all, the Security Council may refer a situation, which it may describe in more detail, in a resolution to the Court, without any further comments or details. In this scenario the matter will be dealt with in accordance with the Statute and the duty to co-operate will be exclusively based on the Statute, meaning, for example, that States non-parties are under no obligation to assist the Court. Such a 'blank submission' without referring to assistance to the Court by all UN members appears an unlikely option having regard to the nature of referral. The Council can only refer a matter when acting under Chapter VII. In other words, it must consider investigation and prosecution by the Court necessary to restore or maintain international peace and security, which, one may argue, implies co-operation by all UN members, including States that are no parties to the Statute. A second, more likely, scenario therefore is that a Chapter VII resolution submitting a matter to the Court decides that all States – or all UN members – shall co-operate with the Court in accordance with its Statute. The resolution, and ultimately the UN Charter, would then constitute the legal basis for the duty to co-operate for all UN members. The duty to co-operate would, for States that are members of the United Nations but not parties to the Statute, be confined to the investigation submitted to the Court by the Council. The scope of the duty to co-operate would not differ from that incumbent on State parties in case of an investigation triggered by a State or initiated by the Prosecutor. As a result, the grounds of refusal set out in the Statute are applicable to and can be invoked by the States non-parties. The third and final option is that the Security Council, with a view to restoring international peace and security, decides that UN members should have the obligation to co-operate fully with the Court. To be more specific, the Council could decide that (certain of) the grounds for refusal in the ICC Statute are not applicable to UN members. This is, again, an unlikely situation because it requires that the Council shapes a new co-operation regime, which may be difficult to reconcile with the legal framework in which the Court has to operate. Furthermore, this may be seen as

> The Security Council, Determining that the situation in Sudan continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security, Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, 1. Decides to refer the situation in Darfur since 1 July 2002 to the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court; 2. Decides that the Government of Sudan and all other parties to the conflict in Darfur, shall cooperate fully with and provide any necessary assistance to the Court and the Prosecutor pursuant to this resolution and, while recognizing that States no party to the Rome Statute have no obligation under the Statute, urges all States and concerned regional and other international organizations to cooperate fully [emphasis in original, ChP].[18]

Be that as it may, it is in any case clear that States must cooperate with the UN ad hoc Tribunals, the ICTY and ICTR, and that this obligation, pursuant to Article 103 of the UN Charter, prevails over other international obligations of States if the latter come into conflict with the former.[19] In addition, States cannot invoke national law to justify a failure to comply with orders from the ICTY and ICTR.[20] This can, for example, be discerned from Rule 58 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE (to focus already a little more on a specific part of the cooperation regime, namely the transfer[21] provisions):

> The obligations laid down in Article [29 for the ICTY and 28 for the ICTR, ChP] of the Statute shall prevail over any legal impediment to the surrender or transfer of the

---

an unauthorised interference with the application in practice of the Statute." (Sluiter 2002 C, pp. 71-72.) See also Sluiter 2002 A, p. 129.

[18] UNSC Res. 1593 of 31 March 2005, UN Doc. S/Res/1593 (2005). Note, however, the criticism of Condorelli and Ciampi (who, as was shown above, have stated that "[o]ne could even argue that one of the implications of a SC referral is that all states are automatically put under an international obligation to comply with requests for cooperation by the Court [emphasis in original, ChP]") towards this resolution: "Of course, this argument – that the SC referral per se blurs the distinction between states party and states not party to the Statute as far as cooperation with the Court is concerned – could be made if the resolution was silent on this point. It cannot, however, be advanced with respect to Res. 1593 (2005), where § 2 expressly rules out such a consequence of the SC referral. The contradiction inherent in the decision to refer the Darfur situation to the ICC, on one hand, and, on the other, to expressly confine the obligation to cooperate with the Court to the states party to the Statute [and to the Government of Sudan and all other parties to the conflict in Darfur, ChP], is, however, nothing but one sign of the overall scant coherency of Res. 1593 (2005)." (Condorelli and Ciampi 2005, p. 593.) See also Heyder 2006, pp. 654-655: "[O]n the one hand, the international community has mandated (…) the ICC to exercise jurisdiction; but (…), on the other hand, states that are not party to the Statute of Rome, except for Sudan [and those other parties to the conflict which are not party to the ICC Statute, ChP], have no obligation to cooperate or support the ICC in fulfilling this task. This contradiction, inherent in the Security Council's logic, is hardly understandable."

[19] See Art. 103 of the UN Charter: "In the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail."

[20] See also Swart 2002 A, p. 1249: "In the matter of arrest and detention, little autonomy or discretion is left to the requested State to refuse to comply with the Tribunals' orders."

[21] Like Swart, this study will use the concept of "transfer" in the context of the ICTY and ICTR. (The reasons therefore are that 1) there does not seem to be a legal difference in the ICTY/ICTR RPE between the concepts of "surrender" and "transfer" (which both are mentioned in the instruments of the ICTY/ICTR) and 2) the ICTY/ICTR RPE have a clear preference for 'transfer', see Swart 2002 C, p. 1666.)

> accused or of a witness to the Tribunal which may exist under the national law or extradition treaties of the State concerned.[22]

Swart explains after having referred to the same rule:

> All this seems to imply that constitutional impediments to the handing over of persons to a tribunal are as irrelevant as other impediments in domestic law. It also implies that a Member State may not invoke the provisions of human rights treaties to which it is a party in order to justify a refusal of transfer.[[23]] The only, rather theoretical, situation in which transfer might be refused is that in which jus cogens would forbid a State to transfer a person. In all these respects transfer of persons to a tribunal is fundamentally different from extradition between States [original footnote omitted, ChP].[24]

Although it would go beyond the scope of this study to make an extensive overview of the entire arrest and transfer framework in the context of the ICTY/ICTR,[25] some [22] Notwithstanding this, Young (2001, p. 340, n. 77) notes that "[d]espite these seemingly coercive powers, the practice of the ICTY and ICTR has shown many incidences where States have imposed their national laws to impede the transfer of accused." Of course, one can imagine that it is sometimes possible to refuse the transfer of a person in such obvious cases as mistaken identity, see, for example, Art. 4, para. 3 of the Dutch Law of 21 April 1994 implementing the ICTY Statute (available at: http://www.icty.org/x/file/Legal%20Library/Member_States_Cooperation/implementation_legislation_the_netherlands_1994_en.pdf): "If the District Court [in The Hague, ChP], which is to rule on whether the Tribunal's request may be granted, holds either that it cannot be established that the person brought before it is the person whose surrender has been requested or that surrender has been requested on account of offences in respect of which the Tribunal is clearly not competent under its Statute, its judgement shall declare the surrender inadmissible." However, O'Shea (1995-1996, pp. 433-434) explains that some States go further than that: "A significant number of states have complied with the Security Council resolutions establishing the ad hoc tribunals by adopting implementing legislation modelled, in most cases, on current extradition law. The newly enacted laws run the gamut from no or optional judicial review (as in the case of Australia and Finland), to limited judicial review (as in the case of France and Italy [and O'Shea also includes the Netherlands among these States, see ibid., p. 379, ChP]), to judicial review of prima facie evidence (as in the case of the United States). Most striking among the new legislation are those of Australia and New Zealand which, despite the tribunals' legal origins in Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter, allows "requests" for cooperation to be denied under exceptional circumstances." Cf. finally Knoops 2002, pp. 70-76 and Zhu 2006, pp. 103-105.

[23] That the State may not invoke provisions from human rights treaties to refuse the transfer does not mean, of course, that the State can forget all its obligations under international human rights law in this context. On the contrary. See, for example, the still-to-discuss Kajelijeli case before the ICTR: "[T]he Appeals Chamber is mindful of the fact that a cooperating State, when effecting an urgent arrest and detention pursuant to the Prosecution's request under Rule 40 of the Rules, must strike a balance between two different obligations under international law. First, the State is required under Security Council Resolution 955 and Article 28 of the Tribunal's Statute to comply fully without undue delay with any requests for assistance from the Tribunal in fulfilling the weighty task of investigating and prosecuting persons accused of committing serious violations of international humanitarian law. On the other hand, the cooperating State still remains under its obligation to respect the human rights of the suspect as protected in customary international law, in the international treaties to which it has acceded, as well as in its own national legislation [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 220.)

[24] Swart 2002 C, pp. 1664-1665. See also Zappalà 2003, p. 9.

[25] See for a more detailed overview, for example, Gallant 1994 (discussing the ICTY rules).

interesting provisions from their Statutes and, in particular, their RPE definitely deserve to be mentioned here.

However, before doing so, the importance of the arrest and transfer provisions must again be emphasised, see also Chapter I of this book. The Tribunals do not recognise trials in absentia, that is, without the person in question being present. As a result, arrests and transfers normally have to be made before the trials can commence.[26] Furthermore, the ICTY/ICTR have no police force of their own. Hence, they are dependent on others – one could hereby think of States and international forces – in the enforcement of arrests. They are, to again refer to the famous metaphor by Cassese, "giant[s] without arms and legs"[27] who need "artificial limbs to walk and work".[28]

Turning now to the arrest and transfer proceedings in the context of the ICTY/ICTR, Article 18, paragraph 4, Article 19 and Article 20, paragraph 2 of the ICTY Statute[29] explain very basically the procedure to follow here: if the Prosecutor determines the existence of a prima facie case, he shall prepare an indictment "containing a concise statement of the facts and the crime or crimes with which the accused is charged under the Statute".[30] This indictment shall then be transmitted to the Trial Chamber where a judge shall review it. "If satisfied that a prima facie case has been established by the Prosecutor, he shall confirm the indictment. If not so satisfied, the indictment shall be dismissed."[31] If the indictment is confirmed, "the judge may, at the request of the Prosecutor, issue such orders and warrants for the arrest, surrender or transfer of persons, and any other orders as may be required for the conduct of the trial".[32] Finally, "[a] person against whom an indictment has been confirmed shall, pursuant to an order or an arrest warrant of the International [26] See Art. 21, para. 4 (d) of the ICTY ("In the determination of any charge against the accused pursuant to the present Statute, the accused shall be entitled to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality: (…) to be tried in his presence") and ICTR ("In the determination of any charge against the accused pursuant to the present Statute, the accused shall be entitled to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality: (…) To be tried in his or her presence") Statutes. In addition, a ban of trials in absentia may also be derived from Art. 20 of the ICTY Statute (see for the ICTR Art. 19 of its Statute): "Article 20 provides that the Trial Chamber can set the date for trial only after reading the indictment to an accused and after confirming that he understands its meaning. This indicates that the physical presence of an accused before the Chamber is an indispensable requirement for commencing a trial." (Furuya 1999, p. 638.) Note finally that suspects, however, may also come voluntarily to The Hague, in which case the arrest is, of course, no conditio sine qua non to the commencement of the trial. However, in most cases, an arrest will be necessary. Cf. also n. 33 of Chapter I and n. 2 of Chapter VIII.

[27] Cassese 1998, p. 13.

[28] Ibid. Arbour (2004, p. 397) notes: "I arrived at the ICTY in October 1996. There were many interesting issues at play in the Office of the Prosecutor (OTP), but there was only one overwhelming, all-encompassing and, I would say, life-threatening issue for the ICTY as it had been conceived: arrests. In fact, the issue of arrests was so acute that although it 'belonged' essentially to the Prosecutor, it had become, inevitably, everybody's issue: the whole of the ICTY, the NGOs and the Press."

[29] See for the ICTR Statute Artt. 17, para. 4, 18 and 19, para. 2.

[30] Art. 18, para. 4 of the ICTY Statute.

[31] Art. 19, para. 1 of the ICTY Statute.

[32] Art. 19, para. 2 of the ICTY Statute.

Tribunal, be taken into custody, immediately informed of the charges against him and transferred to the International Tribunal".[33]

An elaboration of this very basic procedure can be found in the RPE of the Tribunals, in particular Section 1 ('Investigations': Rules 39-43) of Part 4 ('Investigations and Rights of the Suspect') and Sections 1 ('Indictments': Rules 47-53 bis), 2 ('Orders and Warrants': Rules 54-61) and 3 ('Preliminary Proceedings': Rules 62-65 ter) of Part 5 ('Pre-Trial Proceedings').[34] Before focusing on some of these provisions, it may be worth emphasising that these rules speak of both suspects and accused. (Note that in the above-mentioned statutory provisions, only the term 'accused' was mentioned.) The difference between the two is explained in Rule 2 (A) of the ICTY/ICTR RPE: a suspect is "[a] person concerning whom the Prosecutor possesses reliable information which tends to show that [t]he [person] may have committed a crime over which the Tribunal has jurisdiction" whereas an accused is "[a] person against whom one or more counts in an indictment have been confirmed in accordance with Rule 47".

The first rule which is worth mentioning here is Rule 40 (i) of the ICTY RPE.[35] This rule explains that "[i]n case of urgency, the Prosecutor may request any State (...) to arrest a suspect or an accused provisionally". Rule 40 bis of the ICTY/ICTR RPE then further clarifies the law concerning the transfer and provisional detention of suspects. A number of paragraphs from this provision should be addressed here. First, paragraph (B) states which three conditions must be met before the judge shall order the transfer and provisional detention of the suspect.[36] In paragraph (C), one can read that the order for the transfer and provisional detention of the suspect "shall (…) specify the initial time-limit for the provisional detention of the suspect, and be accompanied by a statement of the rights of the suspect, as specified in this Rule and in Rules 42 and 43".[37] Paragraph (D) further clarifies that "[t]he provisional

[33] Art. 20, para. 2 of the ICTY Statute.

[34] Note that in the ICTR RPE context, one will not find a section called 'Preliminary Proceedings'. The provisions from this section have namely been incorporated in Section 2 ('Orders and Warrants': Rules 54-65 bis) of Part 5 ('Pre-Trial Proceedings') of the ICTR RPE.

[35] See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 40 (A) (i) of the ICTR RPE.

[36] Rule 40 bis (B) of the ICTY RPE reads: "The Judge shall order the transfer and provisional detention of the suspect if the following conditions are met: (i) the Prosecutor has requested a State to arrest the suspect provisionally, in accordance with Rule 40, or the suspect is otherwise detained by State authorities; (ii) after hearing the Prosecutor, the Judge considers that there is a reliable and consistent body of material which tends to show that the suspect may have committed a crime over which the Tribunal has jurisdiction; and (iii) the Judge considers provisional detention to be a necessary measure to prevent the escape of the suspect, injury to or intimidation of a victim or witness or the destruction of evidence, or to be otherwise necessary for the conduct of the investigation." See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 40 bis (B) of the ICTR RPE.

[37] Rule 40 bis (C) of the ICTY RPE and Rule 40 bis (D) of the ICTR RPE. Rule 42 of the ICTY RPE reads: "(A) A suspect who is to be questioned by the Prosecutor shall have the following rights, of which the Prosecutor shall inform the suspect prior to questioning, in a language the suspect understands: (i) the right to be assisted by counsel of the suspect's choice or to be assigned legal assistance without payment if the suspect does not have sufficient means to pay for it; (ii) the right to have the free assistance of an interpreter if the suspect cannot understand or speak the language to be used for questioning; and (iii) the right to remain silent, and to be cautioned that any statement the detention of a suspect shall be ordered for a period not exceeding thirty days from the date of the transfer of the suspect to the seat of the Tribunal."[38] Although this detention can be extended,

> [t]he total period of detention shall in no case exceed ninety days, at the end of which, in the event the indictment has not been confirmed and an arrest warrant signed, the suspect shall be released or, if appropriate, be delivered to the authorities of the requested State.[39]

Although the total period of provisional detention may thus not exceed ninety days, this period only starts to run as from the date of[40] or the day after[41] the transfer. However, it is not clear how long a person may be deprived of his liberty before the (day after the) transfer.[42] Swart notes that at the stage of the transfer proceedings in the requested State (as well as in the earlier stage of provisional arrest), > the arrested person's sole recourse is to a tribunal for habeas corpus or for obtaining interim release, since Rule 57 of the RPE of both ad hoc Tribunals leaves no discretion to States to decide on these matters.[[43]] It is, therefore, to be deplored that neither the Statutes nor the RPE of the ad hoc Tribunals accord an explicit remedy to the person at this stage. The duration will be determined by the diligence of the suspect makes shall be recorded and may be used in evidence. (B) Questioning of a suspect shall not proceed without the presence of counsel unless the suspect has voluntarily waived the right to counsel. In case of waiver, if the suspect subsequently expresses a desire to have counsel, questioning shall thereupon cease, and shall only resume when the suspect has obtained or has been assigned counsel." See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 42 of the ICTR RPE. Finally, Rule 43 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE has to do with the recording of the questioning of suspects.

---

[38] See for a comparable (but as regards content also slightly different) provision in the ICTR context Rule 40 bis (C) of the ICTR RPE: "The provisional detention of the suspect may be ordered for a period not exceeding 30 days from the day after the transfer of the suspect to the detention unit of the Tribunal [emphasis added, ChP]."

[39] Rule 40 bis (D) of the ICTY RPE. See for a comparable (but as regards content also slightly different) provision in the ICTR context Rule 40 bis (H) of the ICTR RPE: "The total period of provisional detention shall in no case exceed 90 days after the day of transfer of the suspect to the Tribunal, at the end of which, in the event the indictment has not been confirmed and an arrest warrant signed, the suspect shall be released or, if appropriate, be delivered to the authorities of the State to which the request was initially made [emphasis added, ChP]."

[40] See Rule 40 bis (D) of the ICTY RPE.

[41] See Rule 40 bis (H) of the ICTR RPE.

[42] See also Swart 2002 A, p. 1250: "[T]he RPE attach no time limit to the period a person may be deprived of his liberty at the request of the Prosecutor pending the issuance of an order by a judge or Chamber."

[43] Rule 57 of the ICTY RPE reads: "Upon arrest, the accused shall be detained by the State concerned which shall promptly notify the Registrar. The transfer of the accused to the seat of the Tribunal shall be arranged between the State authorities concerned, the authorities of the host country and the Registrar." See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 57 of the ICTR RPE. Cf. also the still to be mentioned Rule 65 (A) of the ICTY RPE: "Once detained, an accused may not be released except upon an order of a Chamber." Gallant (1994, p. 585) writes on this rule that it "suggests that the arresting state has no authority to release the defendant pursuant to its own law."

> Tribunal and the requested State in conducting the proceedings as well as by the choice of the person requested to challenge transfer or to consent to it. [44]

Nevertheless, in the discussion of the ICTR Barayagwiza case in Subsection 3.2.1, it will be shown that the judges have, to a certain extent, filled this legal gap in the arrest and transfer proceedings.[45]

If the suspect has been transferred to the Tribunal, he "shall be brought, without delay, before the Judge who made the order, or another permanent Judge of the same Trial Chamber, who shall ensure that the rights of the suspect are respected".[46] Alongside the already-mentioned release possibilities pursuant to Rule 40 bis (D) of the ICTY RPE/Rule 40 bis (H) of the ICTR RPE, paragraph (G)[47] adds the following habeas corpus-like provision to these proceedings: "During detention, the Prosecutor and the suspect or the suspect's counsel may submit to the Trial Chamber of which the Judge who made the order is a member, all applications relative to the propriety of provisional detention or to the suspect's release."

Turning now to the provisions focusing on the accused: if the Prosecutor is "satisfied in the course of an investigation that there is sufficient evidence to provide reasonable grounds for believing that a suspect has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal",[48] he "shall prepare and forward to the Registrar an indictment for confirmation by a Judge, together with supporting material".[49] If any or all of the counts in the indictment are confirmed, "(i) the Judge may issue an arrest warrant, in accordance with Rule 55 (A),[[50]] and any orders as provided in Article 19 of the Statute, and (ii) the suspect shall have the status of an accused."[51] A final provision which should be mentioned here, before looking at the provisions on the execution of arrest warrants, is Rule 53 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE.[52] This rule

---

[44] Swart 2002 A, p. 1250. See also ibid., p. 1251: "Time limits included in the RPE (...) are not concerned with arrest and detention in the requested State but with provisional detention after the person's transfer by that State."

[45] See also n. 863 and, generally, n. 880.

[46] Rule 40 bis (F) of the ICTY RPE. See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 40 bis (J) of the ICTR RPE.

[47] See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 40 bis (K) of the ICTR RPE.

[48] Rule 47 (B) of the ICTY/ICTR RPE.

[49] Rule 47 (B) of the ICTY/ICTR RPE.

[50] Rule 55 (A) of the ICTY RPE reads: "A warrant of arrest shall be signed by a permanent Judge. It shall include an order for the prompt transfer of the accused to the Tribunal upon the arrest of the accused." See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 55 (A) of the ICTR RPE.

[51] Rule 47 (H) of the ICTY RPE. See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 47 (H) of the ICTR RPE.

[52] Rule 53 of the ICTY RPE ('Non-disclosure') reads: "(A) In exceptional circumstances, a Judge or a Trial Chamber may, in the interests of justice, order the non-disclosure to the public of any documents or information until further order. (B) When confirming an indictment the Judge may, in consultation with the Prosecutor, order that there be no public disclosure of the indictment until it is served on the accused, or, in the case of joint accused, on all the accused. (C) A Judge or Trial Chamber may, in consultation with the Prosecutor, also order that there be no disclosure of an indictment, or part thereof, or of all or any part of any particular document or information, if satisfied that the making of such an order is required to give effect to a provision of the Rules, to protect confidential information obtained by the Prosecutor, or is otherwise in the interests of justice. (D) Notwithstanding paragraphs (A), (B) authorises the use of sealed indictments, which is one of the three "innovative ways"[53] to obtain the arrest and transfer of persons to The Hague mentioned by Chief of Investigations at the ICTY's OTP Office Lopez-Terres (the other two will be mentioned below).

> Sealed indictments proved effective in a number of cases. It was indeed so effective that many perpetrators of war crimes, including many who were not wanted by the ICTY, started leaving Bosnia and Herzegovina and went to safer areas in Croatia and Serbia and Montenegro where they knew nothing could happen to them.[[54]] The practice was, however, discontinued after the number of accused was significantly reduced in Bosnia and Herzegovina.[55]

The instrument of sealed indictments will be returned to in the discussion of the Dokmanović case, to be examined in Subsection 3.1.1 of this chapter.

Rule 55 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE deals with the execution of arrest warrants. Two paragraphs from this provision merit some more attention here.

First, Rule 55 (C) of the ICTY RPE[56] mentions the rights to which the accused is entitled. Here, reference is made to (the already-mentioned) Rules 42 and 43 of the and (C), the Prosecutor may disclose an indictment or part thereof to the authorities of a State or an appropriate authority or international body where the Prosecutor deems it necessary to prevent an opportunity for securing the possible arrest of an accused from being lost." See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 53 of the ICTR RPE.

---

[53] P. Lopez-Terres, Chief of Investigations, ICTY, 'Arrest and transfer of indictees. The experience of the ICTY', 15 December 2006 (available at: http://www.icln.net/htm/Annual%20conference%202006/Presentation_Lopez-Terres.pdf), p. 5.

[54] Cf. Scharf 1998, pp. 376-377: "The Dayton Peace Accords, Security Council Resolution 1031, and the subsequent agreement of the Bosnian government make clear that NATO forces may lawfully exercise police powers in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Similarly, Security Council Resolution 1037, which with the consent of Croatia and the FRY temporarily placed the administration of Eastern Slavonia under UNTAES, gave the United Nations peacekeeping force the right to exercise police powers in that region of Croatia. Consequently, there is no violation of territorial integrity of the rights of the accused where NATO or United Nations personnel apprehend indicted war criminals in Bosnia and Herzegovina or the region of Eastern Slavonia, Croatia. Such activities conducted in the FRY and other regions of Croatia, however, are another matter [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also ns. 265 and 516.

[55] P. Lopez-Terres, Chief of Investigations, ICTY, 'Arrest and transfer of indictees. The experience of the ICTY', 15 December 2006 (available at: http://www.icln.net/htm/Annual%20conference%202006/Presentation_Lopez-Terres.pdf), pp. 6-7. See also Arbour 2004, p. 397: "Despite the inexplicable (for the time being, one hopes) lack of arrest of Karadžić and Mladić, the 1997 arrest strategy was successful. This was not due exclusively to a reversal from widely publicized indictments to indictments under seal: many other factors came into play to provide, if nothing else, a window of opportunity. But the sealed indictments were critical. They provided us with unanswerable arguments to the alleged operational difficulties of arresting publicly accused and gave us back some of the leadership of our own operations." (Note, of course, that Karadžić is now in ICTY custody.)

[56] "Each certified copy [of the official arrest warrant, ChP] shall be accompanied by a copy of the indictment certified in accordance with Rule 47 (G) and a statement of the rights of the accused set forth in Article 21 of the Statute, and in Rules 42 and 43 mutatis mutandis. If the accused does not understand either of the official languages of the Tribunal and if the language understood by the accused is known to the Registrar, each certified copy of the warrant of arrest shall also be accompanied by a translation of

ICTY/ICTR RPE and Article 21 of the ICTY Statute/Article 20 of the ICTR Statute (entitled 'Rights of the Accused').[57]

The other paragraph from Rule 55 deserving special attention is Rule 55 (G) of the ICTY RPE, which reveals that the execution of arrest warrants is not restricted to States: "When an arrest warrant issued by the Tribunal is executed by the authorities of a State, or an appropriate authority or international body, a member of the Office of the Prosecutor may be present as from the time of the arrest [emphasis added, ChP]."

Rule 59 bis (A) of the ICTY RPE[58] should also be mentioned in this context. This provision reads:

> Notwithstanding Rules 55 to 59, on the order of a permanent Judge, the Registrar shall transmit to an appropriate authority or international body or the Prosecutor a copy of a warrant for the arrest of an accused, on such terms as the Judge may determine, together with an order for the prompt transfer of the accused to the

---

the statement of the rights of the accused in that language." See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 55 (A) and (B) of the ICTR RPE.

[57] Art. 21 of the ICTY Statute reads: "1. All persons shall be equal before the International Tribunal. 2. In the determination of charges against him, the accused shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing, subject to article 22 of the Statute [which deals with the protection of victims and witnesses, ChP]. 3. The accused shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to the provisions of the present Statute. 4. In the determination of any charge against the accused pursuant to the present Statute, the accused shall be entitled to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality: (a) to be informed promptly and in detail in a language which he understands of the nature and cause of the charge against him; (b) to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence and to communicate with counsel of his own choosing; (c) to be tried without undue delay; (d) to be tried in his presence, and to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing; to be informed, if he does not have legal assistance, of this right; and to have legal assistance assigned to him, in any case where the interests of justice so require, and without payment by him in any such case if he does not have sufficient means to pay for it; (e) to examine, or have examined, the witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him; (f) to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in the International Tribunal; (g) not to be compelled to testify against himself or to confess guilt." See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Art. 20 of the ICTR Statute.

[58] Interestingly, the contents of these two provisions (Rule 55 (G) of the ICTY RPE and Rule 59 bis (A) of the ICTY RPE) will not be found in the ICTR RPE, which only mention the concepts of 'appropriate authority' and 'international body' in Rule 53 (D) of the ICTR RPE (where it is stated that "the Prosecutor may disclose an indictment or part thereof to (...) an appropriate authority or international body where the Prosecutor deems it necessary to secure the possible arrest of an accused") and Rule 39 (iii) of the ICTR RPE (where it is stated that "[i]n the conduct of an investigation, the Prosecutor may (...) [s]eek (...) the assistance (...) of any relevant international body including the International Criminal Police Organization (INTERPOL)"). (Note that the ICTR RPE also mention the concept of 'appropriate authority' in the specific context of the State in Rule 61 (A) (i) of the ICTR RPE where it is explained that one of the requirements before the judge shall order that the indictment be submitted by the Prosecutor to his Trial Chamber (in case a warrant of arrest has not been executed) is that "[t]he Registrar and the Prosecutor have taken all reasonable steps to secure the arrest of the accused, including recourse to the appropriate authorities of the State in whose territory or under whose jurisdiction and control the accused to be served resides or was last known to be".)

> Tribunal in the event that the accused be taken into custody by that authority or international body or the Prosecutor [emphasis added, ChP].[59]

Since the nature of international crimes is often characterised by a high level of State involvement[60] and States may hence be reluctant to make arrests,[61] cooperation with entities other than States may be very necessary. In fact, Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE[62] is also one of the "innovative ways" to obtain the arrest and transfer of persons to The Hague mentioned by Lopez-Terres: "[A] significant number of arrests did not occur until the enactment of Rule 59*bis*, which explicitly permitted the transmission of arrest warrants to peacekeeping forces deployed in Bosnia-Herzegovina."[63]

---

[59] Note that this provision stipulates that the Prosecutor may also be involved in the arrest itself, even though OTP officials do not seem to be allowed to make the arrest themselves. See for the latter point the already-mentioned (see n. 8) Blaškić case of 29 October 1997 where the ICTY Appeals Chamber stated: "The International Tribunal can prosecute and try those persons. This is its primary jurisdiction. However, it is self-evident that the International Tribunal, in order to bring to trial persons living under the jurisdiction of sovereign States, not being endowed with enforcement agents of its own, must rely upon the cooperation of States. The International Tribunal must turn to States if it is effectively to investigate crimes, collect evidence, summon witnesses and have indictees arrested and surrendered to the International Tribunal." (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Tihomir Blaškić, 'Judgement on the Request of the Republic of Croatia for Review of the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 18 July 1997', Case No. IT-95-14, 29 October 1997, para. 26.) A good illustration of this issue can be found in the still –to-discuss Dokmanović case where an ICTY OTP official set up a luring operation after which the suspect was taken into custody by UNTAES. During the arrest, the OTP official was present and even read the accused's rights. Scharf (1998, p. 379) notes that "[t]he Blaskić opinion [see the above-mentioned quotation, ChP] makes clear that the officers of the OTP are not authorized to act on their own as an international constabulary. This would suggest that they may not unilaterally arrest indicted persons, but it does not prevent them from participating in operations as an adjunct of the United Nations or NATO." See finally Zhou (2006, p. 209) who is of the opinion that "the relevant rules of the ICTY RPE suggest that the OTP should retain a strong participatory role in the apprehension of individuals indicted by the ICTY."

[60] See Van der Wilt 2004, pp. 274-275.

[61] This is especially so with respect to the ICTY. Ruxton (2001, p. 20) writes, for example, that in the context of the ICTR, "we had considerable success working with national authorities of African countries. As a result we had many high-ranking accused in custody from an early stage."

[62] The entire article reads: "(A) Notwithstanding Rules 55 to 59, on the order of a permanent Judge, the Registrar shall transmit to an appropriate authority or international body or the Prosecutor a copy of a warrant for the arrest of an accused, on such terms as the Judge may determine, together with an order for the prompt transfer of the accused to the Tribunal in the event that the accused be taken into custody by that authority or international body or the Prosecutor. (B) At the time of being taken into custody an accused shall be informed immediately, in a language the accused understands, of the charges against him or her and of the fact that he or she is being transferred to the Tribunal. Upon such transfer, the indictment and a statement of the rights of the accused shall be read to the accused and the accused shall be cautioned in such a language. (C) Notwithstanding paragraph (B), the indictment and statement of rights of the accused need not be read to the accused if the accused is served with these, or with a translation of these, in a language the accused understands and is able to read."

[63] P. Lopez-Terres, Chief of Investigations, ICTY, 'Arrest and transfer of indictees. The experience of the ICTY', 15 December 2006 (available at: http://www.icln.net/htm/Annual%20conference%202006/Presentation_Lopez-Terres.pdf), p. 5. See also Sluiter 2001, p. 151 and the ICC OTP's 'Informal expert paper: Fact-finding and investigative functions of the office of the Prosecutor, including international co-operation', 2003, available at:

There has been great discussion[64] as to whether IFOR/SFOR not only had the possibility (as can be derived from Rules 55 (G) of the ICTY RPE and 59 bis of the ICTY RPE) but also an obligation to arrest (as do States have, see Rule 56 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE).[65] Gaeta, who asserts that IFOR (and SFOR) do have the authority but not a duty to arrest persons indicted by the ICTY,[66] explains that the North Atlantic Council (NATO's political body under which authority the force(s) operate) adopted a resolution on 16 December 1995 which provided that > having regard to the United Nations Security Council Resolution 827, the United Nations Security Council Resolution 1031, and Annex 1-A of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina, IFOR should detain any persons indicted by the International Criminal Tribunal[[67]] who come into contact with IFOR in its execution of assigned tasks, in order to assure the transfer of these persons to the International Criminal Tribunal [emphasis added, ChP].[68]

Of interest is the word "should". Gaeta notices that "[t]he choice of the word 'should' seems to indicate both the absence of an obligation proper and a strong http://www2.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/490C317B-5D8E-4131-8170-7568911F6EB2/248459/372616.PDF, para. 91. The NATO-led peacekeeping force in Bosnia-Herzegovina, IFOR, was replaced by NATO's SFOR and later by the EU's EUFOR. Other examples of peacekeeping forces in the context of the conflict in former Yugoslavia are the UN-led UNTAES (in Croatia) and the NATO-led KFOR (in Kosovo).

---

[64] See, for example, Lamb 2000, p. 192, Scharf 2000, pp. 951-964, Sluiter 2001, pp. 151-152, Henquet 2003, pp. 132*ff* and Frulli 2006, p. 355.

[65] Rule 56 of the ICTY RPE reads: "The State to which a warrant of arrest or a transfer order for a witness is transmitted shall act promptly and with all due diligence to ensure proper and effective execution thereof, in accordance with Article 29 of the Statute [emphasis added, ChP]." See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 56 of the ICTR RPE. Jones (1996, p. 239) argues that "[t]wo arguments might be made that IFOR has not only the right but also the duty to execute the Tribunal's arrest warrants [emphasis in original, ChP]." Both of them are indirect: they deal with the obligation of States and argue that these obligations are also applicable to national contingents within IFOR. "The first argument derives from the Tribunal's Rules and the overriding obligation of all States to comply with the tribunal's orders pursuant to Resolution 827 (1993). (…) For example, the United States contingent of the IFOR currently has responsibility for the operational area which includes Srebrenica. If the Registrar believed an accused to be in Srebrenica, she could send an arrest warrant to the appropriate authorities of the United States, which would then have the duty to execute the arrest warrant [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.) The second argument has to do with the aut dedere (to perhaps also the ICTY) aut iudicare obligation of (troop-contributing) States with respect to suspects charged with grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 1949. (See ibid., pp. 239-240.)

[66] See Gaeta 1998, p. 181. The situation is different with respect to UNTAES though: an obligation to cooperate with the ICTY (including the obligation to execute arrest warrants) has been imposed upon UNTAES by UNSC Res. 1037 of 15 January 1996 where (in para. 21) the words "UNTAES shall co-operate with the International Tribunal in the performance of its mandate [emphasis added, ChP]" are used (see Gaeta 1998, p. 180, n. 16.). The same is valid for KFOR: para. 14 of UNSC Res. 1244 of 10 June 1999, establishing KFOR, "Demands full cooperation by all concerned, including the international security presence, with the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia [underlined emphasis in original and italicised emphasis added, ChP]". See also Ciampi 2002, p. 1620.

[67] International forces, fond of abbreviations, usually call these persons 'PIFWCs': Persons Indicted For War Crimes.

[68] Gaeta 1998, p. 178. See also Lamb 2000, p. 191.

invitation to IFOR to execute arrest warrants [emphasis added, ChP]".[69] Furthermore, the passage "persons (…) who come into contact" hints that IFOR does not need to actively seek the indicted persons. However, this resolution is not very clear and this may also explain the different interpretations on this issue by subsequent Trial Chambers.[70]

For example, in the 2000 Simić et al. decision (this is the Todorović case which will be discussed in more detail in Subsection 3.1.2), the ICTY Trial Chamber, even though it agreed with the fact that forces do not need to initiate a search themselves, took another stance with respect to the authorisation/obligation discussion. It argued that there is in principle > no reason why Article 29 [which, as was clarified earlier, see footnote 14, obliges States to cooperate, ChP] should not apply to collective enterprises undertaken by States, in the framework of international organisations and, in particular, their competent organs such as SFOR in the present case. A purposive construction of Article 29 suggests that it is as applicable to such collective enterprises as it is to States. The purpose of Article 29 of the Statute of the International Tribunal is to secure cooperation with the International Tribunal in the investigation and prosecution of persons accused of committing serious violations of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia. The need for such cooperation is strikingly apparent, since the International Tribunal has no enforcement arm of its own – it lacks a police force. Although this cooperation would, more naturally, be expected from States, it is also achievable through the assistance of international organizations through their competent organs which, by virtue of their activities, might have information relating to, or come into contact with, persons indicted by the International Tribunal for serious violations of international humanitarian law.[71]

---

[69] Gaeta 1998, p. 178, n. 10. See also Lamb 2000, p. 191, n. 80.

[70] See also Ph. Vallières-Roland, 'Prosecuting War Criminals: A Critique of the Relationship between NATO and the International Criminal Courts', Centre for European Security and Disarmament (CESD) – Briefing Paper, February 2002, available at http://www.isis-europe.org/pdf/2008_artrel_87_2002_archives_59_paper.natoandiccs.pdf, p. 7: "In circumspect, the North Atlantic Council (NAC) acted cautiously in its 16 December 1995 regulation, both by using optional language and by limiting to the arrest of ICTY indictees the enforcement authority of the multinational force. The NAC probably hoped that the relationship between NATO and the ICTY would slowly evolve through the years and be strengthened informally if needed. However, the lack of precision on such an important precedent of regulation between an international criminal court and a multi-state entity opened the door for an array of speculation and difficult issues for the international criminal courts to settle. A good opportunity was therefore lost to set out clear guidelines for a future relationship between an international criminal court and a multi-state entity [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[71] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 46. (See also ibid., paras. 47-49.) Cf. also Sluiter (2003 A, pp. 288-289) who endorses the purposive construction of Art. 29 but who is not sure whether it can be applied to SFOR: "One has difficulty accepting that the ICTY is able to issue orders to a "multinational implementation force", which also enjoys a mandate from the Security Council [which does not oblige it to provide legal assistance to the ICTY, ChP]. In other words, I believe that no hierarchical relationship can be established between the ICTY and IFOR/SFOR. (…) The Trial Chamber can be criticised for not having sufficiently taken into account SFOR's own Security Council-based

This decision was rejected in the 2001 Brđanin & Talić decision[72] but confirmed in the 2002 Nikolić decision, which will be discussed at length in Subsection 3.1.4 of this chapter.[73] The only point all these decisions agree upon is the fact that forces do not have to look for suspects themselves. There is only an obligation to arrest – if such an obligation is indeed present, which is still doubtful – if those forces come into contact with suspects. A perhaps – from another perspective – more relevant matter is how the commanders on the ground have viewed their mandate with respect to the arrest of suspects. Although it was previously mentioned by Lopez-Terres that "a significant number of arrests did not occur until the enactment of Rule 59*bis*",[74] the above-mentioned mandate stemming from the 1995 North Atlantic Council resolution, unfortunately, was nevertheless > interpreted restrictively by most commanders on the field, especially when it came to senior accused, such as Radovan Karadzic and Ratko Mladic. There are several documented instances where, from 1995 till 1998, both men could have been arrested by NATO forces, but the local commanders apparently refused to give the appropriate orders.[75] mandate, which makes it in my view impossible to treat SFOR as just a group of States to which Article 29 is fully applicable." See also Henquet (2003, pp. 138*ff*), who is very critical of the reasoning in this Todorović decision as well.

---

[72] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Radoslav Brđanin & Momir Talić, 'Decision on Motion by Momir Talić for Provisional Release', Case No. IT-99-36-PT, 28 March 2001, para. 29: "The use of the word "should" [the judges, like Gaeta, looked at the same resolution of the North Atlantic Council, ChP] demonstrates the reality that SFOR does not accept any legal obligation on its part to arrest anyone. The resolution does not even contemplate any obligation upon SFOR to seek out indicted persons in order to arrest them. The inaction by SFOR during the period following the publication of the SFOR Decision [this is the above-mentioned 2000 Simić decision, ChP] only underlines the unfortunate fact that reliance cannot be placed upon SFOR to arrest indicted persons who fail to appear for trial, in the way a police force may be expected to act in domestic legal systems."

[73] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, paras. 49 ("The question that may arise is whether the duty to co-operate, as laid down in Article 29, applies to States only, or also to other entities or collective enterprises, such as SFOR. Read literally, Article 29 seems to relate to States only. This question had been discussed previously, inter alia, by the Trial Chamber in the Simić Decision. This Trial Chamber sees no reason to take a different view") and 67 ("Once a person comes "in contact with" SFOR, (…) SFOR is obliged under Article 29 of the Statute and Rule 59 bis to arrest/detain the person and have him transferred to the Tribunal [emphasis added, ChP].").

[74] See also P. Lopez-Terres, Chief of Investigations, ICTY, 'Arrest and transfer of indictees. The experience of the ICTY', 15 December 2006 (available at: http://www.icln.net/htm/Annual%20conference%202006/Presentation_Lopez-Terres.pdf), p. 6: "This practice has known some success, especially with the "smaller fish" in the first years of the life of the Tribunal."

[75] According to Lopez-Terres, there appears to be "a significant lack of political will to arrest these men. Preserving the security of troops and fear for the "bodybag syndrome" are certainly some of the reasons why States participating in international forces have not taken such action." (Ibid.) Although Karadžić has by now been arrested (albeit not by international forces), see Subsection 3.1.6, the above-mentioned reasons indeed seem to constitute important reasons for international forces to refrain from arrests more generally.

The penultimate rule which should be mentioned here is Rule 61 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE, created to anticipate potential problems the Tribunals would face concerning uncooperative States in the context of arrest and surrender and therefore deserving special attention in this book.[76]

Interestingly, the first case in which the procedure of this rule was used was the ICTY[77] Nikolić case,[78] arguably the most important male captus case in the context of this chapter, see Subsection 3.1.4.

What is to be done if the warrant is not executed within a reasonable time? In that case, "the Judge who confirmed the indictment shall invite the Prosecutor to report on the measures taken".[79]

The provision then continues, explaining:

> When the Judge is satisfied that: (i) the Registrar and the Prosecutor have taken all reasonable steps to secure the arrest of the accused, including recourse to the appropriate authorities of the State in whose territory or under whose jurisdiction and control the person to be served resides or was last known to them to be; and (ii) if the whereabouts of the accused are unknown, the Prosecutor and the Registrar have taken all reasonable steps to ascertain those whereabouts, including by seeking publication of advertisements pursuant to Rule 60,[[80]] the Judge shall order that the indictment be submitted by the Prosecutor to the Trial Chamber of which the Judge is a member.[81]

Sections under (B) and (C) subsequently introduce a procedure which has often been linked with a trial in absentia – forbidden in the context of the ICTY/ICTR[82] – because the proceeding is held without the accused being present.

According to the first section, Section (B), the Prosecutor, upon obtaining the order as mentioned under the above-quoted Section (A), > shall submit the indictment to the Trial Chamber in open court, together with all the evidence that was before the Judge who initially confirmed the indictment. The Prosecutor may also call before the Trial Chamber and examine any witness whose statement has been submitted to the confirming Judge. In addition, the Trial Chamber [76] In addition, a link with the ICC can also be quickly made here. See Art. 61, para. 2 of the ICC Statute (see ns. 1 and 291 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII) for more information. See also Furuya 1999, p. 637.

[77] The ICTR never showed any interest in Rule 61 proceedings, see Schabas 2006, p. 383. See also Swart 2002 C, p. 1675.
[78] See Quintal 1998, p. 756.
[79] Rule 61 (A) of the ICTY/ICTR RPE.
[80] Rule 60 of the ICTY RPE reads: "At the request of the Prosecutor, a form of advertisement shall be transmitted by the Registrar to the national authorities of any State or States, for publication in newspapers or for broadcast via radio and television, notifying publicly the existence of an indictment and calling upon the accused to surrender to the Tribunal and inviting any person with information as to the whereabouts of the accused to communicate that information to the Tribunal." See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 60 of the ICTR RPE.
[81] Rule 61 (A) of the ICTY RPE. See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 61 (A) of the ICTR RPE.
[82] See n. 26 and accompanying text.

> may request the Prosecutor to call any other witness whose statement has been submitted to the confirming Judge.[83]

Section (C) further clarifies:

> If the Trial Chamber is satisfied on that evidence, together with such additional evidence as the Prosecutor may tender, that there are reasonable grounds for believing that the accused has committed all or any of the crimes charged in the indictment, it shall so determine. The Trial Chamber shall have the relevant parts of the indictment read out by the Prosecutor together with an account of the efforts to effect service referred to in paragraph (A) above.[84]

There is more, however. According to Section (D),

> [t]he Trial Chamber shall also issue an international arrest warrant in respect of the accused which shall be transmitted to all States.[[85]] Upon request by the Prosecutor, the Trial Chamber may order a State or States to adopt provisional measures to freeze the assets of the accused, without prejudice to the rights of third parties.[86]

The Rule 61 procedure, sometimes referred to as the 'voice of the victims',[87] indeed very much resembles an in absentia trial. However, it is not the same. After all, the rule does not allow for a determination of the accused's guilt.

As a result, no sentence can be pronounced.[88] Notwithstanding this, it is indeed true that "judgement, in a sense, is levelled through the creation of a public record.

---

[83] See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 61 (B) of the ICTR RPE.

[84] See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 61 (C) of the ICTR RPE.

[85] According to the ICTY, such an international arrest warrant entails a number of clear-cut consequences: "-the accused will find himself publicly branded an "international fugitive", and the country he has taken cover in will be converted into an "open-air prison"; - the accused will become a hostage to the political changes which might take place in his country of refuge: any protection he enjoys today may turn out to be only temporary; - and lastly, should the accused hold a public, civil or military position of responsibility, his exercise thereof will be seriously affected, both internationally and domestically, by his status as a "wanted person"." ('Rule 61: The voice of the victims. Rule 61 proceedings: Tribunal not defeated by non-appearance of the accused', ICTY Bulletin, No. 3, 22-II-1996.) For criticism, see Quintal 1998, p. 758.

[86] See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 61 (D) of the ICTR RPE. Note that national laws may even allow the freezing of assets of people allegedly supporting the accused persons in evading justice: "Under existing legislation in BiH [Bosne i Hercegovine: Bosnia and Herzegovina, ChP], the property of ICTY indictees who go on the run can be frozen and their business dealings can be halted. The same applies in any case where officials have a "grounded suspicion" that a person is helping an indictee to evade justice. In this regard, the legislation in question explicitly lists "spouses or consensual partners, first line blood relatives, brothers or sisters, adopting parents or adopted children and their spouses or consensual partners, attorney, medical doctor or priest"." (E. Mackic and M. Husejnovic, 'Justice Report: Targeting Fugitives' Family Finances', BIRN (Balkan Investigative Reporting Network), 19 October 2007, available at: http://www.birn.eu.com/en/108/10/5331.)

[87] See 'Rule 61: The voice of the victims. Rule 61 proceedings: Tribunal not defeated by non-appearance of the accused', ICTY Bulletin, No. 3, 22-II-1996.

[88] See ibid. Note, however, that under Rule 61 (D), the assets of the accused can be frozen provisionally and that that may be seen as a sort of 'sentence', see Furuya 1999, p. 645: "[I]f the accused continues to

The perpetrators' actions, thus, are publicized for eternity in a process very much akin to a Truth Commission."[89] Thieroff and Amley, Jr. also argue that the differences between trials in absentia and Rule 61 proceedings may be less significant in practice than on paper.[90]

Be that as it may, the practice of the rule, which, by the way, was also criticised from a prima facie perhaps unexpected corner, namely from former Chief Prosecutor Arbour,[91] "was discontinued once the Tribunal had defendants in custody and the suggestion that it could only function if it could conduct in absentia hearings no longer made any sense [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[92]

---

refuse to appear before the tribunal, the measures to freeze his assets would substantially assume the role of a penalty."

[89] Quintal 1998, p. 750. See also 'Rule 61: The voice of the victims. Rule 61 proceedings: Tribunal not defeated by non-appearance of the accused', ICTY Bulletin, No. 3, 22-II-1996: "Rule 61 affords a formal means of redress for the victims of the absent accused's alleged crimes by giving them an opportunity to have their testimony recorded for posterity either directly if they are invited to testify or indirectly when the Prosecutor speaks on their behalf. Thus the accused cannot escape from international justice simply by staying away from the Tribunal, and the Tribunal will create an historic record against him." This, Quintal remarks (Quintal 1998, p. 723), "creates a disincentive on the part of the international community to arrest suspected war criminals and bring them to [T]he Hague for trial." In addition, she argues, besides the point that the rule is unnecessary (see ibid., p. 754), "that the proceedings conducted under the auspices of Rule 61 may not comport entirely with the norms of due process required by international law." (Ibid., p. 726.) An example mentioned by her (see ibid., p. 752) is the fact that a record "is created without the defense having any ability to cross-examine the witnesses. This is a violation of a defendant's ability to confront a witness guaranteed in Article 14(3)(e) of the I.C.C.P.R." See ibid., pp. 752-753 for more examples.

[90] See Thieroff and Amley, Jr. 1998, p. 259: "Although formal distinctions between trials in absentia and Rule 61 proceedings may exist, it is possible that reconfirmation hearings function as trials in absentia in all but name." See also Furuya 1999, p. 635: "Officially, this 'Rule 61 procedure' is only a proceeding for reconfirming an indictment, which does not determine an accused's guilt or innocence. In substance, however, it has functioned as a trial-like procedure to some extent." In contrast to Quintal, Thieroff and Amley, Jr. argue (see Thieroff and Amley, Jr. 1998, p. 234) that the instrument, "even if it is characterized as the functional equivalent of a trial in absentia, is consistent with international law." Furuya sides more with Quintal in that respect. See for her criticism towards the rule, Furuya 1999, pp. 662*ff*.

[91] See Arbour 2004, p. 399: "The benefit of this process was obviously to satisfy the appetite of the press for access to the investigative phase of the work of the Tribunal – a phase not typically conducted in public. In turn, the process led to the increased visibility of the Tribunal, and provided a forum to mobilize public opinion in favour of aggressive arrest initiatives and budgetary support. I do not know if recourse to Rule 61 was either necessary or effective for this purpose. On the other hand, I believed that recourse to Rule 61 was detrimental to the work of the Prosecutor, and I was never persuaded that its benefits outweighed its deleterious effects. First and foremost, the Rule 61 hearings exposed publicly large parts of the evidence against the accused before he was apprehended. This exposure increased the danger of witness intimidation, tampering with evidence and fabrication of convenient evidentiary responses. It also monopolized important and scarce resources within OTP, with investigators and prosecutors re-examining the case for hearing preparation rather than moving on to developing new cases. Because the hearings were, by definition, ex parte, it also gave the trial attorneys, in my view, a false sense of security and confidence in the quality of their case. Evidence always looks better when it is unopposed and unchallenged."

[92] Schabas 2006, p. 382.

The last provision which should be mentioned here is the habeas corpus-like provision related to accused persons:[93] Rule 65 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE. This provision clarifies, among other things, that "[o]nce detained, an accused may not be released except upon an order of a Trial Chamber"[94] and that provisional release may – there is hence no obligation – only be ordered by the Trial Chamber if, among other things, "it is satisfied that the accused will appear for trial and, if released, will not pose a danger to any victim, witness or other person".[95] Furthermore, the Trial Chamber can impose conditions, such as "the execution of a bail bond and the observance of such conditions as are necessary to ensure the presence of the accused for trial and the protection of others".[96]

It must be noted that the formulation of this provision – especially an earlier version of it which demanded that the suspect showed "exceptional circumstances" to justify release[97] – has been criticised in that it creates a context in which pre-trial detention is the rule and provisional release the exception, this being in contravention of an article such as Article 9, paragraph 3 of the ICCPR[98] and the presumption of innocence.[99] It is indeed strange that a person had to demonstrate "exceptional circumstances" to justify release. The burden of proof should be with the Prosecution here. One can agree with Sluiter that the criticism and damage done to the authority of the Tribunals caused by this provision could easily have been avoided; a different provision would arguably not have led to a situation in which persons would be released too quickly.[100] After all, it would not be too difficult for the Prosecution to prove – given the seriousness of the crimes with which the person

[93] For this provision related to suspects, see the already-mentioned Rule 40 bis (G) of the ICTY RPE and Rule 40 bis (K) of the ICTR RPE.
[94] Rule 65 (A) of the ICTY RPE. See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 65 (A) of the ICTR RPE.
[95] Rule 65 (B) of the ICTY/ICTR RPE.
[96] Rule 65 (C) of the ICTY RPE. See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 65 (C) of the ICTR RPE.
[97] Within the context of the ICTY, the amendment of the rule, removing the requirement "exceptional circumstances", entered into force on 6 December 1999, see ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Momčilo Krajišnik & Biljana Plavšić, 'Decision on Momčilo Krajišnik's Notice of Motion for Provisional Release', Case No. IT-00-39 & 40-PT, 8 October 2001, n. 21. Within the context of the ICTR, this only took place more than three years later, on 27 May 2003, see O'Dowd 2004, p. 96.
[98] Which reads: "Anyone arrested or detained on a criminal charge shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release. It shall not be the general rule that persons awaiting trial shall be detained in custody, but release may be subject to guarantees to appear for trial, at any other stage of the judicial proceedings, and, should occasion arise, for execution of the judgement [emphasis added, ChP]."
[99] See Zappalà 2003, p. 70, Gordon 2007, pp. 691-692 and Sluiter 2007, p. 14 (and n. 28). Note that even judges of the ICTY had to admit that the removal of the "exceptional circumstances" requirement did not change "the position that provisional release continues to be the exception and not the rule". (ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Momčilo Krajišnik & Biljana Plavšić, 'Decision on Momčilo Krajišnik's Notice of Motion for Provisional Release', Case No. IT-00-39 & 40-PT, 8 October 2001, para. 12.) See also O'Dowd 2004, p. 97. See also ibid., p. 98 (and n. 49), explaining that ICTR judges have also followed this stance.
[100] See Sluiter 2007, pp. 14-15.

is charged[101] and the fact that there is thus a chance that that person may be sentenced to a considerable time in prison – that there is also a chance that that person may flee if released.[102] Alongside this risk of absconding, which will lead to the same problems the police force-lacking Tribunals may have encountered in apprehending the person in the first place,[103] Sluiter also points to social disturbance as a legitimate ground for provisional detention. This approach would indeed be more correct, even if the factual outcome may very well be the same as in the first approach, namely that detention is the rule and release the exception.

These kinds of grounds, which were also identified in the context of the (problems related to the) remedy of release from provisions such as Article 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR and Article 5, paragraph 4 of the ECHR (see Subsection 4.4 of Chapter III), can explain why a Tribunal, once it has a person (finally) in custody, will not be keen then to provisionally release him. However, much will depend on the exact circumstances of the specific case. One must also understand that a person charged with very serious crimes may very well be provisionally released, for example, if it is clear that that person will appear for trial and will not pose a danger to other persons and if other grounds for denying release, such as social disturbance, are lacking. Note finally that supporting such conditional releases arguably does not in any way undermine the construction proposed in the context of the problematic remedy of release from Article 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR and Article 5, paragraph 4 of the ECHR, a remedy which has nothing to do with provisional release; the release stemming from the two above-mentioned human rights provisions is the remedy for an unlawful detention and not for the fact that a judge decides that a person, under certain conditions, can await his trial in freedom rather than in custody.

Having briefly discussed the arrest and transfer provisions of the ICTY/ICTR (RPE), about which Swart concludes that they are "mainly concerned on the duties of States vis-à-vis the Tribunals"[104] and "[t]o a certain extent (...) neglect the rights [101] See also Khan 2008, p. 1164, n. 34: "Various commentators have justified or explained the more restrictive pre-trial release conditions in the ICTY/R Rules of Procedure and Evidence. For example, D. D. Ntanda Nsereko, observes that, "Considering that the rules subscribe to the presumption of innocence, the provisional release restrictions are quite stringent. The only justification for this stringency that comes to mind is the gravity of the offences over which the Tribunal has jurisdiction and the desire to avoid a public outcry over allowing accused persons to be at large" (...). Similarly, K. S. Gallant, has stated that "While such a rule [that pre-trial release is exceptional] would be harsh in a court with jurisdiction over ordinary crimes, it is reasonable given that the only crimes over which the Tribunal has jurisdiction are serious violations of international humanitarian law. The harshness of this rule, however, emphasises the need to ensure that persons are not arrested and detained except on reasonable (or probable) cause". (...)." See also O'Dowd 2004, p. 93.

[102] See also O'Dowd 2004, p. 93.

[103] See the remainder of the quotation from the case of Krajišnik and Plavšić (see n. 99), where the judges write on the "position that provisional release continues to be the exception and not the rule, a position justified by the absence of any power in the International Tribunal to execute its own arrest warrants [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Momčilo Krajišnik & Biljana Plavšić, 'Decision on Momčilo Krajišnik's Notice of Motion for Provisional Release', Case No. IT-00-39 & 40-PT, 8 October 2001, para. 12.) See also O'Dowd 2004, p. 93.

[104] Swart 2002 A, p. 1251.

of the individual persons concerned",[105] three points still need to be addressed before turning to the actual male captus cases.

First, the third and last "innovative way" to obtain the arrest of persons and their transfer to The Hague mentioned by Lopez-Terres is still to be discussed.

This is the creation, in 2001, of a specialised tracking and intelligence unit in the OTP.[106] This team has no powers of arrest;[107] it assembles information on the [105] Ibid. See also Sluiter 2009, p. 467.

[106] See P. Lopez-Terres, Chief of Investigations, ICTY, 'Arrest and transfer of indictees. The experience of the ICTY', 15 December 2006 (available at: http://www.icln.net/htm/Annual%20conference%202006/Presentation_Lopez-Terres.pdf), p. 7. Note that the ICTR also had (in fact, was the first to have, see Simmons 2004) such a tracking team, see, for example, 'Security Council reviews progress made by international tribunals for Rwanda, former Yugoslavia. Speakers Stress Need to Bring High-Profile Offenders To Justice, Gain Cooperation of Governments in Arresting Those Accused', UNSC, 5199th Meeting (AM) (13 June 2005), Press Release SC/8409, available at: http://www.un.org/News/Press/docs/2005/sc8409.doc.htm: "Noting that the tracking and apprehension of the 14 fugitives continued to be a high priority, he [ICTR Prosecutor Jallow, ChP] said the organization and strategies of the Tracking Unit had been the subject of review as a result of which three measures had been taken. The Unit's capacity had been increased with additional staff. It also had now adopted a strategy for ensuring a greater physical presence of its members in the field than at headquarters in Arusha and Kigali. Contact with the political and law enforcement authorities had been initiated with the countries in which the fugitives were suspected to be taking refuge. Each of those countries had agreed to establish joint mechanism with the Prosecutor's Investigation Division tracking team through which they could collaborate in tracking the fugitives. There had also been useful discussions with the United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUC) and the African Union on modalities of collaboration in that respect." See on this topic also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), pp. 34-36.

[107] In that respect, it must be clearly discerned from an international arrest team whose establishment was proposed by the Royal Marechaussee of the Netherlands in 2001, see Leurdijk 2001, p. 69. During the discussions on this proposal, it was stated that "arresting war criminals is not a soldier's job but a police responsibility. The actual arrests (…) should be left to specialised police trained teams of the gendarmerie-type, such as the Marechaussee itself". (Ibid.) Since these kinds of teams are already available, "the real question (…) would be whether it would be politically feasible." (Ibid., p. 70.) Leurdijk, after mentioning potential obstacles with respect to the proposal such as the role of the non-intervention principle, answers this question in the negative: "[W]hile a permanent arresting team might be considered highly desirable, at the same time, it is highly unlikely that here is sufficient political support among the UN member states to establish such an 'A-team'". (Ibid., p. 71.) See also Supernor 2001, p. 231: "The UN Charter envisioned that the UN would possess its own standing military force but this has never occurred. If, after approximately fifty years, the UN has been unable to implement its original intent of possessing a standing military force; it is difficult to envision the creation of a standing international police force [original footnote omitted, ChP]." On 14 March 2007, during the lecture 'The Tribunal's Completion Strategy and the Importance of Cooperation of States for its Work', presented by Olga Kavran, spokesperson for the ICTY's Prosecutor and hosted by the International Criminal Law Network in The Hague, the author of this study asked Olga Kavran whether she knew the current opinion of the international community on this issue. Again, the answer was that an international arrest team will probably not be feasible because of a lack of political will. See for an older account Gallant 1994, p. 583: "The reliance upon national authorities to effect arrest is necessary because it is not yet politically feasible to establish an international police force with arrest powers." See finally Lavrijssen 1998, pp. 27-28, describing the views of Goldstone and Van Boven on this matter: "Dr. Richard Goldstone: 'I do not believe that we are going to have an international police force in the foreseeable future. Countries are just not going to allow a foreign police force to come into their territory and start ground, for example through surveillance,[108] in order to track down the suspects. This intelligence is then provided to governments, organisations or other entities with arrest powers, which must make the actual arrests.[109]

The above-mentioned link with the government implies that the State on which territory the team is assembling information is aware of this team and has consented with its mandate and powers.[110]

However, that does not mean that the authorities will always cooperate with the team, even if they have an obligation to do so.[111] arresting their citizens. As much I would like it to happen, it is just not practical politics. (…)' Professor Theo van Boven: 'It is not realistic to expect that the International Criminal Court will have a police force at its disposal. (…)'[emphasis in original but bold emphasis changed into italicised emphasis, ChP]"

---

[108] See M. Simons, 'Tribunal Detectives Pursue War Criminals in the Balkans', New York Times, 25 July 2004, available at: http://query.nytimes.com/gst/fullpage.html?res=9E01EFD6173DF936A15754C0A9629C8B63&sec=&spon=&pagewanted=all: "The war crimes tribunal for the former Yugoslavia has no assault troops or police commandos at its service. But it does have detectives armed with cameras. For almost two years, the undercover agents and their network of informants have snooped around streets in Serbia and travelled through the mountains in Bosnia. Their business is to find and shadow people suspected of committing war crimes during the Balkan conflict of the early 1990's. (…) "It's classic shadowing work, with the use of sources and informants," said a former investigator familiar with the work of both tribunals."

[109] See P. Lopez-Terres, Chief of Investigations, ICTY, 'Arrest and transfer of indictees. The experience of the ICTY', 15 December 2006 (available at: http://www.icln.net/htm/Annual%20conference%202006/Presentation_Lopez-Terres.pdf), p. 7. See also the presentation of David Tolbert of the ICTY during the 'Second public hearing of the Office of the Prosecutor, Session 2: NGOs and Other Experts', The Hague, 26 September 2006 (available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/Menus/ICC/Structure+of+the+Court/Office+of+the+Prosecutor/Network+with+Partners/Public+Hearings/Second+Public+Hearing/Session+2), commenting on the ICC OTP's Report on Prosecutorial Strategy, The Hague, 14 September 2006 (available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/D673DD8C-D427-4547-BC69-2D363E07274B/143708/ProsecutorialStrategy20060914_English.pdf), providing two examples where the ICTY tracking team was used, namely the Hadžić case (see n. 112) and the Gotovina case: "[T]he key information which resulted in Gotovina's arrest in the Canary Islands could only be properly assessed because the OTP's "tracking team" could evaluate it. (…) [T]he Office needs "eyes and ears" of its own. (…) Because we had gathered our own intelligence/expertise from the field, we were able to test Croatia in the Gotovina case when the authorities c[a]me forward with information. Thus, the Prosecutor had the tools to test the information submitted by the Croatian government. When the crucial information came that Gotovina was possibly in the Canary Islands, we were able to check this information."

[110] See also n. 106 (where Chief Prosecutor Jallow explains the policy at the ICTR). If that is not the case, then one can wonder whether the police work executed by this team is not a violation of a State's sovereignty. (Although the ICTY's OTP has not qualified the work of the unit as police work (See the following summary from the ICTY Weekly Press Briefing, 2 May 2001, available at: http://www.icty.org/sid/3334: "He [Jean Jacques Joris, Advisor to the Prosecutor, ChP] added that the term 'police task force' was given to the general idea previously, now the Prosecutor favoured the expression 'tracking team' because that was what the team would be about. Not police, because they would not be carrying out the arrests, solely locating people. Like a scouting group, he concluded."), it is hard to see why it is not. The fact that the team does not have the (indeed very crucial) power to arrest, does not make all its other powers, which appear to go to the core of police work, meaningless. See also Subsection 2.1 of Chapter III and its examination of the concept of luring.)

The famous Hadžić tip-off story makes this abundantly clear.[112] Notwithstanding this, Lopez-Terres explains that the unit "has played a crucial role in obtaining intelligence and information on the whereabouts of several fugitives, which eventually led to their arrest, both in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in Serbia".[113]

The second point to be made is that it is probably not the above-mentioned techniques, but political pressure from third States and organisations that has led to most arrests and transfers. In the words of the (then) Chief Prosecutor of the ICTY, Carla Del Ponte: "Experience had shown that the political pressure from the European Union and the United States was the most significant factor encouraging the States of the former Yugoslavia to transfer indictees to The Hague."[114] One could hereby think of the carrot-and-stick method with respect to finances[115] and

---

[111] See P. Lopez-Terres, Chief of Investigations, ICTY, 'Arrest and transfer of indictees. The experience of the ICTY', 15 December 2006 (available at: http://www.icln.net/htm/Annual%20conference%202006/Presentation_Lopez-Terres.pdf), p. 7.

[112] See Simons 2004: "Recounting her [Carla Del Ponte's, ChP] story in an interview, she said that earlier this month, when her office was about to deliver a new indictment and arrest warrant to Serbia, she and her agents decided to set a trap. The arrest order was for Goran Hadzic, a leader of rebel Serbs in Krajina, Croatia, who was charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity. A warehouse worker before the war, Mr. Hadzic profited from wartime smuggling, Ms. Del Ponte said, and now lives in a comfortable villa in Novi Sad, a Serbian city on the Danube. "The day before delivering the papers, we put Hadzic's house under surveillance," she said. She offered a detailed account of what came next. On July 13, at 9:30 a.m., her representatives delivered the indictment and arrest warrant for Mr. Hadzic to the Serbian Foreign Ministry in Belgrade. They also provided Mr. Hadzic's address. In keeping with the standard practice, on the same day, at 11:30 a.m., copies were transmitted to the Serbian Embassy at The Hague. At 3:30 p.m., Ms. Del Ponte said, the Serbian Foreign Ministry sent the documents to the Belgrade District Court. They arrived there after working hours. That day, Mr. Hadzic was seen in his garden. He left his home at 12:38 p.m., and returned 45 minutes later. "Around 4 o'clock he gets a call on his cellphone," Ms. Del Ponte said. "It's the call tipping him off. I'd quite like to know who that was." At 4:27 p.m., he was seen leaving his house carrying a bag. He got into a car with a driver and drove off. Two days later, Ms. Del Ponte said, the local police reported to the Belgrade Court that Mr. Hadzic was not at home and that his whereabouts were unknown. On Thursday, after she released the surveillance photographs, the Serbian police said they would open an internal investigation into Mr. Hadzic's escape. It was not the first time, she said, that a suspect had vanished after the Belgrade authorities were asked to make an arrest." For the official press conference on these events, see 'Press Conference by Prosecutor Carla Del Ponte 19 July 2004', The Hague, 19 July 2004, JP/P.I.S./872-e, available at: http://www.icty.org/sid/8389.

[113] P. Lopez-Terres, Chief of Investigations, ICTY, 'Arrest and transfer of indictees. The experience of the ICTY', 15 December 2006 (available at: http://www.icln.net/htm/Annual%20conference%202006/Presentation_Lopez-Terres.pdf), p. 7. See also the ICTY itself on its website available at: http://www.icty.org/sid/97: "The tracking team, which consists of information agents from various countries, has contributed to the arrest of several indictees. Providing national authorities with exact data on the fugitives' location can circumvent the passiveness of many states in searching for them."

[114] 'Presidents, Prosecutors of Rwanda, former Yugoslavia Tribunals Brief Security Council on Progress in Implementing Completion Strategies. Say Aim to Conclude by 2010, but Schedule Will Be Affected By Apprehension of At-Large Indictees, Transfer of Cases to National Courts', UNSC, 5328th Meeting (AM) (15 December 2005), Press Release SC/8586, available at: http://www.un.org/News/Press/docs/2005/sc8586.doc.htm.

[115] As will be further clarified in Subsection 3.1.3, "[f]ormer President Milosevic was surrendered to the ICTY on 28 June 2001 due to a US threat to boycott a key donor's conference." (P. Lopez-Terres, Chief of Investigations, ICTY, 'Arrest and transfer of indictees. The experience of the ICTY', 15 December membership of organisations.[116] One can argue that such actions are not only based on politics but may also have a legal dimension. In the words of the ICTY:

> Article 29 imposes an obligation on Member States towards all other Members or, in other words, an "obligation erga omnes partes". By the same token, Article 29 posits a community interest in its observance. In other words, every Member State of the United Nations has a legal interest in the fulfilment of the obligation laid down in Article 29 (…). Faced with the situation where a judicial finding by the International Tribunal of a breach of Article 29 has been reported to the Security Council, each 2006 (available at: http://www.icln.net/htm/Annual%20conference%202006/Presentation_Lopez-Terres.pdf), p. 10.) See also Gillett 2008, p. 19 (writing on the Milošević transfer as well): "[I]t took the conditioning of US $1.28 billion of desperately needed aid on his surrender to persuade the Serbian National Assembly to hand him over [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Scharf (2000, p. 938), who does not, however, limit himself to the statal context: "[F]inancial inducement can be used as a stick (as with the threat or imposition of trade embargoes and the freezing of assets), or as a carrot (as with the conditional promise of reconstruction aid or the offer of "rewards)." One can agree with Scharf's preference for the more personal method of freezing of assets here (see ibid., p. 946): "Compared to other forms of financial inducement such as imposition of economic sanctions and conditionality of reconstruction aid – which hurt the population at large, as well as the target country's trading partners – freezing the assets of indicted war criminals is a precision tool for promoting justice. It is a tool of great potential value to the ICC, which would be available where its jurisdiction is triggered by the Security Council." See also n. 300 of Chapter VIII, where the ICC's own possibilities with respect to this tool are further explained. As concerns the rewards, one could think here of financial rewards for citizens for information or assistance which will lead, in the end, to the arrest of suspects of international crimes, see the 'US Rewards for Justice Program', available at: http://www.rewardsforjustice.net. See also ibid., p. 950, where Scharf explains that "[o]n June 24, 1999, the United States announced that it was offering a reward of $5 million for such information and assistance related to indicted Yugoslav war criminals [original footnote omitted, ChP]." This last tool could indeed be very practical, at least when it is clear that awards will only be granted for information and assistance in the arrest efforts of the competent authorities and not for actually turning in the suspect in question, which may lead to chaotic wild-west scenarios executed by private bounty hunters, see also n. 281 of this chapter.

[116] See P. Lopez-Terres, Chief of Investigations, ICTY, 'Arrest and transfer of indictees. The experience of the ICTY', 15 December 2006 (available at: http://www.icln.net/htm/Annual%20conference%202006/Presentation_Lopez-Terres.pdf), pp. 10-11: "In 2002, in Copenhagen, the European Union agreed to a strategy defining the conditions for the States of the former Yugoslavia to join the EU. The full co-operation with the ICTY was one of them. In parallel, NATO told Bosnia and Herzegovina and Serbia and Montenegro that could not join the Partnership for Peace program as long as the most wanted indictees would remain at large." An example mentioned by Lopez-Terres (at p. 11) is the Gotovina case: "It was only after the Prosecutor confirmed that Croatia was fully co-operating with the ICTY, on 3 October 2005, that the accession talks [with the EU, ChP] finally began. A few days earlier, Croatia had communicated Gotovina's whereabouts." See also Ciampi 2006, p. 734 and Roper and Barria 2008, p. 461. The latter authors, by the way, differentiate between political (less efficient) and economic (more efficient) pressure, see ibid., pp. 466-467 (where they write about the ICC, in whose context political/economic pressure may, of course, also be of crucial importance): "We regard political pressure by third parties, whether by states or non-state actors, as generally having a limited ability to enhance the bargaining effectiveness of the ICC with regard to the capture of indictees. Instead, military or peacekeeping pressure and especially economic pressure are more successful tools available to third parties to enhance the leverage of the ICC." See finally Rastan 2008, pp. 438-439 and C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), pp. 21-22.

> Member State of the United Nations may act upon the legal interest referred to; consequently it may request the State to terminate its breach of Article 29. In addition to this possible unilateral action, a collective response through other intergovernmental organizations may be envisaged. The fundamental principles of the United Nations Charter and the spirit of the Statute of the International Tribunal aim to limit, as far as possible, the risks of arbitrariness and conflict. They therefore give pride of place to collective or joint action to be taken through an intergovernmental organization. It is appropriate to emphasise that this collective action: (i) may only be taken after a judicial finding has been made by the International Tribunal; and (ii) may take various forms, such as a political or moral condemnation, or a collective request to cease the breach, or economic or diplomatic sanctions. In addition, collective action would be warranted in the case of repeated and blatant breaches of Article 29 by the same State; and provided the Security Council had not decided that it enjoyed exclusive powers on the matter, the situation being part of a general condition of threat to the peace [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[117]

Recourse to these methods can also be explained by the fact that the normal mechanism in the case of non-compliance[118] is not very effective.[119]

In that respect, the fact that the Tribunals are, on paper, backed by the UN Charter and the UNSC, to which, for example, the ICTY's OTP has often turned for assistance, [120] may not necessarily be of any help to these institutions.[121]

---

[117] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Tihomir Blaškić, 'Judgement on the Request of the Republic of Croatia for Review of the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 18 July 1997', IT-95-14, 29 October 1997, paras. 26 and 36.

[118] According to Rule 7 bis of the ICTY (and ICTR) RPE, "[a] judge, a Trial [C]hamber or the Prosecutor may request the President to make a finding of non-compliance with the obligation to cooperate, and if the President makes such a finding, the Security Council must be notified. Upon receipt of the President's report, the Security Council has the discretion with respect to what action, if any, is necessary, to bring the recalcitrant State into compliance with its duties." (P. Lopez-Terres, Chief of Investigations, ICTY, 'Arrest and transfer of indictees. The experience of the ICTY', 15 December 2006 (available at: http://www.icln.net/htm/Annual%20conference%202006/Presentation_Lopez-Terres.pdf), p. 9.)

[119] See ibid.: "Such a mechanism of denunciation before the Security Council, is potentially a useful tool, since if used diligently, is tantamount to a public blame before the representatives of the whole international community in New York, which most of States will want to avoid. However, the Security Council has not always responded effectively to the Tribunal's reports of non-compliance, typically issuing a Resolution or a Presidential Statement in response to the ICTY President's reports of non-compliance. (…) Given the relative inefficiency of such a mechanism the Office of the Prosecutor had to find innovative ways to obtain the cooperation from the recalcitrant states by using a substitute strategy and also by creating incentives for full cooperation with the ICTY, such as conditioning aid programs and admission to international organizations." The fact that the Tribunals (and this, of course, also goes for the ICC) do not have the power to force States to comply with their orders has been qualified as the Achilles heel of these institutions. (See, for example, Van Sliedregt 2001 B, p. 74.) Although this term is indeed most often used in the context of lack of enforcement powers (see, for example, also Sadat 1999, p. 116, Knoops 2002, pp. 1 and 324 and Sloan 2005, p. 492), the term has also been used to describe other features in the systems of international criminal tribunals, see for example Tolbert 2003, p. 975 ("the defense counsel and legal aid systems") and Crane 2006, p. 513 ("the experience of the judges who are appointed to try the cases and hear the various appeals").

[120] See, for example, the following words from Carla Del Ponte. After having talked about the "accused who are beyond the reach of SFOR" (UNSC, Fifty-fourth year, 4063rd meeting, 10 November 1999,

The third and final point which must be made here before turning to the actual male captus cases has to do with the interaction between the law of the Tribunals (of which part has been described in the previous pages) and human rights law. Although the Statute and the RPE mention certain rights,[122] one can wonder whether the Tribunals are also bound to human rights law stemming from, for example, the ICCPR and the ECHR.

Although the provisions of international and regional human rights treaties in principle only create obligations for States and thus not for non-State entities such as an international criminal tribunal,[123] it can be argued (cf. also the discussion in Chapter III on the right to liberty and security) that several of these treaty provisions are evidence of customary international law and as such binding on all subjects of

---

S/PV.4063, p. 3), she stated (ibid., p. 4): "I cannot emphasize enough the importance of the support the Security Council can give the Tribunal. We do not seek it lightly, and I therefore urge the Council to put its full weight behind our efforts when we ask for its assistance and to be creative in finding ways to bring to bear the sort of pressures that will produce results." It must be noted that the word "creative" is linked here to the words "in finding ways to bring to bear the sort of pressures that will produce results." Hence, it is linked with the political pressure which the UNSC can resort to. However, these words can arguably not be seen as a green light for 'creative'/dubious ways to arrest suspects, for example, through abduction. However, Supernor (2001, p. 217) does connect these words of Carla Del Ponte with the abduction of Nikolić (whose case will be discussed in Section 3.1.4).

[121] See in that respect the Report to the Secretary-General of the Commission of Experts to Review the Prosecution of Serious Violations of Human Rights in Timor-Leste (then East Timor) in 1999, 26 May 2005. In this report, which can be found in Annex II of UN Doc. S/2005/458 of 15 July 2005 ('Letter dated 24 June 2005 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council'), one can read (in para. 417): "[T]he experience of the ICTY has shown that a legal foundation in Chapter VII may not necessarily guarantee effective enforcement in practice [emphasis in original, ChP]." Nevertheless, it is also true that "[o]ne cannot say (...) that all actions by the Security Council against Serbia and Montenegro, Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina have had no effect on these States' efforts to cooperate with the ICTY's requests of arrest and surrender of suspects located in their territory." (Ciampi 2006, p. 732.) Ciampi also provides (see ibid., p. 733) an example related to an internationalised criminal tribunal in that respect: "[E]ven the mere possibility that the Security Council requires the surrender of suspects under the threat of sanctions has proved effective: for example, when the Prosecutor for the Sierra Leone Special Court advanced the proposal of a Chapter VII Security Council resolution to compel Nigeria to arrest and transfer wanted fugitive Charles Taylor to the Special Court, Charles Taylor was eventually turned over by the Nigerian government before any Security Council's action was taken against the latter [original footnote omitted, ChP]." A very famous example, not related to the present international(ised) criminal tribunals, where a Chapter VII recourse (eventually) seems to have worked is the Lockerbie case. In UNSC Res. 748 of 31 March 1992, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, decided that Libya had to comply, among other things, with requests for extradition of the two Libyan officials who were suspected of murdering 270 people in the 1988 explosion of Pan Am Flight 103 over the Scottish town of Lockerbie, "failing which a set of enforcement measures would be imposed. Enforcement measures were eventually imposed, remained into force for a decade and were finally lifted following not only the surrender of the two suspects to the Netherlands for trial before a Scottish tribunal, but also acceptance of responsibility by [the] government of Libya for the actions of its officials, payment of appropriate compensation to the victims and an express renunciation of terrorism [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ciampi 2006, p. 732.)

[122] See, for example, the already discussed Art. 21 of the ICTY Statute/Art. 20 of the ICTR Statute ('Rights of the accused') and Rule 42 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE ('Rights of Suspects during Investigation').

[123] See also Zappalà 2002 B, p. 1327.

international law, including an international criminal tribunal.[124] Moreover, if a tribunal were not bound by such provisions, obligations imposed on States could then easily be circumvented by creating tribunals which could then take over State functions.[125] Finally, it could also be asserted that it is not very logical to maintain that these sub-organs of the UNSC, which are often seen as model institutions with respect to fair proceedings,[126] could operate without respecting such (procedural) rights. If that were to happen, then it could have "negative consequences that transcend the limited framework of the Tribunals".[127]

Notwithstanding this, the first impression one may have obtained from the overview of the arrest and transfer provisions discussed above is that the Tribunals are particularly focused on efficiency and not so much on the rights of the suspect.[128] However, in 1993, the UNSG, commenting on the rights of the accused in the context of the ICTY, stated that

> [i]t is axiomatic that the International Tribunal must fully respect internationally recognized standards regarding the rights of the accused at all stages of its proceedings.[[129]] In the view of the Secretary-General, such internationally recognized standards are, in particular, contained in article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.[130]

Nevertheless, in the Tribunal's very first case, the Tadić case, the judges, while taking into account this paragraph of the UNSG's report,[131] clarified:

> The fact that the International Tribunal must interpret its provisions within its own legal context and not rely in its application on interpretations made by other judicial bodies is evident in the different circumstances in which the provisions apply. The interpretations of Article 6 of the ECHR by the European Court of Human Rights are meant to apply to ordinary criminal and, for Article 6 (1), civil adjudications. By contrast, the International Tribunal is adjudicating crimes which are considered so

[124] See also ibid., pp. 1327-1328. See also Sluiter 2003 B, p. 937: "[H]uman rights law binds the Tribunals in their activities to the extent that it is part of customary international law or constitutes general principles of law."
[125] See Zappalà 2002 B, p. 1328. See also Sluiter 2002 B, p. 702.
[126] Cf. also Art. 1 ('purposes') of the UN Charter: "promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all" and Zappalà 2002 B, p. 1328.
[127] Swart 2001, p. 201. This is because "both ad hoc Tribunals inevitably provide role models for national systems of criminal justice." (Ibid.) See also Schomburg 2005, p. 95: "[A]ll international criminal tribunals fulfill an important model role for national courts".
[128] See the already-mentioned remarks of Swart at ns. 24 and 104-105 and accompanying text.
[129] The words "at all stages of its proceedings" show that the Tribunal should ensure that the suspect receives not only a fair trial in court (a fair hearing) but also a fair trial more generally, which includes the pre-trial process. (Cf. in that respect also the already-mentioned Rule 42 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE: "rights of suspects during investigation".)
[130] Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), UN Doc. S/25704, 3 May 1993, para. 106.
[131] ICTY, Trial Chamber I, Prosecutor v. Duško Tadić a/k/a "Dule", 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion Requesting Protective Measures for Victims and Witnesses', Case No. IT-94-1-T, 10 August 1995, para. 25.

> horrific as to warrant universal jurisdiction. The International Tribunal is, in certain respects, comparable to a military tribunal, which often has limited rights of due process and more lenient rules of evidence. (…) [T]he Trial Chamber agrees with the Prosecutor that the International Tribunal must interpret its provisions within its own context and determine where the balance lies between the accused's right to a fair trial and the protection of victims and witnesses within its unique legal framework. While the jurisprudence of other international judicial bodies is relevant when examining the meaning of concepts such as "fair trial", whether or not the proper balance is met depends on the context of the legal system in which the concepts are being applied.[132]

These words can clearly be criticised. Recalling the reasoning made in the discussion of the Levinge case (see footnote 159 and accompanying text of Chapter V): as concerns the fairness of the trial in the strict sense of the word (which was the case here – the issue involved the use of anonymous witnesses), there can arguably be no balance between the suspect's fair trial right and anything else. It is submitted that a fair trial in the strict sense of the word is the minimum requirement for any trial. If anything less is offered, under the guise of the court's 'uniqueness', the trial should be stayed to immediately repair the problem. However, if it becomes clear that the suspect can no longer receive a fair trial, the judges should refuse jurisdiction to try the case.

Luckily, however, "[s]ubsequent decisions (...) have displayed a greater ease with sources of law outside the Statute and RPE and have increasingly applied treaty based human rights law [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[133]

---

[132] Ibid., paras. 28 and 30. For criticism, see, for example, Stapleton 1999, pp. 555*ff*.

[133] Sluiter 2003 B, p. 938. See also Zappalà 2002 B, p. 1328 and the two still-to-discuss Barayagwiza (see Subsection 3.2.1) and Nikolić (see para. 110 of the Trial Chamber's decision of 9 October 2002, see Subsection 3.1.4) cases. In the first case, for example, the judges held: "The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights is part of general international law and is applied on that basis. Regional human rights treaties, such as the European Convention on Human Rights and the American Convention on Human Rights, and the jurisprudence developed thereunder, are persuasive authority which may be of assistance in applying and interpreting the Tribunal's applicable law. Thus, they are not binding of their own accord on the Tribunal. They are, however, authoritative as evidence of international custom." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 40.) Swart (2001, p. 201) welcomes this development: "Persons suspected or accused of international crimes should be no less entitled to respect for their basic individual rights than any other suspects or accused." Of course, one cannot but agree with this statement. Prosecutors and judges must respect basic human rights, such as the right to liberty and security, in every case, whether that case involves a suspect of fraud or a suspect of genocide. In addition, it is also crucial that every pre-trial wrong is repaired by a remedy. However, as will be explained in the context of the Dokmanović and Nikolić cases, these commendable thoughts do not delete the problems caused by the remedy of release, see Subsection 4.4 of Chapter III. To solve these problems, it was, and again will be, suggested that, in the case of the establishment of an unlawful arrest/detention, one should take into account all the relevant aspects of the case in determining the most appropriate remedy, which may include the fact that the suspect in question is charged with very serious crimes and that prosecuting that person is of paramount importance to the international community as a whole (cf. the abuse of process doctrine).

An example of this can be provided with respect to the right to liberty and security/the right not to be subjected to arbitrary arrest and detention, which is so important for this study.

This right is not mentioned in Article 21 of the ICTY Statute/Article 20 of the ICTR Statute ('Rights of the accused') and Rule 42 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE ('Rights of Suspects during Investigation'),[134] which have already been alluded to but, with inspiration from (or by applying directly) treaties like the ICCPR and the ECHR,[135] judges have tried to fill that gap through case law.[136] For example, in the still-to-discuss (see Subsection 3.2.1) Barayagwiza case, the ICTR judges saw "no reason to conclude that the protections afforded to suspects under Article 9 of the ICCPR do not also apply to suspects brought before the Tribunal".[137] Zappalà also notes that

> [a]n element that may seem surprising in the texts governing the activities of the ad hoc Tribunals is the absence of any express provision granting the right to challenge the legality of the arrest. This is, however, an element that should absolutely not be overestimated. As stated several times by the Chambers of the Tribunals, such a right

[134] See also Sluiter 2001, p. 152. Note, however, that Rule 40 bis (G) of the ICTY RPE seems to point to a certain habeas corpus possibility: "During detention, the Prosecutor and the suspect or the suspect's counsel may submit to the Trial Chamber of which the Judge who made the order is a member, all applications relative to the propriety of provisional detention or to the suspect's release." See for a comparable provision in the ICTR context Rule 40 bis (K) of the ICTR RPE. See also the review and release possibility from the moment of the suspect's transfer in Rule 40 (C) and (D) of the ICTR RPE.

[135] See ibid., p. 155: "One may explain the prominent place of the ECHR and the jurisprudence of the European Court as recognition of the importance and authority of this instrument and this international judicial body. Furthermore, a great number of rights are identical under both the ECHR and the ICCPR, and the ECHR, was used as a source in the development of the ICCPR."

[136] Sluiter (ibid., p. 152) notes that, because of the fact that the ICTY Statute and RPE "do not incorporate the right of persons not to be subjected to arbitrary arrest and detention", it is "of vital importance that the Tribunal applies these provisions [namely Artt. 9 of the ICCPR and 5 of the ECHR, ChP] to their full extent, including relevant case law pertaining to these provisions." Hence, that should also include the remedies mentioned therein. Cf. in that respect also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Zejnil Delalić, Zdravko Mucić also known as "Pavo", Hazim Delić and Esad Landžo, 'Decision on Application for Leave to Appeal (Provisional Release) by Hazim Delić', Case No. IT-96-21-AR72.4, 22 November 1996, para. 16: "The right to liberty is without question a fundamental human right. The Applicant has cited a number of international human rights instruments in this connection, but the proposition is axiomatic. The right also entails the right to an effective remedy for deprivation or violation of that right." See also ibid., para. 17, where it is clarified that this means that the Chamber must review the lawfulness of a person's deprivation of liberty. Although it is not clearly stated as such, this must arguably also include a release if the deprivation of liberty is deemed unlawful. However, that was not the case here: "The mistake which the Applicant makes, however, is to consider that the Trial Chamber, by denying the motion for provisional release, has violated the Applicant's right to liberty and that the Applicant is therefore entitled to an effective judicial remedy for that violation. The correct analysis is that the Trial Chamber is the effective judicial remedy for any alleged violation of the right to liberty. By applying to the Trial Chamber, the Applicant exercises his right to challenge the lawfulness of his detention and deprivation of liberty. The word "effective" does not mean that the Application has to succeed; this would be a nonsense. It is enough that the competent judicial authority reviews the position in accordance with the appropriate norms and human rights standards, which the Trial Chamber has done quite properly [emphasis in original, ChP]."

[137] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 79, n. 205.

is implicit in the system of the Tribunals for its fundamental importance and it directly derives from international norms protecting the rights of the individuals in criminal proceedings, which are binding on the Tribunals [original footnote omitted, ChP].[138]

[138] Zappalà 2002 A, p. 1195. (See also Zappalà 2003, p. 75: "In the ad hoc Tribunals systems there are no specific provisions for habeas corpus motions or for compensation for unlawful arrest or detention. However, the practice of Chambers has shown that the judges are willing to admit such motions, irrespective of the lack of express provisions, in accordance with international human rights law. Furthermore, as regards the right of compensation the Appeals Chamber of the Tribunal held that where the rights of the accused were violated he or she had to receive compensation [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also Knoops 2003, p. 221.) Zappalà hereby refers, besides the Dokmanović, Barayagwiza and Todorović cases which will be addressed in more detail in the next section of this chapter, to the Djukić and Krsmanović case (IT-96-19-Misc1). This last case will not be further examined in this book (see also n. 3 of Chapter IV) for the Chamber quickly disposed of the matter: it "declined to pronounce upon the legality of the arrest by national authorities on the view that it could not review the acts of national authorities in this respect". (Ibid.) (For the decision itself, see ICTY, Trial Chamber I, Motion on Behalf of General Djorde Djukić, 'Decision', Case No. IT-96-19-Misc. 1, 28 February 1996.) Cf. also Radosavljevic 2008, p. 276: "[T]he ICTR has consistently held that it lacked jurisdiction to review the legal circumstances attending the arrest of a suspect in so far as the arrest had been made pursuant to the laws of the arresting state [original footnote omitted, ChP]. Radosavljevic refers here to the cases of Karemera, Ngirumpatse and Kajelijeli (ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus Edouard Karemera, 'Decision on the Defence Motion for the Release of the Accused', Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, 10 December 1999; ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Matthieu Ngirumpatse, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Challenging the Lawfulness of the Arrest and Detention and Seeking Return or Inspection of Seized Items', Case No. ICTR-97-44-I, 10 December 1999; ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus J[u]v[é]nal Kajelijeli, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Arbitrary Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused and on the Defence Notice of Urgent Motion to Expand and Supplement the Record of 8 December 1999 Hearing', Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, 8 May 2000), three cases which were also referred to in the case ICTR, Trial Chamber I, The Prosecutor v. Siméon Nshamihigo, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Seeking Release of the Accused Person and/or Any Other Remedy on the Basis of Abuse of Process by the Prosecutor', Case No. ICTR-2001-63-DP, 8 May 2002, n. 2. See finally also ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Joseph Nzirorera, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Challenging the Legality of the Arrest and Detention of the Accused and Requesting the Return of Personal Items Seized', Case No. ICTR-98-44-T, 7 September 2000, para. 27 (where the Chamber recalled its decisions in Karemera, para. 4.3.1, Ngirumpatse, para. 56 and Kajelijeli, paras. 34 and 35, "where it held that the Chamber lacks jurisdiction to review the legal circumstances attending the arrest of a suspect, under Rule 40 of the Rules, in so far as the arrest has been made pursuant to the laws of the arresting state") and ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Pauline Nyiramasuhuko, 'Decision on the Defence Motion for Exclusion of Evidence and Restitution of Property Seized', Case No. ICTR-97-21-T, 12 October 2000, para. 28: "[W]e recall the Ngirumpatse Decision, (...) holding that the Tribunal is not competent to determine the legality of operations executed by sovereign national authorities within the context of existing national legislation." As will be argued in the remainder of this chapter, this is arguably a too restrictive stance (a stance which does arguably not find support in cases such as Dokmanović, Barayagwiza, Semanza (Appeals Chamber), Kajelijeli (Appeals Chamber) and Rwamakuba, cases which will all be examined in this chapter). If arrests and detentions are made by national authorities (or international forces) at the request of the Tribunal, these arrests and detentions are part of the Tribunal's legal proceedings, even if they are executed by others. It is submitted that if wrongs/violations have occurred in these (inter)national arrest and detention proceedings, the Tribunal should be able to repair them by granting remedies. Thus, it should also be able to review the legal circumstances attending the arrest and detention of suspects made at the national level if it wants to find out whether or not wrongs have in fact been committed in these proceedings.

Now that the reader has been introduced to some of the characteristics of the arrest and transfer regime of the ICTY and ICTR, it is time to look at the male captus cases decided in this context. As will become clear in the next section, not every case will receive the same degree of attention as some cases are legally speaking simply more interesting than others.

3 CASES IN THE CONTEXT OF THE ICTY AND ICTR

3.1 Cases in the context of the ICTY

3.1.1 Dokmanović

The 1997 Dokmanović case[139] was "the first case before either of the ad hoc Tribunals in which the legality of arrest was the object of litigation".[140]

It is an excellent example of luring and resembles, to a certain extent, the already analysed Stocké case, see Subsection 2.2.4 of Chapter III (and Subsection 2.2 of Chapter V).

On 3 April 1996, Judge Fouad Riad of the ICTY ordered that Dokmanović's name be secretly[141] added to an indictment against three other accused, namely Mile Mrkšić, Miroslav Radić and Veselin Šlijvančanin, "for their alleged involvement in the November 1991 beatings and killings of non-Serb men at the Ovčara farm in Vukovar".[142] Dokmanović was the President of the Municipal Assembly in Vukovar, the capital of Eastern Slavonia – a region in eastern Croatia – where UNTAES had its headquarters.[143]

The same day, Judge Riad also signed a 'Warrant of Arrest Order for Surrender', directing UNTAES to search for, arrest, and surrender Dokmanović to the ICTY.[144]

Three months later,[145] the necessary documents were forwarded to UNTAES,[146] but in the meantime, Dokmanović had already moved east, to Sombor in the FRY, a territory beyond the jurisdiction of UNTAES.[147]

---

[139] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997.

[140] Sluiter 2001, p. 151.

[141] Dokmanović's indictment was sealed (see also Section 2 of this chapter) because Judge Riad was convinced that non-disclosure was necessary for the investigation, see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 2.

[142] Ibid.

[143] See ibid., para. 7.

[144] See ibid., para. 3. As already explained (see n. 66), in contrast to IFOR/SFOR, UNTAES (and the same goes for KFOR) has an explicit obligation to cooperate with/arrest suspects for the ICTY.

[145] The reason for this delay is explained in ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, n. 1. See also ibid., para. 55.

[146] See ibid. para. 3.

When in December 1996, the ICTY OTP's Belgrade office was contacted by Dokmanović, who expressed "his desire to give evidence of alleged atrocities committed by Croats against Serbs in the area of Vukovar",[148] the OTP saw its chance; a month later, OTP investigator Kevin Curtis contacted Dokmanović, "suggesting a possible meeting between himself and Mr. Dokmanović in Vukovar".[149]

However, Dokmanović refused, stating he could not come to Vukovar for personal reasons.[150] When Curtis consequently proposed a number of other locations, Dokmanović made clear "that he was not prepared to meet with the OTP anywhere in UNTAES territory [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[151] Although Dokmanović was (most likely) not aware of the sealed indictment against him, he "was among those included on a list of persons not granted amnesty and/or indicted as war criminals by Croatia".[152] That could, obviously, explain his wariness in coming to UNTAES territory. Dokmanović suggested in turn that Curtis could come to Sombor but the latter "stated that he could not make such a trip because of the civil unrest at that time in Belgrade".[153]

Nevertheless, and apparently in an effort to win Dokmanović's trust, OTP investigators contacted him at his home in Sombor in June 1997 and requested a new meeting with him later that month to discuss the above-mentioned statement he wished to give about the atrocities committed against Serbs in Vukovar.[154] At this meeting, on 24 June 1997, a new opportunity presented itself to lure Dokmanović from the FRY to UNTAES territory when Dokmanović "inquired of the OTP investigator, Mr. Curtis, about the possibility of compensation for his property in Croatia".[155] Curtis informed him that for these kinds of matters, he had to contact the Transitional Administrator General Jacques Klein (the head of UNTAES).[156] When Dokmanović stated that he was indeed interested in contacting Klein, Curtis seized the opportunity and informed Dokmanović that he would contact the office of the Transitional Administrator to see if he could arrange such a meeting.[157] Obviously, UNTAES agreed to cooperate. Curtis, and the interpreter who was also present at the meeting of 24 June, came back the next day and told Dokmanović that a meeting was indeed possible and that he had to contact Klein's executive assistant, Mr Hryshchyshyn, at 10:15.[158] Dokmanović consequently made the call and a

[147] See ibid., para. 7.
[148] Ibid., para. 8.
[149] Ibid. Of course, the whole idea was not to have this meeting, but to have Dokmanović arrested by UNTAES so that he could be transferred to the ICTY.
[150] See ibid.
[151] Ibid.
[152] Ibid., n. 6.
[153] Ibid., para. 8.
[154] See ibid., para. 9.
[155] Ibid., para. 9.
[156] See ibid.
[157] See ibid.
[158] See ibid., para. 10.

meeting was scheduled in Vukovar at 15:30 the next day (27 June).[159] Hryshchyshyn informed Dokmanović "that he would send an UNTAES vehicle to collect Mr. Dokmanović from the bridge over the Danube River, which divides Croatia and Serbia and where the UNTAES checkpoint is located".[160]

The account of the next day's events is so precise that it is better to provide the exact words from the decision rather than to try to paraphrase them.

> On the afternoon of 27 June 1997, Mr. Dokmanović and his companion, Milan Knežević, arrived at the border post on the FRY side of the Danube River bridge. After making their way on to the bridge, and having passed the FRY border post, Mr. Dokmanović and Mr. Knežević entered an UNTAES vehicle[[161]] shortly before 15:00 hours, believing that they were being taken to their meeting with General Klein. The vehicle carrying the accused and his companion, along with two escort vehicles, proceeded to cross the bridge towards the Erdut base in the UNTAES administered area of Croatia. Upon arrival in Erdut, UNTAES soldiers removed Mr. Dokmanović and Mr. Knežević from their vehicle at gunpoint and searched them. Mr. Dokmanović was handcuffed, advised by the OTP (through an interpreter) of his rights, and informed of the nature of the charges against him. His jacket and handbag[[162]] were seized, and he had a hood placed over his head before being driven to the Čepin airfield. Upon arrival at the airfield, he was examined by a medical officer and then taken on board an UNTAES aeroplane. Around 16:00 hours, the plane departed the Čepin airfield in Croatia bound for The Hague, The Netherlands, in order to transport Mr. Dokmanović to detention and trial by the International Tribunal. Minutes after lift-off, Mr. Dokmanović was provided with a copy of the Indictment, the arrest warrant, and a statement of his rights, these documents all being in Serbo-Croatian [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[163]

In The Hague, Dokmanović complained that his arrest was illegal, arguing that it violated the ICTY Statute and RPE, the sovereignty of the FRY and international law.[164]

Six arguments seemed to have been brought forward by the Defence in that respect:[165] first, the correct procedure for arrest (see Rule 55 of the ICTY RPE) was

---

[159] See ibid.
[160] Ibid., para. 10.
[161] A footnote in the decision (see ibid., n. 7) explains here that "[i]t is disputed as to exactly where Mr. Dokmanović and Mr. Knežević entered the UNTAES vehicle. It is clear that it was somewhere in between the FRY checkpoint in Serbia and the UNTAES checkpoint in Croatia. However, it is unclear as to whether it was (…) in FRY or Croatian territory. Nevertheless, as discussed below in the Findings, this factual point is irrelevant because Mr. Dokmanović was not detained against his will until he arrived at the UNTAES Erdut base in Croatia [emphasis in original, ChP]." This point will be returned to infra in the discussion of the legal merits of this case.
[162] In which, among other things, a loaded .357 Magnum Zastafa hand pistol was found later, see ibid., para. 12.
[163] Ibid., para. 11. Note that in Erdut, Mr Knežević "was led away to a building where he was temporarily detained and later released." See ibid., n. 8.
[164] See ibid., para. 13.
[165] See ibid.

not followed.[166] Besides the fact that, according to the Defence, the contents of his indictment were refused to be told to him, Dokmanović argued > that Sub-rule 55(B) of the Rules was violated "because FRY could extradite any persons who are not citizen[s] of the [FRY] since there is no Constitutional and other legal restrictions for that and Mr. Slavko Dokmanović is not a citizen of [the] Federal Republic of Yugoslavia" [original footnote omitted, ChP].[167]

This last point also played a role in Dokmanović's second argument, namely that the ICTY had not requested the FRY to extradite Dokmanović pursuant to Article 29 of the ICTY Statute.[168] "Thus, the Defence contends that both Rule 55 of the Rules [which at that time did not yet contain the sub-element (G), which states that an arrest warrant can also be executed by "an appropriate authority or international body", see Section 2 of this chapter, ChP] and Article 29 of the Statute [which only mentions the obligations of States, ChP] gave the FRY the sole authority for bringing the accused before the Tribunal."[169] Thirdly, the Defence argued "that Mr. Dokmanović was arrested in a "tricky way," which can only be interpreted as a "kidnapping" [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[170] Fourthly, he had been guaranteed a safe conduct to Croatia and back again to his home in the FRY.[171] Dokmanović's fifth argument was that his arrest "violated the sovereignty of the FRY and international law because he was arrested in the territory of the FRY without the knowledge or approval of the competent State authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[172] Finally, he referred to the male captus male detentus decision of the US Court of Appeals in the Alvarez-Machain case (see footnote 191 and accompanying text of Chapter V), asserting that the ICTY did not have jurisdiction to try his case.[173]

The Prosecution, of course, did not agree with any of these arguments; the execution of the arrest was procedurally correct,[174] it could in no way be viewed as a

[166] See ibid., para. 14.
[167] Ibid.
[168] See ibid., para. 15.
[169] Ibid.
[170] Ibid., para. 16.
[171] See ibid., para. 17.
[172] Ibid., para. 18.
[173] See ibid., para. 19.
[174] See ibid., para. 21. Among other things, it hereby contended that UNTAES was authorised, pursuant to Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE (whose sub-element (A) (see also Section 2 of this chapter) by that time stated that "[n]otwithstanding Rules 55 to 59, on the order of a Judge, the Registrar shall transmit to an appropriate authority or international body or the Prosecutor a copy of a warrant for the arrest of an accused, on such terms as the Judge may determine, together with an order for his prompt transfer to the Tribunal in the event that he be taken into custody by that authority or international body or the Prosecutor.") to make the arrest. In fact, "UNTAES would have been in contravention of a court order had they failed to take the accused into custody". (Ibid.)

"kidnapping",[175] Dokmanović was never given explicit guarantees that he would not be arrested[176] and there was no violation of the sovereignty of the FRY.[177] Finally, the Prosecution relied on the male captus bene detentus reasoning: it noted that the decision of the US Court of Appeals in the Alvarez-Machain case, to which the Defence referred, had been reversed by the Supreme Court (see footnote 204 and accompanying text of Chapter V) and that on the basis of that decision and other decisions (such as the Eichmann case) "the way an accused is brought to the International Tribunal does not affect its jurisdiction".[178]

The Trial Chamber, overwhelmed by all the different arguments, decided to streamline the proceedings a little by dividing the issues into five headings, namely A ('The Arrest of the Accused'), B ('Authority for the arrest of the accused'), C ('Non-disclosure of the indictment and issuance of the warrant of arrest'), D ('The method of arrest') and E ('Safe conduct').[179] These headings will also be followed here in the discussion of the case.

With respect to the arrest of Dokmanović (issue A), the Trial Chamber concluded that Dokmanović had been arrested and detained only after he had arrived at the UNTAES base in Erdut, Croatia.[180] The Trial Chamber, relying on (inter)national definitions of arrest,[181] explained:

> Mr. Dokmanović did not have his freedom of movement restricted or liberty deprived until he arrived at Erdut. The record clearly shows that Mr. Dokmanović entered the UNTAES vehicle that carried him to the Erdut base in Croatia of his own free will.[[182]] The accused, in fact, was quite eager to get into the vehicle, due to his belief

[175] Ibid., para. 22. This was because, according to the OTP, "there was an Indictment against Mr. Dokmanović, a valid warrant for his arrest, and (...) he went to Erdut, where he was arrested, of his own free will [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)

[176] See ibid., para. 23. The OTP noted "that Mr. Dokmanović only sought safe conduct in relation to the Croatian authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)

[177] See ibid., para. 24. This was because "(1) there was no prohibition in force which disallowed vehicles on the Serbian side of the border; (2) Mr. Dokmanović entered the vehicle of his volition; (3) Mr. Dokmanović's arrest cannot be said to have been effected until after the UNTAES vehicle in which he was riding crossed into Croatian territory; and (4) Mr. Dokmanović does not have standing to raise the issue [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)

[178] Ibid., para. 25.

[179] See ibid., para. 26.

[180] See ibid., para. 27. Lamb (2000, p. 174) notes: "This was despite the fact that Dokmanović had probably lost his liberty the moment he entered the UNTAES vehicle, for if he had attempted to leave the UNTAES vehicle before it had reached the military compound, he would have almost certainly been restrained."

[181] One example comes from Australia where "to effect an arrest, a law enforcement officer must simply make clear to a person by what is said or done that that person is no longer a free individual [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 29.)

[182] Although it was argued earlier (see Subsection 2.2.4 of Chapter III) that most luring cases can indeed probably not be seen as operations against the will of the person, not everybody agrees with that point of view, see, for example, Scharf 1998, p. 374: "[A] decision based on misrepresentation cannot truly be characterized as a choice made by free will [original footnote omitted, ChP]." If the luring operation had been against the will of Dokmanović, this would probably have effected his right to liberty and security > that he was heading to a meeting with the Transitional Administrator, General Klein, to discuss his property rights in Croatian territory.[183]

With respect to the authority for the arrest of Dokmanović (issue B), the Trial Chamber concurred with the Prosecution that "the mechanism prescribed in Rule 59 bis provides an alternative procedure to that contemplated by Article 29 and Rule 55, and that the circumstances of the present case merited the utilisation of this alternative".[184] It hereby remarked, among other things, that UNTAES is authorised, in fact obliged to cooperate with the ICTY – which includes the making of arrests[185] – and that > the FRY has failed or refused to execute the warrants which remain outstanding for the arrest of the three co-accused in the indictment against Mr. Dokmanović. Considering this failure, the utilisation of the procedure for arrest contemplated by Rule 55 would very well have been an exercise in futility. In addition, when the warrant for the arrest of Mr. Dokmanović was issued, it was reasonably believed that he was residing in the area of Eastern Slavonia [original footnote omitted, ChP].[186]

Finally, the Trial Chamber concluded that during this operation, the rights of Dokmanović were fully respected and hence that Rule 5 of the ICTY RPE, which by

---

(see again Subsection 2.2.4 of Chapter III, where the ECmHR explained that (colluding for the purpose of) returning against his will a person living abroad, without consent of his State of residence, to the territory of a High Contracting Party where the latter State can prosecute that person, can lead to an unlawful arrest/detention within the meaning of Art. 5 of the ECHR). However, that does not do away with the fact that a luring operation where the suspect joins the luring agent on his free will can, under certain circumstances, still be seen as a violation of State sovereignty and the suspect's human rights, see the remainder of this decision.

[183] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 30. The Trial Chamber, providing a few notes from the cross-examination, also noted that Dokmanović was shocked when he was arrested at the base, providing evidence "that UNTAES officials had not created the type of environment in which "a person knows he is not free," until the accused got out of the vehicle at the Erdut base." (Ibid., para. 31.) The fact that Mr Dokmanović testified that the door was locked while he was in the vehicle did not change the Trial Chamber's stance: "[H]e did not attempt to open it. He did not express any desire whatsoever for the vehicle to stop or to be let out. Furthermore, he was not handcuffed or forcibly restrained in any way until he arrived at Erdut. Given the uncertainty as to what would have transpired had the accused attempted to leave the vehicle, and the facts stated above, this Trial Chamber finds that the accused was arrested and detained only once he arrived at the UNTAES Erdut base in Croatia." (Ibid., para. 32.)

[184] Ibid., para. 34.

[185] See ibid., para. 46. The Trial Chamber stressed that the accused was arrested by the military forces of UNTAES but that it was an OTP investigator, Vladimir Dzuro, who, through an interpreter, advised him of his rights and informed him of the nature of the charges against him, see ibid., para. 51 and n. 62. (The exact stance of the Prosecution on this point was not very clear, see ibid., para. 50: "The Prosecution argued orally at the 8 September hearing that the arrest was carried out by military personnel from UNTAES and by representatives of the Office of the Prosecutor, citing Rule 59 bis in support. Mr. Hryshchyshyn, however, stated during his testimony that, in his view, the accused was arrested by the Prosecution investigators, with the assistance of UNTAES in his detention [original footnotes omitted, ChP].")

[186] Ibid., para. 42.

then stated that an act can be declared null if it is "inconsistent with the fundamental principles of fairness and has occasioned a miscarriage of justice",[187] could not be relied upon.[188]

In the context of the third issue, the non-disclosure of the indictment and issuance of the warrant of arrest, the Trial Chamber clarified that "the Defence seemingly claims that, because the Indictment was under seal, the FRY was denied the opportunity to serve it upon the accused and thus, somehow, its sovereign rights were violated".[189] In its rejection of this point, the Chamber explained that the idea that the FRY was somehow exempted because of the non-disclosure was without any basis as the rule is clear and absolute in its terms.[190] Another reason advanced by the Chamber as to why the indictment did not have to be transmitted to the FRY was the fact that on 3 April 1996 (when Judge Riad ordered that Dokmanović's name be secretly added to the indictment), Dokmanović was not a resident of the FRY.[191] In addition, and repeating a point the Chamber already made in the context of the second issue, > given the history of non-cooperation with the Tribunal of the FRY it is reasonable to conclude that if the arrest of the accused was to be achieved, it was necessary that the [187] The entire Rule 5 read by then: "Any objection by a party to an act of another party on the ground of non-compliance with the Rules or Regulations shall be raised at the earliest opportunity; it shall be upheld, and the act declared null, only if the act was inconsistent with the fundamental principles of fairness and has occasioned a miscarriage of justice."

[188] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 52.

[189] Ibid., para. 53. It added that the Defence is seemingly "not contending that the fact that Mr. Dokmanović was unaware of the existence of the Indictment against him or the warrant for his arrest constitutes a violation of his rights [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.) The Chamber refers here to the fact that the Prosecution has "argued that the use of confidential indictments is standard practice in many national jurisdictions and such practice cannot be regarded as constituting a violation of the fundamental rights of the accused person. The latter point is based on Articles 9(2) and 14(3)(a) of the International Covenant o[n] Civil and Political Rights, as reflected in Rules 55 to 59 of the Rules of the Tribunal, which state that an accused person must be informed of the charges against him upon his arrest." (Ibid., n. 68.) However, for (human rights law) criticism related to sealed indictments, see Sluiter 2001, pp. 154-155: "At the moment of the confirmation of an indictment, either publicly or secretly, a person is formally accused. As an accused, he is, according to Article 21, paragraph 4, (a) of the Statute, entitled to be informed promptly and in detail of the nature and cause of the charge against him. The language of this provision and provisions in human rights instruments do not suggest that the accused is only entitled to be informed of the charges at the moment of his arrest, as has been suggested by the Prosecutor. There were two other reasons why the practice of sealed indictments could further be looked upon in a critical way. First of all, the accused is denied the opportunity to surrender voluntarily to the Tribunal. (…) Secondly, since the accused is denied the opportunity to surrender to the Tribunal, he is also denied the opportunity to prepare his defence. (…) However, this [latter] situation may be remedied by granting him sufficient time before the commencement of the trial to prepare his case [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[190] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 54.

[191] See ibid. This seems indeed reasonable, see Sluiter 2001, p. 154.

> order for non-disclosure remain in effect, even after October 1996, when his employment in Eastern Slavonia ceased and he resided in Sombor in the FRY [original footnote omitted, ChP].[192]

The most interesting issue for the purpose of this book is clearly issue D ('The method of arrest'). The Chamber promptly distinguished[193] between a luring operation and a kidnapping and explained that

> [w]hile the Prosecution freely concedes that it "used trickery, it was a ruse" and that "[i]t was the intention of the Prosecutor from day one to arrest Mr. Dokmanović," the Trial Chamber does not believe that this amounts to a forcible abduction or kidnapping [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP].[194]

It based its belief on the already-mentioned factors that Dokmanović had entered the UNTAES vehicle of his own free will and that he was in fact eager to get into the car because it would bring him to General Klein with whom he could talk about his property rights in Croatia.[195]

Nevertheless, the Trial Chamber did believe that a luring operation had in fact occurred here.[196] Could such a technique be considered legal? The Chamber was of

---

[192] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 54.

[193] As already explained in Subsection 1.5 of Chapter III, such a distinction is not recognised by everyone. It may, for example, be good to recall the often-used definition of Shearer (1971, p. 72), defining abduction as "the removal of a person from the jurisdiction of one state to another by the use of force, the threat of force or by fraud" or Scharf's explanation that "most countries do not distinguish between abduction by fraud and abduction by force." (Scharf 1998, p. 374.) The Trial Chamber, admitted this (see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, n. 73) but argued that "on the continuum between force and fraud, the Trial Chamber does not believe that the accused was coerced in a way that would justify our comparing the case at bar to a forcible abduction or kidnapping case [emphasis in original, ChP]." (Ibid.) Cf. also Knoops 2002, p. 245: "[T]he Trial Chamber's position, differentiating between abduction by force and abduction by fraud, is not a persuasive one and bears no legal authority. In effect, this distinction permits de facto forms of abuse of process."

[194] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 57.

[195] See ibid. See also n. 183 and accompanying text. Cf. also n. 339 of Chapter V (with respect to the case Somchai Liangsiriprasert v. Government of the United States of America): "In the present case the applicant and S.C. [Sutham Chokvanitphong, the cousin of Somchai Liangsiriprasert, ChP] came to Hong Kong of their own free will to collect, as they thought, the illicit profits of their heroin trade. They were present in Hong Kong not because of any unlawful conduct of the authorities but because of their own criminality and greed. The proper extradition procedures have been observed and their Lordships reject without hesitation that it is in the circumstances of this case oppressive or an abuse of the judicial process for the United States to seek their extradition."

[196] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 57: "[T]he accused was deceived, tricked and lured into going Eastern Slavonia [emphasis in original, ChP]".

the opinion that it could; "such "luring" is consistent with principles of international law and the sovereignty of the FRY".[197]

How did the Chamber reach this conclusion? First, it looked at the – by now well-known – Articles 9, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR and 5, paragraph 1 of the ECHR and found that all the necessary procedures had been followed in this case.[198] In addition, it also looked at how these provisions had been interpreted in the case law of the ECtHR and the HRC.

Before continuing to look at this case law, it must be emphasised that it is commendable that the judges looked at these important human rights provisions in such a broad way.

In the words of Sluiter:

> A positive aspect of the examination of in particular human rights instruments appears to be its full application to that part of the criminal procedure that takes place outside the courtroom. In this respect, the Chamber, in my view, acknowledged the overall responsibility of the ICTY for these procedures. This responsibility is based on the duty incumbent upon the Trial Chamber pursuant to Article 20 to ensure that the accused receives a fair trial and on the vertical co-operation relationship between States, which enables the Tribunals to impose modalities of execution. It is imperative that the defendant receives the full protection of human rights instruments and should not be the victim of the fragmentation of the criminal procedure over two or even more jurisdictions [original footnote omitted, ChP].[199]

This study is very much in favour of this stance, which arguably also means that if the Chamber wants to take the ultimate responsibility for everything which happens in the context of its case (which it arguably should), and if it really wants to check whether a suspect's right to liberty and security was respected and to remedy violations of that right, it must make a full review of that right.

That entails the judge not only verifying whether the arrest was made on the correct grounds (this requirement will normally be met if a valid indictment has been issued) or whether the ICTY has observed its own procedures (for example, by issuing an arrest warrant),[200] it arguably also means (taking into account that Article 9 of the ICCPR/Article 5 of the ECHR not only refers to international but also to national law) that the judge must examine what actually happened on the ground: whether the arrest was made in accordance with the proper procedures of the (inter)national forces making the arrest, whether the manner of arrest and detention was arrested and detained was correct and whether the arrest/detention/transfer can [197] Ibid. See for criticism Van Sliedregt 2001 B, p. 79.

---

[198] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 61: "[A]s has been described in detail above, a valid Indictment was issued for Mr. Dokmanović, as was a "Warrant of Arrest Order of Surrender." The accused was informed of the charges against him in a timely manner upon his arrest, in a language he understands, and was promptly transferred to the International Tribunal for detention and trial."

[199] Sluiter 2001, pp. 155-156. (See also n. 232 and accompanying text of Chapter III.)

[200] See, for example, n. 198.

be seen as non-arbitrary.[201] It can be argued that another interpretation, one that does not take these arguably crucial elements of the right to liberty and security into account, can lead to absurd results. For example, what if the Tribunal had validly indicted the person and had respected all its own procedures, but the person in question was kidnapped by State officials from another State in contravention of all the national laws implementing that State's duties to cooperate with the Tribunal? In such a situation, it is difficult to maintain that there was nothing wrong with the person's right to liberty and security, even if it was based on a valid indictment and arrest warrant. Hence, the judges at the Tribunal level must also be able to review how the arrest was executed by the (inter)national forces on the ground.[202] This does not mean, however, that the national judge can invoke certain national irregularities to refuse the transfer of the suspect to the Tribunal – he cannot.[203] In addition, a suspect cannot invoke an irregularity which originated from a State's failure to cooperate with the Tribunal. For example, he cannot invoke a violation of a provision which stipulates that that State cannot transfer nationals to the Tribunal.[204] It must concern genuine violations of real national provisions.

In those cases, it can be argued that the violations (which, in turn, will lead to a violation of one's human right to liberty and security) must be considered and remedied by the judges at the Tribunal,[205] for the simple reason that these violations, whoever was responsible for them, occurred in the context of their case. (In doing so, they can, of course, take into account that the Tribunal itself was not involved in

---

[201] See, for example, also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 59 (explaining how the ECtHR has interpreted Art. 5, para. 1 of the ECHR): "The term "procedure" in Article 5(1) of the ECHR has been interpreted as including the procedures followed by a court when ordering a detention as well as the rules governing the making of an arrest. The European Court of Human Rights has indicated that this requirement means that the procedure to be followed must be in conformity with the ECHR and applicable municipal law and must not be arbitrary. The "lawfulness" requirement of this Article has been interpreted as relating to both procedure and substance [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[202] Cf. also Henquet 2003, p. 155: "If the Tribunal must remedy a violation of the rights of an accused during his or her arrest, it must have access to information pertaining to the arrest."

[203] See the words of Swart at n. 24 and accompanying text. It must be noted that Swart admits that "[t]he only, rather theoretical, situation in which transfer might be refused is that in which jus cogens would forbid a State to transfer a person." (See again n. 24 and accompanying text.) However, that would be the case if, for example, there is a considerable chance that the suspect be tortured by the Tribunal. In such a theoretical case (because one can assume that such a situation will indeed not occur), the national judge might validly refuse to transfer. However, that would arguably not be the case if the suspect is, for example, abducted from another State. Although the abduction may violate the ius cogens norm of non-intervention, the subsequent transfer of a suspect to the Tribunal, after such an abduction, does arguably not constitute, in itself, a violation of a ius cogens norm. (Nevertheless, this does not mean that a judge with more power at the national level (see the still-to-discuss context of the ICC) may not refuse to surrender the suspect in such a situation.)

[204] See also the still-to-discuss Milošević case, see Subsection 3.1.3.

[205] However, note that not every error in the proceedings amounts to a violation, which, in turn, should lead to a remedy. One could hereby think, for example, of a simple and small technical error in the arrest warrant. Cf. n. 603 of Chapter III (with reference to the Brima case and the question when an arrest/detention can be qualified as unlawful/illegal).

the hypothetical abduction mentioned above.) This important point will be returned to in the remainder of this study.

Although it initially focused on the Tribunal's own procedures (see footnote 198 and accompanying text),[206] it will be shown in the remainder of the case that the Trial Chamber in Dokmanović also looked, seemingly more generally, to the manner in which the actual arrest was made by UNTAES.[207] This is to be welcomed, because the correctness of the way the arrest was made on the ground is, of course, also part of the suspect's right to liberty and security and also falls within the context of the Tribunal's case. However, this likewise means that the Tribunal must be able to review the arrest and detention at the national level not only if the arresting entity is an international force but also if it is a national police force. In that case, the Tribunal must check whether the manner in which the arrest was made was in accordance with, for example, the prohibition of arbitrariness and the national arrest procedures. As will be shown infra, this stance, which can arguably also be found in the still-to-discuss Barayagwiza case, does not seem to comport with (Trial Chamber) decisions such as Djukić and Krsmanović, Karemera, Ngirumpatse, Kajelijeli (Trial Chamber), Nshamihigo, Nzirorera and Nyiramasuhuko (see also footnote 138), which support the idea that the Tribunal is "not competent to determine the legality of operations executed by sovereign national authorities within the context of existing national legislation".[208] However, that would also mean that the Tribunal would not be able to state that an arrest was clearly irregular if national police forces had abducted a person from another State before handing him over to the Tribunal, simply because the arrest was made in the context of national legislation, which the Tribunal could not review. It is submitted that this would, of course, make no sense, for the Tribunal in that case would arguably turn away from a crucial part of a person's right to liberty and security, namely the question as to how he was actually deprived of his liberty. Nevertheless, it appears that these cases have later been (correctly) abandoned in (Appeals Chamber) cases such as Semanza, Kajelijeli and Rwamakuba (Trial Chamber and Appeals Chamber), cases which will all be addressed in the remainder of this chapter.[209]

Returning to the Trial Chamber's examination of the case law stemming from the HRC and ECtHR, the Chamber discussed the – already examined, see Chapter

[206] See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 60: "In determining whether Mr. Dokmanović was arrested in accordance with the standards enunciated in Article 5(1) of the ECHR and Article 9(1) of the ICCPR (…), the Tribunal's own Statute and Rules must first be revisited to see if the accused was arrested in a non-arbitrary way in "accordance with procedures prescribed by law" – namely, in accordance with the law of the Tribunal."

[207] See ns. 255-256 and accompanying text.

[208] ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Pauline Nyiramasuhuko, 'Decision on the Defence Motion for Exclusion of Evidence and Restitution of Property Seized', Case No. ICTR-97-21-T, 12 October 2000, para. 28.

[209] See also n. 859.

III of this book – Stocké,[210] Bozano,[211] Celiberti de Casariego,[212] Lopez Burgos,[213] Almeida de Quinteros[214] and Cañón García[215] cases and noted that they > discuss illegality of arrest in relation to violations of specific, established procedures for obtaining custody of a suspect (often relating to an extradition treaty) or in relation to forcible kidnapping, which has been considered manifestly arbitrary. There is, however, no such extradition treaty or cooperation agreement between the International Tribunal or UNTAES and the FRY. (…) In addition, there was no forcible kidnapping at the case at bar, which could be seen as manifestly arbitrary [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[216]

Although one may agree with the last point, the first argument that the ICTY seems to make, namely that the cases from the ECtHR and the HRC are not really relevant here as they had to examine cases where specific, established procedures for obtaining custody of a suspect (such as extradition treaties or cooperation agreements) were violated, is not very convincing. It ignores the fact that between the FRY/UNTAES and the ICTY, there are also specific, established procedures in place which can be violated and that the arguably real message of the ECtHR and HRC is, if one has to transpose it to the context of the international criminal tribunals, that one should not circumvent the existing, formal procedures (whether they stem from extradition treaties[217] are not).[218] One can wonder whether this is not what the ICTY has also done here.

A short explanation may be necessary here: the normal procedures of arrest and transfer can be found in, for example, Rules 55 and 59 bis of the ICTY RPE. The ICTY, assuming that the FRY would not cooperate pursuant to Rule 55 of the ICTY RPE, decided to instruct UNTAES pursuant to Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE to arrest Dokmanović. This is, of course, the ICTY's right: it can use Rule 59 bis

---

[210] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, paras. 62-64.
[211] See ibid., para. 65.
[212] See ibid., para. 66.
[213] See ibid.
[214] See ibid.
[215] See ibid.
[216] Ibid., para. 67.
[217] It is to be noted that, of course, extradition treaties cannot be concluded in this vertical context between the ICTY and UNTAES/States (see also the first words of Section 2). Therefore, it is rather strange that the ICTY states that the arrest was not illegal because, among other things, it did not circumvent an extradition treaty. See also Sluiter 2001, p. 156: "[O]bviously, neither the International Tribunal nor UNTAES are States and thus do not have the power to conclude extradition treaties with other States[.] This contention is, even within its context, totally incomprehensible [original footnote omitted, ChP]."
[218] Cf. also Lamb 2000, pp. 240-241 (who is, nevertheless, of the opinion that cases which dealt with the circumvention of extradition treaties cannot be looked at, see n. 334): "While the transfer of an accused to the Tribunal cannot constitute a breach of rights under any extradition arrangement, the question of the effects upon the ICTY's jurisdiction of any arrest by Tribunal staff or multinational forces which circumvents the Tribunal's own arrest procedures nevertheless remains [emphasis in original, ChP]."

instead of Rule 55 of the ICTY RPE. However, UNTAES could not in fact arrest Dokmanović pursuant to Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE because the latter was not on UNTAES territory. Therefore, the luring operation was set in motion to make sure that Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE could be enforced and that UNTAES could arrest Dokmanović.

However, can this still be seen as normal use of Rule 59 bis of the RPE ICTY? One can very well argue that Dokmanović was not taken into custody on the basis of Rule 59 bis alone, but on the basis of a luring operation resulting in an arrest based on Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE. The question now is whether such a technique, which includes the element of luring, is not a contravention of the existing and normal procedures. It can be argued that it is. After all, even though the ICTY's choice of UNTAES (on the basis of Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE) instead of FRY (on the basis of Rule 55 of the ICTY RPE) to cooperate in the arrest of Dokmanović may initially have been justified, it is arguably not justified to resort to quite another arrest technique (namely the dubious method of luring followed by a normal arrest method, namely Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE) if there remains another option in the catalogue of normal arrest procedures which does not include the dubious element of the luring operation, namely to simply ask the FRY to transfer Dokmanović to The Hague on the basis of Rule 55 of the ICTY RPE. This point was also observed by Scharf (and followed by Sluiter)[219] who writes: "The luring of Dokmanović in [219] See Sluiter 2001, p. 153. For another opinion, see Van der Wilt 2004, p. 293, who emphasises that the obligation to cooperate with the ICTY can in no way be put on a par with a voluntary cooperation agreement such as an extradition treaty which is based on the freedom of contract. That is indeed undisputed. However, that arguably does not mean that once a certain procedure has been established, whether that procedure has a voluntary origin or not, the procedure in place should not be followed or that a deviation from the existing cooperation procedures between the ICTY and States cannot injure sovereign rights of the State (see ibid.). It arguably can. Van der Wilt shares the position of Lamb, Van Sliedregt and this study that an implicit authority to violate a State's sovereignty cannot be derived from the fact that the ICTY was established pursuant to a resolution from the UNSC (see n. 265) and (thus) that the Tribunal cannot be involved itself in violations of State sovereignty, see ibid., p. 295. However, it is unclear how that (arguably correct) position must then be seen in light of his earlier (and rather generally formulated) remark that a deviation from the existing cooperation procedures between the ICTY and States cannot injure sovereign rights of the State. It may be the case that Van der Wilt only wants to connect these latter words with actions from third parties. This may be deduced not only from the above-mentioned remark that the Tribunal cannot be involved itself in violations of State sovereignty, but also from ibid., p. 294, where he argues that, precisely because the Tribunal lacks a police force and because the commitment of States is of vital importance in this context, the Tribunal, when confronted by States which neglect their duty, must take a more tolerant stance with respect to suspects who are put at its disposal through different means. However, in that case, it is perhaps a little unclear that Van der Wilt makes his general remark in the context of the Dokmanović case, where, after all, the Prosecution was involved in the luring operation. (Note finally that in the case of Dokmanović, it cannot be said that the FRY neglected its duty (to transfer Dokmanović). Even though such an outcome may have been very probable, no request of transfer was sent to the FRY in the first place.) Be that as it may, it can more generally be argued that in the case of non-cooperation, the Tribunals must not debase themselves by resorting to illegal methods in obtaining custody over a suspect. They must follow the normal route when they are confronted by non-compliance, such as reporting such non-compliance to the UNSC. That the UNSC in such cases does not do what it should do, namely putting real pressure on the non-cooperating State, is very unfortunate, but strictly speaking, not the problem of the Tribunals. In that respect, the Tribunals should better clarify to the public that a lack of arrests is usually not the lieu of pursuing his surrender from the FRY through the formally established procedure (…) raises the same concerns as if the ICTY had acted in circumvention of an operational extradition treaty."[220]

After having examined the international cases, the Trial Chamber looked at the national level. Referring to cases which were already discussed or at least mentioned in the previous chapter – namely the cases of Yunis,[221] Toscanino,[222] Wilson,[223] Reed,[224] Re Hartnett,[225] In re Schmidt[226] and Liangsiriprasert[227] – it found "that there is strong support in such national systems for the notion that luring a suspect into another jurisdiction in order to effect his arrest is not an abuse of the suspect's rights or an abuse of process [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[228]

Nevertheless, it admitted that there are also "cases in national jurisdictions where courts have frowned upon the notion of luring an individual into a jurisdiction to effectuate his arrest [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[229] It thereby referred to the already examined Swiss case of 15 July 1982[230] and the (not yet addressed) Canadian case Walker v. Bank of New York.[231] However, notwithstanding these two cases, the Chamber argued,

---

Tribunals' fault, but the fault of politicians who either default on their legal obligations (the politicians of the non-cooperating States) or who undermine the fight against impunity and the credibility of their own institution by not taking any further action in the case of non-compliance (the politicians in the UNSC). However, a perhaps more constructive route which the Tribunals can take is to make more use of the already-mentioned "innovative ways" to obtain custody over a person, to freeze the assets of the accused under Rule 61 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE, to mobilise powerful States themselves to put pressure on non-cooperating States or to use any other creative (but legal, see also Ruxton 2001, p. 21) method which can help in the enforcement of arrest warrants.

[220] Scharf 1998, p. 376. Note that Scharf, when writing of the formally established procedure refers, among other things, to Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE (see ibid., n. 39). Although some may now wonder whether Scharf is still correct (as the luring was not used instead of Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE: it was in fact used to enable the use of Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE), Scharf arguable wants to point out, as was done in the main text, that what was used in this case was a luring operation followed by an arrest on the basis of Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE and that that is a circumvention of the existing and formal procedures (because Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE does not mention the dubious element of luring).

[221] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šljivančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, paras. 69-70.

[222] See ibid., para. 70.

[223] See ibid., para. 71. (See n. 582 of Chapter V for the Wilson case.)

[224] See ibid. (See n. 103 of Chapter V for the Reed case.)

[225] See ibid., para. 72. (See n. 582 of Chapter V for the Hartnett case.)

[226] See ibid., para. 73.

[227] See ibid., n. 104. (See n. 339 of Chapter V for the Liangsiriprasert case.)

[228] Ibid., para. 68. The Trial Chamber noted that Paust (et al. 1996) had another opinion on this (namely that the international community generally disapproves of luring, see also ns. 79 and 234 and accompanying text of Chapter III) but found "the very limited case authority cited for this proposition unhelpful in resolving the present issue." (Ibid., n. 92.)

[229] Ibid., para. 74.

[230] See ibid., n. 105.

[231] See ibid. The Trial Chamber explained the case "Walker v. Bank of New York (15 O.R. 3d 596 (Ont. (Can.) Gen. Div. 1993), rev'd on other grounds, 16 O.R. 3d 504 (Ont. (Can.) C.A. 1994)" (ibid.) as follows (ibid.): "Plaintiff was arrested in New York as part of a sting operation by the United States government. The plaintiff allegedly was given an aeroplane ticket to fly from Canada to the Bahamas, > in all the national and international cases with which we are familiar, which found luring to be a violation of some international law principle[232] or a suspect's rights, there existed an established extradition treaty that was, in each case, circumvented or there was unjustified violence used against the suspect [original footnote omitted, ChP].[233]

It then repeated its point already explained above that > there was no extradition treaty which was circumvented in securing the arrest of the accused. While Mr. Dokmanović could have been arrested and transferred to The Hague pursuant to Rule 55, as discussed, it is not the only method allowed to apprehend suspects [original footnote omitted, ChP].[234]

Again, it can be maintained that this argument is not very convincing.

Although Rule 55 of the ICTY RPE is indeed not the only way in which a person can be arrested (the ICTY can also use Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE), using another technique which is not recognised by the RPE (namely a normal arrest on the basis of Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE made possible by luring) while there is a regular, formal, existing procedure available which does not contain this dubious element of luring – namely a transfer by the FRY on the basis of Rule 55 of the ICTY RPE – is arguably a contravention of the existing procedures, comparable with the circumvention of extradition treaties at the inter-State level.

As such, one could very well argue that the arrest and detention of Dokmanović were not made pursuant to the specific, established procedures for obtaining custody and hence that his right to liberty and security was violated.[235] Sluiter also notes this but was unaware until he was on board that there was a stopover in New York, where he was subsequently arrested. After he was released on bond he fled to Canada. In outlining the background of this case, Paust [et al. 1996, ChP] states that although the U.S. requested extradition, Canada refused to convene an extradition hearing, citing violations of Canada's law and sovereignty, Paust, at p. 433". It can be argued that the overview of national case law examined by the Trial Chamber was rather limited. See Sluiter 2001, p. 155: "In terms of international law, the ad hoc Tribunals are bound by those domestic rules and practices which may be considered general principles of law recognized by civilized nations[.] If the Chamber wishes to establish the existence of such principles with respect to the arrest of indicted persons, it has not succeeded through this comparative legal exercise. The Trial Chamber believed that [s]trong support for a certain view could be derived from national systems. What followed, however, was a very rudimentary and selective analysis of domestic jurisprudence, in which the focus lay with jurisprudence from one particular jurisdiction, that of the United States." (See also n. 1 of Chapter IV.)

---

[232] The Chamber explained here in a footnote that "[t]here are at least two commentators who argue that fraudulent luring by a state or its agent is an international law violation." (And then, reference is made to F.A. Mann's 1990 Further Studies in International Law (p. 340) and Paust et al. 1996, p. 435. Cf. n. 79 of Chapter III.)

[233] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 74.

[234] Ibid., para. 75.

[235] For another opinion, see Lamb 2000, pp. 202-203.

point and then concludes that Dokmanović's arrest was unlawful.[236] He then continues with the point that "[t]his does not necessarily mean, however, that the accused should be released from custody".[237]

As argued earlier, although paragraph 4 of both Articles 9 of the ICCPR and 5 of the ECHR – a provision which arguably has attained customary international law status and which would thus, in principle, also be applicable in the context of the international criminal tribunals – indeed only mentions that a person should be released in the case of an unlawful detention, it is the belief of this study that this should also include a release in the case of an unlawful arrest: what is arguably important here is that a person unlawfully deprived of his freedom (through an arrest and detention) is released.[238]

However, it is very well possible that Sluiter has the same opinion on this. If that were indeed the case, then when he writes that an unlawful arrest (read: an unlawful deprivation of liberty) does not necessarily have to lead to a release, he probably means that such a remedy is too far-reaching for the violations committed here. However, in Chapter III of this study, it was explained that if a judge (which would include a judge at an international criminal tribunal) is of the opinion that a person's detention[239] (read: arrest/detention/deprivation of liberty)[240] is unlawful, he must, strictly speaking, release that person.

Nevertheless, it was also explained in the same chapter, in its Subsection 4.4, that this remedy is problematic; if a person has been the victim of an unlawful arrest/detention (but not one which is so serious as to lead to the ending of the case),[241] he must, strictly speaking, be released.[242] However, as explained, that does

---

[236] See Sluiter 2001, p. 153. See also Smeulers 2007, p. 109: "From the Dokmanović case, however, it can be concluded that the Trial Chamber does not easily qualify an arrest as illegal. Dokmanović had been lured into entering UNTAES territory in order to be arrested. Although the prosecutor was closely involved in the arrest, the Trial Chamber concluded that the arrest was not unlawful. This is a decision that can be heavily criticized, because it can be seen as a violation of Article 5 European Convention of Human Rights [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[237] Sluiter 2001, p. 153.

[238] See n. 583 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[239] See n. 581 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[240] See ns. 583, 586 and 588 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[241] As explained in Chapter III, even though the release of Art. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR or Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR does not preclude a re-arrest, a serious violation of these human rights provisions may nevertheless lead to a male detentus result, not because these provisions state so but because the judge may decide so in his discretion in finding the most appropriate remedy.

[242] Note that there is, however, also a certain threshold before one can qualify a deprivation as unlawful: small technical errors will not lead to the qualification 'unlawful arrest/detention/deprivation of liberty'. Cf. in that respect also the already briefly mentioned (see n. 603 and accompanying text of Chapter III) Brima case before the SCSL, where Judge Itoe clarified that "having been taken into custody, a mere technical flaw in the warrant of arrest neither renders the said arrest nor the detention based on that arrest, illegal." (SCSL, Trial Chamber, The Prosecutor against Tamba Alex Brima, 'Ruling on the Application for the Issue of a Writ of Habeas Corpus Filed by the Applicant', Case No. SCSL-03-06-PT, 22 July 2003, p. 14.) The reviewing judge must check the essential points concerning the lawfulness of the deprivation of liberty, namely 1) are there substantive grounds for the deprivation; 2) is the deprivation in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law and 3) is the deprivation non-arbitrary? See for the Brima case also n. 1286 and accompanying text. Cf. finally n. 205.

not mean he cannot be re-arrested and brought to trial. (This will particularly be the case if the suspect is charged with serious crimes and prosecution is considered to be of utmost importance.) Although a person released by the ICTY/ICTR (in the Netherlands/Tanzania) cannot be re-arrested for 15 days,[243] one can imagine that the ICTY/ICTR will then demand that all UN Member States (which must cooperate with these Tribunals) immediately transfer the suspect back to the ICTY/ICTR the moment he sets foot on their soil. Thus, one can assume that there is a considerable chance that after those two weeks,[244] the person will be immediately re-arrested and brought to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal in question. In such a case, the prosecuting authorities could assert that this 'remedy' (the 'release') has repaired the [243] See Art. XX ('The suspect or accused') of the 'Agreement Between the United Nations and the United Republic of Tanzania Concerning the Headquarters of the International Tribunal for Rwanda' (signed at New York on 31 August 1995): "1. The host country shall not exercise its criminal jurisdiction over any person present in its territory, who is to be or has been transferred as a suspect or an accused to the premises of the Tribunal pursuant to a request or an order of the Tribunal, in respect of acts, omissions or convictions prior to their entry into the territory of the host country. 2. The immunity provided for in this Article shall cease when the person, having been acquitted or otherwise released by the Tribunal and having had for a period of fifteen consecutive days from the date of his or her release an opportunity of leaving, has nevertheless remained in the territory of the host country, or having left it, has returned." (See for an almost identical provision in the context of the ICTY Art. XX ('The suspect or accused') of the 'Agreement Between the United Nations and the Kingdom of the Netherlands Concerning the Headquarters of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia Since 1991' (signed at New York on 27 May 1994).

[244] And sometimes even earlier, see the Ntuyahaga case. In this case, the suspect, who was accused of the murder of former Rwandan Prime Minister Unwilingiyimana and ten Belgium peacekeepers, illegally entered Tanzania and voluntarily handed himself over to the ICTR. The OTP subsequently requested the judges to withdraw the indictment of this case (because it did not fit the prosecution policy of the Tribunal) and to defer the case to Belgium, which had already started to investigate the case. However, the judges, dismissing the ICTR indictment of Ntuyahaga, stated that they could not defer cases to national courts. (This has changed in the meantime, see Rule 11 bis of the ICTR RPE ('Referral of the Indictment to another Court').) As a result, he was released on Thursday 18 March 1999, although he stayed in the detention facility of the ICTR for personal security reasons. Belgium subsequently called on Tanzania to arrest Ntuyahaga and to extradite him to Belgium. Peter Gijsels, advisor to the Belgium Ministry of Justice, explained "that in deciding whether to arrest Ntuyahaga, Tanzania would have to consider both the bilateral treaty with Belgium and its agreement with the ICTR. Under the latter accord, persons freed by the tribunal enjoy fifteen days of immunity. But he said there were several reasons why this agreement did not apply in Ntuyahaga's case, and the Tanzanian parliament had not yet ratified it." ('Belgium Calls on Tanzania to Arrest Ntuyahaga Immediately', 19 March 1999, Fondation Hirondelle, available at: http://www.hirondelle.org/hirondelle.nsf/0/eefb51a4e2e6f69ac12566bd007e77a2?OpenDocument.) On Monday 29 March 1999, Ntuyahaga was released in Dar Es Salaam (Tanzania), but the very same day, he was arrested by Tanzanian authorities. "The Justice Minister said Ntuyahaga had been detained for his own security, and pending a decision on extradition requests from both Belgium and Rwanda. Mwapachu said it was also to "sort out the immigration issue". Ntuyahaga entered Tanzania illegally when he turned himself over to the ICTR last June." ('Tanzanian Authorities Arrest Ntuyahaga in Dar Es Salaam', 30 March 1999, Fondation Hirondelle, available at: http://www.hirondelle.org/hirondelle.nsf/0/eefb51a4e2e6f69ac12566bd007e77a2?OpenDocument.) In the end, Ntuyahaga was extradited to Belgium in 2004 where he was tried, found guilty of murdering several peacekeepers and Rwandan civilians and sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment, a verdict which was confirmed on 12 December 2007.

initial iniuria of the irregularity and that the trial can continue as normal. However, in that case, the suspect would only be granted a pro forma remedy, comparable with that at the national level (but extended over a longer period), which does arguably not comport with the idea that a remedy must be real and effective, see also Article 2, paragraph 3 (a) of the ICCPR and Article 13 of the ECHR.[245] In addition, the pro forma release does not take account of the exact seriousness of the irregularity. In other words: it is not only a pro forma remedy but also an over-simplified remedy.

It would thus be better if a judge would avoid this problematic remedy of release and would, if he determines that the suspect was arrested/detained unlawfully, simply grant the most appropriate remedy, taking all the different aspects of the case into account (including, for example, the seriousness of the unlawful arrest/detention/deprivation of liberty and the importance of having this person prosecuted). If one follows that route, then one can still satisfy the common sense idea behind the immediate re-arrest mentioned above, namely that cases involving suspects of serious crimes must be continued if possible – although a male detentus must, of course, also not be excluded for these suspects – but one will also replace the strange pro forma release and immediate re-arrest with real remedies, such as a reduction of the sentence and/or compensation.[246] The judge can then take the exact

[245] See also the still-to-discuss (see Subsection 3.2.1) Barayagwiza case where the ICTR judges held: "[T]o order the release of the Appellant without prejudice – particularly in light of what we are certain would be his immediate re-arrest – could be seen as having cured the prior illegal detention. That would open the door for the Prosecutor to argue (assuming arguendo the eventual conviction of the Appellant) that the Appellant would not then be entitled to credit for that period of detention (...) on the grounds that the release was the remedy for the violation of his rights. The net result of this could be to place the Appellant in a worse position than he would have been in had he not raised this appeal. This would effectively result in the Appellant being punished for exercising his right to bring this appeal." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 110.)

[246] It may be interesting to note that on 19 September 2000, the then President of the ICTY, Claude Jorda, wrote a letter to the UNSG in which he requested that the issue of compensation for persons unlawfully arrested/detained, unjustly prosecuted and wrongfully convicted be addressed because a provision regarding compensation, cf. Art. 9, para. 5 of the ICCPR for persons unlawfully arrested/detained, was lacking in the ICTY Statute/RPE. With respect to persons unlawfully arrested/detained, he noted, among other things, that the UN would be legally bound to award compensation to the victim of a violation of Art. 9 of the ICCPR but only "if the conduct giving rise to this violation is legally imputed to the Tribunal and thus to the United Nations". (UNSC, 'Letter dated 26 September 2000 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council', S/2000/904, 26 September 2000, p. 4.) See also Beresford 2002, p. 640, Acquavivia 2007, pp. 621-623 and Staker 2008, pp. 1499-1500. However, as will be shown in the Barayagwiza case, another international criminal tribunal, the ICTR, appeared to indicate that it would award compensation for a suspect who was, among other things, irregularly detained and thereafter found not guilty, irrespective of who was responsible for the violation, see ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, paras. 74-75: "The Appeals Chamber (...) confirms that the Appellant's rights were violated, and that all violations demand a remedy. (...) DECIDES that for the violation of his rights the Appellant is entitled to a remedy, to be fixed at the time of judgement at first instance, as follows: a) If the Appellant is found not guilty, he shall receive financial compensation; b) If the Appellant is found guilty, his sentence shall be reduced to take account of the violation of his rights." Note that this seriousness of the irregularity into account in determining how much the sentence should be reduced or or how much compensation one should accord the suspect. Such a solution would arguably be fairer to the suspect and better capable of putting flexibility into the system.

Furthermore, this solution also avoids the criticism one may expect from various actors if a suspect of serious crimes is released for an irregularity which is not so serious as to lead to the ending of the case (in such serious cases, the public must understand that the court has no option but to refuse jurisdiction and to release (but now in a 'real' way) the suspect), but which nevertheless ensures that the detention must be qualified as unlawful[247] and that, strictly speaking, the suspect must be released.

In fact, whereas at the national level, one can expect that a suspect of serious crimes will be immediately re-arrested, at the Tribunal level, there may be more problems because of the two-week immunity period. As already stated, all UN Member States (which must cooperate with the Tribunals) will probably do everything in their power to ensure that a suspect of serious international crimes is immediately re-arrested and brought to the jurisdiction of the Tribunals, but one cannot exclude the prospect of the suspect fleeing to a non-UN Member State (which, in principle, has no obligation to cooperate with the Tribunals) or to a State which, even though it has an obligation to cooperate, will not do so. That could mean that a suspect of international crimes, fleeing to such a State, could effectively evade prosecution.

That is to be avoided. Although the law should obviously be obeyed, one must also be careful not to apply the law in such a strict way that it leads to great injustice: summum ius, summa iniuria.[248] This constitutes another reason to continue construction may be very appropriate (and probably for that reason has also been followed in later cases), but that one must not forget either that provisions like para. 5 of Art. 9 of the ICCPR and Art. 5 of the ECHR state that compensation should not only be awarded in the case of an acquittal. Compensation is, in principle, available to any person whose detention was considered unlawful, whether that person was later acquitted or not. See also Sluiter 2001, pp. 153-154: "[I]t is suggested that creative use be made of (a combination of) other available remedies, such as the reduction of the sentence in case of conviction – and financial compensation, rather than termination of the proceedings and the release of the accused [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." A final point that must be made is that Claude Jorda's above-mentioned letter, in the end, did not lead to a modification of the ICTY Statute, see Acquaviva 2007, p. 623: "[T]he Security Council has not yet decided to intervene in this delicate matter by modifying the Statutes of the Tribunals. Unless these Statutes are modified, it is hard to envisage the adoption by these two institutions of a rule providing for suitable reparation – which, among other things, would inevitably bring about remarkable financial costs for the institution. In the absence of a pronunciation by the 'legislator', these bodies have difficulties in shaping general rules to face such situations [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Nevertheless, this did not constitute a reason for the still-to-discuss Rwamakuba case not to order financial compensation, see Subsection 3.2.4.

---

[247] Swart, for example, explains that "a failure to promptly inform the person of the reasons for his arrest and of any charges against him makes his detention illegal." (Swart 2001, p. 204.)

[248] See Garner 2004, p. 1759: "The highest right is the utmost injury. That is, law too rigidly interpreted produces the greatest injustice." It may be interesting to note that Green (1963, p. 642) also referred to this maxim as a counterargument with respect to the ex iniuria ius non oritur claim of Eichmann (see n. 13 of Chapter I).

to exercise jurisdiction in these kinds of (less serious) male captus cases and to grant other remedies which do not jeopardise the trial itself.[249]

Thus, it is worth repeating that the judge must take all the different aspects of the case into account (including, for example, the seriousness of the unlawful arrest/detention/deprivation of liberty and the importance of having this person prosecuted) and simply grant the most appropriate remedy in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, comparable with the abuse of process doctrine. If a judge decides to continue the case (which may very often be the case considering the seriousness of the suspect's charges), then the suspect should be granted real and concrete other remedies such as a reduction of the sentence and/or compensation. In determining which exact remedies are to be provided, the judge could then take into account the precise male captus which took place. For example, one could hereby look at the involvement of the Tribunal in the male captus situation (it should be noted that the formulation of paragraph 4 is very general and does not take into account which actors were responsible for the unlawful arrest/detention) or the mistreatment suffered by the suspect during the operation.[250] However, neither should it be forgotten that a truly serious male captus situation can lead to one remedy only, namely the ending of the case before that particular court, that is, a 'real' release (without the possibility of re-arrest),[251] whether one is dealing with a suspect of international crimes or not.

It seems that Sluiter, when he writes that an unlawful arrest does not necessarily have to lead to a release, alludes to this 'real' release[252] and, of course, it is not hard to agree with him on this point: the seriousness of Dokmanović's male captus was not such as to grant him this ('real') release, the male detentus remedy. However, as [249] Note that this does not mean, however, that such a suspect cannot be released in certain cases (besides the situation that he is released because the judge is of the opinion that the case must be stopped). If a judge reviewing a suspect's detention feels that the suspect will appear at trial, there is no longer a need to hold him in detention while awaiting trial. In such a case, the suspect can, of course, be provisionally released pending trial, with or without conditions.

[250] Cf. also Sluiter 2003 B, pp. 946-947, where he writes about factors in determining whether or not another remedy, namely the male detentus remedy (the termination of the proceedings), should be granted: "Crucial factors in determining whether or not this remedy should be provided for are the following: 1. The degree of attribution of the violation to the Tribunal, in particular the Prosecutor (significant involvement in the violation by the Prosecutor could damage the integrity of the proceedings to such an extent that the trial cannot be continued); 2. The nature of the violation of individual rights (violation of individual rights of an egregious nature, such as subjecting the individual to inhuman or degrading treatment, may constitute a legal impediment to exercise of jurisdiction by the Tribunal, regardless of whether or not the Tribunal, in particular the Prosecutor, had anything to do with the violation)."

[251] See also Swart 2001, p. 206: "[B]oth Article 9 of the ICCPR and Article 5 of the ECHR make it imperative that a person be released if his detention was unlawful. I take it for granted that, in the case of more serious violations of these Articles, the nature of this particular remedy rules out any possibility of re-arresting the suspect or the accused."

[252] See Sluiter 2001, p. 153: "In case of gross violations in which the Prosecutor has been implicated, the dismissal of the indictment, resulting in the release of the accused, should not be ruled out as an appropriate and effective remedy." See also ibid.: "I agree with those who believe that the termination of the proceedings and the release of a person indicted should only be the ultimate remedy for violations of the rights of the accused [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

already stated, in principle, he would be entitled to a 'normal' (pro forma) release given the fact that his deprivation of liberty was unlawful, but as this remedy, as explained, is not without its problems, he should be granted other remedies such as a reduction of the sentence and/or financial compensation.[253]

Returning to the reasoning of the judges in the Dokmanović case, after they had explained that Dokmanović's arrest did not circumvent an established extradition treaty, they turned to the other situation mentioned in case law "which found luring to be a violation of some international law principle or a suspect's rights [original footnote omitted, ChP]",[254] namely unjustified violence used against the suspect. However, that was not the case here either:

> [T]here was no "cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino" in the arrest of Mr. Dokmanović. The accused was not mistreated in any way on his journey to the Erdut base. There was nothing about the arrest to shock the conscience. In fact, it was an ordinary arrest by most standards, with no resistance by the accused and no force needed by UNTAES to handcuff him. The videotape and audiotape of the arrest confirm that valid procedures were used in detaining Mr. Dokmanović and transferring him to The Hague [original footnote omitted, ChP].[255]

These words show the point made supra[256] that the Trial Chamber in Dokmanović looked, seemingly more generally, to the manner in which the actual arrest was made by UNTAES, a point which is to be welcomed because the correctness of the way the arrest was made on the ground is, of course, also part of this suspect's right to liberty and security and also falls within the context of this Tribunal's case.

The words also show the idea established in the Yunis case, namely that if the luring operation is accompanied by "cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct", the case should be dismissed.

It must be stressed that, even though the Toscanino decision itself was about an abduction, the Trial Chamber only uses the Toscanino threshold here in the context of the method of luring. In other words: there is no evidence that the Trial Chamber would also demand the Toscanino threshold in cases of abduction. Hence, it can be argued that the Trial Chamber's decision cannot be used as evidence for the idea that the Tribunal would only refuse jurisdiction if the Tribunal were responsible for an abduction involving "cruel, inhumane and outrageous" conduct (and would hence not refuse jurisdiction if the Tribunal were responsible for a 'normal' abduction, an abduction without "cruel, inhumane and outrageous" conduct).

---

[253] See also ibid., p. 154: "In the case of Dokmanović, if the Chamber had decided his luring was unlawful, as it should have, release would clearly have been an inappropriate and disproportionate remedy. Financial compensation or a (minor) reduction of the sentence in case of conviction would have been more in line with the nature of the violation."

[254] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 74.

[255] Ibid. para. 75.

[256] See n. 207 and accompanying text.

Most probably, the Tribunal would also dismiss a case if the Tribunal was responsible for a 'normal' abduction. In the words of Scharf: "[T]he Trial Chamber focused on the distinction between "luring" (the means used to arrest Dokmanović) and "forcible abduction", reckoning that the former was acceptable while the latter might constitute grounds for dismissal in future cases [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[257]

However, whatever the position of the Trial Chamber is on this issue, it can, in any case, be argued that the Tribunal should resolutely refuse jurisdiction if its own people were responsible for a 'normal' abduction, let alone for an abduction accompanied by "cruel, inhumane and outrageous" conduct. It is submitted that the Tribunal would clearly undermine its integrity as a court of law if it condoned such reprehensible methods of its people, methods which it has been established are clearly arbitrary and illegal.[258]

The Chamber then turned to the argument that the operation violated the sovereignty of the FRY.

Although Dokmanović – and this is in contrast to the view of the Prosecutor[259] – did have standing to raise this issue, the argument itself was, according to the Chamber, without merit.

It explained that there had been "no actual physical violation of FRY territory in gaining custody of Mr. Dokmanović. The arrest occurred in Croatian territory".[260] Although in inter-State luring cases, there may be a question of whether a State's sovereignty has been violated, the judges continued, this point was irrelevant for this case because "the arresting force, UNTAES, was established under Chapter VII authority – binding upon the international community – and thus does not have the type of horizontal relationship with the FRY that would exist between sovereign States".[261] It hereby referred to the Blaškić case – in which it was held that "[a]n order within the International Tribunal's mandate, addressed to a State, as with any compulsory action taken by the Security Council itself, in no way offends the sovereignty of that State"[262] – and then stated that "[w]hen UNTAES arrested the accused, it was fulfilling its obligation pursuant to Resolution 1037 to cooperate

[257] Scharf 1998, p. 371.
[258] See ns. 225, 411, 414 and accompanying text of Chapter III and n. 523 and accompanying text of Chapter V.
[259] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 76. The Chamber referred here to the ICTY Appeals Chamber decision in Tadić, see also n. 178 of Chapter III.
[260] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 77.
[261] Ibid.
[262] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Tihomir Blaškić, 'Decision on the Objection of the Republic of Croatia to the Issuance of Subpoenae Duces Tecum', Case No. IT-95-14-PT, 18 July 1997, para. 51.

with the Tribunal and to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security".[263]

There are a few points which may undermine these two arguments of the Trial Chamber related to the alleged violation of the sovereignty of the FRY. First of all, can one really assert that there was no actual physical violation of FRY territory in gaining custody of Dokmanović? It is, of course, true that the actual arrest occurred in Croatia, but during the luring operation culminating in this arrest, OTP investigators did enter the territory of the FRY. Should all these preparations simply be cut off from what can be seen as the 'mere' end result of the luring operation itself, namely the arrest by UNTAES? This point was also discussed in Subsection 2.1 of Chapter III (where, it should be remembered, the inter-State context was examined): there, it was explained that, arguably more in line with the principle of respect for another State's sovereignty is not the (limited) idea that agents of other States are not allowed to arrest persons in a State, but rather the (broader) idea that agents of other States are not allowed to carry out police operations in that State, whether these operations amount to an actual arrest or not. If one follows this line of reasoning, one may very well consider that the sovereignty of the FRY was in fact violated by the luring operation.[264] However, does the fact that there is a vertical relationship present in the context of this case make a difference here? This point is related to the second argument of the Trial Chamber, namely that the fact that there is such a relationship present ensures that Dokmanović's claim that the sovereignty of the FRY was violated must fail. This argument is also not without its deficiencies: although it is, of course, true that the Chapter VII backbone of Resolution 1037 means that UNTAES may arrest persons on a territory where it has the mandate to do so, such a backbone does not give UNTAES a full carte blanche. For example, it does not allow it to go into the territory of another State where UNTAES does not have such a mandate, like the FRY, to make arrests there.[265] In

[263] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 77.

[264] See also Scharf (1998, p. 374), who notes that "[t]he Trial Chamber's conclusion [that there was no physical violation of FRY territory, ChP] would only have been correct if the communications between law enforcement officials and the target of the luring were conducted exclusively over the phone, radio, e-mail, or fax. In contrast, an agent of the OTP (Kevin Curtis) did physically enter FRY territory with the purpose of engaging in a law enforcement activity (the luring) without the FRY's permission." See also Currie 2007, p. 363: "The distinction made by the Trial Chamber between luring and abduction seems strained, founded as it was on the controversial view that luring is not a sovereignty violation."

[265] Cf. in that respect Lamb 2000, p. 223, n. 201: "Potentially at least, a State may plead lawful excuse, on the grounds that the ICTY (and hence by implication its orders) was instituted by the UN Security Council pursuant to a resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. (…) However, such a plea appears unlikely to succeed, on the grounds that while arrest warrants may constitute enforcement measures, these oblige custodial States to effect arrests or direct international forces to carry them out. They stop short of authorizing such States or forces to launch incursions into third States in order to do so". See also Van Sliedregt 2001 B, p. 75 and Van der Wilt 2004, p. 295. Note, however, that international forces might have such powers when the UNSC has specifically authorised them to have them, when the State where the operation takes place has consented to the activities or where the international forces act in self-defence, cf. Scharf 1998, p. 382 (see also Subsection 2.1.1 of Chapter III).

the same vein, one can wonder whether a joint operation between the OTP and UNTAES as the present one can be seen as falling within the scope of their mandates.[266]

However, it must also be emphasised that even if there were a violation of the FRY's sovereignty, the FRY seemingly did not protest and request Dokmanović's return. However, even if that had been the case, the ICTY would not have been obliged to return Dokmanović.

This must be explained in more detail. Even if this situation had occurred at the inter-State level, it should be recalled that Chapter V has shown that the practice of States has established that male captus bene detentus must be rejected at any rate if the injured State of the person who has been the victim of an abduction (which was not the case here) has protested and requested the return of the suspect. In the context of a luring operation, a violation of international law will normally lead to less far-reaching forms of reparation.

In addition to this, one should take into account the specific context of the Tribunals here (see also above with respect to the remedy of release): if the ICTY decides that the luring operation is not so serious as to dismiss the case completely (that would in any case be so if the luring were accompanied by serious, Toscanino-like mistreatment) but that the violation of State sovereignty nevertheless requires that the person be returned to the State which protested the violation and has requested the return of the suspect, the ICTY would return the suspect, over whom it still has jurisdiction, to a State which then comes under an immediate new obligation to re-transfer the suspect back to the Tribunal (which, after all, still has jurisdiction to try the suspect). However, it can be argued that such a pro forma construction does not make much sense. In fact, one can wonder why the ICTY would return the suspect to a State which may not cooperate in bringing the suspect to justice. (Note, however, that this does not mean that the suspect should not be returned in the case of a serious violation of international law such as an abduction. However, in that case, the Tribunal can still make the return conditional on the injured State prosecuting the suspect itself. This point will come up again in the remainder of this study.) In such cases, it would be better for the judge to decide to continue the case, to hold the suspect in custody and to grant other forms of

---

(Nevertheless, the construction used by Scharf (1998) on p. 378 of his article, where he argues that several more general UNSC resolutions, provisions from the ICTY Statute and RPE and non-cooperation on the part of the FRY taken together may also lead to a justified law enforcement operation in the territory of the FRY, is arguably too broad.) Scharf (1998, p. 376) further argues that "contrary to the implication of the Trial Chamber's opinion, abductions from the FRY may be legally justifiable" but it is not clear whether the Trial Chamber indeed disapproves of operations which can fall under the three above-mentioned scenarios. That it does not mention them does not necessarily have to mean that it does not recognise them.

[266] Cf. also Sloan 2003 A, pp. 107-108 (with respect to the still-to-discuss Todorović case) and p. 108 in particular: "[I]t would appear that the question that needs to be decided in this case is not whether the powers of the ICTY in exercising its legitimate functions prevail over traditional concerns of state sovereignty, but whether the ICTY is indeed exercising its legitimate functions [emphasis in original, ChP]."

reparation for the violation of State sovereignty which occurred in the context of the case.

The last point of issue D ('The method of arrest') has to do with the male captus case of Alvarez-Machain to which both the Defence (Court of Appeals) and the Prosecution (Supreme Court) referred. Here, the Trial Chamber simply stated that it did not have to look at this issue because both the arrest and detention of Dokmanović were justified and legal. Hence, the real male captus bene/male detentus discussion did not have to take place because, according to the Trial Chamber, there was no male captus in the first place.[267]

With respect to the final issue (E: 'Safe conduct'), the Trial Chamber found that "the testimony of Mr. Curtis, Mr. Hryshchyshyn, and Witness A, to the effect that no guarantees of safe conduct, either specific or general, were provided to the accused, is more credible than the testimony of Mr. Dokmanović".[268] In addition, "[e]ven if Mr. Dokmanović had been given the assurance which he claims he was given, these would not satisfy the criteria required for a legally binding guarantee of safe conduct".[269]

Although the ICTY in this case decided – arguably incorrectly – not to delve into the true male captus discussion, Scharf notes that if the question of the male captus were to be answered by the ICTY, it could choose – "[w]hile recognizing the appropriateness of the approach of the Human Rights Committee and the European Court of Human Rights[270] for ordinary crimes [emphasis added, ChP]"[271] – "to adopt an 'Eichmann exception', in the case of "universally condemned offenses", under which the issue of the fugitive's abduction should be "decoupled" from his subsequent trial [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[272]

---

[267] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 78: "Given that the Trial Chamber has found that the particular method used to arrest and detain Mr. Dokmanović was justified and legal, we need not decide at this time whether the International Tribunal has the authority to exercise jurisdiction over a defendant illegally obtained from abroad [emphasis in original, ChP]."

[268] Ibid., para. 82.

[269] Ibid., para. 83. See also ibid., para. 84: "Only a Judge or Trial Chamber has the authority to provide a guarantee of safe conduct – this cannot be issued by the OTP or UNTAES. These orders are issued to witnesses in order to secure their testimony. In this case, Mr. Dokmanović was clearly not sought as a witness, but as an accused. The alleged assurances did not specify any temporal or territorial restrictions, nor did they specify the purpose for which they were allegedly issued."

[270] See Scharf 1998, p. 381: "The precedent of the Human Rights Committee and the European Court of Human Rights would (...) suggest that the ICTY should dismiss a case where the defendant has been abducted or lured from a state in contravention of the normal procedures." As has become clear from the previous chapter, although these supervisory bodies normally do not go into the question of jurisdiction and in principle only determine whether a certain act leads to a violation of the human rights instrument in question, certain decisions can indeed be seen as evidence for the idea that jurisdiction should be refused in cases of luring and abduction. However, certain decisions from the European institutions can also be seen as support for the reasoning behind the male captus bene detentus rule, see ns. 388 and 595 of Chapter III.

[271] Scharf 1998, p. 381.

[272] Ibid. Scharf hereby refers to the fact that UNSC Res. 138 of 23 June 1960 did not explicitly require Eichmann's return, which, indeed, may show that the Council took into account the seriousness of the

This study believes that the ICTY should not follow this reasoning[273] as this may lead to a carte blanche for law enforcement officials to do whatever they can to obtain custody over a person charged with international crimes. Although it can be justified that one should, if possible, opt for those remedies which do not jeopardise the trial of the suspect of international crimes, the pre-trial and trial phase should not be decoupled altogether as in that case, even the most extreme male captus situation – for example, a serious abduction orchestrated by the ICTY and involving serious mistreatment – would not jeopardise the consequent trial. That, of course, should not be tolerated. In very serious cases, divestiture of jurisdiction may very well be the only correct remedy, even if the court in question deals with a suspect charged with very serious crimes.[274] If the refusal to exercise jurisdiction is deemed to constitute too harsh a remedy, but it is nevertheless decided that a male captus has occurred which should be remedied, then one may apply other less far-reaching remedies, such as a reduction of the sentence.

Before turning to the next case, it must be pointed out that the Appeals Chamber did not look at this case because "Dokmanović's appeal from this decision was summarily rejected (…) on the ground that the defense argument was "ill-founded in crimes with which Eichmann was charged in approving that the trial in Israel would go ahead, see n. 521 and accompanying text of Chapter III. Note, however, that this Eichmann exception can arguably not be connected with the outcome of the legal process in Israel, see Subsection 3.1 of Chapter V.

---

[273] See also Van der Wilt 2004, p. 280, explaining that the Eichmann exception has a rather unsound legal basis as it is founded on the misconception arising from the fact that one confuses the authority (or obligation) to create universal jurisdiction with the physical enforcement of criminal law (enforcement power). See also n. 163 of Chapter III.

[274] See also Sluiter 2001, p. 153: "I agree with those who believe that the termination of the proceedings and the release of a person indicted should only be the ultimate remedy for violations of the rights of the accused. Such a remedy should not, however, be ruled out altogether on the basis of the male captus bene detentus argument, or on what has been called the "Eichmann" exception. The character and stature of the ICTY as an international tribunal may make the discontinuation of the proceedings an imperative remedy under certain circumstances, in spite of the magnitude of the crimes before it [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." In addition, one can wonder whether there will ever be such a serious case of Eichmann again, a case where many judges, due to the seriousness of Eichmann's charges, would probably continue to exercise jurisdiction, notwithstanding the male captus. (Note that the Israeli judges did not have to found their argument on this basis as male captus bene detentus, to their opinion, was an established rule of law, applicable to anyone.) After all, although suspects of international criminal tribunals may be charged with very serious crimes, it seems doubtful that a person will ever be held co-responsible for the deaths of millions of people again. See in that respect also Mann 1989, p. 414 where he writes about the "decisive" question, which "is not whether jurisdiction exists, but whether jurisdiction should be exercised." He continues: "In order to answer this question one should not think of a case such as Eichmann. This was so extreme, so unique, so horrendous a case that a court which had jurisdiction because the man stood before it could not possibly be expected not to exercise it or even ask whether it should be exercised. The singular character of the crime was such as to render the exercise of jurisdiction a duty, but at the same time should not in any sense be allowed to supply the standard applicable in other cases." Although Mann wrote this article before the ICTY and ICTR were established, one can imagine that Mann would still see the Eichmann case as an exception. Cf. also Michell 1996, p. 423 ("The case concerned crimes of such a unique and grave nature that it would be imprudent to abstract general principles from it [original footnote omitted, ChP].") and Lowenfeld 1990, p. 490: "I have tried throughout the article to stay away from cases that are bigger than law – Adolf Eichmann, for example." See finally Silving 1961, p. 323.

fact and law" [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[275] Sadly, a verdict could not be rendered in this case as Dokmanović hanged himself in his cell almost six months after the above-mentioned Appeals Chamber's rejection.[276]

3.1.2 Todorović

The second case to be addressed here is the rather mysterious case of Todorović. The initial indictment against the Bosnian Serb Stevan Todorović (and his (initially five)[277] co-accused) was confirmed by the ICTY on 21 July 1995, the day on which a warrant for his arrest was also issued.[278] Todorović was indicted for grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions, violations of the laws or customs of war and crimes against humanity, "all relating to events said to have taken place in the area of Bosanski Šamac, in the north-eastern part of Bosnia and Herzegovina, during the summer of 1992".[279] On 27 September 1998, Todorović was transferred by SFOR to the ICTY. Three days later, at his initial appearance before the ICTY, he "stated that he did not feel well because he had received a heavy blow from a baseball bat over his head 'during the kidnapping'".[280] What had happened here? Most probably, the exact details of Todorović's deprivation of liberty will stay a mystery for ever. In the words of Sloan:

> According to Todorović's version of events, as well as various media reports, on the night of 27 September 1998, four armed, masked men burst into Todorović's home in Zlatibor in western Serbia, gagged, blindfolded, and beat him with a baseball bat, then proceeded to smuggle him out of the country and into Bosnia and Herzegovina. Within a few minutes of Todorović's arrival in Bosnia and Herzegovina, a helicopter arrived to take him to the base of the NATO-led Stabilization Force (SFOR) at Tusla.

---

[275] Scharf 1998, p. 371.
[276] See ibid., p. 371.
[277] Todorović's five co-accused were Blagoje Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Simo Zarić, Milan Simić and Slobodan Miljković. The indictment against the latter suspect was withdrawn as a result of his death on 7 August 1998.
[278] See ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Stevan Todorović, 'Sentencing Judgement', Case No. IT-95-9/1-S, 31 July 2001, para. 1.
[279] Ibid.
[280] Ph. Vallières-Roland, 'Prosecuting War Criminals: A Critique of the Relationship between NATO and the International Criminal Courts', Centre for European Security and Disarmament (CESD) – Briefing Paper, February 2002, available at http://www.isis-europe.org/pdf/2008_artrel_87_2002_archives_59_paper.natoandiccs.pdf, p. 3 (referring to "Prosecutor v. Stevan Todorovi[ć], 'Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorovi[ć] and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment', 10 February 1999, Case [N]o. IT-95-9-PT").

Depending on which newspaper accounts (if any) are believed, those involved in his capture were either 'bounty hunters'[281] paid from a 'CIA slush fund',[282] or [281] That bounty hunters should be used in the context of the international criminal tribunals is proposed by, for example, Supernor 2001, who argues (at p. 250) that "[t]he UNSC should pass a resolution that provides international bounty hunters with immunity from domestic laws for the forceful acts necessary to arrest an indicted war criminal." See also Kovac 2002 and n. 1174 and accompanying text (with respect to the case of Charles Taylor before the SCSL). However, even though the UNSC may condone a specific international arrest operation to maintain international peace and security (see n. 157 of Chapter III), it is very doubtful that it would also approve a more general immunity for bounty hunters with respect to acts which it has always condemned. One could think here not only of the condemnation in the Eichmann case, but also of UNSC Res. 579 of 18 December 1985 (see also n. 184 of Chapter III): "Considering that the taking of hostages and abductions are offences of grave concern to the international community, having severe adverse consequences for the rights of the victims and for the promotion of friendly relations and co-operation among States, (…) 1. Condemns unequivocally all acts of hostage-taking and abduction; 2. Calls for the immediate safe release of all hostages and abducted persons wherever and by whomever they are being held; 3. Affirms the obligation of all States in whose territory hostages or abducted persons are held urgently to take all appropriate measures to secure their safe release and to prevent the commission of acts of hostage-taking and abduction in the future; (…) 5. Urges the further development of international co-operation among States in devising and adopting effective measures which are in accordance with the rules of international law to facilitate the prevention, prosecution and punishment of all acts of hostage-taking and abduction as manifestations of international terrorism [emphasis in original, ChP]." In addition, even if the UNSC were to grant such immunity, many practical questions remain. For example, how does one regulate the 'quality' of these bounty hunters? How does one prevent the situation that, even if one has publicly stated that such operations can only be executed by professional, private military firms, amateurish fanatics – longing for the financial award – enter a foreign territory and create an international mess by, for example, killing the suspect in their effort of apprehending him? (See for the problems related to assassinations Scharf 2000, pp. 974-975: "While assassination may achieve a sense of "accountability," it is inconsistent with several of the other goals of international criminal justice, namely achieving truth telling, deterrence, and reconciliation. Without a living defendant, there can be no presentation of evidence at trial, and therefore no production of a historical record. Far from deterring acts of violence, assassination is likely to lead to escalated violence in revenge." Of course, a suspect may also be killed during the course of an arrest operation by international forces (see, for example, the cases of Simo Drljača, Dragan Gagović and Janko Janjić, see Harmon and Gaynor 2004, p. 410, n. 21), but one can assume that this risk will become far greater if amateurish individuals join the 'arrest' efforts because the UNSC, in a way, provides them this possibility.) Moreover, what would the consequences of such an event be for the (nationals of the) State of residence of these individuals? See for criticism also Kalinauskas 2002, p. 404: "One potential problem with this practice is that it could result in legal liability on the part of Western governments for the consequences of bounty hunters' actions. Furthermore, as a policy matter, it is unclear whether encouraging abductions for profit is an acceptable method of achieving the goals of international justice, peace, and stability in Bosnia [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally also Van der Wilt 2004, p. 295, arguing that the use of private bounty hunters is not to be recommended at all for the State's monopoly on violence must be spared as much as possible.

[282] On the DPI (Division of Public Information) site of UNMIK, one can find a news item from Reuters, dated 22 August 2000, where one can read that "[a] Serbian regional court charged seven men on Tuesday with terrorism, accusing them of abducting a war crimes suspect indicted by the United Nations from Serbia in 1998 and handing him over to NATO troops. (…) The court in Serbia's central town of Uzice named the accused as Ignjatije Popovic, Djordje Maksimovic, Djura Dragovic, Zivko Abasevic, Rodoje Erakovic, Branko Zivkovic and Milan Popovic. (…) On Tuesday, the Uzice court charged two more people, also belonging to the group accused of kidnapping Todorovic, Dragan Zivkovic and Nebojsa Suvajdzic, with illegal possession of firearms and ammunition and theft, [independent Yugoslav news agency] Beta said." (See http://www.unmikonline.org/press/wire/im2308pm.html.) A > members of the British SAS and/or elite Delta units from the United States. According to one account, his captors had offered to let him go in return for the equivalent of £13,000. While some of these reports seem far-fetched and elements may be unfounded, because of the wall of secrecy erected by SFOR and strenuously defended by the OTP, untested allegations and unconfirmed press reports are all we have to inform us of what actually happened on the night of 27 September 1998 [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[283]

In any event, Todorović started to file numerous motions challenging the legality of his arrest and seeking his release and return to the FRY.[284]

The first motion[285] was filed on 10 February 1999 through which Todorović's Defence requested five things, one of them being an evidentiary hearing as to the circumstances of his arrest, detention and delivery to the Tribunal.[286] The Trial Chamber noted that Todorović alleged that he was illegally kidnapped by four unknown individuals in the FRY and that this point also raised the issue of the Prosecution's involvement in the kidnapping.[287] However, even if the Prosecution few months later, The New York Times reported, again referring to Beta, that "[a] Serbian regional court found nine men guilty today of kidnapping a war crimes suspect in Serbia who was later handed over to NATO peacekeepers in Bosnia". See '9 Convicted in Kidnap of War-Crimes Suspect', The New York Times, 12 December 2000, available at: http://www.nytimes.com/2000/12/12/world/9-convicted-in-kidnap-of-war-crimes-suspect.html?n=Top/Reference/Times%20Topics/Subjects/K/Kidnapping. This information was confirmed by the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights in Serbia's report Annual Report 2000, Human Rights in Serbia 2000 (available at: http://www.helsinki.org.rs/reports_t10.html), in which one can read (under 'IV: International Humanitarian Law'): "Trial of 9 persons involved in abduction of Stevan Todorovic began in the Uzice District Court on 5 December 2000. According to the indictment in the early morning hours of 27 September 1998 they abducted Stevan Todorovic in Zlatibor village Rudine for a 50,000 dollar award and handed him over to the SFOR soldiers. (…) Trial Chamber of the Uzice District Court on 11 December 2000 sentenced the accused to a total of 45 years in prison. (…) For the said abduction Ignjatije Popovic (at large) was sentenced to 7 years in prison, Milan Popovic to 7 years, D[j]ordje Maksimovic to 6 years, Zivko Odabasic [the Reuters news item, see this footnote, speaks of Zivko Abasevic, ChP] to 8 years and 6 months in prison, Radoje Herakovic [the Reuters news item, see this footnote, speaks of Rodoje Erakovic, ChP] to 4 years and 11 months, Branko Zivkovic to 6 years, D[j]ura Dragovic to 4 years and 7 months (assistance in abduction), Dragan Zivkovic to 18 months (for hiding a stolen Todorovic's car) and Nebojsa Suvajdzic to 6 months in prison (illegal possession of Todorovic's pistol)."

---

[283] Sloan 2003 A, p. 86.

[284] See ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Stevan Todorović, 'Sentencing Judgement', Case No. IT-95-9/1-S, 31 July 2001, para. 2.

[285] This motion was entitled 'Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorovi[ć] and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment' and was supplemented by a 'Memorandum of Law in Further Support for an Evidentiary Hearing as to Abduction and Detention of Accused Todorovi[ć]'. See ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision Stating Reasons for Trial Chamber's Order of 4 March 1999 on Defence Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on the Arrest of the Accused Todorović', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 25 March 1999, p. 2.

[286] See ibid. Next to this, it was also requested (see ibid.): "(2) that the accused be allowed to give evidence on this issue, (3) a discovery order directed to the Prosecution to make available to the Defence all documents in its possession as to the manner of, and individuals responsible for, the detention, arrest and delivery of the accused to the Tribunal, (4) that the accused be returned to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ("FRY") and (5) that the indictment against him be dismissed".

[287] See ibid.

had not been involved in his abduction, Todorović argued, he had still been illegally brought into the power of the ICTY.[288] Conversely, the Prosecution contended, among other things, that Todorović's right to liberty and security was not violated and that > it was not involved in any activity relating to the accused's removal from the FRY, that it did not have prior information of any proposed operation to secure the arrest of the accused, and that it first learned of the accused's arrest on 27 September 1998 when it was contacted by SFOR (…).[289]

The Trial Chamber was not impressed by Todorović's arguments either and orally rejected his motion on 4 March 1999, issuing the reasons for this rejection in its decision of 25 March 1999.[290] In that decision, the Chamber considered that Todorović's motion "is only supported by a report posted by a private individual on an e-mail bulletin board based on an alleged newspaper report"[291] and hence, that it "does not contain sufficient factual and legal material, and in particular does not provide a statement as to the factual circumstances of his arrest, to warrant an evidentiary hearing".[292]

Todorović subsequently filed a motion for leave to appeal this decision,[293] which was granted by a bench of three judges of the Appeals Chamber.[294] The Appeals Chamber stressed that > the issue before the Trial Chamber was not whether there was a kidnapping and, if so, what were its legal effects, but whether or not, as stated by the Trial Chamber in its decision of 25 March 1999, to grant the Accused's request for an evidentiary hearing as to the alleged kidnapping of the Accused[.] [295]

According to the Appeals Chamber, the Trial Chamber, in denying Todorović's motion, had not abused its discretion.[296] As a result, the Appeals Chamber noted that

---

[288] See ibid., p. 3.
[289] Ibid.
[290] See ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision Stating Reasons for Trial Chamber's Order of 4 March 1999 on Defence Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on the Arrest of the Accused Todorović', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 25 March 1999.
[291] Ibid., p. 3.
[292] Ibid.
[293] This motion (of 25 May 1999) was entitled 'Accused Stevan Todorovi[ć]'s Motion for Leave to Appeal From a Certain Oral Order Dated March 4, 1999 and a Decision Dated March 25, 1999 which Denied Motion for an Evidentiary Hearing on Abduction and Kidnapping and Thereafter for Leave to File a Motion to Repatriate the Accused to the Country of Refuge', see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision on Appeal by Stevan Todorović Against the Oral Decision of 4 March 1999 and the Written Decision of 25 March 1999 of Trial Chamber III', Case No. IT-95-9-AR73.2, 13 October 1999, p. 2.
[294] This decision (of 1 July 1999) was entitled 'Decision on Application by Stevan Todorović for Leave to Appeal Against the Oral Decision of Trial Chamber III of 4 March 1999', see ibid.
[295] Ibid.
[296] See ibid., p. 3.

"no ground appears on which the Appeals Chamber may intervene in respect of the Trial Chamber's finding"[297] and dismissed the appeal.[298]

Todorović, however, did not give up. Eight days after the dismissal of his appeal, he filed a 'Notice of motion for an order directing the Prosecutor to forthwith return the accused Stevan Todorovi[ć] to the country of refuge', to which he attached a statement clarifying what he believed had happened to him – now more than a year ago. Sloan explains: "Here again he based his request for relief on an assertion that his arrest was illegal, arguing that it was in violation of state sovereignty and contrary to customary international law [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[299] Furthermore, another (habeas corpus) motion was filed three weeks later, on 15 November 1999.

This time, Todorović had more success; on 23 November 1999, the Trial Chamber issued an oral decision "in which it found that Todorović's statement 'was a new circumstance such that it justified ordering an evidentiary hearing on the legality of the arrest and detention of the Accused' [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[300]

The day after, Todorović filed a new motion, > seeking an Order from the Trial Chamber requesting the assistance of the Stabilisation Force ("SFOR"), or other military and security forces operating on the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina, to provide documents and witnesses to the Defence in connection with the transfer of the accused from his residence in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) to the Tuzla Air Force base in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the arrest of the accused, all alleged to have occurred between 26 and 28 September 1998, for use in the evidentiary hearings as to the legality of that arrest now before the Trial Chamber.[301]

The Prosecution filed its response, arguing that the motion and the related proceedings were "nothing more than a legalistic 'fishing expedition'".[302] Nevertheless, the Trial Chamber, after a request from the Defence for the Prosecution to provide similar material, ordered the Prosecution to provide material

---

[297] Ibid., p. 3.
[298] See ibid. After this decision, the Trial Chamber also dismissed other motions filed by Todorović on 21 and 22 September 1999, which sought "orders from the Trial Chamber for the production of documents and witnesses by the Ministry of the FRY and by SFOR [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Sloan 2003 A, p. 89.) (Todorović had filed these motions because "[h]e claimed that these materials would be necessary for the evidentiary hearing that would result if he was successful in his then pending appeal [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.) Since his appeal was dismissed on 13 October 1999, these motions had become insignificant.) [299] Sloan 2003 A, p. 90.
[300] Ibid.
[301] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 1.
[302] Ibid., para. 2.

on what had happened to Todorović.[303] After an unsuccessful appeal against this order, the Prosecution disclosed some information, but very little.[304] At the same time, Todorović, who was ordered by the Trial Chamber to try to obtain information from SFOR,[305] was told by the latter that "[i]t is the position of SFOR that the ICTY has no authority to order SFOR to disclose any information."[306] At this instance, the Trial Chamber itself came in action: it "ordered that the Motion be served on SFOR".[307] After SFOR was granted time to prepare its case,[308] it filed a written response on 10 July 2000, followed by new filings from the Defence and the Prosecution.[309] In one of these filings, the Defence specified for the first time that the relief it sought (related to these proceedings) also included a request for judicial assistance directed to the US.[310] Finally, a hearing on the motion was held on 25 July 2000 (at which SFOR failed to show up, incidentally).[311]

The Defence's main argument before this hearing was "that it is entitled to seek assistance in the production of evidence relating to the facts and circumstances of the detention and alleged arrest of the accused".[312] The relief sought was far-reaching, namely:

> (i) an order and subpoena duces tecum directed to the Commanding General of SFOR (…)[313]; (ii) a subpoena ad testificandum directed to the Commanding General Tuzla Air Force base, General Shinseki, and to the SFOR personnel involved in the seizure,

[303] See ibid., para. 3. In more detail, the Prosecution was ordered "to provide copies of relevant reports and other material, including disclosure of the identity of various individuals involved in the transportation to and arrest of the accused at the Tuzla Air Force base." (Ibid.)
[304] See ibid., para. 4. In fact, it "provided only a one-page report about the arrest of the accused, prepared by the investigator who effected the arrest on 27 September 1998, Mr. Ole Brøndum. The Prosecution asserted that, apart from this report, it had none of the designated material within its custody and control." (Ibid.)
[305] See ibid.
[306] Ibid., para. 5.
[307] Ibid., para. 6.
[308] See ibid., paras. 6-7.
[309] See ibid., para. 7.
[310] See ibid., para. 7.
[311] See ibid., para. 8.
[312] Ibid., para. 9. In particular, it sought: "(a) attendance of the individual or individuals who transported the accused by helicopter to the Tuzla Air Force base; (b) attendance of the individual who placed the accused under arrest and served the arrest warrant; (c) production of the audio and video tapes made on 27 September 1998 of the initial detention and arrest of the accused at the Tuzla Air Force base; (d) SFOR pre- and post-arrest operations reports relating to the arrest and detention of the accused." (Ibid.)
[313] Namely to produce: "(a) all pre- and post-arrest operational reports relating to the seizure, abduction and arrest of the accused, including orders as to the movement of personnel; (b) orders, approvals and logs for the movement of vehicles including helicopters used in such operations; (c) pre- and post-operation field, operational, movement and headquarters reports, notes, action reports and memoranda relating to the seizure, abduction and arrest of the accused; (d) audio and video tapes of the seizure, abduction and arrest of the accused; (e) orders authorising payment and proof of payment to SFOR personnel and to third parties; (f) names, rank and serial numbers of SFOR personnel involved in the seizure, abduction and arrest of the accused; and (g) names and last known addresses of non-SFOR personnel actually involved in the seizure, abduction and arrest of the accused". (Ibid., para. 10.)

> abduction and arrest of the accused; and (iii) a request for judicial assistance directed to the United States of America for the same materials.[314]

To support its claims, the Defence argued "that individuals serving with SFOR are amenable to compulsory attendance"[315] and that the involvement of SFOR in the abduction was shown by the fact that the helicopter which brought him to the SFOR base in Tuzla arrived minutes after he and his kidnappers arrived in Bosnia and Herzegovina.[316] Finally, the Defence maintained – and this also relates to the point already discussed at footnote 65 and accompanying text, namely if, and if so to what extent, SFOR must cooperate with the ICTY – that > even if SFOR itself is not subject to the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal, the individual member States remain liable and obligated to fulfil all of the obligations undertaken as members of the United Nations and thus to cooperate with the International Tribunal.[317]

The Prosecution and SFOR, however, did not agree with all this.

They first argued, in essence: "(a) the Motion does not establish any prima facie basis for judicial enquiry; (b) even if any irregularity in the circumstances of the arrest did exist, it would not justify the relief sought."[318] It is clear that the latter argument "comes close to adopting the male captus bene detentus principle".[319] Because this point goes to the core of this book's subject, it will now be examined in more detail.[320]

---

[314] Ibid.
[315] Ibid., para. 11.
[316] See ibid. One could argue, by the way, assuming for now that this story is accurate, that the sole fact that a helicopter picked him up from a group of kidnappers and brought him to the SFOR base (whether this happened within a few minutes after Todorović's arrival in Bosnia and Herzegovina or not) strongly points to at least some SFOR involvement in the operation.
[317] Ibid., para. 13.
[318] Ibid., para. 14.
[319] Sluiter 2003 A, p. 287.
[320] As the summary of the Prosecution's arguments in the Trial Chamber's decision of 18 October 2000 (see the end of this footnote) does not really go into this matter in detail, use has been made of a specific document from the Prosecution itself (ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999), including Sloan's article on the Todorović case (Sloan 2003 A). For the summary of the Prosecutor's arguments in the Trial Chamber's decision of 18 October 2000, see ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, paras. 15-17. In these paragraphs, the Chamber noted that the Prosecution argued, among other things, "that "some international laws are not binding on certain international institutions"" (ibid., para. 15), "that the territorial jurisdiction of the International Tribunal extends throughout the territory of the former Yugoslavia, and so there is no basis to assert any breach of sovereignty" (ibid., para. 15) and that "no credible evidence has been put forward to indicate that members of the Office of the Prosecutor or of any other institution, including SFOR, have violated the rights of the accused."

The Prosecution noted that "[t]he accused's Motion appears to proceed from the assumption that if there is any breach of the fundamental rights of an accused in the criminal process, the accused will be entitled to have the indictment dismissed and to be released".[321] However, this was not the case according to the Prosecution:

> Withdrawal of the indictment altogether would be required only in extreme cases, where any continuation of the trial proceedings would in all the circumstances be fundamentally incompatible with the right to a fair trial and the integrity of the justice system.[322]

However, in less serious cases, "other remedies may be available to cure any resulting injustice".[323] It is not hard to agree with this stance as it very much resembles the position taken in this study as well. Thus, it is important, the Prosecution continued, "to identify exactly which rights of the accused are said to

---

(Ibid., para. 16.) The Prosecution also explained "that arrest operations conducted by SFOR "clearly involve serious security and other risks to the States concerned, including risks to the lives of personnel involved. The desire of the States and forces concerned to maintain the strictest confidentiality in respect of the operational details of these activities is readily understandable" [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 17.)

[321] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999, para. 27.

[322] Ibid., para. 28. See also Lamb 2000, pp. 241 and 243: "[W]ithdrawal of the indictment altogether and the release of the accused would be required only in extreme cases, where any continuation of the trial proceedings would in all the circumstances be fundamentally incompatible with the right to a fair trial and the integrity of the judicial process. (…) [I]n most cases, the extreme remedy of release of a person indicted for the commission of serious violations of international humanitarian law will not be seen to comport with justice. Nevertheless, the release of the accused must, in extremis, remain as the ultimate remedy on the grounds that it constitutes the strongest deterrent and sanction against the abuse of power by law enforcement personnel and serves as a remedy of last resort in those truly exceptional circumstances where the divestiture of its jurisdiction is thought by the Tribunal to be necessary to safeguard the integrity of the conduct of international criminal justice [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[323] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999, para. 27. The Prosecution hereby referred, as a hypothetical example, to "the case of an accused in a national legal system charged with a serious crime such as murder [it is interesting to note that the Prosecution, not very surprisingly, deems the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged to constitute an important element to take into account here, ChP], who is illegally beaten by police during arrest or during pre-trial detention. International human rights norms would not necessarily require that the prosecution of the accused for murder be terminated in such a case. International norms may require that the accused have an appropriate legal remedy in respect of the unlawful beating (for instance, a civil action for damages). By virtue of the right to a fair trial, the accused may also be entitled to claim other remedies in the trial process (for instance, exclusion from the trial of evidence of anything said by the accused to the police following the beatings) [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 28.)

have been violated".[324] However, the problem in this case, the Prosecution complained, is that

> [t]he accused's Motion does not specify precisely which rights of the accused are alleged to have been violated in this instance, other than "the right not to be illegally kidnapped or illegally abducted". Nor does the accused's Motion specify the particular law which rendered the "abduction" illegal.[325]

The Prosecution therefore assumed that the claimed illegality in this case was "the alleged violation of the sovereignty of the FRY under international law, and/or an alleged violation of the municipal law of the FRY".[326]

The main question to be answered in this case would thus be "whether such illegalities in the accused's forcible removal from the FRY would require that the indictment against the accused be dismissed, and that the accused be released from custody".[327]

The Prosecution first noted that there were a number of cases and doctrinal support for the male captus bene detentus view[328] but that it "does not need to rely on these authorities, and does not seek to do so".[329] This was because, as will also

---

[324] Ibid. It can be argued that this is indeed the route one should follow. As the Prosecution arguably did not follow this avenue itself, is is rather strange that the Prosecution now defends this position. See also Sloan's comment (Sloan 2003 A, p. 99, n. 101) that "[a]n argument that in order to determine the suitability of the accused's proposed remedy the potential fairness of the trial must be considered 'in all the circumstances' with a careful examination of 'exactly which rights of the accused are said to have been violated', is not easily reconciled with the OTP's earlier argument that disclosure from SFOR on the facts surrounding Todorović's arrest was unnecessary, as the matter could be decided on the limited facts available."

[325] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999, para. 29.

[326] Ibid.

[327] Ibid., para. 30. The Prosecution hereby noted that this point had not been examined yet by a Trial Chamber as in Dokmanović, the Trial Chamber decided that there was no male captus in the first place, see ibid. See also n. 267.

[328] See ibid., para. 31, ns. 9-10. The Prosecution hereby referred, among other things, to the Eichmann and Alvarez-Machain cases and to handbooks such as Brownlie's Principles of Public International Law (1998, p. 320) and Shaw's International Law (1997, p. 478). Sloan (2003 A, p. 101) notes that "[i]n its pleadings, the OTP led by arguing in favour of the male captus bene detentus principle" but that it, "despite this ostensible confidence in the male captus bene detentus principle in international law, (…) carefully avoided going down a path that would have required it to champion the principle [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)

[329] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999, para. 31. It may be interesting to note that the Prosecution, looking at the more specific context of the ICTY, had already earlier (see ibid., para. 26) noted "that there is some doctrinal support [the Prosecution here refers to Scharf 1998, pp. 376-379, see also n. 265, ChP] for the proposition that a person indicted by the become clear in the following pages, the Prosecution was of the opinion that there was no male captus in the first place, or at least no male captus so serious (for example, because it could be attributed to the Tribunal) as to lead to a male detentus outcome: the refusal of jurisdiction. Hence, even if the ICTY were in favour of the male captus male detentus reasoning, this would, according to the Prosecution, not lead to a refusal of jurisdiction in this case because there was no male captus at all, or no male captus so serious that a refusal of jurisdiction would be justified.

It then turned to case law which can (more or less) be connected to the male captus male detentus reasoning, to cases where it was affirmed "that a court should decline to exercise criminal jurisdiction over an accused who has been brought within the jurisdiction of the court by means of an irregular rendition [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[330]

However, the Prosecution argued that this last category of cases could not be relied upon because "the basis of the reasoning in these cases affords no valid analogy to the situation under consideration by this Trial Chamber in the present case".[331] The reasons for this assertion in Todorović's case, the Prosecution argued, were threefold: 1) there was no circumvention of an extradition treaty, 2) his alleged male captus was not executed by the authorities of the now prosecuting forum and 3) his right to liberty and security was not violated.[332]

To start with the first reason, the Prosecution explained that "the decisions in some of these cases were premised on the fact that the removal of the accused from the other State involved a circumvention of applicable extradition procedures [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[333] but that in the context of the ICTY, "there are no extradition arrangements, or analogous arrangements, between the Tribunal and the FRY [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[334]

Tribunal may be forcibly arrested by agents of one State in the territory of another State, without the latter State's consent [original footnote omitted, ChP]." However, also here, the Prosecution stated that "this is not a matter that needs to be determined in the present proceedings." (Ibid.)

[330] Ibid., para. 33. Here, the Prosecution (ibid., para. 33, n. 13) referred to Hartley, Ebrahim, Bennett, Toscanino, Stocké, Cañón García and Celiberti de Casariego.

[331] Ibid., para. 33.

[332] See Sloan 2003 A, p. 102.

[333] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999, para. 34.

[334] Ibid. Cf. also Lamb 2000, p. 210, n. 150: "While certain cases decided by national courts have affirmed that a court should decline to exercise criminal jurisdiction over an accused who has been brought within the jurisdiction of a court by means of an irregular rendition, these cases generally do not afford a valid analogy to Tribunal arrests, on the grounds that such decisions were premised on the fact that the removal of the accused from the other State involved a circumvention of applicable extradition procedures. However, the regime of extradition is patently inapplicable to the case of the Tribunal". See also ibid., pp. 232-233.

This point was already discussed (and criticised) in the previous Dokmanović case and will therefore not be addressed here, except that it is worth mentioning that Sloan was not impressed by this reason either.[335]

With respect to the second reason, the Prosecution argued that it had "no involvement in any activity relating to the accused's removal from the FRY",[336] whereas some of the national cases were based on the fact that authorities from the prosecuting State were involved in the alleged male captus.[337] The Prosecution also noted that "[t]he conduct of States, and multi-State entities such as NATO and SFOR, cannot be imputed to the Prosecutor, when the Prosecutor was not involved in that conduct. They are not agencies of the Tribunal, and should not be treated as if they were."[338]

It has become clear from the examination of the inter-State cases in Chapter V of this book that it is indeed true that the participation of authorities of the now prosecuting forum is an important factor for the judges to take into consideration and that the involvement of other parties may indeed lead to another legal outcome.[339] However, one can have one's doubts whether States and entities such as SFOR cannot be seen as a sort of agencies of the Tribunal when they make arrests for the latter. Of course, they are not proper agencies or organs of the ICTY, but the moment they make arrests for the ICTY, they function as its enforcement arm. After all, it has been said earlier that the Tribunals do not have a police force of their own and hence are dependent on others to make arrests and such like. That also means that the moment States and multi-State entities such as SFOR make arrests for the ICTY, they form the latter's temporary police force.[340] This point was also [335] See Sloan 2003 A, pp. 102-103: "[W]hile the reasoning in several of the cases cited was indeed based on the national court's concern at the state's ignoring an established extradition regime (thereby depriving the accused of guarantees afforded by that system), none of the courts held – or implied – that the existence of an extradition treaty was a sine qua non of the determination to refuse jurisdiction. The argument that national courts' reasoning – reflecting as it does a desire to protect the accused from illegal behaviour on the part of state agents, to prevent the abuse of the process of the court, to safeguard the rule of law, and to protect an accused's freedom in society – was contingent on the existence of an extradition regime was not convincingly made by the OTP [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[336] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999, para. 36.

[337] See ibid.

[338] Ibid., para. 39.

[339] See also Sloan 2003 A, p. 103.

[340] See also ibid., p. 104: "[T]he divide between SFOR and the Tribunal does not appear to be as great as the OTP and SFOR have represented it to be. The OTP and SFOR placed great emphasis on their assertion that the OTP alone – and not SFOR – was by analogy to represent the enforcement agents of the prosecuting state in the national cases, with SFOR being treated as analogous to a third party. However, the nature of the relationship between SFOR and the OTP and, more generally, between SFOR and the Tribunal as a whole, calls such an assertion into question. If one is to analogize the circumstances of Todorović's capture with the law of interstate capture, it would surely be more apt to liken SFOR to the role of the enforcement agents of the prosecuting state. They have, after all, been charged with effecting arrests on behalf of the Tribunal. (…) At a minimum, it would appear to be addressed by Judge Robinson in his separate opinion to the 18 October 2000 decision, which will be briefly examined after discussion of this case.

Thus, even if it cannot be said that 'the Tribunal' abducted a person from another State if that abduction was perpetrated by entities such as SFOR (and not by staff from the ICTY itself), the Tribunal should take into account that an abduction has occurred in the context of its case and that this abduction was perpetrated by entities which can, to a certain extent, be connected to the Tribunal. In those cases, it is submitted, remedies for the suspect should still be granted. It may indeed go too far to refuse jurisdiction in such cases (although much will depend on the exact male captus) but then other, lighter remedies may be appropriate.

The third reason that the Prosecution gave for the cases which can more or less be connected to the male captus male detentus reasoning not being applicable here was that some of them "suggest that a forcible abduction by agents of one State in the territory of another, contrary to the domestic claw of the State where the abduction occurs, would be a denial of the accused's right to liberty and security",[341] whereas in the context of the ICTY, "[t]here is no rule that a person indicted by the Tribunal can be arrested only pursuant to the national law of the place where the person is located".[342]

Now, it is, of course, true that a person's arrest and surrender does not necessarily have to be based on the procedures of the State where that person resides. After all, it may very well be that other entities such as SFOR may also have the power to arrest that person. If SFOR, for example, makes the arrest, then, of course, it does not need to follow the procedures which are applicable to national police officials. However, what is arguably important is that, whatever entity makes the arrest, the proper procedures which are applicable to that entity are followed. That means that if the person in question is arrested by national police forces, these forces must follow their own arrest procedures. If, on the other hand, the person is arrested by SFOR, then SFOR does not need to follow those national arrest procedures but must follow its own arrest procedures. As already explained in the context of the Dokmanović case, it is difficult to see those arrest procedures being irrelevant to the person's deprivation of liberty. Hence, if the proper procedures of the national police force or SFOR's own rules are not followed in the arrest, for example, if SFOR abducts a person from a territory where it does not have jurisdiction to make arrests (or has such an abduction executed by third parties), then it is difficult to argue that that person's right to liberty and security has not been fitting to consider SFOR to be a co-enforcement official, alongside the OTP, given that each has a role in the execution of arrest warrants [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

---

[341] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999, para. 40. The words "more or less" have been chosen here as a violation of this right in principle only leads to a 'normal' release and not necessarily to a male detentus outcome.

[342] Ibid.

violated, simply because all the rules of the ICTY have been adhered to. The fact that the ICTY has issued a valid indictment (so that there are grounds for arrest) and an arrest warrant (one of the elements leading to an arrest which can be seen as being in accordance with a procedure), important as they are, say nothing about the question of how the arrest was factually executed on the ground, which is arguably an important, if not, crucial, part of one's right to liberty and security.[343] As earlier explained, although a national judge cannot 'use' a violation of a person's right to liberty and security to refuse the transfer of the suspect to the ICTY and although such a violation does not necessarily have to lead to a refusal to exercise jurisdiction by the ICTY itself,[344] it may very well be appropriate for the ICTY to accord other remedies in such cases. At a certain moment, the Prosecution made the statement that "[g]iven this lawful authority [this is the authority of other States to detain Todorović for transfer to the ICTY, even if they have not received a warrant of [343] See, however, Lamb (2000, p. 228, n. 220), who is of the opinion that "[t]he fact that an arrest may violate the law of the State where the arrest took place is of no consequence, owing to the explicit subordination of national law to the provisions of the ICTY Statute." (See also ibid., p. 240.) See also Sloan 2003 A, p. 105: "[I]f the OTP is to look to jurisprudence setting out the right to liberty and security at the national level and distil the requirement that the deprivation of liberty must comport with the procedural guarantees where this deprivation takes place, surely the apposite question for the Trial Chamber is whether Todorović had been afforded his procedural rights under the international law governing the functioning of the ICTY, not whether he had been afforded his procedural rights under the law of the FRY." Nevertheless, a little later, Sloan also stresses the importance of the regularity of the arrest on the ground (which arguably implies that one should also be able to review whether the arresting entity has complied with its own procedures), see Sloan 2003 A, pp. 105-106: "[The OTP] described issues relating to the procedure surrounding the arrest warrant – including the fact that it had not been issued to the states involved in the detention and had not specifically authorized an arrest in the country to which the accused had fled – as 'immaterial', and appeared content to overlook whether excessive force had been used. In short, the OTP appeared to be asserting that neither the particulars of the arrest warrant nor the nature of the apprehension were relevant to the issue of the right to liberty and security – so long as the indictment was valid. Consideration of the right to liberty and security of person by international bodies both at the European level and the wider international level suggests that the OTP's approach may be overly deferential to the Tribunal [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[344] Again, the remedy in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention is release and not necessarily the refusal of jurisdiction. It can be maintained that judges should indeed only refuse jurisdiction in the most extreme cases and not in cases where it is clear that uncooperative States, executing arrests for the Tribunal, have violated procedures on purpose, even if these violations are rather serious, in an effort to ensure that a person's trial would not continue because of these violations. In that respect, one must agree with the Prosecution that "it could defeat the purposes of justice if every illegality by a State authority, over which the Tribunal has no control, could vitiate a prosecution altogether. Indeed, any such doctrine might potentially encourage certain States, which have hitherto failed to fulfil their obligations of co-operation with the Tribunal, to hand accused persons over to the Tribunal but to ensure that there are serious irregularities in the process. The States concerned could thus claim that they are fulfilling their obligation to co-operate, while at the same time ensuring that the prosecution against the accused cannot proceed." (ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999, para. 51.) See also Lamb 2000, p. 211, n. 154. This concern was also expressed by the Prosecutor in the still-to-discuss Nikolić case, see n. 476.

arrest, ChP], the arrest of the accused by States who were not the addressees of an arrest warrant cannot be considered arbitrary, or a violation of the accused's right to liberty and security of person".[345] However, this is a rather narrow interpretation of what constitutes a violation of the right to liberty and security.[346] As explained before, the fact that certain actors are allowed to make an arrest does not mean that the arrest itself can be considered legal/non-arbitrary. One should also take into account other elements, such as whether the execution of this specific arrest was non-arbitrary.

Going back to the Trial Chamber's decision of 18 October 2000 itself and the position of SFOR, the judges noted that the NATO force maintained that first, "further disclosure is unnecessary because the accused would not be entitled to the relief sought even if the allegations are proven"[347] and secondly, that "compelling

[345] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999, para. 47. See also ibid., para. 48: "Here, the Tribunal has indicted the accused, and had issued warrants for his arrest. There was lawful authority for his detention by the authorities of any State. (…) Thus, even if the forcible removal of the accused from the FRY as part of his transfer to the Tribunal violated rights of the FRY under international law, it cannot be said to have violated any right of the accused to liberty or security of person [emphasis in original, ChP]." This is arguably also a rather strange claim. If SFOR, or a State would indeed have kidnapped Todorović by entering the sovereignty of the FRY without the latter's consent, one can assume that the normal arrest procedures of SFOR or that State were not followed. After all, they do not have enforcement authority in the FRY. And that in turn leads to a violation of a person's right to liberty and security because the arrest was not executed according to the proper procedures.

[346] See also Sloan 2003 A, pp. 105-106.

[347] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 18. This was because, according to SFOR, "(a) relevant case law does not mandate release of the accused, (b) the accused is not entitled to the remedy of release from custody, and (c) the accused should not be returned to a State which defies its legal obligations to the International Tribunal". (Ibid.) It hereby referred, for example, to the still-to-discuss second Barayagwiza decision, in that that decision supports the idea "that release is not justified where the misconduct is not attributable to the Prosecution" (ibid., para. 19). However, as will be discussed in the examination of that case, one can have one's doubts with respect to that conclusion. In addition, SFOR relied on the already discussed Dokmanović case and stated that this case, "in which an arrest involving deceptive "luring" was held to be lawful, does not support the accused's claim for relief [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.) That assertion is arguably also rather odd as Todorović's case involved an alleged abduction and not a luring operation. See also Sluiter 2003 A, p. 287: "It is (…) a "classical" abduction case". Nevertheless, SFOR also turned more specifically to abduction cases and argued that "[i]n cases addressing the lawfulness of cross-border abductions, some cases uphold a principle that abduction in violation of the law of one State does not divest another of jurisdiction, while others suggest that the courts have a discretion to decline to exercise jurisdiction where the State's own agents have been complicit in the abduction." (ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 18.) However, "SFOR points out that, in the current case, it is the Office of the Prosecutor, not SFOR, that stands analogous to the agents of a prosecuting State [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 19.) This point has already been discussed earlier in the main text: even if SFOR cannot be seen as an agent requirements of operational security preclude further disclosure by SFOR concerning the detention of the accused [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[348]

After presenting the final reaction from the Defence to these arguments,[349] the Chamber looked at the submissions of the parties during the previously mentioned hearing of 25 July 2000[350] and the post-hearing submissions.[351] There is no need to examine all of these here, but one remark by the Defence may nevertheless be interesting to note, namely that the Defence acknowledged that, > if it were successful in challenging the validity of the arrest, and the accused were returned to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), there were two possibilities: either the accused would be returned to the custody of the International Tribunal immediately; or that country would not honour its commitments. However, that issue was "beyond the interests of the International Tribunal and has to be dealt with in a political forum" [original footnote omitted, ChP].[352]

As will also be explained in the 2002 Nikolić case, this reasoning is arguably fallacious: if, for example, employees of the OTP are responsible for a serious male captus, for instance, an abduction which violated the sovereignty of a State, the regular transfer procedures and the human rights of the suspect, the judges will have no option but to refuse jurisdiction and to release the person. That might very well lead to a return of that suspect to his State of residence/the injured State. If that happens, one can wonder why that State would have a renewed obligation to return of the ICTY, this does not mean that irregularities committed by third parties might not lead to remedies or even a dismissal of the case (see also the still to Barayagwiza case). SFOR also argued that an alleged violation of the domestic law of the FRY "does not vest in the accused a right to be released from the custody of the International Tribunal, especially as the accused "deliberately created a situation in which what he would consider a procedurally regular arrest and transfer was impossible" [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 20.) (As explained earlier: even though irregularities in the national arrest procedures may not lead to a refusal from the national judge to surrender the suspect to The Hague, such irregularities do arguably have an effect on the lawfulness of one's deprivation of liberty.) Finally, it stated "that a ruling that the International Tribunal will not exercise jurisdiction over a person apprehended in the territory of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) unless the apprehension is conducted in accordance with its domestic law could have far-reaching consequences for the ability of the International Tribunal to try indictees and would, in effect, afford legal recognition to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) as a sanctuary for war crimes indictees." (Ibid., para. 21.) (As stated, although these national irregularities may be taken into account by the judge reviewing one's deprivation of liberty, the refusal of jurisdiction should only be reserved for the most serious male captus cases. National procedural irregularities will normally not lead to that result.)

---

[348] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 18. See also ibid., para. 22.

[349] See ibid., paras. 23-26.

[350] See ibid., paras. 27-33.

[351] See ibid., paras. 34-36.

[352] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 32.

the suspect to the ICTY. That would make no sense. After all, the Tribunal has stated that it has no jurisdiction to try the case. How can a State have an obligation to return a suspect to a forum which has stated that it can no longer try the suspect? It would be better if the Tribunal made the return conditional, for example, on the State of residence prosecuting the suspect for his alleged crimes itself.[353] The Tribunal must not forget that it also has a responsibility to fight impunity, even if it is of the opinion that the suspect can no longer be tried before its own judges. (This was a correct point of criticism vented against the first Barayagwiza case, which will be discussed in Subsection 3.2.1 of this chapter.) Hence, if it is uncertain whether the suspect will be genuinely prosecuted in the injured State, the judges should transfer the suspect to another jurisdiction which is willing and able to try the suspect and repair the violation of the injured State's sovereignty in another way. [354]

In less serious male captus cases, where the judge has not refused jurisdiction but where he may nevertheless be of the opinion that a violation of, for example, the sovereignty of the FRY strictly speaking demands that the suspect is released and returned to that injured State (see also the discussion of this point in the context of the Dokmanović case), it would be better for the Tribunal not to return the suspect at all. After all, in such a situation, the suspect would be returned to a State which has an immediate obligation to re-transfer the suspect to the ICTY (which is, after all, still capable of trying the suspect). In such a case, the Tribunal could argue that the return has repaired the initial iniuria and that one can restart the trial as if nothing had happened. However, that would constitute an absurd pro forma remedy. Furthermore, one could also argue that it would be rather ridiculous to return a suspect to a State which may not cooperate with the ICTY.[355]

---

[353] It must be noted that such a new national trial would probably not violate the principle ne bis in idem for suspects making male captus claims have normally not been tried on the merits of the case yet in the context of the Tribunal. Cf. also Sluiter 2001, p. 154, n. 29 and accompanying text (writing on the context of the ICTY).

[354] This point was already made at the inter-State context, see Fawcett 1964, pp. 199-200 (see also n. 570 of Chapter III): "[I]t might perhaps be said, in the case of irregular capture and removal for trial of a criminal jure gentium, that the State, from which he is taken, may only demand his reconduction if two conditions are satisfied: that that State is the forum conveniens for his trial, and that it declares an intention to put him on trial. If these conditions are not satisfied, then the State must accept reparation in another form, since otherwise the interest of justice would be defeated." See also n. 381 of the present chapter.

[355] Cf. also the UK submission in the Todorović case where it was argued: "It follows that even if Todorovic were to be released and returned to the FRY, the FRY would be under an absolute obligation immediately to hand him back to the Tribunal. The United Kingdom submits that it would be absurd for the Tribunal to hold that international law required it to release Todorovic and return him to the FRY while also requiring the FRY to hand him straight back to the Tribunal. It would be even more absurd to hold that there was a duty to return him to the FRY if there were any chance that the FRY would not comply with its obligations to the Tribunal." (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simi[ć], Milan Simi[ć], Miroslav Tadi[ć], Stevan Todorovi[ć] and Simo Zari[ć], 'Submissions of the United Kingdom Regarding Review of the Decision of Trial Chamber III, 18 October 2000', Case No. IT-95-9-AR108 bis, 15 November 2000, para. 31.)

Hence, it would arguably be better in such a situation to hold the suspect in the custody of the Tribunal, to continue the case and to accord other remedies for the wrongs which occurred in the context of the case.

The Trial Chamber, after having referred to the relevant legal provisions,[356] first presented the question as to whether the ICTY can issue an order to SFOR pursuant to Article 29 of the ICTY Statute, now that that article in principle speaks only of States.[357]

There is no need to discuss this issue in more detail because it has already been explained supra, see footnote 71 and accompanying text, that the ICTY in this case was of the opinion that a purposive reading of Article 29 of the ICTY Statute indeed allows it to issue such an order.

It then turned to the motion of the Defence, explained what its purpose was[358] and rejected the argument of the Prosecution and SFOR that the motion had to be dismissed because Todorović would not be entitled to the relief sought anyway, even if Todorović's allegations were true.[359]

> This argument proceeds on the assumption that the evidence is complete. That assumption is erroneous, as what Todorović is seeking is further evidence from SFOR which will assist him to obtain the relief which he seeks. Only when Todorović has had the opportunity to present all the available evidence will it be possible for the Trial Chamber to determine whether he is entitled to the relief he seeks.[360]

In the US brief on review of this decision, it was argued, while referring to this – according to the US – "glaringly circular" and "plainly erroneous" reasoning, that > [i]n view of the compelling operational security concerns raised by SFOR, the Trial Chamber erred or abused its discretion in ordering the production of the requested information, when the OTP and SFOR concurred that, in the absence of that information, the accused's assertions of fact could be taken as established for the purposes of his requests for release, and that those requests could then be decided as a matter of law [original footnote omitted, ChP].[361]

---

[356] See ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 37.

[357] See ibid., para. 38.

[358] See ibid., para. 59: "The purpose of the Defence Motion is to secure certain information and documents, which the accused believes to be in the custody and control of SFOR, and which will assist him in his motions challenging the legality of his arrest [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[359] See ibid.

[360] Ibid.

[361] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Brief of the United States of America on Review of Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-AR108*bis*, 15 November 2000, p. 7. See also ibid., p. 8: "If all the accused's allegations can be taken as established, and these allegations still will not support the relief he seeks as a matter of law, then there is no conceivable "further evidence . . . which will assist him to obtain the relief which he seeks." To persist in ordering

Although the US seems to have a point here, one can wonder whether full disclosure of the male captus of Todorović would not lead to an even more serious account than the one alleged by Todorović himself.

This is the point observed by Sloan. He explains that the Chamber "correctly observed that it would only be appropriate to turn to the issue of the suitability of the remedy where the evidence was complete [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[362] because

> [e]ven if Todorović's allegations were accepted 'at their highest' by the OTP and SFOR for the purposes of the motions – something which was by no means clear[363] – he was, nevertheless, not in a position to make fuller or further allegations without having the requested disclosure. Without the full story of what happened surrounding his arrest (information presumably possessed by SFOR and its contributing states, and, perhaps, the OTP), Todorović was disadvantaged; he was only in a position to make allegations relating to conduct of which he had first-hand knowledge. There was nothing to say that disclosure of the full story of his arrest would not show treatment that was significantly worse than he had alleged [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[364]

The Trial Chamber also looked at the argument by SFOR that requirements of operational security do not allow further disclosure of what happened to Todorović but this "blanket objection"[365] was not accepted by the Chamber either.[366] As a result, the Chamber found > that it has been adequately demonstrated that there is material in the custody or control of SFOR which is likely to assist Todorović in obtaining the relief he seeks, and that there is a legitimate forensic purpose in having it produced. The Trial Chamber is also satisfied that, as the Prosecution has not been able to produce copies the production of such "further evidence," in the face of SFOR's well-founded security concerns, is futile, erroneous, and an abuse of discretion." See for this brief also Murphy 2001.

---

[362] Sloan 2003 A, p. 98.

[363] Sloan (ibid., pp. 97-98, n. 95) notes here that "[t]he OTP's assertion that it was willing to assume Todorović's allegations to be true, and to take them 'at their highest' was quite misleading. Instead of taking his allegations at their highest, the OTP referred to a carefully drawn list of facts that it was willing to admit for the purposes of the motions and made no concessions additional to these (…). Important omissions from the OTP's list included the accused's allegations of collusion between the OTP and SFOR, as well as allegations that the accused was beaten by the forces that captured him."

[364] Ibid., pp. 97-98. At the end of this quotation, Sloan (ibid., p. 98, n. 96) explains that "[i]t might, for example, have come to light upon full disclosure of the facts that there was an extreme disregard of national or international law by SFOR of an even more egregious nature than that alleged by the accused, or that there had been collusion between the OTP and SFOR."

[365] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 60.

[366] SFOR could have chosen "to make specific objections to the disclosure of particular documents or other material at the hearing (…) but (…) chose not to do so." (Ibid.)

> of the material, it is appropriate that SFOR now be required to disclose that material.[367]

In conclusion, the Trial Chamber granted the motion of the Defence and ordered "what to some was the unthinkable",[368] namely that SFOR, its responsible authority (the North Atlantic Council) and all the participating States in SFOR (including the US) disclose all the relevant material concerning the arrest and detention of Todorović to the Defence.[369] In addition to this, it also noted that "[a] subpoena shall be issued in due course to General Shinseki requiring him to provide evidence in the ongoing evidentiary hearing in this matter at a date and time to be specified".[370]

In his separate opinion to this case, Judge Robinson, also referring to the still-to-discuss Barayagwiza case,[371] underscored the importance of a person's right to challenge the legality of his arrest, including its remedy of release.[372] Even though this right is not explicitly mentioned in the ICTY Statute, it can be found in all the major human rights instruments, has customary international law status[373] and can without a doubt be seen as "one of the "internationally recognised standards regarding the rights of the accused" which the Secretary-General indicates that the Tribunal must "fully respect"".[374] He argued that > a judicial body, whether domestic or international, (…) must be in a position to require the arresting authority[375] to provide material relevant to an arrest; failing

[367] Ibid., para. 61.
[368] Sloan 2003 A, p. 91.
[369] See ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, disposition.
[370] Ibid.
[371] See ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Separate Opinion of Judge Robinson', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 3.
[372] See ibid.
[373] See ibid., para. 2.
[374] Ibid., para. 3. See also n. 130 and accompanying text. See further Zappalà 2002 A, p. 1195, n. 27.
[375] As clarified earlier (see the text following n. 340 and accompanying text), Robinson also looked at the relationship between the ICTY and SFOR and concluded that the "extension of SFOR's function gives SFOR a role comparable to that of a police force in some domestic legal systems, and creates, as between itself and the Tribunal, through the Office of the Prosecutor, a relationship of which the analogue in such systems is the relationship between the police force, the prosecuting authority and the courts. This quasi police function of SFOR, whereby it virtually operates as an enforcement arm of the Tribunal, clearly impacts on the work of the Tribunal in the discharge of its fundamental purpose to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law. (…) There is clearly a strong functional, although not organic, relationship between SFOR and the Tribunal, through one of its organs, the Office of the Prosecutor." (ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Separate Opinion of Judge Robinson', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 6.) Although it can indeed be argued, as was done supra, that the moment SFOR makes arrests for the ICTY, it functions as the latter's enforcement arm, one must also agree with Sluiter who notes that the ICTY is in principle not in a hierarchically higher position than SFOR. See Sluiter 2003 A, p. 289: "Although one may sympathise with this position [of Robinson, ChP], it is exclusively concerned with the Tribunal's mandate and needs. Of course, it would > such a competence, the right to challenge the legality of one's arrest, which is a right under customary international law, may well be rendered nugatory and without substance.[376]

The decision of the Trial Chamber "caused considerable consternation in NATO",[377] which "hinted that the co-operation with the Tribunal might be brought to a halt if the Appeals Chamber did not review the Trial Chamber's orders".[378] It may also be interesting to refer in that respect to the brief of the US, which qualified the decision as "both erroneous and an abuse of discretion [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[379] Furthermore, in the German request for review, the male captus bene detentus be best if the Tribunal could dispose of all relevant evidence, including that of a privileged nature, like information in the hands of the ICRC. However, Judge Robinson's approach in particular fails to provide legal analysis of the relationship with SFOR, which is, contrary to the relationship between States and the ICTY, not of a hierarchical nature, but rather one between equals, with both having their own Security Council mandate." See also Sluiter's already-mentioned criticism in n. 71. See for a detailed analysis of this issue also Henquet 2003, who concludes (at p. 155) that SFOR is not an agent of the Tribunal "since it appears that the Tribunal does not exercise control over SFOR." However, note that Henquet (at ibid.) is also of the opinion that "the "agency test" seems to have been incorrectly derived from the case law." (See also n. 71.) The US was also of the opinion that SFOR could not be seen as the agent of the Prosecution and hence that, "in the absence of a connection between the OTP and the alleged abduction, the accused's requests for release fail as a matter of law." (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Brief of the United States of America on Review of Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-AR108*bis*, 15 November 2000.) The US hereby referred to the second Barayagwiza decision but as will be shown infra, this decision does not overrule the first Barayagwiza decision with respect to the point that the Tribunal seems to be willing to take its responsibility for violations in the context of its case, irrespective of the entity responsible. Nevertheless, one can assume that the Tribunal will not quickly refuse jurisdiction in case its own people were not responsible for the male captus, even though that point cannot be excluded either.

---

[376] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Separate Opinion of Judge Robinson', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 4. For even stronger words, see ibid., para. 7: "No legal system, whether international or domestic, that is based on the rule of law, can countenance the prospect of a person being deprived of his liberty, while its tribunals or courts remain powerless to require the detaining or arresting authority to produce, in proceedings challenging the legality of the arrest, material relevant to the detention or arrest; in such a situation, legitimate questions may be raised about the independence of those judicial bodies."

[377] Ph. Vallières-Roland, 'Prosecuting War Criminals: A Critique of the Relationship between NATO and the International Criminal Courts', Centre for European Security and Disarmament (CESD) – Briefing Paper, February 2002, available at http://www.isis-europe.org/pdf/2008_artrel_87_2002_archives_59_paper.natoandiccs.pdf, p. 4.

[378] Ibid.

[379] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Brief of the United States of America on Review of Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-AR108*bis*, 15 November 2000, A 99. See also ibid., A 100 – A 99: "Refusing to consider whether the accused's allegations could possibly entitle him to the relief he seeks, the Trial Chamber ordered the production of information that is neither relevant nor necessary to that relief, but whose disclosure – or indeed, even further litigation over such disclosure – has grave potential to damage future detention efforts."

principle was explicitly defended.[380] Finally, the UK authorities submitted that the seriousness of Todorović's alleged crimes had to play a role.[381]

[380] See ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simi[ć], Milan Simi[ć], Miroslav Tadi[ć], Stevan Todorovi[ć] and Simo Zari[ć], 'Request of the Federal Republic of Germany for Review of Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-AR108*bis*, 2 November 2000: "Even a decision departing from the facts as they are put forward by the accused must come to the conclusion that the relief sought by the accused, namely his release, cannot be reached under any legal aspect whatsoever. a) Even if the information which the Tribunals orders to provide proved an illegal nature of his arrest, this would in no way affect the legality of his detention. In other words, even if the accused was "male captus", he is in any case "bene detentus". b) In the sense of the "male captus, bene detentus"-principle, the accused may not invoke a breach of any [sovereignty] in his favor, since all States are obliged to cooperate with the Tribunal and to surrender alleged war criminals by a resolution of the UN-Security-Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter. Furthermore, such a breach of a State sovereignty would not affect the rights of the accused as such. No rule of customary international law provides that in the sense of "male captus, bene detentus" a forced abduction of a hereafter legally detained person would hinder his/her trial before a criminal court or would entail his/her release out of a legally maintained detention." See also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simi[ć], Milan Simi[ć], Miroslav Tadi[ć], Stevan Todorovi[ć] and Simo Zari[ć], 'Request of the Federal Republic of Germany for Review of Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-AR108*bis*, 15 November 2000. As has become clear from the previous chapter, one could argue that this is a rather blunt statement, which does not take into account the fact that the exact nature of the male captus may affect the question whether or not male detentus must/should follow. This point was also confirmed in 2003 by the German Federal Constitutional Court in Al-Moayad.

[381] See ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simi[ć], Milan Simi[ć], Miroslav Tadi[ć], Stevan Todorovi[ć] and Simo Zari[ć], 'Submissions of the United Kingdom Regarding Review of the Decision of Trial Chamber III, 18 October 2000', Case No. IT-95-9-AR108 bis, 15 November 2000, paras. 26-28: "It is not necessary for the Tribunal to resolve the question (on which different views have been expressed) whether a State which has abducted a person from the territory of another State to stand trial in respect of crimes under its own domestic law is required by international law to return that person to the State from which he or she was abducted. The present case is different, because Todorovic is charged with crimes under international law and before an international tribunal. It is not clear that international law requires that in every case where the accused has been abducted or brought before the courts outside normal processes of extradition a State is deprived of jurisdiction in respect of international crimes (see, in particular, the decisions of the French Court of Cassation in Barbie 78 ILR 125, the District Court of Jerusalem and the Supreme Court of Israel in Attorney-General of Israel v. Eichmann 36 ILR 5 (especially pp. 305 et seq.)). In addition, a number of decisions of a more general character have suggested that the nature of the crime charged is a factor to be taken into account (see, in particular, the decision of the House of Lords in R. v. Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, ex parte Bennett [1994] 1 AC 42 and the Court of Appeal in R. v. Mullen [1999] 3 WLR 777). [Note that the examination of these cases in the previous chapter of this book does not always agree with these observations presented by the UK authorities, ChP.] Juristic commentary is also far from unanimous in supporting the existence of a blanket rule requiring restitution of the defendant and denying jurisdiction to the courts of the State to which a person has been abducted (see, e.g. Jennings and Watts, Oppenheim's International Law (9th ed., 1992) vol. I, pp. 388-90 and Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law (5th ed., 1998), p. 320). Moreover, a number of commentators who consider that there is normally a duty of restitution in such a case consider that there are exceptions where the accused is charged with crimes under international law and the State from which he was abducted is not prepared to prosecute him." This point was already earlier discussed (see n. 570 and accompanying text of Chapter III and n. 354 and accompanying text of the present chapter) and it is arguably indeed so that the State of residence should have no right to demand the return of the suspect if it cannot guarantee that it will prosecute the suspect itself (a return is not the same as impunity), but that does not mean that the abducting State could then exercise jurisdiction. It has been argued that if the prosecuting forum itself is

After the Trial Chamber had issued its decision, the Prosecution took a drastic step: even before[382] the decisions of the Appeals Chamber were issued (which rejected the appeals of the Prosecution), it filed a motion containing a plea agreement with Todorović by which 1) the latter would plead guilty to one count and would withdraw all the motions pertaining to his alleged unlawful arrest and 2) the Prosecution would drop the other 26 counts against him.[383] As a result of this, Todorović pleaded guilty to one count and, on 31 July 2001, Trial Chamber III sentenced him to ten years' imprisonment (minus the almost three years Todorović had spent in pre-trial detention).[384] Consequently, the ICTY did not – again – have to look at the real male captus discussion (namely at the question as to the effect of a male captus on the jurisdiction of the court) for the allegation of the male captus was dropped.[385] Nevertheless, as probably has become clear in the previous pages, the male captus issue was discussed in the proceedings leading up to this decision,[386] and furthermore, the case has produced much interesting material which can be connected to the male captus discussion and which will hopefully elucidate the examination of the cases still to be addressed.[387]

When journalists asked Graham Blewitt, Deputy Prosecutor of the ICTY, "what had been sacrificed in the interest of justice to remove the issue of the involvement of SFOR in the arrest of Todorovic, Blewitt replied that absolutely nothing as far as the OTP was concerned had been sacrificed".[388] Blewitt hereby pointed to the fact that "the negotiations leading up to the plea agreement had been ongoing for some months. They stemmed from the desire of the accused to enter this plea of guilty."[389] Nevertheless, he also "recognised that a consequence of this plea removed a particular problem that had been confronting the Tribunal for some months, particularly if the problem had anything to do with the recent lack of apprehensions by SFOR in the last six months".[390] involved in an abduction, it should refuse jurisdiction. The problem of impunity (if the State of residence is not able or willing to prosecute the suspect itself) could then be solved by transferring the suspect to a jurisdiction which is able and willing to prosecute the suspect.

---

[382] This may be explained by the fact that the Prosecution did not have much faith in the outcome of its appeals, see, for example, Sloan 2003 A, p. 92.

[383] See ibid., pp. 92-93.

[384] See ibid., p. 93.

[385] See also Sluiter 2003 A, p. 288.

[386] See, for example, ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999.

[387] Cf. also Sloan 2003 A, p. 85 (abstract).

[388] Summary of the ICTY Weekly Press Briefing, 13 December 2000, available at: http://www.icty.org/sid/3672.

[389] Ibid.

[390] Ibid. See also ibid: "For that reason alone, the OTP saw that today's plea was a significant one and hoped that if there was a log jam being created by the Todorovic proceedings involving SFOR this plea would now remove that log jam."

Although it may indeed be the case that Todorović was interested in making this plea earlier on – that would in any case explain the motion containing the plea agreement being filed even before the decisions of the Appeals Chamber concerning the legality of arrest were issued – it is hard to believe that the Prosecution was really of the opinion that "absolutely nothing" had been sacrificed in this case.[391] Sloan also notes in this respect that, "in view of the gravity and extent of his crimes, it is fair to say that Todorović got off relatively lightly".[392] That may indeed be the case, but Todorović could nevertheless not enjoy the life of a free man for long: on 3 September 2006, he died, a little more than one year after being granted early release.

3.1.3 Milošević

The third alleged male captus case under examination here is the case of Milošević. Almost a year after four Dutch nationals, two Canadian nationals and two British nationals were detained by the Yugoslav authorities on suspicion "of operating on behalf of Western intelligence agencies with instructions to enter its territory and kidnap, among others, Milosevic",[393] the former President of Serbia and the FRY was apprehended on 1 April 2001 for corruption and abuse of power in a more successful operation by Serbian authorities at his home in Belgrade.[394]

Almost two years earlier, on 24 May 1999, an ICTY indictment against Milošević (and four co-accused) had been confirmed for alleged crimes committed [391] See also Cogan (2002, p. 127), who finds the statement of Blewitt "rather unconvincingly". See further Sridhar 2006, p. 362: "The non-cooperation of states could have a potentially crippling effect on the day-to-day operations of the Tribunal, undermining the institution by depriving it of its defendants. As a result, the Prosecutor was likely anxious to strike a deal with Todorovic. The Tribunal, for its part, was likely happy to accept such a plea and be relieved of any duty to examine the matter further."

---

[392] Sloan 2003 A, p. 87. See also ibid., p. 93: "The ultimate result in the case (26 out of 27 of the charges against Todorović being dismissed in return for his renouncing his right to access SFOR information) appears to be a vindication of Todorović's strategy and may be an indication that the OTP's desire to ensure that SFOR did not have to disclose any information relating to the capture of Todorović was its primary concern, surpassing all else, including its desire to ensure the accused did not escape justice [original footnote omitted, ChP]." This could also be discerned from the following document, in which the Prosecution hinted that it might withdraw the whole indictment if necessary, see ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999, para. 53: "Should the Trial Chamber decide in any case that knowledge of such operational facts were necessary to ensure the integrity of a trial (and for the reasons given, that is not the case here), it is submitted that the Prosecution should be given prior notice. This would enable the Prosecution to consider whether in the circumstances it would be in the public interest to apply to withdraw the indictment, rather than to embark upon such an enquiry." (See also Sloan 2003 A, p. 93, n. 70.)

[393] Magliveras 2002, p. 671. This example again shows the importance of addressing the role of (actual?) private individuals in male captus cases, see also the Nikolić case which will be discussed in Subsection 3.1.4.

[394] See ibid., p. 663.

in Kosovo.[395] Three days later, on 27 May 1999, copies of the warrants of arrest were issued.[396]

Now that Milošević was in custody (albeit for other crimes), the pressure from Western States to transfer him to the ICTY began to grow. On 23 June 2001, after efforts to have a law on cooperation with the ICTY passed by the Yugoslav Parliament had failed, Yugoslav President Koštunica adopted a governmental decree with a similar purpose.[397] This decree was subsequently challenged by Milošević's attorneys on legal grounds (in that the decree was unconstitutional) and on procedural grounds.[398] Wedgwood explains what happened then as follows:

> This decree was suspended by the Yugoslav constitutional court on June 28, pending further hearing, and President Kostunica of Yugoslavia stated that he would await the outcome of the court's proceeding. Thereafter, Zoran Djindjic, the prime minister of Serbia, asserted that Serbia had power to nullify the Yugoslav decision, and ordered the transport of Milosevic by helicopter to the Bosnia airbase at Tuzla, where the former president was flown to The Hague.[399]

---

[395] At that time, he was the first head of State in function that was charged by an international criminal tribunal.

[396] It may be interesting to note that these copies were transmitted not only to the FRY, but also to all UN Member States and the Confederation of Switzerland. However, it is important to stress that here, the procedure envisaged by the already discussed (see ns. 85-86 and accompanying text) Rule 61 (D) of the ICTY RPE (the international arrest warrant) was not used; what was used was a broad interpretation of Rule 55 (D) of the ICTY RPE which states that "[s]ubject to any order of a Judge or Chamber, the Registrar may transmit a certified copy of a warrant of arrest to the person or authorities to which it is addressed, including the national authorities of a State in whose territory or under whose jurisdiction the accused resides, or was last known to be, or is believed by the Registrar to be likely to be found." See also ICTY, Judge David Hunt, Prosecutor v Slobodan Milošević, Milan Milutinović, Nikola Šainović, Dragoljub Ojdanić & Vlajko Stojiljković, 'Decision on Review of Indictment and Application for Consequential Orders', Case No. IT-99-37-I, 24 May 1999, paras. 21-22: "21. In the light of the possibility that some or all of the accused may seek refuge outside the territory of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the Prosecutor also seeks an order, pursuant to Rule 55(D), that certified copies of each of the warrants are to be transmitted by the Registrar to all States Members of the United Nations and to the Confederation of Switzerland. 22. Rule 61(D) permits the issue of international arrest warrants to be transmitted to all such States, but only where the arrest warrant issued pursuant to Rule 55 has not been executed within a reasonable time, and such international warrants may be issued only by a Trial Chamber. It is nevertheless argued that the power to transmit certified copies of the arrest warrant pursuant to Rule 55(D) is a wide one, and that it is expressly not limited to transmission only to those national authorities of the States or territories where the accused resides or is believed to reside. In any event, it is argued, the procedure permitted by Rule 55(D) of transmitting certified copies of the original arrest warrant is not the same as the issue of international arrest warrants pursuant to Rule 61(D). Rule 54 permits a judge of the Tribunal to issue such orders as may be necessary for the purposes of the preparation or conduct of the trial. There can be no trial until the accused is arrested. The orders sought would assist in ensuring the arrest of the accused [emphasis in original, ChP]."

[397] See Magliveras 2002, p. 663.

[398] See ibid.

[399] R. Wedgwood, 'Former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic To Be Tried in The Hague for Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Allegedly Committed in Kosovo', ASIL Insights, July 2001 (available at: http://www.asil.org/insigh76.cfm). It may be interesting to note that ICTY OTP investigator Kevin Curtis – a by now hopefully familiar name (see the (alleged) male captus case of Dokmanović) – took part in the transfer of Milošević. See, for example, the following words from

Đjinđić admitted afterwards that the sudden transfer of Milošević was the consequence of great pressure from in particular the US and the EU, which threatened Yugoslavia with a financial boycott if it did not comply with the requests for transfer in this case.[400] That Yugoslav President Koštunica labelled the transfer as illegal may not come as a surprise, but also Magliveras, in his article in the European Journal of International Law, concludes straightforwardly "that the Serbian Government's decision to surrender Milosevic to the ICTY lacked any legal basis"[401] and that "[h]is arrest and detention were clearly illegal".[402]

Milošević himself at p. 672 of the transcripts of the 20 February 2002 session of his case (available at: http://www.icty.org/x/cases/slobodan_milosevic/trans/en/020220IT.htm): "THE ACCUSED: [Interpretation] Well, then I have another thing to say. I heard a name mentioned, Kevin Curtis. If I understood the name correctly, it was Kevin Curtis. Kevin Curtis is an individual who committed a crime, the crime of my unlawful arrest in Belgrade. He was the perpetrator of that." That Curtis was indeed involved in the operation can be found in Carla Del Ponte's memoirs, see Del Ponte 2009, pp. 118-119, where one can read an interesting 'inside' account of Milošević's transfer into the custody of the ICTY: "On the Thursday that was Vidovan in 2001 [28 June 2001, ChP], the Serbian government turned over Slobodan Milošević to face trial. A little after seven in the evening, the Belgrade government made a public announcement that Milošević had been placed in the tribunal's custody. Kevin Curtis, a British police officer and former Olympic-caliber swimmer, was shown to an area behind a government building where three helicopters awaited. After a few minutes, Milošević arrived in a prison van. The sight of the helicopters appears to have alarmed him, as if he did not know that any deals he might have struck with Koštunica no longer held. He raised his arm. He asked the prison warden what was going on. And the warden explained that he would soon be departing for The Hague. Milošević protested. He complained that he did not recognize the tribunal's authority. He said he would not leave. The warden led him toward Curtis, who read Milošević his rights and formally placed him under arrest. Milošević refused to acknowledge or accept any of the paperwork offered to him. A security officer searched Milošević's person. Then the security officer, Curtis, their translator, and Milošević boarded a helicopter that set off toward Bosnia and Herzegovina and the NATO military base outside the city of Tuzla. Against the engine scream and beating chopper blades, Milošević attempted to converse with Curtis in English. Stepping off the aircraft at Tuzla, he asked Curtis to put a handkerchief on the ground so he would not have to set foot on Bosnian soil; and he tried without success to exchange small talk with the soldiers who were guarding him. Sometime after ten o'clock, handcuffed and ordered to remain silent, he boarded a C-130 transport aircraft and flew to Eindhoven, a small airport east of Rotterdam. There he boarded a Dutch helicopter that flew him to a landing pad inside the penitentiary in Scheveningen, where he would reside until his dying day."

[400] See Strijards 2003, pp. 750-751, n. 5 and Magliveras 2002, p. 676. See also Van Sliedregt 2001 A, p. 635, who states that it was the power of money and not the power of justice that made Milošević end up in a prison in Scheveningen, and R. Wedgwood, 'Former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic To Be Tried in The Hague for Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Allegedly Committed in Kosovo', ASIL Insights, July 2001 (available at: http://www.asil.org/insigh76.cfm): "Critics of the decision argued that Serbia was under pressure to act because an international donors' conference was scheduled for June 28 [this must be 29, ChP] to consider $1.2 billion in aid for the reconstruction of Serbia." See finally also 'Milosevic extradition steps closer', CNN, 23 June 2001 (available at: http://www.cnn.com/2001/WORLD/europe/06/23/milosevic.decree/index.html): "An international donors' conference is due to be held next week at which Serbia hopes to raise over one billion dollars in much needed aid. The United States has made clear it will only attend the donors' conference in Brussels on June 29 if it has seen signs of progress in Belgrade's cooperation with the tribunal. A White House spokesman said: "This is a good step in the right direction. We'll be watching to see when he's [extradited]. But this is a potentially positive step.["] "The international community regard his extradition as a moral imperative. It is an oft-stated and important goal.""

[401] Magliveras 2002, p. 667.

[402] Ibid.

In The Hague, Milošević raised his concerns, including those pertaining to his transfer, in two motions (of 9 and 30 August 2001) which were considered by the Trial Chamber in its decision of 8 November 2001.[403]

Paragraphs 35-51 of this decision deal with the argument 'Lack of competence by reason of his unlawful surrender'.

Milošević presented the following grounds as to why his transfer had to be seen as unlawful:

> (a) The International Tribunal sent the arrest warrants to the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, not to the government of the Republic of Serbia. However, it was the latter that transferred the accused to the International Tribunal. That government had no power to act in such a manner.
> (b) The Serbian government had no international obligation to cooperate with the International Tribunal.
> (c) Article 18 of the Federal Constitution does not provide for the extradition or transfer of Yugoslav citizens to an international body.
> (d) In the circumstances set out in (a), (b) and (c) above, his transfer is an abuse of process in that the procedures of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were bypassed and he was unlawfully transferred to the International Tribunal.[404]

The Prosecution countered this by saying that it is a "well-established principle of law that States may not rely on their national legislation to defeat their international obligations"[405] and that the FRY was under an international obligation to cooperate with, and transfer Milošević to, the ICTY.[406]

As already asserted in the Dokmanović case, a suspect could invoke 'real' irregularities related to his national deprivation of liberty and transfer but he cannot invoke an irregularity which originated from a State's failure to cooperate with the Tribunal. Thus, Milošević cannot claim that his transfer was illegal because his national Constitution does not provide for the transfer of nationals to the ICTY.

The Trial Chamber first underscored the importance of a provision to which considerable attention has already been paid in this book: the habeas corpus right of Article 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR. The Chamber noted that this right was not included in the Statute but that, "as one of the fundamental human rights of an accused person under customary international law, it is, nonetheless, applicable, and indeed, has been acted upon by this International Tribunal".[407]

After having made this statement, it turned to the above-mentioned arguments of the Defence and the Prosecution and clarified that

---

[403] See ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Slobodan Milošević, 'Decision on Preliminary Motions', Case No. IT-99-37-PT, 8 November 2001.
[404] Ibid., para. 35.
[405] Ibid., para. 36. See also Section 2 of this chapter.
[406] See ibid.
[407] Ibid., para. 38. The Trial Chamber referred here to the still-to-discuss Barayagwiza case before the ICTR, see ibid., para. 39.

> notwithstanding the fact that the surrender was made by the government of the Republic of Serbia, rather than the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to whom the request was made, the provisions of Rule 58[408] apply and, consequently, the transfer was effected in accordance with the provisions of the Statute.[409]

There is something strange about this reasoning. It is indeed so that Rule 58 of the ICTY RPE stipulates that States may not use (problems in) their national law to refuse cooperation with the ICTY but that is, it is submitted, something quite different from the question as to whether the transfer was executed procedurally correctly and whether the suspect can invoke the fact of his unlawful transfer (if that is the case). However, the Chamber clarified this point when it subsequently noted the relevance of Article 27 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which provides that "a party may not invoke the provisions of its internal law as justification for its failure to perform a treaty". It explained:

> The Statute of the International Tribunal is interpreted as a treaty. The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia has an obligation under the Statute to comply with the request to arrest and transfer the accused and, therefore, cannot rely on its internal law, namely the division of power as between the federal government and its States as a justification for failure to comply. Although it is the accused, and not the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia that is seeking to rely on the internal constitutional system of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, it follows that if the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia itself cannot rely on internal laws, then, a fortiori, neither can the accused. Accordingly, this ground is dismissed.[410]

This can be accepted: it may indeed be the case that the transfer was made by the Government of the Republic of Serbia, rather than the FRY to whom the request was sent, but this irregularity originates from the fact that the FRY had apparently not clearly regulated how this State (including its constituent parts) was to cooperate with the Tribunal. Such an irregularity, it has been argued earlier, cannot be invoked by the suspect before the ICTY.

The Chamber then turned to the abuse of process doctrine. It clarified that an abuse of process does not necessarily have to lead to a lack of jurisdiction, but that the judges have a discretion to refuse jurisdiction.[411] Nevertheless, the Trial

---

[408] This rule, which has already been discussed earlier, see n. 22 and accompanying text, provides that "[t]he obligations laid down in Article 29 of the Statute shall prevail over any legal impediment to the surrender or transfer of the accused or of a witness to the Tribunal which may exist under the national law or extradition treaties of the State concerned." The Chamber held that this "Rule should be given an interpretation that takes full account of its purpose" (ibid., para. 46), which is "is to ensure that domestic procedures relating to the surrender and transfer of a person, from a State in respect of whom a request for arrest and transfer has been made, are not used as a basis for not complying with the request." (Ibid., para. 45.)

[409] Ibid., para. 46.

[410] Ibid., para. 47.

[411] Ibid., para. 48. It hereby referred to the Bennett case (see Subsection 1.2 of Chapter V) and the observation in that case that "[a] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be

Chamber also clarified that the ICTY "will exercise its discretion to refuse to try the accused if there has been an egregious breach of the rights of the accused [emphasis added, ChP]."[412] This means that the ICTY may refuse jurisdiction under certain circumstances but that, in any case, jurisdiction will be refused in the case of an egregious breach of the suspect's rights.

Applying these observations to the case at bar, the Chamber held:

> In light of that jurisprudence, the Chamber holds that the circumstances in which the accused was arrested and transferred – by the government of the Republic of Serbia, to whom no request was made, but which is a constituent part of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, to whom the request for arrest and transfer was made – are not such as to constitute an egregious violation of the accused's rights. (…) Consequently, the doctrine of the abuse of process is inapplicable, and this ground is dismissed.[413]

This quotation also shows that the ICTY may connect the most extreme consequence (namely the refusal of jurisdiction) to violations committed by third parties, violations for which the ICTY is not responsible. This can certainly be applauded. However, it is submitted that the ICTY should also grant less far-reaching remedies for less serious violations, irrespective of the question of whether the ICTY was responsible for them. After all, if the ICTY takes the ultimate responsibility for violations committed in the pre-trial phase of its case, whoever committed them, it should also take 'normal' responsibility for less serious violations. It would be very strange if the ICTY took responsibility for a suspect impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case [emphasis added by the ICTY and original footnote omitted, ChP]." See ibid., para. 49.

---

[412] Ibid., para. 48. The Chamber here referred again to the Barayagwiza case, where, according to the ICTY Trial Chamber, the ICTR Appeals Chamber "stressed that the discretionary power to dismiss a charge is exercised "in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity"." (Ibid., para. 50.) Besides the fact that this sentence does not flow properly, the Trial Chamber also presents the ICTR observation as if it means that judges must exercise their power to dismiss the charge under these circumstances ("is exercised"), whereas the ICTR decision speaks of a discretion. The exact sentence of the ICTR decision namely reads: "It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity [emphasis added, ChP]." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74.) However, perhaps this difference only exists on paper; one can imagine that if judges determine that to exercise jurisdiction under certain circumstances would prove detrimental to the court's integrity, that there is only one option left, namely to refuse jurisdiction. (In any case, it would be very difficult for judges to explain why they would nevertheless continue to exercise jurisdiction if they have previously determined that to continue to exercise jurisdiction would prove detrimental to the court's integrity.) Cf. also Jones and Doobay 2004, p. 95 (discussed in the context of the Bennett case in Chapter V): "Although the majority use the framework of the abuse of process doctrine, in which the word "discretion", rightly or wrongly, is frequently employed, the trenchant words of Lord Griffiths and Lord Bridge, and to a lesser extent Lord Lowry, appear to leave little or no room for the operation of a discretion or balancing exercise, where an abduction abroad in breach of extradition procedures has been found."

[413] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Slobodan Milošević, 'Decision on Preliminary Motions', Case No. IT-99-37-PT, 8 November 2001, para. 51.

who suffered egregious violations, but refused to do so when the suspect suffered less serious violations for the reason that these violations could not be attributed to the ICTY. That does not matter with respect to serious violations in the context of the abuse of process doctrine and arguably should not matter with respect to 'normal' violations which do not lead to the ending of the case.

The Chamber explains here that the fact that Serbia made the arrest and transfer – whereas the request was sent to the FRY – are not such as to constitute an egregious violation. That seemingly implies that the Chamber is nevertheless of the opinion that there was a violation in this case, even if it was not so serious as to lead to a refusal of jurisdiction.[414] Although one can readily agree with the fact that the circumstances of this case should not lead to a refusal of jurisdiction, this statement also appears to confirm the views of Koštunica and Magliveras that the transfer was illegal. However, the fact that the Chamber does not accord other, less far-reaching, remedies here may be explained by the point mentioned above, namely that Milošević cannot invoke the illegality of his transfer as it originates from a failure from the FRY to regulate the cooperation with the ICTY in such a way that such problems would not occur. Nevertheless, Magliveras has argued that there were also other violations discernible in the arrest, detention and transfer of Milošević to The Hague, violations which may have a weaker connection with the internal organisational problems of the FRY.[415] If that were indeed the case here, if actual violations did occur, then remedies should arguably have been granted, depending on the seriousness of the violations. (Which, in this case, given the fact that the ICTY was involved in the case, but not in the violations, may, of course, be very light.)

As will also be explained in Chapter VIII, Milošević also "brought summary civil proceedings (kort geding) against the Netherlands State before the President of the Regional Court (arrondissementsrechtbank) of The Hague".[416] He asked the Court primarily to order the defendant, namely the Dutch State, to release him unconditionally because, among other things, "[t]he so-called Tribunal, elements in the Serbian government and the defendant blatantly kidnapped and abducted him in a coordinated action, which must be regarded as a flagrant breach of his human [414] See also Magliveras 2002, p. 669.

[415] See ibid., p. 668. For example, he writes that "the Yugoslav Constitution confers upon an arrested person a number of procedural rights that must be strictly observed, for instance, the right to appeal against the arrest order, which must be decided by the competent court within 48 hours. From what one can ascertain, these procedural rights were not applied in the case of Milosevic. The same conclusion is reached if we examine the position under the relevant stipulations of the Serb Constitution [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[416] ECtHR (Second Section), 'Decision as to the admissibility of Application No. 77631/01 by Slobodan Milošević against the Netherlands', 19 March 2002, p. 3. For the Dutch kort geding, see Arrondissementsrechtbank 's-Gravenhage, Sector Civiel Recht – President, Vonnis in kort geding van 31 augustus 2001, gewezen in de zaak met rolnummer KG 01/975 van: Slobodan Milošević tegen de Staat der Nederlanden, LJN: AD3266. The English translation can be found at: http://icrc.org/ihl-nat.nsf/46707c419d6bdfa24125673e00508145/012854276cd2950dc1256da20051ac68!OpenDocument. See finally also Strijards 2001, p. 97.

rights".[417] However, the President of the District Court in The Hague determined that the Netherlands had transferred its jurisdiction to hear an application for release from detention to the Tribunal and hence that this, or any other, Dutch court did not have jurisdiction to decide on Milošević's application for release.[418] After this decision, Milošević "lodged an appeal against this judgment, but withdrew it again as of 17 January 2002",[419] apparently because he believed that it would be to no avail since the District Court had stated that the Dutch courts (plural!) have no jurisdiction to decide on the application. Finally, on 20 December 2001, Milošević's counsel lodged a series of complaints with the ECtHR,[420] but the European Court quickly declared his entire application inadmissible, explaining that domestic remedies had not been exhausted. Although Milošević claimed that the judgment of the District Court (which stated that Dutch courts have no jurisdiction to decide on the application) showed that no adequate and effective domestic remedies were available, the ECtHR stated that > the applicant did not make use of the opportunities offered by Netherlands law to challenge this finding; he withdrew his appeal to the Court of Appeal and in so doing also deprived himself of the possibility of lodging a subsequent appeal on points of law to the Supreme Court. The Court reiterates that the existence of mere doubts as to the prospects of success of a particular remedy which is not obviously futile is not a valid reason for failing to exhaust domestic remedies (...).[421]

3.1.4 Nikolić

The most important male captus case in the context of the international criminal tribunals is arguably the 2002 (Trial Chamber) and 2003 (Appeals Chamber) Nikolić case.

Dragan Nikolić was indicted on 1 November 1994 for 24 counts of crimes against humanity, violations of the laws or customs of war and grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions.[422] Most of these crimes, it was alleged, were committed in the detention camp Susica (eastern Bosnia), where Nikolić was allegedly the camp commander.[423]

---

[417] The English translation of the Dutch kort geding at: http://icrc.org/ihl-nat.nsf/46707c419d6bdfa24125673e00508145/012854276cd2950dc1256da20051ac68!OpenDocument.
[418] See ibid.
[419] ECtHR (Second Section), 'Decision as to the admissibility of Application No. 77631/01 by Slobodan Milošević against the Netherlands', 19 March 2002, p. 4.
[420] Milošević claimed that the following rights of the ECHR had been violated: Art. 5, paras. 1 (among other things, because of his unlawful transfer from the FRY to The Hague), 2 and 4, Art. 6, paras. 1, 2 and 3 (c), Artt. 10, 13 and 14. See ibid, pp. 4-6.
[421] Ibid., p. 6.
[422] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 2. It may be interesting to note that Nikolić was the very first person to be indicted by the ICTY.
[423] See ibid.

As explained earlier,[424] Nikolić was the first defendant in whose case the Rule 61 proceedings were used; after it became clear that the two arrest warrants for Nikolić (issued to the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina and to the Bosnian Serb administration in Pale)[425] would not be executed,[426] in May 1995 Judge Odio Benito ordered that the case be submitted to the Trial Chamber to review the indictment pursuant to Rule 61 (A) of the ICTY RPE.[427] As this Trial Chamber was of the opinion that there were reasonable grounds to believe that Nikolić had committed the crimes with which he was charged, an international arrest warrant was issued.[428]

After these Rule 61 proceedings, the Prosecution amended the indictment (which now contained no less than 80 (!) counts of crimes against humanity, violations of the laws and customs of war and grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions), which was confirmed by Judge Claude Jorda on 12 February 1999.[429] After that, a new arrest warrant was issued to the FRY.[430]

Then, a little more than a year later, on or about 20 April 2000, Nikolić was arrested and detained by SFOR in Bosnia and Herzegovina and transferred to The Hague.[431] Although he made no complaint about the way he was brought into the jurisdiction of the ICTY during his first appearance on 28 April 2000,[432] his counsel advised the Tribunal during a Status Conference almost six months later that the legality of Nikolić's arrest and detention pursuant to that arrest would be challenged.[433] Subsequently, on 17 May 2001, Nikolić filed his first motion challenging his male captus.[434] Interestingly but perhaps not very surprisingly,

[424] See n. 78 and accompanying text.
[425] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 10.
[426] See ibid., para. 11. The Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina notified the ICTY that it could not execute the warrant whereas the Bosnian Serb administration in Pale did not respond at all.
[427] See ibid., para. 12.
[428] See ibid. The Trial Chamber also noted "that the failure of the Prosecution to effect service of the Indictment was due wholly to the failure or refusal of the Bosnian Serb administration in Pale to co-operate. In accordance with the procedure of Rule 61(E), the Presiding Judge of the Trial Chamber requested the President of the Tribunal to notify the Security Council of this failure. The President of the Tribunal complied with this request and sent a letter dated 31 October 1995 to notify the Security Council [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 13.) This was the first time the ICTY notified the UNSC of such a lack of cooperation.
[429] See ibid., para. 14.
[430] See ibid.
[431] See ibid., para. 15
[432] See ibid., para. 3.
[433] See ibid., para. 4.
[434] See ibid., para. 6. See for this motion: ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 17 May 2001.

Nikolić had heard from the rather successful tactics used in the male captus case of Todorović and argued that he would also use that method if necessary:[435]

> In this Motion Nikolić reserves his right to rely upon the decision of a Trial Chamber of this Tribunal in the case of Todorović ("Simić Decision") so that, if this present Motion failed, he would seek an evidentiary hearing to establish the facts surrounding his arrest as an alternative challenge to the Tribunal's exercise of jurisdiction [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[436]

Although the Prosecution acknowledged this reservation on the part of Nikolić, it also made clear that this case was different as all the material in its possession pertaining to Nikolić's arrest had already been disclosed to Nikolić.[437]

After a number of appeals from the judges to reach an agreement to narrow the issues in dispute, an agreement was indeed reached between the Defence and the Prosecution after another Status Conference held on 29 August 2001.[438] In addition to this, a second motion with the exact issues to be resolved was filed by the Defence on 29 October 2001.[439]

Finally, in February 2002, the indictment was again amended, meaning that at the time the Trial and Appeals Chamber's decisions with respect to Nikolić's male

---

[435] That Nikolić did not use the successful Todorović method right away (but only as a safety net) was, of course, much to the OTP's relief, see Sloan 2003 A, pp. 109-110 (who finalised his article at a time when the Trial Chamber had not yet issued its decision of 9 October 2002): "Given that the Trial Chamber's decision that Todorović was entitled to disclosure from SFOR and its participating states was the ace in the hole that resulted in his negotiating a favourable plea agreement with the OTP, it might have been expected that Nikolić would follow a similar path and seek potentially embarrassing disclosure from SFOR and its participating states. Surprisingly, he did not. Instead, his counsel requested that the Trial Chamber determine the jurisdictional consequences that would flow from a successful challenge to the legality of the arrest as a preliminary matter. Of course the OTP, which along with SFOR had been agitating for this approach in the Todorović case, was only too pleased to follow this course. Under this approach, SFOR and its contributing states are safely out of reach of any embarrassing requests for disclosure from the Tribunal – at least until the complicated issues related to remedy are considered. Presumably, if the Trial Chamber finds that the requested remedy is inappropriate, Nikolić will request the Tribunal – which by then may very well be losing patience with the matter – for an order requiring disclosure from SFOR; if the remedy is found to be appropriate, the OTP still has the option of making a deal with Nikolić [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also Sloan 2003 B, p. 544.

[436] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 6.

[437] See ibid.

[438] See ibid., para. 8.

[439] See ibid., para. 9. See for this second motion: ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001.

captus challenges were issued, he was 'only' charged with eight counts of crimes against humanity.[440]

In the above-mentioned agreement between the Defence and the Prosecution, it was stipulated that "[t]he relief sought by the Accused is his release and the dismissal of the Indictment against him or such other relief that the Court deems appropriate".[441] In addition, the two parties agreed that,

> [i]n order to determine whether the relief should be granted (…) the following issues would require resolution by way of hearing; 1. If it can be established by the accused that the accused's arrest was achieved by any illegal conduct committed by, or with the material complicity of; (a) any individual or organisation (other than SFOR, OTP or the Tribunal), (b) SFOR, (c) OTP or (d) the Tribunal would the accused be entitled to the relief sought[?] 2. Does SFOR act as an agent of the OTP and/or the Tribunal in the detention and arrest of suspected persons?[442]

These issues had to be resolved on the basis of the following facts, although it was also agreed that if, on the basis of these assumed facts, the judges were indeed of the opinion that the relief requested by Nikolić could be granted, that "a further hearing would be held to determine the factual circumstances of the Accused's arrest [emphasis added, ChP]".[443] Hence, the parties were operating in a legal framework, to which – perhaps – the 'real' facts of the case would be applied later. The assumed facts of the case were:

> - that the Accused at the time of his apprehension was living in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; - that the Accused was taken forcibly and against his will and transported into the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina; - that the apprehension and transportation into the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina was undertaken by unknown[444] individuals having no connection with SFOR and/or the Tribunal; - that

---

[440] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 16. See also ibid., para. 2. After the Appeals Chamber's decision in June 2003, the indictment was amended again. In the end, the indictment was brought back to four counts to which Nikolić pleaded guilty. On 4 February 2005, he was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment.

[441] Ibid., para. 18. Note that in the decision of 9 October 2002, the Trial Chamber itself does not mention the arguably important element "or such other relief that the Court deems appropriate": "By way of relief, Nikolić seeks a stay, dismissal or negation of the Indictment, his release from the custody of the Tribunal and a return to his place of residence prior to his arrest [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 2.) This was the relief sought in the first Defence motion of Nikolić, see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 17 May 2001, para. 1.

[442] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 18.

[443] Ibid.

[444] One can wonder whether the identities of these individuals were really such a mystery when the Trial and Appeals Chamber made their decisions in October 2002 and June 2003, respectively. (The Appeals Chamber decision, which will be discussed after the Trial Chamber's decision, also referred to > the Accused in his interview with the Prosecution asserted that he was handcuffed and in the trunk of a car, when the unknown individuals handed him over to SFOR; - that in Bosnia and Herzegovina the Accused was arrested and detained by SFOR; - that subsequently the Accused was delivered into the custody of the Tribunal and transferred to The Hague; - that certain individuals have been tried and sentenced in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia[445] for the acts relating to the apprehension of the Accused [original footnote omitted, ChP].[446]

The submissions of the parties were as follows. The Defence claimed that because a kidnapping, like the one in this case, is such a serious male captus,[447] "a judicial body set up with, inter alios, the objectives of preserving human rights can have no proper option but to make it plain that jurisdiction will not be entertained in such circumstances [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[448] That also means that it is not necessary to check whether a kidnapping will, for example, jeopardise the fairness of the subsequent trial because that is a different matter.[449] This male detentus

"unknown individuals", see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 3.) After all, already in the spring of 2001, the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights in Serbia released the (already-mentioned, see the Todorović case) Annual Report 2000, Human Rights in Serbia 2000 (available at: http://www.helsinki.org.rs/reports_t10.html), in which one can read (under 'IV: International Humanitarian Law', after the account of the trial of the kidnappers of Todorović): "In mid-May police arrested 9 men on suspicion that "in the early morning hours of 21 April 2000 they abducted [Dragan] Nikolic in the territory of Serbia and handed him over to SFOR in Bosnia, for his further extradition to the Hague." (…) After the main hearing, held between 24 October-24 November, the trial chamber of the Smederevo District Court pronounced the following sentences for commission of the criminal offense of abduction under article 64 of the Penal Code of Serbia: Amir Morenkovic (sentenced in absentia) - 6 years in prison, Branko Stupar, Zeljko Mitrovic, Goran Dimitrijevic - three years in prison each, Zivorad Trajkovic - three years and four months, Jadranka Kovacevic - 2 years and 6 months, Slavoljub Antunovic - 6 months, while Miroljub Vasic and Boris Nestorovic were cleared of charges." It may also be good to point out that the Defence, in the first Defence motion, also spoke of "known individuals", see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 17 May 2001, para. 3. With respect to the nationalities of the kidnappers, different news reports show that these persons were from Serbia (like Nikolić was). See also Sloan 2003 B, p. 541 ('abstract'). Note finally, to return to the possible dangers of rewards (see also n. 115), that Nikolić's counsel had implied that Nikolić "had been arrested as part of the US State Department's Rewards Program for Former Yugoslavia War Criminals." (Magliveras 2002, p. 673.)

[445] See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 6.

[446] Ibid., para. 21.

[447] See ibid., para. 24: "[I]n this case, and any case involving, in effect, kidnapping, the taint of that degree of illegality and breach of fundamental human rights is so pernicious, and the dangers of the appearance of condoning it to any degree so much a hostage to unpredictable consequence and fortune that [… see the main text for the remainder of this quote, ChP]".

[448] Ibid.

[449] Cf. ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional outcome, Nikolić's Defence continued, which, among other things, is necessary to protect and maintain the integrity of the ICTY, would have to be entertained a fortiori where the breach of international law "was committed by or with the material complicity of an agent and/or alternatively, by a recipient of an order of the Tribunal itself".[450]

With a greater focus on this specific case, the Defence had, according to the Trial Chamber, basically two lines of reasoning to challenge the exercise of jurisdiction by the ICTY.[451] The first submission brought in the previously discussed (see Subsection 3.3 of Chapter III) matter of attribution:

> [B]y taking over the accused from the unknown individuals, SFOR and/or the Prosecution have acknowledged and adopted the alleged illegal conduct of those individuals. The illegality of the acts of the individuals thereby becomes attributable to SFOR and to the Prosecution. In turn, such attribution leads to the conclusion that the Tribunal is barred from exercising jurisdiction over the accused.[452]

This argument must be clarified in more detail. First, how can certain conduct from private individuals be attributed to SFOR and/or the Prosecution? This was because, according to the Defence, SFOR "had knowledge, actual or constructive, that the accused had been unlawfully apprehended and brought from Serbia against his free will".[453] Secondly, the argument states that the illegality becomes attributable to

---

Relief Under Rule 72', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 17 May 2001, para. 11: "It is not the thrust of this motion to assert that the accused could not have a fair trial simply because of the nature of his initial arrest or that in every case (…) the rights of an accused should take unlimited precedence over all other considerations; to do so would be intellectually and jurisprudentially barren. The fairness of proceedings once started depends upon different criteria." See also the already discussed Bennett case where these two points were also clearly separated: "[A] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case." (House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161.) This quotation was also referred to in ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 17 May 2001, para. 15.

[450] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 24.

[451] See ibid., para. 29.

[452] Ibid.

[453] Ibid., para. 25. In more detail, the Defence argued that "[i]n spite of being aware that the rendition was tainted with illegality and knowing that, but for the breach of international law and fundamental human rights principles, Nikolic would not have been in their presence SFOR personnel opted to "take advantage" of the situation by taking custody of the accused, alerting the International Tribunal of his presence and proceeding with the arrest procedures as agreed with the Tribunal. It is submitted that, by not only ignoring the illegality but, by actively taking advantage of the situation and taking into custody the accused, SFOR's exercise of jurisdiction over Nikolic was an adoption of the illegality – of which they were aware – and thus, an extension of the unlawful detention." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the

SFOR and to the Prosecution. This idea, that certain conduct can be attributed to SFOR and hence also to the OTP/the ICTY, implies that the Defence is of the opinion that there is a strong relationship between SFOR on the one hand and the OTP/the ICTY on the other in matters of arrest. This was indeed asserted by the Defence, which argued "that SFOR must be considered both the de facto and de jure agent of the Prosecution and of the Tribunal in apprehending indictees and that, consequently, the illegal conduct can be attributed to the Tribunal [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[454] If this agency argument were not accepted, the Defence continued, then one could argue "that the subsequent conduct of the Prosecution and the Tribunal "was such that the conduct of SFOR was in effect ratified and made as if it had been previously authorised" [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[455]

The second submission cleared the technical attribution hurdle: "[T]he illegal character of the arrest in and of itself should bar the Tribunal from exercising jurisdiction over the accused [emphasis added, ChP]."[456] It thus argued that even if the abduction could not be attributed to SFOR or the Prosecution, the simple fact that there was a kidnapping involved, by definition a serious[457] male captus

Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001, para. 12.)

[454] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 25.

[455] Ibid.

[456] Ibid., para. 29.

[457] The alleged seriousness of the male captus can be found in the following words of the Defence: "It is not the thrust of this motion to assert (…) that in every case (…) the rights of an accused should take unlimited precedence over all other considerations (…). The central argument is that in this case, and any case involving, in effect, kidnapping, the taint of that degree of illegality and breach of fundamental human rights is so pernicious, and the dangers of the appearance of condoning it to any degree so much a hostage to unpredictable consequence and fortune that a judicial body set up with, inter alios, the objectives of preserving human rights can have no proper option but to make it plain that jurisdiction will not be entertained in such circumstances." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 17 May 2001, para. 11.) See also the following summary by the Trial Chamber of the Defence's arguments: "that the forcible removal of the Accused from the FRY entailed a breach of both the sovereignty of the FRY and the Accused's individual due process guarantees; and that although such breaches occurred prior to the delivery of the Accused into the custody of SFOR and the Tribunal, these breaches were of such magnitude that even absent the involvement of SFOR or Prosecution, the release of the Accused from the custody of this Tribunal and the dismissal of the indictment against him is the only appropriate remedy [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 25.) Nevertheless (and as already explained in n. 442 of Chapter III), note that the footnote after these words of the Trial Chamber (n. 34, referring to para. 9 of the first Defence motion) does not lead to these words/ideas of the Defence.

situation, violating State sovereignty, human rights and the rule of law,[458] can mean but one thing, namely that the Tribunal is not to exercise its jurisdiction.

[458] To be very precise, these three elements indeed played an important role in the arguments of the Defence (and hence should also be mentioned here), but, strictly speaking, the words of the Trial Chamber in para. 71 of its decision ("The central submission of the Defence is that unlawful rendition of a defendant to the Tribunal should lead to the conclusion "[t]hat international law has to some degree been breached and that the violation of some fundamental principle – whether it be state sovereignty and/or international human rights and/or the rule law of law – needs to be protected above all other considerations [original footnote omitted, ChP]".") are incorrect because the words "[t]hat international law has to some degree been breached and that the violation of some fundamental principle – whether it be state sovereignty and/or international human rights and/or the rule law of law – needs to be protected above all other considerations [original footnote omitted, ChP]" were not presented as a submission of the Defence, but 'merely' as an explanation of the reasoning of earlier male captus male detentus cases, see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001, para. 14: "The decision by both national courts and international tribunals to deny jurisdiction where the defendant can show that there has been an unlawful rendition, has been justified on the grounds that international law has to some degree been breached and that the violation of some fundamental principle – whether it be state sovereignty and/or international human rights and/or the rule law of law – needs to be protected above all other considerations [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Nevertheless, it is also clear that the Defence used these reasonings of other male captus male detentus cases in this case as well. Note finally that the Defence and the Prosecution are officially still operating in a theoretical framework, working with assumed facts; strictly speaking, the Defence is not arguing that these elements have been violated in the case of Nikolić; it only argues that if that were to be established, that this must lead to a male detentus outcome, see, for example, ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001, para. 18: "It is submitted that if the accused does establish that his arrest was achieved by illegal conduct committed by or with the material complicity of any individual or organization and/or SFOR and/or the OTP and/or the Tribunal, such conduct or complicity, entailing a breach of international law, would entitle the accused to relief that is meaningful, effective and substantial. As such, the only appropriate remedy must be that the indictment is stayed, dismissed or otherwise negated followed by the return [of] the injured party, Dragan Nikolic, to the status quo ante [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." Hence, it is arguably not correct of the Trial Chamber to write that the Defence alleges that these violations have occurred in this case, see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 96: "The Chamber must now address the allegations of the Defence that, in the present case, violations of international law occurred. Such violations relate to: (i) a violation of the State sovereignty of the injured State, (ii) a violation of international human rights, in particular the rights of the accused, and (iii) a violation of the rule of law." However, it must also be admitted that the line between the assumed facts and the allegations of the Defence is sometimes blurry, see, for example, ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001, para. 17: "[B]y proceeding with the trial, the manifestly unlawful means by which the

Because the Defence suggested that the male captus male detentus outcome had to be preferred in this case implies that the Defence looked at the male captus topic more generally and, especially in its second Defence motion, the Defence did indeed examine it. It is appropriate to now pay some more attention to that discussion of the Defence, which not only looked at the inter-State context but, of course, also at the context of the Tribunals.

First, the Defence noted that the male captus bene detentus principle had lost much of its relevance today, a statement which is true if one follows the old-fashioned rationale of the maxim, but which is also, see the outcome of Chapter V, perhaps rather shallow given the fact that courts around the world still issue decisions which can be qualified as male captus bene detentus decisions:

> It is acknowledged that traditionally, the principle male captus, bene detentus has applied and that in some civil law jurisdictions, the maxim may still remain good law. However, it is submitted that the principle can no longer be considered good law, or at least the most consistent with the flow of human rights legislation, in most common law jurisdictions and that moreover, under international law, the maxim male captus, male detentus is preferred [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[459]

It subsequently explained that the different male captus male detentus courts had used the following general justification for reaching their male detentus outcomes, namely > that international law has to some degree been breached and that the violation of some fundamental principle – whether it be state sovereignty and/or international human rights and/or the rule law of law – needs to be protected above all other considerations [original footnote omitted, ChP].[460]

These three elements, which were also presented and discussed in Chapter III of this book, were then examined in more detail.

With respect to State sovereignty, the Defence noted:

> While evidence of direct or material complicity by a state in the abduction of an individual can, it is submitted, raise a legitimate action for the violation of state sovereignty, where the abduction has been perpetrated by private individuals, the law accused has been brought into the Tribunal's jurisdiction seriously taints and undermines the integrity of the judicial process, not simply in the instant case but in the eyes of the international community at large."

---

[459] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001, para. 14.

[460] Ibid. See also n. 458.

> remains unsettled and thus, the remedy for (…) such a breach also remains unresolved.[461]

Although this quotation is not entirely clear (see also footnote 442 of Chapter III), it appears that the Defence is claiming that private individuals can violate the sovereignty of another State, but that it is unclear whether an abduction, executed by private individuals, can also be used to raise a legitimate action with respect to this violation.[462] As a result, it is also unclear what kind of remedy for the violation of State sovereignty (the words "for (…) such a breach" also imply that private individuals can violate a State's sovereignty) should be granted.

However, in any case, it was asserted that "subsequent ratification of the illegal act does establish state responsibility [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[463] and that the appropriate remedy in such cases would be the return of the abducted individual.[464] Although the Defence does not clearly explain how this point is to be transposed into the context of the Tribunals, it can be argued that it is of the opinion that if the Tribunal were to ratify the conduct (and given the sources to which the Defence refers, such ratification could already be established if the Tribunal would simply continue with the case)[465] the Tribunal would become responsible for the act, as a result of which the remedy of the return would have to be granted.

Turning to international human rights law, the Defence, referring to "some of the most recent and pertinent rulings by regional and international human rights

---

[461] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001, para. 15.

[462] Such an interpretation would be in conformity with the first Defence motion, where it was stated that "the assumptive facts must amount to a violation of sovereignty". (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 17 May 2001, para. 11.)

[463] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001, para. 15.

[464] See ibid., n. 24.

[465] See ibid., where the Defence refers to, among other things, the words of Mann (1989, p. 408) which were already mentioned earlier in this book, see n. 527 of Chapter III. The Defence also referred to the following words from Shen 1994, p. 23 (this must, by the way, be p. 63): "Whether the captors are government officials or private citizens, and whether the abduction is originally authorized or sponsored by the government, the State whose unauthorized agents or private citizens engage in extraterritorial captures assumes its responsibility as soon as it adopts, sanctions, or takes advantage of the private or unauthorized kidnapping activities. A State that fails to return the abducted individual and then arrests and prosecutes the individual has the same responsibilities as in a State-sponsored abduction."

tribunals on forcible abductions [original footnotes omitted, ChP]",[466] submitted "that where a defendant has been the victim of an abduction, his rights under customary international human rights law have been violated"[467] and that "[w]here a forcible abduction has been established in fact, international tribunals have consistently called for the return of the defendant to the status quo ante as the appropriate remedy [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[468] The Defence explained here as well that the fact that the initial wrong may have been caused by private individuals does not change this point:

> It is further submitted that because an unlawful rendition not only seriously curtails the basic inalienable rights of the individual, but must also necessarily involve the irregular exercise of jurisdiction over an individual by the adjudicating court, the issue of whether or not the perpetrators of the abduction were state-sponsored or acting in a private capacity, is irrelevant. Therefore, any attempt to distinguish [466] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001, para. 16. Reference was made here (in ns. 25-26) to the now well-known cases of Stocké, Bozano, Velásquez Rodríguez, Celiberti de Casariego, Lopez Burgos, Almeida de Quinteros and Cañón García.

[467] Ibid.

[468] Ibid. The Defence refers here (in n. 30) to Celiberti de Casariego, Lopez Burgos, Almeida de Quinteros, Cañón García and Barayagwiza. Some critical comments should be made here. To start with Barayagwiza (which will be discussed in Subsection 3.2.1), that case did not involve a forcible abduction. Furthermore, it must be noted that in Cañón García, the HRC could not ask for the release or the return to the status quo ante as the State holding the suspect (the US) "had not ratified, or acceded to, the Covenant or the Optional Protocol." (HRC, Cañón García v. Ecuador, Communication No. 319/1988 (5 November 1991), UN Doc. CCPR/C/43/D/319/1988 at 90 (1991), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/undocs/html/dec319.htm, para. 5.1.) In this case, the Committee was of the opinion that the State co-responsible for the abduction (Ecuador) had nevertheless violated, among other things, Art. 9 of the ICCPR and concluded that: "the State party is under an obligation to take measures to remedy the violations suffered by Mr. Cañón García. In this connection, the Committee has taken note of the State party's assurance that it is investigating the author's claims and the circumstances leading to his expulsion from Ecuador, with a view to prosecuting those held responsible for the violations of his rights. The Committee would appreciate receiving from the State party, within ninety days of the transmittal to it of this decision, all pertinent information on the results of all its investigations, as well as on measures taken to remedy the situation, and in order to prevent the repetition of such events in the future." (Ibid., paras. 6.2 and 7.) However, in the other three cases (which, it must be noted, also involved other human rights violations), the HRC indeed ordered the release of the suspect. Although, as explained, a release as such would not exclude a new trial, the HRC explicitly stated in the cases of Celiberti de Casariego and Lopez Burgos that the suspect also had to be permitted to leave the forum State, which arguably means the de facto ending of the case. In Almeida de Quinteros, it was not necessary to mention this permission to leave the forum State as the latter State (Uruguay) was also the suspect's home State. Given the serious male captus involved here (see n. 251 and accompanying text of Chapter III), one can assume that the HRC would not accept a release followed by an immediate new arrest on the spot. Hence, in that case, the release would arguably also constitute the real ending of the case.

> between the categories of violator of the human rights of the accused is, it is submitted, a superfluous exercise [original footnote omitted, ChP].[469]

This study agrees with the point that the Tribunal should look at all violations, whether they have been committed by OTP staff or private individuals. However, the entity responsible for the violation may and should certainly play a role in determining the most appropriate remedy for the violation, including whether or not the ultimate remedy, the refusal of jurisdiction, should follow.

With respect to the final element, the rule of law, the Defence submitted that the still-to-discuss Barayagwiza case before the ICTR and a series of national cases require "that a court consider divesting itself of jurisdiction over the defendant where there has been a serious violation of the rule of law or an abuse or process [original footnote omitted, ChP]",[470] for example, because it wants "to provide a remedy for the violation of the accused's rights; to deter future misconduct; and to enhance the integrity of the judicial process [original footnote omitted, ChP]",[471] and that, while an abduction per se is both an abuse of process and a breach of the rule of law, a transfer, as a direct consequence of such an abduction, of a suspect to a jurisdiction so that that suspect can be tried is (also) an abuse of process.[472]

The Defence emphasised that an irregular rendition does not necessarily deprive a suspect of a fair trial.

However, that is not important. What is important is that > by proceeding with the trial, the manifestly unlawful means by which the accused has been brought into the Tribunal's jurisdiction seriously taints and undermines the integrity of the judicial process, not simply in the instant case but in the eyes of the international community at large.[473]

Like the other elements, State sovereignty and human rights, the Defence submitted that here also, the fact that the abduction may have been executed by private individuals would not make a difference.[474] Finally, the Defence made a sort of general appeal that

---

[469] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001, para. 16.

[470] Ibid., para. 17.

[471] Ibid.

[472] See ibid.

[473] Ibid.

[474] This was because such conduct could be ratified by the Tribunal, see ibid.: "[E]ven where private parties are the initial perpetrators of the abuse of process and/or breach of the rule of law, the illegality can be imputed to SFOR and/or the OTP and/or the Tribunal, on subsequent ratification [original footnote omitted, ChP]." As the Defence refers back to n. 24 of its Motion (see n. 465 and accompanying text), one can assume that the Defence is here also of the opinion that such ratification can already be established if the Tribunal would simply continue with the case. See also ibid.: "[A]s > it cannot be that in war crime cases a resort to the male captus bene detentus maxim is an automatically acceptable surrogate procedure for circumventing procedures of apprehension that comply with human rights principles and the central tenets of the rule of law. As an organ of the United Nations, the cradle for international human rights norms, the ICTY should promote and develop those rights within the framework of international law and turn its face from what could be seen to be encouraging or accepting lawlessness.[475]

Before turning to the Trial Chamber's observations, it should be noted that the Prosecution basically focused on the availability of the remedies and argued that the far-reaching remedies sought by Nikolić may only be warranted in extreme cases (which was not the case here), namely in situations which involve at a minimum:

> a) [u]nambiguous, advertent[476] violations of international law which can be attributed[477] to the Office of the Prosecutor; and/or b) a residual category of cases with a violation of the accused's human rights, any attempt to distinguish between the illegal conduct – abuse of process or breach of the rule of law – committed by or with the material complicity of an individual or organization and such conduct by SFOR personnel, the OTP or the Tribunal is, once again, a superfluous exercise." See finally ibid. for a more general statement, which could be applied to all three situations: "It is submitted that if the accused does establish that his arrest was achieved by the illegal conduct committed by or with the material complicity of any individual or organization and/or SFOR and/or OTP and/or the Tribunal, such conduct or complicity, entailing a breach of international law, would entitle the accused to relief that is meaningful, effective and substantial. As such, the only appropriate remedy must be that the indictment is stayed, dismissed or otherwise negated followed by the return [of] the injured party, Dragan Nikolic, to the status quo ante [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

---

[475] Ibid., para. 20.

[476] A synonym of this word is 'mindful', a word which clarifies that there must have been a real intent from the Prosecution to violate international law. Cf. in that respect also Chapter V where intent played a considerable role in the different male captus cases. See also Swart 2001, p. 206, where he writes: "Dismissal of criminal cases as a result of official misconduct is a remedy accepted by the courts of many States. There is, of course, considerable variation in the way national legal systems make use of that remedy. Among other things, the choice will depend on the availability of other effective remedies for correcting the wrongs done to the accused. Usually, a relevant consideration is also whether unlawful conduct on the part of law officers shows an intent to prejudice the rights of the accused or instead constituted negligence [emphasis added, ChP]." The above-mentioned words of the Prosecution stem from para. 17 of ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to Defence "Motion to Determine Issues as Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber…and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, His Arrest and Subsequent Detention", filed 29 October 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 12 November 2001 (this is the response of the Prosecutor to the second Defence motion of Nikolić). In an earlier response (the response to the first Defence motion of Nikolić), the Prosecution had used comparable words, words which also show that the violations must have been committed consciously/intentionally, see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to "Defence Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72" filed 17 May 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 31 May 2001, para. 31: "At a minimum, cases in which such extreme remedies may be warranted will involve either: a) unambiguous, conscious violations of international legality which can be attributed to the Office of the Prosecutor (i.e. the Prosecution's own conduct would have to be in some way egregious); and/or b) a residual category of case[s] where the violations in question are of such egregiousness or > where the violations in question are of such egregiousness or outrageousness that, irrespective of any lack of involvement on the part of the Prosecution, the Trial Chamber could not, in good conscience, continue to exercise its jurisdiction over the Accused [original footnote omitted, ChP].[478]

The Trial Chamber focused on the two central submissions of the Defence mentioned above: one related to attribution and one making a more direct relation between the male captus and the male detentus outcome, namely that jurisdiction should be refused even if the male captus could not be attributed to SFOR/the OTP.

The Chamber first examined whether the (assumed) acts of the individuals could be attributed to SFOR/the OTP.

After having explained the legal framework in which SFOR, the OTP and the Tribunal operate,[479] it first confirmed the Todorović case with respect to the question of whether SFOR has a legal obligation to arrest suspects for the ICTY – this point was already discussed earlier, see footnote 71 and accompanying text[480] – outrageousness that, irrespective of any lack of involvement on the part of the Prosecution, the Trial Chamber could not, in good conscience, continue to exercise its jurisdiction over the accused. In such circumstances, his or her release may therefore be ordered so as to safeguard the integrity of the entire judicial process [first emphasis added, ChP]." The Prosecution formulated this test relying on Lamb 2000. See also Sloan 2003 A., p. 110, n. 183. In this context, the Prosecution also submitted "that any irregularities committed by the authorities of another State or individuals prior to the delivery of the accused to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal should not suffice to divest this Tribunal of its jurisdiction over the accused [original footnote omitted, ChP]" (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to "Defence Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72" filed 17 May 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 31 May 2001, para. 34), among other things, because it would entail an inducement for certain States "to ensure that serious irregularities were committed in the arrest process before handing the accused to the Tribunal, being confident that after review, the indictment would be dismissed and the defendant released because the defendant's rights had been violated by the authorities in the FRY. Under this scenario, the States concerned could claim that they were fulfilling their obligations of co-operation while, at the same time, knowingly sabotaging the Prosecution by violating the accused's fundamental rights in the process of transferring him to the Tribunal." (Ibid., para. 34, n. 31.) See also ibid., para. 35 and ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to Defence "Motion to Determine Issues as Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber…and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, His Arrest and Subsequent Detention", filed 29 October 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 12 November 2001, para. 6. This – justified – concern was also identified in the Todorović case, see n. 344.

---

[477] The Prosecution was of the opinion that "[t]he mere subsequent acceptance by the Prosecution of custody of the Accused is not sufficient in and of itself to satisfy the required level of "collusion" and/or "official involvement." According to the Prosecution, at least some form of adoption and approval by the Prosecution of such violations is required [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 27.)

[478] Ibid., para. 28.

[479] See ibid., paras. 35-47.

[480] See ibid., paras. 49 ("The question that may arise is whether the duty to co-operate, as laid down in Article 29, applies to States only, or also to other entities or collective enterprises, such as SFOR. Read literally, Article 29 seems to relate to States only. This question had been discussed previously, inter alia, by the Trial Chamber in the Simić Decision. This Trial Chamber sees no reason to take a different and explained that "in the particular circumstances of this case the relevant SFOR forces had no other option than to detain the Accused and to set the standard procedures in motion in order to have the Accused transferred to The Hague".[481] In other words, it was not up to SFOR to release Nikolić. The Trial Chamber then turned to the question as to whether the male captus of Nikolić, allegedly committed by these private individuals, could be attributed to SFOR. It hereby looked at the (already discussed in Chapter III) ILC's DARS, although it immediately warned that "any use of this source should be made with caution".[482] This was because these Draft Articles > are still subject to debate amongst States. They do not have the status of treaty law and are not binding on States. Furthermore, as can be deduced from its title, the Draft Articles are primarily directed at the responsibilities of States and not at those of international organisations or entities.[483]

Notwithstanding this caveat, the Chamber examined whether Article 11 of the DARS ('Conduct acknowledged and adopted by a State as its own')[484] could be relevant here.[485]

The Trial Chamber referred to the ILC's commentary to this article,[486] which explains that view") and 67 ("Once a person comes "in contact with" SFOR, (…) SFOR is obliged under Article 29 of the Statute and Rule 59 bis to arrest/detain the person and have him transferred to the Tribunal [emphasis added, ChP]."). It may be interesting to note that the Trial Chamber also concurred with another (and also already discussed) male captus case before the ICTY, the Dokmanović case, namely with respect to that decision's reasoning that Rule 59 bis of the ICTY RPE should be read as providing a mechanism additional to that of Rule 55 of the ICTY RPE, see ibid., para. 50.

---

[481] Ibid., para. 55.

[482] Ibid., para. 60.

[483] Ibid. It may be interesting to note that the ILC is now in the process of preparing draft articles on the responsibility of international organisations, see, for example, Chapter IV ('Responsibility of International Organizations') of the Report of the International law Commission, Sixty-first session (4 May-5 June and 6 July-7 August 2009), UNGA OR, Sixty-fourth Session, Supplement No. 10, UN Doc. A/64/10, pp. 13-183. On pp. 77-78 of this report, one can even find a reference to the ICTY Trial Chamber's decision in the Nikolić case, after which the ILC commented (at p. 78): "No policy reasons appear to militate against applying to international organizations the criterion for attribution based on acknowledgement and adoption." (See for the acknowledgement and adoption topic the remainder of the main text.) Cf. also Acquaviva 2007, p. 634.

[484] "Conduct which is not attributable to a State under the preceding articles shall nevertheless be considered an act of that State under international law if and to the extent that the State acknowledges and adopts the conduct in question as its own." See also n. 482 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[485] Another DARS article which is often relied upon in comparable cases (Art. 8: 'Conduct directed or controlled by a State', see n. 481 and accompanying text of Chapter III) was not examined here for it was not argued or suggested in any way that SFOR instructed, directed or controlled the acts of the private individuals, see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 64.

[486] See also Subsection 3.3.3 of Chapter III.

> as a general matter, conduct will not be attributable to a State under article 11 where a State merely acknowledges the factual existence of conduct or expresses its verbal approval of it. In international controversies, States often take positions which amount to "approval" or "endorsement" of conduct in some general sense but do not involve any assumption of responsibility. The language of "adoption", on the other hand, carries with it the idea that the conduct is acknowledged by the State as, in effect, its own conduct. (…) [T]he term "acknowledges and adopts" in article 11 makes it clear that what is required is something more than a general acknowledgment of a factual situation, but rather that the State identifies the conduct in question and makes it its own.[487]

The Trial Chamber was of the opinion that SFOR had not acknowledged and adopted the male captus of the private individuals as its own.[488] In fact, "SFOR did nothing but implement its obligations under the Statute and the Rules of this Tribunal".[489]

As the conduct of the private individuals could not be attributed to SFOR, the Trial Chamber found it unnecessary to examine whether certain conduct by SFOR could be attributed to the OTP/the Tribunal.[490]

Now that the attribution submission of the Defence was rejected, the Trial Chamber looked at the submission as to whether the male captus should lead to a male detentus anyway, even if the male captus could not be attributed to SFOR/the OTP/the Tribunal. And in doing so, the judges of the ICTY, for the first time ever,[491] explicitly examined the male captus bene/male detentus discussion.[492] However, before going into this discussion, it warned that "[c]are needs to be applied"[493] with respect to the male captus case law of the various national jurisdictions. This was because this case law 1) "is far from uniform"[494] and 2) was

---

[487] Yearbook of the International Law Commission 2001, Vol. II, Part Two, Report of the Commission to the General Assembly on the work of its fifty-third session, United Nations, New York and Geneva, 2007, A/CN.4/SER.A/2001/Add.1 (Part 2), p. 53.

[488] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 67.

[489] Ibid.

[490] See ibid., para. 69.

[491] The judges noted that "[t]he Trial Chamber is aware that in answering the central legal question (…) it finds itself in uncharted waters." (Ibid., para. 75.)

[492] The Trial Chamber used the following male captus bene detentus definition: "The maxim male captus, bene detentus expresses the principle that a court may exercise jurisdiction over an accused person regardless of how that person has come into the jurisdiction of that court." (Ibid., para. 70.) It also noted, apparently with approval, the following male captus male detentus definition used by the Defence: "In the view of the Defence, this Tribunal should instead apply the principle of male captus, male detentus, meaning that an irregularity has occurred in the arrest of the Accused and therefore should bar any further exercise of jurisdiction by the Tribunal [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)

[493] Ibid., para. 75.

[494] Ibid. See also ibid.: "In some national jurisdictions, the maxim male captus, bene detentus is more closely followed than in others. Furthermore, the case law on this particular issue is still developing and such developments are more advanced in some jurisdictions. In addition, the concept of forced cross-border abductions is not always interpreted the same way. Case law often differs also in that the facts on which decisions have to be taken are not at all identical." Although it cannot be denied, of course, that decided in the context between sovereign States, on a horizontal level, whereas the relation between States and the ICTY is of a vertical nature.[495] Hence, "the national case law must be "translated" in order to apply to the particular context in which this Tribunal operates".[496] However, notwithstanding these two caveats, the Chamber noted that it "still regards it useful to provide an overview of his case law although the overview will not and cannot be exhaustive".[497]

The overview of the Trial Chamber consisted of 15 paragraphs,[498] addressing 19 national cases,[499] all of which have been discussed or at least briefly mentioned earlier in this book (where it was also argued that the Trial Chamber was sometimes not entirely accurate in its analysis).[500]

After its examination, the Trial Chamber first correctly observed "that the case law described above is rather diverse"[501] and that it involved many different male captus situations.[502] However, after repeating the warning made earlier that these cases stem from a context other than that in which the ICTY operates,[503] the Trial Chamber nevertheless distilled the following core elements (one might better say: core questions) from the overview:

---

the case law from the previous chapter was very diverse and involved many different male captus cases, leading to many different outcomes, this does not mean that there are not some common features discernible. See in that respect, for example, the point mentioned in the Al-Moayad case that in two specific male captus situations, State practice appears to indicate that jurisdiction must be refused. Nevertheless, it is clear that much depends here on the exact circumstances and therefore, that one should also be wary of making general statements on the (customary international law) status of male captus bene detentus. See, for example, Strijards 2001, pp. 96-97, Goldstone and Simpson 2003, p. 19, Hamid 2004, pp. 70, 78 and 86 and Loan 2005, p. 284. (Note that Goldstone and Simpson (2003, p. 19, n. 33) even qualify the male captus bene detentus rule as "a principle of extradition law". This peculiar statement has also been noted by Currie 2007, p. 359, n. 43. See for the same oddity Knoops 2002, p. 253, writing about "the principle of international extradition law male captus bene detentus".)

[495] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 76. See also ibid., paras. 95, 100 and 103. In addition, the Chamber warned that caution is required with respect to its own decision when referring to the debates on the male captus bene detenus principle at the national level, just like "caution is needed to interpret the outcome of this case in its vertical context to the debates in that horizontal context." (Ibid., para. 78.)

[496] Ibid., para. 76.

[497] Ibid., para. 77.

[498] See ibid., paras. 79-93.

[499] Namely: Ker v. Illinois, Frisbie v. Collins, United States v. Toscanino, United States, ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, United States v. Alvarez-Machain, United States v. Matta-Ballesteros, United States v. Noriega, Eichmann, ex p. Scott, ex p. Elliott, ex parte Mackeson, re Bennett, Regina v Hartley, Levinge, State v. Ebrahim, re Jolis, re Argoud, an untitled case by the German Constitutional Court from 17 July 1985 [this is the Stocké case, see ns. 503 et seq. of Chapter V, ChP] and State v. Beahan (Trial Chamber's own notation). Short references to cases in footnotes are not included here.

[500] See, for example, the ICTY Trial Chamber's statement that "[t]he rule of law is clearly interpreted here as demanding only a fair trial for an accused" (in the Bennett case) and its remark that "[t]he Court used its discretionary power to stay the case as it considered the conduct of the police to be an abuse of power" (in the Hartley case).

[501] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 94.

[502] See ibid.

[503] See ibid., para. 95.

- Was a member of the executive of the forum State involved in the illegal transfer of the accused from the State where he was found (the injured State) to the forum State?[504] (...) - Was the accused a national of the injured State (...) or of the forum State (...)?[505] - Did the injured State protest in some way against the fact that the accused was taken out of its territory? (...)[506] - Did an extradition treaty exist between the forum State and the injured State and, if so, was there first an attempt to apply that treaty? (...)[507] - How was the accused treated during the period between the moment of his deprivation of liberty in the injured State and the moment of his [504] Chapter V has shown that this is indeed an important element: if a prosecuting forum's own authorities are involved in the male captus, it is more likely that a male detentus will follow. An exception is the Swiss case of X (but it is to be noted that that was 'only' a male deditus decision). Cf. also Sluiter 2003 B, p. 946. One of the factors he presents which can be used in the determination whether a male detentus must follow is the "degree of attribution of the violation to the Tribunal".

[505] One can imagine that States may protest the violation of their sovereignty, irrespective of the nationality of the abducted person, see Fawcett 1964, p. 199: "[W]here there is an international issue in the form of a breach of the territorial jurisdiction of another State by the capture and abduction of an offender, neither his nationality nor the reason for his presence in that State are material to the right of that State to demand his return. In other words, such a demand is in effect an assertion by the State, not of a right of protection of the offender, but of its exclusive jurisdiction over persons and property in its territory. The offender therefore need not be a national of that State, or domiciled, or even legally resident within its territory." Nevertheless, one can assume that a protest will be more likely if the suspect is a national of the injured State. See, for example, Alvarez-Machain (Mexican national, male captus in Mexico, protest from Mexico), Jolis (Belgian national, male captus in Belgium, protest from Belgium) and Al-Moayad (Yemeni national, male captus in Yemen, protest from Yemen). Conversely, if the suspect is a national from the forum State and not from the State where the male captus took place, there may not be a protest, see, for example, Scott (English national, male captus in the Netherlands) and Ebrahim (South African national, male captus in Swaziland).

[506] Chapter V has shown that State practice indicates that an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect must lead to the male detentus outcome. However, in other male captus situations, of which it is less clear whether they lead to a violation of international law in the first place, such as luring, a protest may not help, see Al-Moayad.

[507] This point may be invoked by the forum State, in that a male captus technique would be more justified in case it is resorted to as an ultimum remedium. However, it is unclear whether the judges trying the case will be more willing to refuse jurisdiction if the Executive has not tried other legal possibilities first before turning to the male captus technique. Although cases like Bennett and Hartley (where the judges refused jurisdiction, among other things, because the Executive had not turned first to the possibility of having the suspect extradited in a normal way) and Matta-Ballesteros (where the judges did not refuse jurisdiction in a case where the prosecuting authorities had first tried to have the suspect extradited from Honduras to the US before they abducted him) may point to such an element, there are also cases where judges continued to exercise jurisdiction, even if the Executive had not resorted to the available extradition possibilities first, see, for example, Alvarez-Machain. Conversely, even if the circumvention of extradition treaties may constitute a factor in refusing jurisdiction, it is not so that such circumvention is necessary before a judge can stop the case. See in that respect also Sloan 2003 B, p. 549, n. 63: "The most that may be said is that the violation of an extradition treaty (…) may be a factor in the decisions of national courts [emphasis in original, ChP]". See also n. 335 where Sloan (2003 A, pp. 102-103) argues: "[W]hile the reasoning in several of the cases cited was indeed based on the national court's concern at the state's ignoring an established extradition regime (thereby depriving the accused of guarantees afforded by that system), none of the courts held – or implied – that the existence of an extradition treaty was a sine qua non of the determination to refuse jurisdiction."

official arrest in the forum State?[508] (...) - Finally, for which crimes was the accused sought?[509]

Now that the core elements/questions from the national male captus case law had been identified, the Trial Chamber turned to the allegations of the Defence that in this case, violations of 1) the sovereignty of the injured State and 2) human rights and the rule of law/due process of law[510] had occurred.[511]

With respect to the alleged violation of State sovereignty, the Trial Chamber, mentioning the elements which should be taken into account here,[512] was of the opinion that no such violation had occurred in this case. The reasons for this were threefold.

First, the Trial Chamber recalled the previously mentioned fact that in the vertical context of the ICTY/ICTR (international criminal tribunals established on the basis of Chapter VII of the UN Charter), "sovereignty by definition cannot play the same role"[513] as in the horizontal context of equal, sovereign States, where "it is of utmost importance that any exercise of (...) national jurisdiction be exercised in full respect of other national jurisdictions"[514] because "[o]bservance of this [508] Chapter V has shown that State practice indicates that courts will refuse jurisdiction in case an abduction is accompanied by serious mistreatment. In fact, one can assume that courts will do so in any male captus situation, see, for example, the following reasoning from the luring case of Yunis: "In this action, there is no dispute that United States law enforcement officers were fully involved in the planning and execution of defendant's arrest. However, defendant has failed either to allege or to show any actions committed by these officers that meet the standard of outrageousness established by Toscanino and its progeny requiring this Court to divest itself of jurisdiction. The record in this proceeding has been reviewed with care and the Court fails to find the type of cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino." (US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909), p. 920.) Cf. also Sluiter 2003 B, p. 946. One of the factors he presents which can be used in the determination whether a male detentus must follow is the "nature of the violation of individual rights". He continues (ibid., pp. 946-947): "violation of individual rights of an egregious nature, such as subjecting the individual to inhuman or degrading treatment, may constitute a legal impediment to exercise of jurisdiction by the Tribunal, regardless of whether or not the Tribunal, in particular the Prosecutor, had anything to do with that violation".

[509] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 95. Chapter V has indeed shown that judges may more easily continue the case because of the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged, see, for example, Latif.

[510] The Trial Chamber decided to address the concepts of 'human rights' and 'the rule of law'/'due process of law' together, see ibid., para. 106: "In relation to the question of whether a violation of human rights has occurred, the following factors in particular may play a role: how was the accused arrested, how was he treated, who was involved in the arrest and treatment? As regards the question of whether a violation of the principle of due process of law occurred, the same factors may play a role. In addition, the question may arise as to whether the Accused can still be considered to receive a fair trial. As both arguments are closely connected to each other, they will be discussed here together."

[511] See ibid., para. 96.

[512] See ibid., para. 97: "[T]he role the executive authorities of the forum State played in the transfer of the accused, the nationality of the accused, the role of the injured State itself and any treaty obligations that may exist between the injured State and the forum State, especially as to extradition."

[513] Ibid., para. 100.

[514] Ibid.

fundamental principle forms an important asset of peaceful co-operation between States".[515] This argument appears to be valid, although it should, of course, not constitute a carte blanche for the Tribunals to violate the sovereignty of States at will.[516]

Secondly, the Trial Chamber noted that Nikolić was deprived of his liberty by unknown individuals and that neither SFOR nor the Prosecution had been involved in his transfer from the FRY to Bosnia and Herzegovina or had offered incentives to these individuals.[517] This point was deemed to be very important as the national case law had shown "that in every case in which a court decided not to exercise jurisdiction the facts of the case demonstrated that executive authorities of the forum State had been involved in the disputed operation to transfer an accused from one State to another".[518] It is indeed true that Chapter V has shown that courts will generally continue with the case if the prosecuting State's own authorities were not involved in the male captus.[519]

Although the first two arguments are very reasonable, the third reason much resembles the argument already made and criticised in the context of the Dokmanović and Todorović cases, namely that > no issue arises as to possible circumvention of other available means for bringing the Accused into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. As follows inter alia from the vertical relationship between the Tribunal and national States, no extradition treaties are applicable. Instead, States are obliged to surrender indicted persons in compliance with any arrest warrants. Such warrants are de jure orders of this Tribunal directed to all Member States of the United Nations.[520]

---

[515] Ibid.

[516] Cf. also Sloan 2003 B, pp. 549-550: "While it is, of course, true that different considerations must apply as regards relations between the Tribunal and member states of the UN (clearly the Tribunal could not function if its relations with states were constrained in the same manner as between states), it is submitted that there must nevertheless be some limits on the ICTY's power to intervene in a state. Indeed the Decision would have benefited from consideration of whether there are such limits on the ICTY, and, if so, what they are and whether Nikolić's capture in violation of the law of the FRY violated them [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also (again, see n. 265) Lamb 2000, p. 223, n. 201: "Potentially at least, a State may plead lawful excuse, on the grounds that the ICTY (and hence by implication its orders) was instituted by the UN Security Council pursuant to a resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. (…) However, such a plea appears unlikely to succeed, on the grounds that while arrest warrants may constitute enforcement measures, these oblige custodial States to effect arrests or direct international forces to carry them out. They stop short of authorizing such States or forces to launch incursions into third States in order to do so".

[517] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 101.

[518] Ibid.

[519] An exception in that respect, see also n. 504, is the 1982 Swiss case of X (where no Swiss authorities were involved in the luring operation and the judge nevertheless halted the case), although it must also be admitted that this Court did not refuse jurisdiction to try the case (male detentus) but refused to extradite the person to the State involved in the luring operation (male deditus).

[520] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 103.

Although it is true that extradition treaties do not apply in the context of the Tribunals, this does not mean that one cannot circumvent the procedures applicable in the context of a State and the Tribunal and that such a circumvention of the normal rules can be compared with a circumvention of the extradition procedures in the horizontal context of States.[521]

The Chamber also made an obiter dictum, namely that "[e]ven if this Chamber would have concluded that a violation of State sovereignty had taken place in this case, the maxim "dolo facit qui petit quod [statim] redditurus est" would still have applied [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[522]

This maxim means that "a person acts with deceit who seeks what he will have to return [immediately]".[523] Thus, a person/State cannot ask what he/it is not entitled to, what he/it must return straightaway.

In this case, it would mean that "if a violation of State sovereignty had taken place, the Accused should first have been returned to the FRY, whereupon the FRY would have been immediately under the obligation of Article 29 of the Statute to surrender the Accused to the Tribunal".[524]

A few critical remarks can be made about this reasoning.

As already explained earlier, if, for example, employees from the OTP are responsible for orchestrating an abduction, violating the sovereignty of a State, the regular transfer procedures and the human rights of the suspect, the judges will have no option but to refuse jurisdiction and to release the person. That might very well lead to a return to that suspect's State of residence/the injured State.

Now, of course, the male captus discussion must not be used in such a way that the fight against impunity is brought to a standstill. The fact that this court will refuse the case does not mean that the suspect cannot be tried elsewhere. As a result, the return can be made conditional, for example, on the State of residence being willing and able to prosecute the suspect for his alleged crimes. If the injured State cannot guarantee this, the suspect should be transferred to another jurisdiction which is willing and able to prosecute him.

However, all this does not mean that the suspect or the injured State cannot claim that the suspect should be returned to the injured State. They can. The argument of the Tribunal – in that they cannot do so because the injured State would have a renewed obligation to transfer him to the Tribunal – overlooks the fact that such a new transfer would make no sense if the Tribunal has earlier refused jurisdiction in this case. The fact that, for example, the OTP has forfeited its right to prosecute the suspect will not simply disappear because of the return and the immediate new transfer. In short, there is no point in transferring a person to a Tribunal which has earlier determined that it cannot try the person. If there is no point in transferring the person, the injured State arguably has no obligation to do so. Thus, a maxim which [521] See for criticism on this point of the Trial Chamber also Sloan 2003 B, p. 549.

[522] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 104.
[523] Ibid., n. 114.
[524] Ibid., para. 104.

assumes that the complaining actor cannot complain because it has a duty to re-transfer cannot be applied.

However, in less serious male captus cases, where the judge has not refused jurisdiction but where he may nevertheless be of the opinion that a violation of State sovereignty, strictly speaking, demands that the suspect is released and returned to the injured State (note that this would only be so if the injured State protested the violation of its sovereignty and requested the return of the suspect), then the maxim would make sense, see also the discussion of this issue in the Dokmanović and Todorović cases. After all, in such a case, the Tribunal can still try the person. If that is so, and taking into account the injured State's obligation to cooperate with the Tribunal, it would indeed be strange if the suspect/the injured State sought the suspect's return. After all, that would mean that the suspect would be returned, after which the injured State would have to immediately transfer the suspect back to the Tribunal (which would (still) be competent to try him). Such a pro forma and ridiculous 'return-immediate re-transfer construction' would make no sense, especially in the context of a State which is not very willing to cooperate with the Tribunal. Hence, in such a case, it would be better if the Tribunal does not return the suspect but continues the case and repairs the violation of State sovereignty in another way, for instance, through an apology.

With respect to the alleged violation of human rights and the rule of law/due process of law, the Trial Chamber, mentioning the elements which should be taken into account here,[525] first of all noted that it attached great importance to these two concepts.[526]

For example, it considered that it had "a responsibility to fully respect "internationally recognized standards regarding the rights of the accused at all stages of its proceedings"",[527] standards which can be found in Articles 5 and 6 of the ECHR.

Although Article 5 of the ECHR could be interpreted strictly, meaning that the Tribunal would only look at how the suspect was formally arrested and detained by ICTY officials when the suspect came into the power of these officials, the Tribunal has rightly rejected this approach and has opted for a much broader interpretation:

> There exists a close relationship between the obligation of the Tribunal to respect the human rights of the Accused and the obligation to ensure due process of law. Ensuring that the Accused's rights are respected and that he receives a fair trial forms, in actual fact, an important aspect of the general concept of due process of law. In that context, this Chamber concurs with the view expressed in several national judicial decisions, according to which the issue of respect for due process of law encompasses

[525] See ibid., para. 106: "In relation to the question of whether a violation of human rights has occurred, the following factors in particular may play a role: how was the accused arrested, how was he treated, who was involved in the arrest and treatment? As regards the question of whether a violation of the principle of due process of law occurred, the same factors may play a role. In addition, the question may arise as to whether the Accused can still be considered to receive a fair trial."
[526] See ibid., para. 110.
[527] Ibid.

> more than merely the duty to ensure a fair trial for the Accused. Due process of law also includes questions such as how the Parties have been conducting themselves in the context of a particular case and how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal [emphasis added, ChP].[528]

Thus, the Trial Chamber continued, the Prosecution must come to court with clean hands (cf. the reasoning in Ebrahim).[529]

In addition, it concurred with the still-to-discuss Barayagwiza case of the ICTR Appeals Chamber in that "the abuse of process doctrine may be relied on if "in the circumstances of a particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice"".[530]

However, according to the Trial Chamber, this doctrine can only be used if it is "clear that the rights of the Accused have been egregiously violated [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[531]

Importantly, the Trial Chamber noted, after having – carefully – referred to a number of cases from the UN Human Rights Committee,[532] that in such cases, the entity responsible for such an egregious violation is irrelevant (cf. also the previously discussed Milošević case):

> [I]n a situation where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subjected to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment to the exercise of jurisdiction over such an accused. This would certainly be the case where persons acting for SFOR or the Prosecution were involved in such very serious mistreatment. But even without such involvement this Chamber finds it extremely difficult to justify the exercise of jurisdiction over a person if that person was brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal after having been seriously mistreated.[533]

This version of the abuse of process test clearly goes much further than the national abuse of process doctrine, where the involvement of the authorities of the prosecuting forum appears to be required. Nevertheless, even if it does not follow

---

[528] Ibid., para. 111.
[529] See ibid.
[530] Ibid.
[531] Ibid.
[532] See ibid., para. 113: "The Defence makes reference to several decisions of the Human Rights Committee relating to forced abductions in the 1980's in some Latin-American countries [namely the cases of Almeida de Quinteros, Lopez Burgos, Celiberti de Casariego and Cañón García, see ibid., n. 122 and Subsection 2.2.2 of Chapter III, ChP]. In these decisions, the persons concerned were considered victims of violations of the right to liberty and security of the person. The Chamber hesitates to apply this case law automatically mutatis mutandis to the issue at hand. Those cases were decided in the specific context of whether a State should be held responsible for the violation of the human rights it was duty-bound to respect. Furthermore, in all those cases, the States against which the applications were lodged were themselves involved in the forced abductions of the victims. As already discussed above, this aspect is an important factor in the assessment of the legal and factual issues in the case at hand [original footnote omitted, ChP]."
[533] Ibid., para. 114.

the national abuse of process doctrine, it can be argued that this Tribunal's version of the doctrine is to be welcomed and in fact may also be very appropriate for the inter-State context. The abuse of process doctrine, in the words of Lord Lowry, means that > a court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case.[534]

Thus, and focusing now on the second element, which for this study is the most interesting (see also Subsection 4.3 of Chapter III), there may be pre-trial circumstances which are so serious that it would undermine the court's sense of justice/integrity/propriety to proceed with the case. Although the national abuse of process doctrine focuses on the pre-trial irregularities committed by authorities which can be linked to the prosecuting forum, the above-mentioned words of Lord Lowry are so generally formulated that they could also encompass irregularities committed by others. For example, national courts may also be confronted by an abduction by private individuals during the course of which the suspect is seriously mistreated. This may seem far-fetched, but when the stakes are considered to be high enough, such a situation may not be excluded at the national level either. The fact that national courts are prosecuting more and more international crimes themselves may contribute to such situations. If it can be established that such an abduction took place in the context of the national court's case, one can imagine that a judge may also refuse jurisdiction because the irregularity which occurred in the context of his case may be deemed to be so serious that he cannot continue with the case, even if entities which cannot be connected with the prosecuting forum were responsible for the irregularity.

Nevertheless, this broad version of the abuse of process doctrine is arguably especially interesting for the Tribunals because they do not have their own police force. That means that, besides the fact that they may be confronted by irregularities committed by private individuals (a situation which may occur in the context of any court, even a court which has a police force at its disposal), the Tribunal may be confronted by irregularities committed by, for example, national police forces and international troops working for them. Normally, there is nothing wrong with arrests/detentions/transfers executed by those entities at the request of the Tribunal. In those cases, the Tribunal may profit from the actions of third parties. However, there may also be instances where the consequences of the Tribunal's dependence on others are negative, namely when something goes wrong in the pre-trial arrest and detention phase. It would be very easy but not a sign of real legal 'maturity' for the Tribunal to only accept the positive side of the fact that it has no police force of its own. In addition, if the Tribunal – and this also goes for a national court – did not remedy violations committed in its pre-trial phase, whichever entity committed those violations, the suspect would fall into a legal vacuum, a situation which must, of course, be prevented by the court which is ultimately prosecuting the case.

[534] See n. 610 and accompanying text of Chapter III and ns. 300 and 310 and accompanying text of Chapter V.

Having said that, it must also be noted that the above-mentioned words of the ICTY Trial Chamber focus on the mistreatment dimension of the abuse of process doctrine. That is, of course, very well possible: if a person is seriously mistreated in the context of his case, a judge may feel that he cannot continue the case. However, it must also be understood that the abuse of process doctrine is not a 'torture test'.[535] It is not only about (physical)[536] mistreatment. It may very well be that a suspect's rights are seriously violated, even if he is not mistreated. In such cases, the abuse of process doctrine can, of course, also be invoked. In that respect, it may be good to know that the Nikolić Trial Chamber, when it wrote that "in order to prompt a Chamber to use this doctrine, it needs to be clear that the rights of the Accused have been egregiously violated [original footnote omitted, ChP]",[537] referred to the (still-to-discuss) Barayagwiza case,[538] a case in which the suspect was not seriously mistreated. In that case, the suspect 'only' suffered such serious violations of his rights that the Appeals Chamber was of the opinion that a male detentus verdict was in order.[539] To use the example of the abduction: it can be argued (as has been done earlier and as will be done later in this book) that if the Tribunal were responsible for an abduction, the judges should resolutely refuse jurisdiction under the abuse of process doctrine. In such a situation, it should not matter whether or not the suspect was seriously mistreated during his abduction. The mere fact that an international criminal tribunal would resort to an abduction should be seen as such a serious irregularity that the judges, in good conscience, can no longer proceed with the case. It should be noted that the Trial Chamber may indeed be in favour of this stance. It is true that the judges have focused on serious mistreatment in their explanation that the abuse of process doctrine can also be applied to third parties, but they only did so in the context of private individuals' conduct.[540] Hence, this does not exclude the [535] Cf. also Michell 1996, p. 403 (commenting on the interpretation of the Toscanino case by later courts): "[T]hese later interpretations suggest incorrectly that Toscanino was primarily a "torture" case rather than a "forcible abduction" case [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[536] In the context of male captus cases, mistreatment normally means physical mistreatment/bodily harm. See, for example, the torture suffered by Toscanino (see ns. 53 and 79 of Chapter V). However, even though the term (serious) mistreatment/torture in this book is thus mainly used in a physical sense, the term as such may, of course, also encompass mental mistreatment.

[537] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111.

[538] See ibid., n. 121. See also ibid., para. 114 where the Trial Chamber notes that its view "is in keeping with the approach of the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza case, according to which in cases of egregious violations of the rights of the Accused, it is "irrelevant which entity or entities were responsible for the alleged violations of the Appellant's rights." [original footnote omitted, ChP]"

[539] See also the Bennett case as discussed in Chapter V, where the judges refused jurisdiction under the abuse of process doctrine in a case where the prosecuting authorities were involved in a deliberate circumvention of the extradition possibilities and during which Bennett was not mistreated in any way.

[540] See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para.

Trial Chamber from also applying the abuse of process doctrine in, for example, the above-mentioned case of an abduction organised by Tribunal staff and without any serious mistreatment. In fact, the following (and partly already presented) words constitute clear support for that stance:

> [T]his Chamber concurs with the view expressed in several national judicial decisions, according to which the issue of respect for due process of law encompasses more than merely the duty to ensure a fair trial for the Accused. Due process of law also includes questions such as how the Parties have been conducting themselves in the context of a particular case and how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The finding in the Ebrahim case [where, it should be remembered, the suspect was the victim of a 'normal' abduction, without any serious mistreatment, ChP][541] that the State must come to court with clean hands applies equally to the Prosecution coming to a Trial Chamber of this Tribunal.[542]

Moreover, one can also imagine that in cases in which the Tribunal was not involved, a certain male captus may be deemed to be so serious, even if the suspect was not seriously mistreated, that judges may refuse jurisdiction.

Applying the Trial Chamber's reasoning to the facts of the case, the judges assessed the level of violence against Nikolić and found "that the assumed facts, although they do raise some concerns, do not at all show that the treatment of the Accused by the unknown individuals (…) was of such an egregious nature."[543] As a result, the final conclusion was that > on the basis of the assumed facts, the Tribunal must exercise jurisdiction over the Accused. The allegations that his human rights have been violated or that proceeding with the case would violate the fundamental principle of due process of law are rejected.[544]

There is something strange about this conclusion.

Although the Trial Chamber may be perfectly right in concluding that, on the basis of the assumed facts, the male captus of Nikolić was not so egregious as to divest jurisdiction – it can be argued that this should indeed be reserved for the truly serious cases – and hence that proceeding with the case would not violate the

---

113: "The Chamber has already concluded that, as such, the acts of the unknown individuals, i.e. bringing the Accused against his will from the territory of the FRY into the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina, cannot be attributed to SFOR or the Prosecutor."

[541] Of course, an abduction will always contain some force/threat of force. For the Ebrahim case, see n. 657 of the previous chapter, where reference is made to Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 890: "He was bound, blindfolded and gagged". In 95 International Law Reports (1994), where one can find more details on the abduction itself, one can read that Ebrahim's kidnappers "pointed guns at him and warned him that they would kill him if he screamed or made a noise." (95 International Law Reports (1994), p. 420.)

[542] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111.

[543] Ibid., para. 114.

[544] Ibid., para. 115.

fundamental principle of due process of law/the rule of law, it was nevertheless also concluded, again within the context of the assumed facts, that Nikolić was kidnapped and mistreated during his abduction. However, how does that conclusion comport with the Trial Chamber's findings that no human rights have been violated?

This can probably only be explained by the fact that the Trial Chamber must be of the opinion that private individuals cannot violate human rights, see also the discussion of this topic in Chapter III of this book.[545] After all, how else can one conclude – on the basis of the assumed facts – that, on the one hand, there was a kidnapping during which course Nikolić was mistreated (but not so seriously as to divest jurisdiction) and, on the other hand, there was no violation of human rights?

A reason for this potential inconsistency could be that the ICTY was afraid of the possible consequences of a finding that there was a violation of Nikolić's rights, namely that in that case, it would be logical to grant remedies.[546] (As explained in the context of the Milošević case, if the Tribunal is prepared, in the context of the abuse of process doctrine, to take the ultimate responsibility (namely the refusal of jurisdiction) for violations committed by other entities, one can argue that it should also take responsibility more generally and repair less serious violations committed in the context of its case, whether or not these violations can be attributed to the Tribunal.)

It is also interesting to point to the fact that the ICTY 'safely' speaks about Nikolić's rights, which arguably refers to his rights under the ICTY Statute, and not more broadly about Nikolić's human rights, which term the Defence seemed to embrace (see footnotes 442-443 of Chapter III and 448, 457-458 and accompanying text of the present chapter). There may be a reason for this. It could be that the Tribunal is afraid that if it were to speak more broadly about human rights such as the right to liberty and security, that a finding that a violation of that right had occurred would lead to the remedies of this human right, such as release and compensation. However, as the ICTY Statute does not refer to these remedies (or to the right to liberty and security), the Tribunal may have thought that if it did not to [545] Cf. again (see also n. 532) ibid., para. 113: "The Defence makes reference to several decisions of the Human Rights Committee relating to forced abductions in the 1980's in some Latin-American countries [namely the cases of Almeida de Quinteros, Lopez Burgos, Celiberti de Casariego and Cañón García, see ibid., n. 122 and Subsection 2.2.2 of Chapter III, ChP]. In these decisions, the persons concerned were considered victims of violations of the right to liberty and security of the person. The Chamber hesitates to apply this case law automatically mutatis mutandis to the issue at hand. Those cases were decided in the specific context of whether a State should be held responsible for the violation of the human rights it was duty-bound to respect. Furthermore, in all those cases, the States against which the applications were lodged were themselves involved in the forced abductions of the victims. As already discussed above, this aspect is an important factor in the assessment of the legal and factual issues in the case at hand [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[546] See also Sloan 2006, p. 341: "[A]lthough the facts – limited though they were – clearly implied that illegality had occurred, the Trial Chamber concocted several arguments to the effect that there had been no breach of sovereignty or human rights and therefore no illegal capture. By making such improbable findings (…) the Trial Chamber was able to sidestep the difficult issue of what remedy would be required." See further Sloan 2005, p. 492, arguing that the illegal capture "violated state sovereignty and the human rights of the accused."

refer to general human rights, it would have more discretion in finding the most appropriate remedy in the case of a violation and as such would have been able to evade the rather 'automatic' sanctions in the case of a violation of the right to liberty and security, namely release and compensation. However, even if that was the reasoning of the ICTY, this would not have helped the Tribunal as it has already been shown that the Tribunal must not only adhere to (the rights from) its own Statute but also to the more general human rights (such as the right to liberty and security, which arguably also includes the remedies of this right).

Hence, although the fundamental principle of due process/the rule of law might still have been violated if Nikolić's mistreatment by the private individuals were more serious (because for that violation to materialise, it is irrelevant which entity is responsible for the violation), the Chamber's conclusion that no violation of State sovereignty or Nikolić's human rights had occurred appears to have been triggered by the assumed fact that Nikolić was kidnapped and mistreated by private individuals. And because the Trial Chamber seems to be of the opinion that private individuals cannot violate the sovereignty of a State or human rights, Nikolić's arguments were rejected. In that respect, one can only agree with Sloan who notes in his commentary to this decision that

> Nikolić's lack of success in the motions appears to have been linked in no small way to the decision on the part of the defence counsel to agree to assumed facts and, in particular, to agree that Nikolić's captors in the FRY were 'unknown individuals having no connection with SFOR and/or the Tribunal' [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[547]

One cannot deny that there seems to be some friction in the outcome of this decision, a friction which is caused by the fact that the Trial Chamber, on the one hand, concludes that the assumed facts show that Nikolić was abducted and mistreated during his abduction and, on the other hand, does nothing with that conclusion. As explained above, one could argue that the Tribunal, now that it has admitted that it will take the ultimate form of responsibility (namely by divesting jurisdiction) in very serious cases, is also perfectly able to take responsibility for less serious violations committed in the pre-trial phase (by unknown individuals). Thus, perhaps the judges could also have stated that the assumed facts mean that Nikolić is entitled to lighter, less far-reaching remedies (than the male detentus remedy) for the abduction and his (not so serious) mistreatment, and that it now only needs to be determined, via an evidentiary hearing, whether the assumed facts have in fact occurred in reality. If the Chamber had taken such a stance, it would have met Nikolić's very reasonable request that the Chamber, if it did not grant him the (ultimate) relief sought (namely his release and the dismissal of the indictment against him), would grant him "such other relief that the Court deems appropriate".[548]

[547] Sloan 2003 B, p. 551.

A final point which must be made before turning to the Appeals Chamber's decision is that the Trial Chamber is clearly not in favour of the male captus bene detentus rule as interpreted by the Trial Chamber itself, namely "that a court may exercise jurisdiction over an accused person regardless of how that person has come into the jurisdiction of that court".[549] After all, the words "regardless of" entail that the judges can always exercise their jurisdiction, no matter what happened during the proceedings of bringing a person into the power of the court. It is clear that this idea is not supported by the Trial Chamber for it has stated that "[d]ue process of law also includes questions such as (…) how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal".[550] This means that the circumstances of how an accused came into the power of the court may influence the decision as to whether or not jurisdiction should be exercised in this specific case. Therefore, a maxim which automatically upholds the exercise of jurisdiction, no matter what had happened during the pre-trial phase, is arguably not endorsed here. In fact, the Trial Chamber, while neither following the strict male captus male detentus reasoning of the Defence,[551] seems nevertheless more interested in the ideas behind this latter maxim when it writes, referring to the male captus male detentus case (Ebrahim), that the Prosecution must come to court with clean hands, implying that if the Prosecution did not do so, the Trial Chamber would follow the male detentus route.[552]

---

[548] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 18. See also Sluiter 2003 B, p. 947: "I agree with the Chamber that in such circumstances, release of the accused would be a disproportionate remedy. However, one wonders why the Trial Chamber, as the Appeals Chamber did in Barayagwiza, did not consider alternative remedies. In this respect, one can envisage the reduction of the sentence, in case of conviction, or financial compensation, in case of acquittal."

[549] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 70 and n. 492.

[550] See ns. 528 and 542 and accompanying text.

[551] After all, a male captus situation ("an irregularity has occurred in the arrest of the Accused") does not automatically lead ("and therefore") to a male detentus situation ("should bar any further exercise of jurisdiction"). See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 70. Only a serious male captus might lead to the dismissal of jurisdiction. Hence, there are two 'buts' here. First of all, there must be not just any irregularity but a serious male captus. Although the Defence alleged that this was the case here, the Trial Chamber did not concur. Furthermore, even if there was such a serious male captus, then this does not automatically lead to the verdict male detentus. (Although the Trial Chamber should, of course, come up with extremely good reasons to entertain jurisdiction in such a case.)

[552] See also Sloan 2003 B, pp. 547-548: "While not explicitly endorsing the male captus, male detentus approach over that of male captus, bene detentus, the trial chamber did appear to disapprove of the latter approach given its clear willingness to look into the nature of the accused's capture. Moreover, it specifically applied aspects of some of the national decisions which followed the male captus, male detentus approach [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., p. 552: "[T]he trial chamber's emphasis on its obligation to ensure due process of law and its endorsement of some of the principles expressed by the national courts following the male captus, male detentus approach – specifically its

However, many will also argue that despite all these theoretical deliberations and commendable ideas, the factual outcome of the case is still that the court continues to exercise its jurisdiction (bene detentus), notwithstanding the (assumed) fact that Nikolić was kidnapped – and mistreated during his kidnapping – before being brought to the ICTY (male captus). The Trial Chamber could perhaps have distanced itself even more from the rather old-fashioned male captus bene detentus reasoning if it had remedied the assumed violations suffered by Nikolić, even if those remedies had not led to a male detentus outcome. Such an approach would have brought more flexibility into a system which sometimes seems too much focused on the two ultimate and extreme remedies: bene detentus or male detentus.

Nikolić appealed the decision of the Trial Chamber, thus ensuring that the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY had for the first time to give its opinion on the male captus discussion.[553]

Reading the Appeals Chamber's central question[554] and its strategy on how to tackle the problem at hand,[555] it is apparent that the judges – in contrast to their colleagues in the Trial Chamber – wished to address the issue of the remedies first, before turning to the specifics of the case.[556] They started with a theoretical framework – in which cases of violations of State sovereignty and human rights in general is the remedy of setting aside jurisdiction appropriate? – to which they later wanted to apply the facts of this specific case. If these facts indeed warranted the requested remedy, then it also had to be determined whether these violations could comment that the prosecution is obliged to come before a trial chamber of the ICTY with 'clean hands' – might be taken as an indication of how it would rule if the OTP and/or SFOR were implicated in the capture [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[553] The following examination of the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić has, to a large extent, been taken from Paulussen 2008.

[554] See ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 3: "The question presented in this appeal is whether the International Tribunal can exercise jurisdiction over the Appellant notwithstanding the alleged violations of Serbia and Monten[e]gro's sovereignty and of the Accused's human rights committed by SFOR, and by extension OTP, acting in collusion with the unknown individuals who abducted the Accused from Serbia and Montenegro."

[555] See ibid., para. 18: "The Appeals Chamber observes that the basic assumption underlying the Defence submissions is that setting aside jurisdiction by the International Tribunal is the appropriate remedy for the violations of State sovereignty and/or human rights that allegedly occurred in this case. That assumption requires further scrutiny. For, if the setting aside of jurisdiction is not the appropriate remedy for such violations, then, even assuming that they occurred and that the Defence is correct that the responsibility for the actions of the Accused's captors should be attributed to SFOR, jurisdiction would not need to be set aside. Thus, the first issue to be addressed is in what circumstances, if any, the International Tribunal should decline to exercise its jurisdiction because an accused has been brought before it through conduct violating State sovereignty or human rights. Once the standard warranting the declining of the exercise of jurisdiction has been identified, the Appeals Chamber will have to determine whether the facts of this case are ones that, if proven, would warrant such a remedy. If yes, then the Appeals Chamber must determine whether the underlying violations are attributable to SFOR and by extension to the OTP."

[556] The judges of the Trial Chamber did not (really) have to go into the matter of the remedies since, in their opinion, the facts of the case did not indicate violations of the sovereignty of Serbia and Montenegro, the human rights of Nikolić and the principle of due process in the first place.

in fact be attributed to SFOR and by extension to the OTP. At least two comments can be made here.[557]

First, as with the Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber seemed too focused on the ultimate remedy of setting aside jurisdiction. Admittedly, that is the remedy the Defence is aiming for, but Nikolić's basic objective is arguably that the injustice of his abduction is addressed and repaired – for example, by other, less drastic remedies if the desired remedy is not granted.[558] By formulating its strategy as such, the Appeals Chamber limited the issue of the remedies to an 'all-or-nothing' formula, which leaves no room for differentiation and which will ensure that the suspect will rarely come off best. After all, bearing in mind that an international criminal tribunal has the task not only of protecting the human rights of the suspect but also of prosecuting very serious crimes, it will – and within the limits of the law, it should – do everything in its power to prevent the termination of the proceedings.

Secondly, a crucial element in the argumentation of the Defence was that a kidnapping as such (irrespective of who was responsible for it and how much violence was used) constitutes an egregious violation of the accused's rights [557] A further comment is that the central question does not contain the allegation that the abduction violated due process of law – even though that allegation is correctly mentioned in the paragraph preceding the one containing the central question, where the Appeals Chamber provides a summary of the Trial Chamber's conclusions. A short remark like the one made by the Trial Chamber in para. 106 of that Chamber's decision, see also n. 510 ("As both arguments [relating to the issues of human rights violations and violations of due process of law, ChP] are closely connected to each other, they will be discussed here together.") would probably have been enough to at least diminish the somewhat hasty and incomplete impression one gets when reading the Appeals Chamber's decision. Several small (spelling) errors contribute to that feeling. An example can be found in para. 19, where the Appeals Chamber states that Nikolić is charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity. However, even though Nikolić was indeed initially indicted for war crimes and crimes against humanity (see also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 2), he was 'only' charged with crimes against humanity at the time of the proceedings, see also n. 440 and accompanying text.

[558] See again ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 18: "The relief sought by the Accused is his release and the dismissal of the Indictment against him or such other relief that the Court deems appropriate [emphasis added, ChP]." In fact, Sluiter (2004 C, pp. 245-246) explains that the judges are not even bound by the submissions of the parties. When writing on the UK and US briefs in the Todorović case, he notes: "The briefs also harbour a misconception as to the role of the judiciary when it comes to the question of relief. The shared argument is that even if the facts asserted by the defence are true, they do not warrant the relief the defendant seeks, namely release and return to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. One notices here the apparent position, that the Trial Chamber has no option other than to either grant or refuse the requested relief. However, in the ICTY procedure, the Chamber is not limited to the application of the parties. The Chamber may, on the basis of presented evidence, rule that release is not an appropriate remedy and instead order alternative remedies. (...) Taking account of Rule 5 (C), the Trial Chamber decides independently on an appropriate legal remedy [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Rule 5 (C) of the ICTY RPE reads: "The relief granted by a Trial Chamber under this Rule shall be such remedy as the Trial Chamber considers appropriate to ensure consistency with the fundamental principles of fairness." Sluiter (ibid., p. 246, n. 19) clarifies: "Although Rule 5 applies to violations of the Rules or Regulations, it offers a good starting point when dealing with violations of other applicable law." Cf. also Lamb 2000, pp. 242-243 and Henquet 2003, p. 124.

justifying a bar to the exercise of jurisdiction.[559] The Appeals Chamber was aware of this argument.[560] Indeed, as will be shown infra, under certain circumstances, the Appeals Chamber seemed to concur with the more specific view that an abduction, irrespective of who was responsible for it, can lead to a refusal of jurisdiction.[561] However, if that is indeed the Appeals Chamber's position on this, then both its central question and strategy are confusing, since they give rise to the impression that the Tribunal will only set aside its jurisdiction if the violations requiring that remedy can be connected to the Tribunal.[562]

Leaving aside that matter for now, it is time to look at the two questions founding the Appeals Chamber's theoretical framework: 1) under what circumstances does a violation of State sovereignty require jurisdiction to be set aside; and 2) under what circumstances does a human rights violation require jurisdiction to be set aside?

With respect to the first question, the Appeals Chamber started by saying that this is "a novel issue for this Tribunal"[563] and that "[i]n the absence of clarity in the Statute, Rules and jurisprudence of the International Tribunal, the Appeals Chamber will seek guidance from national case law, where the issue at hand has often arisen, in order to determine State practice on the matter".[564] This approach, which was

---

[559] See ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 15: "The Defence contends that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the circumstances of the Accused's arrest were insufficiently egregious to justify a discretionary stay of the proceedings. The Defence argues that, following the reasoning of the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal [for Rwanda, ChP] ("ICTR") in Barayagwiza, a court may decline to exercise its jurisdiction in cases where violations of an accused's rights are so egregious that to exercise jurisdiction would be detrimental to the court's integrity. The Defence contends that kidnapping constitutes such an egregious violation. In order to deter future kidnappings, the Defence stresses that the International Tribunal should only exercise jurisdiction over indictees who were transferred to the International Tribunal through lawful means. Exercising jurisdiction in this case amounts to condoning kidnappings that are executed with minimal violence."

[560] See ibid. With respect to the position that it should be irrelevant as to who is responsible for the abduction, see also the following and more general sentence in ibid., para. 18, where the connection with the Tribunal is also not mentioned: "[T]he basic assumption underlying the Defence submissions is that setting aside jurisdiction by the International Tribunal is the appropriate remedy for the violation of State sovereignty and/or human rights that allegedly occurred in this case."

[561] It is, however, doubtful whether the Appeals Chamber also agrees with the idea that an abduction, irrespective of how much violence was used during the seizure (this may include an abduction with minimal violence), can lead to the ending of the case, see infra.

[562] After all, the central question reads: "The question in this appeal is whether the International Tribunal can exercise jurisdiction over the Appellant notwithstanding the alleged violations (…) committed by SFOR, and by extension OTP, acting in collusion with the unknown individuals [emphasis added, ChP]". (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 3.) Furthermore, the last part of the strategy states: "Once the standard warranting the declining of the exercise of jurisdiction has been identified, the Appeals Chamber will have to determine whether the facts of this case are ones that, if proven, would warrant such a remedy. If yes, then the Appeals Chamber must determine whether the underlying violations are attributable to SFOR and by extension to the OTP [emphasis added, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 18.)

[563] Ibid., para. 20.

[564] Ibid.

reapplied when addressing question two, reflects the Trial Chamber's approach to seeing which of the elements of the inter-State discussion on male captus bene/male detentus might play a role in the case at hand. However, whereas the Trial Chamber examined the inter-State context rather comprehensively,[565] the theoretical framework of the Appeals Chamber prima facie seemed less impressive: it warranted just four paragraphs,[566] addressing nine national cases.[567]

Besides this quantitative aspect, which admittedly is not necessarily a reliable criterion for the quality of the overview, one can focus on the sort of cases the judges reviewed in order to find the principles from the inter-State context. The Appeals Chamber appeared to use a specific criterion here: almost all the cases the judges referred to were decided by the highest judicial authorities of a State.[568] Such a criterion might very well be justifiable, since these institutions and their cases have de iure and de facto great legal authority.[569]

Continuing this line of reasoning, it is understandable that the Appeals Chamber also paid some – albeit perhaps too little – attention in its overview to inter-State male captus case law decided by institutions with perhaps even greater legal authority: the ECmHR and the ECtHR (obviously taking into account that these institutions, in contrast to national courts, do not have to decide whether they can try the suspect notwithstanding the male captus).[570]

However, it is a pity that the Appeals Chamber, in contrast to the Trial Chamber, did not refer to decisions from, for example, the HRC.[571]

Admittedly, being a quasi-legal institution, its decisions might not have the same authority as those from genuine international human rights courts, but its international perspective on inter-State male captus cases would nevertheless be of value to the ICTY judges.

Returning to question one, the Appeals Chamber referred on the one hand to the French Argoud, German Stocké and US Alvarez-Machain cases to show that several (supreme) courts "have held that jurisdiction should not be set aside, even though

---

[565] See ns. 498-499 and accompanying text.

[566] See ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, paras. 21-23 (concerning the issue of State sovereignty) and para. 29 (concerning the issue of human rights).

[567] Argoud, Stocke, United States v. Alvarez-Machain, Jacob-Salomon, State v. Ebrahim, Bennet, Eichmann, Barbie and Toscanino. (Appeals Chamber's own (and not always correct) notation.) Short references to cases in footnotes are not included here.

[568] Exceptions are the Jacob-Salomon and Toscanino cases. As already explained in n. 407 of Chapter V, Jacob-Salomon was not decided by a judicial body. This kidnapping case was settled directly between the Governments of Switzerland and Germany after the latter proposed the termination of the initiated arbitral procedure. Furthermore, Toscanino was 'merely' decided by a US Court of Appeals.

[569] See also Chapter IV.

[570] Although only the reference to the Stocké case (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 21) could be found in the Appeals Chamber's overview (ibid., paras. 21-23 and 29), the Öcalan (ibid., para. 26, n. 30) and Soering (ibid., para. 30, n. 36) cases were also mentioned in the decision. (Note, however, that the Soering case cannot be seen as a male captus case.)

[571] See n. 532 and accompanying text.

there might have been irregularities in the manner in which the accused was brought before them".[572]

On the other hand, the Appeals Chamber noted that "there have been cases in which the exercise of jurisdiction has been declined",[573] referring to the Swiss-German Jacob-Salomon, (which, it should be remembered, did not involve a court declining jurisdiction),[574] South African Ebrahim and the British Bennett cases.

It then turned to two cases which concerned "the same kinds of crimes as those falling within the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal":[575] the Israeli Eichmann and French Barbie cases.

From these eight cases, the Appeals Chamber, while rightly warning that "it is difficult to identify a clear pattern in this case law, and caution is needed when generalising",[576] distilled two principles, which "seem to have support in State practice as evidenced by the practice of their courts":[577]

> First, in cases of crimes such as genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes which are universally recognised and condemned as such ("Universally Condemned Offences"), courts seem to find in the special character of these offences and, arguably, in their seriousness, a good reason for not setting aside jurisdiction. Second, absent a complaint by the State whose sovereignty has been breached or in the event of a diplomatic resolution of the breach, it is easier for courts to assert their jurisdiction. The initial iniuria has in a way been cured and the risk of having to return the accused to the country of origin is no longer present.[578]

To begin with the latter (and not very carefully formulated)[579] principle: Chapter V has shown that there is indeed evidence in the practice of courts that if two States have resolved the problem of an alleged violation of State sovereignty amongst themselves (not resulting in a request for the return of the suspect), or if the injured State does not complain at all about the violation, there is no duty for the prosecuting State to return the suspect to the injured State.[580]

That would also mean that there is in principle no reason for a judge, as an element of that prosecuting State, not to proceed with the case. As explained earlier, a suspect should, of course, have ius standi to plead an alleged violation of State

---

[572] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 21.
[573] Ibid., para. 22.
[574] See n. 568 of this chapter and n. 407 of Chapter V.
[575] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 23.
[576] Ibid., para. 24.
[577] Ibid.
[578] Ibid.
[579] To take the example of the State sovereignty violating abduction: in many cases where the injured State complained about an abduction by the forum State, the problem was solved diplomatically by the return of the abducted person from the forum State to the injured State (see, for example, the Jacob-Salomon case). If such a diplomatic resolution took place, it was not "easier" for a court to assert jurisdiction: it was in fact impossible (because there was not going to be a trial at all).
[580] See also Michell 1996, p. 422.

sovereignty,[581] but arguably, if there is no request by the injured State for the return of the suspect, the suspect's argument for returning him to the injured State is doomed to failure.[582]

That does not mean that the judge in such cases should proceed with the case – there might be other reasons to refuse jurisdiction, for example, in relation to human rights/due process considerations – but the hurdle of an alleged violation of State sovereignty, which could prevent him from exercising jurisdiction, will have been overcome.

Turning now to the Appeals Chamber's first principle, one can wonder how the deduction of a principle, which "seem[s] to have support in State practice as evidenced by the practice of their courts", is achievable in the first place from only two cases.[583] However, even if that were possible, a few remarks are in order with respect to the way the Appeals Chamber uses these cases.

As was explained in the previous chapter[584] and as Sloan has correctly previously observed,[585] it is true that the Israeli Supreme Court proceeded with Eichmann's case (bene detentus) notwithstanding the fact that Eichmann was abducted from Argentina (male captus).

---

[581] It seems that the Appeals Chamber is not defending the idea that a person has no ius standi to raise a violation of State sovereignty, but only that it might be easier for courts to assert their jurisdiction if the injured State does not protest and demand the return of the suspect. However, Sloan does not agree with that. He is of the opinion that the Appeals Chamber does support the idea that a person has no standing to raise such a violation (thus contradicting its own views in the Tadić case), see Sloan 2006, p. 331.

[582] See also n. 178 of Chapter III.

[583] This point is also criticised by Sloan (2006, pp. 328-329): "It is, of course, perfectly appropriate for the ICTY to turn to national law where there are gaps in international criminal law – a relatively young part of international law – and it has done so many times in the past. But it must be acknowledged that this gap-filling process vests in the ICTY judges a tremendous discretion in deciding what national jurisdictions to consult (it would be impractical to consult the national jurisdictions of each and every state in the world), what the characteristics of national law in the jurisdictions consulted are and which particular aspects of this national law are applicable to the ICTY in view of its many differences from a national system. While this discretion is necessary and desirable, with it must come a duty on the part of the judges to be balanced and comprehensive (or at least relatively so) in their analysis of the national law and clear in their reasoning as to why the law of one national jurisdiction is apposite – and why that of another is not. Unfortunately, in the Nikolić decision the Appeals Chamber's treatment of national case law was flawed; it was neither comprehensive – giving the impression of selectivity – nor clearly reasoned, at times relying on cases that are either inappropriate or controversial, and at times failing to cite a source at all. Despite its acknowledgement that 'it is difficult to identify a clear pattern in [the national criminal] case law' on the question of the exercise of jurisdiction in the face of an illegal or irregular interstate capture, and that 'caution is needed when generalising', the Appeals Chamber appeared to disregard its own good advice and proceeded to generalise based on a small number of cases, several of which were of only limited value to the ICTY. Based on a perfunctory review of Eichmann, Barbie and a handful of other cases, the Appeals Chamber reduced the detailed and complex jurisprudence on the subject of irregular capture from the world's national courts to two principles and a balancing test [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (See also n. 1 of Chapter IV.) For another (and arguably rather strange) opinion on this, see Acquaviva 2007, p. 630, who writes about the Appeals Chamber's "meticulous analysis of the domestic case law on the seizure of suspects without authorization by local authorities".

[584] See n. 626 and accompanying text of that chapter.

[585] See n. 625 and accompanying text of Chapter V.

However, the judges did not apply this male captus bene detentus rule because Eichmann was accused of very serious crimes; it should be remembered[586] that the judges in the District Court of Jerusalem were of the opinion that "[i]t is an established rule of law that a person being tried for an offence against the laws of a State may not oppose his trial by reason of the illegality of his arrest or of the means whereby he was brought within the jurisdiction of that State [emphasis added, ChP]".[587] Hence, according to them, the rule was applicable to any person standing trial, not necessarily a person charged with very serious crimes.

Admittedly, the seriousness of Eichmann's crimes did play a role for the Israeli judges, but not to defend the "established rule of law" summarised by male captus bene detentus; it played a role to defend the judges' usage of the universality principle,[588] whose rationale is that some crimes are so serious that even a State with no direct jurisdictional link can try a suspect charged with these serious crimes so that the latter can never escape justice. By using the universality principle, the Israeli Supreme Court claimed that it had the laws enabling it to exercise jurisdiction over Eichmann. However, as explained in Subsection 1.2 of Chapter III, to start a trial, one must have not only the legal means, but also the person himself (jurisdiction ratione personae).[589] These are two separate issues and it is only in relation to the second where the problem of *male captus bene/male detentu*s comes in.[590]

---

[586] See n. 15 of Chapter I.

[587] District Court of Jerusalem, The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann, 'Judgment', 12 December 1961, Criminal Case No. 40/61, para. 41 (36 International Law Reports 1968, p. 59). This observation was confirmed by their colleagues in the Israeli Supreme Court, see again n. 15 of Chapter I of this book. See also the last sentence of the quotation in n. 590 of the present chapter.

[588] See Supreme Court of Israel, Adolf Eichmann v. The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel, 'Judgment', 29 May 1962, Criminal Appeal No. 336/61, para. 12 (36 International Law Reports 1968, p. 304): "Not only do all the crimes attributed to the appellant bear an international character, but their harmful and murderous effects were so embracing and widespread as to shake the international community to its very foundations. The State of Israel therefore was entitled, pursuant to the principle of universal jurisdiction and in the capacity of a guardian of international law and an agent for its enforcement, to try the appellant [emphasis added, ChP]."

[589] Except, of course, in the case of a trial in absentia.

[590] See Supreme Court of Israel, Adolf Eichmann v. The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel, 'Judgment', 29 May 1962, Criminal Appeal No. 336/61, para. 13 (36 International Law Reports 1968, pp. 306-307): "The appellant is a "fugitive from justice" from the point of view of the law of nations, since the crimes attributed to him are of an international character and have been condemned publicly by the civilized world (…) and therefore, by virtue of the principle of universal jurisdiction, every country has the right to try him. This jurisdiction was automatically vested in the State of Israel on its establishment in 1948 as a sovereign State. Accordingly, in bringing the appellant to trial, it has functioned as an organ of international law and has acted to enforce the provisions of that law through its own laws. (…) Indeed, counsel for the appellant has here confused the question of the substantive penal jurisdiction of the State of Israel with the question whether his client enjoys immunity from the exercise of that jurisdiction against him by reason of the fact of his abduction. These two questions are entirely separate from one another. As has been indicated, the moment it is conceded that the State of Israel possesses criminal jurisdiction both according to local law and according to the law of nations, the Court is no longer bound to investigate the manner and legality of the appellant's detention, as indeed may be gathered from the judgments upon which the District Court has rightly relied [emphasis in original, ChP]."

It is almost ironic that the ICTY judges explicitly (and correctly) state that the discussion in their decision centres on the issue of jurisdiction ratione personae,[591] but then negate their own warning by using quotations from the Eichmann case which have nothing to do with that matter – particularly since these quotes can be found in the very same paragraph in which the Israeli Supreme Court corrects Eichmann's counsel for making exactly the same mistake.[592]

Looking at the facts of the second case, that of Klaus Barbie, one wonders why the Appeals Chamber includes this case in the part of its decision entitled "Under what circumstances does a violation of State sovereignty require jurisdiction to be set aside [emphasis added, ChP]?" After all, Barbie involved an alleged disguised extradition, which cannot lead to a violation of a State's sovereignty.[593] However, perhaps one should look beyond this fault in classification and see what the Appeals Chamber is trying to clarify, namely that the French Supreme Court upheld jurisdiction notwithstanding (alleged) irregularities in the arrest – a disguised extradition – because the suspect was accused of very serious crimes. As already explained in the previous chapter, that might indeed be the case.[594] Nevertheless, even if that were the outcome of the Barbie case, one can seriously doubt whether one can conclude, on the basis of that case only, that there is a principle, "seem[ingly] (…) [having] support in State practice as evidenced by the practice of their courts"[595] advocating the idea that, notwithstanding irregularities in the arrest proceedings, courts have not refused jurisdiction because of the seriousness of the crimes involved. With respect to the more specific irregularity of an abduction violating another State's sovereignty (which did not occur in the Barbie case), one can wonder, on the basis of the Appeals Chamber's analysis, if there is any supporting State practice as evidenced by the practice of courts at all.

However, as was shown in the previous chapter, there are more cases – not mentioned by the Appeals Chamber – in which one may find (implicit) evidence for the idea that judges seem to take the seriousness of the alleged crimes into account in deciding that jurisdiction/extradition to a third State should not be refused in the case of a pre-trial irregularity.[596] (The previous chapter has also shown that after the [591] See ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 19.

[592] See n. 590.
[593] See n. 77 and accompanying text of Chapter III. See also n. 499 of Chapter V where the same mistake is made by Conforti. (Note that the Appeals Chamber also referred to Conforti, see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 23, n. 28.)
[594] See n. 499 and accompanying text of Chapter V.
[595] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 24.
[596] This can most clearly be discerned from cases such as Schmidt (luring) and Latif (luring). In Mullen, such a balancing exercise was also used, but in that case, the English judges felt that it was more important to legally disapprove of the male captus (a disguised extradition in which the British authorities were involved) by refusing jurisdiction, even if Mullen was charged with (and in fact already convicted for) serious crimes, namely IRA terrorism. The idea that the seriousness of the alleged crimes should play a role in deciding whether or not jurisdiction/extradition has to be refused may also be ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić, other inter-State decisions were issued which support this idea, but obviously, the Appeals Chamber could not have taken those cases into account.)[597]

Notwithstanding this, the Appeals Chamber added its own observations regarding this matter.[598]

It stated that there is a legitimate expectation that persons accused of 'Universally Condemned Offences' are quickly brought to justice[599] and that this expectation "needs to be weighed against the principle of State sovereignty and the fundamental rights of the accused".[600] With respect to State sovereignty, it observed:

> [T]he damage caused to international justice by not apprehending fugitives accused of serious violations of international humanitarian law is comparatively higher than the injury, if any, caused to the sovereignty of a State by a limited intrusion in its territory, particularly when the intrusion occurs in default of the State's cooperation. Therefore, the Appeals Chamber does not consider that in cases of universally condemned offences, jurisdiction should be set aside on the ground that there was a violation of the sovereignty of a State, when the violation is brought about by the apprehension of fugitives from international justice, whatever the consequences for the international responsibility of the State or organisation involved. This is all the more so in cases such as this one, in which the State whose sovereignty has allegedly found in the Australian Levinge case, where the judges stated more generally that "it is necessary to balance the public interest in preventing the unlawful conduct against the public interest in having the charge or complaint determined. This is not to say that the end can justify the means and that the more serious the charge the greater is the scope for the prosecution to engage in unlawful conduct. But conduct which might be regarded as constituting an abuse of process in respect of a comparatively minor charge may not have the same character in respect of a serious matter", see n. 158 and accompanying text of Chapter V. See further the German case from 1986 (BVerfG (3. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 3.6 1986 – 2 BvR 837/85. NJW 1986, Heft 48), where even an abduction by German agents did not lead to a refusal of jurisdiction. For older cases, one may refer to the Ker case (see n. 26 and accompanying text of Chapter V) and, perhaps, the Argoud case. Although the judges in this latter case adhered to a rather strict male captus bene detentus reasoning, comparable with the one of the Eichmann case, the words of rapporteur Comte may reflect what the judges may have thought when they issued their decision, see n. 410 and accompanying text of Chapter V.

---

[597] One could mention here the German case Al-Moayad (luring) and the Namibian case Mushwena (alleged disguised extradition/irregular transfer). These cases also referred to the Nikolić case. As already explained in the context of these two cases, one could argue, now that the ICTY Appeals Chamber's reference to the Eichmann case (as support for the idea that the seriousness of the alleged crimes must be taken into account in the male captus discussion), is incorrect, that the references in Al-Moayad and Mushwena to Nikolić (to support this idea) are also incorrect. However, as will now be shown in the main text, the ICTY Appeals Chamber also made some observations of its own concerning this issue (after it had discussed the inter-State context). And to those observations, these two cases can, of course, safely refer (as long as they do not qualify them as evidence of State practice, see Al-Moayad).

[598] See ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 24: "Drawing on these indications from national practice, the Appeals Chamber adds the following observations."

[599] See ibid., para. 25.

[600] Ibid., para. 26.

> been breached has not lodged any complaint and thus has acquiesced in the International Tribunal's exercise of jurisdiction [original footnote omitted, ChP].[601]

After having stated that this observation, which, incidentally, is somewhat reminiscent of the ECtHR's statement that "[i]nherent in the whole of the Convention is a search for a fair balance between the demands of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights",[602] would count a fortiori with respect to abductions carried out by 'real' private individuals,[603] because those actions "do not necessarily in themselves violate State sovereignty",[604] the Appeals Chamber concluded that "even assuming that the conduct of the Accused's captors could be attributed to SFOR and that the latter is responsible for a violation of Serbia and Montenegro's sovereignty, the Appeals Chamber finds no basis, in the present case, upon which jurisdiction should not be exercised".[605]

To better understand the possible implications that follow from these observations, it is appropriate to first look at question two of the Appeals Chamber's theoretical framework: under what circumstances does a human rights violation require jurisdiction to be set aside?

With respect to this second question, the Appeals Chamber, after a short review of the Trial Chamber's decision in Nikolić, the US Toscanino case and two other cases from the UN ad hoc Tribunals (the previously discussed ICTY Dokmanović case and the still-to-discuss ICTR Barayagwiza case), concluded that it "agrees with these views".[606] That does not, however, clarify what the Appeals Chamber's position is, as these views are arguably not identical. The differences can be found between the Toscanino and the Dokmanović cases on the one hand and the Nikolić and *Barayagwiz*a cases on the other.

In Toscanino, and only focusing now on the first reason of the judges of that case to dismiss jurisdiction, namely the reason related to constitutional law/due process/the rights of the suspect,[607] the US Second Circuit Court of Appeals stated that

---

[601] Ibid.
[602] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 88. See also ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Soering v. The United Kingdom, Application No. 14038/88, 7 July 1989, para. 89.
[603] Namely private individuals whose actions are not instigated, acknowledged or condoned by a State, international organisation or other entity, see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 26.
[604] Ibid. See also the discussion of this point in the context of the Trial Chamber's decision and Subsection 3.2.2 of Chapter III.
[605] Ibid., para. 27.
[606] Ibid., para. 30.
[607] It should be remembered that one could identify three reasons why the Court in Toscanino dismissed jurisdiction in this case. The other two are: supervisory power over the administration of criminal justice and international law. See Subsection 1.2 of Chapter III for more information.

> we view due process as now requiring a court to divest itself of jurisdiction over the person of a defendant where it has been acquired as the result of the Government's deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights [emphasis added, ChP].[608]

Hence, Toscanino shows that there is an obligation for a court to refuse jurisdiction, but only if the prosecuting forum (in casu the US Government) is responsible for the violations of the suspect's rights. Furthermore, those violations must be very serious. Although the words of the Toscanino case itself ("deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable") are still rather general, and although one may also find support in the case for the idea that a forcible abduction as such (without serious mistreatment) must lead to the ending of the case, it was shown earlier that cases after Toscanino, such as Lujan (see Subsection 1.2 of Chapter V), have interpreted the case as a very narrow exception to the male captus bene detentus rule because of the extreme facts involved.[609] Another such case is the luring case of Yunis, see again Subsection 1.2 of Chapter V. In this case, the judges stated that their case did not involve "the type of cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino".[610] The ICTY judges in the Dokmanović case, where the prosecuting forum (the Tribunal, in casu the OTP) was involved in a luring operation, followed Yunis and stated that, in the context of the male captus situation of luring, "there was no "cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino" in the arrest of Mr. Dokmanović. The accused was not mistreated in any way (…). There was nothing about the arrest to shock the conscience [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[611]

Conversely, the Nikolić and Barayagwiza cases, explicitly discussing the (from the common law system stemming) abuse of process doctrine,[612] held that even without involvement of the prosecuting forum (the Tribunal), serious[613] and

[608] US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), p. 275.
[609] It should be remembered that Toscanino, in the context of his abduction, was tortured for nearly three weeks. Note that Circuit Judge Anderson in the Lujan case also asserted that the Toscanino judges themselves would only divest jurisdiction in the case of an abduction accompanied by serious mistreatment (and not in the case of a 'normal' forcible abduction). See n. 97 of Chapter V.
[610] US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909), p. 920. See also n. 177 and accompanying text of the previous chapter.
[611] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 75. See also n. 255.
[612] Note, however, that the Toscanino and Dokmanović cases also made some brief references to this doctrine, see US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), p. 276 (in its discussion of the second reason to dismiss jurisdiction (supervisory power over the administration of criminal justice)) and ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, paras. 68, 73 and n. 104.
[613] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74.

egregious[614] violations of the suspect's rights/(very) serious or egregious[615] mistreatment could lead to the refusal of jurisdiction.[616] Furthermore, these tests seem – at least in theory – not to be as high as the Toscanino standard ("cruel, inhumane and outrageous"). The Trial Chamber's judges in the Nikolić case, for example, referred to an accused being "very seriously mistreated, maybe even subjected to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture [emphasis added, ChP]".[617] The Nikolić and Barayagwiza cases also differ in another aspect: they held

[614] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111. See also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74.

[615] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 114.

[616] See ibid., paras. 111 and 114: "[T]his Chamber concurs with the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza case that the abuse of process doctrine may be relied on if "in the circumstances of the particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice". However, in order to prompt a Chamber to use this doctrine, it needs to be clear that the rights of the Accused have been egregiously violated [original footnote omitted, ChP]." "[T]he Chamber holds that, in a situation where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subjected to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment to the exercise of jurisdiction over such an accused. This would certainly be the case where persons acting for SFOR or the prosecution were involved in such very serious mistreatment. But even without such involvement this Chamber finds it extremely difficult to justify the exercise of jurisdiction over a person if that person was brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal after having been seriously mistreated [emphasis added, ChP]." (Note that in the Appeals Chamber's decision (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 28), the first words of this quotation are not correctly printed.) See further ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, paras. 73-74: "[U]nder the abuse of process doctrine, it is irrelevant which entity or entities were responsible for the alleged violations of the Appellant's rights. (…) It is important to stress that the abuse of process doctrine may be invoked as a matter of discretion. It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity." It must be noted, however, that the ICTY Appeals Chamber does not mention the arguably most important words of the Nikolić and Barayagwiza cases, namely where they explicitly state that it is irrelevant which entity was responsible for the mistreatment/the violations. This may be seen as proof of the idea that the Appeals Chamber is of the opinion that the Tribunal will only refuse jurisdiction if the Tribunal itself is responsible for the mistreatment/the violations. However, one can also argue – and this is probably the better view – that the fact that the Appeals Chamber refers to these two cases is enough proof that it follows (the core of) these cases, especially now that it does mention the Trial Chamber's words earlier quoted in this footnote that "[t]his would certainly be the case where…" (see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 28); this shows that the Appeals Chamber is aware of the Trial Chamber's view that the latter will also consider refusing jurisdiction in case SFOR/OTP was/were not involved in the male captus. In addition, the Appeals Chamber does not explicitly disapprove of the judges' view in Nikolić and Barayagwiza that it is irrelevant which entity was responsible for the mistreatment/the violations either.

[617] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 114. Two sentences later, the Trial Chamber even deleted the word "very": "if that person was brought into the

that there is no obligation, but rather a discretion for judges to decide whether or not jurisdiction should be refused.[618]

It appears that the Nikolić Appeals Chamber picked the most far-reaching elements from those four cases when it observed that "certain human rights violations are of such a serious nature that they require that the exercise of jurisdiction be declined".[619] After all, that could be interpreted as meaning that the Appeals Chamber does not necessarily require the involvement of the Tribunal in the violations to refuse jurisdiction in certain cases.[620] Furthermore, by choosing the verb "require", the Appeals Chamber states that some human rights violations are so serious that jurisdiction must (and not may) be refused. Finally, the Appeals Chamber followed the (at least in theory) lower 'serious and egregious' violation standard.[621]

However, the Appeals Chamber promptly warned that these would be "exceptional cases"[622] and that "the remedy of setting aside jurisdiction will (…) usually be disproportionate"[623] because "[t]he correct balance must (…) be maintained between the fundamental rights of the accused and the essential interests of the international community in the prosecution of persons charged with serious violations of international humanitarian law".[624] jurisdiction of the Tribunal after having been seriously mistreated." After stating that it concurred with the judges in the Barayagwiza case (who used the adjectives "serious" and "egregious"), the Trial Chamber also referred to the word "egregious" (see ibid.). See also ibid., para. 111.

---

[618] Nevertheless, it must also be stated that the discretion mentioned in Nikolić and Barayagwiza is relative in nature. For instance, in Nikolić (see n. 616), one can read: "[T]his Chamber concurs with the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza case that the abuse of process doctrine may be relied on if "in the circumstances of the particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice"." One can imagine that if the Tribunal is of the opinion that to proceed with the case, in view of certain serious circumstances, contravenes its sense of justice, it will not exercise jurisdiction, even if it officially has a discretion. The same can be said about the Barayagwiza case, where it was stated (see ibid.): "It is important to stress that the abuse of process doctrine may be invoked as a matter of discretion. It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity." Again, if the court is of the opinion that to proceed with the case, in view of the serious male captus, proves detrimental to the court's integrity, it will, of course, not continue with the case (unless it wants to undermine its own integrity). Cf. in that respect also Jones and Doobay 2004, p. 95 (commenting on the Bennett case), see n. 412.

[619] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 30.

[620] See Sluiter 2004 C, pp. 246-247: "The court's integrity is, of course, more obviously damaged in case of involvement of the Prosecutor, who is expected to come with "clean hands" to the Trial Chamber. However, in Nikolić it has also been established that serious human rights violations prior to trial may in and of themselves require that the exercise of jurisdiction is declined [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Sluiter refers here to ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 30.)

[621] For the "egregious" term, see ibid., paras. 31-32.

[622] Ibid., para. 30.

[623] Ibid.

[624] Ibid.

As explained earlier, one can argue that it seems indeed reasonable that under certain circumstances, for example under the abuse of process doctrine, judges should be able to balance all the different interests at stake and to use their discretion to decide what the most appropriate remedy in a specific case is (and that, in that balancing exercise, he can very well take into account that a suspect is charged with very serious crimes and that the trial, if possible, should continue). However, there is also a risk in this discretion, a risk that clearly reprehensible male captus situations are in a way approved because one is dealing with a suspect of very serious crimes. This can never be the case. A court can never continue to exercise jurisdiction if it is clear that members of the OTP have, for example, orchestrated an abduction in clear violation of international law and human rights. Those cases are arguably so serious and so devastating to the court's integrity that, in the words of the Appeals Chamber, "they require that the exercise of jurisdiction be declined". In that respect, one can argue that the idea of the Appeals Chamber that such male detentus cases would be exceptional cases should only be read to mean that one can hope that employees of the Tribunal will never resort to such male captus techniques. However, one cannot argue that these cases would be exceptional because, even if they occur, a court can still decide to continue the trial because of the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged; it is submitted that if they occur, they should lead to the ending of the case.

After determining that Nikolić's rights were not egregiously violated,[625] the Appeals Chamber concluded the examination of question two by stating that "even assuming that the conduct of Accused's captors should have been attributed to SFOR and that the latter was responsible for a breach of the rights of the Accused, the Appeals Chamber finds no basis upon which jurisdiction should not be exercised".[626]

The final conclusion was therefore that Nikolić's appeal had to be dismissed.[627] Putting the outcome of questions one and two together, the Appeals Chamber's decision can be summarised as meaning that jurisdiction would not be refused if, in the process of bringing a suspect of very serious crimes to justice, the sovereignty of a State is violated (even if that State were to complain about the violation and [625] See ibid., para. 32. The Appeals Chamber explained (see ibid., para. 31) that it had reviewed proprio motu all the facts of the case but the decision, unfortunately, does not elaborate on this issue any further. Sloan (2006, p. 340) notes that "[t]he Appeals Chamber did not indicate whether this proprio motu review involved the issuance of subpoenas or orders for the attendance of additional witnesses, as is arguably permitted under the Rules. Nor does the decision of the Appeals Chamber shed even a glimmer of light on what its proprio motu review might have turned up [original footnote omitted, ChP]." However, importantly, this review was one of the reasons why Nikolić, after this decision, could not ask for an evidentiary hearing in the style of Todorović to find out what had actually happened to him, see Sloan 2006, pp. 340-341.

[626] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 33.

[627] See ibid., para. 34.

request the return of the suspect),[628] on the condition that the suspect's rights are not violated during that process to such an extent that jurisdiction must be refused.

Now, it is not hard to agree with the Appeals Chamber that "certain human rights violations are of such a serious nature that they require that the exercise of jurisdiction be declined". However, because it was assumed that Nikolić was the victim of an abduction, because the Appeals Chamber was apparently not very impressed by the value of State sovereignty and because the Appeals Chamber refers to passages from cases which are particularly interested in the serious mistreatment dimension,[629] it could be argued that the Appeals Chamber's male detentus test appears to be mainly interested in the seriousness of the mistreatment inflicted on the suspect.[630] This could mean that the Appeals Chamber would not be [628] Although the Appeals Chamber distils the principle that it is easier for a court to assert its jurisdiction when the international imbalance or iniuria has been resolved (for example, by not complaining about the (alleged) violation), it does not state that if the injured State complains (and requests the return of the suspect), jurisdiction would be set aside. In fact, the observations in ibid., para. 26, where the principle is discussed in the context of the Tribunal, seem to hint that even if an injured State complains and requests the return of the suspect, jurisdiction would not be set aside: "[T]he Appeals Chamber does not consider that in cases of universally condemned offences, jurisdiction should be set aside on the ground that there was a violation of the sovereignty of a State (…). This is all the more so in cases such as this one, in which the State whose sovereignty has allegedly been breached has not lodged any complaint and thus has acquiesced in the International Tribunal's exercise of jurisdiction [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." The emphasis shows that as the injured State has not complained about the (alleged) violation, there is no reason at all why jurisdiction should be refused. However, that does not mean that jurisdiction would be refused if the injured State has complained.

[629] See also Sloan 2006, pp. 340-341.

[630] This important point needs to be clarified in further detail. Although the reference to the Barayagwiza case (where there was no mistreatment of the suspect) and the test mentioned in that case ("It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74)) would not exclude a 'normal' abduction (without serious mistreatment), the Appeals Chamber's other references are particularly focused on the mistreatment aspect. First of all, the Appeals Chamber refers to the Nikolić Trial Chamber's words which specifically focus on the question whether Nikolić was seriously mistreated: "[W]here an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subjected to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment to the exercise of jurisdiction over such an accused. This would certainly be the case where persons acting for SFOR or the Prosecution were involved in such very serious mistreatment." (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 28.) See also ibid., para. 31: "In the present case, the Trial Chamber examined the facts agreed to by the parties. It established that the treatment of the Appellant was not of such an egregious nature as to impede the exercise of jurisdiction. (…) [T]he Appeals Chamber concurs with the Trial Chamber that the circumstances of this case do not warrant, under the standard defined above, the setting aside of jurisdiction." The Appeals Chamber also referred to a passage from the Toscanino case dealing with the national concept of due process. These words could, in itself, encompass a 'normal' abduction but the Toscanino test has later been interpreted as a very restricted male detentus possibility. An abduction as such is not enough. What is required is in fact serious mistreatment. For example, the judges in the Yunis case stated that their case did not involve "the type of cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino." (US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909), p. 920.) That the Appeals Chamber prefers that interpretation of the Toscanino case concerned about an abduction, as long as that abduction was not accompanied by serious mistreatment.[631]

Although the Appeals Chamber may very well be right in arguing that the abduction in this case (which after all, was 'merely' executed by private individuals) was not so serious as to divest jurisdiction, the male detentus test of the Appeals Chamber can be interpreted as meaning that the judges would be obliged neither to refuse jurisdiction if the Tribunal itself were involved in an abduction (as long as that abduction was not accompanied by serious mistreatment).

It can be argued that the Appeals Chamber should have stated (at least more clearly)[632] that the judges would also refuse jurisdiction if employees of the Tribunal itself intentionally[633] committed serious (procedural) irregularities in the process of bringing a suspect to trial, such as an abduction. In such a case, it should not matter whether or not the accused was seriously mistreated.[634] The mere fact that the OTP can also be derived from its reference to the paragraphs in the Dokmanović case where one can read: "[T]here was no "cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino" in the arrest of Mr. Dokmanović. The accused was not mistreated in any way on his journey to the Erdut base. There was nothing about the arrest to shock the conscience [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 75.)

---

[631] See also Currie 2007, p. 372, writing about the "fairly stark" "logical implications" of the "test put forward by the court": "For example, if State A sends its police or agents into the territory of State B where they violently abduct a fugitive, then so long as State A can present the individual to the Tribunal there will be no jurisdictional problems (absent serious physical abuse). That A has violated the territorial integrity of B is of no moment, even supposing relations between these states are already fractious and the abduction might provoke an international incident."

[632] It may be interesting to note that the Defence was apparently also not very sure about the exact content of the Appeals Chamber's male detentus test and therefore asked the Chamber for clarification, see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion Requesting Clarification of the Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 20 June 2003, para. 5: "[T]he defence respectfully requests clarification of exactly what test is contemplated by 'the standard defined above' [see para. 31 of the Appeals Chamber's decision, ChP], and where that above (…) is to be found in the instant judgement. The facts agreed by the parties encompassed kidnapping and the forcible removal by a person against his will from a sovereign jurisdiction to another jurisdiction without the leave of either, such having involved the prosecution and conviction of some of the perpetrators in Serbia. If it be the case that the defence is correct in interpreting the 'standard' simply thus, that the agreed subjective facts were not sufficient to establish an egregious violation, then the defence respectfully requests what 'standard' is applicable so as to form the watershed between illegality that, on the one hand is egregious and, on the other, is not. That, with respect cannot be an abstraction, as the use of the phrase 'the standard defined' implies just that, a defined test [emphasis in original, ChP]." However, the Appeals Chamber, declaring the request "frivolous", considered that no clarification was required, see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Motion Requesting Clarification', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 6 August 2003, A 69. See also Sloan 2006, pp. 333-334.

[633] Cf. n. 476 and accompanying text.

[634] In that respect, it can be argued that the Tribunal should follow the lower male detentus standards which can, for example, be found in cases like Bennett. See also Sloan 2006, p. 337: "The Appeals Chamber made no effort to reconcile the approach in the Toscanino case [perhaps it is better to speak here of the interpretation of this case by subsequent courts, ChP] with the jurisprudence of other states which did not require an egregious element to the violation of human rights of an accused in order for is, for example, orchestrating an abduction should make the judges refuse jurisdiction.[635] It is not so much the harm inflicted on the suspect (which might be minimal) or the harm inflicted on the sovereignty of a State[636] which should lead to the refusal of jurisdiction here, it is above all the integrity and credibility of the

---

the court to reject jurisdiction [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]." Cf. also Sluiter 2003 B, pp. 946-947: "Crucial factors, in determining whether or not this remedy [this is the termination of the proceedings, ChP] should be provided for are the following: 1. The degree of attribution of the violation to the Tribunal, in particular the Prosecutor (…); 2. The nature of the violation of individual rights (violation of individual rights of an egregious nature (…) may constitute a legal impediment to exercise of jurisdiction by the Tribunal, regardless of whether or not the Tribunal, in particular the Prosecutor, had anything to do with that violation)."

[635] It can be argued that the cases to which the Appeals Chamber refers would not exclude this. However, as explained, the Appeals Chamber seems particularly interested in the serious mistreatment passages of some of these cases, see also n. 630. The Barayagwiza case (where there was no mistreatment of the suspect) and the test mentioned in that case ("It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74)) would not exclude a 'normal' abduction (without serious mistreatment). See also ibid.: "Under the doctrine of "abuse of process", proceedings that have been lawfully initiated may be terminated after an indictment has been issued if improper or illegal procedures are employed in pursuing an otherwise lawful process [emphasis added, ChP]." Furthermore, one can also find evidence in the Toscanino case itself that a normal abduction would fall under its male detentus test, although the case has not been interpreted as such in subsequent cases. (See also Michell 1996, p. 403: "[T]hese later interpretations suggest incorrectly that Toscanino was primarily a "torture" case rather than a "forcible abduction" case.") In addition, the Nikolić and Dokmanović cases arguably also include passages which can be seen as supporting a male detentus test, which could include a normal abduction, without serious mistreatment. In the Trial Chamber's decision in Nikolić, the judges stated more generally: "Due process of law also includes questions such as how the Parties have been conducting themselves in the context of a particular case and how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The finding in the Ebrahim case that the State must come to court with clean hands applies equally to the Prosecution coming to a Trial Chamber of this Tribunal. In addition, this Chamber concurs with the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza case that the abuse of process doctrine may be relied on if "in the circumstances of a particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice". However, in order to prompt a Chamber to use this doctrine, it needs to be clear that the rights of the Accused have been egregiously violated [original footnote omitted, ChP]." In addition, neither should it be forgotten that the passage from the Dokmanović case, to which the Appeals Chamber refers, was (only) made in the context of luring. However, before the Trial Chamber in Dokmanović turned to this male captus situation, it had distinguished this situation from the male captus situation forcible abduction. This may mean that the Trial Chamber might have dismissed the case of Dokmanović if the OTP was not involved in a mere luring operation, but in an abduction operation. See also Scharf 1998, p. 371: "[T]he Trial Chamber focused on the distinction between "luring" (the means used to arrest Dokmanović) and "forcible abduction", reckoning that the former was acceptable while the latter might constitute grounds for dismissal in future cases [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[636] That might indeed be of less importance to an international criminal tribunal whose relationship with national States is of a superior, vertical and not of an equal, horizontal nature. However, as already explained, the fact that the sovereignty aspect "by definition cannot play the same role" (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 100) in the context of the Tribunals does not mean that the Tribunal has a 'carte blanche' in violating the sovereignty of domestic States.

Tribunal as an institution based on (international) law which would be harmed if the trial continued.[637] In that sense, neither should it matter whether a State has, for example, protested and requested the return of the suspect. An abduction as such (without any further qualification) should lead to the ending of the case if the Tribunal wants to be taken seriously as a court of law. One could also mention practical considerations here; such an approach would arguably also be damaging to the entire mission of the Tribunal.[638] In addition, neither should one forget that the negative consequences of proceeding with the case in such a situation might not be limited to the context of the Tribunals. For national States/courts, these international institutions may be seen as examples to follow. If employees of a Tribunal are involved in an abduction and, in a way, get away with it (because the judges do not decline jurisdiction), then national States/courts can refer to the Tribunal's approach to defend their own (potentially) dubious methods of bringing suspects to trial or to defend the 'approval' of such methods by proceeding with the case.[639] That, in turn, [637] Cf. also Sloan 2006, pp. 342-343: "If all the facts were brought to light and it became clear that SFOR had been involved in illegal behaviour, the nature of the violation of human rights and sovereignty would appear in a different light. Indeed, it is not beyond the realm of possibility that a thorough examination of the facts might even have shown foreknowledge on the part of the OTP of SFOR's intention to carry out illegal capture operations (...). Were such findings to have been made, the arrest process would have been found to be contaminated. The obligation of the Appeals Chamber, therefore, would have been to provide a remedy that reflected the ICTY's intolerance of such conduct by making it clear that such behaviour in the future would be unlikely to lead to the prosecution of the accused. This might very well have taken the form of ordering the release of Nikolić".

[638] See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 65: "Both SFOR and the Tribunal are involved in a peace mission and are expected to contribute in a positive way to the restoration of peace and security in the area. Any use of methods and practices that would, in themselves, violate fundamental principles of international law and justice would be contrary to the mission of this Tribunal." Cf. also Henquet 2003, p. 146: "The purpose of the Tribunal, indeed the legal basis for its establishment, is to contribute to the restoration of peace and security in the former Yugoslavia. Thus, it might be argued, if the Tribunal is to succeed in this task it must be perceived as credible and just. This requires it to uphold the highest standards of justice." See also Van Sliedregt 2001 B, pp. 82-83.

[639] Cf. the already-mentioned words of Swart and Schomburg at n. 127 and accompanying text (writing on the context of respect for international human rights). See further Carcano 2005, p. 91 ("[N]ational courts, when called to decide cases involving crimes of international concern or raising certain aspects of international criminal law, may be influenced by the content of international decisions") and Sluiter 2006 C, pp. 629-630, writing about Dutch war crimes courts which "proved not to be insensitive towards ICTY jurisprudence, also in the field of international criminal procedure. The rationale lies in the lack of relevant case law of human rights supervisory organs in relation to those complex cases." See also ibid., p. 635: "International criminal procedure may in spite of all its flaws fulfil an important gap-filling function and serve as important point of reference for participants in domestic war crimes trials with an open eye and mind for procedural solutions and approaches coined in other systems. In this light, the 'legislator' in the field of international criminal procedure should become aware of its relevance and impact beyond the scope of international criminal trials." See finally Smeulers 2007, p. 108 (writing about the concepts of human rights and due process of law: "The tribunal fulfills an important and exemplary function") and Starr 2008, pp. 713-714: "At least some of the ICTs' judges see the Tribunals as models for other courts' treatment of defendants and point out that respecting due process is crucial to that mission. Indeed, the ICTs' procedural rules and jurisprudence have repeatedly been cited by scholars discussing human rights in the context of domestic proceedings, by other would harm the integrity of these States/courts, the human rights of their suspects and – what is far more important for the horizontal context than for the context of the Tribunals – the very foundation of the inter-State level itself, namely respect for another State's sovereignty.[640] Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber's 'carte blanche' approach towards State sovereignty[641] could also have consequences for the ICC, the context of which will be discussed in the next part of this book.[642]

One could counter the suggestion that the Appeals Chamber should have mentioned this second situation (at least more clearly), by arguing that the judges did not need to address that situation at all, as Nikolić was not abducted by employees of the Tribunal but by private individuals. However, as almost all the generally formulated observations in this decision are not so much related to the case itself but more to the theory behind it, this important aspect should not have been left out. In addition, there are even indications that the Tribunal is of the opinion that jurisdiction should not be refused, even if the Tribunal itself were involved in the irregularity – as long as the accused is not seriously mistreated. After all, the Appeals Chamber also bases its 'serious violation' criterion on cases such as Toscanino and Dokmanović, cases in which the prosecuting forum itself was involved in the (alleged) irregularity.[643] Moreover, the Appeals Chamber, in its central question and last sentence from its strategy, makes use of the combination "violations (…) committed by SFOR, and by extension OTP [emphasis added, international courts and commissions and advocates before those bodies, and by domestic courts interpreting their own international legal obligations [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." One could here think, for example, of the Al-Moayad and Mushwena cases discussed in Chapter V.

[640] See again (see also n. 519 of Chapter III) UNSC Res. 138 of 23 June 1960 (S/4349), in which the Council, dealing with the Israeli abduction of Eichmann in Argentina, stated "that the repetition of acts such as that giving rise to this situation would involve a breach of the principles upon which international order is founded, creating an atmosphere of insecurity and distrust incompatible with the preservation of peace". Cf. also Van der Wilt 2004, p. 295, who explains that if the Tribunal would knowingly make use of States carrying out violations of State sovereignty for the Tribunal, it would also jeopardise the peaceful coexistence. See finally Currie 2007, p. 373: "Under the Nikolić test, the threat to international peace and security that these offenders pose is more significant than the inter-state conflict their arrest might engender, even though that inter-state conflict might itself threaten peace and security."

[641] See also ibid., p. 384: "The Appeals Chamber's approach in Nikolić has a certain carte blanche, "hang the consequences" flavour, adopting as it does the view that international crime in the form of universally-condemned offences represents a greater threat to international peace and security than the prospect of states invading each others' territory to abduct wanted individuals."

[642] See also Sloan 2006, p. 333: "[T]o simply observe that the violation [of State sovereignty, ChP] may lead to 'consequences for the international responsibility of the State or organization involved', without establishing meaningful parameters regarding when such violations will be tolerated by the ICTY, gives a blank cheque to those who would violate state sovereignty in what they perceive to be the best interests of international criminal justice. If this were to be considered a precedent for capture of those indicted by the International Criminal Court (ICC) residing in non-cooperating member states, the ramifications could be very damaging to international peace and security [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[643] In addition, one could argue that the Appeals Chamber does not explicitly mention the important words of the ICTY Trial Chamber in Nikolić and the ICTR Appeals Chamber in Barayagwiza that it is irrelevant which entity is responsible for the mistreatment/the violations. However, it seems that this point is not decisive, see n. 616.

ChP]"/"violations (…) attributable to SFOR and by extension to the OTP [emphasis added, ChP]".[644] That could mean that the conclusion of the Appeals Chamber, namely that the remedy of setting aside jurisdiction will almost never be appropriate, is also applicable to situations where the violations can be attributed to the OTP.[645]

However, even if the Tribunal only refers to situations where it is not itself involved in the irregularity,[646] the outcome, or at least the way it is formulated, is unfortunate. The Appeals Chamber's 'all-or-nothing' formula with respect to the issue of remedies leads to a 'not-unless' answer ('jurisdiction will not be set aside, unless...'). As a result, the judges focus on what irregularities may not cause, thus in a way reassuring the parties involved in the pre-trial arrest and detention phase that they should not worry too much if irregularities are committed in the process of bringing a suspect of very serious crimes to justice. However, if the Tribunal wants to deter such irregularities, it should emphasise what they may in fact lead to. The Appeals Chamber could also have stated that violations will not be tolerated and that, if they occur, they will be remedied.[647] This might neither lead to the ultimate remedy – the refusal of jurisdiction/dismissal of the indictment – (that should indeed be reserved for the more serious male captus cases), but then less drastic remedies would have to be granted.[648] By formulating it in this way, the Appeals Chamber

[644] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, paras. 3 and 18.

[645] The Appeals Chamber did not need to consider the question of whether the violations in this case could be attributed to SFOR or the OTP, as it concluded that the requested remedy was not going to be granted in any event.

[646] The fact that in paras. 27 and 33 of its decision, the Appeals Chamber – in contrast to its central question and strategy – suddenly leaves out the part "and by extension (to) the OTP", might be proof of this possibility.

[647] Cf. also Sluiter 2003 B, pp. 941-942: "From a practical point of view, the most vital question is, to what extent the ICTY should bear responsibility (in the sense of providing remedies) for human rights violations that have occurred in the framework of its proceedings. (…) [T]he trial forum must take account of every human rights violation that occurs in the framework of the criminal proceedings. This view finds its ultimate basis in simple fairness and in the nature of the relationship between the accused and the trial forum."

[648] Cf. also M. Federova, S. Verhoeven and J. Wouters, 'Safeguarding the Rights of Suspects and Accused Persons in International Criminal Proceedings', Working Paper No. 27 – June 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: http://www.ggs.kuleuven.be/nieuw/publications/working%20papers/new_series/wp27.pdf), p. 23. One could think here of a reduction of the sentence and financial compensation, see ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, paras. 74-75. The time or amount of these remedies can then depend on factors like the seriousness of the irregularity and the (perceived – see n. 154 of Chapter V) 'closeness' of those responsible for the irregularity in relation to the Tribunal. One may argue that the remedy for an abduction committed by SFOR should be more significant than the remedy for an abduction committed by private individuals having no connection with the Tribunal or an entity cooperating with the Tribunal whatsoever. Cf. also Carcano 2005, p. 88 (who is, however, of the opinion that the Appeals Chamber did not have to address this issue in this case): "[W]hile the Appeals Chamber has clearly stated that it will not tolerate egregious human rights violations in the process of arresting individuals, it did not discuss whether there should also be a remedy for lesser violations. This is understandable because the issue had become moot and, in any case, there was no apparent linkage between SFOR and the kidnappers so that would have shown more clearly that it is not only focusing on the prosecution of very serious crimes but also on respect for law in general.[649]

The main justification for the Appeals Chamber not to give up jurisdiction too readily is, arguably, the seriousness of the crimes with which its suspects are charged.[650] Although the Appeals Chamber's overview of national case law does not provide solid support for that justification, the previous chapter has shown that there are more cases – cases not mentioned by the Appeals Chamber – in which one may find (implicit) evidence for the idea that judges seem to take the seriousness of the alleged crimes into account in deciding that jurisdiction/extradition to a third State should not be refused. However, even if clear support in national case law were lacking, one can argue that such a justification, to a certain extent (see infra), is quite reasonable[651] for courts (both at the national and at the international level) which have to prosecute suspects of serious crimes.

Several aspects of this reasoning were already mentioned in Subsection 4.4 of Chapter III and the Dokmanović case, but it is worth now clarifying this important issue in further detail. It must first be stressed that, apart from the possible rule of customary international law that jurisdiction must be refused in the case of an abduction perpetrated by the prosecuting forum and followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect,[652] there is no clear international rule for courts the latter's actions remained acts of private individuals with no relevance at the international level. Nevertheless, the International Tribunal, in order to avoid the impression that it condones them, should also have ways to remedy non-egregious human rights violations. Such a system may provide, for instance, for the granting of monetary compensation or a reduction of the sentence when a Chamber finds that the accused has been the victim of human rights violations."

---

[649] In that respect, it is difficult to agree with Carcano (2005, p. 88) when he states that the decision "is arguably well balanced and sufficiently protective of the accused's human rights".

[650] As already explained in the context of the Dokmanović case, there is an even stronger proposition that the illegal method of apprehending a suspect charged with international crimes should be 'decoupled' from the exercise of jurisdiction. That means that in such cases, jurisdiction must never be refused, see Higgins 1994, pp. 72-73. Michell, referring to Higgins, calls this the "Eichmann exception". (Michell 1996, pp. 423-424.) However, one can wonder why this is called the Eichmann exception, as the Israeli courts – it was already shown earlier – did not use the seriousness of Eichmann's alleged crimes as a reason for applying the male captus bene detentus rule. However, the reference to Eichmann might be explained by the fact that the UNSC arguably did take Eichmann's alleged crimes into account to, in a way, condone the trial in Israel, a trial which was made possible by the abduction, see n. 521 and accompanying text of Chapter III. One may notice that the Eichmann exception from Higgins is not followed by the Nikolić Appeals Chamber, as at least one male captus situation must lead to the dismissal of jurisdiction (namely when the accused's rights are seriously violated). Note, however, that Van der Wilt (2004, p. 279) writes that the Eichmann exception appears in the case law of the ICTY. Nevertheless, as can be deduced from his article (in which he correctly states that the Nikolić decisions recognise that jurisdiction would be refused in very serious cases), he apparently uses another concept of the Eichmann exception, namely that the Tribunals take into account the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes when determining the consequences of a male captus, which is indeed correct).

[651] See also Carcano 2005, p. 87.

[652] This will be further explained in Chapter VII. However, assuming for now that such a rule indeed exists at the inter-State level – founded on the idea that courts refuse jurisdiction in such cases to protect the fragile international legal order based on the equality of States (and to repair what the Executive has not done) – one can wonder whether it can also be applied mutatis mutandis to the context of the Tribunals. After all, even though the ICTY/ICTR do not have a carte blanche vis-à-vis the sovereignty to refuse jurisdiction in a certain case. For example, there is no human rights provision which states that jurisdiction must be refused in the case of a violation. Admittedly, courts may refuse jurisdiction if they are of the opinion that the male captus is so serious (for example, because the prosecuting authorities resorted to clearly illegal means, entailing serious violations of human rights) that the court cannot proceed with the case. However, courts have a discretion here, cf. the abuse of process doctrine; they can (and should) take every aspect of the case into account in deciding whether or not jurisdiction should be refused. One of those aspects may be that the suspect is charged with international crimes, crimes of which the international community demands that they be prosecuted. There is nothing strange about taking this important element into account. It is certainly rational that, because of the seriousness of the alleged crimes involved, a court should do everything within the limits of the law to prevent the termination of the proceedings.[653] of States, the latter concept does arguably play a less important role. In that respect, it could be argued that a protest from a State will have less influence in the vertical context of the Tribunals than it will have in the horizontal context of the States. Perhaps it could be argued that in such circumstances, there would be no obligation for a Tribunal to transfer the suspect back. Notwithstanding this however, it has already been submitted that in the case of an abduction orchestrated by the Tribunal, the latter should return (conditionally, see n. 354 and accompanying text) the suspect back, whether or not there has been a protest from the injured State.

---

[653] Cf. also the following words from the Prosecution in the still-to-discuss (see Subsection 3.2.2) Semanza case before the ICTR when it made a comparison with US Code, Title 18 ('Crimes and Criminal Procedure'), Section 3162 ('Sanctions'), under (a)(1): "18 USC 3162(a)(1) sets out factors that are to be considered, among others, in deciding whether a dismissal shall be with or without prejudice. The factors are: 1. the seriousness of the offense; 2. the facts and circumstances of the case which led to the dismissal; and 3. the impact of a reprosecution on the administration of the Speedy Trial Act and on the administration of justice. (...) [I]n U.S. v. Taylor, 487 U.S. 326 (1988), the U.S. Supreme Court characterized as "serious" the charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine and possession of 400 grams of cocaine with intent to distribute. In that case the Supreme Court reversed the dismissal with prejudice, finding that the trial court had abused its discretion. While drug-related crimes are certainly serious, there is simply no comparison between the illegal possession of sale of drugs and the 14 counts of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes with which the Accused is charged in this case. These are among the most serious crimes with which a person may be charged in any jurisdiction, national or international, in the world. The seriousness of these crimes, by itself, should preclude a dismissal with prejudice. (...) A dismissal with prejudice would be devastating to the administration of justice under international law. Dismissal with prejudice would not only prevent a trial on the merits for an accused mass murderer but would also foster the belief that political and military leaders can act with impunity in committing crimes against their own population in their territory. This practice of impunity is exactly what United Nations Resolution 955 sought to end when it adopted the Statute of the Tribunal." (TPIR, Chambre d'Appel, Le Procureur contre Laurent Semanza, 'Réponse du Procureur au Mémoire Préalable [à] l'Appui de l'Acte d'Appel du 12 Octobre 1999 contre l'Ordonnance du 6 Octobre 1999 de la Chambre de Premi[è]re Instance III Relative [à] la Requête de la Défense en Annulation de la Procédure d'Arrestation et de Détention de Laurent Semanza pour Cause d'Illégalité', Affaire No. ICTR-97-20-I, 21 janvier 2000, pp. 28-29, 208*bis* – 207*bis*.) A final remark is that these observations may very well be correct with respect to this specific case, but it must be clearly understood that the words "[t]he seriousness of these crimes, by itself, should preclude a dismissal with prejudice" may not necessarily apply to any case of suspects of international crimes. As will now also be explained in the main text, the seriousness of the crimes should definitely play a role in deciding whether jurisdiction must be refused or not, which may imply that a male detentus verdict/dismissal/release with prejudice should be avoided in the context of international crimes if However, what is not justified – and what the Appeals Chamber should have disapproved of more clearly – is that the seriousness of the alleged crimes may be used as an excuse to commit irregularities in the process of bringing suspects of such crimes to justice;[654] it must be stressed that the view that one may take the seriousness of the crimes into account in deciding whether or not jurisdiction must be refused in a certain situation cannot in any way be seen as a green light for using male captus techniques in the context of international crimes.[655] On the contrary: as has already been argued, if the Tribunal discovers that its employees have orchestrated an abduction, it should resolutely refuse jurisdiction. That would be the only avenue to avoid further damage to the integrity of the proceedings. However, if less serious wrongs have been committed in the pre-trial phase of their case, judges should opt for less far-reaching remedies which do not jeopardise the trial.

Of particular interest in this discussion is the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention. As previously explained, there is no human right stating that in the case of a violation, jurisdiction must be refused. Because of that, a judge should take every single aspect of the case into account (including the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged) in deciding whether or not jurisdiction must be refused. However, that discretion is lacking in the context of the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention. This remedy is applicable to anyone. Any arrested/detained person, whether that any person is charged with fraud or with genocide, must, strictly speaking, be released if the judge finds his (arrest and) detention unlawful. However, even though that is true, it was also argued in Chapter III and in the context of the Dokmanović case that this remedy is not without its problems. Release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention does not preclude re-arrest and being brought to trial. Although a person released by the ICTY/ICTR (in the Netherlands/Tanzania) cannot be re-arrested for 15 days, one can imagine that the ICTY/ICTR will then demand from all UN Member States (which must cooperate with these Tribunals) to immediately transfer the suspect back to the ICTY/ICTR the moment he sets foot on their soil. Thus, one can assume that it is highly likely that after those two weeks, the person is immediately re-arrested and brought to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal in question. In such a case, possible, but that does not mean that this remedy is entirely excluded from this context. On the contrary, if ICTY/ICTR authorities are involved in a kidnapping, the ICTY/ICTR should refuse jurisdiction/dismiss the case with prejudice if it still wants to be taken seriously as a court of law.

---

[654] See also Sloan 2006, p. 334: "The Appeal Chamber's focus on the serious nature of the crimes and the indignation of the international community, and its willingness to balance it against violations of human rights or sovereignty (and, in the case of sovereignty, to find a good basis for not setting aside jurisdiction in the 'universally condemned' nature of the alleged offences) leaves the impression that the graver the alleged crime, the less troubled an international judicial body should be by the violation."

[655] In that respect, this study cannot disagree more with views such as the one expressed by Mohit (2006, p. 144), who writes on the inter-State context: "It would be absurd to hold that terrorists and serious human rights violators should not be brought to trial by irregular means, for example, by abduction. The interests of society require that such offenders be brought to trial." (Mohit (ibid.) stresses that "[t]hese methods should (…) be utilized by states only once they have exhausted all possible routes to secure the fugitive's return by normal processes", but even then, prosecuting authorities should not debase themselves by resorting to illegal means in obtaining custody over a suspect.)

the prosecuting authorities could assert that this 'remedy' (the 'release') has repaired the initial iniuria of the irregularity and that the trial can continue as normal. However, in that case, the suspect would only be granted a pro forma remedy, comparable with the one at the national level (only extended over a longer period), which does not comport with the idea that a remedy must be real and effective. In addition, the pro forma release does not take account of the exact seriousness of the irregularity. In other words: it is not only a pro forma remedy but also an over-simplified remedy.

Thus, it was and is argued that it would be better for a judge, when he determines that a person's arrest/detention was unlawful, to avoid this problematic remedy of release and instead simply grant the most appropriate remedy which takes into account all the specifics of the case, including the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes and the importance of having the case continued. If one follows that route, which much resembles the abuse of process doctrine (where the seriousness of the alleged crimes can be taken into account without any problems since the remedy 'refusal of jurisdiction' is discretionary), then one can still satisfy the common sense idea behind the immediate re-arrest mentioned above, namely that cases involving suspects of serious crimes must be continued if possible – although it should neither be forgotten that a truly serious male captus situation can lead to one remedy only, namely the ending of the case before that particular court, that is, a 'real' release (without the possibility of re-arrest) – but one will also avoid the strange pro forma release and immediate re-arrest and replace it with real remedies, such as a reduction of the sentence and/or compensation.

The judge can then take the exact seriousness of the irregularity into account in determining how much time to reduce from the sentence or how much compensation to accord the suspect.

For example, one could hereby look at the involvement of the Tribunal in the male captus situation or the mistreatment suffered by the suspect during the operation. Such a solution would arguably be fairer to the suspect and better capable of putting flexibility into the system.

Furthermore, this solution also avoids the (justified) criticism one may expect from various actors if a suspect of serious crimes is released for an irregularity which is not so serious as to lead to the ending of the case (in such serious cases, the public must understand that the court has no option but to refuse jurisdiction and to release (but now in a 'real' way) the suspect), but which nevertheless entails that the detention must be qualified as unlawful and that, strictly speaking, the suspect must be released.

In fact, whereas at the national level, one can expect that a suspect of serious crimes will be immediately re-arrested, the Tribunal level may engender more problems because of the two-week immunity period.

As already stated, all UN Member States (which must cooperate with the Tribunals) will probably do everything in their power to ensure that a suspect of serious international crimes will be immediately re-arrested and brought to the jurisdiction of the Tribunals, but one cannot exclude the possibility that the suspect may flee to a non-UN Member State (which, in principle, does not have an obligation to cooperate with the Tribunals) or to a State which, even though it has an obligation to cooperate with them, will not do so.

This could mean that a suspect of international crimes, fleeing to such a State, could effectively evade prosecution because of an irregularity which will, strictly speaking, demand the release of the suspect, but which is not considered to be so serious that jurisdiction must be refused.

This is to be avoided. This constitutes another reason to continue to exercise jurisdiction in these kinds of (less serious) male captus cases and to grant other remedies which do not jeopardise the trial itself.

Critics of this reasoning may assert that taking into account the seriousness of the alleged crimes of the suspect (and hence the importance of prosecution) within the examination of what the consequences must be of certain irregularities is not in conformity with the presumption of innocence, as the quality of the suspect (who is, of course, innocent until proven guilty) plays a role in the judge's balancing exercise.[656]

And indeed, it cannot be denied that there is some tension here. For example, under the abuse of process doctrine, a suspect of less serious crimes may be better off than a suspect of serious crimes. Imagine the situation in which a suspect of minor domestic crimes becomes the victim of a kidnapping by private individuals in which the authorities of the now prosecuting forum were not involved and during which he was not mistreated before being brought to the national judge. In such a situation, it would not be surprising if the national judge would refuse to exercise jurisdiction and to release the suspect because of, on the one hand, the rather serious male captus and, on the other, the low importance of having this person prosecuted. However, if the person is charged with genocide, one can imagine that the judge (whether it be a judge at the national or at the Tribunal level) would continue the case and grant the person other remedies instead. Although the seriousness of the male captus is the same in both cases, the importance of having this person prosecuted will probably tip the balance, ensuring that the trial will continue and that the suspect will receive other less far-reaching remedies for the wrongs he suffered.

---

[656] See, for example, Oehmichen 2007, pp. 230-231 (criticising the German case from 1986 in which the German judges did not refuse jurisdiction in the aftermath of an abduction executed by the German police). See also n. 523 of Chapter V. It must, however, also be emphasised that this study agrees with Oehmichen with respect to that particular case as discretion to balance all the different elements and taking into account the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes must have some boundaries: some male captus situations, such as the one of the German case, are arguably so serious that jurisdiction should be refused. The same would go for the Tribunals: if the OTP is involved in an abduction, the judges should refuse jurisdiction, even if that suspect was charged with very serious crimes. Note finally that even though it was explained in the inter-State context that Oehmichen has serious reservations as concerns the element 'seriousness of the alleged crimes' in general (see n. 523 of Chapter V), she nevertheless admits that the abuse of process doctrine, in the context of the international criminal tribunals, has been limited to exceptional human rights violations, "was in Anbetracht der Delikte, die bei den Internationalen Strafgerichten in Frage stehen, in gewisser Weise nachvollziehbar erscheint." (Ibid., p. 243.)

However, as explained earlier, because of the discretionary nature of the abuse of process doctrine, the judge is able to take every single aspect of the case into account in determining whether it would contravene the court's integrity/sense of justice to continue the case, notwithstanding the irregularities. And one of these aspects is that the person standing before him is charged with very serious crimes of which the international community demands that they be prosecuted. There is no reason as to why this important element should not be taken into account here. In fact, the judge may be of the opinion that it would contravene the court's sense of justice and other goals of its institution, such as, in the case of the ICTY, contributing to the restoration and maintenance of peace,[657] if he were not to take the importance of prosecution into account.[658]

However, this stance may be more complicated with respect to a violation of the human right to liberty and security as the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention is not discretionary; it applies to any suspect unlawfully [657] See UNSC Res. 827 of 25 May 1993: "The Security Council, (…) Convinced that in the particular circumstances of the former Yugoslavia the establishment as an ad hoc measure by the Council of an international tribunal and the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law (…) would contribute to the restoration and maintenance of peace [emphasis in original, ChP]". This is indeed true, but it should neither be forgotten (see also n. 638 and accompanying text) that it would in fact contravene the Tribunal's mission if it were to resort itself to illegal methods in obtaining custody over persons.

[658] Cf. also Ryngaert 2008, p. 731, who notes with respect to the still-to-discuss (see Subsection 5.1) Duch case: "[S]erious concerns may be raised over the use of the gravity of the crime as a free-standing criterion (...) in terms of the presumption of innocence. While Duch may be accused of grave and heinous crimes, he should remain innocent until a trial judge has determined his guilt – even if he is ready to confess and reveal the crimes committed by the Khmer Rouge. It would therefore appear unfair to rely on a presumption of his having committed grave crimes, a presumption that may tip the balance in favour of not staying the proceedings. Irrespective of the gravity of his crime(s), should not every suspect be entitled to the same due-process protection?" However, in the end, Ryngaert concurs with the vision of this study, see ibid., p. 732 (writing on the abuse of process doctrine): "Because the tribunal's decision is a discretionary one, it may rely on any criteria it deems fit in order to assess whether application of the abuse of process doctrine to the case would be warranted. There is no reason why gravity of the crime could not be one of them." Note that Ryngaert, after the quotation at the beginning of this footnote, writes: "Sluiter, however, has submitted, precisely in the context of the ECCC (but well before the Duch order), that it is not unfair, pointing out that '[w]hen prosecuting the most serious crimes, mandatory release [in case of blatant violations of important protections, including unlawful arrest and/or detention] may appear disproportionate to the human rights violations of which the suspect is accused.' [original footnote omitted, ChP]" However, it must be clarified that Sluiter is not writing here about the abuse of process doctrine in which one has a discretion to decide the most appropriate remedy, but about a provision which dictates a certain remedy (cf. Art. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR). In addition, it can be argued that Sluiter takes a more subtle standpoint here, see Sluiter 2006 B, pp. 317-318: "When prosecuting the most serious crimes, mandatory release may appear disproportionate to the human rights violations of which the suspect is accused. At the same time, expectations of the CEC [Cambodian Extraordinary Chambers, ChP]'s role as a model of criminal justice should not be underestimated, and may require faithful application of these mandatory release provisions [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., p. 317. n. 14: "One could argue that mandatory release in respect of an individual indicted for genocide is not always consistent with international standards, bearing in mind the duty to bring such persons to justice. However, this argument is difficult to reconcile with the specific purpose of those remedies to enhance respect for international (human rights) standards." detained. For example, in his commentary on the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić, Sloan notes:

> The Appeal Chamber's focus on the serious nature of the crimes and the indignation of the international community, and its willingness to balance it against violations of human rights or sovereignty (and, in the case of sovereignty, to find a good basis for not setting aside jurisdiction in the 'universally condemned' nature of the alleged offences) leaves the impression that the graver the alleged crime, the less troubled an international judicial body should be by the violation. On the question of human rights, at least, such an approach must surely be misguided: it does not appear to comport with the presumption of innocence. Indeed, if our human rights are to be meaningful, the opposite approach would appear fitting. That is to say, when an accused is charged with a very serious crime – one of the type that is likely to engender severe public outrage, or in the words of the Appeals Chamber one that triggers the 'legitimate expectation' of 'the international community' – a judicial body must be most scrupulous in ensuring that the accused's human rights are observed. For a court to provide no remedy for a human rights violation where the accused is charged with a traffic offence and subject to a fine would be regrettable; to provide no remedy where the accused is charged with mass murder or war crimes and subject to life imprisonment would be unconscionable [emphasis in original, ChP].[659]

[659] Sloan 2006, p. 334. Cf. also the report Extradition. European standards. Explanatory notes on the Council of Europe convention and protocols and the minimum standards protecting persons subject to transnational criminal proceedings, Council of Europe, December 2006, p. 140: "Issues of unlawful arrest and transfer to an international tribunal have been raised in the cases of Todorovic, Nikolic and Krajisnik [see for this last case the end of this footnote, ChP] before the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). The tribunal found itself with a fundamental dilemma; namely, whether to encourage the apprehension of suspects and the bringing to justice of individuals who had engaged in serious crimes, on the one hand; or the safeguard of international legality and fundamental human rights, on the other. It seems that administration of justice considerations have prevailed in the reasoning of the ICTY, which, as mentioned above, poses certain questions concerning the presumption of innocence; an obligation found in Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights [original footnote omitted, ChP]." As concerns the Krajišnik case: although this case has been included in this chapter for other purposes (see ns. 97, 99 and 103), no actual male captus claims were found in its proceedings, hence making it unnecessary to include this case in the overview of male captus cases. That the report of the Council of Europe nevertheless mentions this case in the context of cases like Todorović and Nikolić may, however, be explained by the fact that the report, in the paragraph where this remark is made, refers to Lamb 2001, pp. 39-40. Although one will not find any reference on these pages to the Krajišnik case, on p. 34, n. 32 of Lamb's article, one can read: "The modalities in which the accuseds Dragan Nikolić and Momčilo Krajišnik were apprehended raise similar issues to Todorović and the lawfulness of these arrests may thus also in future be challenged; see infra." Although Lamb does not re-examine the case "infra", these words clarify that there was something special about the arrest of Krajišnik. And indeed, it was quite robust, see M. Simons, 'Nato Troops Seize a Top Serb Facing War Crime Charge', The New York Times, 4 April 2000 (available at: http://www.nytimes.com/2000/04/04/world/nato-troops-seize-a-top-serb-facing-war-crime-charge.html?pagewanted=1): "NATO and tribunal officials said Mr. Krajisnik was at his elderly parents' home in Pale when French troops blew open the door with explosives shortly after 3 a.m. today. They briefly detained his parents, tied the hands of his two sons and hustled Mr. Krajisnik, still in his pajamas, out the door." Hence, because of this robust arrest, Lamb was justified to write in 2001 that Krajišnik may challenge the lawfulness of his arrest in the future. However, apparently, he chose not to do so.

Many of these words are to be welcomed; as stated earlier, it can indeed not be the case that "the graver the alleged crime, the less troubled an international judicial body should be by the violation". Furthermore, it is also not hard to agree with the idea that "a judicial body must be most scrupulous in ensuring that the accused's human rights are observed" and that remedies are provided when violations occur.[660]

However, it is submitted that neither should the – indeed very important – presumption of innocence be used in such a way as to lead to absurd results. One must not forget that the Tribunals are prosecuting not just any suspects, but suspects charged with the most serious crimes known to the international community as a whole. For example, a judge at the ICTY cannot issue an arrest warrant unless he has confirmed the indictment of the Prosecution, an indictment which can only be prepared if the Prosecutor is of the opinion that a prima facie case exists. Although this fact does not, of course, mean that the person is guilty of the international crime – that would constitute a clear violation of the presumption of innocence – there is no reason why one should not take into account the fact that one is not dealing with a normal suspect here, but with a suspect of whom the independent Prosecutor and an impartial judge are of the opinion that a prima facie case exists against him and hence that there are reasons to assume that the person may be involved in extremely serious crimes of which the international community demands that they be prosecuted. This is not nothing. This is an important element which should be taken into account, not only in the context of the abuse of process doctrine, but also in the context of determining what to do with the consequences of an unlawful arrest/detention. It is submitted that negating this important element and strictly applying the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, a remedy which was already criticised for the fact that it can be used in a mere pro forma way and for the fact that it totally disregards the specifics of the exact male captus, can possibly lead to absurd results which no longer have anything to do with the concept of justice. For example, if a suspect of the ICTY/ICTR is not promptly informed of the reasons for his arrest, this would, strictly speaking, mean that his detention is unlawful and that he is to be released. However, if the suspect is released, the Netherlands/Tanzania would not be able to re-arrest the suspect for 15 days. In that time, he could flee to a non-UN Member State (which, in principle, does not have an obligation to cooperate with the Tribunals) or to a State which, even though it has an obligation to cooperate with them, will not do so. That could mean that a suspect of international crimes, fleeing to such a State, could effectively evade prosecution because of an irregularity which is not considered so serious that jurisdiction must be refused but which, strictly speaking, would demand the release of the suspect. This is to be avoided. As explained, although the law should obviously be obeyed, one must also be careful not to apply the law in such a strict way that it leads to great injustice: summum ius, summa iniuria.

[660] See also Van Sliedregt 2001 B, p. 82, noting that one can argue that "the more serious the allegation, and therefore the potential sanction, the more assiduous any court or Tribunal should be with regard to taking into account any material illegality, and the more reluctant it should be to adopt any 'tainted' jurisdiction." See further Oehmichen 2007, p. 231, agreeing with Van Sliedregt.

A final word on the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić is that the Appeals Chamber, like the Trial Chamber, does not explicitly support the definitions of male captus bene/male detentus as used in the Trial Chamber's decision.

That should be welcomed as these versions are the height of simplicity, leaving no room for differentiation at all.[661] However, neither is that much-needed differentiation provided by the Appeals Chamber, because it limits the issue of remedies to an 'all-or-nothing' formula: should jurisdiction be set aside or not? Even if termination of the proceedings is not the appropriate remedy here (which might very well be the case), the Appeals Chamber should have granted other, less drastic remedies to repair the abduction suffered by Nikolić.[662]

As argued before: now that the Chambers have admitted that they will take the ultimate responsibility (namely by refusing jurisdiction) in very serious cases, it is submitted that they should also have the power to remedy less serious violations committed in the pre-trial phase of their case, irrespective of the entity responsible. Furthermore, the unsatisfactory 'all-or-nothing' formula leads to an equally unsatisfactory 'not-unless' answer, which may be interpreted as authorising parties involved in the pre-trial arrest and detention phase to use (potentially) dubious methods in bringing a suspect of serious crimes to justice rather than deterring them from using such methods.[663] As a result, even though it does not explicitly support male captus bene detentus, the Appeals Chamber's decision may be viewed as backing the idea behind that principle, as only a serious mistreatment of the accused – which arguably will almost never occur[664] – will lead to male detentus.[665] The Appeals Chamber could have lessened this (unpopular) male captus bene detentus image by clearly stating that jurisdiction should also be refused if the prosecuting forum, the Tribunal, is involved in serious, intentional (procedural) irregularities in the process of bringing a suspect to trial, even if that suspect is not seriously mistreated.[666]

---

[661] After all, a court should not continue to exercise jurisdiction irrespective of what has happened during the process of bringing a suspect to court ("a court may exercise jurisdiction over an accused person regardless of how that person has come into the jurisdiction of that court [emphasis added, ChP]"), nor should it refuse jurisdiction any time an irregularity occurs, because that could include a simple procedural, non-intentional fault by a third party as well ("an irregularity has occurred in the arrest of the Accused and therefore should bar any further exercise of jurisdiction by the Tribunal").

[662] See also Sluiter (2003 B, pp. 945 and 947) when addressing the Trial Chamber's decision in Nikolić.

[663] See also Sloan 2006, p. 344: "[T]he decision of the Appeals Chamber will allow future international criminal decision-making bodies to turn a blind eye to violations of human rights and state sovereignty in pursuit of the 'greater good'. More worryingly, the absence of guidance and a tolerance of illegality means that there is nothing to give pause to SFOR, its successor or other such forces before they engage in illegal behaviour – or commission criminals or bounty hunters to do so on their behalf – so long as it doesn't exceed what appears to be a very wide margin of appreciation [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[664] See Sloan 2005, p. 492: "The appeals chamber's rejection of Nikolić's claims sends a clear message to other defendants before the ICTY that jurisdiction will not be set aside in the face of an illegal capture in any but the most egregious situations." See also the words from Sloan in the previous footnote.

[665] See also Sloan 2006, p. 334: "The Appeals Chamber (...) favoured the male captus, bene detentus approach over the male captus, male detentus approach." See also ibid., p. 342.

[666] See again the quotation from the Trial Chamber – which arguably seems more in favour of the idea behind male captus male detentus (see also Sloan 2003 A, pp. 547-548) – in n. 542 and accompanying

3.1.5 Tolimir

The penultimate case which will be discussed in the ICTY context is that of Zdravko Tolimir.

Tolimir, who was charged with genocide, conspiracy to commit genocide, crimes against humanity and violations of the laws or customs of war, was arrested on 31 May 2007 and transferred to The Hague on 1 June 2007.

In The Hague, Tolimir argued that he had been kidnapped by "illegal groups and individuals"[667] in Belgrade (Serbia) and taken to Bijeljina (Republika Srpska/Bosnia and Herzegovina)[668] where he met a patrol from the Ministry of the Interior of the Republika Srpska.[669]

From there, he was allegedly brought to Bratunac, another location in the Republika Srpska/Bosnia and Herzegovina which can also be found in Tolimir's indictment.

Tolimir claimed that he > was kept there for half a day and recorded secretly or not secretly for reasons unknown to me and the entire public was deceived into believing that I was arrested in Bratunac, which seemed to have the effect of incriminating me in the sense that the criminal was arrested at the scene of the crime.[670]

After these events, he was allegedly taken back to Bijeljina, brought to Banja Luka (also located in the Republika Srpska/Bosnia and Herzegovina), handed over to text: "The finding in the Ebrahim case that the State must come to court with clean hands applies equally to the Prosecution coming to a Trial Chamber of this Tribunal."

---

[667] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Preliminary Motions on the Indictment in Accordance with Rule 72 of the Rules' (Public Filing), Case No. IT-05-88/2-I, 30 October 2007 (Translation: 7 November 2007), p. 4 (under 1.15).

[668] See ibid., p. 3: "1.5 I was abducted at 0315 hours on 31 May from an apartment at Vajara Živojina Lukića Street number 7, Bežanijska Kosa in Belgrade, Serbia, when the armoured door was blown in by explosives without previous warning. The abduction was carried out by a well-equipped and organised group of 20 men. They introduced themselves both to me and to my neighbours as policemen. Denying me a lawyer, and putting a sack over my head, they put me in a van which, under heavy security, accompanied by escort vehicles, took me to Belgrade, to a prison facility where cells were secured by doors with bars. 1.6 Around 0800 hours on 31 May I was taken from the detention facility to a BMW passenger car. Under escort and accompanied by a vehicle of the same colour and make, against my will, I was taken to the Pavlovića Ćuprija border crossing, near Bijeljina, on the border between Serbia and Republika Srpska. 1.7 We went through border crossings between the Republic of Serbia and Republika Srpska without waiting or any checks, and we were given priority passage, which points to the organisation, official relations, and links between the persons who abducted me and the state customs organs of Serbia and Bosnia and Herzegovina, which is responsible for the borders of Republika Srpska."

[669] See ibid., p. 3 (under 1.8).

[670] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Public Transcript of Hearing 03 July 2007', Case No. IT-05-88/2-I, p. 27.

NATO officers and OTP representatives, helicoptered to the NATO base in Sarajevo and from there flown to The Hague.[671]

In his first submission, Tolimir argued that his abduction violated the Constitution and national laws of Serbia and a number of rights accorded to him by the ICTY Statute and RPE[672] and that "[t]he International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia has no jurisdiction to try abducted persons, set precedents, or legalise such legal practice in international law and relations".[673]

The Prosecution responded that it had "no knowledge of, and had no involvement in, the alleged abduction"[674] and that, even if Tolimir had indeed been abducted – in the meantime, namely on 17 September 2007, the OTP had "submitted a formal request for information from the Serbian government concerning the Accused's allegations [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[675] – this did not deprive the ICTY of jurisdiction.[676] The OTP referred to the decisions of the Trial and Appeals Chamber in the Nikolić case and argued, with respect to the concept of State sovereignty, that "[e]ven if a violation of Serbia's sovereignty had occurred, this merely would have resulted in the Accused being returned to Serbia, whereupon his extradition to The Hague would be required".[677] With respect to the concept of human rights, the OTP noted that Tolimir had "not raised any human rights violations that are of such a serious nature that the Tribunal should decline to exercise jurisdiction".[678] On 3 December 2007, the OTP filed a supplement to its response, which contained, among other things, a report from the authorities of the Republika Srpska on Tolimir's arrest (no response was received on the part of the Serbian Government).[679] According to this report, Tolimir was not deprived of his liberty in Belgrade but in the Republika Srpska/Bosnia and Herzegovina following a coordinated operation in the border region of the Republika Srpska/Bosnia and [671] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Preliminary Motions on the Indictment in Accordance with Rule 72 of the Rules' (Public Filing), Case No. IT-05-88/2-I, 30 October 2007 (Translation: 7 November 2007), p. 4 (under 1.12 and 1.13).

[672] Ibid., pp. 4-5 (under 1.16).
[673] Ibid., p. 2 (under 1.1).
[674] ICTY, Pre-Trial Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Prosecution Response to the Accused's Preliminary Motion on the Indictment' (Public with Confidential Appendices), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 21 November 2007, para. 6 (p. 2). According to the Prosecution, it "first became involved in the arrest of the Accused on 31 May 2007, when the Prosecutor was contacted by the Prime Minister of Republika Srpska and informed that the Accused was in the custody of the Republika Srpska police. On the evening of 31 May 2007, the Accused was formally arrested in Banja Luka by Mr. Don King, head investigator for the Office of the Prosecutor's Sarajevo office, and subsequently transferred to The Hague [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 5 (p. 2).)
[675] Ibid., para. 9 (p. 3).
[676] See ibid.
[677] Ibid., para. 14 (p. 4). See also ibid.: "To decline jurisdiction on this ground would be senseless."
[678] Ibid., para. 15 (p. 5).
[679] See ICTY, Pre-Trial Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Supplement to Prosecution Response to the Accused's Preliminary Motion on the Indictment' (Confidential), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 3 December 2007, D735-D724.

Herzegovina and Serbia, in which authorities from these two entities were involved.[680]

On 14 December 2007, Trial Chamber II of the ICTY issued its decision. In this decision, it followed the Prosecution in applying the Nikolić jurisprudence to the case at hand. Approving the (not uncriticised, see supra) Appeals Chamber's distillation of the two 'principles' which "seem to have support in State practice as evidenced by the practice of their courts", the Trial Chamber rejected a possible claim related to the concept of State sovereignty:

> In the present case, the Accused is charged with genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes. Assuming, without deciding, that a violation of state sovereignty occurred in the instant case, the Trial Chamber finds that given the serious crimes involved such a violation is not sufficient to justify the setting aside of jurisdiction by this Tribunal. Moreover, the Trial Chamber notes that Serbia did not lodge a complaint. Therefore, any alleged violation of state sovereignty is not a basis to decline jurisdiction in this instance.[681]

---

[680] See ibid., Appendix, D729-D727: "In the early hours of 31st May 2007, members of the Security and Information agency of the Republic of Serbia phoned authorized employees of the Criminal Police Administration from the Team for locating and apprehending [T]he Hague indictees and informed them that they had the intelligence information according to which, in the course of that same day, some of [T]he Hague indictees, most probably Ratko Mladić or someone close to him, will try to cross over from the Republic of Serbia to Bosnia and Herzegovina, that is to the territory of the Republic of Srpska, between Zvornik and Ljubovija, most probably on the territory bordering with Ljubovija, to the municipality of Bratunac. According to this information, deputy head of the Criminal Police Administration of the RS Ministry of Interior, with six members of this Administration of the Team for locating and apprehending of [T]he Hague indi[c]tees, headed to the area of the Bijeljina Public Security Centre in order to prepare for blocking and controlling of the mentioned terrain, that is coordinating of simultaneous action of the blockade, both from the territory of the Serbian Republic and the territory of the Republic of Srpska. (...) The action implicated a discrete control of all vehicles and persons on the blocked road directions, and it fully started around 14.00 hours on the same day with coordination of activities of the Republic of Serbia Ministry of Interior members, who used helicopters in the action of blocking in their [border] area. Members of the Team of the Criminal Police Administration, with three unmarked official vehicles, took part in mobile observation of road communication along the Drina river, especially the road communication which from the [border] crossing towards Ljubovija leads along the Drina river towards Sopotnik, and then towards Drinjača and Zvornik. At about 14.15, while taking a detour from the road communication in the direction of Sopotnik, on the part of the cobbled road the mobile team of the Criminal Police Administration intercepted movement of one person, who was moving on foot towards the settlement of Sopotnik, on the left side of the road. This person was stopped and an attempt to identify him was made. He said he had no id whatsoever and he introduced himself as General Zdravko Tolimir, officer of the Republic of Srpska army, to whom he did resemble in some of his features, although had lost a lot of weight. Following this, since the person was in poor health and had difficulties moving, he was asked where he was heading, what direction he came from and if anyone else was with him, that is, if anyone else drove him, but he did not wish to answer the questions posed. (...) The person was immediately put into the official vehicle, and then transported to Banja Luka with escort of the entire team of the Crime Police."

[681] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Decision on Preliminary Motions on the Indictment Pursuant to Rule 72 of the Rules' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 14 December 2007, para. 19.

With respect to the concept of human rights,[682] the Trial Chamber was, "[f]or the purpose of the present analysis only, (...) prepared to accept the factual allegations of the Accused related to the initial phase of his arrest",[683] even though "the only information concerning the very initial phase of the Accused's arrest is the description of the events given by the Accused himself".[684] However, this was not of any help to Tolimir:

> What is before the Trial Chamber – with reference to each phase of the arrest individually and cumulatively – does not amount to a human rights violation of such a serious nature so as to require that the exercise of jurisdiction be declined. In fact, the only irregular aspect of the arrest is the alleged circumstances surrounding the Accused's removal from his apartment in Belgrade. Assuming those allegations to be true, even that scenario however is not so egregious as to merit declining jurisdiction over this Accused in relation to the grave crimes charged against him.[685]

In this context, the Trial Chamber noted a not unimportant point, namely the fact that no evidence was provided that NATO/the OTP were involved in the initial phase of Tolimir's arrest.[686] In fact, it found that "the Prosecution has provided evidence to the contrary".[687]

Although at the time the Trial Chamber issued its decision, the Prosecution had not yet received a response from the Serbian Government regarding the circumstances of Tolimir's arrest,[688] the Serbian Government finally reacted on 9 October 2008, more than a year (!) after the Prosecution had submitted a formal request for information. This reaction, which was received on 13 October, can be found in a submission from the Prosecution dated 15 October and explains that the Serbian Ministry of Internal Affairs has informed the Ministry of Foreign Affairs "that it was not in possession of either records or any documents in relation to the arrest of Zdravko TOLIMIR, as well as that the officials of that Ministry did not participate in the arrest of Zdravko TOLIMIR".[689] However, the reaction does

---

[682] See ibid., para. 23: "The Accused submits that the manner in which his abduction, transfer to the RS and ultimately transfer to the Tribunal were conducted resulted in a violation of his rights. According to the Accused, the NATO forces and the representatives from the Prosecution involved in the abduction acted in collusion with his captors and therefore the unlawful conduct of his capture, detention and transfer to The Hague are imputable also to them [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[683] Ibid., para. 25.

[684] Ibid., para. 24. It must be noted that at the time the Trial Chamber issued its decision, there was still no response from Serbia regarding the OTP's request to provide information on Tolimir's arrest. See ibid.

[685] Ibid., para. 25.

[686] See ibid., para. 26.

[687] Ibid. The Trial Chamber also noted that "[o]nce the Accused came into contact with NATO and the Prosecution his arrest was carried out in a lawful manner and without any violations of his rights." (Ibid.)

[688] See also n. 675 and accompanying text.

[689] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Submission Pursuant to the Direction of the Trial Chamber Concerning the Accused's Arrest, With Appendix' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 15 October 2008 (filed: 16 October 2008, D 2079 – D 2070), Appendix A, D 2075.

confirm the already-mentioned[690] joint operation in the border region on 31 May 2007.[691]

On 22 October 2008, Tolimir challenged the authenticity and truthfulness of the document in which one can read the Serbian reaction and argued, among other things, that the reaction contradicts the statement of Carla Del Ponte in her memoirs that "a Serbian special unit took Tolimir into custody after he had refused to surrender voluntarily".[692] Two days later, Tolimir wrote another submission in which he noted that on 22 October 2008, "the Minister of Interior [of the Republic of Serbia, ChP] accused the former Government of the Republic of Serbia of having arrested me in Serbia and of handing me over to Hague Tribunal".[693]

The Prosecution was, however, not impressed by these new assertions as Trial Chamber II, in its 14 December 2007 decision, had already concluded "that even if the Accused's allegations concerning the circumstances of his arrest were true, they do not justify declining the exercise of jurisdiction [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[694]

Tolimir, in his reaction of 4 December 2008, emphasised, however, that he had not requested a reconsideration of the 14 December 2007 ruling in his submissions because he was simply unable to make such a request.[695] The reason for his inability to do so was that he was "not familiar with the content of this ruling, because it has not been translated to a language the Accused understands or has been entered in the Tribunal's judicial data base".[696] The aim of Tolimir's present submissions was > that it be established that Zdravko Tolimir was arrested in the Republic of Serbia (and not in Republika Srpska) and that he was denied the right to have the competent court

---

[690] See n. 680.

[691] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Submission Pursuant to the Direction of the Trial Chamber Concerning the Accused's Arrest, With Appendix' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 15 October 2008 (filed: 16 October 2008, D 2079 – D 2070), Appendix A, D 2075 – D 2073.

[692] ICTY, [Trial] Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Submission by the Accused Concerning the Prosecution's Submission of 15 October 2008' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 22 October 2008 (translation filed: 29 October 2008), D 2163, under 9. See also ibid., under 10: "In her book, Carla del Ponte also states that "the Bosnian Serb authorities later told me they would never again participate in such a charade just so Koštunica could say that none of the Tribunal's accused had been arrested on Serbian soil" [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[693] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Supplementary Submission by the Accused Concerning the Prosecution's Submission of 15 October 2008' (Public, Urgent), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 24 October 2008 (translation filed: 29 October 2008), D 2173, under 2.

[694] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Response to Submission, Supplementary Submission and Attachment by the Accused Concerning the Prosecution's Submission of 15 October 2008' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 6 November 2008, para. 1.

[695] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Reply to the Prosecution's Response to Submission, Supplementa[r]y Submission and Attachment by the Accused Concerning the Prosecution's Submission of 15 October 2008' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 4 December 2008 (translation filed: 16 December 2008), D 2593, under 2.

[696] Ibid. (It is arguably rather strange that a suspect is not familiar with a decision concerning his case almost a year after that decision has been issued.)

> decide about handing him over to the Tribunal in accordance with the Law on Cooperation with the Hague Tribunal.[697]

According to Tolimir, writing about himself, "the truth about his arrest has been covered up (...) as this can have an impact on the Tribunal's final judgement and Zdravko Tolimir's position after and before the final judgement".[698]

On 18 December 2008, Trial Chamber II, having examined all these submissions, decided:

> The Accused requests that the Trial Chamber make inquiries and take other measures in order to investigate and establish the circumstances of his arrest. Specifically the Accused asks the Trial Chamber to rule that he was arrested in Serbia and denied his right to call on "a competent court" with regard to his arrest. He requests this without seeking a specific legal remedy as a result and on the basis of the Tribunal's "inherent right" to do so. This Tribunal does not entertain arguments – factual or legal – in the abstract. While the Accused may have remedies to pursue in national courts in relation to an alleged illegal arrest, it is not for this Trial Chamber to examine the circumstances of the Accused's arrest for the purpose of providing some form of declaration. The circumstances surrounding the arrest of the Accused are relevant to the Trial Chamber to the extent that they may affect the jurisdiction of the Tribunal over him. For this reason the Trial Chamber will consider the arguments of the Accused related to his arrest only in the context of the impact on the jurisdiction of the Trial Chamber to adjudicate on this case.[699]

Before going to examine the Trial Chamber's observations regarding the issue of jurisdiction, some attention must be paid to the Trial Chamber's remarks that "it is not for this Trial Chamber to examine the circumstances of the Accused's arrest for the purpose of providing some form of declaration" because these circumstances are only "relevant (...) to the extent that they may affect the jurisdiction of the Tribunal over him".

This, it can be argued, is again a rather restricted view of the consequences of an illegal arrest. The Trial Chamber focuses only on the ultimate remedy, the refusal of jurisdiction.[700] However, as explained earlier, there is another remedy which can be

---

[697] Ibid., under 3.
[698] Ibid., D 2592, under 9.
[699] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Decision on Submissions of the Accused Concerning Legality of Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 18 December 2008, para. 12.
[700] As already explained in the context of the Nikolić case, this focus on the ultimate remedy alone, in a way, reassures the parties involved in the pre-trial arrest and detention phase that they should not worry too much if irregularities are committed in the process of bringing a suspect of very serious crimes to justice. Cf. also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Reply to the Prosecution's Response to Submission, Supplementa[r]y Submission and Attachment by the Accused Concerning the Prosecution's Submission of 15 October 2008' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 4 December 2008 (translation filed: 16 December 2008), D 2592, under 10: "If the Trial Chamber fails to issue a ruling that Tolimir's arrest was unlawful, the Tribunal will send out an unambiguous signal that the law does not apply to those accused before the Tribunal and that every measure, including unlawful arrest, can be undertaken against them." It may not seem strange that the Trial Chamber only looked at the ultimate remedy here because Tolimir, in his very first submission, see n. 673 and accompanying text, had indeed linked to the establishment of an illegal arrest/detention and which is, because of its (at least) customary international law status, also applicable to the context of the Tribunals, namely the right of every arrested and detained person to have the lawfulness of his (arrest and) detention reviewed and to be released if his (arrest and) detention is deemed unlawful.

However, as stated, because this remedy is not without its problems, see Subsection 4.4 of Chapter III and the discussions of the cases of Dokmanović and Nikolić supra, it would be better if the judge would avoid this remedy and would grant, in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, the most appropriate remedy for the wrong suffered, taking every aspect of the case at hand into account, whether that remedy consists of a declaration[701] that a person's arrest was unlawful (for example, with respect to minor violations (not committed by ICTY/NATO personnel)), of a reduction of the sentence or financial compensation,[702] or of the (final!) release of the suspect and the ending of the case (in truly serious cases). However, before one can grant the most appropriate remedies, one must, of course, determine, among other things, how serious the violations are. Hence, it is important that the judge knows how the suspect in question was arrested/detained and whether the process was accompanied by any irregularities, irrespective of the question of whether these irregularities should have any effect on the exercise of jurisdiction.

Returning now to the Trial Chamber's observations regarding the jurisdiction issue, the judges, who were of the opinion that Tolimir, despite his submission to the contrary, in fact wanted to have a reconsideration of the 14 December 2007 ruling,[703] felt that the new information revealed after 14 December 2007 had no influence on that decision; there was "no basis to doubt the authenticity of the Serbia report"[704] and even if Carla Del Ponte's statements and the allegations of the Serbian Minister of Interior were correct in that Tolimir was arrested by Serbian forces in Serbia, "this would not add anything new to the original allegations advanced by the Accused and decided upon by the Trial Chamber in the 14 December 2007 Decision".[705] argued that the ICTY had no jurisdiction to try him. However, the Trial Chamber, in this passage, clearly responds to Tolimir's suggestions that the circumstances of his arrest must be established and that this may entail lighter remedies, such as a declaration that his arrest was unlawful. (In addition, it can be argued that any judge should consider for himself whether the suspect is not entitled to other less far-reaching remedies if the ultimate remedy is not granted.)

---

[701] In contrast to the Trial Chamber's position, there is arguably no reason why this cannot be seen as a "specific legal remedy" as well.

[702] Cf. the still-to-discuss Barayagwiza case.

[703] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Decision on Submissions of the Accused Concerning Legality of Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 18 December 2008, para. 13.

[704] Ibid., para. 16.

[705] Ibid., para. 17. See also ibid.: "The comments of the former Chief Prosecutor alleged by the Accused and the remarks of the Minister of the Interior are both submitted in support of the Accused's original allegation that he was arrested in Serbia and illegally transferred to the Republika Srpska and that Serbian authorities were involved. Given that the Trial Chamber's original decision assumed these allegations to be true for the purpose of its determination, no new circumstances have been presented so as to justify revisiting that decision."

Tolimir appealed the 18 December 2008 and not the 14 December 2007 decision (about which Tolimir clarified that a "translation (...) into a language which the accused understands was not filed until on 31 December 2008")[706] as he found this senseless, given the fact that the 2007 decision was, in effect, incorporated into the 2008 decision.[707]

He asserted, as was done supra, that "[t]he Trial Chamber erred in limiting its consideration of the circumstances under which the accused was arrested to the "context of the impact on the jurisdiction of the Trial Chamber to adjudicate" [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[708]

It is hard not to agree with Tolimir's argument that "the very least that is expected of the International Tribunal is to establish the circumstances under which the accused was arrested and whether or not he was deprived of his freedom in a lawful or unlawful manner".[709] Only then can one properly look at what kinds of remedies would be appropriate to heal possible violations.[710] It was asserted supra that a simple declaration that the person was unlawfully arrested could very well constitute an appropriate remedy if the nature of the unlawfulness were minor. This point was, not surprisingly, also raised by Tolimir.[711]

However, Tolimir – possibly inspired by the formula used by the Trial Chamber in Nikolić – also hinted that more far-reaching remedies would perhaps be appropriate in this case because, in his opinion, the circumstances of his apprehension were also rather serious:

> It is not merely that the arrest was made in an illegal manner because, inter alia, he was subjected to torture and other forms of inhumane conduct (putting a sack over his head during the arrest, failure to inform him of the charges against him, unlawful transfer to the territory of Republika Srpska without the appropriate or binding

[706] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Appeal Against the Decision on Submissions of the Accused Concerning Legality of Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2, 23 January 200[9] (translation filed: 29 January 2009), A 22, under 1.
[707] See ibid., A 22, under 2.
[708] Ibid., A 21, under 6.
[709] Ibid., A 20, under 10. See also ibid., A 20 – A 19, under 13: "It cannot be claimed that the Tribunal has no jurisdiction to establish the circumstances of the arrest of an accused, considering that the Tribunal is actively involved in the procedure to arrest the accused and that actual acts, in whose legality the Tribunal as a judicial organ must have an interest, are carried out by organs of states which are legally obliged to cooperate with the Tribunal. The Tribunal must be the guardian of the principles of the rule of law and therefore must also take account of whether the arrest was made legally, either when raised by the accused or on its own initiative." Cf. also Sloan 2006, p. 342 (writing on the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić): "The first obligation of a decision-making body in these circumstances should be to get to the heart of what actually happened".
[710] Cf. again (see also n. 202) Henquet 2003, p. 155: "If the Tribunal must remedy a violation of the rights of an accused during his or her arrest, it must have access to information pertaining to the arrest."
[711] See ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Appeal Against the Decision on Submissions of the Accused Concerning Legality of Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2, 23 January 200[9] (translation filed: 29 January 2009), A 19 – A 18, under 15-17. See also ibid., A 15, under 32: "Simply making a declaration is not mere abstract deliberation without any consequences; establishing certain relevant circumstances and their legal qualification constitute a form of satisfaction and a measure to protect the legal system."

> procedure, forcing the accused to "come to an understanding" whereby he renounced his citizenship of the Republic of Serbia, etc.), but also that his arrest was presented in a way which calls into question the integrity of the Tribunal and makes the accused the subject of manipulation and propaganda activities in the context of cooperation with the Tribunal and the Republic of Serbia avoiding taking responsibility for arresting people accused before the Tribunal [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP].[712]

Tolimir also hinted that one of those more far-reaching remedies could, for example, be a reduction of his sentence: "[t]he circumstances under which he was arrested are important, for example, for his provisional release, sentencing decision, etc. [emphasis added, ChP]".[713]

In fact, in the final words of his appeal, Tolimir confirmed the point he also made in his very first submission,[714] namely that the ICTY must actually grant him the ultimate remedy available:

> [T]he accused Zdravko Tolimir hereby requests that the Appeals Chamber amend the decision of the Trial Chamber, and establish: A) that, considering the circumstances under which Zdravko Tolimir was arrested and those which followed upon his arrest, it is not within the Tribunal's jurisdiction to continue proceedings against Zdravko Tolimir.[715]

Only if that remedy were rejected, Tolimir requested that the ICTY establish:

> B) That Zdrvako Tolimir was arrested in the territory of the Republic of Serbia. C) That he was arrested in an unlawful manner. D) If it considers there is insufficient information to render a decision on applications B) and C), that it order the Prosecution to use the instruments of cooperation to investigate further with the Republic of Serbia the circumstances relating to the manner and location of Zdravko Tolimir's arrest, and to take a statement from the former Chief Prosecutor, Ms Carla Del Ponte, to confirm the claims regarding intelligence related to his arrest. E) To draw to the attention of the President of the Tribunal and the Chief Prosecutor the circumstances under which Zdravko Tolimir was arrested in order that this information be included in the reports submitted to the Security Council.[716]

---

[712] Ibid., A 18 – A 17, under 20.
[713] Ibid., A 16, under 30.
[714] See n. 673 and accompanying text.
[715] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Appeal Against the Decision on Submissions of the Accused Concerning Legality of Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2, 23 January 200[9] (translation filed: 29 January 2009), A 14, under 36. In that respect, the word "establish" in the following passage in ibid., A 15, under 34 must be considered a clear mistake: "The accused hereby sets out for the Appeals Chamber applications on which the Trial Chamber has ruled. The first is to establish its jurisdiction due to the serious violations of Zdravko Tolimir's rights, and due to the prolonged consequences of these violations, which have been made manifest not only in the violation of his rights but also because the acts which followed his arrest (...) have done serious damage to the Tribunal's integrity."
[716] Ibid., A 14, under 37.

The Prosecution, in its response, was of the opinion that Tolimir's appeal had to be dismissed for a number of procedural reasons. However, even if that were not accepted by the Appeals Chamber, the substantive arguments of Tolimir had to be rejected as well. This was because,

> [t]he Appeal fails to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber committed any discernible error of law or fact, or that it weighed either relevant or irrelevant considerations in an unreasonable manner, irrespective of whether the Accused is requesting the Appeals Chamber to decline jurisdiction based on the circumstances of his arrest, or whether he is simply seeking a declaration. Furthermore, the Accused similarly has failed to show that the Trial Chamber has abused its discretion [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[717]

On 12 March 2009, it fell to the Appeals Chamber to shed light on these issues. However, unfortunately, it did not go into the merits of the case as it dismissed both the appeal of Tolimir and the Prosecution's response to this appeal on procedural grounds alone: according to the judges, Tolimir should have asked the Trial Chamber's permission to file an appeal against the 2008 decision (which was not done)[718] and the Prosecution filed its response to Tolimir's appeal too late.[719]

Although it is, of course, unfortunate that the Appeals Chamber did not go into the merits of this case, the case remains interesting for a number of issues which have been reviewed during the examination of this case. One could refer here not only to the discussion as to whether the ICTY should not put too much emphasis on the ultimate remedy of setting aside jurisdiction, but also to the fact that the Trial Chamber's decision of 14 December 2007 confirmed the findings of the Appeals Chamber in Nikolić with respect to the element of 'seriousness of the alleged crimes'. Hence, even if the legal foundation for the Appeals Chamber's observations on that point is not without its flaws, one can assert that the Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić appears to incorporate the ICTY view on the male captus issue.

3.1.6 Karadžić

On 31 July 2008, the world could see one of the 'biggest fish' of the ICTY, Radovan Karadžić, being brought into the courtroom of the Tribunal. During this initial appearance, Karadžić wished to inform Judge Orie – who presided over this session – of the "procedural irregularities in my arrival here",[720] a point which he further

---

[717] See ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Prosecution's Motion for Extension of Time to File a Response and Response to Tolimir's "Appeal Against the Decision on Submissions of the Accused Concerning Legality of Arrest"' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-AR72.2, 10 February 2009, para. 13.

[718] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Decision on Zdravko Tolimir's Appeal Against the Decision on Submissions of the Accused Concerning Legality of Arrest (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-AR72.2, 12 March 2009, para. 13.

[719] Ibid., paras. 9-10.

[720] See ICTY, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, Case No. IT-95-5/18, Transcripts of 31 July 2008, p. 20. See also Sluiter 2008 A, p. 624.

developed in his first motion where he recounted the circumstances of his apprehension in Serbia as follows:

> The next irregularity occurred in Belgrade. Unknown civilians showed me a badge so quickly that I could not identify it, took me out of a public transport vehicle and held me in an unknown place for 74 hours. During this time I was not informed of the rights to which I am entitled if they abducted me in the name of international justice. Nor did they tell me who they were or what they intended to do with me. Nor did they allow me to speak with one of their chiefs or allow me to make a telephone call. They did not even allow me to send a single SMS message to one of my new friends so that they would not go round the hospitals and mortuaries looking for me. Nor would they send such a message on my behalf. For those 74 hours I did not exist, and after that they handed me over to the Special Court and an investigating judge, after which everything was regular.[721]

On 4 August 2008, the Prosecution stated that it did not see this submission of Karadžić, who was defending himself, as an official motion and hence that it would not respond to it.[722] As a result, two days later, Karadžić filed an "[o]fficial submission concerning my first appearance and my immunity agreement with the USA".[723] Remarkably, this submission, even though it very much resembles the earlier one, leaves out the most interesting point from the perspective of this study, namely the circumstances pertaining to his actual apprehension in Belgrade. As a result, the proceedings continued with respect to Karadžić's alleged immunity agreement with the US, the so-called Holbrooke Agreement, but the point of his alleged male captus faded into the background. Nevertheless, it is clear that Karadžić had not forgotten it; on 4 August 2009, he filed a motion through which he returned to this topic.

Before going to examine that motion however, it is worth pointing out that in the aftermath of the alleged immunity agreement proceedings, Trial Chamber III and the Appeals Chamber made some interesting remarks about the abuse of process doctrine. In the context of these proceedings, Karadžić had argued that, if the Chamber were to decide that the agreement was not binding on the ICTY, it then had to > consider whether it should dismiss the Indictment or stay the proceedings as an abuse of process "so as not to taint the integrity of the Tribunal by prosecuting someone [721] See ICTY, Pre-Trial Chamber, Prosecutor v. Karadžić, 'Irregularities Linked to My Arrival Before the Tribunal', Case No. IT-95-5/18-I, 31 July 2008 (filed on 1 August 2008), p. 3.

[722] See ICTY, Trial Chamber I, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Prosecution's Notice Regarding Accused's Communication with the Pre-Trial Chamber' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-I, 4 August 2008, para. 1.
[723] See ICTY, Pre-Trial Chamber, Prosecutor v. Karadžić, 'Official submission concerning my first appearance and my immunity agreement with the USA', Case No. IT-95-5/18-I, 6 August 2008.

> who, through no fault of his own, relied upon an agreement which was based on deception [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[724]

The judges indeed decided that the agreement was not binding on the ICTY,[725] thereby assuming for the moment – and only for the purpose of first deciding the legal issues[726] – that Karadžić's allegations concerning the agreement were true. As a result, the judges turned to the abuse of process argument. After having examined the observations of the judges in the Barayagwiza (to be discussed in the next subsection) and Nikolić cases on this doctrine, they rejected Karadžić's claim:

> First, proceeding with his case, even in light of the Agreement, would not affect any of the Accused's fair trial rights, including as a suspect or an accused. In addition, the Chamber recalls its finding that Holbrooke did not act with actual or apparent authority of the UNSC. Thus, he was essentially a third party, unconnected to the Tribunal, promising immunity years before the Accused's transfer to the Tribunal. It is difficult to see how, in those circumstances, to proceed with the case can be said to be such an abuse of process that the Tribunal would be obliged to stay the proceedings.[727]

Two remarks can be made here.

First, the test used by the Trial Chamber – "proceeding with his case (...) would not affect any of the Accused's fair trial rights" – is not, as will also be shown in the next subsection, the test used by the ICTR Barayagwiza case, even though the ICTY judges referred earlier[728] to this correct test:

> [T]he abuse of process doctrine may be relied on in two distinct situations: (1) where delay has made a fair trial for the accused impossible; and (2) where in the circumstances of a particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct.[729]

---

[724] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on the Accused's Holbrooke Agreement Motion' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 8 July 2009, para. 11.

[725] See ibid., para. 80.

[726] See ibid., paras. 46-47: "If the Accused cannot obtain the relief he seeks as a matter of law, then the issue of whether the Agreement was ever made is irrelevant to any issue other than sentence, on which evidence may be led at trial. (...) The Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber in Nikolić followed the same approach: the parties there agreed to proceed without an evidentiary hearing and, instead, submitted a list of agreed facts on which the Chamber was to rely while making its determination on the law. The fact that in this case there is no such agreement, nor any agreed facts, does not preclude the Chamber from taking a similar approach. Instead of relying on agreed facts, the Chamber will make its determination on the basis that the evidence submitted by the Accused is accepted pro veritate for this purpose. Thus, the Accused's argument that the facts surrounding the Agreement are all disputed does not prevent the Chamber from deciding the legal issues first [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[727] Ibid., para. 84.

[728] See ibid., para. 80.

[729] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, paras. 77. See also ibid., para. 74: "It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity."

Hence, the judges can use the abuse of process doctrine, even if continuing with the trial would not affect the person's right to fair trial (in the strict sense of the word), namely "where in the circumstances of a particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct". In that latter case, one could argue that the broader concept of a fair trial, the fairness of the entire proceedings of bringing a suspect to justice, has been affected, entailing that it would be unfair to try the suspect in the first place. (See also Subsection 4.3 of Chapter III.)

The second remark that can be made here is that the Trial Chamber's emphasis on the fact that Holbrooke cannot be connected to the Tribunal may not necessarily make any difference. It is true that the 'national' abuse of process doctrine, even though it is sometimes formulated in such a general way that it could also encompass the actions of third parties,[730] focuses on the actions of the prosecuting forum's own authorities, but the cases of Milošević and Nikolić (and the same goes for other still-to-discuss cases, such as Barayagwiza) have shown that the Tribunal's version of this doctrine entails that the judges may refuse to exercise jurisdiction in very serious male captus cases, irrespective of the entity responsible for the serious male captus. Now, the judges of Trial Chamber III did in fact acknowledge that in the Nikolić case, the judges of Trial Chamber II had held "that the Tribunal should not exercise its jurisdiction over persons who have been "seriously mistreated" by a party not acting for the Tribunal and before being handed over to the Tribunal",[731] but they also expressed "some doubts that this statement is applicable to every situation involving a third party not connected to the Tribunal".[732] They explained their reservation as follows:

> The Nikolić Trial Chamber based this part of its decision on two examples, namely (i) the events in Barayagwiza, where there was a considerable delay by state authorities before the accused's transfer to the Tribunal, and (ii) a hypothetical situation of torture or cruel or degrading treatment of the accused by a third party just before his [730] See the following words of Lord Lowry in Bennett, see n. 610 and accompanying text of Chapter III and ns. 300 and 310 and accompanying text of Chapter V: "[A] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case." (House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161.) See also the following words of Lord Steyn in Latif (see n. 346 and accompanying text of Chapter V): "[P]roceedings may be stayed in the exercise of the judge's discretion not only where a fair trial is impossible but also where it would be contrary to the public interest in the integrity of the criminal justice system that a trial should take place." (House of Lords, Lord Steyn, Regina v. Latif; Regina v. Shazad, 18 January 1996, 1 W.L.R. 112-113 [1996].) Not very surprisingly, these quotations were also referred to by the ICTR Appeals Chamber in Barayagwiza, see ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, paras. 74-75.

[731] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on the Accused's Holbrooke Agreement Motion' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 8 July 2009, para. 85.

[732] Ibid.

> transfer to the Tribunal. However, those two situations are hardly applicable to a case such as the one before the Chamber. First, in Barayagwiza, the prosecution was stayed partly also because of the delays caused by the ICTR's Prosecutor upon the transfer to the Tribunal, which compounded the serious delays caused by the state authorities that captured Barayagwiza. In addition, the state authorities in question were explicitly held to have been acting on behalf of the ICTR Prosecutor and thus were not completely unconnected to the Tribunal. As for the example of "serious mistreatment" of the accused by a third party, such as torture or cruel and/or degrading treatment, there is no indication that the Accused suffered such serious mistreatment or that there was any other egregious violation of his rights, including his right to political activity. In any event, in the opinion of this Chamber, it could only be in exceptional circumstances that actions of a third party that is completely unconnected to the Tribunal or the proceedings could ever lead to those proceedings being stayed. Where an accused is seriously mistreated by such a third party, that mistreatment is unlikely to be a barrier to a fair trial which can be secured in various other ways, for example, by excluding any evidence obtained by torture at the hands of the third party [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP].[733]

The last point is connected with the previously mentioned – and criticised – abuse of process test of the Trial Chamber that even serious mistreatment, such as torture, may not lead to the ending of the case because his fair trial rights may not be in danger. However, as mentioned above, the abuse of process doctrine is also about stopping a case, not when the fairness of the trial in court is in jeopardy, but where it would be unfair to start a trial in the first place in view of certain circumstances. In that latter case, one could say that because of certain circumstances, the broad fair trial concept (meaning the entire process of bringing a person to justice), the judges' sense of justice in general, has become infected. Recall the abuse of process doctrine from the Bennett case:

> [A] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case.[734]

Judges may and should also refuse jurisdiction in the case of serious pre-trial irregularities, even if these irregularities do not jeopardise a person's fair trial in the restricted sense of the word. It is not only the fair trial for the suspect which is at stake, but also the integrity of the court in question. That integrity will, of course, be more easily harmed if the authorities of the prosecuting forum itself are involved in the serious male captus, but the court may also be of the opinion that its integrity as a court of law is undermined if it were to try a person who, in the context of the court's proceedings, has been seriously mistreated.

---

[733] Ibid.
[734] See n. 730.

Having that said, one can, however, generally agree with the Trial Chamber's other observations that the irregularities in this case are definitely not so severe as to divest jurisdiction. What is required is such a serious male captus (irrespective of the entity responsible) that the judges cannot, in good conscience, decide to continue with the case. However, what constitutes such a serious male captus depends on the circumstances, for example on who was involved in it. In that respect, one can concur with the Chamber that some third parties can be seen as being more connected with the Tribunal than others. For example, irregularities caused by a State which is acting on the Prosecutor's behalf may be deemed to be more serious than the same irregularities committed by third parties which have a less strong connection with the Tribunal, such as private individuals acting on their own.[735] Another aspect which could be taken into account is the question as to how much violence was used against the person.

As will be shown in the Barayagwiza case, the seriousness of the irregularities related to that person's pre-trial detention were caused by the several violations of the person's rights in which the Prosecution, but also a third party, had its share. In this context, one could also think of this study's suggestion presented in the context of the Dokmanović and Nikolić case, namely that a court should refuse jurisdiction if employees of the Tribunal itself were, for example, involved in serious, intentional irregularities related to a person's apprehension, such as a kidnapping. In that latter situation, however, the person may not been mistreated (that was also not the case in Barayagwiza). Nevertheless, one can imagine that a court may also be of the opinion that it should refuse jurisdiction where it has become clear that a suspect was tortured in the context of its proceedings, even if the Prosecution was not in some way involved in that irregularity. (It is, of course, clear that if the Prosecution were involved in such serious mistreatment – which probably/hopefully will never happen – the court has no proper option but to refuse jurisdiction.)

Karadžić appealed the decision and argued, with respect to the Trial Chamber's use of the abuse of process doctrine, and referring to the Barayagwiza and Nikolić cases, that "the Trial Chamber improperly concluded that there were two different standards for abuse of process – one for Tribunal actors and one for non-Tribunal actors".[736] However, as clarified, although there are two situations possible, there is arguably only one test:

[735] Although it is true that Barayagwiza was being held for a long time at the request of the ICTR in Cameroon, the ICTR also stated that even if Barayagwiza was not in the constructive custody of the Tribunal, the fact that he had "spent an inordinate amount of time in provisional detention without knowledge of the general nature of the charges against him" (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 85, see also n. 856 and accompanying text) had to be taken into account. This is a point which the Trial Chamber does not mention here.

[736] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadzic, 'Appeal of Decision of Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-05/18-AR73.4, 27 July 2009, para. 101.

> [T]he abuse of process doctrine may be relied on in two distinct situations: (1) where delay[737] has made a fair trial for the accused impossible; and (2) where in the circumstances of a particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct.[738]

Hence, if the judge is of the opinion that the suspect can no longer enjoy a fair trial (in the strict sense of the word) or that some pre-trial circumstances mean it would be contrary to the integrity of the court/his sense of justice to have a trial in the first place (one could call this the concept of a fair trial more broadly perceived),[739] he can refuse jurisdiction.

Hence, there is only one test, consisting of two male detentus avenues. However, and focusing now on the avenue which is most interesting for this study (the second one), in taking all the elements into account in this exercise, the nature of the actor responsible for the impropriety/misconduct is, it can be argued, of course, an important element which should be taken into account here.[740] It can certainly be

---

[737] Or other circumstances, see the test from Bennett (see n. 734 and accompanying text) to which the judges in the Barayagwiza case referred, see ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 75.

[738] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 77. See for the second male detentus avenue also ibid., para. 74: "It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity." With respect to these particular words, requiring serious violations of the suspect's rights, it is submitted that the judge should take a liberal stance. Hence, even if he is of the opinion, for example, that private individuals cannot violate (human) rights (see the Nikolić case), he should ask himself whether what happened to the suspect is nonetheless so serious that jurisdiction must be refused. In that respect, one can agree with the following words from the Appeals Chamber in Karadžić: "[T]he question before the Appeals Chamber is whether, assuming that the Appellant's factual submission are accepted, proceeding with the trial of the Appellant would contravene to the Tribunal's sense of justice or would be detrimental to the Tribunal's integrity, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct amounting to serious and egregious violations of the Appellant's rights [emphasis added, ChP]." (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on Karadžić's Appeal of Trial Chamber's Decision on Alleged Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-AR73.4, 12 October 2009, para. 51.) In any case, one can always refer here to the more general words of the Barayagwiza decision as mentioned in para. 77: "pre-trial impropriety or misconduct".

[739] This was also very clearly explained in the Latif case (see also n. 346 and accompanying text of Chapter V): "The speeches in Ex parte Bennett conclusively establish that proceedings may be stayed in the exercise of the judge's discretion not only where a fair trial is impossible but also where it would be contrary to the public interest in the integrity of the criminal justice system that a trial should take place." (House of Lords, Lord Steyn, Regina v. Latif; Regina v. Shazad, 18 January 1996, 1 W.L.R. 112-113 [1996].) See also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74. (See also n. 730.)

[740] In this context, it is also to be remembered that at the national level, the abuse of process doctrine, even though one will find rather general definitions of his concept, seems to require the involvement of the prosecuting forum's own authorities. Cf. also Sloan 2006 p. 342 (writing on the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić): "If the full facts were set out and it became clear that there was no link to SFOR, then many of the bases on which national courts have favoured the male captus, male detentus approach (e.g., a desire to control an overzealous executive, avoiding the perception of impropriety, etc.) would be mitigated or would become inapplicable."

maintained that the integrity of a Tribunal will more easily be affected by the pre-trial impropriety/misconduct if it can be attributed to the Tribunal. It can be asserted that the Barayagwiza/Nikolić cases 'only' support the idea that serious impropriety/misconduct can lead to the ending of the case, irrespective of the entity responsible,[741] but not that actions from a third party may not be given less weight than actions from parties which can be connected to the prosecuting forum, when the judge has to determine whether the impropriety/misconduct is so serious that it must lead to the ending of the case. In other words, although one can agree with Karadžić that "[t]he Barayagwiza Appeals Chamber never purported to exclude third-party conduct from scrutiny under the abuse of process doctrine or to limit such scrutiny only to extreme cases of severe physical mistreatment or torture",[742] one can imagine that a Tribunal, given its important responsibility to also prosecute suspects of international crimes, will not refuse jurisdiction too readily and certainly not when the entities which can be connected to the prosecuting forum have done nothing wrong. Hence, only in extreme cases, such as (but indeed not limited to) serious mistreatment of the suspect, will a Tribunal probably refuse jurisdiction if the impropriety/misconduct was committed by third parties having no link with the Tribunal (and arguably rightly so). However, it appears that the Trial Chamber did not deny this when it stated (see also footnote 733 and accompanying text):

> As for the example of "serious mistreatment" of the accused by a third party, such as torture or cruel and/or degrading treatment, there is no indication that the Accused [741] Arguably, the Tribunal should apply a broad concept of abuse of process doctrine here, see also the discussion on this point in the context of the Nikolić case. Cf. also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadzic, 'Appeal of Decision of Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-05/18-AR73.4, 27 July 2009, paras. 109-111: "Within national jurisdictions, it will almost always be a single state authority which creates the criminal law, investigates and arrests individuals for breaches of it, and establishes the courts in which to hear the criminal case. It is also the same state authority which is represented by the prosecution that proceeds with the case. In these circumstances, it will be exceedingly rare for an actor unrelated to the state to be involved in the law enforcement and adjudication. As such, it is perhaps rational for an abuse or process doctrine operating in this context to look primarily or solely to misconduct attributable to the state – reserving only an extraordinary or residual category for abusive misconduct attributable to other unrelated actors. The exact opposite is true of international tribunals. These are highly decentralized institutions. Only the actors which create the criminal law (the UNSC) and which hear and prosecute cases for breaches of its (the Tribunal/OTP) are exclusively related to the central authority (the UN). As the Tribunal itself frequently points out, "the International Tribunal has no enforcement arm of its own – it lacks a police force." As such, it is entirely dependent on a diverse range of actors to fill this critical role. A whole host of states, inter-state organizations and international agencies – as well as diplomats, special envoys, local authorities, and military personnel, – routinely fill the key roles of investigating crimes, sharing intelligence, and arresting and transferring suspects. This involvement may be formal or informal, and it may occur with or even without the Tribunal's knowledge. Where so many diverse actors may be involved in creating, enforcing and adjudicating international criminal law – sometimes even without one another's knowledge or consent – it is essential that the doctrine of abuse of process in this setting not be applied in a restrictive or technical manner. (…) A Court operating in these circumstances must have the discretionary authority to look at all the events that have led to the proceedings and decide, regardless of whom they are attributable, whether on the whole they breach the Accused's rights or contravene the Court's sense of justice [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[742] Ibid., para. 104.

> suffered such serious mistreatment or that there was any other egregious violation of his rights, including his right to political activity. In any event, in the opinion of this Chamber, it could only be in exceptional circumstances that actions of a third party that is completely unconnected to the Tribunal or the proceedings could ever lead to those proceedings being stayed [emphasis added and emphasis (of the word "egregious") in original, ChP].[743]

The Appeals Chamber, which repeated its balancing exercise from the Nikolić case,[744] agreed with this position when it held:

> [T]he Trial Chamber adopted the common standard established by the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza Decision and in the Nikolić Appeal Decision, and not a higher one, by considering whether the Appellant suffered a serious mistreatment or if there was any other egregious violation of his rights [emphasis added, ChP].[745]

Finally, it may also be worth mentioning that the Appeals Chamber, in contrast to the Trial Chamber, correctly checked whether one of the two situations triggering the abuse of process doctrine was met[746] (which was not the case here).[747]

Returning to the actual male captus discussion, in his motion filed on 4 August 2009, Karadžić first repeated (see his first submission filed a year earlier) what had in fact happened to him.

He claimed that he was arrested in Belgrade on Friday 18 July 2008 by unknown men and taken to a location where he was held incommunicado for three days.[748] "During that time, he was never advised of the reason for his arrest, the identity of

---

[743] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on the Accused's Holbrooke Agreement Motion' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 8 July 2009, para. 85.

[744] See ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on Karadžić's Appeal of Trial Chamber's Decision on Alleged Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-AR73.4, 12 October 2009, para. 49: "The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Appellant is charged with genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes. The public interest in the prosecution of an individual accused of such offences, universally condemned, is unquestionably strong. Against the legitimate interest of the international community in the prosecution of the Appellant for Universally Condemned Offences stands the alleged violation of the Appellant's expectation that he would not be prosecuted by the Tribunal, pursuant to the alleged Agreement [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[745] Ibid., para. 47.

[746] See ibid., para. 51: "The Appeals Chamber observes at the outset that none of the Appellant's allegations qualify as a situation making a fair trial impossible, pursuant to the first prong of the test set out in the Barayagwiza Decision. The Appellant's allegations point instead to the second prong of the test set out in the Barayagwiza Decision. In other words, the question before the Appeals Chamber is whether, assuming that the Appellant's factual submission are accepted, proceeding with the trial of the Appellant would contravene to the Tribunal's sense of justice or would be detrimental to the Tribunal's integrity, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct amounting to serious and egregious violations of the Appellant's rights [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

