[747] See ibid., para. 53.

[748] See ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 3 August 2009 (filed 4 August 2009), para. 4.

his captors, or brought before a judicial officer. He was refused access to a telephone to inform anyone that he had been arrested."[749]

After the weekend, Karadžić continued, the Serbian authorities improperly announced that he was arrested on Monday 21 July 2008, three days after his actual apprehension on the Friday.[750] On Tuesday 22 July 2008, Karadžić was brought before a judge.[751] Thus, he had allegedly been held without seeing a judicial officer for four days.

According to Karadžić, these four days, which thus also encompassed three days of incommunicado detention, had violated his rights,[752] namely 1) his right to liberty; 2) his right to be informed of the reasons for his arrest and 3) his right to be promptly brought before a judge.

With respect to the first right, Karadžić argued that "[t]he practice of incommunicado and unacknowledged arrest and detention is 'an obvious example' of arbitrary arrest and detention [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[753] This argument, supported by Nowak, was mentioned earlier in this book,[754] but it was there also explained that this statement should be refined:

> Brief incommunicado detention, that is, deprivation of liberty for a short period of time in complete isolation from the outside world, including family and lawyer, does not per se appear to be illegal under international human rights law, but it cannot be used in order to bar the detainee from exercising his or her rights as an arrested or detained person.[755]

Next to the element of arbitrariness, Karadžić looked at the procedural dimension of the element of legality and correctly asserted that "human rights instruments require compliance with the national procedures during arrest and detention in order for the deprivation of liberty to be lawful".[756] Hence, the relevant Serbian provisions had to be examined.

In Karadžić's view, an examination of these provisions (including relevant human rights provisions) showed that they had been infringed.[757] Given these

---

[749] Ibid.
[750] See ibid., para. 5.
[751] See ibid.
[752] See ibid.
[753] Ibid., para. 6.
[754] See n. 225 of Chapter III.
[755] Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights and International Bar Association 2003, p. 211.
[756] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 3 August 2009 (filed 4 August 2009), para. 7.
[757] See ibid., para. 11. See also ibid.: "First, an apprehension was effectuated by individuals acting as police officers failing to identify themselves to Dr. Karadžić, as well as to announce the reasons for his arrest and his right in connection therewith. Second, no warrant for compulsory appearance was served to him during and right after his apprehension, instead he was simply abducted. Third, Dr. Karadžić was taken to an unidentified location and detained in a secret house, instead of being taken to official detention facilities as prescribed by law. And finally, as a result of this intimidating apprehension and violations of the elements of procedural legality and non-arbitrariness, it had to be concluded that his right to liberty and security had been breached.[758]

Karadžić asserted that his second right, the right to be informed of the reasons for his arrest (and of the charges against him), was also violated[759] but arguably, he had already done this in the context of the more general right to liberty, a right which includes this more specific right.[760]

The third right, the right to be promptly brought before a judge, can also be seen as a sub-right of the more general right to liberty and security.[761]

According to Karadžić, this (sub)right was also violated[762] because he "was brought before the national judicial authority on 22 July 2008, that is on the fifth day after his arrest of 18 July 2008. Such time period is clearly contrary to the relevant international human rights standards."[763]

Because of these human rights violations, Karadžić argued, he was entitled to an effective remedy.

This had been earlier stressed in cases such as Delalić et al.[764] and the four still-to-discuss ICTR cases of Barayagwiza,[765] Kajelijeli,[766] Semanza[767] and Rwamakuba.[768]

The fact that these violations were not committed by authorities which can be linked to the Tribunal did not change this – a statement which, as will also be shown in the remainder of this chapter, can certainly find support in the above-mentioned cases:

> In light of the above jurisprudence it is not necessary to address the question whether or not the violations of Dr. Karadzic's rights can in some way be attributed to the ICTY, or one of its organs. It follows from the highly authoritative case law from the Appeals Chamber in Barayagwiza, Kajelijeli, Semanza and Rwamakuba, that unacknowledged incommunicado detention until 21 July 2008, Dr. Karadžić was prevented from contacting the outside world, in particular his family and his legal counsel as guaranteed by the law."

---

[758] See ibid., para. 12.

[759] See ibid., para. 21.

[760] See n. 757: "First, an apprehension was effectuated by individuals acting as police officers failing to identify themselves to Dr. Karadžić, as well as to announce the reasons for his arrest and his right in connection therewith [emphasis added, ChP]."

[761] See, for example, para. 3 of the ICCPR's right to liberty and security (Art. 9). See also ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 3 August 2009 (filed 4 August 2009), para. 25: "Dr. Karadžić was denied his right to be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power. This is yet another breach of the right to liberty and security of a person."

[762] See the previous footnote.

[763] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 3 August 2009 (filed 4 August 2009), para. 25.

[764] See n. 136.

[765] See n. 919 and accompanying text.

[766] See n. 1081 and accompanying text.

[767] See n. 997 and accompanying text.

[768] See ns. 1124, 1144 and 1164 and accompanying text.

> attribution or any involvement of the ICTY in aforementioned violations cannot be a condition for Dr. Karadzic's entitlement to an effective remedy.[769]

Karadžić concluded his submission by requesting the Trial Chamber to first, "find that Dr. Karadzic's rights to liberty, to be informed of the reasons for his arrest, and to be taken promptly before a judicial officer, were violated during his arrest, and to hold an evidentiary hearing if necessary"[770] and secondly – invoking the remedies formula used in the still-to-discuss cases of Barayagwiza[771] and Semanza[772] – "order that an appropriate remedy, namely financial compensation in the event of an acquittal or reduction in sentence, in the event of a conviction, be fixed by the Trial Chamber as part of the final judgement in this case".[773]

The Prosecution responded on 18 August 2009. It argued, among other things, that "Karadžić's request should be denied because the Tribunal is under no obligation to provide him with a remedy unless the alleged violations can be attributed to the Tribunal".[774] The Prosecution was of the opinion that Karadžić could not rely on Barayagwiza, Kajelijeli, Semanza and Rwamakuba in that respect as in those cases, "the accused were granted a remedy because those violations were attributed to the ICTR through one of its organs, i.e. the ICTR Prosecution".[775] However, as will be explained in the remainder of this chapter, all cases contain reasonings which can be interpreted as meaning that the ICTR will take responsibility for violations, even if they cannot be clearly attributed to the Prosecutor. The Rwamakuba case is the weakest case in that respect and the Barayagwiza case, where the judges even looked at irregularities beyond the period of constructive custody (see footnotes 828-829 and accompanying text for this term), the most far-reaching.

The Prosecution in Karadžić clarified its point, referring to different statements from these four cases. For example, with respect to the first Barayagwiza decision, it noted that the Appeals Chamber > found that "the Prosecutor has failed with respect to her obligation to prosecute the case with due diligence." The Appeals Chamber ordered the release of the accused as [769] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 3 August 2009 (filed 4 August 2009), para. 44.

[770] Ibid., para. 45.
[771] See n. 922 and accompanying text.
[772] See n. 1004 and accompanying text. Cf. also the cases Kajelijeli (see n. 1082 and accompanying text) and Rwamakuba (see n. 1154 and accompanying text).
[773] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 3 August 2009 (filed 4 August 2009), para. 45.
[774] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Prosecution Response to Karadžić's "Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest"' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 18 August 2009, para. 1.
[775] Ibid., para. 4. This paragraph only focused on the cases of Barayagwiza, Kajelijeli and Semanza but the reasoning of the Prosecution also extends to the Rwamakuba case, see ibid., paras. 3 and 5.

> "the only remedy available for such prosecutorial inaction and the resultant denial of his rights [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."[776]

However, what do these words say?

They arguably only say that because the Prosecution failed to such an extent in this case, the case had to be dismissed with prejudice to the Prosecution. Thus, because of serious flaws in the Prosecution's handling of the case, the remedy had to be far-reaching.

However, that does not mean that the Tribunal would not have granted lighter, less far-reaching remedies if the suspect suffered violations which were not caused by serious failures on the part of the Prosecution. As will be shown in the next subsection, the Barayagwiza case arguably supports the idea that any violation occurring in the context of the case must be remedied, even if the violation, strictly speaking, cannot be attributed to the Prosecution/Tribunal. This point is clear with respect to the abuse of process doctrine (see the first Barayagwiza decision),[777] but it seems that the Tribunal would also take responsibility and remedy the (less serious) violations which do not trigger the male detentus outcome (and rightly so), see the second Barayagwiza decision.

The Prosecution in Karadžić noted with respect to this second decision that > the Appeals Chamber found that even though the accused's rights had been violated by the Cameroonian authorities, those violations "were not attributable to the Prosecutor." The Appeals Chamber consequently altered the remedy because it found that "new facts diminish the role played by the failings of the Prosecutor as well as the intensity of the violations of the rights of the Appellant." A remedy was nevertheless granted because of the violations of the accused's rights once he had been transferred to the ICTR [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[778]

However, as will also be shown in the discussion of that decision, the fact that certain violations were not attributable to the Prosecutor does not mean that the judges would not take these violations into account when determining the appropriate remedies for these violations.

It seems that the Appeals Chamber did take (just as it arguably should take) all the violations into account when determining the remedies, including those which cannot be attributed to the Prosecution, when it stated more generally "that the Appellant's rights were violated, and that all violations demand a remedy".[779]

This point was also made in the Semanza case, where the judges stated "that any violation, even if it entails only a relative degree of prejudice, requires a

---

[776] Ibid., para. 4.

[777] See ns. 841 and 856 and accompanying text.

[778] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Prosecution Response to Karadžić's "Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest"' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 18 August 2009, para. 4.

[779] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 74.

proportionate remedy".[780] The Prosecution in Karadžić noted that this statement was only made "in the circumstances of the case where there were violations attributable to the Prosecution and the ICTR".[781]

However, as will be shown in the discussion of that case, one can wonder whether this is so. The decision also contains a remark which can be seen as evidence for the idea that the statement "that any violation, even if it entails only a relative degree of prejudice, requires a proportionate remedy" must be viewed broadly, an idea which is reinforced by the declaration of Judge Lal Chand Vohrah in this case, see footnotes 834 and 985.

The fact that there was some delay in transferring Semanza to the ICTR and that this delay "was not attributable to the Prosecutor and consequently that the Tribunal did not violate Rule 40 bis"[782] does not jeopardise this reasoning. It only says that the Tribunal itself did not violate Rule 40 bis of the ICTR RPE because the delay could not be attributed to it. However, that does not mean that the judges may not view such a delay as a human rights violation nonetheless (which, by the way, does not seem to be the case here) which must be remedied, even if it could not be attributed to the Tribunal.[783]

The Prosecution in Karadžić also referred to the statement in the Kajelijeli case that "[t]he Prosecution failed to effect its prosecutorial duties with due diligence out of respect for the Appellant's rights following its Rule 40 request to Benin. Thus, the Appellant is entitled to a remedy from the Tribunal."[784] As will also be explained in the context of the Kajelijeli case, this is a tricky remark as it indeed seems to connect the granting of remedies with the attribution of certain violations to the Prosecutor, note the word "[t]hus". Of course, it is obvious that if certain violations can be attributed to the Prosecutor, then the suspect is entitled to a remedy. However, the more interesting question is whether these words imply that the suspect is only entitled to a remedy if certain violations can be attributed to the Prosecutor. As will become clear from the discussion of this case, the decision seems to provide enough room for the interpretation that the Tribunal is of the opinion that all violations in the context of a certain case must be remedied, even if those violations cannot be attributed to the Prosecutor.[785]

Finally, with respect to the Rwamakuba case, the Prosecution in Karadžić opined that "the Appeals Chamber based its conclusion that Rwamakuba was entitled to an

---

[780] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 125.
[781] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Prosecution Response to Karadžić's "Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest"' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 18 August 2009, para. 4.
[782] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 104. See also ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Prosecution Response to Karadžić's "Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest"' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 18 August 2009, para. 4.
[783] Cf. again Judge Lal Chand Vohrah's declaration in this case, see ns. 834 and 985.
[784] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 252.
[785] See ns. 1060, 1065-1066, 1070, 1079 and 1081 and accompanying text.

effective remedy for violations following his transfer to the ICTR on the fact that these violations were "attributable to the Tribunal." [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[786] It is indeed correct that in this case, the ICTR only looked at violations which occurred after the suspect's transfer to the Tribunal. (According to the ICTR, the violations at the national level did not occur in the constructive custody of the ICTR.) However, this does not necessarily negate the general connotation of the statement that every violation must be effectively remedied. Here, the same point can be made as that made supra in the context of the Kajelijeli case; of course, the ICTR must remedy violations which are clearly attributable to it. However, the more interesting question is whether this case can also be seen as support for the idea that the ICTR will remedy violations occurring in the context of its case (for example, violations occurring in the context of the constructive custody) which cannot be clearly attributed to it. As will be shown in the discussion of that case, the judges in Rwamakuba, referring to Barayagwiza and Semanza, also seemed to accept responsibility for parts of the constructive custody, although it is also clear that this case does not go as far as those two cases.

The Prosecution in Karadžić also had another point, namely that "[t]he Barayagwiza, Semanza, and Kajelijeli cases are further distinguishable from Karadžić's case because, in the former, no confirmed indictments and no arrest warrants had been issued prior to the accused's detention in the detaining state".[787] Although the issuance of indictments and arrest warrants may lead to additional obligations on the part of the national State,[788] this does not change the basic idea suggested in this study, a suggestion which arguably finds support in the ICTR cases, that the Tribunal will remedy violations committed in the context of a certain case, whether or not the suspect has received an indictment or arrest warrant.

Finally, the Prosecution in Karadžić stated that "[t]he requirement that violations be attributed to the Tribunal does not deprive Karadžić of his right to an effective remedy since he may seek relief for the alleged violations elsewhere, e.g. in Serbia [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[789] This is a rather easy remark for the Prosecution to make. However, the Prosecution cannot seriously be of the opinion that Karadžić can get an effective remedy for these violations elsewhere (if they are established as such). After all, if it is established that Karadžić's detention was unlawful pursuant to national law, the normal remedy in such a case would be the release of the suspect, see the habeas corpus provision of, for example, Article 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR. However, how can Karadžić be released by the Serbian authorities if he is in the ICTY's custody?

[786] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Prosecution Response to Karadžić's "Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest"' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 18 August 2009, para. 5.
[787] Ibid.
[788] See also ibid., para. 7.
[789] Ibid. para. 9.

As argued before, it would be a sign of real legal 'maturity' on the part of the ICTY if it takes the full responsibility for all violations occurring in the context of its cases, simply because it is the ICTY that is now trying this suspect.

In providing the remedies for certain violations, the judges can then, of course, take into account the fact that their own people were not involved in the violations. As a result, the remedies can be very light. However, that is better than simply ignoring the problems which are inherently linked with the cooperation system of the ICTY, namely that the Tribunal is dependent on other actors for arresting and detaining suspects and thus that it should not only accept the fortunate, but also the less fortunate consequences of this dependence.

In his reply to these arguments, Karadžić first of all pointed to the decision of 8 July 2009 concerning the Holbrooke Agreement (see supra),[790] which supported the abuse of process idea in the Nikolić case that serious violations may lead to a refusal of jurisdiction, even if these violations were not committed by organs which can be connected to the Tribunal. As argued earlier in this book, the fact that the Tribunal would take the ultimate responsibility (by refusing jurisdiction) for serious actions of third parties, should indeed be seen as additional evidence for the idea that the Tribunal must remedy every violation in the context of its cases, irrespective of the entity responsible for these violations.

Alongside that, Karadžić rejected the views of the Prosecution with respect to the ICTR cases mentioned above. Much of his criticism resembles the remarks briefly mentioned above and examined in greater detail in the remainder of this chapter. For example, with respect to the Barayagwiza case, Karadžić stated, among other things:

> The fact that violations of rights not directly attributable to the ICTR still entitle the accused to a remedy follows from two basis elements of the Decision: (i) the violations by the Cameroonian authorities not directly attributable to the ICTR were fully taken into consideration; (ii) the unequivocal concluding statement that all violations demand a remedy [original footnote omitted, ChP].[791]

Likewise, Karadžić pointed to passages in the Semanza[792] and Kajelijeli[793] cases which will be further addressed in the remainder of this chapter and which indeed seem to support the idea that the Tribunal will remedy any violations in the context of its case, whether or not these violations could be attributed to the Prosecutor.

The last point to be discussed here is that Karadžić was, of course, also not of the opinion that the way a case is brought within the context of a Tribunal should influence the basic idea that the Tribunal should take responsibility for violations committed in this context.

---

[790] See ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadzic, 'Reply Brief: Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-95-05/18-PT, 24 August 2009, para. 4.
[791] See ibid., para. 6.
[792] See ibid., para. 8. See also ns. 977-978 and accompanying text.
[793] See ibid., para. 10. See also ns. 1070-1072 and accompanying text.

Hence, in that respect, it would not matter whether that case was brought within the context of the Tribunal via the issuance of an indictment/arrest warrant or otherwise.[794]

On 31 August 2009, the Trial Chamber issued its decision on these matters. The judges were very brief: they decided that these matters were premature and would have to be resolved at the end of the substantive case.[795] However, the judges nevertheless already noted > that there is substance in the Prosecution's submission that, before being able to obtain the remedy he seeks, the Accused has to be able to attribute the infringement of his rights to one of the organs of the Tribunal or show that at least some responsibility for that infringement lies with the Tribunal.[796]

As has – and will – become clear in this study, although it may seem very logical that the Tribunal would only have to remedy those violations which can be attributed to it or for which it can be held legally responsible (to a certain extent), and although it is true that in the cases mentioned by Karadžić, "the major discussions and findings ultimately revolved around the Prosecution's responsibility for violations, rather than the responsibility of state authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP]",[797] there are still several passages in these cases which also provide room for another interpretation, namely that the Tribunal will take a more general responsibility, even if violations cannot be clearly attributed to it or of which it cannot be said that the Tribunal was, strictly speaking, legally responsible (to some extent) for them, and that it will remedy all violations in the context of its cases.

The fact that judges, under the abuse of process doctrine, will take even the ultimate responsibility (namely the refusal of jurisdiction) for actions of other entities in very serious situations (which was not the case here)[798] arguably constitutes additional evidence for this idea.

One can assume that if the trial of Karadžić reaches its final stage, these points will be re-litigated, probably up to the Appeals Chamber. It remains to be seen how those judges will respond, although it seems clear that both interpretations can be found in the jurisprudence of the Tribunals.

It is submitted that this study is, in any case, of the opinion that the interpretation which does not demand the attribution of certain violations to the Tribunal is the better one.

Simple fairness (among other things – this point will be returned to) demands that the now prosecuting forum remedies all the violations which have been committed in the context of its case. In the words of Zahar and Sluiter:

---

[794] See ibid., paras. 12-13.
[795] See ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on the Accused's Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 31 August 2009, para. 5.
[796] Ibid., para. 6.
[797] Ibid.
[798] See also ibid., para. 7.

> When other entities bear primary responsibility for violations of human rights, what matters is the duty of every tribunal bench to protect the fairness and integrity of the trial by determining an appropriate remedy. Obviously, the trial does not start at the seat of the tribunal but extends to every act connected with it. While this may be a heavy and seemingly unfair burden on the tribunals – they interact with a wide variety of actors, not all of whom may apply the highest standards of justice, and the tribunals are not in a position to change this – the reverse is even more unfair.[799]

The judges in Karadžić also agreed with the Prosecution that the authorities used by Karadžić

> are not directly applicable to cases where an arrest warrant has been issued and executed pursuant to Rule 55 as they concerned facts where suspects were detained by various states pursuant to requests from the Prosecution under Rule 40, and then were left to languish in those states for months, while the Prosecution was preparing to issue an indictment against them.[800]

That is, of course, true, but it can again be argued that this does not necessarily jeopardise the idea mentioned above, namely that violations which occur in the context of a Tribunal case must be remedied by the final prosecuting forum, whether that "in the context of a Tribunal case" concept has been triggered by an indictment, arrest warrant, request for provisional arrest or otherwise.

3.2 Cases in the context of the ICTR

3.2.1 Barayagwiza

It was stated earlier in this book that this study would particularly focus on those male captus cases which have to do with irregular arrests as the word captus, of course, refers to the capture/apprehension. The previous cases from the ICTY have confirmed this. However, it is now time to look at a case which is also very often mentioned in the male captus discussion and which has to do with the question of the effect of an irregular pre-trial detention on the exercise of jurisdiction: the – already very often alluded to – case of Barayagwiza. In this case, > [t]he Appeals Chamber of the ad hoc Tribunals was confronted with the impossible task of striking the right balance between two interests that had equal dignity and deserved equal consideration. On the one hand, the right of the accused not to be arbitrarily detained; on the other, the effective functioning of international criminal justice [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[801]

---

[799] Zahar and Sluiter 2008, pp. 285-286. See also n. 859.

[800] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on the Accused's Motion for Remedy for Violation of Rights in Connection with Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 31 August 2009, para. 6.

[801] Zappalà 2003, p. 256. This extremely interesting dilemma, which plays a central role in this book, did arguably not come to the fore in many other ICTR cases where the suspect claimed that his

In 1997, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza was charged with genocide, complicity in genocide, incitement to commit genocide, conspiracy to commit genocide and crimes against humanity (murder and persecution).[802] Schabas notes that "[t]aking everything into account, and assuming the allegations in the indictment can be even partially established, Barayagwiza stands out as one of the most heinously evil of those responsible for the Rwandan genocide – and not for want of competitors".[803]

The problems related to the pre-trial detention of this 'big fish' are rather complicated but may be summarised as follows.

On 15 April 1996, thus before he was indicted by the ICTR, Barayagwiza (and several other suspects) were arrested in Cameroon by the authorities of Cameroon "on suspicion of having committed genocide and crimes against humanity in Rwanda in 1994 [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[804] Barayagwiza claimed that "he was arrested by Cameroon on the basis of a request from the [ICTR] Prosecutor, while the Prosecutor contend[ed] that the Appellant was arrested on the basis of international arrest warrants emanating from the Rwandan and Belgian authorities".[805]

Although Goldstone, the then ICTR Prosecutor, was at first interested in investigating Barayagwiza and had therefore requested on 17 April 1996, pursuant to Rule 40 of the ICTR RPE,[806] that Barayagwiza be detained,[807] he "informed arrest/detention/transfer had to be considered as unlawful. See, for example, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean Kambanda v The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR[-]97-23-A, 19 October 2000 or the cases mentioned in n. 138. These cases arguably do not shed new light on the main topics of this study, for example, because the suspect's arguments were quickly rejected, see, for example, the above-mentioned Kambanda decision where the Appeals Chamber held (in para. 48): "As the Appellant has failed to establish any reason for which he should exceptionally be allowed to raise the question of the legality of his detention for the first time on appeal, this ground of appeal is rejected." Cf. also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Paul Akayesu, 'Judgment', Case No. ICTR-96-4-A, 1 June 2001, paras. 364-375. See in that respect also ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor Versus Gratien Kabiligi, 'Decision on the Defence Motion to Lodge Complaint and Open Investigations into Alleged Acts of Torture under Rules (40)(C) and 73(A) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Case No. ICTR-97-34-I, 5 October 1998. In this case, the Trial Chamber dismissed a motion of the suspect who claimed to have been tortured in the context of his arrest and detention. A subsequent appeal was dismissed for procedural reasons, see ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Gratien Kabiligi, 'Decision Rejecting Notice of Appeal', Case No. ICTR-97-34-A, 18 December 1998. As a result, these kinds of cases will not be examined here in their entirety, although some observations stemming from them may, of course, be reviewed. (See also n. 3 of Chapter IV.)

---

[802] See ICTR, Judge Lennert Aspegren, The Prosecutor versus Jean[-]Bosco Barayagwiza, 'Decision Confirming the Indictment', Case No. ICTR-97-19-I, 23 October 1997. The charges in the final, amended, indictment of 13 April 2000 were genocide, conspiracy to commit genocide, direct and public incitement to commit genocide, complicity in genocide, crimes against humanity and serious violations of Art. 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, see ICTR, Office of the Prosecutor, The Prosecutor against Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza, 'Amended Indictment', Case No. ICTR-97-19, 13 April 2000.

[803] Schabas 2000, p. 564.

[804] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 5.

[805] Ibid., Appendix A: Chronology of Events, p. 65.

[806] Which at that time read: "(A) In case of urgency, the Prosecutor may request any State: (i) to arrest a suspect provisionally; (ii) to seize physical evidence; (iii) to take all necessary measures to prevent the Cameroon [on 16 May 1996, ChP] that she [this must be "he", ChP][808] only intended to pursue prosecutions against four of the detainees, excluding the Appellant [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]".[809]

That the new Prosecutor, Louise Arbour, was also not interested in a prosecution became clear from the fact that "[o]n 15 October 1996, responding to a letter from the Appellant complaining about his detention in Cameroon, the Prosecutor informed the Appellant that Cameroon was not holding him at her behest [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[810]

However, on 21 February 1997, the day that the Court of Appeal of Cameroon rejected a request from Rwanda to have the remaining suspects extradited to Rwanda and ordered their release, the ICTR Prosecutor nevertheless reacted and "made a request pursuant to Rule 40 for the provisional detention of the Appellant and the Appellant was immediately re-arrested pursuant to this Order [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[811] escape of a suspect or an accused, injury to or intimidation of a victim or witness, or the destruction of evidence. The State concerned shall comply forthwith, in accordance with Article 28 of the Statute. (B) Upon showing that a major impediment does not allow the State to keep the suspect under provisional detention or to take all necessary measures to prevent his escape, the Prosecutor may apply to a Judge designated by the President for an order to transfer the suspect to the seat of the Tribunal or to such other place as the Bureau may decide, and to detain him provisionally. After consultation with the Prosecutor and the Registrar, the transfer shall be arranged between the State authorities concerned, the authorities of the host Country and the Registrar. (C) In the cases referred to in paragraph B, the suspect shall, from the moment of his transfer, enjoy all the rights provided for in Rule 42, and may apply for review to a Trial Chamber of the Tribunal. The Chamber, after hearing the Prosecutor, shall rule upon the application. (D) The suspect shall be released if (i) the Chamber so rules, or (ii) the Prosecutor fails to issue an indictment within twenty days of the transfer."

---

[807] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 5. See also ibid.: "On 6 May 1996, the Prosecutor asked Cameroon for a three-week extension of the detention of all the suspects, including the Appellant [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[808] At the time, Richard Goldstone was still the Chief Prosecutor of the ICTR. The new Prosecutor, Louise Arbour, replaced Goldstone on 1 October 1996, see UNSC Res. 1047 of 29 February 1996, UN Doc. S/RES/1047 (1996).

[809] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 5.

[810] Ibid., para. 7. The delay between May and October was, according to Barayagwiza, caused by the fact that "on 31 May 1996, the Court of Appeal of Cameroon adjourned sine die consideration of Rwanda's extradition request, pursuant to a request to adjourn by the Deputy Director of Public Prosecution of the Court of Appeal of the Centre Province, Cameroon. The Appellant claims that in making this request, the Deputy Director of Public Prosecution relied on Article 8(2) of the Statute [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 6.) Art. 8, para. 2 of the ICTR Statute reads: "The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the primacy over the national courts of all States. At any stage of the procedure, the International Tribunal for Rwanda may formally request national courts to defer to its competence in accordance with the present Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Tribunal for Rwanda."

[811] Ibid., para. 7.

In addition, she requested an Order for transfer and provisional detention pursuant to Rule 40 bis of the ICTR RPE,[812] which was signed by Judge Aspegren on 3 March 1997 and filed on 4 March 1997.[813]

However, it was only on 19 November 1997, more than eight months later, that Barayagwiza was transferred to the ICTR pursuant to this Order.[814]

---

[812] Which at that time read: "(A) In the conduct of an investigation, the Prosecutor may transmit to the Registrar, for an order by a Judge assigned pursuant to Rule 28, a request for the transfer to and provisional detention of a suspect in the premises of the detention unit of the Tribunal. This request shall indicate the grounds upon which the request is made and, unless the Prosecutor wishes only to question the suspect, shall include a provisional charge and a summary of the material upon which the Prosecutor relies. (B) The Judge shall order the transfer and provisional detention of the suspect if the following conditions are met: (i) the Prosecutor has requested a State to arrest the suspect provisionally, in accordance with Rule 40, or the suspect is otherwise detained by a State; (ii) after hearing the Prosecutor, the Judge considers that there is a reliable and consistent body of material which tends to show that the suspect may have committed a crime over which the Tribunal has jurisdiction; and (iii) the Judge considers provisional detention to be a necessary measure to prevent the escape of the suspect, injury to or intimidation of a victim or witness or the destruction of evidence, or to be otherwise necessary for the conduct of the investigation. (C) The provisional detention of a suspect may be ordered for a period not exceeding 30 days from the day after the transfer of the suspect to the detention unit of the Tribunal. (D) The order for the transfer and provisional detention of the suspect shall be signed by the Judge and bear the seal of the Tribunal. The order shall set forth the basis of the application made by the Prosecutor under Sub-rule (A), including the provisional charge, and shall state the judge's grounds for making the order, having regard to Sub-rule (B). The order shall also specify the initial time limit for the provisional detention of the suspect, and be accompanied by a statement of the rights of a suspect, as specified in this Rule and in Rules 42 and 43. (E) As soon as possible, copies of the order and of the request by the Prosecutor are served upon the suspect and his counsel by the Registrar. (F) At the end of the period of detention, at the Prosecutor's request indicating the grounds upon which it is made and if warranted by the needs of the investigation, the Judge who made the order, or another Judge of the same Trial Chamber, may decide, subsequent to an inter partes hearing, to extend the detention for a period not exceeding 30 days. (G) At the end of that extension, at the Prosecutor's request indicating the grounds upon which it is made and if warranted by special circumstances, the Judge who made the order, or another Judge of the same Trial Chamber, may decide, subsequent to an inter partes hearing, to extend the detention for a further period not exceeding 30 days. (H) The total period of detention shall in no case exceed 90 days, at the end of which, in the event the indictment has not been confirmed and an arrest warrant signed, the suspect shall be released or, if appropriate, be delivered to the authorities of the requested State. (I) The provisions in Rules 55(B) to 59 shall apply mutatis mutandis to the execution of the order for the transfer and provisional detention relative to a suspect. (J) After his transfer to the seat of the Tribunal, the suspect, assisted by his counsel, shall be brought, without delay, before the Judge who made the order, or another Judge of the same Trial Chamber, who shall ensure that his rights are respected. (K) During detention, the Prosecutor and the suspect or his counsel may submit to the Trial Chamber of which the Judge who made the order is a member, all applications relative to the propriety of provisional detention or to the suspect's release. (L) Without prejudice to Sub-rules (C) to (H), the Rules relating to the detention on remand of (…) accused persons shall apply [mutatis mutandis] to the provisional detention of persons under this Rule."

[813] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 7.

[814] See ibid. See also ibid., para. 9: "The President of Cameroon issued a Presidential Decree on 21 October 1997, authorising the transfer of the Appellant to the Tribunal's detention unit. On 22 October 1997, the Prosecutor submitted the indictment for confirmation, and on 23 October 1997, Judge Aspegren confirmed the indictment, and issued a Warrant of Arrest and Order for Surrender addressed to the Government of Cameroon [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

Another remarkable point is that Barayagwiza filed a writ of habeas corpus on 29 September 1997 to challenge the legality of his detention but his application was never considered.[815]

In addition, it also took quite some time before Barayagwiza appeared in the courtroom for the first time: his initial appearance was on 23 February 1998,[816] more than three months after he was transferred to the ICTR and more than 22 months after his arrest in Cameroon.

The following day, Barayagwiza filed his 'Extremely Urgent Motion by the Defence for Orders to Review and/or Nullify the Arrest and Provisional Detention of the Suspect' in which he submitted, among other things, that a number of his rights had been violated[817] and that as a result, he requested the Trial Chamber to declare: "1. The arrest and provisional detention unlawful, null and void. 2. The entire proceedings are a nullity. 3. The accused be set free. 4. In the alternative, that the accused be released on bail pending further hearing."[818]

This motion was dismissed by Trial Chamber II on 17 November 1998. In doing so, it held, among other things, that "the accused was arrested at the behest of the Rwandan and Belgian governments",[819] that "the Defence failed to show that the accused was kept in custody because of the Prosecutor (...) before 21 February 1997",[820] that "detention under rule 40 for a period between 21 February 1997 and 3 March 1997 (...) does not violate the rights of the accused under rule 40"[821] and that neither did the long period between 3 March 1997 and 19 November 1997 violate Rule 40 bis of the ICTR RPE because

> [t]he maximum time periods for provisional detention provided for under rule 40 (bis) take effect from the day after the accused is transferred. At the end of the maximum time periods provided for under rule 40 (bis), if the indictment has not been confirmed and an arrest warrant signed, the suspect shall be released or delivered to the authorities of the State to which the request was initially made. In the instant case the indictment of the accused was confirmed before the accused was even transferred [emphasis in original, ChP].[822]

---

[815] See ibid., para. 8.
[816] See ibid., para. 9.
[817] See ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza, 'Decision on the Extremely Urgent Motion by the Defence for Orders to Review and/or Nullify the Arrest and Provisional Detention of the Suspect', Case No. ICTR-97-19-I, 17 November 1999, p. 2: "In the Motion, the Defence submit[s]; 1. That the accused rights, liberties and freedoms under article 20 of the Statute have been violated because: the provisional detention was a miscarriage of justice under rule 5 (Non-co[m]pli[a]nce with Rules); the Prosecutor's request for provisional detention was unprocedural and unwarranted; Rule 40*(bis)* (Transfer and Provisional Detention of Suspects) was not satisfied regarding the provisional detention; and there was no justification for the arrest or provisional detention. 2. Rule 40*(bis)* breaches the provisions of article 17, 18 and 19 of the Statute. 3. The provisional charges were illegal."
[818] Ibid., p. 2.
[819] Ibid., p. 4.
[820] Ibid.
[821] Ibid.
[822] Ibid., p. 5.

The fact that Cameroon had waited so long after 3 March 1997 for the transfer of Barayagwiza could not lead to a violation of the RPE by the Prosecution.[823]

Barayagwiza appealed this decision and on 3 November 1999, the Appeals Chamber issued its controversial decision which will now be considered in greater detail.

The Appeals Chamber examined two main issues, namely 1) whether the rights of Barayagwiza were violated and 2) the abuse of process doctrine.

With respect to the first main issue, it looked at the right to be promptly charged under Rule 40 bis of the ICTR RPE and the period of time between the transfer of Barayagwiza and his initial appearance.

Focusing on the first element, the Appeals Chamber found that there were "two relevant periods of time under which Cameroon was clearly holding the Appellant at the behest of the Tribunal".[824]

The first ran from 17 April 1996 to 16 May 1996[825] and the second ran from 4 March 1997 to 19 November 1997.[826] With respect to the second period of time[827] (when Barayagwiza was only held at the behest of the Tribunal – it is to be recalled that from 17 April 1996 – 16 May 1996, Barayagwiza was also detained because of the inter-State extradition procedures), the judges clarified that "Cameroon was holding the Appellant in constructive custody for the Tribunal by virtue of the Tribunal's lawful process or authority".[828] This means that the ICTR was detaining Barayagwiza pursuant to lawful authority but in the absence of physical control.[829] The judges also clarified: "This finding does not mean, however, that the Tribunal was responsible for each and every aspect of the Appellant's detention, but only for the decision to place and maintain the Appellant in custody."[830]

That may, of course, be the Appeals Chamber's opinion (see, however, infra), but it is submitted that the Tribunal, even if it is not, strictly speaking, responsible for certain wrongs, should take responsibility for them. If actors involved in the arrest/detention of suspects (such as national States and international forces) arrest and detain a suspect for and at the behest of the Tribunal, the Tribunal should bear

[823] See ibid.
[824] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 43.
[825] On 17 April 1996, two days after Barayagwiza's initial arrest on the basis of the Rwandan and Belgian extradition requests, the Prosecutor made his first Rule 40 request for provisional detention and on 16 May 1996, he indicated that he was no longer interested in pursuing the case, see ibid.
[826] 4 March 1997 is the day when the Rule 40 bis Order was filed and 19 November 1997 the day when Barayagwiza was transferred to the ICTR, see ibid., para. 44.
[827] See also ibid., para. 100.
[828] Ibid., para. 61.
[829] See ibid., para. 58. One wonders why the ICTR does not conclude then that Barayagwiza was also in the constructive custody of the ICTR between 17 April 1996 and 16 May 1996. After all, also in that period, it could be argued that the ICTR was detaining Barayagwiza pursuant to lawful authority (namely pursuant to the request based on Rule 40 of the ICTR RPE) but in the absence of physical control. The fact that Barayagwiza by that time was also held in custody by Cameroon because of the inter-State extradition procedures does not seem to change this. It is submitted that to detain a person at the behest of the ICTR/to have a suspect in the constructive custody of the ICTR is the same.
[830] Ibid., para. 61.

the ultimate responsibility for every aspect of this process. As explained, although the Tribunal may not, strictly speaking, be responsible for certain violations (for example, if the suspect is mistreated by a State official while the former is in pre-transfer detention pursuant to a request from the Tribunal), one could argue that this entire constructive custody period falls under the more general responsibility of the Tribunal.[831] Hence, even if certain violations occurring in this context cannot, strictly speaking, be attributed to the Tribunal, one can argue that the entire constructive custody period/detention at the request/behest of the Tribunal is attributable to the Tribunal in a more general sense. In fact, one can even make a more general submission, see also the final words from the discussion of the Karadžić case, namely that simple fairness – among other things, this point will be returned to – towards the suspect demands that every wrong/irregularity/violation[832] committed in the context of the Tribunal's case more generally (whether this occurred in the constructive custody period or not) should be remedied by the Tribunal, even if that Tribunal was – strictly speaking – not responsible for it.[833]

It is, of course, difficult to define the exact meaning of "wrongs/irregularities/violations committed in the context of a Tribunal case" but one clear example which should definitely fit this definition – besides the obvious example of organs of the Tribunal having committed the violations themselves – are irregularities in the arrest and detention executed by States/international forces if the Tribunal has requested that the suspect be arrested and detained by these parties, see supra. Other situations may very well also fit the "in the context of" criterion, but these should be considered on a case-by-case basis.[834] For example, in the ICTY

[831] Cf. also DeFrancia 2001, p. 1438: "Protections of the international system should, as far as possible, apply at the moment of the suspect or accused is in the constructive custody of the international court."

[832] Again taking into account that certain errors are so small and insignificant that they cannot be seen as actual wrongs/irregularities/violations in need of a remedy. Cf. the Brima case and the question when one can speak of an unlawful arrest/detention, see n. 603 of Chapter III and ns. 205 and 242 of the present chapter.

[833] Cf. also Sluiter 2003 B, p. 942: "[T]he trial forum must take account of every human rights violation that occurs in the framework of the criminal proceedings. This view finds its ultimate basis in simple fairness and in the nature of the relationship between the accused and the trial forum."

[834] See also Judge Lal Chand Vohrah's declaration to the still-to-discuss 2000 decision in Semanza (see also n. 985) where he stated: "If an accused is arrested or detained by a state at the request or under the authority of the Tribunal, even though the accused is not yet within the actual custody of the Tribunal, the Tribunal has a responsibility to provide whatever relief is available to it to attempt to reduce any violations as much as possible, and this remedy must be proportional to the violations. (…) I would also like to note my apprehension of certain language employed in the present Decision, which states that the "Appeals Chamber emphasises that, in any case, the Tribunal is not responsible for the period of time which elapsed before the Appellant was transferred to the Detention Facility of the Tribunal." [It must be noted that this is not an entirely accurate reproduction of the Appeals Chamber's words. The original Appeals Chamber's words go as follows: "[T]he Appeals Chamber emphasizes that in any event, the Tribunal is not responsible for the time that elapsed before the Appellant was transferred to the Tribunal's Detention Facility.", ChP.] (…) I do not take it to imply nor should it be interpreted as implying, that the Tribunal has no responsibility to an accused before he is transferred to the Detention Facility of the Tribunal when the accused has been arrested or detained at the behest of the Tribunal. This accords with the position taken in the Barayagwiza Review Decision, that the cumulative effects of all violations – even those occurring prior to transfer into Tribunal custody – are to be considered in Nikolić case, the Trial Chamber held that the ICTY would find it very hard to continue the case if a person was seriously mistreated before being handed over to the Tribunal (irrespective of who was responsible for this mistreatment).[835] It was argued in the context of that case that if the Tribunal takes the ultimate responsibility (namely by refusing jurisdiction) for serious male captus cases, it should also definitely have the authority to take responsibility for less serious irregularities committed against a person before that person is handed over to the Tribunal, irrespective of which entity committed those irregularities. Although "before (…) handed over" may encompass huge time periods, the ICTY does not, of course, have to take responsibility for irregularities committed against the person which occurred 50 years ago and which cannot be connected in any way to the proceedings of the ICTY. Thus, one could assert that the ICTY is referring here to irregularities which are in some way related to the way a person was brought into its jurisdiction. Hence, alongside the more specific 'at the request/behest' situations (involving States and international forces), one may also look at this more generally formulated and thus broader situation, namely that the Tribunal will take responsibility for irregularities in some way related to the way a person was brought into its jurisdiction, irrespective of the question as to which entity (States/international forces/private individuals) committed these irregularities.[836] In addition to these two situations, there may be other situations which could fall within the notion of "committed in the context of a Tribunal case", but that would have to be determined on the basis of the exact circumstances.

Returning to the judges' clarification that "[t]his finding does not mean (…) that the Tribunal was responsible for each and every aspect of the Appellant's detention, fashioning an appropriate remedy [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, Declaration by Judge Lal Chand Vohrah, paras. 6-7.) Judge Lal Chand Vohrah further notes that "[r]esponsibility and authority to redress violations occurring at a time when the accused was not detained under Tribunal request or authority would need to be considered on a case by case basis." (Ibid., para. 7, n. 7.)

---

[835] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 114: "[I]n a situation where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subjected to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment to the exercise of jurisdiction over such an accused. This would certainly be the case where persons acting for SFOR or the Prosecution were involved in such very serious mistreatment. But even without such involvement this Chamber finds it extremely difficult to justify the exercise of jurisdiction over a person if that person was brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal after having been seriously mistreated."

[836] See ibid., para. 111: "Ensuring that the Accused's rights are respected and that he receives a fair trial forms, in actual fact, an important aspect of the general concept of due process of law. In that context, this Chamber concurs with the view expressed in several national judicial decisions, according to which the issue of respect for due process of law encompasses more than merely the duty to ensure a fair trial for the Accused. Due process of law also includes questions such as how the Parties have been conducting themselves in the context of a particular case and how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal [emphasis added, ChP]." Mohan 2009, p. 22 notes here: "Although the Chamber's decision was far from perfect, it acknowledged that violations of Nikolic's rights at the pre-trial stage could undermine the fairness of the proceedings and must be redressed as a matter of fairness [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

but only for the decision to place and maintain the Appellant in custody", one could argue that the ICTR is actually in favour of taking a broader responsibility when it later concluded "that the length of time that the Appellant was detained in Cameroon at the behest of the Tribunal without being indicted violates Rule 40*bis* and established human rights jurisprudence governing detention of suspects".[837] Hence, the Tribunal is concerned that the suspect's pre-transfer detention is not in conformity with human rights case law concerning the detention of suspects. That may mean that the Tribunal is in fact interested in (and may take responsibility for) more elements of the pre-transfer period than just "the decision to place and maintain the Appellant in custody", even if the Tribunal itself is, strictly speaking, not responsible for them. As was previously clarified in discussed cases in this book, in the remainder of this decision, it appeared that the Appeals Chamber more clearly confirmed this stance.

Turning to the second element, the period of time between the transfer of Barayagwiza and his initial appearance: could the 96-day period (between 19 November 1997 and 23 February 1998) be seen as violating the requirement that the initial appearance is to be held "without delay"?[838] The Appeals Chamber held that it could.[839]

With respect to the second main issue, the abuse of process doctrine, the Appeals Chamber explained that this doctrine would be used to look at Barayagwiza's allegations regarding the following three issues:

> 1) the right to be promptly informed of the charges during the first period of detention; 2) the alleged failure of the Trial Chamber to resolve the writ of habeas corpus filed by the Appellant; and 3) the Appellant's assertions that the Prosecutor did not diligently prosecute her case against him.[840]

However, before turning to these three issues, the Appeals Chamber first described some general features of the abuse of process doctrine.

---

[837] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 67. It may be interesting to note that the Appeals Chamber was of the opinion that the suspect's right to be promptly charged (see Rule 40 bis of the ICTR RPE) becomes effective when an order based on this rule has been filed. See ibid. However, it must be noted that Rule 40 bis (C) states that "[t]he provisional detention of the suspect may be ordered for a period not exceeding 30 days from the day after the transfer of the suspect to the detention unit of the Tribunal [emphasis added, ChP]." In that respect, one can wonder whether Rule 40 bis was in fact violated. The Appeals Chamber, however, remarked on this point: "[T]he purpose of Rule 40 and Rule 40*bis* is to limit the time that a suspect may be provisionally detained without the issuance of an indictment. This comports with international human rights standards." (Ibid., para. 53.) (See also n. 982 and accompanying text.)

[838] See ibid., para. 69.

[839] See ibid., para. 71: "Based on the plain meaning of the phrase, 'without delay', the Appeals Chamber finds that a 96-day delay between the transfer of the Appellant to the Tribunal's detention unit and his initial appearance to be a violation of his fundamental rights as expressed by Articles 19 and 20, internationally-recognised human rights standards and Rule 62."

[840] Ibid., para. 73.

Here, it repeated the above-mentioned point identified in other cases that in the context of the abuse of process doctrine, the Tribunal should be concerned by and take responsibility for pre-transfer wrongs, irrespective of who was responsible for them:

> [T]his analysis focuses on the alleged violations of the Appellant's rights and is not primarily concerned with the entity responsible for the alleged violation(s). As will be discussed, it is clear that there are overlapping areas of responsibility between the three organs of the Tribunal and as a result, it is conceivable that more than one organ could be responsible for the violations of the Appellant's rights. However, even if fault is shared between the three organs of the Tribunal – or is the result of the actions of a third party, such as Cameroon – it would undermine the integrity of the judicial process to proceed. Furthermore, it would be unfair for the Appellant to stand trial on these charges if his rights were egregiously violated. Thus, under the abuse of process doctrine, it is irrelevant which entity or entities were responsible for the alleged violations of the Appellant's rights.[841]

As was stated earlier, one can wonder whether the national abuse of process doctrine in fact deems the perpetrator of the violation irrelevant; although it is true that there are some cases in which rather general statements were made, statements which could be seen as supporting the ICTR's explanation,[842] it was concluded in the previous chapter of this book that it appears that the prosecuting forum's own authorities must be involved in the irregularity before one can turn to the abuse of process doctrine.

Nevertheless, even if the national abuse of process doctrine does not support the idea that a court may refuse jurisdiction if a third party were responsible for the violations, it is clear that this study supports this ICTR's version of the abuse of process doctrine: as the Tribunals do not have their own police force, it is appropriate that they not only take advantage of achievements effectuated by the parties on which they depend (national police forces, international troops etc.) but also take responsibility if something goes wrong in the arrest and transfer phase.[843]

---

[841] Ibid.

[842] See the following words of Lord Lowry in Bennett (see n. 610 and accompanying text of Chapter III and ns. 300 and 310 and accompanying text of Chapter V): "[A] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case." See also the following words of Lord Steyn in Latif (see n. 346 and accompanying text of Chapter V): "[P]roceedings may be stayed in the exercise of the judge's discretion not only where a fair trial is impossible but also where it would be contrary to the public interest in the integrity of the criminal justice system that a trial should take place." Not very surprisingly, these quotations were also referred to by the Appeals Chamber, see ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, paras. 74-75. (See also ns. 730 and 739.)

[843] Cf. also the still-to-discuss 2000 decision in Barayagwiza ("[A]ll violations demand a remedy": ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 74.), Sluiter 2001, p. 156 ("It is imperative that the defendant receives the full protection of human rights instruments and

In that respect, they should also be able to, for example, review the circumstances surrounding the arrests and detentions made by national States and international forces on the ground.[844]

The Appeals Chamber, after having stated that "[u]nder the doctrine of "abuse of process", proceedings that have been lawfully initiated may be terminated after an indictment has been issued if improper or illegal procedures are employed in pursuing an otherwise lawful process",[845] subsequently stressed the discretionary approach of the abuse of process doctrine: "It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity."[846]

After having discussed a number of national abuse of process cases, which were, by the way, not all correctly summarised,[847] and after having mentioned the three should not be the victim of the fragmentation of the criminal procedure over two or even more jurisdictions. In other cases, Trial Chambers have acknowledged their responsibility in this respect and have not refrained from providing drastic remedies in cases where the rights of the defendant were violated in the pre-trial phase, even if the Tribunal itself had no part in it [original footnote omitted, ChP].") and Swart 2002 A, p. 1250: "Where it is a case involving the ad hoc Tribunals, rather than a case of extradition between two States, the responsibility for the person's arrest/or detention lies mainly with the Tribunals, and it is therefore principally to the Tribunals that a suspect or accused must turn for the protection of his basic individual rights when deprived of his liberty for the purpose of surrender."

---

[844] This view, see also ns. 138 and 208 and accompanying text, is not in conformity with the (Trial Chamber) cases of Djukić and Krsmanović, Karemera, Ngirumpatse, Kajelijeli, Nshamihigo, Nzirorera and Nyiramasuhuko (where the Tribunal argued that it was not competent to review the legality of the arrests and detentions made at the national level), but it does appear to be in conformity with the (arguably better) view of the Appeals Chamber. This will be further discussed in the next cases.

[845] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74.

[846] Ibid. Note, however, that this test is arguably relative, see n. 618.

[847] For example, the Appeals Chamber stated that "[i]n R. v. Hartley, the Wellington Court of Appeal relied on the abuse of process doctrine in quashing a conviction that rested on an unlawful arrest and the illegally obtained confession that followed [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 75.) As already explained in n. 133 (and accompanying text) of the previous chapter (and see the remainder of this footnote), this is incorrect. Schabas, in his commentary to the Barayagwiza case, doubts the precedential value of the abuse of process cases invoked by the Appeals Chamber, hereby indicating that the seriousness of Barayagwiza's alleged charges should play a role: "For example, as "one of the leading cases," the judgment cites one [this is the Bennett case, ChP] in which a stay for abuse of process was allowed "because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case." What the appeals chamber does not mention is that the crime in question was fraudulent purchase of a helicopter, and that the accused had been handcuffed to an airplane seat by South African policemen in lieu of the normal extradition process. A second case, cited by the appeals chamber to support a stay for failure to inform an accused of the charges, involved driving while intoxicated. A third case concerned firearms charges but no killing. Only the fourth case dealt with homocide [this is the Hartley case, ChP], but contrary to what the appeals chamber contends, a conviction was not quashed based on abuse of process. Although the Court of Appeal of Wellington was harsh in its criticism of an illegal rendition, the court explicitly refrained from ordering a stay for abuse of process, and overturned the conviction because of an illegally obtained confession. The court noted that without the confession, there was no evidence – an uncontroversial proposition but hardly a precedent to support releasing an accused génocidaire.

important functions of the use of supervisory powers (a notion "[c]losely related to the abuse of process doctrine"),[848] namely "to provide a remedy for the violation of the accused's rights; to deter future misconduct; and to enhance the integrity of the judicial process [original footnote omitted, ChP]",[849] the Appeals Chamber looked at the above-mentioned three elements[850] to find out "whether it would offend the Tribunal's sense of justice to proceed to the trial of the accused".[851] This question was based on the following, and already briefly mentioned,[852] abuse of process test:

> [T]he abuse of process doctrine may be relied on in two distinct situations: (1) where delay has made a fair trial for the accused impossible; and (2) where in the circumstances of a particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice, due to the pre-trial impropriety or misconduct.[853]

With respect to the first of the three elements, the right to be promptly informed of the charges during the first period of detention, the Appeals Chamber noted that this right was indeed violated[854] and repeated its point made earlier that it would take responsibility for the violations suffered by the suspect, even if the Tribunal, to a great extent, is, strictly speaking, not responsible for them:

> In the present case, the Appellant was detained for a total of 11 months before he was informed of the general nature of the charges that the Prosecutor was pursuing against him. While we acknowledge that only 35 days out of the 11-month total are clearly attributable to the Tribunal (the periods from 17 April – 16 May 1996 and 4 – 10 March 1997),[[855]] the fact remains that the Appellant spent an inordinate amount of time in provisional detention without knowledge of the general nature of the charges

---

Presumably, if the appeals chamber had found any case whatsoever where the facts were even remotely similar to those before it – that is, where multiple murder charges had been stayed because of a delay of less than two years – it would have cited the case in its judgment [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Schabas 2000, p. 567.)

[848] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 76.

[849] Ibid. Cf. also n. 471 and accompanying text.

[850] See n. 840 and accompanying text.

[851] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 77.

[852] See ns. 729 and 738 and accompanying text.

[853] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 77.

[854] See ibid., para. 78: "In the present case, the Appellant makes several assertions regarding the precise date he was informed of the charges. However, using the earliest date, we conclude that the Appellant was informed of the charges on 10 March 1997 when the Cameroon Deputy Prosecutor showed him a copy of the Rule 40*bis* Order. This was approximately 11 months after he was initially detained pursuant to the first Rule 40 request [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[855] See also n. 829 where it was wondered why the ICTR does not conclude that Barayagwiza was also in the constructive custody of the ICTR between 17 April 1996 and 16 May 1996. After all, also in that period, it could be argued that the ICTR was detaining Barayagwiza pursuant to lawful authority (namely pursuant to the request based on Rule 40 of the ICTR RPE) but in the absence of physical control.

> against him. At this juncture, it is irrelevant that only a small portion of that total period of provisional detention is attributable to the Tribunal, since it is the Tribunal – and not any other entity – that is currently adjudicating the Appellant's claims. Regardless of which other parties may be responsible, the inescapable conclusion is that the Appellant's right to be promptly informed of the charges against him was violated.[856]

The ICTR takes responsibility here for irregularities (irrespective of which entity committed them) which occurred even beyond the constructive custody/the detention at the behest of the Tribunal.[857] Schabas has criticised this stance because it would be "tantamount to holding the prosecutor responsible for things over which she had no control".[858] Schabas may have a point here, for this violation was also taken into account when the judges formulated their final remedy, which was, as will be shown at the end of this case, with prejudice to the Prosecutor. However, it is arguably a good thing that the judges take the ultimate responsibility for violations committed in the context of their case, irrespective of whether the Prosecutor or another entity was responsible for these violations. Hence, that may also include violations committed by entities over which the organs of the Tribunal have no control. One could think here, for example, of private individuals involved in the kidnapping of a suspect. The only important requirement is arguably that these wrongs can in some way be connected to the context of the Tribunal case (at least, if one does not want that the Tribunal takes responsibility for wrongs which have absolutely nothing to do with the Tribunal case).[859] Two examples have already

---

[856] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 85.

[857] See also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 100: "[E]ven if he was not in the constructive custody of the Tribunal, the period of provisional detention was impermissibly lengthy." However, one cannot agree with the ICTR's conclusion a few paragraphs later that "[i]n the present case, the Appellant has been in provisional detention since 15 April 1996 – more than three years. During that time, he spent 11 months in illegal provisional detention at the behest of the Tribunal without the benefits, rights and protections afforded by being formally charged [emphasis added, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 104.) After all, only a few days of the 11 months between 15 April 1996 and 10 March 1997 were at the behest of the ICTR (between 17 April and 16 May 1996 and between 4 March and 10 March 1997). (According to the ICTR, Barayagwiza was only in the constructive custody of the ICTR between 4 March and 10 March 1997, but it was argued before (see ns. 829 and 855) that one could add to this constructive custody period the other 'at the behest of the ICTR' period (between 17 April and 16 May 1996). As explained in n. 829 (and 855), these concepts are arguably the same. Why the ICTR only qualifies the second (between 4 March and 19 November 1997) and not the first 'at the behest of' period (between 17 April and 16 May 1996) as 'constructive custody' of the ICTR is unclear.)

[858] Schabas 2000, p. 569. See also ibid., pp. 568-569.

[859] In that respect, one cannot agree more with Zahar and Sluiter (2008, pp. 285-286, see also n. 799 and accompanying text) when they state: "When other entities bear primary responsibility for violations of human rights, what matters is the duty of every tribunal bench to protect the fairness and integrity of the trial by determining an appropriate remedy. Obviously, the trial does not start at the seat of the tribunal but extends to every act connected with it. While this may be a heavy and seemingly unfair burden on the tribunals – they interact with a wide variety of actors, not all of whom may apply the highest standards of justice, and the tribunals are not in a position to change this – the reverse is even more unfair. The decision of the ICTR Trial Chamber [here, Zahar and Sluiter refer to the decisions of

been mentioned in that respect: irregularities committed while the suspect was in the constructive custody of the Tribunal and irregularities in some way connected to the way a person was brought into the jurisdiction of the court. However, there may be other situations falling under the notion "committed in the context of a Tribunal case" but they would have to be determined on the basis of the exact circumstances of the case. In this case, the judges stated that they would take into account the entire 11-month period of detention, even if only a small portion of that period was at the behest of the Tribunal, "since it is the Tribunal – and not any other entity – that is currently adjudicating the Appellant's claims". However, the fact that the Tribunal is now adjudicating the case does not mean that the Tribunal also has to take responsibility for every violation ever suffered by the suspect. As already explained, the minimum requirement must obviously be that the violation was committed in the context of the Tribunal case. Otherwise, the Tribunal would also have to remedy human rights violations suffered by the suspect 50 years ago which have nothing to do with the Tribunal, for the only reason that the Tribunal is now trying that suspect. That, of course, would be a ridiculous situation. However, the Tribunal is probably saying that it needs to take responsibility for violations committed in the context of the Tribunal case, irrespective of the question of who committed these violations, because it is the Tribunal that is now trying this case. That is to be welcomed. Although the judges do not explain very clearly how they view these violations as falling within the context of the ICTR case, an explanation may be that these violations occurred after the Prosecution started the case against Barayagwiza and in a period during which the Prosecution, even if Barayagwiza was not detained at the ICTR's behest, was nevertheless (perceived to be)[860] involved in the case.[861]

With respect to the second element, the alleged failure of the Trial Chamber to resolve the writ of habeas corpus filed by Barayagwiza, the Appeals Chamber stated that Barayagwiza was indeed "never afforded an opportunity to be heard on the writ of habeas corpus".[862] This notwithstanding the importance of the possibility for a detained person to "have recourse to an independent judicial officer for review of Nyiramasuhuko, Ngirumpatse, Kajelijeli, Karemera and Nzirorera (see also ns. 138, 208-209 and 844 and accompanying text), ChP] not to review national activities is simply untenable from the perspective of the duty to ensure a fair trial [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

---

[860] See, for example, Schabas 2000, p. 564: "On May 31, 1996, the Yaounde Court of Appeal suspended the Rwandan extradition hearing, apparently at the request of Cameroon deputy director of public prosecutions, and proceedings did not resume for many months. The Cameroon authorities claimed they were acting pursuant to Article 8(2) of the Statute, which asserts the primacy of the ICTR and requires states to relinquish jurisdiction in its favor. Cameroon's having made such a claim, would, moreover, explain why, while awaiting the Yaounde Court of Appeal decision, Barayagwiza wrote to the ICTR complaining about his detention."

[861] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 86: "The numerous letters attached to one of the Appellant's submissions point to the fact that the Appellant was in continuous communication with all three organs of the Tribunal in an attempt to assert his rights."

[862] Ibid., para. 87.

the detaining authority's acts".[863] The judges concluded that even though their decision (of 3 November 1999) rendered the writ of Barayagwiza moot, > the failure to provide the Appellant a hearing on this writ violated his right to challenge the legality of his continued detention in Cameroon during the two periods

[863] Ibid., para. 88. The Appeals Chamber clarified that the fact that a detained person must have this possibility, even if "neither the Statute nor the Rules specifically address writs of habeas corpus as such" (ibid.), "is well-established by the Statute and Rules. Moreover, this is a fundamental right and is enshrined in international human rights norms, including Article 8 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Article 9(4) of the ICCPR, Article 5(4) of the ECHR and Article 7(6) of the ACHR [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.) See for other examples from the context of the UN ad hoc Tribunals also n. 407 and accompanying text of this chapter (the Milosević case), ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v Radoslav Brđanin, 'Decision on Petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus On Behalf of Radoslav Brđanin', Case No. IT-99-36-PT, 8 December 1999, paras. 2-6, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Joseph Kanyabashi, 'Decision on the Defence Extremely Urgent Motion on Habeas Corpus and for Stoppage of Proceedings', Case No. ICTR-96-15-I, 23 May 2000, paras. 27-28, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, paras. 112-113, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Samuel Musabyimana, 'Decision on Musabyimana's Motion on the Violation of Rule 55 and International Law at the Time of his Arrest and Transfer', Case No. ICTR-2001-62-T, 20 June 2002, para. 24 and ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Notice of Appeal', Case No. IT-94-2-AR72, 9 January 2003, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, para. 11. See also n. 45 and, generally, n. 880. Note that in the Kanyabashi case, the judges, after having referred to the rather broad scope of some national habeas corpus concepts (they provide, for instance, the example of the US writ of habeas corpus ad subiiciendum (see also n. 42 of Chapter II) which "extends to all constitutional challenges" (ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Joseph Kanyabashi, 'Decision on the Defence Extremely Urgent Motion on Habeas Corpus and for Stoppage of Proceedings', Case No. ICTR-96-15-I, 23 May 2000, para. 24)), stipulate that "[t]he Chamber restates that the Tribunal is not bound by any national law. It finds the notion of habeas corpus at the international level is limited to a review of the legality of detention. The Accused's Motion, apart from the submission of violation of the right to protection from unlawful detention, is beyond that scope and, therefore, is not proper." (Ibid., para. 28.) Although the judges do not mention this point very clearly, it can be argued that the concept of the right to protection from unlawful detention used by the judges must, of course, also encompasses the consequence of release if the detention (and arguably also the arrest) is to be considered unlawful, in conformity with what appears to be the scope of the habeas corpus concept at the international level, see, for example, Art. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR, Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR and Art. 7, para. 6 of the ACHR. (See also Chapter III of this book.) Even though it has been argued earlier that this remedy is not without its problems and that it would be better if judges confronted by a male captus of a considerable but not serious nature would continue the case instead and accord other, real remedies, such a construction can, of course, only be suggested if one assumes in the first place that judges in principle have the obligation to release the suspect in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention. If the judges do not even recognise that, then there would be no need to devise a construction on how to cope with irregularities which can be linked with one's deprivation of liberty. (However, that cannot be seriously maintained by judges for it could mean that a suspect would not even be released in the case of the most extreme unlawful arrest/detention, a situation which, of course, has nothing to do with protection from unlawful detention.) Finally, it must also be stated that the ICTR was willing to look at the other objections of Kanyabashi, even though they were, according to the judges, beyond the scope of the habeas corpus concept (violation of right to protection from unlawful detention). One of those objections was the violation of the right to be promptly informed of the reasons for his arrest/detention/charges. However, one can argue that this right is in fact part of this concept. Cf., for example, Swart when he notes that "a failure to promptly inform the person of the reasons for his arrest and of any charges against him makes his detention illegal." (Swart 2001, p. 204, see also n. 607 and accompanying text of Chapter III and n. 247 of the present chapter.)

> when he was held at the behest of the Tribunal and the belated issuance of the indictment did not nullify that violation.[864]

Regarding the third and final element, Barayagwiza's assertions that the Prosecutor did not diligently prosecute her case against him, the judges first stated that "once the Prosecutor has set this process [namely the process of bringing a defendant to trial, ChP] in motion, she is under a duty to ensure that, within the scope of her authority, the case proceeds to trial in a way that respects the rights of the accused".[865]

The judges then explained that Barayagwiza had "claimed that the Prosecutor simply forgot about his case".[866] Although such a claim is, of course, very difficult to prove, the judges noted "that after the Appellant raised this claim, the Prosecutor failed to rebut it in any form, relying solely on the argument that it was Cameroon's failure to transfer the Appellant that resulted in this delay".[867]

However, that argument was not credible to the judges, who stated, among other things, that "[t]he Prosecutor provided no evidence that she contacted the authorities in Cameroon in an attempt to get them to comply with the Rule 40*bis* Order [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[868] Hence, "the only logical conclusion to be drawn (…) is that the Prosecutor failed in her duty to diligently prosecute this case".[869]

After having repeated the conclusions related to the two main issues of this case,[870] the Appeals Chamber turned to the final point to be looked at here: the appropriate remedy for these pre-trial irregularities.

The judges, hereby also referring to the seriousness of Barayagwiza's charges, concluded:

> The crimes for which the Appellant is charged are very serious. However, in this case the fundamental rights of the Appellant were repeatedly violated. What may be worse, it appears that the Prosecutor's failure to prosecute this case was tantamount to negligence. We find this conduct to be egregious and, in light of the numerous violations, conclude that the only remedy available for such prosecutorial inaction

---

[864] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 90.
[865] Ibid., para. 92.
[866] Ibid., para. 98.
[867] Ibid.
[868] Ibid.
[869] Ibid., para. 99.
[870] See ibid., paras. 100-101. See for a brief summary also ibid., para. 104: "In the present case, the Appellant has been in provisional detention since 15 April 1996 – more than three years. During that time, he spent 11 months in illegal provisional detention at the behest of the Tribunal without the benefits, rights and protections afforded by being formally charged. [See for criticism on this point n. 857, ChP.] He submitted a writ of habeas corpus seeking to be released from this confinement – and was never afforded an opportunity to be heard on this writ. Even after he was formally charged, he spent an additional 3 months awaiting his initial appearance, and several more months before he could be heard on this motion to have his arrest and detention nullified."

> and the resultant denial of his rights is to release the Appellant and dismiss the charges against him.[871]

Indeed, the judges clarified that Barayagwiza's release and dismissal had to be with prejudice to the Prosecutor, meaning that the Prosecutor was barred from starting a new prosecution against Barayagwiza in the future.[872] This is a clear male detentus verdict: because of the serious male captus involved, the court has no jurisdiction to try the person and the Prosecutor cannot start the trial anew when the person is released from custody.[873]

The judges were aware of the fact that this remedy, which was "consistent with the jurisprudence of many national systems [original footnote omitted, ChP]",[874] was extreme, but they felt that it was also necessary:

> As troubling as this disposition may be to some, the Appeals Chamber believes that to proceed with the Appellant's trial when such violations have been committed, would cause irreparable damage to the integrity of the judicial process. Moreover, we find

[871] Ibid., para. 106. See for the element 'seriousness of the charges' also Judge Shahabuddeen's 'Separate Opinion' to the decision of 3 November 1999, under '1. Post-transfer delay': "Matters to be taken into account in evaluating whether that consequence [namely lack of jurisdiction, ChP] follows from a breach of the requirement of promptitude include the seriousness of the offences with which the accused is charged. Here the offences were serious. But the requirement of promptitude was fundamental, and its breach was also grave, the delay extending to a little over three months. On balance, I respectfully agree with the Appeals Chamber that the administration of justice by the Tribunal would suffer from proceeding with the case notwithstanding the delay."

[872] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 108. See also n. 611 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[873] This also implies that there is a difference between a dismissal of the indictment/the charges as such and a dismissal of the indictment/the charges with prejudice to the Prosecutor in that the first remedy would not exclude a new trial. See also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 109: "The failure to hear the writ of habeas corpus, the delay in hearing the Extremely Urgent Motion, the prolonged detention of the Appellant without an indictment and the cumulative effect of these violations leave us with no acceptable option but to order the dismissal of the charges with prejudice and the Appellant's immediate release from custody. We fear that if we were to dismiss the charges without prejudice, the Appellant would be subject to immediate re-arrest and his ordeal would begin anew [original footnote omitted, ChP]." However, one can imagine that if a judge, because of the serious male captus involved, were to determine that the person's indictment must be dismissed, that that should mean the real ending of the case. After all, it would be very strange if the Prosecutor could restart the trial after a judge has determined that the pre-trial irregularities are so serious that the charges must be dismissed. Note finally that the 1999 Barayagwiza decision can also be seen as a rupture with the Kabiligi decision (see n. 801) where the appeal of the suspect (who also claimed to have been the victim of serious violations, namely torture) was dismissed "on the basis that the Notice of Appeal did not go to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal". (Lamb 2000, p. 242, n. 279.) See also ibid.: "This decision (...) sits uncomfortably with the recent Appeals Chamber ruling in Barayagwiza (...) where, on the basis of numerous irregularities pertaining to the accused's detention (some of which were attributable to the Office of the Prosecutor), the Appeals Chamber did resort to the exceptional remedy of dismissing the indictment against the accused and directing his immediate release."

[874] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 108. The judges referred here to a subsection of the decision in which, among other things, the cases of Bennett and Latif were discussed.

> that it is the only effective remedy for the cumulative breaches of the accused's rights.[875] Finally, this disposition may very well deter the commission of such serious violations in the future.[876]

Although one can seriously wonder whether the violations suffered by Barayagwiza were indeed so serious that they must lead to the ending of the case (one could perhaps also opt for other, less far-reaching remedies such as a reduction of the sentence and/or compensation),[877] an international criminal tribunal should, of course, have the power to release a person and dismiss the charges against him with prejudice to the Prosecutor.

Such a male detentus remedy may constitute the only appropriate answer to serious irregularities in the pre-trial phase.

The basis for this discretionary remedy lies in what is called the abuse of process doctrine in common law countries, namely the – arguably – inherent power of any judge (whether stemming from a common, civil or other legal background)[878] to

---

[875] See also ibid., para. 109: "We reiterate that what makes this case so egregious is the combination of delays that seemed to occur at virtually every stage of the Appellant's case."

[876] Ibid., para. 108. Cf. also n. 849 and accompanying text.

[877] Cf. also Swart 2001, p. 206: "I have attempted to explain that not all criticisms of the Appeals Chamber are justified. In my opinion, there was no violation of "the Appellant's right to be promptly charged pursuant to international standard as reflected in Rule 40 bis". Neither the ICCPR nor the ECHR recognise such a right. They accord the person the right to be promptly informed of the "charges". That, however, is an entirely different matter. (...) On the other hand, it is obvious that the Appellant's right to be promptly informed of the reasons for his arrest and of any 'charges' against him in accordance with international human rights standards had been violated, and more often than the Appeals Chamber assumed. [See, however, Schabas 2003, pp. 264-265, where he writes that Barayagwiza "must have known he was being held for his involvement in the Rwandan genocide from the moment of his arrest, and, most certainly, from the point he first appeared in court in Cameroon to answer the Rwandan and Belgian extradition requests. This was not some Kafkaesque scenario where an ignorant accused lingered in prison wanting to know what he might have done to justify arrest and detention. Where, then, is the violation of the international norm entitling any person "to be informed, at the time of arrest, of the reasons for his arrest" and to be "promptly informed of any charges against him" [original footnote omitted, ChP]?", ChP.] Finally, I strongly disagree with the Appeals Chamber as to how long the Appellant spent in illegal detention in Cameroon at the behest of the Tribunal. In sum, the violations of Appellant's rights, although serious, were considerably less egregious and numerous than the Appeals Chamber believed. (...) Another remedy which is accepted in the case law of international bodies concerning these two Articles [Artt. 9 of the ICCPR and 5 of the ECHR, ChP] has been the reduction of the sentence in the situation of a conviction (...). Finally, the two Articles provide that a person wrongfully arrested or detained shall have an enforceable right to compensation, a right that is of particular importance when a person has been acquitted. Of course, recourse can also be had to a combination of different remedies. My own assessment of the legal situation in the case of the Appellant leads me to believe that a combination of these remedies would have been an appropriate solution." Note finally that the entire decision (including its far-reaching remedies) has also been hailed, although that opinion does not appear to be shared by many people. See DeFrancia 2001, p. 1405: "What should have been recognized as a healthy decision to strengthen the future integrity of the Tribunal was rather considered a "setback in efforts to hold accountable those responsible for the Rwandan genocide in 1994." [original footnote omitted, ChP]"

[878] See, for example, the 1985 Stocké case (see ns. 512-513 and 516-517 and accompanying text of Chapter V) and the decision the German Federal Constitutional Court issued one year later: BVerfG (3. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 3.6 1986 – 2 BvR 837/85. NJW 1986, Heft 48, pp. 3021-3022

stop the proceedings if he is of the opinion, for example, that to continue the trial would seriously damage the integrity of the judicial process.[879]

Before turning to its disposition, the Appeals Chamber stated the following last words, which generally (not focusing on the question as to whether or not Barayagwiza's violations were indeed that serious as to divest jurisdiction) can only be applauded:

> The Tribunal – an institution whose primary purpose is to ensure that justice is done – must not place its imprimatur on such violations. To allow the Appellant to be tried on the charges for which he was belatedly indicted would be a travesty of justice.

(see ns. 522-523 and 526 and accompanying text of Chapter V). Note that also in the Ebrahim case, words resembling the abuse of process doctrine were used: "The individual must be protected against illegal detention and abduction, the bounds of jurisdiction must not be exceeded, sovereignty must be respected, the legal process must be fair to those affected and abuse of law must be avoided in order to protect and promote the integrity of the administration of justice [emphasis added, ChP]." (Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 896.) Cf. also Nsereko 2008, p. 61: "Invoking the abuse of process doctrine, the South African court nullified the proceedings." Note, however, that in that case, the Court did not state that judges had a discretion to consider whether the violations of these values had to lead to a refusal of jurisdiction. It simply stated that these violations entailed that the judges had no jurisdiction to try the case. See finally also Beahan (see n. 713 of Chapter V) and the reasoning of Acting Justice of Appeal O'Linn in the Mushwena case (see n. 781 and accompanying text of Chapter V). Cf. also Schabas 2000, p. 567, writing on the ICTR's use of the abuse of process doctrine: "[T]he Chamber is (...) on firm legal ground in invoking abuse of process. In particular, even though the Statute gives the ICTR no explicit authority to stay proceedings in the case of abuse of process, the remedy is well recognized in national legal systems and can reasonably be deemed to be an inherent power." See also Lamb 2000, p. 237, writing on "the inherent jurisdiction of any judicial body to prevent an abuse of its own process [emphasis added, ChP]". See also ibid., p. 240: "[C]ases in which an otherwise-competent national court has declined to exercise jurisdiction over an accused stress the unacceptable and egregious nature of the violations of the accused's rights which have occurred and the fact that all judicial bodies have an inherent jurisdiction to guard against abuses of their own process [emphasis added, ChP]." Cf. finally the words of Arbour in ns. 23-24 of the very first chapter of this book. Although she writes about quite another issue here (rendition), she connects the abuse of process doctrine with the words "any credible jurisdiction [emphasis added, ChP]": "[The] features of the 'new normal' are characterized by the fact that it would appear that terrorist suspects are being arrested, detained and interrogated with no apparent intention of bringing them to trial. And I say 'with no apparent intention of bringing them to trial' because the circumstances of their arrest, detention and interrogation – take only the length of their detention – would in any credible jurisdiction amount to such an abuse of process that trial jurisdiction, if it ever existed, could never be exercised."

[879] However, it must be noted that the Appeals Chamber, in defending the remedy, also referred to Rule 40 bis (H) of the ICTR RPE which states that "[t]he total period of provisional detention shall in no case exceed 90 days, at the end of which, in the event the indictment has not been confirmed and an arrest warrant signed, the suspect shall be released or, if appropriate, be delivered to the authorities of the State to which the request was initially made." The judges noted that the word "shall" "is imperative and is certainly not intended to permit the Prosecutor to file a new indictment and re-arrest the suspect." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 110.) However, although judges may, of course, be of the opinion that if the Prosecutor has violated this provision to such an extent that the suspect cannot be re-arrested anew, the provision itself, like a habeas corpus provision such as Art. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR, only speaks of a release as such and not of a release with prejudice to the OTP. Arguably, the word "shall" does not change this observation.

> Nothing less than the integrity of the Tribunal is at stake in this case. Loss of public confidence in the Tribunal, as a court valuing human rights of all individuals – including those charged with unthinkable crimes – would be among the most serious consequences of allowing the Appellant to stand trial in the face of such violations of his rights. As difficult as this conclusion may be for some to accept, it is the proper role of an independent judiciary to halt this prosecution, so that no further injustice results.[880]

Then, finally, the Appeals Chamber unanimously dismissed the indictment with prejudice to the Prosecutor and directed the immediate release of Barayagwiza.[881] In addition, it directed – with Judge Shahabuddeen dissenting – "the Registrar to make the necessary arrangements for the delivery of the Appellant to the Authorities of Cameroon".[882]

Perhaps not very surprisingly,[883] all hell broke loose after the decision was issued.

The Government of Rwanda, for example, could not believe that such a 'big fish' as Barayagwiza was apparently going to escape justice and consequently suspended its cooperation with the Tribunal.[884]

Amnesty International also issued a public statement in which it expressed its concerns. Although the organisation regretted "that there have been violations of the procedural rights of fair trial of Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza",[885] it noted that the Appeals Chamber decided to release Barayagwiza "without any assurance that the

---

[880] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 112. That the ICTR stressed the importance of human rights in the pre-trial phase, a context which is not comprehensively regulated by the ICTR RPE, is, of course, to be applauded. See also Swart 2002 A, p. 1251: "Time limits included in the RPE (...) are not concerned with arrest and detention in the requested State but with provisional detention after the person's transfer by that State. It is therefore to be welcomed that, in Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, the Appeals Chamber of the ICTR seized the opportunity to affirm that arrest and detention for the purpose of transfer should conform to established international legal norms, that the person arrested on the territory of a State may turn to the Tribunal for habeas corpus and that the surrender proceedings should be conducted with due diligence on the part of the Prosecutor [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ns. 45 and 863 and accompanying text with respect to the issue of habeas corpus.

[881] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 113.

[882] Ibid. Judge Shahabuddeen was of the opinion that "the proper order was to set the appellant at liberty and to direct the Registrar to provide him with reasonable facilities to leave Tanzania, if he so wishes." (Judge Shahabuddeen's 'Separate Opinion' to the decision of 3 November 1999, under '1. Post-transfer delay'.) It must also be noted that Judge Shahabuddeen believed that Barayagwiza had to be released and his indictment dismissed on the basis of the delay between the transfer and his initial appearance (and not on his detention prior to his transfer), see ibid., under 'Preliminary'.

[883] See also Swart 2001, p. 206.

[884] This is very much reminiscent of the reactions within NATO after the Todorović decision of 18 October 2000 was issued, see ns. 377-378 and accompanying text.

[885] Amnesty International, News Service: 221/99, AI Index: AFR 47/20/99, 24 November 1999, 'International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda: Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza must not escape justice' (Public Statement), available at: http://www.amnesty.org/en/library/asset/AFR47/020/1999/en/c5424d3e-dfee-11dd-82c9-a1d1b98af6ef/afr470201999en.html.

charges then pending against him of having participated in the Rwandan genocide of 1994 will be considered by a national court".[886]

This is a good point which was also examined in Chapter III of this book where it was explained that although a male detentus outcome may constitute a proper remedy for serious violations and will lead to the ending of the case before the now prosecuting court, it is not the same, or should not be the same, as impunity for the suspect. That a court decides to refuse to exercise jurisdiction because, for example, the authorities which can be linked to the prosecuting forum have acted irregularly, does arguably not mean that another court, which has nothing to do with the male captus, cannot try the suspect afterwards.[887]

However, Barayagwiza was not released immediately after the decision since Barayagwiza himself filed an application for review two days later. This was because he did not agree with the fact that the Registry was ordered to return him to Cameroon.[888]

When the Prosecutor "responded to the application, asking to be heard on the same point [original footnote omitted, ChP]",[889] Barayagwiza withdrew his request. On 19 November 1999, the Prosecutor informed the judges "of her intention to file her own request for review of the Decision pursuant to Article 25 of the Statute of the Tribunal,[[890]] and in the alternative, a "motion for reconsideration"",[891] and on 1 December 1999, her request, entitled 'Prosecutor's Motion for Review or Reconsideration of the Appeals Chamber's Decision Rendered on 3 November 1999, in Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. the Prosecutor and Request for Stay of Execution' was filed.[892]

In its decision of 31 March 2000, the Appeals Chamber considered this motion, in which the Prosecutor argued, among other things, that > review is justified on the basis of the new facts, which establish that the Prosecutor made significant efforts to transfer the Appellant, that the Prosecutor acted with due

---

[886] Ibid.

[887] That court could then take into account the fact that the suspect has suffered an irregular pre-trial phase and grant him certain remedies. Otherwise, the suspect would still not have received a 'personal' remedy repairing the wrongs. (The fact that the first court refuses jurisdiction and that the second court starts a new trial is not of any 'advantage' to the suspect. Although it is not so that every remedy must be to the benefit of the suspect, it would arguably contravene the concept of fairness if the suspect is, for example, kidnapped, brought to a court which refuses jurisdiction, brought before a new court and then tried without the latter court providing him a remedy, which, in the suspect's eyes, would effectively repair the wrongs suffered by him, such as a reduction of his sentence.)

[888] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 4.

[889] Ibid.

[890] This article ('Review Proceedings') reads: "Where a new fact has been discovered which was not known at the time of the proceedings before the Trial Chambers or the Appeals Chamber and which could have been a decisive factor in reaching the decision, the convicted person or the Prosecutor may submit to the International Tribunal for Rwanda an application for review of the judgement."

[891] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 6.

[892] See ibid., para. 1.

> diligence and that any delays did not fundamentally compromise the rights of the Appellant and would not justify the dismissal of the indictment with prejudice to the Prosecutor.[893]

The Prosecutor also stressed that the decision of 3 November 1999 was "contrary to the mandate of the Tribunal to promote national reconciliation in Rwanda by conducting public trial on the merits"[894] and that not only the rule of law and the human rights of the suspect had to be taken into account, but also, indeed particularly, "the interests of justice required by the victims and the international community as a whole".[895]

The Defence, of course, did not agree with these arguments. Moreover, it specifically urged the judges "to forcefully reject the notion that the human rights of a person accused of a serious crime, under the rubric of achieving national reconciliation, should be less than those available to an accused charged with a less serious one".[896]

The Appeals Chamber first reacted to the warning from the Government of Rwanda that an unfavourable decision would jeopardise the co-operation on the part of Rwanda with the ICTR:[897]

---

[893] Ibid., para. 25.
[894] Ibid., para. 22.
[895] Ibid.
[896] Ibid., para. 33.
[897] See ibid., para. 34: "[T]he Chamber notes that during the hearing on 22 February 2000 in Arusha, Prosecutor Ms Carla Del Ponte, made a statement regarding the reaction of the government of Rwanda to the Decision. She stated that: "The government of Rwanda reacted very seriously in a tough manner to the decision of 3 November 1999." Later, the Attorney General of Rwanda appearing as representative of the Rwandan Government, in his submissions as "amicus curiae["] to the Appeals Chamber, openly threatened the non co-operation of the peoples of Rwanda with the Tribunal if faced with an unfavourable Decision by the Appeals Chamber on the Motion for Review [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." It may be interesting to note that during the hearing of 22 February 2000, Carla Del Ponte took the guilt of Barayagwiza for granted when she stated rather sweepingly: "I am the only person here to represent the victims, and on their behalf I pray you to allow the prosecutor to institute proceedings against Barayagwiza, who has committed crimes against humanity, who has committed genocide, and his indictment has been confirmed. He is no longer a suspect. He is an accused. This accused is responsible for the death of over 800,000 people in Rwanda, and the evidence is there. Irrefutable, incontrovertible, he is guilty…In the name of justice, genuine justice, for the sake of the victims, for the sake of the survivors. There are victims who are still suffering for what happened in Rwanda. I will always continue to say that Barayagwiza is guilty." (Del Ponte 2009, p. 82.) Luckily, the Appeals Chamber emphasised that it is for the judges and for the judges alone (and not the Prosecutor) to adjudicate on the guilt of Barayagwiza. (See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 35.) In his Separate Opinion to the 31 March 2000 decision, Judge Shahabuddeen examines this interesting point a little further (para. 68): "The Prosecutor of the ICTR is not required to be neutral in a case; she is a party. But she is not of course a partisan. This is why, for example, the Rules of the Tribunal require the Prosecutor to disclose to the defence all exculpatory material. The implications of that requirement suggest that, while a prosecution must be conducted vigorously, there is room for the injunction that prosecuting counsel "ought to bear themselves rather in the character of ministers of justice assisting in the administration of justice". The prosecution takes the position that it would not prosecute without itself believing in guilt. The point of importance is that an assertion by the prosecution of its belief in guilt is not relevant to the proof. Judicial traditions vary and

> The Appeals Chamber wishes to stress that the Tribunal is an independent body, whose decisions are based solely on justice and law. If its decision in any case should be followed by non-cooperation, that consequence would be a matter for the Security Council.[898]

These words are, of course, to be welcomed: the ICTR is a legal institution which should not be put under pressure by political entities which do not agree with the outcome of a certain case.[899]

However, even though the Appeals Chamber's stance is very commendable, many believe that the remainder of the decision, which – as will be shown infra – led to quite another outcome, in fact revealed that the judges did yield to political pressure.[900]

---

the Tribunal must seek to benefit from all of them. Taking due account of that circumstance, I nevertheless consider that the system of the Statute under which the Tribunal is functioning will support a distinction between an affirmation of guilt and an affirmation of preparedness to prove guilt. In this case, I would interpret what was said as intended to convey the latter meaning, but the strength with which the statements were made comes so close to the former that I consider it right to say that the framework of the Statute is sufficiently balanced and sufficiently stable not to be upset by the spirit of the injunction referred to concerning the role of a prosecutor. I believe that it is that spirit which underlies the remarks now made by the Appeals Chamber on the point [original footnote omitted, ChP]." It is reassuring that Carla Del Ponte, in her memoirs, also admitted that her (above-mentioned) words were perhaps too strong, although it is also clear that she (still) assumed the guilt of Barayagwiza, see Del Ponte 2009, pp. 82-83: "In hindsight, these words might have gone over the line. I allowed my zeal on behalf of the victims to carry my rhetoric beyond the bounds required by the presumption of innocence and respect for the tribunal's own independence. Perhaps I should have stressed that Barayagwiza had only been indicted for genocide and crimes against humanity, that he stood accused of these crimes. I anticipated that the judges would comment upon my rhetorical flourish. But I decided that if I did not stress as starkly as possible the fact that, if the Appeals Chamber did not overturn the previous ruling and allowed a guilty man, a man who had participated in genocide at the wholesale level, to go free, then it would be on their conscience and not mine. I was almost daring the judges not to overturn the ruling of November 3 [emphasis in original, ChP]."

[898] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 34. This point was further elaborated upon by Judge Nieto-Navia in his declaration to the 31 March 2000 decision.

[899] See also Sloan 2006, p. 343: "For an Appeals Chamber to order the release of an accused war criminal would take courage, but, depending on the circumstances (including who was involved, on whose behalf and what level of force was used), it could well be the only appropriate way forward. While there would certainly be political fallout in the face of a decision to order the release of an accused war criminal – many would view this as a retrograde movement in the battle against impunity – the impartial administration of justice must be the primary concern of a judicial body, not political factors."

[900] See, for example, Schabas 2000, pp. 570-571 ("As for the judges of the appeals chamber, their second thoughts may well have saved the ICTR, whose future was compromised by Rwanda's quite predictable and understandable fury with the first judgment and with what appeared to be an ICTR-sanctioned grant of impunity to Barayagwiza. In view of the lamentable legal reasoning in the second decision, the judges' insistence that Rwanda's pledge not to cooperate with the Tribunal – a threat echoed by the prosecutor at the February 2[2] hearing on the review motion – had no bearing in their deliberations was, and remains, unconvincing."), Cogan 2002, p. 135 ("The judges denied that they had been coerced into changing their decision to release Barayagwiza, but it is likely that Rwanda's threats played a part in the outcome [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."), Sloan 2006, p. 338 ("This judicial

After having stated that it could review the 3 November 1999 decision on the basis of Article 25 of the ICTR Statute and Rule 120 of the ICTR RPE,[901] the Appeals Chamber turned to the merits of the case. It divided Barayagwiza's pre-trial detention in three periods, namely 1) 15 April 1996 (arrest by the Cameroon authorities) – 21 February 1997 (when the Court of Appeal of the Centre of Cameroon rejected Rwanda's extradition request); 2) 21 February 1997 (Rule 40 ICTR RPE request) – 19 November 1997 (transfer of Barayagwiza) and 3) 19 November 1997 (transfer of Barayagwiza) – 23 February 1998 (initial appearance of Barayagwiza).[902]

With respect to the first period, it found that the new information submitted to the judges established that Barayagwiza "knew the general nature of the charges against him by 3 May 1996 at the latest".[903] Although these 18 days (at most) still entailed a violation of his right to be informed without delay of the charges against him, the judges felt that "this violation is patently of a different order than the one identified in the Decision whereby the Appellant was without any information for 11 months".[904]

New facts were also 'discovered'[905] with respect to the second period; the judges explained that in the 3 November 1999 decision, the Appeals Chamber had determined that "Cameroon was willing to transfer the Appellant".[906] However, the new information showed that Cameroon had in fact not been prepared to transfer Barayagwiza before 24 October 1997.[907] flip-flop was viewed by many as politically motivated."), Sridhar 2006, p. 362 ("The Barayagwiza case in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) provides a parallel example of how international tribunals might be undermined by political pressures.") and Zahar and Sluiter 2008, pp. vii-viii, where they state that "the ICTR Appeals Chamber distorted the law in order to breathe new life into legal proceedings which had been terminated, by its first decision, for no reason other than to appease the Rwandese government which was furious about the release of a prominent defendant over what the government saw as a trivial human rights violation."

The judges continued:

---

[901] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 50. Rule 120 of the ICTR RPE complements Art. 25 of the ICTR Statute (see n. 890) and reads: "Where a new fact has been discovered which was not known to the moving party at the time of the proceedings before a Chamber, and could not have been discovered through the exercise of due diligence, the defence or, within one year after the final judgement has been pronounced, the Prosecutor, may make a motion to that Chamber, if it can be reconstituted or, failing that, to the appropriate Chamber of the Tribunal for review of the judgement."

[902] See ibid., para. 53.

[903] Ibid., para. 54.

[904] Ibid., para. 55.

[905] See Schabas 2000, p. 568: "None of the "new facts" admitted by the appeals chamber were "discovered," nor were they unknown when the appeals chamber first heard the case in 1999. The prosecutor had simply failed to put them in evidence."

[906] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 57.

[907] See ibid.

> The new fact, that Cameroon was not prepared to transfer the Appellant prior to the date on which he was actually delivered to the Tribunal's detention unit,[908] would have had a significant impact on the Decision had it been known at the time, given that, in the Decision, the Appeals Chamber drew its conclusions with regard to the Prosecutor's negligence in part from the fact that nothing prevented the transfer of the Appellant save the Prosecutor's failure to act (...).[909]

As a result, it was held that "the new facts show that, during this second period, the violations [of Barayagwiza's human rights, ChP] were not attributable to the Prosecutor".[910]

As already explained in the context of the Karadžić case, this may, of course, be true and if so, should have an effect on the remedies. However, this quotation arguably does not mean that these violations were not taken into account by the Appeals Chamber when it came to determine the remedies.[911]

With respect to the third and final period, the judges stated that the new information had revealed that counsel for Barayagwiza, in an annex to a letter to the Registrar, had in fact consented to an initial appearance taking place on 3 February 1997. Although this still meant a substantial delay of 20 days (the initial appearance took place on 23 February 2007), the delay was clearly less extensive than the 96-day period mentioned in the 3 November 1999 decision.[912]

After having discussed these three periods, the Appeals Chamber turned to Rule 120 of the ICTR RPE which introduces an additional condition related to Article 25 of the ICTR Statute.[913]

According to this rule, a party can only submit a motion for review "[w]here a new fact has been discovered which was not known to the moving party at the time of the proceedings before a Chamber, and could not have been discovered through the exercise of due diligence".[914]

After the Appeals Chamber had concluded that "[t]he new facts identified in the first two periods (...) may have been known to the Prosecutor or at least they could [908] These words are arguably incorrect; Cameroon was prepared to transfer the Appellant prior to the date on which he was actually delivered to the Tribunal's detention unit. After all, a few moments earlier, the Appeals Chamber had clarified that Cameroon was not prepared to transfer Barayagwiza before 24 October 1997. However, that also means that Cameroon was prepared to transfer Barayagwiza after 24 October 1997, a date which is still prior to the date Barayagwiza was actually transferred to the ICTR (19 November 1997). Unfortunately, the Appeals Chamber does not go into this period of time (of almost a month) between the moment Cameroon would be prepared to transfer Barayagwiza and the actual date of transfer.

---

[909] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 58.

[910] Ibid.

[911] It seems that the Appeals Chamber did take (like it arguably should take) all the violations into account when determining the remedies, including those which cannot be attributed to the Prosecution, see n. 919 and accompanying text.

[912] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 62.

[913] See n. 890.

[914] See also n. 901.

have been discovered",[915] a conclusion which would block the motion for review with respect to the 'new' facts of the first two periods, it consequently diminished the relevance of Rule 120 of the ICTR RPE to, arguably, reach the result it already had in mind:[916]

> In the wholly exceptional circumstances of this case, and in the face of a possible miscarriage of justice, the Chamber construes the condition laid down in Rule 120, that the fact be unknown to the moving party at the time of the proceedings before a Chamber, and not discoverable through the exercise of due diligence, as directory in nature. In adopting such a position, the Chamber has regard to the circumstance that the Statute itself does not speak to this issue.[[917]] There is precedent for taking such an approach. Other reviewing courts, presented with facts which would clearly have altered an earlier decision, have felt bound by the interests of justice to take these into account, even when the usual requirements of due diligence and unavailability were not strictly satisfied. (...) To reject the facts presented by the Prosecutor, in the light of their impact on the Decision, would indeed be to close ones eyes to reality.[918]

---

[915] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 64. The Appeals Chamber was arguably of the opinion that the new fact related to the third period was not known to the Prosecutor because the annex to the letter written by the defence counsel of Barayagwiza to the Registrar, in which counsel had given his consent to an initial appearance taking place on 3 February 1997, was not available to her. The word "arguably" has been used here because the Appeals Chamber states that "[i]t must be deduced that the fact that the defence counsel had given his consent was known to the Prosecutor at the time of the proceedings before the Appeals Chamber". (Ibid., para. 70.) However, taking all the words of this paragraph into account (and the fact that the judges first clarified that "[t]he new facts identified in the first two periods (...) may have been known to the Prosecutor or at least they could have been discovered", thus contrasting the first two periods with the third period), it appears that the judges have forgotten the word "not" between "was" and "known", see ibid.: "With regard to the third period, the Appeals Chamber remarks that, although a set of the elements submitted by the Prosecutor on 16 February 2000 were available to her prior to that date, according to the Registrar's memorandum, Annex C [the annex to the letter written by Barayagwiza's counsel and directed to the Registrar which indicated that the former had given his consent to an initial appearance taking place on 3 February 1997, ChP] was not one of them. It must be deduced that the fact that the defence counsel had given his consent was known to the Prosecutor at the time of the proceedings before the Appeals Chamber."

[916] Cf. also Schabas 2000, p. 567: "In the second decision, the appeals chamber ultimately distorts the law in an effort to achieve the desired result – to compensate for its previous decision and, in view of the "new facts" adduced, to enable the prosecution of Barayagwiza to proceed. In all fairness, the "new facts" did, indeed, change the appeals chamber's perception of the case and of the prosecutor's conduct, but the chamber's efforts to justify overturning its previous decision are surprisingly weak. For example, the chamber itself seems to acknowledge that none of the "new facts" came anywhere near the test set by Rule 120". See also ibid., p. 571.

[917] For criticism related to this observation, see ibid., pp. 567-568.

[918] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, paras. 65-66 and 69.

In the end, the judges concluded "that the Appellant's rights were violated, and that all violations demand a remedy"[919] but that "the violations suffered by the Appellant and the omissions of the Prosecutor are not the same as those which emerged from the facts on which the Decision is founded".[920]

As a result, the remedy had to be changed.[921] Barayagwiza was not released and his indictment was not dismissed with prejudice to the Prosecutor, but the judges decided > that for the violation of his rights the Appellant is entitled to a remedy, to be fixed at the time of judgement at first instance, as follows: a) If the Appellant is found not guilty, he shall receive financial compensation; b) If the Appellant is found guilty, his sentence shall be reduced to take account of the violation of his rights.[922]

Consequently, when Barayagwiza's case was completed on the merits, the Trial Chamber reduced his life sentence (Barayagwiza was found guilty of conspiracy to commit genocide, genocide, complicity in genocide, direct and public incitement to commit genocide, crimes against humanity (extermination, murder and persecution) and serious violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II) to 35 years' imprisonment.[923]

As has become clear from examination of this case, decisions of the Appeals Chamber are definitely not flawless, one of the most important points of criticism being that the Appeals Chamber should take into account the fact that refusing jurisdiction may be an appropriate remedy in serious cases, but that refusing [919] Ibid., para. 74. These words confirm the idea of the 3 November 1999 decision that every violation committed in the context of an ICTR trial, even one for which the Prosecutor may not be directly responsible, should be remedied. That the Appeals Chamber supports the rather general view of the first decision in that the judges must take responsibility for violations committed in the context of an ICTR trial (and do not only have to look at violations which, for example, occurred while Barayagwiza was being detained at the behest/request of the Tribunal) can also be discerned from the following words: "The information now before the Chamber demonstrates that (…) the Appellant knew the general nature of the charges against him by 3 May 1996 at the latest. He thus spent at most 18 days in detention without being informed of the reasons therefor. The Appeals Chamber considers that such a time period violates the Appellant's right to be informed without delay of the charges against him." (Ibid., paras. 54-55.) Thus, the judges start to count as from the day Barayagwiza was arrested (3 May 1996 minus 18 days = 15 April 1996), a day on which Barayagwiza was not yet detained at the behest/request of the ICTR. Apparently, the judges were of the opinion that by then, the detention could nevertheless be seen as falling within the context of their case.

---

[920] Ibid., para. 74.

[921] See also ibid., para. 71: "The Chamber notes that the remedy it ordered for the violations the Appellant was subject to is based on a cumulation of elements: (…) The new facts diminish the role played by the failings of the Prosecutor as well as the intensity of the violation of the rights of the Appellant. The cumulative effect of these elements being thus reduced, the reparation ordered by the Appeals Chamber now appears disproportionate in relation to the events. The new facts being therefore facts which could have been decisive in the Decision, in particular as regards the remedy it orders, that remedy must be modified."

[922] Ibid., para. 75.

[923] See ICTR, Trial Chamber I, The Prosecutor v. Ferdinand Nahimana, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza and Hassan Ngeze, 'Judgement and Sentence', Case No. ICTR-99-52-T, 3 December 2003, para. 1107.

jurisdiction should not be equated with impunity for the suspect. That prosecuting forum A has forfeited its right to prosecute the suspect does not mean that the suspect may not be tried by prosecuting forum B.[924] However, the decisions can also be applauded, for example, for (arguably) confirming the idea that the Tribunal must remedy every violation committed in the context of its case, even if the Tribunal is, strictly speaking, not responsible for it. This duty to repair wrongs is apparently not only valid in the context of the abuse of process doctrine (when the Tribunal decides to refuse jurisdiction because of serious violations), but also in the context of less serious irregularities which do not lead to the ending of the case, see the general words in the 2000 Barayagwiza case: "all violations demand a remedy".

Finally, a last word on this case's judicial legacy; although the 2000 decision clearly reversed many factual observations from the 1999 decision, other, more general, reasonings of the 1999 decision have remained untouched.[925] One could hereby think of the Appeals Chamber's observation that one may rely on the abuse of process doctrine if "in the circumstances of a particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice",[926] cited with approval by the Trial Chamber in Nikolić.[927] The same Chamber also agreed with the idea established in the 1999 decision of Barayagwiza that a court may refuse to exercise jurisdiction in the case of serious violations, irrespective of the entity responsible for it.[928] Moreover, the Appeals Chamber's remarks on the importance

[924] See also Subsection 4.1 of Chapter III and Schabas 2000, p. 569: "In the November decision, the appeals chamber ordered Barayagwiza to be returned to Cameroon. Although theoretically, in view of the prosecutorial abuse, it may have been appropriate for the appeals chamber to refuse to exercise its jurisdiction, the ICTR still had a duty to promote accountability for genocide. Its decision to send Barayagwiza back to Cameroon seemed destined to accomplish the opposite. Article VI of the Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Genocide Convention) offers two bases for jurisdiction: an international tribunal or the state where the crime took place. Rwanda would therefore be the alternative forum, and the ICTR should have seen itself as bound to ensure Barayagwiza was within effective reach of that forum." See also Fernández de Gurmendi and Friman 2002, pp. 330-331, n. 240, referring to (the wrong pages of) Schabas. One can agree with Schabas that, "[i]f the interests of international justice are to be served, the ICTR should be empowered to transfer individuals to a state with jurisdiction over the crime and a willingness to prosecute in cases where the ICTR declines jurisdiction (for whatever reason)." (Schabas 2000, p. 570.) Luckily, in 2002, Rule 11 bis of the ICTR RPE was adopted (see also n. 244), which enables and regulates the transfer of cases from the ICTR to national courts. Finally, it must be noted that the ICC might face the same problems the ICTR has experienced as "the same lacuna exists in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)

[925] See also Sluiter 2003 B, pp. 944- 945 and Currie 2007, p. 364 (quoting Sluiter).

[926] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 77.

[927] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111. See also, for example, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Pauline Nyiramasuhuko, 'Decision on Defence Motion for a Stay of Proceedings and Abuse of Process', Case No. ICTR-97-21-T, 20 February 2004, para. 14.

[928] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 114. As already explained earlier, it was not entirely clear whether the ICTY Appeals Chamber also followed this stance (although it seems that it did), the judges of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in any case of a person's right to habeas corpus have been confirmed as well.[929] In that respect, one cannot agree with Schabas who wrote in 2003 that the 1999 decision "seems to have been entirely forgotten in subsequent case law, as if it were a bad dream".[930]

3.2.2 Semanza

The next case under examination, Semanza, has many similarities with Barayagwiza. On or about 26 March 1996, Laurent Semanza was arrested by the authorities of Cameroon pursuant to an international arrest warrant issued by the Rwandan Attorney-General's Office.[931] Some three weeks later, on 17 April 1996, the ICTR Prosecutor used Rule 40 of the ICTR RPE to issue a request for provisional measures to be taken against Semanza and several other suspects (including Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza).[932] On 6 May 1996, the Prosecutor issued a request to the authorities of Cameroon for a three-week extension of the suspects' concurred with the idea expressed in Barayagwiza that a court may refuse jurisdiction in cases "where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity." (See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74 and ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, paras. 29-30.) These latter words were also confirmed in the still-to-discuss Kajelijeli case, see ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 206.

---

[929] Although many cases have generally confirmed the habeas corpus reasoning of the ICTR Appeals Chamber (see n. 863), the following two statements are explicit examples in that respect. In the Milošević case, the judges held, commenting on a person's right to habeas corpus and the 1999 Barayagwiza decision: "This case was overturned by the Appeals Chamber on a review on grounds that do not in any way affect the validity of the Chamber's rulings as to the significance of the right of an accused to habeas corpus." (ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Slobodan Milošević, 'Decision on Preliminary Motions', Case No. IT-99-37-PT, 8 November 2001, para. 39, n. 44.) Cf. also the Separate Opinion of Judge Robinson in the Todorović case where he stated: "The subsequent history of this case, in which the decision was reviewed pursuant to Rule 120 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, in no way affects the validity of the Appeals Chamber's dictum in paragraph 88 that the "notion that a detained individual shall have recourse to an independent judicial officer for review of the detaining authority's acts" is a "fundamental right"." (ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Separate Opinion of Judge Robinson', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, para. 3, n. 1.) See finally (from the context of the international*ised* criminal tribunals): SCSL, Trial Chamber, The Prosecutor against Tamba Alex Brima, 'Ruling on the Application for the Issue of a Writ of Habeas Corpus Filed by the Applicant', Case No. SCSL-03-06-PT, 22 July 2003, pp. 7 and 9. (See also n. 1288 and accompanying text.)

[930] Schabas 2003, p. 265. (Note that the 2005 case of Kajelijeli (see n. 928) should, of course, not be taken into account here as that decision was only issued after Schabas' article was published.) See also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 50, n. 187.

[931] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Laurent Semanza, 'Decision on the "Motion to Set Aside the Arrest and Detention of Laurent Semanza as Unlawful"', Case No. ICTR-97-20-I, 6 October 1999, para. 2.

[932] See ibid., para. 3. See also ns. 806-807 and accompanying text.

provisional detention[933] but on 16 May 1996, he informed the authorities in Cameroon of his intention to proceed against only four of the suspects, excluding Semanza (and Barayagwiza).[934] As previously explained in the context of the Barayagwiza case, on 21 February 1997, the day that the Court of Appeal of Cameroon rejected a request from Rwanda to have the remaining suspects extradited to Rwanda and ordered their release, the ICTR Prosecutor reacted by issuing a new request for provisional arrest.[935] Furthermore, she requested an Order for transfer and provisional detention pursuant to Rule 40 bis of the ICTR RPE,[936] which was filed by Judge Aspegren on 4 March 1997.[937] This Order was "served on the authorities in Cameroon on 6 March 1997 and the Appellant received a copy thereof on 10 March 1997".[938] Like Barayagwiza, Semanza filed a writ of habeas corpus challenging the lawfulness of his detention on 29 September 1997.[939] On 17 October 1997, the indictment against Semanza was filed,[940] charging him with "genocide, direct and public incitement to commit genocide, complicity in genocide, crimes against humanity and serious violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II".[941] This indictment was confirmed on 23 October 1997.[942] Like Barayagwiza, Semanza was finally transferred to the ICTR on 19 November 1997,[943] where he made his initial appearance on 16 February 1998,[944] more than 22 months – cf. again Barayagwiza – after he was arrested in Cameroon. After his indictment was amended and corrected, Semanza filed his 'Motion to Set Aside the Arrest and Detention of Laurent Semanza as Unlawful' on 16 August [933] See ibid., para. 4. See also n. 807. Note that para. 4 of the 6 October 1999 decision speaks of an extension of three months, but this is arguably incorrect, see also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 6.

[934] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Laurent Semanza, 'Decision on the "Motion to Set Aside the Arrest and Detention of Laurent Semanza as Unlawful"', Case No. ICTR-97-20-I, 6 October 1999, para. 5. See also n. 809 and accompanying text.

[935] See ibid., paras. 6-7. See also n. 811 and accompanying text.

[936] See ibid., para. 8. See also n. 812 and accompanying text.

[937] See ibid., para. 10. See also n. 813 and accompanying text.

[938] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 9.

[939] See ibid., para. 10. See also n. 815 and accompanying text.

[940] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Laurent Semanza, 'Decision on the "Motion to Set Aside the Arrest and Detention of Laurent Semanza as Unlawful"', Case No. ICTR-97-20-I, 6 October 1999, para. 11.

[941] ICTR, Prosecutor, The Prosecutor of the Tribunal versus Laurent Semanza, 'Indictment', Case No. ICTR-97-20-I, 16 October 1997, p. 1.

[942] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Laurent Semanza, 'Decision on the "Motion to Set Aside the Arrest and Detention of Laurent Semanza as Unlawful"', Case No. ICTR-97-20-I, 6 October 1999, para. 12.

[943] See ibid., para. 13. See also n. 814 and accompanying text. Note that para. 13 of the 6 October 1999 decision speaks of 11 November 1997 as the date of Semanza's transfer, but this is arguably incorrect, see also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 12.

[944] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Laurent Semanza, 'Decision on the "Motion to Set Aside the Arrest and Detention of Laurent Semanza as Unlawful"', Case No. ICTR-97-20-I, 6 October 1999, para. 14.

1999, which was considered by Trial Chamber III.[945] On 6 October 1999, the judges issued their decision on this motion.

The Trial Chamber first examined the submissions of the parties. Like Barayagwiza, Semanza argued, among other things, that his detention was "unlawful and unjustifiable".[946]

This was countered by the Prosecutor, who was of the opinion that his detention was "lawful under the Statute and Rules".[947] It was also stipulated that "the Prosecutor does not have judicial control stricto senso over detention within a sovereign State".[948]

The Trial Chamber divided the points to be discussed into two categories: 1) the detention of Semanza before his transfer to the ICTR and 2) the detention of Semanza after his transfer.

With respect to the first category, the judges held that "it is not for the Tribunal to consider alleged violations of Semanza's rights before his transfer to the custody of the Tribunal"[949] because "an accused, before his transfer to the custody of the Tribunal, has no remedy under the Statute and Rules for the detention and acts by sovereign States over which the Tribunal does not exercise control".[950]

This stance was already expressed in the 1996 ICTY case of Djukić and Krsmanović (see also footnotes 138, 208 and 844 and accompanying text) and was later repeated by ICTR Trial Chambers in cases such as Karemera, Ngirumpatse, Kajelijeli (this last case will be further discussed in Subsection 3.2.3 of this chapter), Nshamihigo, Nzirorera and Nyiramasuhuko.

However, one can question whether these six decisions (which were decided on 10 December 1999 (Karemera and Ngirumpatse), 8 May 2000 (Kajelijeli and Nshamihigo), 7 September 2000 (Nzirorera) and 12 October 2000 (Nyiramasuhuko)) are consistent with the first (and second) Appeals Chamber's decision in Barayagwiza, where it was, after all, seemingly established that the ICTR may also remedy pre-trial violations committed by third parties in the context of a Tribunal case.[951]

---

[945] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 17.

[946] ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Laurent Semanza, 'Decision on the "Motion to Set Aside the Arrest and Detention of Laurent Semanza as Unlawful"', Case No. ICTR-97-20-I, 6 October 1999, para. 23. See also ibid. why Semanza thought his detention was unlawful and unjustifiable: "(a) the accused did not receive a formal indictment stating the charges against him before his transfer, and therefore was unable to prepare his defence; (b) the provisional detention of the accused violated the rights of the accused under Article 20 of the Statute and Rule 40; (c) the extension of the detention in the absence of judicial control was arbitrary and an abuse of the rights of the accused; (d) the accused has been discriminated against, as compared to others arrested in Cameroon; (e) the Prosecution failed to comply with Rule 40*bis* and the 40*bis* Order to file an indictment within thirty days, by 2 April 1997."

[947] Ibid., para. 27.

[948] Ibid.

[949] Ibid., para. 31.

[950] Ibid., para. 30.

[951] With respect to the question as to whether the Trial Chambers must follow the reasonings of the Appeals Chamber, it may be interesting to refer to the following words stemming from the ICTY Appeals Chamber's judgement in the Aleksovski case: "The Appeals Chamber considers that a proper

Furthermore, the judges, turning to the second category, found "that the Defence has failed to show any violation of the provisions of the Statute and the Rules with regard to Semanza's detention after his transfer to the custody of the Tribunal".[952]

Semanza decided to appeal this decision and the Appeals Chamber issued its decision on 31 May 2000, two months after the Appeals Chamber had reversed its 3 November 1999 decision in Barayagwiza.

The similarities between the cases of Semanza and Barayagwiza was also why the Appeals Chamber stressed that this did > not necessarily imply that the legal findings will be the same. The Appeals Chamber would like to recall the specific features of the instant case relative to the Barayagwiza case and states that it has considered the issues raised in the instant case on the basis of the specific arguments and grounds submitted to it by the Parties.[953]

Before turning to the merits of the case, the judges first had to consider a preliminary point, namely the Prosecutor's request to supplement the record on appeal with additional evidence in view of the outcome of the Barayagwiza case.

According to the Prosecutor, "the new evidence was rendered unavailable inasmuch as it related to points of law which the Chamber had not considered; those points of law were raised only after the Barayagwiza Decision had been delivered".[954] In addition to this unavailability argument, the Prosecutor submitted that the interests of justice must also constitute a reason why the Appeals Chamber should consider the new evidence.[955]

Semanza did not agree with these arguments and stated, among other things, that "the Prosecutor did possess the evidence but simply failed to make use of it [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[956] With respect to the interests of justice argument, Semanza believed that this concept in fact demands that the Appeals Chamber must "refuse to admit the evidence presented by the Prosecutor, who, "just as for any other organ of the Tribunal, or any party, […] is bound by the rights and privileges stipulated in the Statute and Rules" [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[957]

The judges concurred with Semanza with respect to the unavailability argument; according to them, the Prosecutor had failed to demonstrate in what respect the construction of the Statute requires that the ratio decidendi of its decisions is binding on Trial Chambers". (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Zlatko Aleksovski, 'Judgement', Case No. IT-95-14/1-A, 24 March 2000, para. 113.)

---

[952] ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Laurent Semanza, 'Decision on the "Motion to Set Aside the Arrest and Detention of Laurent Semanza as Unlawful"', Case No. ICTR-97-20-I, 6 October 1999, para. 36.

[953] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 3.

[954] Ibid., para. 30.

[955] See ibid., para. 31.

[956] Ibid., para. 32. According to Semanza, "this application is but a frantic attempt to anticipate issues and/or reopen the debate on the jurisprudence of Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza" [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)

[957] Ibid., para. 33.

relevant documents had not been available at the trial proceedings.[958] The outcome of the Barayagwiza case could not constitute a reason for unavailability: "developments in case-law can in no case be the cause or grounds for, or even a factor in the unavailability of evidence".[959]

Nevertheless, with respect to the interests of justice argument, the judges agreed with the Prosecution:

> [B]y admitting the new facts presented in the Barayagwiza case, ICT[R] Appeals Chamber, in reviewing the Decision, rectified the miscarriage of justice which had emerged in the light of those facts. The Appeals Chamber is consequently aware that if henceforth it refuses to admit certain items of evidence in the instant case a miscarriage of justice will result. This exceptional situation consequently enables it to admit said evidence (...).[960]

As a result, the judges turned to the merits of the case, taking into account (some of) the new evidence presented by the Prosecutor.

The judges first summarised the substantive arguments submitted by the two parties and noted that Semanza had requested the Appeals Chamber > to vacate the Trial Chamber III Decision; to find that his fundamental rights were violated and that the principle of equality of arms was not complied with; to vacate the arrest and detention proceedings as unlawful; to order his release; and to rule the Appeal suspensive of proceedings before the Trial Chamber [original footnote omitted, ChP].[961]

However, the Prosecutor did not agree. She argued, among other things, that the Trial Chamber had correctly concluded "that no remedy was open to the Accused under the Statute or Rules of the Tribunal for matters predating his transfer to the Tribunal"[962] because "the above-mentioned legal instruments contain no provision for reviewing the domestic legislation of States in which arrest and detention take place [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[963] As already explained supra, this stance was later repeated by ICTR Trial Chambers in cases such as Karemera, Ngirumpatse, Kajelijeli, Nshamihigo, Nzirorera and Nyiramasuhuko but appears to be inconsistent with the Barayagwiza case where it was seemingly established that the ICTR may also remedy pre-trial violations committed by third parties in the context of a Tribunal case. Moreover, the Prosecutor was of the opinion – a point which was also explained in Chapter III of this book[964] – "that dismissal of the Prosecution charges is not a remedy which is permitted under international human

[958] See ibid., para. 43.
[959] Ibid.
[960] Ibid., para. 45.
[961] Ibid., para. 59.
[962] Ibid., para. 63.
[963] Ibid., para. 63.
[964] See n. 611 of Chapter III.

rights law [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[965] The Prosecutor also argued that even if this remedy were permitted under international law, that the facts of the case did not justify granting it.[966] As already explained in the present chapter,[967] the Prosecutor looked at different factors which should be considered in deciding whether or not a dismissal should be with or without prejudice, one of them being the seriousness of the suspect's charges.

The Appeals Chamber considered five major issues, of which four will be examined here:[968] 1) the right of the suspect to be informed promptly of the nature of the charges against him, 2) the suspect's right to be promptly charged, 3) the right of the accused to be brought before a Trial Chamber without delay and to be formally charged and 4) the right to challenge the lawfulness of detention (habeas corpus).

With respect to issue number one, the judges first made the general statement that "a suspect arrested by the Tribunal has the right to be informed promptly of the reasons for his or her arrest [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[969] In addition, they stressed that, "[i]n accordance with the norms of international human rights law, (...) this right comes into effect from the moment of arrest and detention [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[970]

This means that either the Tribunal or national authorities/international forces making the arrest for the Tribunal must promptly inform the person of the reasons for his arrest if this right is not to be violated. This, in turn, implies that the Tribunal, if necessary, should be able to review whether the arrest and detention at the national level was properly executed, for example, with due regard to a person's right to be promptly informed of the reasons for his arrest.

Hence, this can arguably be seen as a rupture with cases such as Karemera, Ngirumpatse and Kajelijeli (Trial Chamber) which support the idea that the ICTR cannot review the circumstances surrounding the arrest and detention at the national level. Concerning this specific case, the judges divided Semanza's detention at the request of the ICTR Prosecutor in two different periods,[971] namely 15 April 1996 (the date of the first request based on Rule 40 of the ICTR RPE)[972] – 17 May 1996 (when the authorities of Cameroon were informed that the Prosecutor was not

[965] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 65.
[966] See ibid.
[967] See n. 653.
[968] The first, whether or not there was a violation of the principle of ne bis in idem, is not particularly interesting here. (However, note that the topic can be relevant for this book's subject in general, see n. 353.)
[969] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 78.
[970] Ibid.
[971] See ibid., para. 79.
[972] Note that this request (dated 15 April 1996) was submitted on 17 April 1996 to the authorities of Cameroon, see n. 932 and accompanying text.

interested in prosecuting the suspect)[973] and 21 February 1997 (the date of the second request based on Rule 40 of the ICTR RPE) – 19 November 1997 (when Semanza was transferred to the ICTR).

Regarding the first period, the judges concluded on the basis of the new evidence that Semanza "had been informed of the nature of the crimes for which he was being pursued by the Prosecutor on 3 May 1996".[974] This is 18 days after the date of the first request based on Rule 40 of the ICTR RPE of 15 April 1996, when Semanza was detained for the first time at the request of the ICTR Prosecutor.[975] According to the judges, this constituted a violation of Semanza's right to be informed promptly of the nature of the charges against him.[976] Furthermore, the judges found that "[a] fitting remedy for this violation is justified".[977]

This is an interesting point, which was also used by Karadžić,[978] for the judges state that a remedy is necessary because of the violation as such. They do not state, for example, that the remedy is necessary because it can be clearly attributed to the Prosecutor.

This is the correct approach. A suspect detained at the behest of the ICTR must be promptly informed of the nature of the charges against him, whether this is done by somebody from the OTP or by the national authorities detaining the suspect for the ICTR. However, this also means that if the OTP requests the national authorities to inform the suspect and the latter authorities fail to do so, a violation has occurred within the context of the ICTR case which must be remedied, whether or not that violation is, strictly speaking, attributable to the OTP.

Regarding the second period, the judges opined that Semanza's right to be informed promptly of the nature of the charges against him started on 21 February 1997 and that he "was formally informed of the charges laid against him by the Tribunal when the Order issued under Rule 40 bis was served on him in Cameroon on 10 March 1997".[979] The Appeals Chamber admitted that this period of 18 days could be seen as a violation of Semanza's right to be informed promptly of the nature of the charges against him, but also held that "the violation is less serious [973] Note that, according to the Trial Chamber in Semanza and the Appeals Chamber in Barayagwiza, the Cameroon authorities were informed on 16 May 1996, see ns. 934 and 809 and accompanying text, respectively.

[974] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 81.
[975] See ibid., para. 87. Note that the judges (in contrast to those of the Barayagwiza case) do not look at the period of time between Semanza's first deprivation of liberty (pursuant to an international arrest warrant issued by the Rwandan Attorney-General's Office) and his detention at the request of the ICTR. Hence, in this case, the judges were not of the opinion that the first days of detention could be seen as falling with the context of the ICTR case.
[976] See ibid.
[977] Ibid.
[978] See also n. 792 and accompanying text.
[979] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 88. See also n. 938 and accompanying text.

since the Appellant had been informed in substance of the nature of the Prosecutor's charges against him during his first period in detention".[980]

With respect to issue number two, Semanza's right to be promptly charged, the judges first noted that their colleagues who had written the 3 November 1999 decision in Barayagwiza were of the opinion that this right "becomes effective as soon as a Rule 40 bis Order is filed [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[981] However, the judges in Semanza did not agree with this, arguing that "the clock for the Rule 40 bis time-limit starts running only from the day the suspect is transferred to the Tribunal's Detention Facility".[982] As a result, Rule 40 bis of the ICTR RPE could not have been violated, as Semanza's indictment had already been confirmed (23 October 1997) before he was transferred to the ICTR (19 November 1997).[983] Moreover, the judges also made a point comparable with the one made by the judges in the 31 March 2000 decision in Barayagwiza, namely > that in any event, the Tribunal is not responsible for the time that elapsed before the Appellant was transferred to the Tribunal's Detention Facility. The evidence before the Appeals Chamber shows that Cameroon was not inclined to transfer the Appellant before 21 October 1997.[984]

As was also explained in the context of the 31 March 2000 decision in Barayagwiza, it may, of course, very well be that the Tribunal was, strictly speaking, not responsible for what happened to Semanza prior to his transfer, but this does not mean that the Tribunal, if it is of the opinion that violations occurred in the context of its case, may not repair them (although the fact that certain violations cannot clearly be attributed to the Tribunal can, of course, be of influence in determining the remedies for the violations). As asserted before, see the text following footnote 830 and accompanying text, one can very well argue that violations which occur in the context of constructive custody – the context on which the case of Semanza focuses – can generally be seen as being the Tribunal's responsibility, whether or not the specific violations occurring in this context can be clearly attributed to it.[985]

---

[980] Ibid., para. 90.
[981] Ibid., para. 91.
[982] Ibid., para. 96. See also n. 837.
[983] See ibid., para. 100.
[984] Ibid. para. 101. Note, however, that in the Barayagwiza case, Cameroon was three days slower, see n. 907 and accompanying text.
[985] Cf. also Judge Lal Chand Vohrah's declaration to this decision, where he remarked (see also n. 834): "If an accused is arrested or detained by a state at the request or under the authority of the Tribunal, even though the accused is not yet within the actual custody of the Tribunal, the Tribunal has a responsibility to provide whatever relief is available to it to attempt to reduce any violations as much as possible, and this remedy must be proportional to the violations. (…) I would also like to note my apprehension of certain language employed in the present Decision, which states that the "Appeals Chamber emphasises that, in any case, the Tribunal is not responsible for the period of time which elapsed before the Appellant was transferred to the Detention Facility of the Tribunal." [It must be noted that this is not an entirely accurate reproduction of the Appeals Chamber's words. The original Appeals Chamber's words go as follows: "[T]he Appeals Chamber emphasizes that in any event, the Tribunal is not responsible for the time that elapsed before the Appellant was transferred to the Tribunal's

The statement cited above, on the "fitting remedy", and the declaration of Judge Lal Chand Vohrah in this case, see footnotes 834 and 985, can be seen as evidence for this reasoning, for the idea that ICTR takes its responsibility for violations which occur in the context of its case.

With respect to issue number three, the right of Semanza to be brought before a Trial Chamber without delay and to be formally charged, the judges again made a point comparable with the one made by the judges in the 31 March 2000 decision in Barayagwiza, namely that counsel for Semanza had requested postponement of Semanza's initial hearing to 16 February 1998.[986] According to the judges, this request had "the import of waiving the Appellant's right to claim violation of his right to be brought before a Trial Chamber without delay and be formally charged".[987]

The fourth and final issue which had to be discussed was Semanza's right to challenge the lawfulness of detention (habeas corpus). After having confirmed the reasoning of the 3 November 1999 decision in Barayagwiza on the importance of this right,[988] the judges noted that a writ of habeas corpus was filed on 29 September 1997 but was not heard by a Trial Chamber.[989] As a result, Semanza's right to challenge the lawfulness of his detention was violated.[990] However, "[t]o assess the extent of the violation and its consequences in terms of remedy",[991] the judges had to take into account all the circumstances of the case. In doing so, they found that after this writ was filed in 1997, counsel for Semanza remained inactive on it for quite some time; according to the judges, it was "apparent that the Appellant became interested in the fate of his writ of habeas corpus only after the Appeals Chamber's 3 November 1999 Decision in the Barayagwiza case [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[992] Because of this, the Appeals Chamber concluded that Semanza's counsel "had failed in his duty of diligence by not carrying through to Detention Facility.", ChP.] (…) I do not take it to imply nor should it be interpreted as implying, that the Tribunal has no responsibility to an accused before he is transferred to the Detention Facility of the Tribunal when the accused has been arrested or detained at the behest of the Tribunal. This accords with the position taken in the Barayagwiza Review Decision, that the cumulative effects of all violations – even those occurring prior to transfer into Tribunal custody – are to be considered in fashioning an appropriate remedy [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, Declaration by Judge Lal Chand Vohrah, paras. 6-7.) Judge Lal Chand Vohrah further notes that "[r]esponsibility and authority to redress violations occurring at a time when the accused was not detained under Tribunal request or authority would need to be considered on a case by case basis." (Ibid., para. 7, n. 7.)

---

[986] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 108.

[987] Ibid., para. 111. See for criticism on this point, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, Declaration by Judge Lal Chand Vohrah, paras. 9-10.

[988] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, paras. 112-113. See also n. 863 and accompanying text.

[989] See ibid., para. 114.

[990] See ibid.

[991] Ibid., para. 115.

[992] Ibid., para. 118.

conclusion the matter he had undertaken on the Appellant's behalf in his writ of habeas corpus".[993] This is rather an awkward statement: it appears that the Appeals Chamber is trying to turn the ICTR's own fault (namely its fault not to have considered the 1997 writ of habeas corpus) into a fault of the Defence because the latter has not sufficiently stressed the importance of this writ for his case. Is this not the world turned upside-down?[994] The judges also clarified that Semanza > adduced two principal grounds in his 29 September 1997 writ of habeas corpus. Firstly, he contends that the Prosecutor was responsible for the continuing increase in the lapse of time before he was transferred to the Tribunal's Detention Facility and, secondly, that he was detained with no formal legal justification. The Appeals Chamber recalls that an indictment was confirmed against the Appellant on 23 October 1997 and that he was transferred to the Tribunal's Detention Facility on 19 November 1997. The results sought by filing the writ of habeas corpus were therefore achieved relatively soon after the writ was filed [original footnote omitted, ChP].[995]

As a result, the judges concluded that "while indeed there was prejudice caused, it must be seen in perspective and thus does not take the form of material prejudice alleged by the Appellant".[996] Arguably, the judges' clarification does not seem to be without its flaws. Although the fact that Semanza's indictment was confirmed indeed appears to resolve his argument that he was detained with no formal legal justification, it is difficult to understand how his transfer can solve his assertion "that the Prosecutor was responsible for the continuing increase in the lapse of time before he was transferred". After all, even if Semanza has been transferred, the [993] Ibid., para. 121. However, one can wonder whether this is indeed so. After all, the Appeals Chamber notes itself (ibid., para. 116) that "[h]is 29 September 1997 writ of habeas corpus aside, the Appellant challenged the lawfulness of his arrest and detention in Cameroon for a second time in his Motion to Set Aside [the Arrest and Detention of Laurent Semanza] as Unlawful, which he filed on 16 August 199[9] [original footnote omitted, ChP]." As the aim of a writ of habeas corpus is to challenge the lawfulness of one's arrest and detention, one can wonder whether this challenge, made on 16 August 1999 – hence before the Barayagwiza case – is not a repetition of the 1997 writ of habeas corpus in another form. In that respect, the following words are also incomprehensible (ibid., para. 119): "Counsel for the Appellant neglected to follow up the 29 September 1997 writ of habeas corpus until the Barayagwiza Decision had been delivered. The fact that Counsel for the Appellant elected to challenge the lawfulness of the Appellant's arrest and detention in August 1999 in a second motion confirms this finding." The question is how this possible, given the fact that (16) August 1999 is clearly preceding the moment the Barayagwiza Decision was delivered (3 November 1999).

---

[994] Cf. also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, Declaration by Judge Lal Chand Vohrah, para. 12: "I consider that when any organ of the Tribunal contributes to due process or other human rights violations (including by omission or oversight), the Chambers should be sufficiently flexible to allow the violations to be raised and redressed. Indeed, when an accused is defending himself against charges of genocide, crimes against humanity or war crimes before the Tribunal, he should not also be required to diligently ensure that the Tribunal is not itself contributing to a violation of his rights, as that onus should rest with the Tribunal."

[995] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 124.

[996] Ibid.

Prosecutor can still be held responsible for the considerable lapse of time prior to the transfer.

Be that as it may, the Appeals Chamber nevertheless found "that any violation, even if it entails only a relative degree of prejudice, requires a proportionate remedy".[997] This statement, which very much resembles the concluding statement of the judges in the 31 March 2000 decision in Barayagwiza that "all violations demand a remedy",[998] can be welcomed[999] as it can be seen as confirmation of what appears to be the reasoning in the Barayagwiza decisions, namely that the Tribunal will take responsibility for any violations committed in the context of its case, even if these violations have been committed by third parties.[1000]

The last remark made by the judges before they turned to the final conclusion arguably indirectly showed that in determining a proportionate remedy, the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes may be taken into account: "In that connection, the Appeals Chamber also kept in mind the Tribunal's mandate, particularly in respect of the protection of international public order."[1001]

The judges' final conclusion was that Semanza's right to be informed promptly of the nature of the charges against him and his right to challenge the lawfulness of his detention were violated.[1002] However, "the remedy sought by the Appellant, namely his release, is disproportionate, in the instant case".[1003] As a result, the judges decided

---

[997] Ibid., para. 125.

[998] See n. 919 and accompanying text.

[999] However, strictly speaking, one could argue that the Appeals Chamber's statement is in violation of the ICTR RPE for Rule 5 (A) of the ICTR RPE states that "[w]here an objection on the ground of non-compliance with the Rules or Regulations is raised by a party at the earliest opportunity, the Trial Chamber shall grant relief, if it finds that the alleged non-compliance is proved and that it has caused material prejudice to that party [emphasis added, ChP]". Remarkably, this rule was also presented in this decision (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 122) but the Appeals Chamber does not say anything about the fact that this rule seemingly contradicts the Appeal Chamber's conclusion that a remedy will be provided in this case, even if the prejudice caused "does not take the form of material prejudice alleged by the Appellant". (See n. 996 and accompanying text.) This point will be returned to in the Rwamakuba case, see ns. 1139-1145 and accompanying text.

[1000] The only difference is that in the Barayagwiza case, the judges also looked at a period of detention which could not be seen as being at the behest/request of the Prosecutor, see ns. 857 and 919 and accompanying text.

[1001] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 126.

[1002] See ibid., paras. 127-128.

[1003] Ibid., para. 129. As explained earlier (see the Dokmanović case), although the remedy of (final) release may indeed not be a proportionate remedy in this case, the judges do not explain how their conclusion can be reconciled with the strict application of the law, which stipulates that such violations lead to an unlawful detention (see also Swart 2001, p. 204 who explains that "a failure to promptly inform the person of the reasons for his arrest and of any charges against him makes his detention illegal"), which, in turn, according to para. 4 of Artt. 9 of the ICCPR or 5 of the ECHR, demands the remedy of release.

> that for the violation of his rights, the Appellant is entitled to a remedy which shall be given when judgement is rendered by the Trial Chamber, as follows: (a) If he is found not guilty, the Appellant shall be entitled to financial compensation; (b) If he is found guilty, the Appellant's sentence shall be reduced to take into account the violation of his rights, pursuant to Article 23 of the Statute.[1004]

Although this disposition is similar to the one of the second Barayagwiza case, Semanza's remedy was considerably smaller than the one of Barayagwiza (whose life sentence, it is recalled, was reduced to 35 years' imprisonment); when Semanza's substantive case was completed, his sentence (25 years' imprisonment) was reduced by six months.[1005]

Although it is not clear exactly how the judges arrived at this remedy and although this remedy may not seem very impressive to the suspect, it is to be welcomed that the judges seemingly did what every chamber should do, namely to properly examine the pre-transfer period of its case and to accord the suspect a remedy if his rights were violated in the context of the case, irrespective of who was responsible for these violations.

Perhaps, the fact that the judges in this case accorded a small remedy for the violations may also reassure people critical of granting remedies to suspects of international crimes that providing a remedy may not necessarily jeopardise the prosecution of that suspect. Although such remedies may and in fact should be granted in certain serious male captus cases, for example when the Tribunal itself is involved in a kidnapping, one can assume, or hope, that this will not happen too often. Normally, a (small) reduction of the (very often quite severe) sentence will suffice, hence ensuring that both the sense of justice of the person in question (in that his violations are remedied) and of the victims/the international community as a whole (in that a suspect of international crimes, if found guilty, receives an appropriate (which very often means stern) penalty for his deeds) are met.

3.2.3 Kajelijeli

The penultimate case in the ICTR context to be discussed here is that of Kajelijeli. On 5 June 1998, pursuant to Rule 40 of the ICTR RPE, Juvénal Kajelijeli was arrested by the authorities in Benin and put in custody.[1006] Almost three months

---

[1004] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, under 'Disposition', para. 6.

[1005] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor vs. Laurent Semanza, 'Judgement and Sentence', Case No. ICTR-97-20-T, 15 May 2003, para. 590. See also ibid., para. 580: "The Chamber has fully considered the nature of these violations. The total period of the violation of the Accused's right to be promptly informed of the charges lasted approximately thirty-six days, while the violation of his right to challenge his detention was found not to cause material prejudice. Considering the importance of these fundamental rights, the Chamber finds that it is appropriate to reduce the Accused's sentence by a period of six months."

[1006] See ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus J[u]v[é]nal Kajelijeli, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Arbitrary Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused and on the Defence Notice

later, on 29 August 1998, Kajelijeli's indictment was confirmed, charging him, and others (including André Rwamakuba whose case will be discussed after this one), with "Conspiracy to commit Genocide, Genocide, Complicity in Genocide, Direct and Public Incitement to commit Genocide, Crimes Against Humanity and Violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol II".[1007] A few days later, on 9 September 1998, Kajelijeli was transferred to the ICTR.[1008] Although his initial appearance was scheduled for 24 November 1998, this date was postponed several times and took place as late as 7 and 8 April 1999.[1009] However, already long before this date, namely on 9 November 1998, Kajelijeli had filed a motion challenging the lawfulness of his arrest and detention.[1010]

Kajelijeli complained 1) that he was arrested without a warrant and probable cause;[1011] 2) that he was denied the right to counsel during his interrogation in July 1998 in Benin;[1012] 3) that he was not promptly informed about the charges against him in a language he understands;[1013] and finally 4) that his right to an initial appearance without delay was violated.[1014] Because of these violations, counsel for Kajelijeli submitted that his client was "entitled to a right to remedy pursuant to Article 9 (4) of the ICCPR; Article 5 (4) of the ECPHR [here, another abbreviation for the ECHR is used, ChP] and Article 8 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights".[1015] This latter submission is very interesting for it is, surprisingly, one of the few where the Defence specifically refers to those human rights provisions which one would think would be used much more often by suspects claiming to have been the victims of an illegal arrest/detention, namely the habeas corpus provisions of the ICCPR and ECHR which unequivocally state that the judge must release a person if that person's detention is unlawful, see Subsection 4.2 of Chapter III.

The Prosecutor rejected these arguments and claimed, among other things, that "if the Accused has any complaint about his arrest, he can seek redress from the Benin Authorities, as the Tribunal has no jurisdiction".[1016] This, again, is of Urgent Motion to Expand and Supplement the Record of 8 December 1999 Hearing', Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, 8 May 2000, p. 2.

---

[1007] Ibid.

[1008] See ibid.

[1009] See ibid.

[1010] See ibid.

[1011] See ibid., para. 3.

[1012] See ibid., para. 9.

[1013] See ibid., para. 10. See also ibid.: "He was presented, for the first time: a confirmation of non-disclosure of the indictment; a warrant and a copy of a redacted indictment without his name being mentioned anywhere and without any identification of him, when he was transferred to Arusha on 9 September 1998. All the documents were in English, which he does not understand".

[1014] See ibid., para. 11.

[1015] Ibid.

[1016] Ibid., para. 17.

reminiscent of a case like Ngirumpatse, the reasoning of which seems to have been abandoned in cases such as Barayagwiza and Semanza.[1017]

The Ngirumpatse decision, and likewise the Karemera decision, were also referred to by the judges in Kajelijeli, namely in the context of Kajelijeli's first point; the judges found, after having stated that the ICTR RPE do not refer to "probable cause" but only to a "suspect",[1018] that, when arresting a "suspect", no warrant of arrest is needed.

This is because

> [a]t this stage, the manner and execution of arrest is an area within the States' responsibility. When the Prosecutor makes a request for the arrest of the Accused, the matter falls within the domain of the requested State and it is that State which organizes, controls and carries out the arrest in accordance with their domestic law. All these procedures were fulfilled in this case. The Accused was, therefore, properly arrested under Rule 40.[1019]

After this statement, the judges recalled the reasonings of Karemera[1020] and Ngirumpatse[1021] and stated that "[t]he Trial Chamber maintains its reasoning in the above cited cases on the issue of lack of warrant of arrest and is of the view that there is no good reason to depart from it".[1022] Furthermore, Kajelijeli "had not shown that any denial, whatsoever, has occurred to affect his right to immediately challenge the legality of his arrest in Benin".[1023] That may be so, but as national proceedings may not be used as an excuse to refuse the transfer of the person in question to the ICTR (unless one is of the opinion that transferring the suspect would lead to a ius cogens violation),[1024] national authorities will not permanently

---

[1017] This point will be further discussed when examining the Appeals Chamber's decision in Kajelijeli.

[1018] As a result, what is required is reliable information which tends to show that a person may have committed a crime over which the ICTR has jurisdiction. See ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus J[u]v[é]nal Kajelijeli, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Arbitrary Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused and on the Defence Notice of Urgent Motion to Expand and Supplement the Record of 8 December 1999 Hearing', Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, 8 May 2000, para. 32.

[1019] Ibid., para. 34.

[1020] See ibid., para. 35: "In [the] Karemera case, Trial Chamber II expressed the opinion that a request made by the Prosecutor is executed and controlled by the State authorities using their law enforcement organs (…). In that case, it was decided that "the Trial Chamber therefore, considers that it cannot provide any remedy concerning such arrest and custody as these are still matters within the jurisdiction of the requested State.""

[1021] See ibid.: "In the Ngirumpatse [c]ase a similar declaration was made. At para. 56, the Trial Chamber states that "the Tribunal is not competent to supervise the legality of arrest, custody, search and seizure executed by the requested State. The laws of the requested State may not require an arrest warrant or impose other legal conditions.""

[1022] Ibid.

[1023] Ibid., para. 36. The Prosecutor noted (ibid., para. 21) that "[t]he Accused made a request to the Benin Authorities to be released but they did not respond. The Prosecutor has no power over the Benin Authorities and she cannot compel the release of the Accused by those authorities."

[1024] See n. 24 and accompanying text. It must be clarified that even though some may assert that the right of a person to challenge the lawfulness of his detention can be considered a ius cogens norm (see n. 433 and accompanying text of Chapter III where Knoops argues that "the right to liberty [which, of release a person on the basis of a habeas corpus proceeding.[1025] In fact, Swart has already[1026] explained that "the arrested person's sole recourse is to a tribunal for habeas corpus or for obtaining interim release, since Rule 57 of the RPE of both ad hoc Tribunals leaves no discretion to States to decide on these matters".[1027] Rule 65 (A) of the ICTR RPE could also be mentioned here: "Once detained, an accused may not be provisionally released except upon an order of a Trial Chamber."[1028] Hence, the reference of both the Prosecutor[1029] and the judges to Kajelijeli's right to challenge the legality of his arrest and detention in Benin is quite odd.

With respect to the second point raised by Kajelijeli, namely that he was denied the right to counsel during his interrogation in July 1998 in Benin, the judges noted that "the Accused voluntarily waived his right to counsel at the time of the questioning".[1030]

The judges also looked at an issue which can be connected to this subject, but which was not mentioned by the Trial Chamber in its summary of the allegations of Kajelijeli, namely the fact that there was a delay in the assignment of his counsel.[1031] They were of the opinion that the process of assigning counsel to Kajelijeli was indeed prolonged but this was also caused by Kajelijeli himself, who had "abused course, includes the right to challenge the lawfulness of one's detention, ChP] is recognized as a jus cogens norm"), it can arguably not be said that a denial of this right by the national authorities can constitute a reason for the national judge, in the context of the ICTR, to refuse the transfer. A refusal to transfer the suspect is arguably only possible if the judge is of the opinion that the transfer to the ICTR itself would lead to a ius cogens violation. (Cf. also n. 203.)

---

[1025] As explained earlier, the habeas corpus provisions in human rights law only speak of a release as such and not of a permanent release/a release with prejudice. Hence, such a release does not have to lead to a refusal to transfer. Nevertheless, judges may be of the opinion that such serious procedural irregularities occurred in the arrest/detention that the person in question is to be released with prejudice to the OTP, hence blocking the possibility of transferring the person to the Tribunal.

[1026] See n. 44 and accompanying text.

[1027] Swart 2002 A, p. 1250.

[1028] See also n. 43, where reference was also made to the following words from Gallant 1994, p. 585, writing that the ICTY version of the rule "suggests that the arresting state has no authority to release the defendant pursuant to its own law."

[1029] See n. 1016.

[1030] ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus J[u]v[é]nal Kajelijeli, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Arbitrary Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused and on the Defence Notice of Urgent Motion to Expand and Supplement the Record of 8 December 1999 Hearing', Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, 8 May 2000, para. 39.

[1031] It appears that the Trial Chamber simply forgot to mention this allegation ('Right to Counsel generally'). The fact that the Trial Chamber first states that "[t]he Defence submitted that there were five major complaints against the Prosecutor, which are elaborated below." (Ibid., para. 1.) and then addresses only four complaints (namely 1) that he was arrested without a warrant and probable cause; 2) that he was denied the right to counsel during his interrogation in July 1998 in Benin; 3) that he was not promptly informed about the charges against him in a language he understands; and finally 4) that his right to have an initial appearance without delay was violated) may be additional proof for that assertion. Note that in the summary of the Prosecutor's response, the Trial Chamber did mention this point, see ibid., paras. 24-25.

his right to Counsel by not following the established procedure on the assignment of Counsel".[1032]

With respect to the complaint that Kajelijeli was not promptly informed about the charges against him in a language he understands, the Trial Chamber found "that, at the time of arrest, the Accused should have been informed of the reasons for his arrest by the Benin Authorities".[1033] After having stated that it was not certain whether this had in fact happened, the Trial Chamber quickly turned to the undisputed fact that Kajelijeli had received a warrant of arrest, a copy of the redacted indictment and an order for the non-disclosure of the indictment "while in Benin, before his transfer to the UNDF [United Nations Detention Facilities, ChP] on 9 September 1998".[1034] Although this seems correct,[1035] one can wonder whether the Trial Chamber can present this as an undisputed fact because Kajelijeli had (apparently incorrectly) argued that he had received these documents for the first time "when he was transferred to Arusha on 9 September 1998".[1036] Furthermore, the judges do not really explain how Kajelijeli's was promptly informed of the charges. Moreover, they forget to address the argument of Kajelijeli that he must not only be promptly informed, but also in a language he understands.

Concerning Kajelijeli's last complaint, that his right to an initial appearance without delay was violated, the judges opined that at the initial appearance, the judges must also be satisfied that Kajelijeli's right to counsel is respected.[1037] However, as already explained by the Trial Chamber, the assignment of counsel was also delayed by Kajelijeli himself. Thus, the judges concluded, "he stands to blame [1032] Ibid., para. 41. See also ibid., para. 40: "It is clear that serious efforts were made by the Registry to secure an assigned Counsel for the Accused. It is also true that the Accused frustrated these efforts by selecting Counsel whose names were not on the Registrar's drawn up list."

[1033] Ibid., para. 42.
[1034] Ibid.
[1035] See also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 210: "In total, the Appellant was in the custody of the authorities of Benin from the date of his initial arrest until his transfer to the custody of the Tribunal for 95 days. During this period, the Appellant was in the custody of Benin authorities for 85 days before being served with an arrest warrant or a confirmed indictment." That would mean that Kajelijeli was served with these documents 10 days before his transfer on 9 September 1998, on 30 August 1998. See also ibid., para. 231 for a less clear conclusion: "The evidence on the record indicates that the Appellant was never informed by a Judge of the charges against him, even provisionally, until sometime between 29 August 1998 and 7 September 1998, when he was formally served with an arrest warrant and a copy of the redacted indictment against him from the Tribunal [original footnote omitted, ChP]."
[1036] See n. 1013. The following words do not contradict this as 9 September 1998 is, of course, also falling in the period after 29 August 1998: "The Appellant notes that it was not until after 29 August 1998 that he was served in Benin with copies of a warrant for his arrest, an order of surrender, an order of confirmation and non-disclosure, and a redacted version of the amended indictment from the Tribunal." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 212.)
[1037] See ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus J[u]v[é]nal Kajelijeli, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Arbitrary Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused and on the Defence Notice of Urgent Motion to Expand and Supplement the Record of 8 December 1999 Hearing', Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, 8 May 2000, para. 45.

for the delay in his initial appearance, which is inter-twined to the issue of the assignment of Counsel".[1038]

As a result, Kajelijeli's motion was dismissed. Kajelijeli subsequently filed a notice of appeal but this was dismissed by the Appeals Chamber on 10 August 2000 as it "lacked specificity in that it did not mention any ground of appeal or the relief sought, and that the Appellant failed to cure this deficiency within the deadline it had set for doing so".[1039]

Hence, Kajelijeli filed a second challenge to the jurisdiction of the ICTR, but this challenge was also rejected by Trial Chamber II, which noted "that these issues are res judicata, as they were decided upon by the Trial Chamber in its Decision of 8 May 2000".[1040]

When Kajelijeli appealed this decision, the Appeals Chamber, in its decision of 16 November 2001,

> declined to comment on the Appellant's arguments contesting the Tribunal's personal jurisdiction noting that an appeal on that issue had already been dismissed. The Appeals Chamber indicated that at a later stage in the trial, the Appellant could raise before the Trial Chamber all issues relating to his fundamental rights and any demands for reparation [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[1041]

When Kajelijeli's substantive case was about to be brought to an end, the Appeals Chamber stated that it now had to find out whether, taking its earlier decisions of 10 August 2000 and 16 November 2001 into account, it could perhaps "reconsider the arguments addressed therein in considering the Appellant's submission under this ground of appeal that the Trial Chamber erred in rejecting them and in finding that it had jurisdiction".[1042]

It decided that Kajelijeli could not re-litigate the issue of the ICTR's personal jurisdiction[1043] and explained that even if the judges were to reconsider it, this would not lead to a refusal of jurisdiction.[1044] This was because Kajelijeli's violations – in contrast to their colleagues at the Trial Chamber level, the judges of the Appeals

---

[1038] Ibid.
[1039] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 199.
[1040] ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus Juvénal Kajelijeli, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Objecting to the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-T, 13 March 2001, para. 6.
[1041] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 200.
[1042] Ibid., para. 201.
[1043] See ibid., para. 205. The judges explained in that respect (ibid.): "The Appeals Chamber squarely held, in its 16 November 2001 decision, that the Appellant procedurally lost his entitlement to raise his personal jurisdiction objection by failing to file a sufficiently specific notice of appeal, even after the Appeals Chamber had allowed him extra time to do so after his initial failure. This holding disposed of the personal jurisdiction objection. The Appellant has not demonstrated any cause to reconsider this determination on a discretionary basis: there is no clear error in the Appeals Chamber's reasoning, nor is reconsideration necessary to prevent an injustice."
[1044] See ibid., para. 206.

Chamber had proprio motu[1045] established that his "rights were in fact violated during his initial arrest and detention prior to his initial appearance"[1046] – did not meet the male detentus test as established by the Barayagwiza and Nikolić cases:

> [E]ven if it were to reconsider the issue of its personal jurisdiction, the Appeals Chamber does not find that these newly and more detailed submitted breaches rise to the requisite level of egregiousness amounting to the Tribunal's loss of personal jurisdiction. The Appeals Chamber is mindful that it must maintain the correct balance between "the fundamental rights of the accused and the essential interests of the international community in the prosecution of persons charged with serious violations of international humanitarian law." While a Chamber may use its discretion under the circumstances of a case to decline to exercise jurisdiction, it should only do so "where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity." For example, "in circumstances where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subject to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment." However, those cases are exceptional and, in most circumstances, the "remedy of setting aside jurisdiction, will . . . be disproportionate." The Appeals Chamber gives due weight to the violations alleged by the Appellant; however, it does not consider that this case falls within the exceptional category of cases highlighted above [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[1047]

It must be noted that the Appeals Chamber, even though it does not exclude the fact that serious violations of a suspect's human rights (without serious mistreatment) can lead to the ending of the case,[1048] again (see also the Nikolić case) focuses here on the more 'physical' dimension ("very serious mistreatment") of the male detentus test.

That is, of course, unproblematic, but one must be careful that the male detentus test, by constantly focusing on this dimension, is not slowly transforming into a 'torture test'. As argued before, there may be other male captus situations not involving serious mistreatment which should also lead to the ending of the case, such as an abduction (not involving serious mistreatment) orchestrated by OTP staff.

Even though the violations did not lead to a male detentus outcome, what was the exact opinion of the Appeals Chamber judges on these violations and their consequences for this case?

The judges divided the violations in two different periods, namely 1) between his arrest and transfer to the ICTR and 2) between his transfer and his initial appearance.

[1045] See ibid., para. 208.
[1046] Ibid., para. 206.
[1047] Ibid.
[1048] See the words "[f]or example" as in: "While a Chamber may use its discretion under the circumstances of a case to decline to exercise jurisdiction, it should only do so "where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity." For example, "in circumstances where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subject to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment.""

With respect to the first period, the judges examined three issues, namely 1) the arrest and the right to be promptly informed of the reasons for the arrest; 2) Kajelijeli's detention in Benin and 3) Kajelijeli's right to counsel during questioning. The second period covered two issues, namely 1) the right to counsel and 2) the right to an initial appearance.

However, before it addressed issue number one, it first noted a number of what it called undisputed facts.

These included that Kajelijeli had been detained by the Benin authorities for 95 days and that it had taken 85 days before he was served with an arrest warrant or a confirmed indictment.[1049] This also means that Kajelijeli had been served with these documents ten days before he was transferred to Arusha. Even though this may, of course, be true,[1050] it is hard to see how this point can be presented as an undisputed fact – see also footnote 1036 and accompanying text – since Kajelijeli had claimed that he had only received these documents for the first time "when he was transferred to Arusha on 9 September 1998".[1051]

Be that as it may, the judges also made a few general remarks, for example, that "under Rule 40 of the Rules, the Prosecution and Benin had overlapping responsibilities during the first period of the Appellant's arrest and detention in Benin".[1052] This, the judges continued, > flows from the rationale that the international division of labour in prosecuting crimes must not be to the detriment of the apprehended person. Under the prosecutorial duty of due diligence, the Prosecution is required to ensure that, once it initiates a case, "the case proceeds to trial in a way that respects the rights of the accused [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[1053]

This statement by the Kajelijeli Appeals Chamber, which includes a quotation from the first Barayagwiza decision,[1054] must be applauded for it clearly stresses the importance alluded to earlier that the suspect must not become the victim of the fact that the legal proceedings of his case are fragmented over two or more jurisdictions.[1055]

Returning to the overlapping responsibilities during the first period of arrest and detention in the State concerned,[1056] the Appeals Chamber explained that this means

---

[1049] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 210.
[1050] See also n. 1035 and accompanying text.
[1051] See n. 1013.
[1052] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 220.
[1053] Ibid.
[1054] See n. 865 and accompanying text.
[1055] See n. 199 and accompanying text. (See also ns. 231-232 and accompanying text of Chapter III and n. 843 of the present chapter.)
[1056] See also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 221: "[A] shared burden exists with regard to safeguarding the suspect's fundamental rights in international cooperation on criminal matters."

that the national judge can and must also safeguard several fundamental rights of the suspect,[1057] but that it is not this judge's task to go into the merits of the case:

> He or she would not know the reasons for the detention in the absence of a provisional or final arrest warrant issued by the requesting State or the Tribunal. This responsibility is vested with the judiciary of the requesting State, or in this case, a Judge of the Tribunal, as they bear principal responsibility for the deprivation of liberty of the person they requested to be surrendered.[1058]

It can be argued that the words quoted above, that the ICTR bears principal responsibility for the deprivation of liberty of the person, is valid for the entire deprivation of liberty. Hence, not only for the substantive part, but also for the procedural part (even though that latter part is factually executed by others).

The judges recalled the commendable and previously mentioned[1059] words of Judge Lal Chand Vohrah in the Semanza case that > if an accused is arrested or detained by a state at the request or under the authority of the Tribunal even though the accused is not yet within the actual custody of the Tribunal, the Tribunal has a responsibility to provide whatever relief is available to it to attempt to reduce any violations as much as possible (…).[1060]

They then turned to the first issue (the arrest and the right to be promptly informed of the reasons for the arrest) of the first period (between his arrest and transfer).

The Appeals Chamber first noted that the Trial Chamber had found that Kajelijeli's arrest was not arbitrary or in violation of due process of law;[1061] Rule 40 of the ICTR RPE had been adhered to[1062] and, with respect to the exact "manner and execution of the arrest pursuant to the Prosecutor's request",[1063] this was the domain of the State over which the Tribunal had no control:

[1057] See ibid. For example, "[a] Judge of the requested State is called upon to communicate to the detainee the request for surrender (or extradition) and make him or her familiar with any charge, to verify the suspect's identity, to examine any obvious challenges to the case, to inquire into the medical condition of the suspect, and to notify a person enjoying the confidence of the detainee and consular officers [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)

[1058] Ibid.

[1059] See ns. 834 and 985.

[1060] However, as commendable as these words are, it is submitted that judges should also take their responsibility for irregularities which can be seen to fall within the notion of "within the context of the Tribunal case" but which are not triggered by the fact that a request for arrest and detention has been issued by the Tribunal. This was not excluded by Judge Lal Chand Vohrah, by the way, see again ns. 834 and 985, where it was explained that this Judge further noted that "[r]esponsibility and authority to redress violations occurring at a time when the accused was not detained under Tribunal request or authority would need to be considered on a case by case basis." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, Declaration by Judge Lal Chand Vohrah, para. 7, n. 7.)

[1061] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 225.

[1062] See ibid.

[1063] Ibid.

> [T]he Trial Chamber held that responsibility lies with the cooperating State to organize, control, and carry out the arrest in accordance with its domestic law. The Trial Chamber found that there was no violation of the Appellant's right to be promptly informed of the reasons for his arrest and of the charges against him. The Trial Chamber noted that responsibility for promptly informing the Appellant of the reasons for his arrest lay with the Benin authorities, and it was disputed whether or not information was passed to the Appellant at the time of his arrest.[1064]

It was noted earlier that this reasoning, which was also expressed in cases such as Karemera and Ngirumpatse, appears to be in violation of cases such as Barayagwiza and Semanza (Appeals Chamber) where the judges examined the pre-transfer phase of their case and seemingly took responsibility (by granting remedies) for any violation committed in the context of their case.

The Appeals Chamber in Kajelijeli apparently supports this stance because it did not agree with the above-mentioned reasoning of the Trial Chamber. Although Rule 40 of the ICTR RPE was not violated in this case, "the manner in which the arrest was carried out was not according to due process of law because the Appellant was not promptly informed of the reasons for his arrest".[1065] Hence, the fact that the national authorities had not informed Kajelijeli entailed a breach of his rights.[1066] This means that Tribunal does what it arguably should do, namely taking into account pre-transfer violations committed in the context of its case (such as violations occurring in the context of the Tribunal's constructive custody), even if the Prosecutor was not, strictly speaking,[1067] responsible for these violations.

With respect to the second issue (Kajelijeli's detention in Benin) of the first period (between his arrest and transfer), the judges concluded that the Trial Chamber > erred in failing to find that his detention in Benin for a total of 85 days without charge and without being brought promptly before a Judge was clearly unlawful and was in violation of his rights under the Tribunal's Statute and Rules as well as international human rights law.[1068]

[1064] Ibid.

[1065] Ibid., para. 226. The Appeals Chamber hereby referred to the already-mentioned (see ns. 969-970 and accompanying text) observation by the Appeals Chamber in Semanza that "a suspect arrested at the behest of the Tribunal has a right to be promptly informed of the reasons for his or her arrest, and this right comes into effect from the moment of arrest and detention [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)

[1066] See ibid., para. 227: "The Appellant claims in this appeal that at the time of the arrest, he asked the Benin authorities as to the reasons for his arrest and was informed that he would find them out at a later date. The Prosecution failed to rebut this argument. Consequently, the Appeals Chamber finds that in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the Appellant's right to be informed of the reasons as to why he was being deprived of his liberty was not properly guaranteed [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[1067] Nevertheless, it can again be maintained that the Prosecutor can be seen as generally responsible for every violation taking place within this constructive custody (or better: within the context of the Tribunal case more generally).

[1068] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 231.

For these violations, the judges continued, the Prosecution was responsible because the latter "failed to make a request within a reasonable time under Rules 40 and 40*bis* for the Appellant's provisional arrest and transfer to the Tribunal".[1069] With respect to the responsibility of the Prosecution for Kajelijeli's violated right to be brought promptly before a judge, the judges clarified that this violation was not solely attributable to the Prosecution. Hence, the violation could also be attributed in part to the national authorities. However, the Prosecution was nevertheless to be held responsible in general as "it was the Prosecution, thus an organ of the Tribunal, which was the requesting institution responsible for triggering the Appellant's apprehension, arrest and detention in Benin".[1070] This statement, which was also used by Karadžić,[1071] can again be seen as a confirmation of the view that the Prosecution is to be held generally responsible for pre-transfer violations committed in the context of a Tribunal case (such as in this case: violations occurring in the constructive custody of the Tribunal), irrespective of the question as to exactly which entity the violation could be attributed.[1072]

Concerning the third issue (Kajelijeli's right to counsel during questioning) of the first period (between his arrest and transfer), the judges simply agreed with the Trial Chamber that there was no violation of this right as Kajelijeli had not challenged "the Trial Chamber's conclusion that there had been voluntary waiver or his concession of the same".[1073]

With respect to the second period (between the transfer and the initial appearance), it is recalled that the Appeals Chamber looked at two issues, namely 1) the right to counsel and 2) the right to an initial appearance.

However, as with the first period, before the judges went to address issue number one of this second period, they first noted a number of undisputed facts. For example, the fact that Kajelijeli "was in the custody of the Tribunal for a total of 211 days prior to any initial appearance during which he was without assigned counsel for 147 days".[1074]

Turning to the first issue in the context of the second period, the judges concluded, in contrast to their colleagues from the Trial Chamber, that Kajelijeli's right to counsel had in fact been violated because "[i]t constitutes a violation (...) not

[1069] Ibid.
[1070] Ibid., para. 232.
[1071] See n. 793 and accompanying text.
[1072] Hence, what is important is that, if a violation is identified in the context of a Tribunal case (for example, after the Prosecutor has requested the national State to provisionally arrest a person), that violation is consequently repaired by the now prosecuting forum, the Tribunal, irrespective of who committed the violation. However, this does not mean that the Tribunal will express itself on whether the party which (seems to have) committed this violation is also legally responsible for it. That is clearly a domain which is not for the Tribunal to enter, see also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 252, where the judges summarised their findings, without going into or "irrespective of any responsibility of Benin for violations of the Appellant's rights during the first period of arrest and detention, on which this Tribunal does not have competence to pronounce".
[1073] Ibid., para. 236.
[1074] Ibid., para. 237.

to assign duty counsel, in spite of ongoing efforts to assign counsel of choice in light of the outstanding initial appearance".[1075]

With respect to the second issue of this period, the right to an initial appearance, the judges, again, disagreed with the Trial Chamber. In fact, they held that "the 211-day delay between the Appellant's transfer to the Tribunal and the initial appearance before a Judge of this Tribunal constitutes extreme undue delay".[1076] The problems with respect to assigning counsel to Kajelijeli did not change this.[1077]

Now that the five issues, divided over two periods of time, had been examined, the judges turned to the conclusion. In this context, the judges stated, among other things:

> [T]he Appeals Chamber finds that fault is attributable to the Prosecution for violations to the Appellant's rights during this first period of arrest and detention. The Prosecution failed to effect its prosecutorial duties with due diligence out of respect for the Appellant's rights following its Rule 40 request to Benin. Thus, the Appellant is entitled to a remedy from the Tribunal.[1078]

As earlier explained in the context of the Karadžić case (see the text following footnote 784 and accompanying text), this is a tricky remark as it seems to connect the granting of remedies with the attribution of certain violations to the Prosecutor, note the word "[t]hus". Of course, it is obvious that if certain violations can be attributed to the Prosecutor, then the suspect is entitled to a remedy. However, the more interesting question is whether these words imply that the suspect is only entitled to a remedy if certain violations can be attributed to the Prosecutor. As has become clear from discussion of this case, this study is of the opinion that the decision provides enough room for the interpretation that the Tribunal is of the opinion that all violations in the context of a certain case (which in this case happened as from the constructive custody) must be remedied, irrespective of the question as to exactly which entity the violation could be attributed. Recall in this respect, for example, the following statement, made by the Appeals Chamber in the context of Kajelijeli's right to be promptly brought before a judge:

> [A]lthough the violation is not solely attributable to the Tribunal, it has to be recalled that it was the Prosecution, thus an organ of the Tribunal, which was the requesting institution responsible for triggering the Appellant's apprehension, arrest and detention in Benin.[1079]

Thus, the fact that the Prosecutor initiated the case means that it must take the general responsibility for violations which occur in the context of its case,

[1075] Ibid., para. 245.
[1076] Ibid., para. 250.
[1077] See ibid., para. 248.
[1078] Ibid., para. 252.
[1079] Ibid., para. 232. See also n. 1070 and accompanying text.

irrespective of the question as to exactly which entity the violation could be attributed.

This is arguably also confirmed by the final words of this part of the Kajelijeli decision, when the judges repeated the reasonings of their colleagues in the Barayagwiza and Semanza (Appeals Chamber) cases[1080] that "any violation of the accused's rights entails the provision of an effective remedy pursuant to Article 2(3)(a) of the ICCPR [emphasis added, ChP]".[1081]

In the end, they concluded, in conformity with the Barayagwiza (Appeals Chamber) and Semanza (Appeals Chamber) cases, that > where the Appeals Chamber has found on interlocutory appeal that an accused's rights have been violated, but not egregiously so, it will order the Trial Chamber to reduce the accused's sentence if the accused is found guilty at trial. With this in mind, the Appeals Chamber will take into consideration its findings here on violations of the Appellant's rights when it turns to the task of determining the Appellant's sentence in this Judgement in order to provide for an appropriate remedy [original footnote omitted, ChP].[1082]

The remedy was considerable, although the remaining sentence was still so severe that it is unlikely that Kajelijeli will ever be a free man again:

> The Appeals Chamber finds that under the circumstances of this case, in view of the serious violations of the Appellant's fundamental rights during his arrest and detention in Benin and the UNDF from 5 June 1998 to 6 April 1999, and considering the Appellant's entitlement to an effective remedy for those violations under the Tribunal's law and jurisprudence and Article 2(3)(a) of the ICCPR, the Appellant's two life sentences and fifteen years' sentence as imposed by the Trial Chamber shall be set aside and converted into a single sentence consisting of a fixed term of imprisonment of 45 years.[1083]

Before turning to the final case in the ICTR context, it may be interesting to note that the Appeals Chamber speaks here of "serious violations of the Appellant's fundamental rights [emphasis added, ChP]". In the disposition, the judges also stated "that the Appellant's fundamental rights were seriously violated [emphasis added, ChP]".[1084]

The fact that the Appeals Chamber did not refuse jurisdiction in this case, notwithstanding the fact that Tribunal was of the opinion that the suspect's rights

---

[1080] See ns. 919 and 997 and accompanying text, respectively.

[1081] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 255. See also ibid., para. 322: "Where a suspect or an accused's rights have been violated during the period of his unlawful detention pending transfer and trial, Article 2(3)(a) of the ICCPR stipulates that "[a]ny person whose rights or freedoms as herein recognized are violated shall have an effective remedy, notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity."" See for Art. 2, para. 3 (a) of the ICCPR also n. 575 of Chapter III.

[1082] Ibid., para. 255.

[1083] Ibid., para. 324.

[1084] Ibid., para. 325.

were seriously violated/that serious violations of the suspect's rights had occurred, can be seen as additional proof for the fact that the serious/egregious test as presented by the Nikolić case is indeed a very restrictive test which will probably not be met in the case of 'normal' serious human rights violations (see the outcome of Kajelijeli) but probably only in such serious cases as those in which the suspect is, for example, seriously mistreated (involving torture-like conditions). As explained earlier, one should be careful that this test does not become too restrictive; there may still be situations which do not involve serious mistreatment, but which should nevertheless lead to a male detentus outcome, for example, if the Tribunal itself is involved in a kidnapping or when third parties are responsible for serious violations/irregularities not involving serious mistreatment.

3.2.4 Rwamakuba

The final case in the ICTR context to be discussed here is that of Rwamakuba. On 2 August 1995, André Rwamakuba was arrested and detained by the authorities in Namibia.[1085] Almost five months later, on 22 December 1995, the ICTR's OTP "contacted the Namibian authorities for the Accused to be kept in custody pending further information by their services".[1086] However, on 18 January 1996, the OTP informed the Namibians that they had no evidence against Rwamakuba, as a result of which the latter was released by the Namibian authorities on 8 February 1996.[1087]

Nevertheless, on 29 August 1998, Rwamakuba's indictment was confirmed – charging him with the same crimes with which Kajelijeli was charged[1088] – and after an order for his arrest and transfer was issued on 8 October 1998, he was arrested on 21 October in Namibia and transferred to the ICTR the next day.[1089] It was not until more than five months later, on 7 April 1999, that Rwamakuba's initial appearance took place,[1090] showing that the ICTR seems to have great difficulty in bringing persons before a judge of the ICTR as soon as possible.

The Defence claimed, among other things, 1) that Rwamakuba's arrest was carried out on the basis of a formal request from the OTP pursuant to Rule 40 of the ICTR RPE, thus ensuring that "[a]ny irregularities pertaining to both the arrest and the subsequent detention of the Accused in Namibia from 2 August 1995 to 7 February 1996 are (...) attributable to the Tribunal";[1091] 2) that his arrest was illegal "in the absence of any proof against the Accused to consider him a suspect, let alone

[1085] See ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba et alia, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Illegal Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused', Case No. ICTR-98-44-T, 12 December 2000, p. 2.
[1086] Ibid.
[1087] See ibid.
[1088] See n. 1007 and accompanying text.
[1089] See ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba et alia, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Illegal Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused', Case No. ICTR-98-44-T, 12 December 2000, p. 2.
[1090] See ibid.
[1091] Ibid.

ask for his arrest";[1092] 3) that during his detention, "several of his individual rights were violated",[1093] namely that he had not received assistance of a counsel, that he was not brought before a judge and that no indictment was issued against him;[1094] 4) that his second arrest in 1998 (after his release in 1996 in the absence of evidence against him) shows "a lack of diligence in the Prosecutor's handling of this case, resulting, notably, in the violation of his right to a speedy trial";[1095] 5) that there was a 135-day delay between his second arrest/transfer and his initial appearance and, moreover, a delay in providing him with a counsel and that both delays "are substantial enough in themselves to warrant the loss of jurisdiction of the Tribunal over the Accused and, consequently, his release and the dismissal of all charges against him";[1096] and 6) that, in any case, this remedy had to be granted in view of "[t]he cumulation of all these violations of the individual rights of the Accused".[1097]

The Prosecution countered these arguments, saying that it "did not direct or otherwise cause the August 1995 arrest".[1098] According to the OTP, former Prosecutor Goldstone only learnt of Rwamakuba's arrest four months after it had happened, as a result of which he sent the Namibians a letter, dated 22 December 1995, > asking them to continue detaining the Accused pending further information under the regime of their municipal laws rather than on behalf of the Tribunal. Therefore, the Accused was not detained at the behest of the Tribunal in 1995/1996, which has no jurisdiction over alleged irregularities in this respect.[1099]

Regarding the delay between Rwamakuba's transfer and his initial appearance, the Prosecution explained that this was not only caused by the judicial recess but also by Rwamakuba himself who had delayed appointment of his counsel.[1100] The Prosecution felt that Rwamakuba could "not claim for responsibility of the Tribunal with respect to a delay for which he is partly responsible".[1101]

The judges first examined whether the ICTR had jurisdiction over the conditions of Rwamakuba's detention in Namibia in 1995 and 1996. In this context, they recalled the reasoning of cases such as Karemera, Ngirumpatse, Kajelijeli (the decision of 8 May 2000), Nzirorera and Nyiramasuhuko that "as a rule, the Tribunal has consistently held that it had no jurisdiction over the conditions of any arrest, detention or other measures carried out by a sovereign State at the request of the Tribunal".[1102] However, the judges continued,

---

[1092] Ibid., para. 3.
[1093] Ibid., para. 4.
[1094] See ibid.
[1095] Ibid., para. 5.
[1096] Ibid., para. 6.
[1097] Ibid., para. 7.
[1098] Ibid., para. 8.
[1099] Ibid.
[1100] See ibid., para. 9.
[1101] Ibid.
[1102] Ibid., para. 22.

> [a]s far as detention in a State is concerned (...), these holdings have to be read in the light of the Bar[a]yagwiza Decision of 3 November 1999 (...) where the Appeals Chamber (...) held that "under the facts of this case, Cameroon was holding [him] in the "constructive custody" of the Tribunal by virtue of the Tribunal's lawful process or authority". Although the notion of one's "constructive custody" was not explicitly referred to in its subsequent Semanza Decision of 31 May 2000, which addressed in essence the same issues, the Appeals Chamber applied some of the consequences drawn from the notion of constructive custody in its Barayagwiza Decision of 3 November 1999 in the Semanza Decision as well. Among these consequences are the responsibility of the Tribunal for some aspects of the detention of such an individual detained at its behest, while specific timeframes under the Rules run with respect to the "constructive detainee" of the Tribunal, prior to his transfer to the UNDF, notably with respect to his right to be promptly informed of the nature of the charges against him [emphasis in original, ChP].[1103]

It can be argued that this is not entirely correct since the judges in the Barayagwiza case even took responsibility for violations committed beyond the constructive custody period/the period during which Barayagwiza was detained at the behest of the ICTR.[1104] In addition, the cases of Barayagwiza and Semanza (Appeals Chamber) can arguably be viewed as support for the broader idea that the Tribunal must take responsibility for all wrongs committed in the context of a Tribunal case.

Be that as it may, it appears that the judges in Rwamakuba would nevertheless take their responsibility for parts of the detention of Rwamakuba, even if violations in this context could not, strictly speaking, be attributed to the Tribunal, as long as the detention was at the behest of the ICTR. This is at least something. However, in this specific case, the judges were of the opinion that Rwamakuba had not been arrested and detained on 2 August 1995 at the behest of the ICTR.[1105] Furthermore, they established that the ICTR Prosecutor was only informed of Rwamakuba's detention as from 21 December 1995.[1106] As a result, the judges concluded that the Prosecutor was not responsible for Rwamakuba's detention between 2 August 1995 and 22 December 1995,[1107] that the ICTR had no jurisdiction over the conditions of

[1103] Ibid., para. 23.
[1104] See ns. 857 and 919 and accompanying text.
[1105] See ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba et alia, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Illegal Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused', Case No. ICTR-98-44-T, 12 December 2000, para. 27: "The Trial Chamber (…) finds that no such evidence was brought by the Defence that the Namibian authorities so acted to abide, more specifically, by a formal request from the Prosecutor pursuant to Rule 40 of the Rules, in the form of a list of suspects including the Accused's name, notified to the State of Namibia by the Prosecutor, and requesting States to arrest and detain the suspects in question. (…) Being thus satisfied, in view of the arguments and the material submitted by both Parties, that the Namibian Authorities did not act on the basis of a list of suspects circulated by the Prosecutor prior to the Accused's arrest of 1995, the Trial Chamber does not find it necessary to request, pursuant to Article 28 of the Statute, the said authorities for further clarifications on the circumstances of the arrest and detention of the Accused in 1995 and 1996, as asked by the Defence."
[1106] See ibid., para. 30.
[1107] See ibid.

that period of detention and that "any challenges in this respect [were] to be brought before the Namibian jurisdictions".[1108]

The judges concluded the same with respect to the period between 22 December 1995 and 18 January 1996 (when the OTP informed the Namibians that they had no evidence against Rwamakuba), because "the letter [of 22 December 1995, ChP] does not amount to a request under Rule 40 to detain the Accused on behalf of the Tribunal".[1109]

It may very well be that Rwamakuba was not arrested and detained at the request of the ICTR, but perhaps the more interesting question the judges could have asked themselves, see also the point mentioned supra, is whether the arrest and detention by the Namibians could in any way be seen as falling within the context of the ICTR case more generally. If that were not the case, then the ICTR, of course, does not need to take responsibility for irregularities committed in the course of that arrest/detention, but if were the case, then the Tribunal should arguably take responsibility.

With respect to the delay between Rwamakuba's transfer (22 October 1998) and initial appearance (7 April 1999), the judges first of all noted that one had to look at the date between the transfer and (no later than) 10 March 1999 as counsel of Rwamakuba (and counsels of the other co-accused) had requested that the initial appearance, planned for 10 March 1999, be adjourned to 7 April 1999.[1110] However, "[e]ven so, it clearly appears that the Accused's initial appearance was not scheduled (…) "without delay" (…) as more than four months and a half had elapsed since his transfer".[1111] Nevertheless, the judges noted "that this delay is mainly attributable to the difficulties in having a Counsel assigned to the Accused"[1112] and that "the Registrar took reasonable steps so as to have a Counsel assigned to the Accused in due time following his transfer to the Tribunal".[1113] As a result, the Registry was not responsible for the delay in assigning counsel to Rwamakuba.[1114] Nevertheless, a suspect's right to legal assistance is broader than just having the counsel of his choice assigned to him; the Registry has also a duty, as from the moment of transfer, of assigning a duty counsel to the suspect pending nomination of the 'real' counsel.[1115] The judges concluded that the Registry had failed in that respect and that

[1108] Ibid.
[1109] Ibid., para. 33. See also ibid.: "[T]he words used by the Prosecutor do not suggest that, upon being notified of the Accused's detention in Namibia, he considered him a suspect before the Tribunal. On the contrary, the letter suggests that the Prosecutor did not even know whether the Accused could be considered a suspect. Besides, the Trial Chamber notes that the Prosecutor, in this letter, did not ask for the continued detention of the Accused on behalf of the Tribunal, but rather envisaged such possibility under the regime of the Namibian laws, "if [these] laws permit this" [emphasis in original, ChP]."
[1110] See ibid., para. 35.
[1111] Ibid., para. 36.
[1112] Ibid.
[1113] Ibid., para. 40.
[1114] See ibid.
[1115] See ibid., para. 41.

> [t]his omission resulted in the absence of any legal assistance for the Accused over an extended period of time in contradiction with, notably, Article 20(4)(c) of the Statute [the right to be tried without undue delay, ChP], and, further, in the delay in the Accused's initial appearance.[1116]

However, notwithstanding the fact that this delay in assigning a duty counsel constituted "a violation of one of the Accused's fundamental rights"[1117] and had caused the delay in his initial appearance, the judges were also of the opinion that it had not caused Rwamakuba "a serious and irreparable prejudice".[1118] Thus, Rwamakuba's request to be immediately and unconditionally released was dismissed.

Rwamakuba appealed, but in 2001, a bench of the Appeals Chamber, for procedural reasons, dismissed his appeal. Nevertheless, the judges clarified "that it is open to the Appellant to invoke the issue of the alleged violation of his fundamental human rights by the Tribunal in order to seek reparation as the case may be, at the appropriate time".[1119]

When more than five years later Trial Chamber III rendered judgment in this case, it found that Rwamakuba was not guilty of the (amended) charges, namely genocide, complicity in genocide and crimes against humanity (extermination and murder) and thus that he had to be acquitted.[1120]

With respect to the observation of the Appeals Chamber in 2001 "that it is open to the Appellant to invoke the issue of the alleged violation of his fundamental human rights by the Tribunal in order to seek reparation as the case may be, at the appropriate time", the judges of Trial Chamber III first of all noted that Trial Chamber II had found in 2000 that Rwamakuba's right to legal assistance had been violated – Trial Chamber III appears to forget here that Trial Chamber II was also of the opinion that the delay in assigning a duty counsel to Rwamakuba was in contradiction with the latter's right to be tried without undue delay[1121] – and that the delay in assigning a duty counsel to him had caused a delay in his initial appearance.[1122] It then repeated the words of the Appeals Chamber in cases such as Barayagwiza, Semanza and Kajelijeli[1123] that every violation must be effectively remedied[1124] – note, however, the previously mentioned point that even though these

---

[1116] Ibid., para. 43.
[1117] Ibid., para. 45.
[1118] Ibid., para. 44.
[1119] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, André Rwamakuba v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision (Appeal Against Dismissal of Motion Concerning Illegal Arrest and Detention)', Case No. ICTR-98-44-A, 11 June 2001, p. 4.
[1120] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 20 September 2006, under 'Chapter IV – Verdict', I.
[1121] See n. 1116 and accompanying text.
[1122] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 20 September 2006, para. 217.
[1123] See ns. 919, 997 and 1081 and accompanying text.
[1124] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 20 September 2006, para. 218.

words are rather generally formulated, they were also made in the context of a case which involved violations for which the ICTR was clearly responsible – and remarked that the judges in Barayagwiza and Semanza had decided that if the person in question were found to be not guilty, then he had to receive financial compensation.[1125] Finally, it concluded that "[s]ince a violation of the Accused's right to legal assistance during the first months of his detention was found,[1126] André Rwamakuba is at liberty to file an application seeking an appropriate remedy".[1127]

Rwamakuba consequently filed an application, in which he requested not only an appropriate remedy for the violation of his right to legal assistance "but also for the alleged grave and manifest injustice occasioned".[1128] He was of the opinion that he "was indicted and prosecuted on false and manipulative evidence"[1129] and that "this circumstance, combined with the length of his pre-trial and trial detention which amounts to a total of nine years, constitutes a miscarriage of justice [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[1130] Rwamakuba requested the judges to order that the Registry:

> (i) provide Rwamakuba with an apology; (ii) seek the good offices of the State where Rwamakuba's family is present to facilitate some temporary status for him in that State; (iii) seek the good offices of that State to ensure the uninterrupted schooling of Rwamakuba's children; and (iv) provide financial compensation to Rwamakuba [original footnote omitted, ChP].[1131]

Regarding the violation of his right to legal assistance, Rwamakuba more specifically requested "financial compensation covering a minimum of 2,000 US dollars (USD) per month for loss of earnings and 10,000 USD for emotional stress [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[1132]

The judges first of all noted that Trial Chamber III, in its judgement of 2006, had not stated that grave and manifest injustice had occurred which could be used to seek a remedy, but they were also of the opinion that it was nevertheless "in the interests of justice to discuss it since it could pertain to the fundamental rights of a former accused of the Tribunal."[1133]

[1125] See ibid.
[1126] Note, however, that Trial Chamber II was also of the opinion that the delay in assigning a duty counsel to Rwamakuba was in contradiction with the latter's right to be tried without undue delay, see ns. 1116 and 1121 and accompanying text.
[1127] ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 20 September 2006, para. 220.
[1128] ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007, para. 5.
[1129] Ibid., para. 19.
[1130] Ibid.
[1131] Ibid., para. 5.
[1132] Ibid.
[1133] Ibid., para. 13.

However, in their discussion of this request, in which Rwamakuba also referred to Article 85, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute,[1134] the judges explained, whilst underlining the importance of the concept behind Article 85, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute,[1135] that the Statute/RPE/case law of the ICTR unfortunately did not provide for "the power to accord compensation to an acquitted person in circumstances involving a grave and manifest miscarriage of justice".[1136] In addition, neither did another source of law which could be applied by the ICTR, customary international law, help Rwamakuba as, > other than the ICC Statute,[[1137]] no instrument in international criminal law or international human rights law includes a provision for compensation for an acquitted person in circumstances involving a grave and manifest miscarriage of justice while some of them do provide for compensation under other circumstances.[1138]

Hence, the additional request of Rwamakuba was denied by the judges.

Turning to Rwamakuba's request for a remedy based on the violation of his right to legal assistance, the judges first explained that Rule 5 of the ICTR RPE, which demands that material prejudice is proved,[1139] could not constitute a basis for such a request as the judges in 2000 had clarified that the violation had not caused Rwamakuba "a serious and irreparable prejudice".[1140] Nevertheless, the judges admitted that a right to an effective remedy for violations of human rights

---

[1134] This provision states: "In exceptional circumstances, where the Court finds conclusive facts showing that there has been a grave and manifest miscarriage of justice, it may in its discretion award compensation, according to the criteria provided in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, to a person who has been released from detention following a final decision of acquittal or a termination of the proceedings for that reason." See also n. 44 of Chapter IX.

[1135] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007, paras. 29-30: "[T]he Chamber finds it (…) necessary to emphasize the importance and the relevance of the principle set forth in Article 85(3) of the ICC Statute in light of the long and complex trials in this Tribunal. (…) [T]he Chamber is of the view that the possibility to grant some sort of remedy or compensation would be fair in circumstances where, although the arrest or detention of an acquitted person was not unlawful, he or she was subject to a lengthy detention during the pre-trial and trial stages. Such an award of compensation would be exercised in light of the circumstances of the case, and could not be applied, for instance, where an accused had intentionally caused his or her arrest or where it would be unreasonable to award compensation. In the Chamber's view, such a provision would offer an acceptable balance between the fundamental right to freedom of any individual and the realities of the investigation and prosecution of international crimes."

[1136] Ibid., para. 21.

[1137] The judges also noted that the inclusion of Art. 85, para. 3 in the ICC Statute had not been without controversy either, see ibid., para. 26.

[1138] ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007, para. 25.

[1139] The entire rule reads: "Where an objection on the ground of non-compliance with the Rules or Regulations is raised by a party at the earliest opportunity, the Trial Chamber shall grant relief, if it finds that the alleged non-compliance is proved and that it has caused material prejudice to that party."

[1140] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007, para. 38. See also the discussion in the Semanza case on this issue, see n. 999.

"undoubtedly forms part of customary international law"[1141] and is expressly provided for in many international human rights instruments.[1142] In addition, the judges stated,

> [r]elying upon international human rights instruments, and particularly the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the Appeals Chamber of this Tribunal has recognized on several occasions [the judges refer here to the cases of Barayagwiza, Semanza and Kajelijeli, ChP][[1143]] that an Accused has a right to an effective remedy [original footnote omitted, ChP].[1144]

Thus, the judges concluded that they had the power to grant an effective remedy for human rights violations and that this power arose out of "the combined effect of the Tribunal's inherent powers and its obligation to respect generally accepted international human rights norms".[1145]

However, did this also include financial compensation? The Registry was of the opinion that it did not. It had two arguments in this respect: 1) "orders to financially compensate those whose rights have been violated are only under development within the general principles of law as understood in Article 38 of the ICJ Statute";[1146] and 2) "there is no provision in the Statute that allows the Tribunal or Chambers to grant financial compensation to individuals it has allegedly wronged [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[1147]

The Trial Chamber, after having examined human rights instruments and human rights case law, quickly rejected the first point, stating that "it cannot be said that orders to financially compensate those whose rights have been violated are only under development in international law".

With respect to the second point, the Trial Chamber noted that the Registrar had referred in this respect to, among other things, the fact that the Presidents of the ICTR (and the Presidents of the ICTY) had sent letters to the UNSC requesting the latter to have the Statute(s) of the Tribunal(s) amended so that the Chambers could make orders for compensation,[1148] something which has already been briefly mentioned earlier in this study.[1149] However, the judges also rejected this point; the

---

[1141] Ibid., para. 40.
[1142] See ibid. In more detail: "[T]he Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the ICCPR, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment, the Convention Concerning Indigenous and Tribal Peoples in Independent Countries, the UN Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power, the ECHR, the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man and the American Convention of Human Rights [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)
[1143] See ns. 919, 997 and 1081 and accompanying text. See also n. 1124 and accompanying text.
[1144] ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007, para. 41.
[1145] Ibid., para. 45. See also ibid., para. 47: "[T]his power is essential for the carrying out of judicial functions, including the fair and proper administration of justice."
[1146] Ibid., para. 53.
[1147] Ibid., para. 57.
[1148] See ibid.
[1149] See n. 246.

Chamber's above-mentioned inherent power to grant an effective remedy encompassed financial compensation "where, in the specific circumstances of a case, it constitutes the appropriate remedy to redress a violation of the human right in question".[1150] The fact that this power was not explicitly mentioned in the ICTR's Statute/RPE was immaterial in that respect.[1151] Moreover, the above-mentioned letters of the Presidents did not change this point either as > the Presidents did not discuss the possibility that the Chamber possessed an inherent power to grant financial compensation, nor did they comment on the right to an effective remedy as they were not acting as a judicial body as this Chamber is in the present case.[1152]

Finally, the judges also referred to the Barayagwiza and Semanza cases[1153] where the Appeals Chamber had stated that if the suspects were found to be not guilty, they were entitled to financial compensation.[1154]

Now that the judges had established that they could indeed grant Rwamakuba financial compensation, they turned to the merits of this case. After having stated that human rights case law had shown that "an effective remedy must be granted on a case-by-case basis, taking into account the subject matter as well as the nature of the right allegedly violated [original footnote omitted, ChP]",[1155] the judges asked themselves two questions: 1) would the outcome, with respect to (pecuniary and non-pecuniary) damages, have been different if Rwamakuba's right to legal assistance had not been violated and 2) had Rwamakuba suffered from the violation itself?[1156]

The judges answered the first question in the negative: "there is no causal link between the violation found and his alleged loss in earnings, nor between the violation found and any non-pecuniary injury he may have suffered as a result of his detention".[1157] While that may, of course, be the case, the judges explained in this context that "[w]hile Trial Chamber II established that the violation of Rwamakuba's right to legal assistance caused a delay in his initial appearance, the Defence has not established that this delay lengthened the duration of his time in detention [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[1158] That, however, seems to be a rather strange observation. After all, a delay in one's initial appearance arguably automatically means that one's (pre-trial) detention is extended (until the moment of his initial appearance).

[1150] ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007, para. 58.
[1151] See ibid.
[1152] Ibid., para. 59.
[1153] See ns. 922 and 1004 and accompanying text.
[1154] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007, para. 63.
[1155] Ibid., para. 68.
[1156] See ibid., para. 70.
[1157] Ibid., para. 71.
[1158] Ibid.

With respect to the second question, the judges concluded that "Rwamakuba must have suffered some moral damage as a result of the violation of his right to legal assistance which cannot be adequately compensated by the sole finding of a violation and the provision of an apology by the Registrar".[1159]

Finally, and in contrast to the comprehensive examination on the question of whether the Chamber could provide the remedy of financial compensation, the judges very quickly established that all the other remedies Rwamakuba had asked for were also to be granted by the Registrar.[1160]

As a result, the Chamber ordered > that the Registrar provide André Rwamakuba with an apology for the violation of his right to legal assistance; (…) that the Registrar provide André Rwamakuba with financial compensation in the amount of 2,000 (two thousand) US dollars for the moral injury sustained as a result of this violation; (…) that the Registrar use all available means to seek the good offices of the State where André Rwamakuba's family is present to facilitate some temporary status for him in that State and to seek the good offices of that State to ensure the uninterrupted schooling of his children.[1161]

Neither Rwamakuba nor the Registrar agreed with this decision; Rwamakuba because his claim based on the grave and manifest injustice was not considered and the Registrar because it did not agree with the Chamber's award of financial compensation to Rwamakuba.[1162]

The judges of the Appeals Chamber, however, agreed with the Trial Chamber and rejected both arguments,[1163] thereby confirming important observations from earlier cases such as the one in Semanza that "any violation, even if it entails a relative degree of prejudice, requires a proportionate remedy [original footnote

[1159] Ibid., para. 73. See also ibid.: "Bearing in mind the complexity of international criminal proceedings, his unfamiliarity with the Tribunal's proceedings, the seriousness of the charges and the potential sentence involved, in all probability, Rwamakuba suffered feelings of confusion, isolation, and distress as a result of the failure to provide him with duty counsel over a four and a half month period [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[1160] This was because the Registrar "has the duty to give effect and implement any Chamber's Decision or Judgement [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 76.)

[1161] Ibid., pp. 23-24.

[1162] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, André Rwamakuba v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision on Appeal against Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-A, 13 September 2007, para. 3.

[1163] See ibid., paras. 15 ("Mr. Rwamakuba has not demonstrated that the Trial Chamber erred in law in finding that it lacked authority to award him compensation for his acquittal. Furthermore, Mr. Rwamakuba fails to substantiate his claim that he suffered a grave and manifest injustice from the proceedings brought against him because he was indicted and prosecuted on false and manipulative evidence and because of his lengthy pre-trial detention.") and 31: "[T]he Appeals Chamber concludes that the Trial Chamber did not err in awarding Mr. Rwamakuba two thousand United States dollars as financial compensation as part of an effective remedy for the violations in the present case." Note finally that even though the Registrar was ordered to pay 2,000 US dollars to Rwamakuba, it "refused to pay the award, choosing instead simply to refer the trial chamber's order to the Security Council. (…) Rwamakuba will thus have to return to court to enforce the order." (Heller 2008, p. 664, n. 2.)

omitted, ChP]".[1164] The only other point which may be interesting to note in relation to this decision is that the judges held that "[i]t is not disputed that Mr. Rwamakuba's suffered serious violations of his fundamental rights [emphasis added, ChP]".[1165] The word "serious" is reminiscent of the discussion at the end of the Kajelijeli case[1166] and confirms the idea that judges will probably only refuse jurisdiction in extremely serious cases, for example, cases involving serious physical mistreatment and torture-like circumstances. As explained, judges should, however, be careful to not restrict this test too severely: there may also be violations not involving serious mistreatment (cf. the Barayagwiza case) that are so serious that jurisdiction should be refused.

4 GENERAL REMARKS ON COOPERATION REGIMES IN THE CONTEXT OF THE INTERNATIONALISED CRIMINAL TRIBUNALS

As already stated in the introduction to this chapter, this study will only devote a few general remarks to the cooperation regimes in the context of the internationalised (or hybrid) criminal tribunals – tribunals which are half international, half national[1167] – as it is unnecessary for the purpose of this study to explain all the different regimes in detail. However, a few general remarks can certainly be made.

Like the UN ad hoc Tribunals, internationalised criminal tribunals do not have a police force of their own.[1168] Hence, for cooperation – such as for arresting suspects – they are dependent on other entities. (For most[1169] internationalised criminal

[1164] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, André Rwamakuba v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision on Appeal against Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-A, 13 September 2007, para. 24. See also ns. 919 (Barayagwiza), 997 (Semanza) and 1081 (Kajelijeli) and accompanying text. See also ns. 1124 and 1144 and accompanying text (Rwamakuba).
[1165] Ibid., para. 29.
[1166] See ns. 1083-1084 and accompanying text.
[1167] For example, their staff may be half national – half international, their subject-matter jurisdiction may encompass both international and national crimes and their way of establishment has also very often some semi-international dimensions (think of an agreement between the State in question and the UN). For more information on these internationalised criminal tribunals, see Romano, Nollkaemper and Kleffner 2004 (see also n. 1).
[1168] See Sluiter 2004 B, p. 379.
[1169] See, however, Art. 22 of the STL Statute ('Trials in absentia'): "1. The Special Tribunal shall conduct trial proceedings in the absence of the accused, if he or she: (a) Has expressly and in writing waived his or her right to be present; (b) Has not been handed over to the Tribunal by the State authorities concerned; (c) Has absconded or otherwise cannot be found and all reasonable steps have been taken to secure his or her appearance before the Tribunal and to inform him or her of the charges confirmed by the Pre-Trial Judge. 2. When hearings are conducted in the absence of the accused, the Special Tribunal shall ensure that: (a) The accused has been notified, or served with the indictment, or notice has otherwise been given of the indictment through publication in the media or communication to the State of residence or nationality; (b) The accused has designated a defence counsel of his or her own choosing, to be remunerated either by the accused or, if the accused is proved to be indigent, by the Tribunal; (c) Whenever the accused refuses or fails to appoint a defence counsel, such counsel has been assigned by the Defence Office of the Tribunal with a view to ensuring full representation of the interests and rights of the accused. 3. In case of conviction in absentia, the accused, if he or she had not tribunals, arresting suspects is normally a necessity because they explicitly/most probably do not allow trials in absentia.)[1170] These other entities will normally be the State where the internationalised criminal tribunal is located, but one could also think here of assistance from other (neighbouring) States, for example, if suspects have moved to those areas.[1171] Furthermore, the help of international forces may be needed,[1172] for instance, if such forces have taken over the daily tasks of the local authorities.[1173] With respect to the role played by international forces in the context of arresting suspects for internationalised criminal tribunals, it may be interesting to refer to UNSC Resolution 1638 of 11 November 2005, in which the UNSC, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, decided > that the mandate of the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL) shall include the following additional element: to apprehend and detain former President Charles Taylor in the event of a return to Liberia and to transfer him or facilitate his transfer to Sierra Leone for prosecution before the Special Court for Sierra Leone and to keep the Liberian Government, the Sierra Leonean Government and the Council fully informed (...).[1174]

In contrast to the sometimes rather vague mandates of a peacekeeping force such as IFOR/SFOR (see Section 2 of this chapter), this mandate is extremely explicit and clear and should therefore be welcomed.[1175]

However, it must also be understood that this Chapter VII decision was made in the specific context of the UNSC's determination that Charles Taylor's "return to designated a defence counsel of his or her choosing, shall have the right to be retried in his or her presence before the Special Tribunal, unless he or she accepts the judgement."

---

[1170] See Sluiter 2004 B, p. 380: "It must be mentioned that the legal framework of the UNTAET Serious Crimes Panels in East Timor and UNMIK courts in Kosovo explicitly exclude the possibility of trials in absentia. The legal framework of the Sierra Leone Special Court and the legal framework of the Cambodia Extraordinary Chambers are not as explicit on this point, but one may expect that in light of the right attributed to the accused to be tried in his presence and in light of the reduced authority of in absentia verdicts, these bodies will avoid conducting trials in absentia, in particular when an individual is accused of the most serious international crimes [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[1171] See ibid., pp. 380-381.

[1172] See ibid., p. 379.

[1173] See Frulli 2006, p. 352, n. 2, mentioning "the powers conferred upon military forces acting in the framework of a UN Transitional Administration or Authority such as those established, for instance, in East Timor (UNTAET) and in Kosovo (UNMIK/KFOR)": "It is obvious that in these cases the military components are endowed with broad enforcement powers, including the power to arrest and detain war criminals, since they temporarily replace local authorities."

[1174] UNSC Res. 1638 of 11 November 2005, UN Doc. S/RES/1638 (2005), para. 1. It may also be interesting to note that almost two years earlier, a private UK-based military firm, Northbridge Services Groups, stated that it was looking for an investor to fund an operation by which the company would kidnap Taylor "to claim a $2m reward allegedly offered by the United States Congress." (BBC, 'Firm Seeks Charles Taylor Bounty', 11 December 2003, available at: http://www.globalpolicy.org/component/content/article/199/41037.html.) (Cf. also n. 281.)

[1175] See also Frulli 2006, p. 352: "This new duty assigned to a peacekeeping mission enables a significant and most welcome departure from UN practice." See also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 40.

Liberia would constitute an impediment to stability and a threat to the peace of Liberia and to international peace and security in the region".[1176] The decision has nothing to do with the nature of the cooperation regime of the SCSL itself.

In fact, although the term 'tribunals' (as in: internationalised criminal tribunals) hints at a connection with the UN ad hoc Tribunals, the cooperation regime of the internationalised criminal tribunals is very much akin to the inter-State cooperation regime.[1177] Nevertheless, the lack of a vertical cooperation regime may not always be a problem as many of these tribunals (although an exception is the SCSL) "have the advantage of being integrated into a domestic legal order, enabling them to exercise enforcement power over a certain territory".[1178] With respect to the internationalised criminal tribunals in Kosovo and East Timor, Sluiter writes, for example, that these institutions, even if they "lack enforcement powers of their own",[1179] "have the considerable advantage over the existing international criminal tribunals in that they do preside over a 'police force' capable of using coercive measures, within a geographically limited area".[1180] And, since many suspects in whom those Tribunals are interested may still reside in those areas, the lack of a vertical cooperation regime may not necessarily be an insurmountable problem. However, things are different, of course, with respect to suspects which have moved to other areas. In those cases, being unable to issue binding orders to States that certain suspects must be arrested may indeed influence the effectiveness of the Tribunals' ability to bring suspects to justice.[1181] Having said that, it is time to examine the male captus case law stemming from the context of the internationalised criminal tribunals.

5 CASES IN THE CONTEXT OF THE INTERNATIONALISED CRIMINAL TRIBUNALS

5.1 The Duch case before the ECCC

Guek Eav Kaing, alias Duch, was arrested and detained by the Cambodian Military Court on 10 May 1999 for various charges under Cambodian law.[1182] It was more [1176] UNSC Res. 1638 of 11 November 2005, UN Doc. S/RES/1638 (2005).

[1177] See Sluiter 2003 C, p. 651, n. 167: "These "internationalized tribunals" do not in any way enjoy the benefit of a vertical cooperation relationship and can only count on existing and applicable mechanisms of interstate legal assistance. As a result, a considerable amount of evidence – and a considerable number of suspects – could be beyond their reach."
[1178] Ibid. See also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 6 (writing on the ECCC).
[1179] Sluiter 2004 B, p. 379.
[1180] Ibid., p. 389. See also n. 1073 and accompanying text.
[1181] See also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 8, writing on the situation in East Timor.
[1182] See ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 2.

than two years later, on 10 August 2001, that the 'Law on the Establishment of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia' entered into force.[1183] (However, according to the co-investigating judges of the ECCC, it was not until 22 June 2007, the date the Internal Rules of the ECCC entered into force, that this new internationalised criminal tribunal became operational.)[1184] On the basis of this 'Law on the Establishment of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia' (ECCC law) and apparently in anticipation of the birth of this new internationalised criminal tribunal,[1185] the Investigating Judge of the Cambodian Military Court issued detention orders for Duch on 20 February 2002, 2003 and 2004 charging him with crimes against humanity.[1186] On 28 February 2005, 2006 and 2007, Duch's 'provisional' detention (now for charges of war crimes and crimes against internationally protected persons but again pursuant to the ECCC law) was extended by the Investigating Judge, but on 21 July 2008, "the Military Court, considering that it was no longer competent to try crimes falling under the jurisdiction of the ECCC, issued a Decision terminating the competence of the Military Court with respect to the Accused [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[1187]

However, this did not lead to Duch's release because by that time, he was already in the custody of the ECCC; as explained earlier, the ECCC had become operational on 22 June 2007. About a month later, on 31 July 2007, two co-investigating judges of the ECCC[1188] ordered that Duch be placed in the provisional detention of the ECCC. In reaching this result, the co-investigating judges examined the male captus discussion and its effect on the proceedings of this specific internationalised criminal tribunal. It is this interesting order and its aftermath which will be discussed here in detail.

In their order, the two co-investigating judges first explained the charges against Duch in the context of the ECCC. He was > accused of directing the Security Prison S-21 between 1975 and 1979 where, under his authority, countless abuses were allegedly committed against the civilian population (arbitrary detention, torture and other inhumane acts, mass executions,

[1183] See ibid.
[1184] See ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 20.
[1185] See Mohan 2009, p. 16. See also K. Ossenova, 'Khmer Rouge genocide tribunal denies bail for former prison chief', Jurist Paper Chase, 3 December 2007 (available at: http://jurist.law.pitt.edu/paperchase/2007/12/khmer-rouge-genocide-tribunal-denies.php): "Those charges were primarily brought to keep Duch in custody while the ECCC started operations."
[1186] See ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 2.
[1187] Ibid., para. 3.
[1188] The (on the – civil law – Cambodian legal system focused) system of the ECCC is not comparable with the system of Tribunals like, for example, the ICTY and ICTR. "[T]he investigations before the trial stage are carried out not by the Parties (Prosecutors and Defense), but by two Co-Investigating Judges, a national Judge and an international Judge." (Http://www.eccc.gov.kh/english/investigating_judges.aspx.) After this investigative phase, the proceedings before the Trial Chamber, consisting of 'real' judges, will start.

> etc.), which occurred within a political context of widespread or systematic abuses and constitute crimes against humanity.[1189]

Although the ECCC's co-prosecutors requested Duch's placement in provisional detention, Duch's lawyer argued, unsurprisingly, that Duch had been in detention for more than eight years, that this violated both Cambodian law and international standards (standards which the ECCC must respect), that the conditions for provisional detention were not satisfied, that Duch was no senior leader and finally that ""more than two thousand persons" held positions as heads of security centres".[1190]

Because of this, Duch's lawyer requested "that the Court release Duch from detention and impose a bail order instead".[1191] This seems a rather mild request. After all, a bail order implies that Duch only sought to be released pending trial. However, one can imagine that there would also be suspects/lawyers who would demand a much more far-reaching remedy for these kinds of violations, namely a real male detentus remedy such as a dismissal of the charges/release with prejudice to the Prosecutor (with the result that the suspect does not have to appear in court again). That Duch did not choose such a remedy may be explained by the fact that it seems as if he wanted to be tried. In any case, the Defence argued that Duch "did not resist arrest in May 1999",[1192] "has never denied being the chief of centre S-21",[1193] "has said that he is prepared to reveal details of all the crimes committed by the Khmer Rouge"[1194] and "has (…) indicated that he is prepared to be tried by the ECCC".[1195]

However, even though it appears that Duch did not want a true male detentus remedy (and only a provisional release pending trial), the co-investigating judges deemed it necessary nevertheless to delve into the male captus discussion:

[1189] ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 1.
[1190] Ibid.
[1191] Ibid.
[1192] ECCC, Pre-Trial Chamber, 'Appeal Brief Challenging the Order of Provisional Detention of 31 July 2007' (Confidential), Case No. 002/14-08-2006, 5 September 2007, para. 120. Note that this appeal was only submitted after the 31 July 2007 decision (which still needs to be discussed here), but these arguments are of a general nature and were hence also applicable to the period before that decision was issued.
[1193] Ibid.
[1194] Ibid.
[1195] Ibid., para. 121. On 12 August 2009, Duch told the ECCC: "I will accept without challenge (…) all the judgments which will be made by this Chamber; the judgment for my role as the Chairman of S-21 and all the crimes committed there. I will accept it by legal means and by psychological means. And I am humble before the Cambodian people to accept all these crimes and I would like the Cambodian people to condemn me to the strictest level of punishment." (ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Transcript of Trial Proceedings – Kaing Guek Eav "Duch"' (Public), Case No. 001/18-07-2008-ECCC/TC, 12 August 2009 (available at: http://www.eccc.gov.kh/english/cabinet/caseInfo/157//E1_62.1_TR001_20090812_Final_EN_Pub.pdf), pp. 49-50.)

> It is necessary (...) to examine if DUCH's prior detention [, which, it must be stressed, the co-investigating judges qualified as "problematic in light of international standards of justice and, more specifically, articles 9(3) and 14(3)(c) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which states that any individual arrested or detained for a criminal offence shall be entitled to a trial within a reasonable time period or to be released",[1196] ChP] affects the proceedings for which the concerned person is before us today. The issue may be phrased in these terms: Does the more than 8 year detention of the Charged Person in separate proceedings before another jurisdiction taint the present proceedings? Or rather, is such detention so excessive and prejudicial to the rights of the defence as to affect the very ability to bring this case within the jurisdiction of the Extraordinary Chambers (which was established within the Cambodian Judicial organization but constitutes an independent institution having a separate structure from the national jurisdictions), to no longer allow the detention of the Charged Person within the jurisdiction of the Extraordinary Chambers, or even to require the Co-Investigating Judges to stay the proceedings? The alternatives before the Co-Investigating Judges today are as follows: must the adage Male captus, bene detentus be applied or, on the contrary, should the theory of abuse of process take precedence? Before concluding, both theories shall be reviewed.[1197]

The fact that the co-investigating judges placed the eight years of detention under the term male captus is explicit support for the view entertained in this study, namely that in the male captus discussion, one may focus on, but should not limit oneself to, irregularities related to the capture; the male captus discussion may also involve other pre-trial irregularities, such as irregularities related to the pre-trial detention (cf., for example, the Barayagwiza case). In the words of the co-investigating judges:

> Many examples exist in domestic as well as international law which apply this maxim, whereby the circumstances which bring an Accused before a tribunal have no effect on the judgement of the Accused. Although most of these precedents are based on the initial arrest of the Charged Person, and more rarely on the conditions of their prior detention, in both cases the reasoning is the same as that with which we are now confronted [emphasis in original, ChP].[1198]

First, the co-investigating judges examined cases which can be linked to the male captus bene detentus side. Alongside a few national cases (which were all mentioned/discussed in this study),[1199] they looked at the ICTR case of Rwamakuba (noting in a footnote that the same reasoning was also used in the cases Semanza and Kajelijeli) and explained in that context that the ICTR "has stated on many occasions that it was not responsible for the illegal arrest and detention of a

[1196] ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 2.
[1197] Ibid., paras. 3-4.
[1198] Ibid., para. 5. See also n. 6 and accompanying text of Chapter III.
[1199] Namely the cases of Scott, Elliott, Ker v. Illinois, Frisbie v. Collins, Alvarez-Machain, Eichmann, Argoud and Barbie.

defendant if the act was not the result of its order".[1200] The co-investigating judges concluded this part of their decision by stating that "[t]here therefore exists a solid tradition supporting the strict separation of, on the one hand, a legal procedure before one jurisdiction and, on the other hand, the prior illegal arrest and detention ordered by a different authority".[1201] Some comments need to be made about this conclusion.

First of all, the ECCC connects the national male captus cases with the idea that there exists a strict separation between the legal procedure in one jurisdiction and the male captus problems caused by other entities in another jurisdiction. However, the national male captus cases may go much further than that; they may state that the prosecuting forum will continue to exercise jurisdiction, regardless of how the suspect was brought into the jurisdiction of the court. That may thus also involve irregularities perpetrated in another jurisdiction by authorities which can be linked to the prosecuting forum (and hence not only irregularities caused by authorities which cannot be linked to the prosecuting forum).

Secondly (and with respect to the ICTR cases), it is true that the Semanza, Kajelijeli (but then the Appeals Chamber)[1202] and Rwamakuba cases focused on the lawfulness of arrests and detentions at the national level pursuant to ICTR requests, but that does not mean that those judges would not also look into irregularities beyond the constructive custody if the judges were of the opinion that those irregularities occurred in the context of their case. That "in the context of their case" concept is normally triggered by a request for arrest and detention,[1203] but there might also be other circumstances which the judges may consider to fall within this notion. For example, something may also go wrong in the context of a suspect being brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, without that suspect being detained by

[1200] ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 10.
[1201] Ibid., para. 11.
[1202] It is a little strange that the judges refer here to the Trial Chamber's decision in Kajelijeli because the reasoning of the judges in that decision (namely that it is not up to the ICTR to take responsibility for the arrest and detention phase at the national level, even if that arrest/detention is at the behest of the ICTR, with reference to the Karemera and Ngirumpatse cases, see ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus J[u]v[é]nal Kajelijeli, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Arbitrary Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused and on the Defence Notice of Urgent Motion to Expand and Supplement the Record of 8 December 1999 Hearing', Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, 8 May 2000, paras. 34-35) was rejected by the other two cases the judges at the ECCC allude to, see the text following n. 970 and accompanying text (Semanza) and n. 1103 and accompanying text (Rwamakuba). In fact, the Trial Chamber's decision in Kajelijeli was also rejected by the Appeals Chamber in the same decision, see n. 1065 and accompanying text.
[1203] In Semanza, the judges were apparently of the opinion that the arrest/detention preceding the arrest/detention at the request of the ICTR could not be seen as falling within the context of the ICTR case, see ns. 975 and 1000 and accompanying text. In Kajelijeli, there was not even an arrest/detention prior to the arrest/detention at the request of the ICTR, see n. 1006 and accompanying text, as a result of which the Tribunal could only look at the arrest/detention at the request of the ICTR. Finally, the judges in Rwamakuba, like their colleagues in Semanza, were apparently of the opinion that the arrest/detention preceding the arrest/detention at the request of the ICTR (including its alleged violations) could not be seen as falling within the context of the ICTR case, see n. 1099 and accompanying text.

a State at the request of the ICTR, for instance if private individuals kidnap a person and bring him into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. Such a situation does not fall under the 'arrest/detention at the request/behest of the Tribunal' category but is certainly an irregularity committed in the context of the ICTR case which one can assume the judges will look at. Indeed, the fact that the ICTY has already stated that it will take the ultimate responsibility (by refusing jurisdiction, invoking the abuse of process doctrine) in a serious male captus involving such a situation, even if the irregularity cannot be attributed to the Tribunal, may constitute evidence for the idea that judges of the ICTR would also remedy violations which can be connected with this irregularity but which do not reach the male detentus standard. It can be argued that Semanza and Kajelijeli can be interpreted as having followed this reasoning – that the Tribunal will take its responsibility for pre-transfer irregularities committed in the context of its case, irrespective of the entity responsible for these irregularities – when they make the general statements that "any violation (…) requires a proportionate remedy [emphasis added, ChP]",[1204] or that "any violation of the accused's rights entails the provision of an effective remedy pursuant to Article 2(3)(a) of the ICCPR [emphasis added, ChP]".[1205] These two statements were also confirmed in the Rwamakuba case[1206] where the judges referred not only to the cases of Semanza and Kajelijeli, but also to the second decision in Barayagwiza, a decision where the judges – like their colleagues in the first decision[1207] – took responsibility for violations which occurred even beyond the context of constructive custody/a detention at the request/behest of the ICTR.[1208] Nevertheless, as clarified earlier, it must also be admitted that Rwamakuba seems to be less far-reaching than Semanza and Kajelijeli as the above-mentioned confirmations were made in the context of a case in which the violations were clearly attributable to the ICTR.[1209]

Be that as it may, it is in any case difficult to connect these ICTR cases with the idea that there is a strict separation between, on the one hand, male captus problems caused by other entities and stemming from a pre-transfer jurisdiction and, on the other hand, the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. Even if one is of the opinion that these cases only constitute evidence for the idea that judges will remedy violations which can be connected to an arrest/detention at the behest of the Tribunal (in which context it must be noted that Rwamakuba is again less far-reaching than Semanza

[1204] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 125. See also n. 997 and accompanying text.
[1205] ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 255. (Cf. also ibid., para. 322.) See also n. 1081 and accompanying text.
[1206] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 20 September 2006, para. 218 (see n. 1124 and accompanying text), ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007, para. 41 (see n. 1144 and accompanying text) and ICTR, Appeals Chamber, André Rwamakuba v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision on Appeal against Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-A, 13 September 2007, para. 24 (see n. 1164 and accompanying text).
[1207] See n. 857 and accompanying text.
[1208] See n. 919.
[1209] See the text following n. 1124 and accompanying text.

and Kajelijeli),[1210] the fact that these judges nevertheless take responsibility for actions of others, committed in another legal system (albeit under the authority of the ICTR), shows that the separation between the national level and the Tribunal level is perhaps not as strict as the ECCC wants to present it here.

After having discussed the male captus bene detentus side, the co-investigating judges turned to the other side of the coin, the abuse of process doctrine.[1211] Although it can be maintained that the most accurate opposite of the male captus bene detentus doctrine is, of course, the male captus male detentus/ex iniuria ius non oritur doctrine (and not the abuse of process doctrine), the co-investigating judges, in their examination of the abuse of process doctrine, looked at cases which can more generally be seen as opposing the reasonings of the male captus bene detentus doctrine: not only abuse of process cases but also 'real' male captus male detentus cases such as Ebrahim.[1212] After a discussion of these cases, which have all been examined in this study already,[1213] the co-investigating judges turned to the ICC Appeals Chamber's position in the still-to-discuss Lubanga Dyilo case, see Section 2 of Chapter X, and explained that the ICC had

[1210] See n. 1103 and accompanying text.

[1211] It is interesting to note that the ECCC, which is focused on the (civil law) Cambodian legal system, looked at the – from the common law stemming – abuse of process doctrine. This confirms the idea that this doctrine may very well be used by courts with a more civil law background, see n. 878. (See also n. 1255.)

[1212] Note that also in the Ebrahim case, words resembling the abuse of process doctrine were used: "The individual must be protected against illegal detention and abduction, the bounds of jurisdiction must not be exceeded, sovereignty must be respected, the legal process must be fair to those affected and abuse of law must be avoided in order to protect and promote the integrity of the administration of justice [emphasis added, ChP]." (Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 896. See also n. 690 and accompanying text of Chapter V.) Note, however, that in that case, the Court did not state that judges had a discretion to consider whether the violations of these values had to lead to a refusal of jurisdiction. It more straightforwardly stated that these violations entailed that the judges had no jurisdiction to try the case.

[1213] Other cases (besides Ebrahim) were: Barayagwiza, Toscanino, Hartley and Bennett. It must also be noted that the judges in a few of these cases may have made some general interesting remarks on the abuse of process doctrine/a comparable doctrine, but may not have used the abuse of process doctrine itself to refuse jurisdiction, see, for example, the Hartley case (and n. 847). In addition to these cases, the judges also mentioned the Nikolić case, as an example of a case where the abuse of process doctrine from Barayagwiza was repeated, but, in the end, not applied. The co-investigating judges referred here specifically to the reasoning of the Trial Chamber in Nikolić that under the abuse of process doctrine, jurisdiction may be refused, irrespective of the entity responsible for the serious male captus (in Nikolić: private individuals): "In this decision, the ICTY held that (…) this theory could only apply where the Accused had been subject to serious mistreatment [This is, by the way, not certain. Although the Trial Chamber indeed focused on this physical dimension, it also concurred with the more general words in Barayagwiza, which 'only' demand egregious violations of the rights of the suspect, see n. 531 and accompanying text. Cf. also n. 1231 and accompanying text, ChP.], specifying that "Whether such a decision should be taken also depends entirely on the facts of the case and cannot be decided in the abstract. Accordingly, the level of violence used against the Accused must be assessed. Here, the Chamber observes that the assumed facts, although they do raise some concerns, do not at all show that the treatment of the Accused by the unknown individuals (…) was of such an egregious nature."" (ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 18.)

> held that the violation of the rights of the defendant at the time of his prior arrest and detention could only be taken into account in two cases: if the court acted in concert with the external authorities, or if the defendant was the victim of torture or serious mistreatment.[1214]

As will also be shown in Chapter X (some parts of Lubanga Dyilo must, however, already be discussed right now), this is not entirely clear. One could indeed argue that the ICC Appeals Chamber agreed with the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber in that case that in the first situation of "concerted action", violations must be considered,[1215] but the serious mistreatment/torture point is less certain as this situation stems from the abuse of process doctrine, a doctrine which was explicitly rejected by the Appeals Chamber. Lack of clarity with respect to this point is also caused by the fact that the exact stance of the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber on this point is uncertain. It namely explained > that whenever there is no concerted action between the Court and the authorities of the custodial State, the abuse of process doctrine constitutes an additional guarantee of the rights of the accused; and that, to date, the application of this doctrine, which would require that the Court decline to exercise its jurisdiction in a particular case, has been confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal [original footnotes omitted, ChP][.][1216]

The problem is that under the abuse of process doctrine in the Tribunal context, there is no requirement for the male captus to have been committed by national authorities. Jurisdiction can be refused, irrespective of the entity responsible. Think, for example, of the actions of the private individuals in the Nikolić case. However, whether this was a mistake by the Pre-Trial Chamber is not clear. On the one hand, it refers to Tribunal cases alone (Nikolić (Appeals Chamber), Kajelijeli and Dokmanović)[1217] but on the other, the test from the Appeals Chamber's decision in the Nikolić case was not very clear (see Subsection 3.1.4 of this chapter), Kajelijeli involved the actions of State authorities working at the behest of the ICTR and the exact paragraphs from the Dokmanović case to which the Pre-Trial Chamber refers contain examinations of national cases. (And in the national context, the abuse of process doctrine appears to require the involvement of authorities which can be linked to the prosecuting forum.) The following does not solve this issue either: one could argue that the Pre-Trial Chamber adheres to the normal abuse of process doctrine from the Tribunal context (not requiring the involvement of State

[1214] Ibid., para. 19.
[1215] See n. 282 and accompanying text of Chapter X.
[1216] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, p. 10.
[1217] See ibid., p. 10, n. 33.

authorities) but only applies the specifics of the case before it to the theory at hand. However, even though a number of quotations from this decision can be seen as such specific applications,[1218] this particular quotation cannot, for it is too generally formulated. Hence, it is not clear whether the Pre-Trial Chamber would refuse jurisdiction irrespective of the entity responsible or whether it would only do so in the case of a male captus committed by the national authorities of the custodial State.

Because of the Appeals Chamber's rejection of the abuse of process doctrine and the lack of clarity with respect to the Pre-Trial Chamber's view of the abuse of process doctrine, it is not clear how the Appeals Chamber would act in the case of serious mistreatment/torture by, for example, private individuals. Although Chapter X will show that serious violations which occur when the ICC is involved in a case (including actions of third parties working at the behest of the ICC) and which entail that one can no longer speak of a fair trial, must/can[1219] lead to the ending of the case (which will certainly be the case if the ICC itself, or third parties working for the ICC, are responsible for serious mistreatment/torture of the suspect), it is uncertain how the Appeals Chamber would react in the case of serious mistreatment/torture as such, even if (third parties working for) the ICC were not involved in the case.

However, notwithstanding this lack of clarity, it will be shown below that the co-investigating judges concluded that the ICC Appeals Chamber's view in Lubanga Dyilo is the same as in the Nikolić case, namely that the application of the abuse of process doctrine – again, it should be remembered that the ICC Appeals Chamber explicitly rejected this doctrine – requires the existence of grave violations of the suspect's rights, such as serious mistreatment/torture.[1220]

The different cases having been discussed, the co-investigating judges looked at the specifics of the case before them and concluded "that they do not have jurisdiction to determine the legality of DUCH's prior detention".[1221] The argument as to why this was so clearly followed what the co-investigating judges thought was the reasoning of the ICC Appeals Chamber in the Lubanga Dyilo case. The co-investigating judges were namely of the opinion that neither situation, where one [1218] See ibid., pp. 9 ("[A]ny violations of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo's rights in relation to his arrest and detention prior to 14 March 2006 will be examined by the Court only once it has been established that there has been concerted action between the Court and the DRC authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP]") and 10: "[N]o issues has arisen to any alleged act of torture against or serious mistreatment of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo by the DRC national authorities prior to the transmission of the Court's Cooperation Request on 14 March 2006 to the said authorities".

[1219] Chapter X will show that there is lack of clarity on this point as well, see the text following n. 255 and accompanying text of that chapter.

[1220] See ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 21 and n. 1231 and accompanying text. See also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 49, n. 182.

[1221] ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 20.

could look at alleged irregularities prior to the arrest and detention of the now prosecuting forum (namely if the prosecuting forum acted in concert with the authorities causing the irregularities and if the defendant was the victim of torture or serious mistreatment), applied here.

With respect to the first situation, the co-investigating judges explained that

> [t]he fact that the Extraordinary Chambers is part of the judicial system of the Kingdom of Cambodia does not lead to the conclusion that this special internationalised Tribunal acted in concert with the military court: the Extraordinary Chambers only became operational on June 22, 2007 (...). Prior to the initiation of this judicial investigation, the Co-Investigating Judges (who together form the sole authority empowered to decide upon matters of provisional detention) had no means of intervening. Once they were in a position to do so, they dealt with the issue. Thus, the time lapse between the lodging of the Introductory submission and the arrest warrant (12 days)[[1222]] cannot seriously be considered excessive or be characterised as negligence, given the time needed to review the case file.[1223]

One can wonder whether the link between the ECCC and the Military Court is indeed as weak as the co-investigating judges present it here. Although it is, of course, true that the ECCC was not yet in operation when Duch was placed in detention, it was explained at the beginning of the examination of this case that on the basis of the ECCC law and apparently in anticipation of the birth of this new internationalised criminal tribunal, the Investigating Judge of the Cambodian Military Court issued detention orders for Duch on 20 February 2002, 2003 and 2004 charging him with crimes against humanity and that on 28 February 2005, 2006 and 2007, Duch's 'provisional' detention (now for charges of war crimes and crimes against internationally protected persons but again pursuant to the ECCC law) was extended by the Investigating Judge.[1224] Hence, it can be argued that, even if one cannot speak of concerted action here, there was certainly a link between Duch's provisional detention, at least as from 2002, and the ECCC, even if the latter was not yet operational. It could be argued that this link entails the violations being seen as falling within the context of the ECCC case more generally and that as a result of that, the violations must be remedied by the ECCC. At this point, it may be interesting to refer to Mohan, who notes that [1222] On 18 July 2007, the co-prosecutors of the ECCC made an introductory submission requesting the co-investigating judges to investigate, arrest and detain five suspects (namely Duch, Chea Nuon, Sary Ieng, Thirith Ieng and Samphan Khieu) and on 30 July 2007, an arrest warrant was issued against Duch.

[1223] ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 20.

[1224] See also Mohan 2009, p. 16, n. 86: "The charges against Duch and the orders placing him and holding him in detention by the Military Court were based on the crimes currently under the ECCC's jurisdiction and the Military Court made specific reference to the ECCC's authority to justify his Prior Detention. It appears therefore that Duch was merely being housed by the Military Court's detention centre in anticipation of the ECCC's proceedings against him."

> [t]he ECCC, as an organ of the Cambodian government, had a legal obligation to review and remedy the breach of the government's obligation under Articles 9 and 14 of the ICCPR to try Duch within a reasonable time or to release him. It was a patently poor excuse for the ECCC's pre-trial courts to retort that Duch's quarrel should have been with the Military Court and not the ECCC. Even if the ECCC was not to blame for Duch's Prior Detention, as a court firmly located within the Cambodian court structure, the ECCC's pre-trial courts were obliged to pronounce on the unlawfulness of Duch's prior detention ordered and executed by another court and organ of the Cambodian government.[1225]

This is reminiscent of the previously discussed issue on the problems caused by fragmentation of a suspect's legal process over two or more systems and the idea that, if the first entity does not examine the irregularities in that process, it is up to the second entity to do so in order to prevent the suspect from falling into a legal vacuum. Mohan also asserts, among other things referring to the ICTR case of Kajelijeli and the ICC case of Lubanga Dyilo, that even if one did not regard the ECCC to be part of the Cambodian Government but a true international court, > this does not detract from the ECCC's obligation to look beyond its seat and examine alleged human rights violations committed by Cambodian national authorities against its defendants. The independence that international(ized) courts are clothed with is an independence from State interference, not a prerogative to dismiss human rights violations perpetrated by the State [emphasis in original, ChP].[1226]

Hence, Mohan is also of the opinion that there is a clear link between Duch's earlier provisional detention and the ECCC, and that as a result of this detention, which occurred in the context of the ECCC case more generally, the co-investigating [1225] Ibid., p. 17. See also ibid., p. 13: "It follows that where a branch of the Cambodian government fails to fulfil its obligations under the ICCPR, the ECCC, applying Cambodian criminal procedure as it is required to, must remedy such unlawful conduct. This is especially so where the government's conduct impinges on a defendant's due process rights. In such cases, the ECCC is expressly required to exercise its jurisdiction in accordance with "international standards of justice, fairness and due process of law, as set out in Articles 14 and 15 of the ICCPR." From the perspective of both Cambodian and international law, therefore, the ECCC had a duty to inquire into and pronounce upon the legality of Duch's Prior Detention [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., p. 16.

[1226] Ibid., p. 17. See also ibid., pp. 17-18 for the link with Kajelijeli: "[A]s the ICTR's Appeals Chamber has held, where national authorities hold a defendant in custody effectively on behalf of an international court, "a shared burden exists with regard to safeguarding the suspect's fundamental rights in international cooperation on criminal matters." That is because the tribunal has "overlapping responsibilities" with the national authorities and once it begins operation, it must ensure that "the case proceeds to trial in a way that respects the rights of the accused". As a result, "if an accused is arrested or detained by a State at the request or under the authority of the Tribunal even though the accused is not yet within the actual custody of the Tribunal, the Tribunal has a responsibility to provide whatever relief is available to it to attempt to reduce any violations as much as possible" [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Note that the last words in fact stem from Judge Lal Chand Vohrah's declaration in the Semanza case, see ns. 834, 985 and 1060 and accompanying text. See also ibid., p. 18 for the link with Lubanga Dyilo, where Mohan explains that the ICC Appeals Chamber "held that it was required to "see that the process envisioned in [national] law was duly followed and that the rights of the arrestee were properly respected." [original footnote omitted, ChP]" judges should have looked into the irregularities which can be connected with this detention.

With respect to the second situation, the co-investigating judges clarified that courts which have applied the abuse of process doctrine "have always considered the proportional relationship between the alleged violations and the proposed remedy".[1227] However, the subsequent words of the co-investigating judges reveal that they felt that they also had to take into account the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged, an element which this study also finds to be important as it is one of the many elements which a judge, under certain circumstances, should take into account when considering the most appropriate remedy in a certain case: "It is obvious that in a case of crimes against humanity, the proceedings should be stayed only where the rights of the accused have been seriously affected, at least, for example, to the degree in Toscanino."[1228] It can be argued that the choice of (at least!) the degree of seriousness from Toscanino is unfortunate as this test is extremely high; it is to be recalled that Toscanino was tortured for nearly three weeks. However, in the remainder of the text, one can also see lower thresholds, although one can assume that even those 'lower' thresholds (which apply irrespective of the entity responsible)[1229] will still be very difficult to meet:

> The Co-Investigating Judges are (…) compelled to follow the solution adopted in Nikolic and Lubanga[1230] which requires, for the application of the abuse of [process] doctrine, the existence of grave violations of the rights of the Accused. Where it has not been established or even alleged that DUCH suffered incidents of torture or serious mistreatment prior to his transfer before the Extraordinary Chambers, the prolonged detention under the jurisdiction of the Military Court, in comparison with the crimes against humanity alleged against the Accused, cannot be considered a sufficiently grave violation of the rights of the Accused.[1231]

Hence, the co-investigating judges did not have jurisdiction to review the legality of Duch's prior detention, enabling them to continue with the trial.

Although the co-investigating judges may have been right in deciding that the seriousness of the male captus suffered by Duch was not such as to divest jurisdiction, the conclusion that his prior detention cannot be reviewed can – again – be criticised. The judges should be able to review alleged irregularities which occur in the context of their case, even if the irregularities were not so serious as to refuse jurisdiction and even if there was no concerted action. If these were the only reasons

[1227] ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 21.
[1228] Ibid.
[1229] See the link with Nikolić and n. 1213.
[1230] As explained supra, it is doubtful whether this is in fact the position of the ICC Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo.
[1231] ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 21.

for a judge to review the irregularities, he would not be able to review a kidnapping by private individuals, not involving serious mistreatment and not involving concerted action between the kidnappers and the prosecuting forum. That, of course, would be very unfortunate as the judge in that case would close his eyes to issues which clearly have to be seen as falling within the context of his case and which it would be very unfair not to consider.

Nevertheless, the co-investigating judges also made a statement which could perhaps be seen as an opening to a broader stance. Although they concluded that the trial, where Duch could enjoy "his full rights of defence",[1232] had to proceed, they also stated that a less far-reaching remedy was not to be excluded in the future: "[A]n eventual remedy for the prejudice caused by the prior detention (in the form of a reduction of sentence or by any other means decided by the Chambers) is not at issue during the investigative phase."[1233] This remark, which does not exclude the granting of remedies for irregularities, even if those remedies would not lead to the ending of the case, is, of course, to be welcomed for it adds the necessary range to the male captus discussion which can sometimes have too great a focus on the extreme solutions. Furthermore, it may mean that the prosecuting forum (if not the co-investigating judges in the investigative stage,[1234] then this must be the 'real' judges in the trial proceedings) must examine the legality of irregularities which it finds as falling within the context of this case. After all, if the prosecuting forum does not examine these irregularities, it cannot grant an appropriate remedy.

The final point left to be discussed by the co-investigating judges, now that they had established that the trial should proceed, was whether it was also necessary to detain Duch pending trial. Referring, among other things, to the seriousness of the crimes with which Duch was charged, the co-investigating judges were of the opinion that it was.[1235]

On appeal, the lawyers for Duch tried to convince the judges

> why the more than eight years of prior detention violates both the relevant provisions of Cambodian law and applicable human rights law, as contained in Article 9 of the

[1232] Ibid.
[1233] Ibid.
[1234] See the words: "[T]he Co-Investigating Judges consider that they do not have jurisdiction to determine the legality of DUCH's prior detention." (Ibid., para. 20.)
[1235] See ibid., paras. 22-23: "[T]he acts alleged against the Charged Person are of a gravity such that, 30 years after their commission, they profoundly disrupt the public order to such a degree that it is not excessive to conclude that the release of the person concerned risks provoking, in the fragile context of today's Cambodian society, protests of indignation which could lead to violence and perhaps imperil the very safety of the person concerned. Furthermore, because DUCH may be sentenced to life imprisonment, it is feared that he may seek, as a consequence, to flee any legal action. Consequently, taking into consideration that there is a well-founded belief that KAING GUEK EAV, alias DUCH, committed the crimes with which he is charged, that provisional detention is necessary to guarantee that the Charged Person remains at the disposition of justice and to protect his safety; and that, finally, it is necessary to preserve public order; because furthermore, no bail order would be rigorous enough to ensure that these needs would be sufficiently satisfied and therefore detention remains the only means to proceed".

> ICCPR, with reference to the jurisprudence related to the abuse of process doctrine [original footnote omitted, ChP].[1236]

According to them, "this period of prior detention may be imputed to the judicial authorities responsible for the present case".[1237] Furthermore, they argued, "such prior detention was a bar to the exercise of a discretion to apply Internal Rule 63(3)[[1238]] and consider the issue of a provisional detention order with respect to proceedings before the ECCC".[1239] This last point clarifies that the lawyers were requesting a male detentus remedy with respect to the proceedings related to the provisional detention order. However, that – again – does not mean that they also want a male detentus remedy for the entire proceedings. As already explained, it appears that Duch did not attack the complete proceedings before the ECCC (because he seemingly wished to stand trial), but only the power of the co-investigating judges to order his provisional detention.

The judges of the Pre-Trial Chamber asked themselves the question "whether previous actions by other than ECCC judicial authorities have caused a violation of (...) [Article 9 of the ICCPR, ChP] entailing consequences for decisions taken by organs of the ECCC".[1240] According to them, they could only take into account a violation of this provision "when the organ responsible for the violation was

[1236] ECCC, Pre-Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Appeal Against Provisional Detention Order of Kaing Guek Eav Alias "Duch"', Criminal Case File No. 001/18-07-2007-ECCC-OCIJ (PTC01), 3 December 2007, para. 13. It may be interesting to quote the following excerpt of Mohan's article which clearly shows how the subject of human rights for suspects of the most serious international crimes is often received: "When Duch's Cambodian lawyer Kar Savuth suggested that Duch's human rights had been violated because of his 8-year pre-trial detention by the Cambodian government prior to the hearing, the largely Cambodian audience erupted into laughter. Cambodian human rights activist Kek Galabru observed that "[t]his is Cambodian style, they laugh…it's too much for them because they know that when he was torturing Cambodians there was no talk about the human rights of the victims. Even me, when I hear that, I laugh." According to Galabru, the idea of conferring human rights to an alleged human rights violator is understandably laughable for local victims of the Khmer Rouge [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Mohan 2009, pp. 2-3.)

[1237] ECCC, Pre-Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Appeal Against Provisional Detention Order of Kaing Guek Eav Alias "Duch"', Criminal Case File No. 001/18-07-2007-ECCC-OCIJ (PTC01), 3 December 2007, para. 13.

[1238] Which reads: "The Co-Investigating Judges may order the Provisional Detention of the Charged Person only where the following conditions are met: a) there is well founded reason to believe that the person may have committed the crime or crimes specified in the Introductory or Supplementary Submission; and b) The Co-Investigating Judges consider Provisional Detention to be a necessary measure to: i) prevent the Charged Person from exerting pressure on any witnesses or Victims, or prevent any collusion between the Charged Person and accomplices of crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the ECCC; ii) preserve evidence or prevent the destruction of any evidence; iii) ensure the presence of the Charged Person during the proceedings; iv) protect the security of the Charged Person; or v) preserve public order."

[1239] ECCC, Pre-Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Appeal Against Provisional Detention Order of Kaing Guek Eav Alias "Duch"', Criminal Case File No. 001/18-07-2007-ECCC-OCIJ (PTC01), 3 December 2007, para. 13.

[1240] Ibid., para. 15.

connected to an organ of the ECCC, or had been acting on behalf of any organ of the ECCC or in concert with organs of the ECCC".[1241]

It can be argued that this test is less far-reaching than the 'attribution' test of the DARS, see Chapter III, which clarifies, for example, that conduct which the now prosecuting forum acknowledges and adopts as its own, can also be attributed to it.[1242] In addition, and again raising the (arguably important) point mentioned above, one can assert that besides this legal attribution test, the prosecuting forum should also be authorised to look more generally into pre-trial irregularities if it is of the opinion that these can be seen as falling within the context of its case, even if it is, strictly speaking, not responsible for them.[1243] To again use the example of a kidnapping by private individuals before the kidnapped person is brought into the jurisdiction of the court: such conduct will not readily fall under the test used here by the ECCC (or the 'acknowledges and adopts as its own' test) but it would nevertheless be strange if the judges did not take into account the wrongs caused by such a kidnapping because it can be seen as falling with the context of the Tribunal case and because "all violations demand a remedy".

However, the judges of the ECCC did not use this test and only examined whether the prolonged detention of Duch could be legally attributed to the ECCC. In the end, referring, among other things, to the "concerted action" concept of the ICC Appeals Chamber's decision in Lubanga Dyilo,[1244] they concluded that this was not possible.[1245] In this context, the judges also looked at the point made above, namely that the Military Court detained Duch from 2002 on the basis of the ECCC law. They found that "[t]o the extent that the Military court purported to base certain actions on the pre-amendment and amended ECCC Law, this cannot have been at the direction of the ECCC"[1246] because the ECCC did not exist at that time. As already stated, the fact that the ECCC was not yet operational is indeed true and it is also accurate that this automatically means that the ECCC could not have directed the Military Court to detain Duch. Nevertheless, it is also clear that there exists a certain link between the ECCC and the provisional detention of Duch by the Military Court which justifies the judges of the ECCC looking at the irregularities committed in the context of their case. Be that as it may, the judges did not share [1242] Cf. also n. 483 for the context of international organisations.

[1241] Ibid.
[1243] See also ECCC, Pre-Trial Chamber, 'Amicus Curiae Brief [of The Center for Social Development & The Asian International Justice Initiative, ChP] Relating to the Appeal Challenging the Order of Provisional Detention of 31 July 2007', Case No. 002/14-08-2006, 3 October 2007, paras. 20 and 23: "[T]he OCIJ [the Office of the co-investigating judges, ChP] had the jurisdiction to determine and declare whether or not the Prior Detention of more than 8 years amounted to a violation of the Appellant's rights. (…) [T]he OCIJ should have proceeded to further acknowledge that it was a violation of his rights under the law. Instead, the OCIJ circumvented this issue by saying that it had no jurisdiction whatsoever to inquire into the matter."
[1244] See n. 1214 and accompanying text.
[1245] See ECCC, Pre-Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Appeal Against Provisional Detention Order of Kaing Guek Eav Alias "Duch"', Criminal Case File No. 001/18-07-2007-ECCC-OCIJ (PTC01), 3 December 2007, para. 21.
[1246] Ibid., para. 22.

this view and hence concluded that they could not look into them. (Furthermore, they opined that the co-investigating judges had correctly decided that the substantive requirements for Duch's provisional detention were met.)

Nevertheless, the judges also made a statement which resembles the one made by the co-investigating judges in the 31 July 2007 decision[1247] and which may open the door to a review of Duch's detention at a later stage:

> The Pre-Trial Chamber further observes that the Trial Chamber and the Supreme Court Chamber may determine, as submitted by the Co-Prosecutors, that it is appropriate to take any previous provisional detention, whether or not it was illegal, into account at a latter stage of the proceedings.[1248]

This point played an important role in the remainder of the proceedings. On 15 June 2009, the Trial Chamber of the ECCC considered the allegations of Duch. After having noted, among other things, the points that "the ECCC (...) is a separately constituted, independent and internationalised court",[1249] that "[t]he fact that the Military Court made reference to the ECCC law in its earlier orders (...) does not demonstrate continuity between the detention ordered by the Military Court and ECCC"[1250] and that "[t]here is no evidence of any involvement by ECCC judicial authorities in the Accused's Military Court file and in particular in its decisions concerning the detention of the Accused [original footnote omitted, ChP]",[1251] the judges made an unexpected but arguably welcome move: referring to the excerpt from the Barayagwiza case where the ICTR judges took responsibility for violations committed against the suspect, irrespective of the entity responsible, and even beyond the "constructive custody" of Barayagwiza,[1252] the judges of the ECCC stated:

> Even if a violation of the Accused's right cannot be attributed to the ECCC, international jurisprudence indicates that an international criminal tribunal has both the authority and the obligation to consider the legality of his prior detention. The ICTR Appeals Chamber decision in Barayagwiza held that a violation of an accused person's rights under the law must be acknowledged by an international criminal tribunal before which he seeks relief, even if that violation cannot be attributed to that tribunal [original footnote omitted, ChP].[1253]

[1247] See n. 1233 and accompanying text.
[1248] ECCC, Pre-Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Appeal Against Provisional Detention Order of Kaing Guek Eav Alias "Duch"', Criminal Case File No. 001/18-07-2007-ECCC-OCIJ (PTC01), 3 December 2007, para. 25. See also ibid., paras. 62-63.
[1249] ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 10.
[1250] Ibid., para. 14.
[1251] Ibid.
[1252] See n. 857 and accompanying text.
[1253] ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 16.

This task, the judges correctly observed, was separate from the situation where "previous violations of an Accused's rights are so egregious that they may preclude or restrain the exercise of an international criminal tribunal's jurisdiction on grounds of abuse of process and violation of the fundamental rights of the accused [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[1254]

Thus, judges of international criminal(ised) tribunals have a general responsibility to repair the pre-trial wrongs committed against the suspect in the context of the tribunal case, even if the tribunal was not responsible for them, and in addition to that, the judges even have discretion, in the case of very serious irregularities, to stop the proceedings under the abuse of process doctrine if they consider that to proceed with the case in such circumstances would undermine the court's integrity.[1255]

As a result, the judges of the ECCC had to ascertain whether Duch's detention before the Military Court was a violation of his rights and if so, what kinds of remedies he was consequently entitled to.[1256]

They concluded that Duch's detention indeed constituted a violation of Cambodian domestic law[1257] and also "contravene[d] his internationally-recognised right to a trial within the reasonable time and detention in accordance with the law".[1258]

[1254] Ibid. (Very remarkably, the judges referred here not only (correctly) to the Barayagwiza case, but also to paras. 26-35 of the ICC Appeals Chamber's decision in Lubanga Dyilo. However, in those paragraphs, the ICC judges first explained and then rejected the abuse of process doctrine, see n. 238 and accompanying text of Chapter X.) See also ibid., para. 35: "The case law of the ICTR Appeals Chamber nevertheless indicates that even where these violations cannot be attributed to an international tribunal or do not amount to an abuse of process, an accused may be entitled to seek a remedy for violations of his rights by national authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[1255] It is again (see also n. 1211) interesting to note that the ECCC, which is focused on the (civil law) Cambodian legal system, looked at the – from the common law stemming – abuse of process doctrine. This confirms the idea that this doctrine (or a comparable doctrine with another label) may very well be used by courts with a more civil law background. Thus, the fact that the judges in the Pre-Trial Chamber (see the decision of 3 December 2007) did not go into the abuse of process doctrine, can probably not be seen as evidence for the idea that the ECCC does not want to apply the – from the common law stemming – abuse of process doctrine. See on this point Ryngaert 2008, pp. 727-728.

[1256] See ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 17.

[1257] See ibid., paras. 19-20: "In 1999, the Cambodian government (...) promulgated the Law on Duration of Pre-Trial Detention of 1999, which imposed a maximum ceiling of three years' provisional detention in relation to genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity charges. The Accused appears to have been held under this latter law for nearly eight years and therefore illegally until his transfer to the ECCC in July 2007. (...) There appears to have been no substantial and systematic investigation throughout the period of detention and there was a general lack of reasoning setting out the legal basis for the various detentions. It also appears from the military file that in some instances, the extension of the detention was ordered by the Prosecutor alone, and not the Investigating Judge. Further, several laws on which the Military Court relied appear to have been applied retroactively, in violation of the rights of the Accused under Cambodia and international law [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[1258] Ibid., para. 21. (This conclusion may not seem very surprising as the co-investigating judges, in their decision of 31 July 2007, had also noted that Duch's detention was "problematic in light of international standards of justice and, more specifically, articles 9(3) and 14(3)(c) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which states that any individual arrested or detained for a criminal offence

Notwithstanding this, they also concluded that there was nothing wrong with Duch's provisional detention under the authority of the ECCC (as from 31 July 2007). As a result, the only problem left to tackle was to determine the remedies Duch was entitled to with respect to his unlawful detention before the Military Court.

However, before turning to the remedies with respect to the violations engendered by this detention, the judges also stipulated that Duch, if convicted, was entitled to credit for the duration of his pre-trial detention, not only the pre-trial detention under the authority of the ECCC (as from 31 July 2007)[1259] but also the pre-trial detention under the authority of the Military Court (as from 10 May 1999).[1260] This was because Duch "would have been entitled to credit for time served from 10 May 1999 to 31 July 2007, had he been brought to trial before the Military Court".[1261] Now that the latter Court had terminated its case against Duch, Duch was no longer going to be brought before that Court.[1262] Thus, it was appropriate that the ECCC would give Duch credit for these years, especially since Duch "was detained before the Military Court for investigations of allegations broadly similar to those being considered in this trial".[1263]

With respect to remedies for the violations committed in the context of Duch's unlawful pre-trial detention, the judges referred to the observation of the Appeals Chamber in Nikolić that the correct "balance must ... be maintained between the fundamental rights of the accused and the essential interests of the international community in the prosecution of persons charged with serious violations of international humanitarian law [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[1264] It must be emphasised again that this balance must never be understood to mean that enforcers should be less concerned about the human rights of suspects of genocide than those of suspects of fraud.[1265] All suspects are human beings and as such entitled to

---

shall be entitled to a trial within a reasonable time period or to be released", see n. 1196 and accompanying text.)

[1259] See ibid., para. 27.

[1260] See ibid., para. 28.

[1261] Ibid.

[1262] See ibid.

[1263] Ibid.

[1264] Ibid., para. 31.

[1265] For example, if authorities which can be linked to the prosecuting court have kidnapped a person, that court must decisively refuse jurisdiction if it does not want to legally approve such reprehensible conduct, whether the kidnapped person is charged with fraud or genocide. Cf. also Mohan 2009, pp. 24-25: "The legitimacy of the Khmer Rouge trials require that an alleged genocidaire receives all the benefits of due process and legality he himself denied to his victims. To treat a genocidaire otherwise than with fairness would result in the tribunal descending to the same level of disrespect for the rule of law and render the proceedings a show trial [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Mogan (ibid., p. 25) also points to the influence such a decision could have on Cambodian justice system. (Cf. in that respect also the already-mentioned words of Swart 2001, p. 201, writing about the ICTY/ICTR and the "negative consequences that transcend the limited framework of the Tribunals".) Indeed, internationalised criminal tribunals are even closer to a State's own legal system than the ICTY/ICTR, which may increase the detrimental effect of an incorrect decision by the tribunal on the national level.

human rights. Moreover, every violation must be remedied.[1266] However, the Appeals Chamber's remark can be supported to the extent that it means that the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged (and hence the importance of continuing the trial) may play a role in determining the appropriate remedy in the case of a violation (in the context of the abuse of process doctrine[1267] and in the context of the consequences of a determination that the person's arrest/detention was unlawful).[1268]

As explained earlier, it must be admitted that that may mean that a suspect of less serious crimes may be better off than a suspect of serious crimes.[1269] Imagine the situation that a suspect of minor domestic crimes becomes the victim of a kidnapping by private individuals in which the authorities of the now prosecuting forum were not involved and during which he was not mistreated before being brought to the national judge. In such a situation, it would not be surprising if the national judge were to refuse to exercise jurisdiction and to release the suspect because of, on the one hand, the rather serious male captus and, on the other, the minor importance of having this person prosecuted. However, if the person is charged with genocide, one can imagine that the judge (whether it be a judge at the national or at the tribunal level) would continue the case and grant the person other remedies. Although the seriousness of the male captus is the same in both cases, the importance of having this person prosecuted will probably tip the balance, ensuring that the trial will continue and that the suspect will receive other less far-reaching remedies for the wrongs he suffered. Notwithstanding this, a male detentus remedy is never excluded, even in the case of a suspect of very serious crimes.

Returning to the Duch case, the judges then repeated, referring to Rwamakuba, the strict legal attribution test that "[v]iolations of an accused person's rights by external authorities will only be attributed to an international tribunal where there

[1266] Cf. also Swart 2001, p. 201 (see also n. 133): "Persons suspected or accused of international crimes should be no less entitled to respect for their basic individual rights than any other suspects or accused."

[1267] See also Ryngaert (2008, p. 732), writing on the abuse of process doctrine: "It is a doctrine that the tribunal is not required to invoke, but that it may do if it believes that the fairness of the entire proceedings may suffer as a consequence of the prior violations. Because the tribunal's decision is a discretionary one, it may rely on any criteria it deems fit in order to assess whether application of the abuse of process doctrine to the case would be warranted. There is no reason why gravity of the crime could not be one of them."

[1268] See, for example, the discussion of this topic in the Dokmanović and Nikolić cases.

[1269] Cf. Ryngaert 2008, p. 720, writing about the abuse of process doctrine: "[A] high standard of applying abuse of process in international criminal law – resulting in less protection for the defendant's rights – is appropriate, in the light of the grave crimes for which the defendants are prosecuted before international criminal tribunals." Ryngaert refers in that respect, among other things, to the Eichmann case. Although it was explained earlier that the judges in Israel did not apply the male captus bene detentus principle because of the seriousness of the crimes with which Eichmann was charged, Ryngaert is not referring to the reaction of the Israeli judges, but to the reaction of the international community in general, see ibid., p. 732. As already explained in the context of the proceedings before the UNSC, it seems that in that context, the seriousness of Eichmann's crimes was indeed taken into account to, in a way, approve the trial in Israel, see n. 521 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

has been concerted action between the international tribunal and those authorities in respect of these violations [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[1270]

However, the judges continued, referring to Barayagwiza (but in fact repeating verbatim the words of the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo),[1271] "[t]he abuse of process doctrine constitutes an additional guarantee of the rights of the accused".[1272] A little earlier (and see also Chapter X), it was argued that the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber incorrectly presented the abuse of process doctrine, demanding the involvement of "national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal [original footnote omitted, ChP]" (whereas the abuse of process arguably requires serious violations irrespective of the entity possible).[1273] Very interestingly, the judges of the ECCC presented a slightly different version of the abuse of process doctrine, a version which, as concerns the above-mentioned point, is arguably better:

> The abuse of process doctrine constitutes an additional guarantee of the rights of the accused and may apply even in circumstances where there is no concerted action between the international criminal tribunal and the external authorities.[[1274]] This doctrine, which would require a tribunal to decline to exercise its jurisdiction in a partic[u]lar case, has been narrowly construed and limited to cases where the illegal conduct in question is such as to make it repugnant to the rule of law to put the accused on trial.[[1275]] Where the violations in question are not attributable to an international tribunal, this doctrine appears to be confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by the external authorities and has most usually been applied in relation to the process of arrest and transfer [emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP].[1276]

However, such serious situations did not apply here: "although the Accused's prior detention amounted to a clear violation of his rights, absent allegations of torture or serious mistreatment by the national authorities,[1277] this would appear insufficient to

---

[1270] ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 32.
[1271] See n. 1216 and accompanying text.
[1272] ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 33.
[1273] See also n. 1216 and accompanying text.
[1274] Here, the judges referred to para. 73 of the first Barayagwiza decision where it was stated that "under the abuse of process doctrine, it is irrelevant which entity or entities were responsible for the alleged violations of the Appellant's rights."
[1275] Here, the judges referred to the ICC Appeals Chamber's decision in Lubanga Dyilo, but again, it must be stressed that the judges in that decision explicitly rejected the abuse of process doctrine. See also ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 34, n. 55.
[1276] Ibid., para. 33.
[1277] Although the words now used are "national authorities", this can be explained by the application of the theory to this specific case. However, that does not jeopardise the general test, which more broadly speaks of "external authorities".

debar the exercise of the ECCC's discretion to order provisional detention".[1278] One could argue that the judges placed too much emphasis on the often-used examples here: serious mistreatment/torture.[1279] Conversely, they should assess for themselves whether Duch's prior detention can be seen as such a serious male captus that it would be "repugnant to the rule of law" to put him on trial.

However, what the judges did do correctly is to consequently note that besides the attribution test and the abuse of process doctrine, the Barayagwiza case indicated that "an accused may be entitled to seek a remedy for violations of his rights by national authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[1280] One could, of course, think here of a reduction of the sentence and financial compensation. Although such remedies could, in the end, very well be appropriate here,[1281] the judges, like the ones in Semanza, see footnote 1003, do not mention the fact that strictly speaking, Duch, like every person unlawfully arrested or detained, would first be entitled to the remedy of release:

> Should the Accused be convicted, the Chamber finds him to be entitled to a remedy, to be decided by the Chamber at the sentencing stage, for the time spent unlawfully in detention before the Cambodian Military Court between 10 May 1999 and 30 July 2007. Where an Accused is acquitted, the international case law instead indicates that he may seek compensation before the national authorities responsible for the violation of his rights. If acquitted, the Accused would thus be entitled to pursue remedies available within the Cambodian national law in relation to time spent in detention and any violation of his rights whilst in the custody of the Cambodian Military Court [original footnote omitted, ChP].[1282]

[1278] ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 34.

[1279] Interestingly in that respect is that the judges left out two important words which can be found in the ICC Pre-trial Chamber's decision in Lubanga Dyilo, namely that the abuse of process doctrine has been restricted to serious mistreatment/torture to date (which does not exclude other examples in the future). See n. 1216 and accompanying text.

[1280] ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 35.

[1281] But see Mohan (2009, pp. 14-15), who still wrote at a time when the Trial Chamber had not yet issued its decision and who deemed these remedies only appropriate as an alternative option and thus found that Duch's detention is so serious that the ECCC judges must invoke the abuse of process doctrine and stay the proceedings: "Duch's continuous prior detention of more than 8 years without any demonstrable attempt to bring him to trial flouts Cambodian criminal procedure and is prima facie unlawful, violating his fundamental right to a trial within a reasonable time or to release. Having acknowledged that the prior detention was "problematic in light of international standards of justice", the ECCC's pre-trial courts should have proceeded to examine, determine and declare the illegality of this detention under both Cambodian and international law. Consistent with international jurisprudence, the ECCC's pre-trial courts should have granted declaratory relief allocating responsibility for human rights violations to the Cambodian government and terminate proceedings in view of the egregious abuse of the court's process. Alternatively, if the courts had come to the conclusion that Duch's rights "have been violated, but not egregiously so", they could have insisted that the ECCC's Trial Chamber reduce the sentence imposed, in the event of a conviction or award Duch financial compensation for the violation, in the event of an acquittal [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[1282] See ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, paras. 36-37.

This is a very important decision for it confirms the Barayagwiza idea that every violation of the rights of the suspect in the context of a tribunal case, even if these violations have not been committed by authorities which can be linked to the prosecuting forum and even if the arrest/detention was not executed at the request/behest of the tribunal, hence beyond the scope of the suspect's constructive custody, must be remedied. Thus, the tribunal will also take responsibility for wrongs for which it is not responsible, simply because these wrongs occur in the context of the tribunal case and because basic fairness demands that the now prosecuting forum, in whose context these violations were committed, repairs these wrongs. Therefore, it is not clear why the ECCC's Trial Chamber states, in its very last words and after having shown that it will take responsibility for wrongs, even if it is not responsible for them,[1283] that Duch should turn to the Cambodian authorities for compensation if he is acquitted. From cases such as Barayagwiza and Semanza, it is not apparent that compensation had to be sought from the national authorities.[1284] After the sentence "international case law indicates...", the judges of the ECCC refer to the Rwamakuba case. However, that case arguably only supports the idea that the judges, if certain violations cannot be seen as falling within the context of a tribunal case, do not need to take responsibility for these violations. That is very logical. After all, judges are not obliged to take responsibility for violations which have nothing to do with the tribunal case. However, if judges deem that certain violations do fall within the context of their case, they (and not the judges at the national level) should remedy these violations, whether a suspect is convicted or acquitted.

6 FINAL INTERESTING OBSERVATIONS STEMMING FROM THE CONTEXT OF THE INTERNATIONALISED CRIMINAL TRIBUNALS

This study has found no other case in the context of the internationalised criminal tribunals other than Duch which so clearly goes into the male captus issue. Nevertheless, it may be interesting to mention a few final interesting observations from this context which address topics which, more generally, can be connected to this book's central topic and which have been mentioned earlier in this chapter.

[1283] After all, the ECCC will reduce the sentence of Duch, if the latter is convicted, because of the illegal detention for which the ECCC itself is not responsible.

[1284] In the Barayagwiza case, it was held "that for the violation of his rights the Appellant is entitled to a remedy, to be fixed at the time of judgement at first instance, as follows: a) If the Appellant is found not guilty, he shall receive financial compensation; b) If the Appellant is found guilty, his sentence shall be reduced to take account of the violation of his rights." (See n. 922 and accompanying text.) In Semanza, it was stated "that for the violation of his rights, the Appellant is entitled to a remedy which shall be given when judgement is rendered by the Trial Chamber, as follows: (a) If he is found not guilty, the Appellant shall be entitled to financial compensation; (b) If he is found guilty, the Appellant's sentence shall be reduced to take into account the violation of his rights, pursuant to Article 23 of the Statute." (See n. 1004 and accompanying text.)

For example, in the already briefly mentioned[1285] Brima case before the SCSL,[1286] Judge Itoe eloquently confirmed the idea already expressed in the Barayagwiza case[1287] that a suspect must be able to ask the prosecuting forum to review the legality of his detention, even if the statute of the tribunal before which he stands does not contain an explicit possibility to file a writ of habeas corpus:

> It is my opinion that because the right to liberty is too sacred to be violated by whoever, any Court faced with or called upon to rule on applications of this nature, in whatever form they may be brought, should, for reasons based on the universal resolve and determination to uphold by all lawful means, respect by all and sundry and in all circumstances, of this entrenched fundamental human right, should entertain such applications and refrain from dismissing them merely on technical pretexts or niceties, geared at and designed to prevent them from being entertained and examined. (…) I agree with the submission of the Respondents that the procedure for granting a release through a Writ of "Habeas Corpus" features nowhere in the Rules for Procedure and Evidence which are applicable to the Special Court. However, entertaining this Writ is dictated by the imperatives of universally ensuring the respect of human rights and liberties.[1288]

In another decision of the SCSL, the judges focused on the – for this study – most interesting situation of the abuse of process doctrine, the one which looks at the broad concept of a fair trial/the integrity of the proceedings:

> At the root of the doctrine of abuse of process is fairness. The fairness that is involved is not fairness in the process of adjudication itself but fairness in the use of the machinery of justice. The consideration is not only about unfairness to the party complaining but also whether to permit such use of the machinery of justice will bring the administration of justice into disrepute.[1289]

[1285] See n. 603 of Chapter III and ns. 205, 242 and 832 of the present chapter.

[1286] It must be noted that in the context of this internationalised criminal tribunal, one will also find allegations of illegal arrests/detentions/transfers, see, for example, SCSL, Trial Chamber, The Prosecutor against Moinina Fofana, 'Decision on the Urgent Defence Application for Release from Provisional Detention', Case No. SCSL-2003-11-PD, 21 November 2003 and SCSL, Trial Chamber, The Prosecutor against Allieu Kondewa, 'Decision on the Urgent Defence Application for Release from Provisional Detention', Case No. SCSL-2003-12-PD, 21 November 2003. However, in these cases, the claims of the Defence were quickly rejected. (See also n. 3 of Chapter IV.)

[1287] See n. 863 and accompanying text.

[1288] SCSL, Trial Chamber, The Prosecutor against Tamba Alex Brima, 'Ruling on the Application for the Issue of a Writ of Habeas Corpus Filed by the Applicant', Case No. SCSL-03-06-PT, 22 July 2003, p. 7. At ibid., p. 9, reference is then made to the para. 88 of the first Barayagwiza decision, see n. 863 and accompanying text. (See also n. 929.)

[1289] SCSL, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor Against Morris Kallon (Case No. SCSL-2004-15-AR72(E)) and Brima Bazzy Kamara (Case No. SCSL-2004-16-AR72(E)), 'Decision on Challenge to Jurisdiction: Lomé Accord Amnesty', 13 March 2004, para. 79.

This observation was confirmed in the case Brima, Kamara and Kanu[1290] where the judges subsequently clarified that, within the context of the abuse of process doctrine, one may also take into account, the element of the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged:

> The Trial Chamber wishes to emphasise that the operation of judicial discretion involves an assessment of the nature and severity of the crimes with which the accused is charged, weighed against the abuse of process that continuing the prosecution would engender.[1291]

In the same case, the judges also supported the Barayagwiza reasoning that a tribunal may stay the proceedings under the abuse of process doctrine, even if authorities which can be connected to the tribunal were not responsible for the violations.[1292]

The final words of this chapter are saved for to the newest internationalised criminal tribunal, the STL.[1293] Although it is still unclear as to how the case against those who are allegedly responsible for the attack of 14 February 2005 in Beirut which killed former Lebanese Prime Minister Hariri and 22 others is going to develop, it is interesting to note that the STL may be confronted by Duch-like submissions in the future. On 30 August 2005, the Lebanese authorities arrested and detained four generals (Al-Sayyed, Al-Hajj, Azar and Hamdan), "pursuant to arrest warrants issued by the Lebanese Prosecutor General based on recommendations from the Commission that there was probable cause to arrest and detain them for conspiracy to commit murder in connection with the assassination of Rafiq Hariri [original footnotes omitted, ChP]".[1294] The 'Commission' mentioned here is the UN International Independent Investigation Commission (UNIIIC), the predecessor – of [1290] See SCSL, Trial Chamber, Prosecutor Against Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara and Santigie Borbor Kanu, 'Written Reasons for the Trial Chamber's Oral Decision on the Defence Motion on Abuse of Process Due to Infringement of Principles of Nullum Crimen Sine Lege and Non-Retroactivity as to Several Counts', Case No. SCSL-04-16-PT, 31 March 2004, para. 18.

[1291] Ibid., para. 25. The judges referred here to the following words stemming from the Mullen case (and not from the Bennett case as the SCSL judges indicated), see ibid., where mention is made of situations "in which the seriousness of the crime is so great relative to the nature of the abuse of process that it would be a proper exercise of judicial discretion to permit a prosecution to proceed or to allow a conviction to stand notwithstanding an abuse of process in relation to the defendant's presence within the jurisdiction. In each case it is a matter of discretionary balance, to be approached with regard to the particular conduct complained of and the particular offence charged [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[1292] See ibid., para. 26.

[1293] See also Swart 2007, p. 1153.

[1294] STL, Pre-Trial Judge, 'Submission of the Prosecutor to the Pre-Trial Judge Under Rule 17 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence' (Confidential), Case No. CH/PTJ/2009/004, 27 April 2009, para. 15. The Prosecutor of the STL refers here to the Report of the International Independent Investigation Commission established pursuant to Security Council resolution 1595 (2005), Beirut, 19 October 2005 (available at: http://www.stl-tsl.org/x/file/TheRegistry/Library/BackgroundDocuments/ReportsoftheUNIIIC/2005-10-20%20UNIIIC%20Report-EN.pdf), para. 174.

sorts – of the STL's OTP.[1295] Although these generals were thus in detention from 2005, the STL only began functioning on 1 March 2009.[1296] As from 10 April 2009, when the Lebanese authorities "referred to the Prosecutor the results of the investigation and a copy of the court's records regarding the Hariri case",[1297] and when the STL was thus officially seized of the case, the generals were detained under the legal authority of the STL.[1298] According to Rule 17 (B) of the STL RPE, the Prosecutor must file "[a]s soon as practicable, (…) reasoned submissions together with any supporting material stating, for each person on the list, whether he requests the continuation of his detention". In this context, Pre-Trial Judge Daniel Fransen stated on 15 April 2009:

> [I]n order to rule as soon as possible on whether these persons should continue to be detained and to ensure that the basic requirements for the protection of human rights are met, the Pre-Trial Judge holds that a time limit must be set for the filing of the Application by the Prosecutor. Indeed, the persons detained are presumed innocent and freedom is the principle, detention the exception.[1299]

On 27 April 2009, the Prosecutor submitted his Application. Although he stressed that it did not "address the detention of the individuals in question prior to the [1295] See Art. 17 ('Practical arrangements') (a) of the Annex ('Agreement between the United Nations and the Lebanese Republic on the establishment of a Special Tribunal for Lebanon') to UNSC Res. 1757 of 30 May 2007: "Appropriate arrangements shall be made to ensure that there is a coordinated transition from the activities of the International Independent Investigation Commission, established by the Security Council in its resolution 1595 (2005), to the activities of the Office of the Prosecutor". See further STL, Pre-Trial Judge, 'Order Regarding the Detention of Persons Detained in Lebanon in Connection with the Case of the Attack Against Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri and Others', Case No. CH/PTJ/2009/06, 29 April 2009, para. 25: "[H]aving directed the work of the Investigation Commission, which began investigating in June 2005, having conducted his own investigations and received the records provided by the Lebanese authorities, the Prosecutor has an in-depth knowledge of the Hariri case file [emphasis added, ChP]." See finally C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 54, noting that the UNIIIC "only later became the STL's Office of the Prosecutor once the STL was established".

[1296] See STL, Pre-Trial Judge, 'Order Regarding the Detention of Persons Detained in Lebanon in Connection with the Case of the Attack Against Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri and Others', Case No. CH/PTJ/2009/06, 29 April 2009, para. 1.

[1297] STL, Pre-Trial Judge, 'Order Setting a Time Limit for Filing of an Application by the Prosecutor in Accordance with Rule 17 (B) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Case No. CH/PTJ/2009/03, 15 April 2009, para. 5.

[1298] See STL, Pre-Trial Judge, 'Order Setting a Time Limit for Filing of an Application by the Prosecutor in Accordance with Rule 17 (B) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Case No. CH/PTJ/2009/03, 15 April 2009, para. 5. See also STL, Pre-Trial Judge, 'Order Regarding the Detention of Persons Detained in Lebanon in Connection with the Case of the Attack Against Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri and Others', Case No. CH/PTJ/2009/06, 29 April 2009, para. 5.

[1299] STL, Pre-Trial Judge, 'Order Setting a Time Limit for Filing of an Application by the Prosecutor in Accordance with Rule 17 (B) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', Case No. CH/PTJ/2009/03, 15 April 2009, para. 7. In this order, the Pre-Trial Judge also referred to the importance of the right to habeas corpus and the Barayagwiza case, see ibid., para. 14, n. 2.

deferral of the Hariri case to the Tribunal",[1300] he nevertheless explained how the suspects came into the power of the STL and that they had been arrested and detained in Lebanon as from 30 August 2005.[1301] He explained "that information gathered to date in relation to the possible involvement of the four detained persons in the attack against Rafiq Hariri has not proved sufficiently credible to warrant the filing of an indictment against any of them".[1302] Because of that, he could not request their provisional detention and would not oppose their release.[1303] However, he also clarified that his submission was "made without prejudice to any further action that the Prosecutor may wish to take in the future in relation to any person".[1304]

The Pre-Trial Judge, who also emphasised that he would only "address the matter of provisional detention at the current stage of the investigation",[1305] but nevertheless also noted "the context in which the Submission is made, that is to say the detention of these persons in Lebanon since 30 August 2005",[1306] agreed with the Prosecutor's Application and thus released the generals. However, as was also mentioned by the Prosecutor, this was "without prejudice to any possible future prosecution before the Tribunal".[1307]

[1300] STL, Pre-Trial Judge, 'Submission of the Prosecutor to the Pre-Trial Judge Under Rule 17 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence' (Confidential), Case No. CH/PTJ/2009/004, 27 April 2009, para. 5.
[1301] See ibid., para. 15.
[1302] Ibid., para. 29.
[1303] See ibid., para. 31.
[1304] Ibid., para. 33.
[1305] STL, Pre-Trial Judge, 'Order Regarding the Detention of Persons Detained in Lebanon in Connection with the Case of the Attack Against Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri and Others', Case No. CH/PTJ/2009/06, 29 April 2009, para. 23.
[1306] Ibid., para. 37.
[1307] Ibid., para. 23.

As a result, it may very well be that in the future, if one of the four generals is re-arrested at the request of the STL, that he, like Duch in the context of the ECCC, will complain about and ask for remedies with respect to his pre-trial detention in Lebanon, which may very well be seen as falling within the context of the STL case, even if the STL had only detained the generals under its legal authority as from 10 April 2009.[1308] [1308] See also the following words from the statement of Mr Bellemare (then Commissioner of the UNIIIC and later Prosecutor of the STL), during the presentation of the UNIIIC's eleventh report to the UNSC: "I cannot conclude my presentation without referring to the situation of the detainees in the Hariri case. This is an issue that is of interest to many, and rightly so. I can assure the Council that this is an issue that is also important to me. As I mentioned in my report, the Commission has continued to share with the Lebanese authorities all the information required to allow them to make a decision on the detainees. Moreover, the detention has been discussed with the Lebanese judicial authorities, with whom I have shared my views. Again, I can only reiterate, as the Minister of Justice of Lebanon forcefully did during a recent television interview, that the Commission gives information to the Lebanese judicial authorities, but that the power of the judicial authorities is absolute on these matters. If transferred to The Hague, the detainees will then be in a position to seek new remedies before the Tribunal. Meanwhile, as Minister Najjar said, no one gives orders to the Lebanese judiciary [emphasis added, ChP]." (UNSC, Sixty-third year, 6047th meeting, Wednesday, 17 December 2008, 10 a.m., New York, UN Doc. S/PV.6047), p. 4.) See also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 53, n. 206.

CHAPTER VII
CREATING AN EXTERNAL EVALUATIVE FRAMEWORK: PRINCIPLES DISTILLED FROM PART 3

1 INTRODUCTION

It is, of course, not an easy task to distil principles from so much case law, especially since many decisions did not excel in their clarity – to say the least. However, a few elements from these cases are definitely worth of attention and hence deserve to be mentioned here. The next section will address the principles distilled from the inter-State context discussed in Chapter V and the third section of this chapter will deal with the principles from the context of the international(ised) criminal tribunals, which was examined in Chapter VI of this book.

2 PRINCIPLES DISTILLED FROM THE CASES BETWEEN STATES

Before presenting the principles from this context, it should be reiterated (see also Chapter IV) that, due to the huge amount of available male captus case law in this context, the overview, even though it was rather extensive, consisted of 'merely' a selection of the most interesting cases. Hence, the principles must be accepted with caution for it is possible that if the overview consisted of even more cases, some principles might have been formulated a little differently. However, notwithstanding this caveat, it seems that the following conclusions, the accuracy of which has also been tested with help of views from literature, have a deal of support in the practice of courts in the inter-State context and therefore can be used for the purposes of this book. As will be shown in the following pages, the focus of this section is on the more recent cases. Although the older cases will also be used to show how the law has developed, the most interesting thing is, of course, to find out what the current status of the law is (acknowledging, of course, that some principles which are valid today may have deep roots in old cases).

Most judges in the older male captus cases continued exercising jurisdiction, stating that they could not[1] or did not want to (because it would make no difference anyway)[2] look at the way a person was brought into the jurisdiction of the State of the now prosecuting court,[3] even if irregularities might have been committed (by authorities from that State)[4] in the pre-trial phase abroad (male captus bene detentus).[5] As such, they adhered to the non-inquiry rule and a restricted notion of a fair trial, excluding that phase which had in fact ensured that the person was brought to the courtroom in the first place. The Jolis case was a clear exception to these male captus bene detentus cases, but it must also be remembered that in that case, there was an unambiguous protest (and a request for the return of Jolis) from the injured State (Belgium) against the illegal arrest executed by French authorities on Belgium territory. Such a protest was lacking in the above-mentioned male captus bene detentus cases, because there was no clear violation of State sovereignty (for example, because the male captus was allegedly committed by authorities from the State of residence,[6] because the authorities of both States worked together in the arrest,[7] because the State of residence did not have an effective government at the time of the male captus[8] or because the person making the arrest could be seen as a private individual rather than a State agent)[9] or, even if there was, the injured State did not protest.[10] One can only guess what these courts would have decided if there had been a clear violation of State sovereignty followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect, although the fact that most judges by that time adhered to the non-inquiry rule could mean that they would probably have stated that international matters were to be resolved by the Executives of the two States involved and not by the judge, who must only ensure that crimes are prosecuted.[11]

[1] See, for example, Scott.
[2] See, for example, Ker.

---

[3] Some courts used both arguments, see, for example, Sinclair and Elliott.

[4] See, for example, Scott.

[5] It must be noted, however, that the male captus bene detentus maxim could not be seen as rule of customary international law. This is because customary international law demands that a State acts in a certain way (State practice), but also acts as such because that State believes it has a legal obligation under international law to do so (opinio iuris). However, the male captus bene detentus courts did not continue to exercise jurisdiction, notwithstanding the occurrence of a male captus, because they were of the opinion that international law dictated that solution. See Borelli 2004, p. 354: "[G]iven the absence of references by domestic courts to any international law norm providing for the application of the male captus doctrine and the consequent lack of opinio iuris, it would have been improper to qualify the principle as an international customary norm. Nevertheless, given the consistency of national case law on the matter, one could arguably have framed it as a "general principle of law recognized by civilised nations" [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., n. 92: "Domestic courts have never claimed that the application of the male captus doctrine was required by international law. The doctrine was almost invariably applied on the basis of domestic law norms, in particular those regulating the relationship between the judiciary and the executive." See also the remainder of this chapter with respect to male captus male detentus and customary international law.

[6] See, for example, Sinclair.

[7] See, for example, Elliott.

[8] See, for example, Ker.

[9] See, for example, Ker.

[10] See, for example, Scott.

[11] Cf. the Argoud case (where it was unclear whether there was such a formal protest and request for the return of Argoud but where the Court appeared to state that even if the injured State had formally protested the male captus and had requested the return of Argoud, this would have been of no concern to the Judiciary). For the, in the main text, above-mentioned traditional rationales of the male captus bene detentus rule, see also Michell 1996, p. 392 (see also ns. 6, 8 and 14 of Chapter V): "Traditionally, the rationale underlying the male captus bene detentus principle has been threefold. First, the rule satisfies

Likewise, one can only surmise what the Court in Jolis would have decided had there not been a protest from Belgium; it may very well be that if Belgium had not complained about the matter, the case of Jolis would have continued as normal, especially since sovereignty violations by that time could only be brought forward by the injured State and not by the individual, whose role in the international plane was still insignificant.[12]

With the arrival of human rights treaties such as the ICCPR and the rising status of the individual in the international context, judges appeared to pay more attention to concepts such as 'fair trial' and were more willing to look at the pre-trial phase abroad, independently of the question of whether or not there had been a protest from the injured State. This is arguably a good development if one does not want individuals to remain, in the words of Eichmann's counsel, toys of States.

Because of this development, one might argue that the era of male captus bene detentus is over and that male captus male detentus or ex iniuria ius non oritur is now the new preferred guideline for judges. However, looking at the alleged pre-trial irregularities is not the same as issuing male captus male detentus decisions.

Even though the old(-fashioned) version of the male captus bene detentus rule (in that judges cannot or will not look at how the suspect came into the jurisdiction of the State of the now prosecuting court) indeed seems to have been (rightly) abandoned,[13] many judges still issue decisions which could be qualified as male captus bene detentus decisions; not because they state that they cannot or will not look at alleged pre-trial irregularities abroad (and hence that they are going to exercise jurisdiction, regardless of the circumstances in which the suspect came into the jurisdiction of the State of the now prosecuting court), but because they are of the opinion that, having investigated the pre-trial phase abroad, the alleged male captus in question is not serious enough to divest jurisdiction: (a not so serious) male captus bene detentus.

Much will depend here on the exact circumstances and the question of how those circumstances are to be weighed in the balancing exercise which judges clearly prefer.[14] domestic due process guarantees. According to this view, a criminal defendant is entitled only to a fair trial, and forcible abduction does not affect the fairness of the trial itself. Second, there is a strong public interest in the prosecution of crime. The rule ensures that alleged offenders are brought to trial. Finally, the judiciary traditionally has held the view that courts are not the appropriate forum to adjudicate alleged violations of public international law by the executive. Instead, courts have adopted the position that any difficulties arising from an irregular arrest are best resolved diplomatically."

---

[12] See, for example, Eichmann and Argoud.

[13] See, however, Vervuren, where the Court held that Sinclair was technically speaking still good law and Alvarez-Machain, where the judges followed Ker. Nevertheless, it must also be noted that both cases received sharp criticism. Note finally that in two other more recent (French) cases, Ramirez Sánchez, and, to a lesser extent, Barbie, the judges appeared to be especially interested in the fairness of the proceedings in court.

[14] The aftermath of Ebrahim has clearly shown that judges prefer the discretionary approach and not the automatic one as used in this South African case. This also means that the male captus bene detentus principle is still the starting point from which judges depart; in principle, they have jurisdiction. It only needs to be found out whether this jurisdiction must be refused because of the male captus in this

In some instances, the male captus is deemed to be so serious that judges are of the opinion that refusing jurisdiction is the only way to protect such values as respect for another State's sovereignty,[15] due process of law/human rights of the suspect[16] and the rule of law/the integrity of the (executive/judicial) proceedings.[17] Much used in that respect is the abuse of process doctrine, which stems from the common law context but whose rationale can arguably also be found in the reasonings of judges from other legal contexts:[18] courts in principle have jurisdiction specific case. Cf. also Rayfuse 1993, p. 893: "Courts in other jurisdictions, while accepting and restating the general proposition that the court has jurisdiction, have occasionally exercised their discretion in favour of a defendant [emphasis added, ChP]".

[15] See, for example, one of the possibilities to refuse jurisdiction under the Toscanino exception (an abduction violating another State's sovereignty and followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from the injured State), a possibility which was followed in Al-Moayad (and confirmed by the ECtHR). See also Ebrahim (where there was not even a protest from the injured State). A general male captus male detentus remark regarding respect for State sovereignty (where no protest from the injured State was mentioned as a requirement either) can also be found in the Beahan case, but in that case, the concrete end result could nevertheless be qualified as male captus bene detentus, for it was not established that the prosecuting State had committed an abduction violating another State's sovereignty (the male captus necessary to lead to a male detentus result).

[16] See, for example, the other possibility to refuse jurisdiction under the Toscanino exception (see also the previous footnote), namely an abduction accompanied by serious mistreatment/serious human rights violations. This possibility was also followed in Al-Moayad (and confirmed by the ECtHR). See also Ebrahim for human rights considerations. (Note that it was explained in Chapter III of this book that the remedies which can be connected to violations of the relevant human rights (for example the release if the judge is of the opinion that a person's arrest/detention is unlawful) as such cannot be equated with male detentus outcomes (refusal of jurisdiction/dismissal of the indictment). Nevertheless, it is clear that serious human rights violations in the male captus may lead to a male detentus result. Thus, it can be argued that the rise of human rights law has certainly played a role in the rise of the male captus male detentus rule, even though human rights law as such does not contain male detentus remedies.)

[17] See, for example, Hartley, Levinge, Ebrahim, Beahan and Bennett. Cf. for these values also more generally Sloan 2003 B, pp. 546-547: "By one approach, which may be summarized by the maxim male captus, male detentus, the national court would refuse jurisdiction where the circumstances of the accused's capture were sufficiently irregular. Among the reasons given by these national courts for refusing jurisdiction in such circumstances have been the following: (i) the rule of law; (ii) the integrity of the executive branch (it must not be rewarded for illegal behaviour); (iii) the integrity of the judicial branch; (iv) the fairness of the legal process; and (v) respect for state sovereignty [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[18] See, for example, the 1985 Stocké case (see ns. 512-513 and 516-517 and accompanying text of Chapter V) and the decision the German Federal Constitutional Court issued one year later: BVerfG (3. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 3.6 1986 – 2 BvR 837/85. NJW 1986, Heft 48, pp. 3021-3022 (see ns. 522-523 and 526 and accompanying text of Chapter V). Note that also in the Ebrahim case, words resembling the abuse of process doctrine were used: "The individual must be protected against illegal detention and abduction, the bounds of jurisdiction must not be exceeded, sovereignty must be respected, the legal process must be fair to those affected and abuse of law must be avoided in order to protect and promote the integrity of the administration of justice [emphasis added, ChP]." (Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 896.) Cf. also Nsereko 2008, p. 61: "Invoking the abuse of process doctrine, the South African court nullified the proceedings." Note, however, that in that case, the Court did not state that judges had a discretion to consider whether the violations of these values had to lead to a refusal of jurisdiction. It simply stated that these violations entailed that the judges had no jurisdiction to try the case. See finally also Beahan (see n. 713 of Chapter V) and the reasoning of Acting Justice of Appeal O'Linn in the Mushwena case (see n. 781 and accompanying text of Chapter V).

(bene detentus) but will use their discretion not to exercise that jurisdiction (male detentus) if the male captus is so serious that to continue exercising jurisdiction would constitute an abuse of the court's process.[19]

Applying these general remarks to the different basic male captus situations presented in Chapter III of this book (disguised extradition, luring and abduction),[20] and starting with the abduction, one could argue that it appears that the more recent cases show that courts would refuse jurisdiction in the case of an abduction

[19] Cf. also Schabas 2000, p. 567, writing on the abuse of process doctrine in the context of the ICTR: "[T]the remedy is well recognized in national legal systems and can reasonably be deemed to be an inherent power." See also n. 878 of Chapter VI.

[20] Whose definitions arguably imply that they are executed intentionally. After all, one cannot, for example, 'accidentally' kidnap a person. These violations are seemingly the result of predetermined plans to commit the male captus. However, other male captus situations might occur which stem from negligence rather than from intent. This is an important difference. Not only with respect to the nature of the violation but also with respect to its consequences. For instance, irregularities in the pre-trial phase which have not been executed intentionally will probably lead to less serious consequences. See, for example, House of Lords, Lord Griffiths, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 152 ("[I]f a serious question arises as to the deliberate abuse of extradition procedures a magistrate should allow an adjournment so that an application can be made to the Divisional Court, which I regard as the proper forum in which such a decision should be taken [emphasis added, ChP]"), Court of Appeal, R v. Hartley, 5 August 1977, [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 216 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), p. 335) ("There are explicit statutory directions that surround the extradition procedure. (…) And in our opinion there can be no possible question here of the Court turning a blind eye to action of the New Zealand police which has deliberately ignored those imperative requirements of the statute [emphasis added, ChP]") and the Swiss case from 2007, where the Court was of the opinion that the Swiss could not be accused of mala fide conduct, but that that would be different if they, with the intent to circumvent an extradition procedure, had asked the Dominican officials to deport the suspect to Switzerland instead (see n. 477 and accompanying text of Chapter V). See also the Toscanino case where the judges held that "we view due process as now requiring a court to divest itself of jurisdiction over the person of a defendant where it has been acquired as the result of the Government's deliberate, unnecessary and unreasonable invasion of the accused's constitutional rights [emphasis added, ChP]." (US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), p. 275.) Interesting in this 'intent' discussion are also the cases of Mackeson and Healy but the Court in Driver was of the opinion that these cases had been decided per incuriam (see n. 274 of Chapter V). See also Swart 2001, p. 206: "Dismissal of criminal cases as a result of official misconduct is a remedy accepted by the courts of many States. There is, of course, considerable variation in the way national legal systems make use of that remedy. Among other things, the choice will depend on the availability of other effective remedies for correcting the wrongs done to the accused. Usually, a relevant consideration is also whether unlawful conduct on the part of law officers shows an intent to prejudice the rights of the accused or instead constituted negligence [emphasis added, ChP]." For another view, see Michell 1996, pp. 495-496: "The mere fact that a fugitive has been returned to the jurisdiction through a deportation which is unlawful under foreign law cannot in itself amount to an abuse of process, even when extradition might have been available. Rather, there must be evidence of action taken by domestic authorities to circumvent formal extradition procedures, and the fugitive cannot rely upon a violation of foreign law by foreign authorities alone. There must be evidence of unlawfulness on the part of the domestic executive, usually evidence that the violation of foreign law came at the instigation of the domestic authorities. Proof of actual intention on the part of the domestic authorities to circumvent extradition [proceedings] may not be required, however. It may be sufficient to demonstrate that the domestic authorities were ambivalent or unconcerned as to whether extradition proceedings have been circumvented, i.e., acting with willful blindness [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

(performed by the prosecuting State's own agents on another State's territory without the latter's consent) which 1) was accompanied by serious human rights violations/serious mistreatment[21] or 2) was followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from the injured State.[22] [21] See the aftermath of Toscanino, such as Lujan. Cf. also the 1986 decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court (BVerfG (3. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 3.6 1986 – 2 BvR 837/85. NJW 1986, Heft 48, pp. 3021-3022), which involved an abduction without a protest and request for the return of the abducted suspect from the injured State. Here, the Court stated that jurisdiction could also be refused under domestic law if the situation could be qualified as an "extremely exceptional case". The meaning of this rather general concept is not clear, but one could perhaps think here of Toscanino-like circumstances, see also Wilske 2000, p. 334, n. 413 (commenting on this concept): "[D]as Gericht hatte hier möglicherweise die schweren Folterungen im Toscanino-Fall im Auge." See also Grams 1994, pp. 70-71. See also more generally American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third, Foreign Relations Law of the United States, 1987, para. 433 ('External Measures In Aid Of Enforcement Of Criminal Law: Law Of The United States', para. 2: "A person apprehended in a foreign state, whether by foreign or by United States officials, and delivered to the United States, may be prosecuted in the United States unless his apprehension or delivery was carried out in such reprehensible manner as to shock the conscience of civilized society."

---

[22] See the aftermath of Toscanino, such as Verdugo. See also the German Stocké case: "Ein Blick auf die Staatenpraxis zeigt, daß Gerichte es nur dann allgemein ablehnen, ein Strafverfahren gegen einen völkerrechtswidrig Entführten zu betreiben, wenn der durch die Entführung verletzte Staat gegen die Unrechtshandlung protestiert und die Rückgabe des Entführten gefordert hat". (BVerfG (1. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 17.7 1985 – 2 BvR 1190/84. NJW 1986, Heft 22, p. 1428.) See also more generally American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third, Foreign Relations Law of the United States, 1987, para. 432 ('Measures in Aid of Enforcement of Criminal Law'), Comment c ('Consequences of violation of territorial limits of law enforcement'): "If a state's law enforcement officials exercise their functions in the territory of another state without the latter's consent, that state is entitled to protest and, in appropriate cases, to receive reparation from the offending state. If the unauthorized action includes abduction of a person, the state from which the person was abducted may demand return of the person, and international law requires that he be returned." Perhaps, one could even refer here to the old (and already briefly mentioned, see n. 175 of Chapter III) 1935 Harvard Research in International Law's Draft Convention on Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime, see the American Journal of International Law Supplement, Vol. 29 (1935), pp. 435-651. Art. 16 of this Convention contains the following male captus male detentus provision: "In exercising jurisdiction under this Convention, no State shall prosecute or punish any person who has been brought within its territory or a place subject to its authority by recourse to measures in violation of international law or international convention without first obtaining the consent of the State or States whose rights have been violated by such measures." This provision is even broader than the test requiring an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect by the injured State (for it more generally demands a violation of international law and a lack of consent from the injured State) but it is, of course, clear that an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from the injured State would be covered by these more general words. This Draft Convention is obviously not legally binding but Deen-Racsmány is nevertheless of the opinion that it "carries great weight, as the drafters sought on the basis of extensive research to codify international custom as it stood at that time." (Deen-Racsmány 2001, p. 610.) See also Slater 2004, p. 155, n. 22: "The Harvard Research Project analyzed national criminal statutes, criminal procedure, and the writings of international scholars and jurists, to attempt to resolve the problem of gaps in overlapping jurisdiction. Based upon their inquiry into international criminal jurisdiction, the researchers produced the Draft Convention on Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime." Nevertheless, it must also be remarked that this specific provision is not devoid of lex ferenda either, see the commentary to this article (see the American Journal of International Law Supplement, Vol. 29 (1935), pp. 623-632), at, for example, pp. 623-624: "The principle thus formulated is in part a restatement of existing practice and in part a reconciliation of conflict between contemporary doctrines. It is believed that its inclusion in a comprehensive convention on the subject of international penal

In the Alvarez-Machain case, the second possibility was clearly quashed, but the immense (international) criticism directed against this decision shows that many States are seemingly of the opinion that jurisdiction must in fact be refused in the case of an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect by the injured State. Because the US Supreme Court in Alvarez-Machain, in the context of the abduction, used the word "shocking", it has been suggested that Alvarez-Machain also brought about the end of the Toscanino mistreatment exception. However, it appears[23] that this is not the case. Hence, in the US, courts would still refuse jurisdiction in the case of an abduction accompanied by serious mistreatment. Nevertheless, to the extent that States are of the opinion that Alvarez-Machain has quashed both male detentus situations, one can argue that the criticism towards this decision in general is proof of the idea that many States are of the opinion that in those two situations (an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect and an abduction accompanied by serious mistreatment) jurisdiction must be refused.

However, is "many States" enough to argue that State practice more generally indicates that in those two circumstances, jurisdiction must be refused? This is not entirely clear. First of all, one has, of course, to cope here with the situation in the US, which does not recognise the second male detentus situation mentioned above. Moreover, with respect to the same male detentus situation, one should mention the situation in France: even though the Argoud case – in which the Supreme Court seemingly stated that even in the case of a protest and request for the return of the suspect, the Court will not refuse jurisdiction because international matters have to be solved by the Executives of the two States involved – cannot be seen as a recent case, it still appears to represent the current French position on this issue.[24] Finally competence is indicated by the most persuasive considerations of policy. (…) It is not everywhere agreed that there may be no prosecution or punishment in reliance upon custody thus obtained "without first obtaining the consent of the State or States whose rights have been violated by such measures." Thus the present article assures an additional and highly desirable sanction for international law in the matter of recovery of fugitives from criminal justice. It removes much of the incentive to such irregular or illegal recoveries as have been the source of international friction in the past. (…) It provides an added incentive for recourse to regular methods in securing custody of fugitives. And if, peradventure, the custody of a fugitive has been obtained by unlawful methods, the present article indicates an appropriate procedure for correcting what has been done and removing the bar to prosecution and punishment. The desirability of such a provision in a convention which embodies a comprehensive statement of the broad penal competence supported by contemporary practice would seem to require no emphasis. While it is frankly conceded that the present article is in part of the nature of legislation, it is not to be understood that the principle stated is without support in national jurisprudence or international practice."

---

[23] See n. 206 and accompanying text of Chapter V.

[24] Cf. also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion to Determine Issues As Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber As Being Fundamental to the Resolution of the Accused's Status Before the Tribunal in Respect of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal Under Rule 72 and Generally, the Nature of the Relationship Between the OTP and SFOR and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, his Arrest and Subsequent Detention', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 29 October 2001, para. 14, where Nikolić's Defence writes about the male captus bene detentus maxim, referring to the Argoud case: "[I]n some civil law jurisdictions, the maxim may still remain good law [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Note that Gilbert (1998, p. 360), however, writes that "[t]he French

(and again with respect to the second male detentus situation), the (more recent) Israeli Vanunu case should be mentioned. Although it is not clear that Italy's protest against the abduction was followed by a request for the return of Vanunu, one can imagine that even if such a request had been made, Israel would probably not have refused jurisdiction in this case.[25]

The question now is whether these exceptions effectively negate the establishment of a certain norm in State practice. In the Nicaragua case, the ICJ, writing on customary international law, clarified:

> In order to deduce the existence of customary rules, the Court deems it sufficient that the conduct of States should, in general, be consistent with such rules, and that instances of State conduct inconsistent with a given rule should generally have been treated as breaches of that rule, not as indications of the recognition of a new rule.[26]

Interestingly, all the three cases mentioned above have received (much) criticism, which may constitute evidence for the idea that State practice more generally indicates that the two situations mentioned above should lead to a male detentus result.[27]

Cour de Cassation in Re Argoud decided that French courts would only be deprived of jurisdiction if the State from which the accused was taken objected and sought his return. This position was reiterated in Barbie [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Nevertheless, besides the fact that the judges in Argoud seemingly went further than that (see the main text), no such confirmation in Barbie has been found.

[25] The Scottish case Vervuren has not been mentioned here for it seems that Scottish courts, even if Sinclair is, strictly speaking, still the case to follow (see n. 13), may very well refuse jurisdiction in the more specific male captus situations mentioned above, where it can certainly be said that the prosecuting authorities do not come to court with clean hands. This could be derived from the fact that the Prosecution (and the Defence) in that case agreed that "if the United Kingdom authorities were guilty of some form of collusion, and did not come to court with clean hands, the courts were entitled to respond by, for example, sustaining a plea in bar of trial" and that Lady Paton noted this agreement without criticising it, see n. 738 and accompanying text of Chapter V.

[26] ICJ, Case Concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (Merits), 'Judgment', 27 June 1986, para. 186. See also Loan 2005, p. 280.

[27] With respect to the Alvarez-Machain case, see, for example, Gluck 1994, pp. 630-631: "This consistent pattern of return notwithstanding, there have been incidents when the asylum state's demand for repatriation was not honored even though the facts clearly showed that the abducting state had violated international law. The most blatant example of this was the Alvarez-Machain case (…). Such examples, however, do not indicate that there is no customary law requiring in cases of international abduction. International custom does not require that state practice be unanimous in order to acquire the force of law; some exceptions are allowed provided they are regarded as breaches of the general rule. [And then, Gluck, refers to exactly the same quotation from the ICJ mentioned in the main text, ChP.] Certainly the outrage engendered by the abduction of Dr. Alvarez-Machain by the United States shows that the "no abduction" rule is well established and that the failure to return the individual by the United States was not accepted as a harbinger of an emerging rule permitting such action [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Zaid 1997, p. 861: "The outrage expressed by the international community following the Supreme Court's decisions demonstrates that the "no abduction without consent" concept is well-established and still in force and that the United States' failure to repatriate Alvarez-Machain following Mexico's repeated demands did not serve to create a revision or exception to the rule." With respect to the Vanunu case, see Wilske 2000, p. 348: "Aufgrund sehr eigenwilliger Vorstellungen Israels zum Inhalt und zur Geltungskraft des Völkerrechts kann Israel aber nicht als Beispiel für eine representative Staatenauffassung betrachtet werden." With respect to Argoud, see the criticism of Kiss

Additional support for this can be found in the confirmation of these two Toscanino possibilities by the German Federal Constitutional Court in the (male captus bene deditus) case of Al-Moayad, with whose findings the ECtHR agreed. Reference can also be made to the conclusion of the 2000 book from Wilske, who extensively discussed the topic of cross-border State-sponsored abductions in the inter-State context. (It was also this conclusion to which the German Federal Constitutional Court referred in Al-Moayad.) Wilske, who did not limit himself to the practice of courts,[28] concluded:

> Gerade diese Entscheidung [namely the Alvarez-Machain decision, ChP] ist der Schlüssel zu einer geänderten Staatenpraxis, die die male captus, bene detentus-Regel zumindest im Fall eines Staatenprotestes wie auch bei schweren Menschenrechtsverletzungen eindeutig ablehnt.[29]

Thus, it may indeed be the case that State practice more generally indicates that courts will refuse jurisdiction in these two situations.[30] However, and this is an important point which needs to be mentioned here (see also footnotes 575-576 and accompanying text of Chapter V), Wilske goes a step further when he asserts, not only that more recent State practice indicates that male detentus will follow in these two situations, but also customary[31] international law more generally: "Ein Strafverfahrenshindernis aus Völkerrechts ist immer dann anzunehmen, wenn der verletzte Staat protestiert hat. Dies gilt aber auch, wenn die Entführung von schweren Menschenrechtsverletzungen begleitet war [emphasis added, ChP]."[32] However, before one can draw that conclusion, it must be clear that the other requirement of customary international law – alongside (State) practice – is also

---

(see also n. 409 of Chapter V): "Les vues qu'exprime cet arrêt semblent être contraires à la pratique française qui a toujours nié la validité des arrestations opérées en territoire étranger, même en l'absence de toute protestation émanant de l'Etat dont la compétence territoriale a été lésée [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Kiss 1965, p. 937.)

[28] It must be noted that the present study 'merely' focused on the practice of courts, although some other manifestations of State practice (see the reactions of governments in the context of the Alvarez-Machain case) have also been reviewed.

[29] Wilske 2000, p. 336.

[30] Cf. also the following conclusion of Oehmichen 2007, p. 237: "Während früher die meisten nationalen Gerichte der „male captus – bene detentus" Doktrin folgten, erfuhr dieses Prinzip eine erste Einschränkung durch den Toscanino-Fall in der Weise, dass ein Strafverfolgungshindernis in Fällen, in denen die Entführung mit schweren Menschenrechtsverletzungen einher ging, angenommen wurde. Teilweise wurde als Bedingung für ein Strafverfolgungshindernis gefordert, dass der verletzte Staat gegen die Entführung protestiert hatte."

[31] Although Wilske uses the word "Völkerrecht" (international law) here, it is clear that he is especially interested in customary international law (although customary international law is, of course, also international law), see Wilske 2000, p. 338: "Ziel der hier dargestellten Staatenpraxis war, eine Antwort auf die Frage zu erhalten, ob Völker*gewohnheits*recht einem Strafverfahren gegen völkerrechtswidrig entführte Personen entgegensteht [emphasis added, ChP]."

[32] Ibid., p. 340. See also ibid., p. 349: "Nach Auswertung der Staatenpraxis ist ein Strafverfahrenshindernis aus Völkerrechts immer dann anuznehmen, wenn der verletzte Staat protestiert hat oder wenn die Entführung von schweren Menschenrechtsverletzungen begleitet war [emphasis added, ChP]."

met: opinio iuris sive necessitatis. Thus, the acts of States, for example through the decisions of their courts, must confirm the above-mentioned two male detentus situations (which may very well be the case), but in addition to that, the States must have acted in that way because they are convinced that it is "required and permitted or necessary under international law".[33] Is that also the case here?

It appears that this is indeed the case with respect to the male detentus situation of an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the abducted person by the injured State. In that situation, the State (if not the Executive, then the Judiciary) arguably returns the suspect to the injured State because it is of the opinion that international law has been violated (namely the rule that a State cannot exercise police powers on another State's territory without that State's consent) and that this breach must be repaired. Hence, even though a conventional rule does not exist in international law that a State must return the abducted suspect to the State which protests and requests the return of the suspect (although such a rule could perhaps be gathered (in the future) from the rather influential DARS rules on restitution, see Subsection 4.1 of Chapter III), States nevertheless appear to be of the opinion that they would return the abducted suspect in such cases[34] and would do so with international law considerations at the back of their minds. Hence, this rule – that a State (if not the Executive, then the Judiciary) must return the abducted suspect if the injured State protests and requests the return of the suspect – indeed seems to have the status of a rule of customary international law. Thus, one could assert more generally that international law (namely customary international law) demands that in such a case, a State (if not the Executive, then the Judiciary) must return the suspect.[35] That would also mean that, in this specific situation, there would actually be no discretion for judges,[36] but an obligation to refuse jurisdiction.

---

[33] See the discussion of the Al-Moayad case for this definition. Note that Oehmichen, referring to Wilske, writes more generally that there is a conviction that the rule in question is law (Rechtsüberzeugung): "Zumindest in den Fällen, in welchen die Verhaftung von schweren Menschenrechtsverletzungen begleitet wurde order der betroffene Staat protestiert hat, hat sich eine Rechtsüberzeugung zu Gunsten der Annahme eines Strafvervolgungshindernisses herausgebildet [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Oehmichen 2007, p. 246.)

[34] See also Loan 2005, pp. 282-283: "It is widely recognized that when an abduction breaches a state's sovereignty and the protesting state demands the return of the individual then the first duty on the abducting state is to return the individual [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[35] See also Michell 1996, pp. 424-427: "The duty to return is an established rule of customary international law. This custom is demonstrated through state practice, specifically in cases involving: Canada and the United States; the United Kingdom and the United States; Mexico and the United States; Spain and the United States; Germany and Switzerland; France and Germany; Italy and Switzerland; and the United Kingdom and South Africa. In all of these incidents the fugitive was returned by the abducting state to the injured state upon protest and a request for his return. Cases where the abducting state made this determination, either by the executive or its domestic courts, support the validity of this doctrine. Until Alvarez-Machain, the U.S. Supreme Court had never denied this rule of customary international law. In fact, federal appellate courts had never refused to return a fugitive when there was a protest and request for the fugitive's return. Moreover, the rule is well-grounded in opinio juris. Thus, the assertion that there is no rule of customary international law requiring the return of a fugitive is inaccurate. Only the broad formulation of the rule (i.e., without the stipulations that the injured state must protest and request the fugitive's return) is inaccurate. Where there is a violation of territorial sovereignty by state agents, and the injured state protests and requests the return of the fugitive,

With respect to the male detentus situation of an abduction accompanied by serious mistreatment; it is less clear that courts refuse jurisdiction in such cases because they believe international law dictates that they do so.

On the one hand, it is true that international law considerations may also play a role here. One could think here of the situation that a judge is of the opinion that such mistreatment brings about violations of international human rights provisions. Even though these human rights provisions do not command a judge to refuse jurisdiction in the case of violations, such violations may nevertheless convince the judge that the male captus is so serious that he must refuse jurisdiction (see also the discussion on this topic in Chapter III).[37]

However, on the other hand, even though international law considerations may play a role here, these considerations are arguably weaker than in the case of an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect, in which case the judge arguably feels that the international system is disrupted by the violation and request for the return of the abducted suspect and that he must correct this international imbalance (by refusing jurisdiction and ordering the return of the suspect) if the Executive has not already done so. A judge confronted by an abduction accompanied by serious mistreatment appears to refuse jurisdiction mainly in the framework of domestic legal considerations.[38] customary international law requires that the fugitive be returned to the state from which he was abducted [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also Gluck 1994, p. 630 (see also p. 654): "[A]n international custom has developed in cases of state-sponsored international abduction: when an asylum state protests an abduction and demands the return of an individual taken from its territory, the abducting state is under an international legal duty to return the individual to the asylum state." See finally also American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third, Foreign Relations Law of the United States, 1987, para. 432 ('Measures in Aid of Enforcement of Criminal Law'), Comment c ('Consequences of violation of territorial limits of law enforcement'): "If a state's law enforcement officials exercise their functions in the territory of another state without the latter's consent, that state is entitled to protest and, in appropriate cases, to receive reparation from the offending state. If the unauthorized action includes abduction of a person, the state from which the person was abducted may demand return of the person, and international law requires that he be returned."

---

[36] Cf. n. 14.

[37] A judge could argue that a violation of the customary international law prohibition of torture demands that a trial cannot continue if it has been preceded by torture. See also Wilske 2000, p. 271: "Der Schutz vor Folter ist Inhalt des Völkergewohnheitsrechts. Die Unvereinbarkeit von Folter mit einem ordnungsgemäßen Strafverfahren kann daher (…) mit völkerrechtlichen Verpflichtungen begründet werden [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Cf. also Swart 2001, p. 206 (not with respect to mistreatment but with respect to the human right to liberty and security): "[B]oth Article 9 of the ICCPR and Article 5 ECHR make it imperative that a person be released if his detention was unlawful. I take it for granted that, in the case of more serious violations of these Articles, the nature of this particular remedy rules out any possibility of re-arresting the suspect or the accused." If serious violations of the right to liberty and security would already lead to the ending of the case (which is arguably a good thing), one can assume that a judge will also refuse jurisdiction if he is confronted by serious violations of human rights provisions which deal with mistreatment/torture.

[38] See, for example, the Russell case: "While we may some day be presented with a situation in which the conduct of law enforcement agents is so outrageous that due process principles would absolutely bar the government from invoking judicial processes to obtain a conviction, cf. Rochin v. California (…), the instant case is distinctly not of that breed [emphasis added, ChP]." (US Supreme Court, United States v. Russell, 24 April 1973, No. 71-1585 (411 US 423), pp. 431-432.) See also the German Federal

In that respect, one can wonder whether Wilske's more broadly formulated conclusion, that (customary) international law in any event demands that in these two situations, jurisdiction must be refused,[39] is entirely correct. Nevertheless, it appears that his first conclusion, that State practice shows that in such cases, jurisdiction must be refused (a conclusion which was confirmed by the German Federal Constitutional Court (and the ECtHR) in Al-Moayad),[40] is accurate. This ultimately also means that, apart from the male captus situation whereby a State protests an abduction and requests the return of the abducted suspect, there is no international law rule demanding that a State (if not the Executive then the Judiciary) refuse jurisdiction.[41]

It should be emphasised that State practice shows that in the above-mentioned two situations, courts will refuse jurisdiction; in those two cases, male captus bene detentus is rejected at any rate. However, that does not mean that courts may not utilise a lower male captus male detentus threshold in the case of abductions. There have also been male captus cases where courts have suggested a test which does not require a protest from the injured State or serious mistreatment. Examples in that respect are Levinge,[42] Bennett,[43] Ebrahim[44] and Beahan.[45]

Constitutional Court's examination in its 1986 case (BVerfG (3. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 3.6 1986 – 2 BvR 837/85. NJW 1986, Heft 48, pp. 3021-3022) whether domestic considerations (namely those related to the rule of law and to Article 1, paragraph 1 of the German Grundgesetz) require that one can speak of an "extremely exceptional case" which demands the refusal of jurisdiction and about which concept Wilske states that "das Gericht hatte hier möglicherweise die schweren Folterungen im Toscanino-Fall im Auge." (Wilske 2000, p. 334, n. 413.) See also Grams 1994, pp. 70-71.

[39] See Wilske 2000, pp. 340 and 349.

[40] See ibid., p. 336.

[41] See also Loan 2005, p. 284: "While it may be desirable for domestic courts to refuse to endorse a state's violation of its human rights obligations, there is no international obligation on domestic courts to decline jurisdiction over an abductee. The prevalence of the rule "male captus bene detentus" throughout the world [As Chapter V has shown, these latter words are probably too sweeping. Much will depend on the exact meaning of the words male captus bene detentus. However, it is clear that there are still many modern cases which can be summarised by the words male captus bene detentus. In that sense, Loan is right that, except for the situation in which the injured State protests and requests the return of the abducted suspect (see also n. 34), there is no rule of international law demanding courts to issue a male captus male detentus decision, ChP.], while controversial, is clear evidence of the non-existence of any norm requiring states to decline the prosecution of abductees."

[42] See, for example, the following general reasoning in that case (not focusing now on the specifics of the case, which did not involve a traditional kidnapping): "Where a person, however unlawfully, is brought into the jurisdiction and is before a court in this State, that court has undoubted jurisdiction to deal with him or her. But it also has a discretion not to do so, where to exercise its discretion would involve an abuse of the court's process. Such an abuse may arise by reason of delay on the part of prosecuting authorities. But delay is only one variety of unfair or wrongful conduct on the part of those authorities. Other such conduct may exist, including wrongful and even unlawful involvement in bypassing the regular machinery for extradition and participating in unauthorised and unlawful removal of criminal suspects from one jurisdiction to another." (Levinge v Director of Custodial Services, Department of Corrective Services, 23 July 1987, 89 FLR 142.)

[43] See, for example, the following general reasonings in that case (not focusing now on the specifics of the case, which did not involve a traditional kidnapping): "If British officialdom at any level has participated in or encouraged the kidnapping, it seems to represent a grave contravention of international law, the comity of nations and the rule of law generally if our courts allow themselves to be used by the executive to try an offence which the courts would not be dealing with if the rule of law had prevailed. It may be said that a guilty accused finding himself in the circumstances predicated is not deserving of much sympathy, but the principle involved goes beyond the scope of such a pragmatic observation and even beyond the rights of those victims who are or may be innocent. It affects the proper administration of justice according to the rule of law and with respect to international law." (House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 163.) See also House of Lords, Lord Griffiths, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 151: "In my view your Lordships should now declare that where process of law is available to return an accused to this country through extradition procedures our courts will refuse to try him if he has been forcibly brought within our jurisdiction in disregard of those procedures by a process to which our own police, prosecuting or other executive authorities have been a knowing party."

Nevertheless, it appears that these lower thresholds, even if they can be applauded,[46] and even if these cases may be seen as evidence of a certain trend in

[44] See Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 896: "When the state is a party to a dispute, as for example in criminal cases, it must come to court with "clean hands". When the state itself is involved in an abduction across international borders, as in the present case, its hands are not clean."

[45] See, for example, the following general reasoning in that case (not focusing now on the specifics of the case, which did not involve a traditional kidnapping): "In my opinion it is essential that in order to promote confidence in and respect for the administration of justice and preserve the judicial process from contamination, a court should decline to compel an accused person to undergo a trial in circumstances where his appearance before it has been facilitated by an act of abduction undertaken by the prosecuting state. There is an inherent objection to such a course both on grounds of public policy pertaining to international ethical norms and because it imperils and corrodes the peaceful co-existence and mutual respect of sovereign nations. For abduction is illegal under international law, provided the abductor was not acting on his own initiative and without the authority or connivance of his government. A contrary view would amount to a declaration that the end justifies the means, thereby encouraging states to become law-breakers in order to secure the conviction of a private individual." (Supreme Court, Beahan v. State, 4 September 1991, International Law Reports, Vol. 103 (1996), p. 214.)

[46] After all, why should a suspect have to prove, for example, that the injured State protested the abduction if it has been established that he was abducted by agents from the now prosecuting State? (See also Pulkowski 2001, p. 1037: "[T]he concept of a human rights dimension that is independent of the state's territorial rights casts doubt on the sustainability of the common view that a court of the abducting state must only relinquish its jurisdiction if the territorial state protests subsequently. How would the lack of subsequent protest by the territorial state do away with the human rights violation, after the individual has been captured by authorities which were undisputedly unlawful at the time of the capture?". See further Frowein 1994, p. 185: "The return of the person cannot be made dependent upon the formal claim of the state from where the abduction took place. If individual rights in that context mean anything, the abducting state must be seen to be under an obligation to return the person independently of any request. A 'male captus male detentus' rule should be applied as a consequence of the violation of human rights." See also Henkin 1990, pp. 310-311, who is of the opinion that the principle male captus bene detentus is "antedating the age of human rights". See further Cazala 2007, p. 838: "Le statut de cet adage est discutable au regard, ou au sein, du droit international contemporain, notamment dans sa dimension protectrice des droits de l'homme." See finally Rayfuse 1993, p. 882: "It will be argued that State-sponsored abductions are a violation of the internationally recognised fundamental human rights to liberty and security of the person and freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention and that courts lack jurisdiction to try defendants who are brought before them in violation of these rights.") Likewise, why should a suspect have to prove that he was seriously mistreated during this abduction? Should the fact that authorities of a State have resorted to an abduction in circumvention of available procedures not already suffice to divest jurisdiction, whether or not there was a protest from

State practice,[47] do not have the same degree of support in the rest of the world as the two Toscanino possibilities. Hence, it is difficult to maintain that in any case involving an abduction (even one without serious mistreatment or without a protest and request for the return of the suspect), State practice (let alone customary international law) indicates that a court will issue a male detentus decision.[48]

---

the injured State and whether or not the suspect was seriously mistreated in the course of this male captus? See Mann 1989, p. 419 and Michell 1996, p. 403. See also Loan 2005, p. 284 (writing on the Ebrahim and Bennett cases): "Such decisions should be applauded as not only giving effect to an individual's rights, but also acting as a deterrent to future violations of international law. Only by declining to exercise jurisdiction can domestic courts maintain the integrity of international human rights and encourage states to abide by their international legal obligations [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See further Hamid 2004, p. 85: "It is a long established legal principle that an illegal act does not give rise to any right; ex injuria jus non oritur. Since the act of abduction itself is illegal and invalid under international law, the abducting State does not have a right to subject the abducted individual to its laws and proceedings following such illegal abduction." See also Gilbert 1998, p. 362 (writing on abduction): "Its manifest illegality ought not to be approved, implicitly at least, by the judiciary accepting jurisdiction to try the fugitive." See also the following recommendation from the International Law Association: "Courts should refuse to permit prosecutions of persons brought before them by government-conducted or government-inspired abductions. In appropriate cases they should decline to exercise jurisdiction and should order the return of the abductee to the state from which he was abducted, without prejudice to future lawful extradition proceedings." (International Law Association 1994, p. 165.) See finally Resolution No. 9 relevant to the topic 'The Protection of Human Rights in International Cooperation in Criminal Matters' (unanimously approved at the closing session of the XV Congress of the International Association of Penal Law in Rio de Janeiro, 4-10 September 1994): "Abducting a person from a foreign country (…) in order to subject such a person to arrest and criminal prosecution is contrary to public international law and should not be tolerated and should be recognized as a bar to prosecution." (Schomburg 1995, p. 105.)

[47] See Henquet 2003, pp. 118-119, writing that "[c]ourts increasingly decline to exercise jurisdiction where the forum State is complicit in an abduction of an accused from the territory of another State [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Note, however, that after Henquet's article was published, the Al-Moayad case was issued. Although that case only presents the situations which must, in any event, lead to a male detentus result, thus not clarifying what the German Court's own stance would be on a normal abduction not accompanied by serious mistreatment and not followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from the injured State, it is very well possible that it would follow the German case of 1986, which involved such an abduction from the Netherlands and which did not lead to the ending of the case.

[48] Cf. Knoops 2002, p. 241. It may be interesting to note that Wilske stated that (customary) international law at any rate/in any event ("immer dann") demands that courts refuse jurisdiction if the abduction is followed by a protest (and a request for the return of the suspect) or if the abduction is accompanied by serious mistreatment. That may mean that he is of the opinion that customary international law would perhaps also require a male detentus result in less serious cases, not involving these two situations (one could hereby think of cases like Bennett and Ebrahim). That he writes, in the context of customary international law, about "die Überzeugung (…) daß im Regelfall einer völkerrechtswidrigen Entführung ein Strafverfahrenshindernis folgen muß" (Wilske 2000 p. 339), may also constitute evidence for that possibility. Although it is not entirely sure whether Wilske is indeed of the opinion that customary international law demands a male detentus result in other situations than the two above-mentioned ones, Pulkowski straightforwardly criticises the fact that "Wilske concludes that customary international law today bars a court from initiating criminal proceedings against an abducted individual." (Pulkowski 2001, p. 1035.) This was because "the attempt to anchor the rule that courts have no jurisdiction over individuals abducted by state agents in customary international law meets with some systematic concerns with respect to both practice and opinio juris." (Ibid.) He explains: "Occasionally, the author is forced to bend state practice considerably to present evidence of the alleged

What can be said about the other two techniques: luring and disguised extradition (and other less serious irregular methods not clearly falling within these three basic male captus situations, such as an informal transfer between two States without any procedural guarantees)?[49]

Quite a few of the more recent cases show that such techniques, even if they can be considered less serious than an abduction, can still lead to a refusal to continue new rule of customary law. Strictly speaking, only the judgments of the British House of Lords ex parte Bennett and the South African Supreme Court in State v. Ebrahim can serve as precedents actually involving state-ordered kidnapping. The author predominantly relies on political declarations within or outside international institutions and academic writings in order to support his thesis. Therefore, some scepticism remains whether a departure from male captus bene detentus is really 'in accordance with a constant and uniform usage practised by the States in question'. Furthermore, neither male captus bene detentus nor the alleged new rule to the contrary was applied by courts with a belief that such conduct was required by international law. The major precedents relied on by the author to support his thesis, the judgments ex parte Bennett and State v. Ebrahim, were both based exclusively on the interpretation of domestic law [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., pp. 1035-1036.) Although one must not forget that the judges in these two latter cases (and in other cases not mentioned by Pulkowski such as Levinge and Beahan, see ns. 42 and 45) also used international law considerations to dismiss the case, it is true that they were mainly basing their decisions on domestic grounds. (Cf. also De Sanctis 2004, p. 538.) However, even if they had based their findings on international law alone, one can indeed wonder with Pulkowski whether these cases, which support a low male captus male detentus threshold, have general support in State practice. Notwithstanding this, that does not do away with the fact, not mentioned by Pulkowski, but correctly observed by Wilske, that State practice appears to indicate that in two more specific situations (namely in the case of an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect and an abduction accompanied by serious mistreatment) courts will refuse jurisdiction and that one could even argue that in the case of an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect, customary international law indicates that courts will refuse jurisdiction. Finally, reference must also be made to Borelli. She first states that "[t]his brief survey of domestic case law related to cases of forcible abduction brings into question the qualification of the male captus doctrine as a "principle of law recognized by civilised nations". (Borelli 2004, p. 361.) She then continues stating, referring to Wilske and the criticism of Pulkowski, that "it may still be premature to affirm the existence of a customary rule, or even of a "general principle of law", compelling the courts to divest themselves from jurisdiction over abducted defendants [original footnote omitted, ChP]". (Ibid.) However, one can argue that this does not exclude the fact that Borelli may also be of the opinion that customary international law indicates that courts will refuse jurisdiction in the case of an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect as Borelli adheres to the following definition of the male captus bene detentus maxim: "According to this doctrine [of male captus bene detentus, ChP], in the absence of protest from another State, once an individual is brought within the jurisdiction, even if he was apprehended by irregular means (including forcible abduction), he may be tried in the apprehending State [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., p. 353.) Hence, this may mean that Borelli is of the opinion that one can indeed not assert that customary international law demands that in every abduction case, a judge must opt for male detentus, but that this may be different when the injured State has protested the abduction (and has demanded the return of the suspect).

[49] See also the end of Section 1 of Chapter III.

the case – a point which can again be applauded[50] – on the condition that the now prosecuting State's own authorities were involved in the male captus.[51]

[50] After all, one can argue that also in cases of luring and disguised extradition, the authorities have resorted to illegal means to obtain custody over the suspect and that courts in such cases should consider whether this is not already enough to divest jurisdiction. It is submitted that the low male detentus tests produced by cases such as Hartley, Levinge and Bennett (see also the following footnote) are much more appropriate if the court wants to protect values like State sovereignty, human rights, due process of law/the rule of law, including the integrity of the judicial and executive proceedings. Only a low male detentus standard can effectively deter the prosecuting authorities from using dubious methods in bringing a suspect to trial. (Recall the three functions of the use of supervisory powers, see ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 76: "[T]o provide a remedy for the violation of the accused's rights; to deter future misconduct; and to enhance the integrity of the judicial process [original footnote omitted, ChP].") See again (see also n. 46) the International Law Association's recommendation that "[c]ourts should refuse to permit prosecutions of persons brought before them by government-conducted or government-inspired abductions. [Note that the International Law Association views a kidnapping by deception (luring) as a form of abduction, see International Law Association 1994, p. 162, ChP.] In appropriate cases they should decline to exercise jurisdiction and should order the return of the abductee to the state from which he was abducted, without prejudice to future lawful extradition proceedings. A court should adopt the same approach where the accused has been brought before it by deportation intended to circumvent the obligations imposed by extradition." (Ibid., p. 165.) See also Resolution No. 9 relevant to the topic 'The Protection of Human Rights in International Cooperation in Criminal Matters' (unanimously approved at the closing session of the XV Congress of the International Association of Penal Law in Rio de Janeiro, 4-10 September 1994): "Abducting a person from a foreign country or enticing a person under false pretences to come voluntarily from another country in order to subject such a person to arrest and criminal prosecution is contrary to public international law and should not be tolerated and should be recognized as a bar to prosecution. (…) Similarly, procedures such as deportation or expulsion, deliberately applied in order to circumvent the safeguards of extradition procedures should be avoided." (Schomburg 1995, p. 105.) See finally also the general statement of Michell 1996, p. 500: "[I]t is my argument that domestic courts possess a discretion to stay proceedings against a fugitive brought before it in violation of the law of a foreign state; or in circumvention of regular extradition proceedings; or in order to prevent unlawfulness on the part of the domestic executive. In exercising its discretion to order a stay the court must weigh and evaluate the circumstances through which the fugitive came before it. The finding that there was no violation of customary international law (e.g., because the injured state consented to the abduction) should not prevent a domestic court from refusing to have its processes tainted by the executive's illegal conduct. The rule of law rationales opposing the male captus bene detentus principle – that it brings the administration of justice into disrepute, encourages lawlessness, violates state sovereignty, disregards international human rights law, and undermines the international extradition network – are overwhelming."

[51] See, for example, Hartley (where the New Zealand police was involved in a "short cut" 'extradition' from Australia), Levinge (where the Court formulated the following, rather general, male captus male detentus test: "Where a person, however unlawfully, is brought into the jurisdiction and is before a court in this State, that court has undoubted jurisdiction to deal with him or her. But it also has a discretion not to do so, where to exercise its discretion would involve an abuse of the court's process. Such an abuse may arise by reason of delay on the part of prosecuting authorities. But delay is only one variety of unfair or wrongful conduct on the part of those authorities. Other such conduct may exist, including wrongful and even unlawful involvement in bypassing the regular machinery for extradition and participating in unauthorised and unlawful removal of criminal suspects from one jurisdiction to another."), Bennett (where (as summarised by the Court in Westfallen) it had to be sorted out "whether it appears that the police or the prosecuting authorities have acted illegally or procured or connived at unlawful procedures or violated international law or the domestic law of foreign States or abused their powers in a way that should lead this court to stay the proceedings against the applicants [original

That also means that courts will generally continue with the case if the prosecuting State's own authorities were not involved in the male captus.[52] An exception in this respect is the 1982 Swiss case of X (where no Swiss authorities were involved in the luring operation and the judge nevertheless halted the case), although it must also be emphasised that this Court did not refuse jurisdiction to try the case (male detentus) but refused to extradite the person to the State involved in the luring operation (male deditus).

Notwithstanding the fact that quite a few of the more recent cases thus show that male captus techniques not involving abduction can still lead to a refusal to continue the case, on the condition that the now prosecuting State's own authorities were involved in the male captus, there are also quite a few recent cases in which such footnote omitted, ChP].") and Mullen (where the Court stated that "the British authorities initiated and subsequently assisted in and procured the deportation of the defendant, by unlawful means, in circumstances in which there were specific extradition facilities between this country and Zimbabwe. In so acting they were not only encouraging unlawful conduct in Zimbabwe, but they were also acting in breach of public international law."). These cases show that there are hence quite some male captus male detentus cases which do not involve, for example, a protest from a third State. In that respect, the following statement from the Third Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States from 1987 can clearly be seen as outdated, see American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third, Foreign Relations Law of the United States, 1987, para. 432 ('Measures in Aid of Enforcement of Criminal Law'), Reporters Notes, No. 2 ('Rule of "male captus, bene detentus."'): "Nearly all states have followed the rule that, absent protest from other states, they will try persons brought before their courts through irregular means, even through an abduction from another state in violation of international law." That these cases show that judges may also refuse to exercise jurisdiction in arguably less serious cases than, for example, a genuine abduction, does not mean, however, that the male captus does not have to be rather serious, see, for example, House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 163: "I regard it as essential to the rule of law that the court should not have to make available its process and thereby indorse (on what I am confident will be a very few occasions) unworthy conduct when it is proved against the executive or its agents, however humble in rank. And, remembering that it is not jurisdiction which is in issue but the exercise of a discretion to stay proceedings, while speaking of 'unworthy conduct', I would not expect a court to stay the proceedings of every trial which has been preceded by a venial irregularity." Hence, the male detentus outcome will indeed normally be reserved for the more exceptional cases, see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to Defence "Motion to Determine Issues as Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber…and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, His Arrest and Subsequent Detention", filed 29 October 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 12 November 2001, para. 10, n. 14: "[I]n all cases, it is clear that the remedy of release of the accused and dismissal of the indictment against him are remedies of last resort, to be utilised only upon the satisfaction of strict criteria and in extreme circumstances". (The Prosecution refers here to Lamb 2000, pp. 228-244.) However, it must also be remarked that the fact that male detentus constitutes an ultimum remedium does not necessarily mean that it will not be granted very often. Much will depend here on the conduct of the prosecuting authorities. See again House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 163: "No 'floodgates' argument applies because the executive can stop the flood at source by refraining from impropriety."

---

[52] See again the above-mentioned (see the previous footnote) cases of Hartley, Levinge, Bennett and Mullen. See also the male captus bene deditus case Al-Moayad. However, one can imagine that there might also be judges who will refuse jurisdiction if they deem the male captus so serious that they feel that jurisdiction must be refused, even if the authorities from the now prosecuting State were not involved in the male captus (for example, when the suspect is seriously mistreated in the process of his arrest and detention).

techniques had been used and where it was established that the prosecuting State's own authorities had been involved in the male captus but where the court nevertheless did not refuse jurisdiction.[53] Those cases show that a luring operation or a disguised extradition as such[54] are not seen as such a serious male captus as to lead to the ending of the case.[55] That might even be the case when the injured State (this can only be the State of residence in the case of a luring operation as the other male captus techniques (such as a disguised extradition) do not lead to a violation of State sovereignty) protests the male captus and requests the return of the suspect.[56]

Related to this issue is the fact that the element of 'seriousness of the alleged crimes with which a suspect is charged' sometimes seems to play a role in the judge's balancing exercise;[57] perhaps a male captus has indeed occurred, but given [53] See, for example, Yunis (see also the following footnote) and Latif (where a luring operation executed by the prosecuting State's own authorities did not lead to the ending of the case). Two other cases could also be mentioned here in that respect – with some marginal comments: in Stocké, the Court held that the prosecuting State's authorities were not involved in the luring operation (or, if they were, were not acting on the State's authority), but that, even if they were, the male captus was not serious enough to divest jurisdiction. In Schmidt, the fact that the State's own authorities were involved in a luring case did not lead to the ending of the case either, but this was not a male captus bene detentus but a male captus bene deditus decision.

[54] Nevertheless, one can assume that if the suspect is seriously mistreated during a luring operation/a disguised extradition, the court may nevertheless refuse jurisdiction, see the reasoning in the Yunis luring case (in the following footnote). See also the 1985 Stocké luring case where the German Federal Constitutional Court stated that jurisdiction could be refused on the basis of national law if a certain male captus situation could be seen as an "extremely exceptional case". Although it is not clear what the exact meaning is of this concept (although the more serious male captus situation of an abduction (as such) will not fall under the term, see the abduction case which was decided by the Constitutional Court one year later (see also n. 21)), it may be that the Court was thinking of Toscanino-like circumstances, see (again) Wilske 2000, p. 334, n. 413 (commenting on this concept): "[D]as Gericht hatte hier möglicherweise die schweren Folterungen im Toscanino-Fall im Auge." See also Grams 1994, pp. 70-71.

[55] See, for example, US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909), p. 920: "In cases where defendants have urged the court to dismiss the indictment solely on the grounds that they were fraudulently lured to the United States, courts have uniformly upheld jurisdiction." This would, however, be different if the luring would meet the serious mistreatment threshold of Toscanino, see ibid.: "In this action, there is no dispute that United States law enforcement officers were fully involved in the planning and execution of defendant's arrest. However, defendant has failed either to allege or to show any actions committed by these officers that meet the standard of outrageousness established by Toscanino and its progeny requiring this Court to divest itself of jurisdiction. The record in this proceeding has been reviewed with care and the Court fails to find the type of cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino."

[56] This could, perhaps, be derived from the German male captus bene deditus decision in Al-Moayad. Although in that case, no German officials were involved in the luring operation, which was followed by a protest from the suspect's State of residence (Yemen), the Court stated in a more theoretical exercise "that it is even doubtful under which preconditions the luring of a prosecuted person out of his or her state of residence by means of trickery – unlike the use of force – can be regarded as an act that is contrary to international law at all". (See n. 584 of Chapter V and accompanying text.) That may mean that the German Federal Constitutional Court would not refuse to exercise jurisdiction in the case of a luring operation executed by German officials, even if the injured State protested the operation.

[57] See also Lamb 2000, pp. 237-238 (cf. also Henquet 2003, p. 123, referring to Lamb): "State practice suggests that where the crimes alleged to have been committed by the accused are of the utmost gravity, the fact that the suspect's alleged crimes are more serious and the continuation of the proceedings is hence of more importance, such a male captus will not lead to a male detentus/deditus outcome.[58]

This can most clearly be discerned from cases such as Schmidt[59] and Latif.[60] In Mullen, such a balancing exercise was also used, but in that case, the English judges felt that it was more important to legally disapprove of the male captus (a disguised extradition in which the British authorities were involved) by refusing jurisdiction, even though Mullen was charged with (and in fact already convicted for) serious crimes, namely IRA terrorism.

Admittedly, these are all English cases, but the idea that the seriousness of the alleged crimes should play a role in deciding whether or not jurisdiction/extradition has to be refused appears to have a broader basis in the more recent cases;[61] such the balance will (...) tend to favour an otherwise-competent court's upholding its jurisdiction, notwithstanding any defects which may be observed in the manner in which the accused was apprehended [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Note, however, that the words "any defects" are very broad and may lead to an Eichmann exception (where the trial is completely decoupled from the pre-trial phase), which this study does not support. Furthermore, it must be noted that Lamb refers to the Eichmann case to back her assertion, which, as was shown in Chapter V, does not seem to be correct. Cf. also Nsereko 2008, pp. 66-67: "In balancing these interests, the courts take into account two major factors; the gravity of the offence or offences charged, and the degree of seriousness of the alleged violations. The graver the offence charged, the greater the need to bring the perpetrator to justice and consequently the courts are less ready to apply the doctrine by permanently staying the proceedings [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Nsereko refers in this context to, among other things, three African cases which were not already mentioned in this study, namely the Namibian case R v. Heienreich (see ibid., p. 67), the Zimbabwean case In Re Mlambo (see ibid., p. 68) and the Botswanan case Sejammitlwa & Another (see ibid., p. 69). Although there was no need to address these cases in Chapter V of this book – from Nsereko's article, it can be deduced that these cases did not involve international male captus cases, but 'merely' purely domestic cases where there was a delay in bringing the suspect to justice – such cases nevertheless show that judges take the seriousness of the alleged crimes into account when determining the consequences of alleged irregularities in the pre-trial phase of their case, an element which may also be taken into account by these judges when addressing international male captus cases.

---

[58] Hence (and recalling the three traditional rationales of the male captus bene detentus rule presented by Michell (see n. 11)), even if judges are of the opinion that they must use a broad concept of fair trial and even if they are of the opinion that they cannot simply refer international problems to their Executive (but must take their responsibility as agents of the international legal order), they may nevertheless be of the opinion that the second rationale (the importance of trying this person) is so great that jurisdiction should not be refused.

[59] Where the English judges – in a theoretical exercise (because the judges were of the opinion that the Bennett/abuse of process exercise was not applicable to extradition procedures) – found that Schmidt, given the seriousness of his alleged crimes (serious drug offences), would have to be extradited (bene deditus), even if he had been lured to England by an English police officer (male captus).

[60] Where the English judges found that the suspect (Shazad), given the seriousness of his alleged crimes (serious drug offences) had to be tried (bene detentus), even if he had been lured to England by a British customs officer (male captus).

[61] Older cases do not appear to explicitly defend this idea but sometimes, persons commenting on the cases have argued that the seriousness of the alleged crimes may have played a role. See, for example, Ker (about which an anonymous author wrote: "The Court warned in Ker that it did "not intend to say that there may not be proceedings previous to the trial, in regard to which the prisoner could invoke in some manner … [the due process clause]; but for mere irregularities in the manner in which he may be brought into the custody of the law, we do not think he is entitled to say that he should not be tried at all ideas may also be identified in the Australian Levinge case,[62] the French Barbie case,[63] the German cases from 1986[64] and of Al-Moayad[65] and the Namibian case

…" 119 U.S. at 440. This warning hardly suggests that the Court considered due process to be limited to the guarantee of a fair trial; it does suggest that the Court doubted the wisdom of allowing one who has committed a serious offense to avoid trial altogether because his arrest was constitutionally defective [emphasis added, ChP].") and Argoud (about which rapporteur Comte wrote: "Rarely – perhaps never – has a problem more difficult, more complex, more disturbing, been put before the conscience of the judiciary. Account must be taken of the need for repression which the exceptional gravity of the crimes makes in the highest degree imperative; the maintenance of the principles sanctifying the rights of the human person and the liberty of the individual, of which the courts are the guardians and the guarantors, must be safeguarded; the sovereignty of States must be recognized and the nature and the limits of the sanctions which it postulates must be made explicit. Above all, it is necessary (…) to preserve the independence and the dignity of French justice [emphasis in original, ChP]."). The (older) Eichmann case has also sometimes been referred to as a case in which the seriousness of the alleged crimes with which the suspect is charged constituted a reason why the judges opted for male captus bene detentus. However, this is arguably incorrect (see n. 626 and accompanying text of Chapter V): the judges in Eichmann did not take the element 'seriousness of the alleged crimes with which the suspect is charged' into account to defend their usage of the male captus bene detentus principle because they did not have to; they were namely of the opinion that this maxim constituted an established rule of law (hence applicable to anyone).

[62] See New South Wales Court of Appeal, Levinge v Director of Custodial Services, Department of Corrective Services, 23 July 1987, 89 FLR 151: "[I]t is necessary to balance the public interest in preventing the unlawful conduct against the public interest in having the charge or complaint determined. This is not to say that the end can justify the means and that the more serious the charge the greater is the scope for the prosecution to engage in unlawful conduct. But conduct which might be regarded as constituting an abuse of process in respect of a comparatively minor charge may not have the same character in respect of a serious matter."

[63] See Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Barbie, 6 October 1983, International Law Reports, Vol. 78 (1988), p. 130: "The Chambre d'accusation [of the Court of Appeal] held that it was competent to examine the submissions made in the application, according to which the detention of Barbie was a nullity since it was the result of a 'disguised extradition'. The Court of Appeal held that "In the absence of any extradition request, the execution of an arrest warrant on national territory, against a person who has not [this negation must be deleted, ChP] previously taken refuge abroad, is not subject to his voluntary return to France or to the institution of extradition proceedings. Furthermore, by reason of their nature, the crimes against humanity with which Klaus Barbie, who claims German nationality, is charged in France where those crimes were committed, do not simply fall within the scope of French municipal law but are subject to an international criminal order to which the notions of frontiers and extradition rules arising therefrom are completely foreign." In giving this ruling … the Court of Appeal gave a proper legal basis to its decision, without inadequacy or contradiction." This reasoning (focusing on the importance of prosecution and less on the way the suspect is brought to trial), plus the fact that the Supreme Court emphasises the fairness of the proceedings in the courtroom seem to imply that problems in the pre-trial phase (for example, a disguised extradition) are not really to be looked at in these kinds of cases. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that the Supreme Court's reasoning can also be read differently, namely that there was nothing wrong with Barbie's transfer and that it can in fact be seen as a sort of extradition (or in any case as a transfer not prohibited by the French extradition law of 1927). See ns. 500-501 and accompanying text of Chapter V.

[64] See BVerfG (3. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 3.6 1986 – 2 BvR 837/85. NJW 1986, Heft 48, p. 3022: "Der (…) strafrechtliche Unrechtsgehalt der „Entführung" wiegt weniger schwer gegenüber der Schuld des Bf. dessen hohe kriminelle Energie auch seine erheblichen Vorstrafen belegen." It is to be noted that this case is more far-going than the other recent cases mentioned here which took the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes into account because in the German case, the suspect was abducted by the German police from the Netherlands. It is submitted that even though the seriousness of the alleged crimes should, where possible (for example, in an abuse of process-like exercise), play a role

Mushwena.[66] Oehmichen, for example, concludes after her overview of national case law that "[t]eilweise wurde nach der Schwere des Delikts sowie nach der Schwere der Menschenrechtsverletzung differenziert".[67]

Concluding this section, one can easily see that a lot depends on the exact circumstances, on questions such as: what kind of male captus was involved,[68] was in deciding whether or not the male captus is so serious that jurisdiction must be refused, judges should also understand that this discretion is relative; certain male captus techniques, such as an abduction executed by one's own agents, should be deemed to be so serious that one should refuse jurisdiction, even if that person was charged with serious crimes.

[65] See German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 b) bb) (3)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 785: "[R]ecent state practice also takes the seriousness of the crime with which the person is charged into account, which means that in this respect, it takes proportionality into consideration. The protection of high-ranking legal interests, which has been intensified on an international level in recent years, can lend itself to justifying the violation of a state's personal sovereignty that possibly goes along with the use of trickery (cf. International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolic, loc. cit., number 26). To the extent that the fight of most serious crimes such as the support of international drugs trade and of terrorism is concerned, luring someone out of a state's territorial sovereignty by means of trickery is not, at any rate to the extent that would be required to demonstrate state practice, regarded as an obstacle precluding criminal prosecution. Nothing different can apply as regards the existence of an obstacle precluding extradition." Although the German Federal Constitutional Court speaks of "recent state practice", para. 26 of the Appeals Chamber's decision in the Nikolić case essentially concerns the ICTY's own views on this problem. One can wonder whether the views of the ICTY can be seen as evidence of State practice but perhaps, the German Federal Constitutional Court is mainly interested in the cases on which the ICTY trusts to support its view. However, in that case, one can wonder whether the word "recent (state practice)" is well chosen as the two cases mentioned by the ICTY were not decided that recently (namely in 1962 (the Eichmann case) and 1983 (the Barbie case)). In addition to this, although there are indeed indications that the Supreme Court of France may have taken the seriousness of the crimes with which Barbie was charged in its decision whether or not jurisdiction had to be declined (see n. 63), it was shown, see n. 584 and accompanying text of Chapter VI, that the ICTY's reliance on the Eichmann case is incorrect as the Israeli courts did not continue with the exercise of jurisdiction because of Eichmann's alleged heinous crimes, but because the male captus bene detentus maxim in those days was an accepted rule of law, applicable to anyone, whether that 'anyone' was charged with fraud or with crimes against humanity. See also n. 61.

[66] In this case, reference was also (see the previous footnote) made to the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić. Nevertheless, in this Namibian case, Acting Justice of Appeal Mtambanengwe was arguably primarily interested in the observations of the Nikolić judges themselves (and not so much in their (flawed) distillation of the principle 'seriousness of the charges' from State practice). That is, of course, unproblematic.

[67] Oehmichen 2007, p. 237.

[68] State practice shows that an abduction performed by the prosecuting State's own agents on another State's territory without the latter's consent, accompanied by serious mistreatment or a protest and request for the return of the suspect, will lead to the ending of the case. (It could be argued that in the case of an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect, there is even an obligation pursuant to customary international law). Less serious cases (such as an abduction without serious mistreatment or without a protest and request for the return of the suspect) may also lead to the ending of the case, but here, State practice is more diverse. With respect to male captus situations which are deemed even less serious, such as luring and disguised extradition, courts more readily continue to exercise jurisdiction, although in such cases, jurisdiction may also be refused.

the male captus committed intentionally,[69] who committed the male captus,[70] did the male captus lead to a violation of another State's sovereignty (including a protest and request for the return of the suspect),[71] was the person seriously mistreated during the male captus[72] and was the victim of the male captus charged with serious crimes?[73]

In that respect, one must also be wary of general statements on the (customary international law) status of the male captus bene detentus rule for exactly what kind of male captus is involved must first be explored.[74]

---

[69] See n. 20.

[70] See ns. 21-22 and 50-51 and accompanying text. See also n. 504 of the previous chapter: if a prosecuting forum's own authorities are involved in the male captus, it is more likely that a male detentus will follow.

[71] See n. 41. See also n. 506 of the previous chapter: State practice shows that an abduction performed by the prosecuting State's own agents on another State's territory without the latter's consent, followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect, will lead to the ending of the case. (It could even be argued that in such a situation, there is even an obligation to refuse jurisdiction pursuant to customary international law.) See also n. 68. However, in other male captus situations, of which it is less clear whether they lead to a violation of international law in the first place, such as luring, a protest may not help, see Al-Moayad. Linked to this issue is the matter of the nationality of the suspect (see also n. 505 of the previous chapter). One can imagine that States may protest the violation of their sovereignty, irrespective of the nationality of the abducted person (see also Fawcett 1964, p. 199). Nevertheless, one can assume that a protest will be more likely if the suspect is a national of the injured State. See, for example, Alvarez-Machain (Mexican national, male captus in Mexico, protest from Mexico), Jolis (Belgian national, male captus in Belgium, protest from Belgium) and Al-Moayad (Yemeni national, male captus in Yemen, protest from Yemen). Conversely, if the suspect is a national from the forum State and not from the State where the male captus took place, there may not be a protest, see, for example, Scott (English national, male captus in the Netherlands) and Ebrahim (South African national, male captus in Swaziland).

[72] See n. 21 and accompanying text. See also n. 508 of the previous chapter: State practice shows that an abduction performed by the prosecuting State's own agents on another State's territory without the latter's consent, accompanied by serious mistreatment will lead to the ending of the case. See also n. 68. In fact, one can assume that courts will do so in any male captus situation, see, for example, the following reasoning from the Yunis luring case: "In this action, there is no dispute that United States law enforcement officers were fully involved in the planning and execution of defendant's arrest. However, defendant has failed either to allege or to show any actions committed by these officers that meet the standard of outrageousness established by Toscanino and its progeny requiring this Court to divest itself of jurisdiction. The record in this proceeding has been reviewed with care and the Court fails to find the type of cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino." (US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909), p. 920. See also n. 177 and accompanying text of Chapter V.)

[73] See ns. 57-67 and accompanying text. See also n. 509 of the previous chapter: judges may more easily continue the case because of the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged, see, for example, Latif.

[74] Cf. also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 75: "[T]he case law (…) is far from uniform. In some national jurisdictions, the maxim male captus, bene detentus is more closely followed than in others. Furthermore, the case law on this particular issue is still developing and such developments are more advanced in some jurisdictions. In addition, the concept of forced cross-border abductions is not always interpreted the same way. Case law often differs also in that the facts on which decisions have to be taken are not at all identical." See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of

After all, the maxim itself does not provide that differentiation.[75] In that respect, one can only agree with these old, but still very pertinent words:

> It seems to me that legal maxims in general are little more than pert headings of chapters. They are rather minims than maxims, for they give not a particularly great but a particularly small amount of information. As often as not, the exceptions and disqualifications to them are more important than the so-called rules.[76]

A final point that should be made is that it can be concluded that many cases, even if most judges have abandoned the old(-fashioned) version of male captus bene detentus cases such as Scott and even if many male captus male detentus cases have been issued by them,[77] can still be qualified as male captus bene detentus decisions because jurisdiction will be exercised (bene detentus), notwithstanding the fact that a (not so serious) male captus has occurred. A more effective way to prevent a court from supporting the (at least after the Alvarez-Machain case) rather unpopular male captus bene detentus rule is to argue, not that the male captus was not serious enough to divest jurisdiction, but that no male captus occurred at all, even if there are indications that something irregular had happened.[78] After all, if the court is of the opinion that no male captus occurred in the first place, it does not have to choose the unpopular male captus bene detentus rule.[79]

Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 94: "[T]he case law (…) is rather diverse."

[75] See, for example, Strijards 2001, pp. 96-97, Goldstone and Simpson 2003, p. 19, Hamid 2004, pp. 70, 78 and 86 and Loan 2005, p. 284 (see n. 41).

[76] See Garner 2004, p. 1703, citing James Fitzjames Stephen in his 1883 History of the Criminal Law of England (Vol. 2, p. 94, n. 1).

[77] Cf. Borelli 2003, p. 808: "[I]n several relatively recent cases, domestic courts in a number of different states have started to challenge the male captus bene detentus rule. These courts have become willing to consider the way in which the defendant has been brought within their jurisdiction and to treat it as a circumstance that could preclude the exercise of criminal jurisdiction." See also Borelli 2004, p. 361: "The divergent approaches taken by courts of very similar judicial systems demonstrate that (...) it would be extremely inaccurate to maintain, as some authors did until relatively recently, that "the violation of [international] law does not affect the validity of the subsequent exercise of jurisdiction over [illegally seized] offenders", or that "with rare unanimity and undeniable justification the courts of the world have held that the manner in which an accused has been brought before the court does not and, indeed, cannot deprive it of its jurisdiction" [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Borelli refers here to Brownlie 1998, p. 320 and Mann 1989, p. 414. It is perhaps saying that in the sixth edition of Brownlie's book (Brownlie 2003), one will no longer find this remark.

[78] See, for example, Menten and the Swiss case from 2007.

[79] Cf. also Cazala 2007, p. 382: "[O]n verra en étudiant les critères de qualification de l'arrestation que le juge a une très nette tendance à reconnaitre la régularité de celle-ci dans des circonstances qui sont pourtant parfois très contestables (…). (…) L'étude de la jurisprudence permet de constater que l'adage male captus bene detentus est finalement très peu utilisé, les juges préférant avoir une conception assez étroite de l'arrestation irrégulière." However, note also that Cazala is in particular focusing on the difference between the irregularities in the deprivation of liberty abroad and the formal arrest and detention in the prosecuting forum, see, for example, ibid., p. 844 (with respect to the case Ramirez Sánchez) and ibid., p. 844, n. 27 (with respect to the case Argoud). However, if a court states that the trial can continue under such circumstances, one can also argue that the court is not asserting that no

3 PRINCIPLES DISTILLED FROM THE CASES BETWEEN STATES AND INTERNATIONAL(ISED) CRIMINAL TRIBUNALS

Chapter VI has arguably shown that tribunals nowadays reject the old-fashioned version of the male captus bene detentus maxim in that they do not support the idea that the tribunals have jurisdiction, regardless of the circumstances in which the suspect was brought before them. This may be explained by the fact that these tribunals, after a perhaps somewhat dubious start,[80] have often stressed the importance of human rights, due process and fair proceedings[81] and have generally not limited these concepts to the proceedings in the courtroom (but see the Trial Chamber's decision of 8 July 2009 in Karadžić where the focus was arguably more on the fairness of the proceedings in court). In the words of Trial Chamber II in the Nikolić case:

> [T]his Tribunal has a responsibility to fully respect "internationally recognized standards regarding the rights of the accused at all stages of its proceedings." (…) [T]his Chamber concurs with the view expressed in several national judicial decisions, according to which the issue of respect for due process of law encompasses more than merely the duty to ensure a fair trial for the Accused. Due process of law also includes questions such as how the Parties have been conducting themselves in the context of a particular case and how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal [emphasis added, ChP].[82]

This (welcome) position can be explained by the fact that when the tribunals discussed in this chapter came into being – as from the 1990s – concepts such as human rights and fair proceedings were already firmly established in the mindset of judges. The much older idea that a trial must continue, irrespective of what male captus occurred at all (unless one views the captus as the formal arrest in the prosecuting forum alone), but that it is in fact supporting the male captus bene detentus rule.

---

[80] See ICTY, Trial Chamber I, Prosecutor v. Duško Tadić a/k/a "Dule", 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion Requesting Protective Measures for Victims and Witnesses', Case No. IT-94-1-T, 10 August 1995, paras. 28 and 30.

[81] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 40: "The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights is part of general international law and is applied on that basis. Regional human rights treaties, such as the European Convention on Human Rights and the American Convention on Human Rights, and the jurisprudence developed thereunder, are persuasive authority which may be of assistance in applying and interpreting the Tribunal's applicable law. Thus, they are not binding of their own accord on the Tribunal. They are, however, authoritative as evidence of international custom." See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 110: "The Trial Chamber observes first that it attaches great importance to respect for the human rights of the Accused and to proceedings that fully respect due process of law. It is also duty-bound to respect the rights laid down in Article 21 of the Statute. This Tribunal has a paramount duty and responsibility to respect fully the norms developed over the last decades in this field, especially within, but not limited to, the framework of the United Nations."

[82] Ibid., paras. 110-111.

happened in the course of bringing a suspect to justice had simply become out of step with these ideas.

One key element in this discussion is the right to liberty and security, which is so important for this study. Because of its customary international law/general international law status (see also Chapter III), the significance of this right has often been emphasised, even if it is not to be found in the regulatory documents of the tribunal in question.[83]

However, also in this context of the international(ised) criminal tribunals, it can be said that highlighting the importance of human rights, including the right to liberty and security, and looking at the way a person was brought into the jurisdiction of the court is not the same as issuing a male captus male detentus decision. In fact, although in the inter-State context, several male captus cases still resulted in a male detentus outcome,[84] there was only one case in the context of the international(ised) criminal tribunals where a male captus led to a male detentus outcome: the Barayagwiza case before the ICTR. However, even that outcome was altered (into a bene detentus outcome, 'softened' with a reduction of the sentence) after the Government of Rwanda, which would not allow such a 'big fish' as Barayagwiza to escape justice, had suspended its cooperation with the Tribunal and after the Appeals Chamber had reviewed its decision. In that respect, it can be maintained that the tribunals, even if they do not support the old-fashioned version of the maxim and even if they do not explicitly champion the (at least after the Alvarez-Machain case unpopular) male captus bene detentus maxim, are more easily affiliated with the latter maxim than with its counterpart male captus male detentus.[85] How can this be explained?

---

[83] See ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Zejnil Delalić, Zdravko Mucić also known as "Pavo", Hazim Delić and Esad Landžo, 'Decision on Application for Leave to Appeal (Provisional Release) by Hazim Delić', Case No. IT-96-21-AR72.4, 22 November 1996, para. 16: "The right to liberty is without question a fundamental human right. The Applicant has cited a number of international human rights instruments in this connection, but the proposition is axiomatic." See also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 79, n. 205: "We (…) see no reason to conclude that the protections afforded to suspects under Article 9 of the ICCPR do not also apply to suspects brought before the Tribunal." See further the Dokmanović case where the judges looked at Artt. 9, para. 1 of the ICCPR and 5, para. 1 of the ECHR (see n. 198 and accompanying text of Chapter VI). See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 110: "[T]his Tribunal has a responsibility to fully respect "internationally recognized standards regarding the rights of the accused at all stages of its proceedings." Such standards "are, in particular, contained in article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights"; such standards are e.g. also contained in Articles 5 and 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of 4 November 1950. This Chamber observes that these norms only provide for the absolute minimum standards applicable [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[84] Think of cases like Ebrahim, Bennett, Toscanino, the two Swiss cases from 1967 and 1982 (albeit that one, more correctly, led to a male deditus outcome), Jolis, Samper and Mullen.

[85] See also Van der Wilt 2004, pp. 274 ('abstract') and 276 and Knoops 2005, p. 35, who argues that the ICTY relies "on a nuanced version of the Latin maxim, male captus, bene detentus".

The tribunals argue, as do most national courts, that they have, in principle, jurisdiction (bene detentus), but that a serious male captus situation can lead, under the discretionary[86] abuse of process doctrine, to a male detentus outcome.[87] In doing so, the tribunals have adopted a broad version of the abuse of process doctrine in that, in determining whether a male captus is so serious that jurisdiction should be refused, it may not matter if the entity committing the male captus cannot be linked to the tribunal.[88] This stance clearly goes further than the national abuse of process

[86] Note, however, that although judges have a discretion in either refusing or not refusing jurisdiction in certain cases, this discretion is only relative in certain serious cases. There might be such serious cases that the tribunals will have to refuse jurisdiction. See, for example, ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 30: "[C]ertain human rights violations are of such a serious nature that they require that the exercise of jurisdiction be declined [emphasis added, ChP]." See also ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Slobodan Milošević, 'Decision on Preliminary Motions', Case No. IT-99-37-PT, 8 November 2001, para. 48: "[T]he International Tribunal will exercise its discretion to refuse to try the accused if there has been an egregious breach of the rights of the accused [emphasis added, ChP]." The Chamber here referred to the Barayagwiza case, where, according to the ICTY Trial Chamber, the ICTR Appeals Chamber "stressed that the discretionary power to dismiss a charge is exercised "in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity"." (Ibid., para. 50.) Besides the fact that this sentence does not run properly, the Trial Chamber also presents the ICTR observation as if it would mean that judges must exercise their power to dismiss the charge under these circumstances ("is exercised"), whereas the ICTR decision speaks of a discretion. The exact sentence of the ICTR decision namely reads: "It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity [emphasis added, ChP]." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74.) However, perhaps this difference only exists on paper; one can imagine that if the judges were to determine that to exercise jurisdiction under certain circumstances would prove detrimental to the court's integrity, that there is only one option left, namely to refuse jurisdiction. (In any case, it would be very difficult for judges to explain why they would nevertheless continue to exercise jurisdiction if they have previously determined that to continue to exercise jurisdiction would prove detrimental to the court's integrity.) Cf. in that respect also Jones and Doobay 2004, p. 95 (discussed in the context of the Bennett case in Chapter V).

[87] It may be interesting to note that this doctrine was also applied by the co-investigating judges (in their order of 31 July 2007) and the trial judges (in their decision of 15 June 2009) of the – on civil law focused – ECCC. This may constitute additional evidence for the idea that this concept, which has its roots in common law, can very well be used by non-common law courts as well, see ns. 878, 1211 and 1255 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[88] See, for example, the Trial Chamber's decision in Nikolić (with reference to the 1999 Barayagwiza decision): "[I]n a situation where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subjected to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment to the exercise of jurisdiction over such an accused. This would certainly be the case where persons acting for SFOR or the Prosecution were involved in such very serious mistreatment. But even without such involvement this Chamber finds it extremely difficult to justify the exercise of jurisdiction over a person if that person was brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal after having been seriously mistreated. This, the Chamber observes, is in keeping with the approach of the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza case, according to which in cases of egregious violations of the rights of the Accused, it is "irrelevant which entity or entities were responsible for the alleged violations of the Appellant's rights" [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 114.) See further ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Slobodan Milošević, 'Decision on Preliminary Motions', Case No. IT-99-37-doctrine where the involvement of the authorities of the prosecuting forum appears to be required.[89]

On a more normative note, it can be argued that the tribunals' broader version of the abuse of process doctrine is better and is in fact also appropriate for the inter-State context, where courts may also be confronted by irregularities in the context of their case which are not committed by entities which can be connected with the now prosecuting court.[90] The most important question a court should ask itself is whether the pre-trial irregularity, whichever entity committed it, is so serious that proceeding with the case would undermine the court's integrity/sense of justice. That would normally be where authorities which can be connected to the prosecuting forum are involved in the irregularity, but this may not necessarily be the case.[91] However,

---

PT, 8 November 2001, para. 51, ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 30, SCSL, Trial Chamber, Prosecutor Against Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara and Santigie Borbor Kanu, 'Written Reasons for the Trial Chamber's Oral Decision on the Defence Motion on Abuse of Process Due to Infringement of Principles of Nullum Crimen Sine Lege and Non-Retroactivity as to Several Counts', Case No. SCSL-04-16-PT, 31 March 2004, para. 26, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 206, ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 21, ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 33, ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on the Accused's Holbrooke Agreement Motion' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 8 July 2009, para. 85 and ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on Karadžić's Appeal of Trial Chamber's Decision on Alleged Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-AR73.4, 12 October 2009, para. 47.

[89] See also Van der Wilt 2004, p. 278.

[90] See also Nsereko 2008, p. 69: "It needs to be emphasized again that where the violations are egregious, as was held by the Yugoslav Tribunal in the Nikolic case, it would not matter whether the state or prosecuting authorities were involved in such violations. In this connection, it is urged that national courts would do well to adopt this salutary stance [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[91] See, for another opinion, Lamb 2000, p. 237: "It bears emphasising that none of the national authorities previously cited suggest that a court should decline to exercise jurisdiction over a defendant, in circumstances where the authorities of the forum State have acted with propriety, merely because the authorities of another State or individual may have acted irregularly. Consequently, where the ICTY or its agents were themselves neither involved nor complicit in any irregularities which may have occurred in the course of effecting an arrest, these irregularities would not suffice to vitiate the ICTY's jurisdiction, at least where that jurisdiction was otherwise well-founded. This consequence flows from the fact that the underlying purpose of the inherent jurisdiction of any judicial body to prevent an abuse of its own process is to impose a form of discipline and control over the law enforcement authorities of the forum State, an object which, in the case of the ICTY as with national courts, would not be promoted by preventing the trial of an accused on the basis of the prior unlawful conduct of a third State or unknown persons in effecting an arrest. [As the Bennett case has shown, however, this view, which can also be found in ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to "Defence Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72" filed 17 May 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 31 May 2001, para. 34, n. 9 and ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to Defence "Motion to Determine Issues as Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber…and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, His Arrest and Subsequent Detention", filed 29 October 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 12 November 2001, para. 6, n. 5, seems to be incorrect, see House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court even though the broad version of the abuse of process doctrine is interesting for both national and international courts, it is especially interesting for the tribunals because these do not have their own police force.[92] That means that, besides the fact that they may be confronted by irregularities committed by private individuals (a situation which may occur in the context of any court, even a court which has a police force at its disposal), the tribunals may be confronted by irregularities committed by, for example, national police forces and international troops executing arrests/detentions/transfers on their behalf. Normally, there is nothing wrong with arrests/detentions/transfers executed by those entities at the request of the tribunal. In such cases, the tribunal may profit from the actions of third parties. However, there may also be instances where the consequences of the tribunal's dependence on others are less fortunate, namely if something goes wrong in the pre-trial arrest and detention phase. It would be very easy but not a sign of real legal 'maturity' for the tribunal to only accept the positive side of the fact that it has no police force of its own.[93] Hence, a liberal concept of the abuse of process doctrine is to be preferred.[94] and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161: "The discretion to stay is not a disciplinary jurisdiction and ought not to be exercised in order to express the court's disapproval of official conduct. Accordingly, if the prosecuting authorities have been guilty of culpable delay but the prospect of a fair trial has not been prejudiced, the court ought not to stay the proceedings merely 'pour encourager les autres'." Cf. also n. 302 of Chapter V, ChP.] Official collusion in the unlawful conduct in question thus appears to be a necessary – but not a sufficient – condition for an otherwise-competent court to decline to exercise its jurisdiction over an offender brought before it by means of an irregular rendition [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Brief of the United States of America on Review of Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others', Case No. IT-95-9-AR108*bis*, 15 November 2000, p. 9: "A variety of other cases address the lawfulness of cross-border abductions, with some upholding the principle that an abduction in violation of the law of one State does not divest another State to which he is brought of jurisdiction to prosecute, and others suggesting that a State's courts may exercise discretion to decline jurisdiction over an individual brought before them under such circumstances. However, when agents of the prosecuting State have not been shown to be complicit, there are no grounds for such discretion."

---

[92] This could perhaps be seen as one of the 'translations'/'transpositions' between the inter-State context and the tribunal context, cf. ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 76: "[T]he national case law must be "translated" in order to apply to the particular context in which this Tribunal operates."

[93] In this context, one could also argue that the moment national police forces/international troops are executing arrest/detentions/transfers for the tribunal, they function as the tribunal's enforcement arm, although this is in no way saying that these entities can thus be seen as organs of the tribunal. See for this point also ns. 340 and 375 of Chapter VI and accompanying text. See also Lamb 2000, p. 241. Nevertheless, one can imagine that the tribunal will more readily refuse jurisdiction in case national police forces/international troops working for the tribunal are involved in a serious male captus than in case an entity without any connection to the tribunal is involved in it, see also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 114: "[I]n a situation where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subjected to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment to the exercise of jurisdiction over such an accused. This would certainly be the case where persons acting for SFOR or the Prosecution were involved in such very serious mistreatment [emphasis added, ChP]."

In addition, if the tribunal – and this also goes for a national court – did not remedy wrongs committed in its pre-trial phase, whichever entity committed those wrongs, the suspect would fall into a legal vacuum, a situation which must, of course, be prevented by the court which is ultimately prosecuting the case.[95]

However, even if the tribunals adopt a broader version of the abuse of process doctrine than that at the national level, in that the tribunals would also refuse jurisdiction in the case of a serious male captus situation occurring in the pre-trial phase of their cases, irrespective of who committed this male captus situation, the male detentus threshold suggested in what is arguably the most authoritative case on this matter, the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision of Nikolić, still appears[96] to be high.

From this case, in which it was assumed that the suspect was brought into the jurisdiction of the ICTY by a forcible kidnapping executed by private individuals, one may deduce that jurisdiction would not be refused if, in the process of bringing a suspect of very serious crimes to justice, the sovereignty of a State is violated (arguably even if that State were to complain about the violation and request the return of the suspect), on the condition that, in the course of that process, the suspect's rights are not violated to such an extent that jurisdiction must be refused.

It is not hard to agree with the Appeals Chamber that "certain human rights violations are of such a serious nature that they require that the exercise of jurisdiction be declined". However, because it was assumed that Nikolić was the victim of an abduction, because the Appeals Chamber was apparently not very impressed by the value of State sovereignty and because the Appeals Chamber, in justifying its approach, refers to passages from cases which particularly focus on serious mistreatment when writing about their male detentus threshold, it could be argued that the Appeals Chamber's male detentus test appears to be mainly interested in the seriousness of the mistreatment inflicted on the suspect. This could mean that the Appeals Chamber would not be concerned about an abduction, as long as that abduction was not accompanied by serious mistreatment.[97]

---

[94] Cf. also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadzic, 'Appeal of Decision of Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-05/18-AR73.4, 27 July 2009, paras. 109-111 (see also n. 738 of Chapter VI).

[95] See also Sluiter 2001, pp. 155-156, commenting on the Dokmanović case: "A positive aspect of the examination of in particular human rights instruments appears to be its full application to that part of the criminal procedure that takes place outside the courtroom. In this respect, the Chamber, in my view, acknowledged the overall responsibility of the ICTY for these procedures. This responsibility is based on the duty incumbent upon the Trial Chamber pursuant to Article 20 to ensure that the accused receives a fair trial and on the vertical co-operation relationship between States, which enables the Tribunals to impose modalities of execution. It is imperative that the defendant receives the full protection of human rights instruments and should not be the victim of the fragmentation of the criminal procedure over two or even more jurisdictions [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[96] See n. 98.

[97] As also explained in Chapter VI, although the Appeals Chamber's reference to the Barayagwiza case (where there was no mistreatment of the suspect) and the test mentioned in that case ("It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity.") would not exclude, for example, a 'normal' abduction (without serious mistreatment), the

The problem with this male detentus test is that it is not entirely clear,[98] given the general observations of the Appeals Chamber in Nikolić and other indications from that decision,[99] whether this is the general male detentus test for the ICTY,

---

Appeals Chamber's other references are particularly focused on the mistreatment aspect. First of all, the Appeals Chamber refers to the Nikolić Trial Chamber's words which specifically focus on the question whether Nikolić was seriously mistreated: "[W]here an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subjected to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment to the exercise of jurisdiction over such an accused. This would certainly be the case where persons acting for SFOR or the Prosecution were involved in such very serious mistreatment." (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 28.) See also ibid., para. 31: "In the present case, the trial Chamber examined the facts agreed to by the parties. It established that the treatment of the Appellant was not of such an egregious nature as to impede the exercise of jurisdiction. (…) [T]he Appeals Chamber concurs with the Trial Chamber that the circumstances of this case do not warrant, under the standard defined above, the setting aside of jurisdiction." The Appeals Chamber also referred to a passage from the Toscanino case dealing with the national concept of due process. These words could, in itself, encompass a 'normal' abduction but the Toscanino test has later been interpreted as a very restricted male detentus possibility. An abduction as such is not enough. What is required is in fact an abduction accompanied by serious mistreatment. For example, the judges in the Yunis case stated that their case did not involve "the type of cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino." (US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909), p. 920.) That the Appeals Chamber prefers that interpretation of the Toscanino case can also be derived from its reference to the paragraphs in the Dokmanović case where one can read: "[T]here was no "cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino" in the arrest of Mr. Dokmanović. The accused was not mistreated in any way on his journey to the Erdut base. There was nothing about the arrest to shock the conscience [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 75.)

[98] As explained in Chapter VI, the Defence in Nikolić was apparently also not very sure about the exact content of the Appeals Chamber's male detentus test and therefore asked the Chamber for clarification, see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion Requesting Clarification of the Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 20 June 2003, para. 5: "[T]he defence respectfully requests clarification of exactly what test is contemplated by 'the standard defined above' [see para. 31 of the Appeals Chamber's decision, ChP], and where that above (…) is to be found in the instant judgement. The facts agreed by the parties encompassed kidnapping and the forcible removal by a person against his will from a sovereign jurisdiction to another jurisdiction without the leave of either, such having involved the prosecution and conviction of some of the perpetrators in Serbia. If it be the case that the defence is correct in interpreting the 'standard' simply thus, that the agreed subjective facts were not sufficient to establish an egregious violation, then the defence respectfully requests what 'standard' is applicable so as to form the watershed between illegality that, on the one hand is egregious and, on the other, is not. That, with respect cannot be an abstraction, as the use of the phrase 'the standard defined' implies just that, a defined test [emphasis in original, ChP]." However, the Appeals Chamber, declaring the request "frivolous", considered that no clarification was required, see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Motion Requesting Clarification', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 6 August 2003, A 69. See also Sloan 2006, pp. 333-334.

[99] After all, the Appeals Chamber also bases its 'serious violation' criterion on cases such as Toscanino and Dokmanović, cases in which the prosecuting forum itself was involved in the (alleged) irregularity. Moreover, the Appeals Chamber, in its central question and last sentence from its strategy, makes use of the combination "violations (…) committed by SFOR, and by extension OTP [emphasis added, ChP]"/"violations (…) attributable to SFOR and by extension to the OTP [emphasis added, ChP]."

applicable to any male captus situation, or whether this is the more specific male detentus test for the situation applicable in that specific case, in which the OTP was not involved in the abduction.

To raise a normative point again here, it is submitted that if the serious/egregious violation test is the male detentus test applicable to any male captus situation (even a male captus situation in which the OTP is involved), the serious/egregious violation test should definitely not be restricted to serious mistreatment circumstances.[100] After all, that would mean that the Tribunal would not refuse jurisdiction in the case of an abduction, executed by the OTP, as long as that abduction was not accompanied by serious mistreatment. That cannot seriously be the Tribunal's stance. As argued in the context of the Nikolić case, if the OTP were involved in an abduction, the ICTY should view this as such a serious male captus situation that it should resolutely refuse jurisdiction. In such a case, it should not matter whether or not the accused was seriously mistreated.[101] The mere fact that the OTP would orchestrate an abduction should make the judges refuse jurisdiction. It is not so much the harm inflicted on the suspect (which might be minimal) or the harm inflicted on the sovereignty of a State[102] which should lead to the refusal of jurisdiction here, it is above all the integrity and credibility of the Tribunal as an institution based on (international) (human rights) law which would be harmed if the trial were to continue.[103] In that sense, neither should it matter whether a State has,

---

(ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, paras. 3 and 18.) That could mean that the conclusion of the Appeals Chamber, namely that the remedy of setting aside jurisdiction will almost never be the appropriate remedy, is also applicable to situations where the violations can be attributed to the OTP.

[100] Note, by the way, that a 'normal' arrest (not, for example, an abduction) accompanied by serious mistreatment may also constitute such a serious male captus that the Tribunal will refuse jurisdiction. See also Lamb who provides the following example of "an arrest which is so tainted by such illegality as to preclude the trial of the accused by the ICTY [original footnote omitted, ChP]" (Lamb 2000, p. 205): "For example, where the arrest of an indictee involved extreme, gratuitous violence or torture inflicted by Tribunal personnel and/or the international forces effecting the arrest, or where there has been official collusion in such abuses." (Ibid., p. 205, n. 127.)

[101] In that respect, it can be argued that the Tribunal should follow the lower male detentus standards which can, for example, be found in cases like Bennett. See also Sloan 2006, p. 337: "The Appeals Chamber made no effort to reconcile the approach in the Toscanino case [perhaps it is better to speak here of the interpretation of this case by subsequent courts, ChP] with the jurisprudence of other states which did not require an egregious element to the violation of human rights of an accused in order for the court to reject jurisdiction [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[102] That might indeed be of less importance to an international criminal tribunal like the ICTY whose relationship with national States is of a superior, vertical and not of an equal, horizontal nature. However, as already explained (see n. 636 of Chapter VI), the fact that the sovereignty aspect "by definition cannot play the same role" (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 100) in the context of the Tribunals does not mean that the Tribunal has a 'carte blanche' in violating the sovereignty of domestic States.

[103] Cf. also Sloan 2006, pp. 342-343: "If all the facts were brought to light and it became clear that SFOR had been involved in illegal behaviour, the nature of the violation of human rights and sovereignty would appear in a different light. Indeed, it is not beyond the realm of possibility that a thorough examination of the facts might even have shown foreknowledge on the part of the OTP of for example, protested and requested the return of the suspect.[104] An abduction as such (with no further qualification) should lead to the ending of the case if the Tribunal wants to be taken seriously as a court of law. One could also mention practical considerations here; such an approach would arguably also be damaging to the entire mission of the Tribunal.[105] In addition, neither should one forget that the negative consequences of proceeding with a case involving an abduction might not be limited to the context of the Tribunals. For national States/courts, these international institutions may be seen as examples to follow. If employees of a Tribunal are involved in an abduction and in a way get away with it (because the judges do not decline jurisdiction), then national States/courts can refer to the Tribunal's approach to defend their own (potentially) dubious methods of bringing suspects to trial or to defend the 'approval' of such methods by proceeding with the case.[106] That in turn would harm the integrity of these States/courts, the human SFOR's intention to carry out illegal capture operations (...). Were such findings to have been made, the arrest process would have been found to be contaminated. The obligation of the Appeals Chamber, therefore, would have been to provide a remedy that reflected the ICTY's intolerance of such conduct by making it clear that such behaviour in the future would be unlikely to lead to the prosecution of the accused. This might very well have taken the form of ordering the release of Nikolić". See also Scharf 2000, pp. 969-970, commenting on authorities condemning male captus techniques as international human rights violations: "These precedents would suggest that an international criminal tribunal would have to dismiss a case where the defendant has been abducted in violation of international law."

---

[104] Although Section 2 of this chapter has shown that there seems to be a customary international law rule that courts will refuse jurisdiction in the case of an abduction followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect, it was also remarked that judges will probably refuse jurisdiction in such cases to, among other things, protect the fragile legal international order based on the equality of sovereign States and to do what its Executive has failed to do, namely to return the suspect to the injured State. However, this rationale is less important in the 'vertical' context of, for example, the ICTY and ICTR, although it is not absent either (see the just-made observations that certain decisions of these Tribunals may also have their effect on the horizontal level). (Cf. also Van der Wilt 2004, pp. 294-295.) As a result, one can wonder whether this rule of customary international law (which, in principle, is also applicable to these Tribunals) can be applied mutatis mutandis into their context. Perhaps it could be argued that in such circumstances, there would be no obligation for the ICTY/ICTR to transfer the suspect back. Notwithstanding this, however, it has already been submitted that in the case of an abduction orchestrated by the Tribunals, the latter should return (conditionally, see n. 179 and accompanying text) the suspect back, whether or not there has been a protest from the injured State.

[105] See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 65: "Both SFOR and the Tribunal are involved in a peace mission and are expected to contribute in a positive way to the restoration of peace and security in the area. Any use of methods and practices that would, in themselves, violate fundamental principles of international law and justice would be contrary to the mission of this Tribunal." Cf. also Henquet 2003, p. 146: "The purpose of the Tribunal, indeed the legal basis for its establishment, is to contribute to the restoration of peace and security in the former Yugoslavia. Thus, it might be argued, if the Tribunal is to succeed in this task it must be perceived as credible and just. This requires it to uphold the highest standards of justice." See also Van Sliedregt 2001 B, pp. 82-83.

[106] In the words of Swart (when writing about the context of respect for international human rights): "[B]oth ad hoc Tribunals inevitably provide role models for national systems of criminal justice. Lack of respect for individual rights could, therefore, have negative consequences that transcend the limited framework of the Tribunals." (Swart 2001, p. 201.) See also Carcano 2005, p. 91: "[N]ational courts, when called to decide cases involving crimes of international concern or raising certain aspects of rights of their suspects and – what is far more important for the horizontal context than for the context of the Tribunals – the very foundation of the inter-State level itself, namely respect for another State's sovereignty.[107] Furthermore, this could also have consequences for the ICC, the context of which will be discussed in the next part of this book.[108]

Luckily, however, there are also indications in the Appeals Chamber's decision of Nikolić that the ICTY would refuse jurisdiction if the OTP were involved in an abduction as such (without serious mistreatment).[109] This view can arguably also be international criminal law, may be influenced by the content of international decisions." See further Smeulers 2007, p. 108 (writing about the concepts of human rights and due process of law): "The tribunal fulfills an important and exemplary function." See finally Starr 2008, pp. 713-714: "At least some of the ICTs' judges see the Tribunals as models for other courts' treatment of defendants and point out that respecting due process is crucial to that mission. Indeed, the ICTs' procedural rules and jurisprudence have repeatedly been cited by scholars discussing human rights in the context of domestic proceedings, by other international courts and commissions and advocates before those bodies, and by domestic courts interpreting their own international legal obligations [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." One could here think, for example, of the Al-Moayad and Mushwena cases discussed in Chapter V.

[107] See again (see also n. 519 and accompanying text of Chapter III) UNSC Res. 138 of 23 June 1960 (S/4349), in which the Council, dealing with the Israeli abduction of Eichmann in Argentina, stated "that the repetition of acts such as that giving rise to this situation would involve a breach of the principles upon which international order is founded, creating an atmosphere of insecurity and distrust incompatible with the preservation of peace". Cf. also Van der Wilt 2004, p. 295, who explains that if the Tribunal would knowingly make use of States carrying out violations of State sovereignty for the Tribunal, it would also jeopardise the peaceful coexistence.

[108] See also Sloan 2006, p. 333: "[T]o simply observe that the violation [of State sovereignty, ChP] may lead to 'consequences for the international responsibility of the State or organization involved', without establishing meaningful parameters regarding when such violations will be tolerated by the ICTY, gives a blank cheque to those who would violate state sovereignty in what they perceive to be the best interests of international criminal justice. If this were to be considered a precedent for capture of those indicted by the International Criminal Court (ICC) residing in non-cooperating member states, the ramifications could be very damaging to international peace and security [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[109] It can, for example, be argued that the cases to which the Appeals Chamber refers would not exclude this. (However, as explained, the Appeals Chamber seems particularly interested in the serious mistreatment passages of some of these cases.) For example, the Barayagwiza case (where there was no mistreatment of the suspect) and the test mentioned in that case ("It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74)) would not exclude a 'normal' abduction (without serious mistreatment). See also ibid.: "Under the doctrine of "abuse of process", proceedings that have been lawfully initiated may be terminated after an indictment has been issued if improper or illegal procedures are employed in pursuing an otherwise lawful process [emphasis added, ChP]." Furthermore, one can also find evidence in the Toscanino case itself that a normal abduction would fall under its male detentus test, although the case has not been interpreted as such in subsequent cases. (See also Michell 1996, p. 403: "[T]hese later interpretations suggest incorrectly that Toscanino was primarily a "torture" case rather than a "forcible abduction" case.") In addition, the Nikolić and Dokmanović cases arguably also include passages which can be seen as supporting a male detentus test, which could include a normal abduction, without serious mistreatment. In the Trial Chamber's decision in Nikolić, the judges stated more generally: "Due process of law also includes questions such as how the Parties have been conducting themselves in the context of a particular case and how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The finding in the Ebrahim case that the State must found in the Trial Chamber's decision of Nikolić[110] and in cases which followed the Appeals Chamber's decision, although many of them, probably because of the come to court with clean hands applies equally to the Prosecution coming to a Trial Chamber of this Tribunal. In addition, this Chamber concurs with the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza case that the abuse of process doctrine may be relied on if "in the circumstances of a particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice". However, in order to prompt a Chamber to use this doctrine, it needs to be clear that the rights of the Accused have been egregiously violated [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111.) In addition, neither should it be forgotten that the passage from the Dokmanović case, to which the Appeals Chamber refers, was (only) made in the context of luring. However, before the Trial Chamber in Dokmanović turned to this male captus situation, it had distinguished this situation from the male captus situation forcible abduction. This may mean that the Trial Chamber might have dismissed the case of Dokmanović if the OTP was not involved in a mere luring operation, but in an abduction operation. See also Scharf 1998, p. 371: "[T]he Trial Chamber focused on the distinction between "luring" (the means used to arrest Dokmanović) and "forcible abduction", reckoning that the former was acceptable while the latter might constitute grounds for dismissal in future cases [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Next to these references, one could also point to the fact that in paras. 27 and 33 of its decision, the ICTY Appeals Chamber – in contrast to its central question and strategy – suddenly leaves out the part "and by extension (to) the OTP", see also n. 646 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[110] Where the judges, even though they focused on the mistreatment example of the abuse of process doctrine in their explanation that this doctrine can also be applied to third parties (in that serious mistreatment can also lead to the ending of the case, not only when entities which can (more or less) be connected to the Tribunal are involved in it, but also when entities with no connection to the Tribunal are involved in it), also stated more generally that "in order to prompt a Chamber to use this doctrine [the abuse of process doctrine, ChP], it needs to be clear that the rights of the Accused have been egregiously violated [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111.) Furthermore, one can also point to the Trial Chamber's confirmation of the approach taken in the first Barayagwiza decision, where the suspect was seriously mistreated by neither the national authorities nor the Prosecution but where the judges nevertheless dismissed the case, see ibid.: "[T]his Chamber concurs with the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza case that the abuse of process doctrine may be relied on if "in the circumstances of a particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice"." (Note, see also the previous footnote, that in the Barayagwiza case, it was stated as well that "[u]nder the doctrine of "abuse of process", proceedings that have been lawfully initiated may be terminated after an indictment has been issued if improper or illegal procedures are employed in pursuing an otherwise lawful process [emphasis added, ChP]." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74.)) But perhaps the clearest indication that the Trial Chamber in Nikolić would also refuse jurisdiction if staff of the Tribunal were involved in an abduction (whether or not that abduction was accompanied by serious mistreatment) can be found in the following words, see ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111: "[T]his Chamber concurs with the view expressed in several national judicial decisions, according to which the issue of respect for due process of law encompasses more than merely the duty to ensure a fair trial for the Accused. Due process of law also includes questions such as how the Parties have been conducting themselves in the context of a particular case and how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The finding in the Ebrahim case [where, it should be remembered, the suspect was the victim of a 'normal' abduction, without any serious mistreatment, ChP] that the State must come to court with clean hands applies equally to the Prosecution coming to a Trial Chamber of this Tribunal."

(partial) involvement of third parties in the male captus, focused in particular on the serious mistreatment example of the abuse of process doctrine.[111]

Although one can seriously doubt that a tribunal would only refuse jurisdiction in the context of actions from third parties if these actions amounted to serious mistreatment or torture (this point will crop up again in a moment), it is in any case to be welcomed that the tribunal cases contain reasonings which entail that the judges would refuse jurisdiction if the OTP were to be involved in an abduction as such. After all, such a male captus can easily be seen as a 'serious' or 'egregious' violation under the Tribunals' abuse of process doctrine.[112] It may be illustrative here to refer again[113] to the male detentus possibilities proposed by the OTP itself in the Nikolić case. An abduction orchestrated by the OTP could easily fall under the first possibility:

> a) [u]nambiguous, advertent[[114]] violations of international law which can be attributed[[115]] to the Office of the Prosecutor; and/or b) a residual category of cases where the violations in question are of such egregiousness or outrageousness that, irrespective of any lack of involvement on the part of the Prosecution, the Trial Chamber could not, in good conscience, continue to exercise its jurisdiction over the Accused [original footnote omitted, ChP].[116]

---

[111] See, for example, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 206: "While a Chamber may use its discretion under the circumstances of a case to decline to exercise jurisdiction, it should only do so "where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity." For example, "in circumstances where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subject to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment." However, those cases are exceptional and, in most circumstances, the "remedy of setting aside jurisdiction, will . . . be disproportionate." The Appeals Chamber gives due weight to the violations alleged by the Appellant; however, it does not consider that this case falls within the exceptional category of cases highlighted above [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Note that in this case, the Appeals Chamber arguably looked at violations on the part of both the national authorities and the Prosecution.

[112] See, for example, Henquet 2003, p. 123. See also the suggestion of this study, made in the Nikolić case, that the Tribunal should have stated more clearly that its male detentus test also contains the situation where employees of the Tribunal itself intentionally committed serious (procedural) irregularities in the process of bringing a suspect to trial, such as an abduction. See n. 633 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[113] See n. 478 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[114] A synonym of this word is 'mindful', a word which clarifies that there must have been a real intent from the Prosecution to violate international law. See also the word "conscious" in a comparable test from the Prosecution, see n. 116.

[115] The Prosecution was of the opinion that "[t]he mere subsequent acceptance by the Prosecution of custody of the Accused is not sufficient in and of itself to satisfy the required level of "collusion" and/or "official involvement." According to the Prosecution, at least some form of adoption and approval by the Prosecution of such violations is required [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 27.)

[116] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 28. It may be interesting to note that the Prosecution would also find the first situation to constitute egregious conduct, see the clarification after the first possibility in the original words of the Prosecution: "(i.e. the

Although it might very well be argued that an abduction as such, orchestrated by the Prosecution, would almost certainly fall under this first notion of "[u]nambiguous, advertent violations of international law", things are less clear with respect to that other important male captus situation, the method of luring. As already explained in Chapter III, even though a luring operation may arguably lead to a violation of the sovereignty of the suspect's State of residence – for example, if agents of the luring State enter the territory of the State of residence to conduct police work – and of the suspect's human rights, it was also conceded that luring is in certain aspects less reprehensible than abduction and that that fact may lead to less serious consequences.

The ICTY Trial Chamber in Dokmanović went even further: it held that the luring of Dokmanović, in the course of which staff from the Prosecution entered the territory of the FRY, "is consistent with principles of international law and the sovereignty of the FRY".[117] This means that, according to this case, luring as such would not lead to a male detentus outcome. However, that may be different if that luring falls under the second notion mentioned above ("a residual category of cases where the violations in question are of such egregiousness or outrageousness that, irrespective of any lack of involvement on the part of the Prosecution, the Trial Chamber could not, in good conscience, continue to exercise its jurisdiction over the Accused"), cf. the cases of Stocké and Yunis, see footnotes 54 and 55.

Prosecution's own conduct would have to be in some way egregious [emphasis in original, ChP])" (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to Defence "Motion to Determine Issues as Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber…and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, His Arrest and Subsequent Detention", filed 29 October 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 12 November 2001, para. 17). See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to "Defence Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72" filed 17 May 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 31 May 2001, para. 31: "a) unambiguous, conscious violations of international legality which can be attributed to the Office of the Prosecutor (i.e. the Prosecution's own conduct would have to be in some way egregious); and/or b) a residual category of case[s] where the violations in question are of such egregiousness or outrageousness that, irrespective of any lack of involvement on the part of the Prosecution, the Trial Chamber could not, in good conscience, continue to exercise its jurisdiction over the accused. In such circumstances, his or her release may therefore be ordered so as to safeguard the integrity of the entire judicial process [emphasis in original, ChP]." The Prosecution formulated this test relying on Lamb 2000. See also Sloan 2003 A., p. 110, n. 183. The following male detentus test from the ECCC would arguably not exclude an abduction orchestrated by the Prosecution either: "The abuse of process doctrine (...), which would require a tribunal to decline to exercise its jurisdiction in a partic[u]lar case, has been narrowly construed and limited to cases where the illegal conduct in question is such as to make it repugnant to the rule of law to put the accused on trial [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 33.)

[117] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 57.

That may also be the case for other male captus situations with which the judges have to cope:[118] if they are not seen as clear violations of international law on the part of the Prosecution, they may not lead to the ending of the case, unless in the course of this male captus situation such serious (other) violations/irregularities have occurred that the judges cannot, in good conscience, continue the case.[119]

However, it should also be noted that the general reasonings of, for example, the Nikolić[120] and Barayagwiza[121] cases as mentioned in footnotes 109-110, cases which were decided after the Dokmanović case, may entail that tribunal judges confronted by luring-like situations are of the opinion that the Prosecutor has not come to court

[118] Although Chapter VI has not seen male captus situations which can really be compared to the inter-State concept of disguised extradition, there have been some cases in which the State of residence may have played a rather dubious role in the transfer of the suspect, see, for example, the Milošević case.

[119] It is reminded that judges, if they look into irregularities from authorities which can be linked to the State of residence, should persuade themselves of the fact that actual violations have in fact occurred. It can be maintained that judges should indeed only refuse jurisdiction in the most extreme cases and not in cases where it is clear that uncooperative States, executing arrests for the Tribunal, have violated procedures on purpose, even if these violations are rather serious, in an effort to ensure that a person's trial would not continue because of these violations. In that respect, one must agree with the understandable and pertinent concerns of the Prosecution in Todorović that "it could defeat the purposes of justice if every illegality by a State authority, over which the Tribunal has no control, could vitiate a prosecution altogether. Indeed, any such doctrine might potentially encourage certain States, which have hitherto failed to fulfil their obligations of co-operation with the Tribunal, to hand accused persons over to the Tribunal but to ensure that there are serious irregularities in the process. The States concerned could thus claim that they are fulfilling their obligation to co-operate, while at the same time ensuring that the prosecution against the accused cannot proceed." (ICTY, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić a/k/a Miro Brko, Stevan Todorović a/k/a Stiv a/k/a Stevo a/k/a Monstrum and Simo Zarić a/k/a Šolaja, 'Prosecutor's Response to the "Notice of Motion for Evidentiary Hearing on Arrest, Detention and Removal of Defendant Stevan Todorović and for Extension of Time to Move to Dismiss Indictment" Filed by Stevan Todorović on 10 February 1999', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 22 February 1999, para. 51.) See also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to "Defence Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72" filed 17 May 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 31 May 2001, paras. 34-35 and ICTY, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Prosecutor's Response to Defence "Motion to Determine Issues as Agreed Between the Parties And the Trial Chamber…and the Consequences of Any Illegal Conduct Material to the Accused, His Arrest and Subsequent Detention", filed 29 October 2001', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 12 November 2001, para. 6. (See ns. 344 and 476 of Chapter VI.)

[120] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111: "[T]his Chamber concurs with the view expressed in several national judicial decisions, according to which the issue of respect for due process of law encompasses more than merely the duty to ensure a fair trial for the Accused. Due process of law also includes questions such as how the Parties have been conducting themselves in the context of a particular case and how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The finding in the Ebrahim case that the State must come to court with clean hands applies equally to the Prosecution coming to a Trial Chamber of this Tribunal."

[121] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74: "Under the doctrine of "abuse of process", proceedings that have been lawfully initiated may be terminated after an indictment has been issued if improper or illegal procedures are employed in pursuing an otherwise lawful process [emphasis added, ChP]."

with clean hands, has resorted to illegal procedures, and thus that jurisdiction must be refused.[122]

Interestingly (and returning, as promised, to the point of serious mistreatment), the words mentioned in the second male detentus possibility proposed by the Prosecution in Nikolić – "violations (…) of such egregiousness or outrageousness" – are not necessarily restricted to serious mistreatment.

The abuse of process test of the tribunals can be found in the Barayagwiza case and entails that a judge, confronted by certain serious/egregious violations/improprieties/misconduct, may stop the proceedings of the case if he believes that to continue the case in these circumstances would be detrimental to the court's integrity/sense of justice, irrespective of the entity responsible.[123] Thus, the test 'only' requires such serious violations/irregularities that the judge cannot proceed with the case, not necessarily serious mistreatment/torture-like circumstances. One can see in the case law of the international(ised) criminal tribunals that the serious mistreatment element is very often used as the example to illustrate the concept of serious violations, especially, but not necessarily,[124] in the context of actions of third parties. That is unproblematic, as long as one does not forget that the test itself is not a 'serious mistreatment/torture test'. Serious mistreatment/torture is only an example of serious impropriety/misconduct/violations, but these concepts constitute the actual test. Nevertheless, it seems that some, perhaps inspired by the Trial Chamber's words in [122] Cf. again (see also n. 112) the suggestion of this study, made in the Nikolić case, that the Tribunal should refuse jurisdiction if employees of the Tribunal itself intentionally committed serious (procedural) irregularities in the process of bringing a suspect to trial, such as an abduction. (See n. 633 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.) See also n. 50 of the present chapter. As concerns the above-mentioned element of intent: even though the words from the previous two footnotes do not contain this element (see also n. 20) as explicitly as the first male detentus possibility of the Prosecution (see ns. 114 and 116), they can nevertheless be viewed as containing that element implicitly, see the idea that the Prosecution must come to court with clean hands and that jurisdiction may be refused when improper or illegal procedures are employed in pursuing an otherwise lawful process.

[123] See, for example, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, paras. 74: "It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity." See also ibid., para. 77: "[T]he abuse of process doctrine may be relied on in two distinct situations: (1) where delay has made a fair trial for the accused impossible; and (2) where in the circumstances of a particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct." In this context, it is also submitted that the judge should take a liberal stance. Hence, even if he is of the opinion, for example, that private individuals cannot violate human rights (see the Nikolić case), he should ask himself whether what happened to the suspect is nonetheless so serious that jurisdiction must be refused. In that respect, one can agree with the following words from the Appeals Chamber in Karadžić: "[T]he question before the Appeals Chamber is whether, assuming that the Appellant's factual submission are accepted, proceeding with the trial of the Appellant would contravene to the Tribunal's sense of justice or would be detrimental to the Tribunal's integrity, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct amounting to serious and egregious violations of the Appellant's rights [emphasis added, ChP]." (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on Karadžić's Appeal of Trial Chamber's Decision on Alleged Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-AR73.4, 12 October 2009, para. 51.)

[124] See the Kajelijeli case (see n. 111).

Dokmanović,[125] a case issued prior to the Appeals Chamber's decisions in Barayagwiza, have forgotten this,[126] although it can be argued that the Karadžić case has correctly re-clarified the state of the law.[127]

---

[125] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 75: "[T]here was no "cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino" in the arrest of Mr. Dokmanović. The accused was not mistreated in any way on his journey to the Erdut base. There was nothing about the arrest to shock the conscience [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." It is reminded that Toscanino was tortured for almost three weeks.

[126] See, for example, ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 33: "Where the violations in question are not attributable to an international tribunal, this doctrine appears to be confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by the external authorities and has most usually been applied in relation to the process of arrest and transfer [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 21: "It is obvious that in a case of crimes against humanity, the proceedings should be stayed only where the rights of the accused have been seriously affected, at least, for example, to the degree in Toscanino." (As also explained in the previous footnote, it is to be recalled that Toscanino was tortured for nearly three weeks.) The co-investigating judges of the ECCC also used more generally words when they stated that they "are (...) compelled to follow the solution adopted in Nikolic and Lubanga which requires, for the application of the abuse of [process] doctrine, the existence of grave violations of the rights of the Accused" (ibid.), but the words following that quotation again show that the co-investigating judges apparently require serious mistreatment/torture-like circumstances: "Where it has not been established or even alleged that DUCH suffered incidents of torture or serious mistreatment prior to his transfer before the Extraordinary Chambers, the prolonged detention under the jurisdiction of the Military Court, in comparison with the crimes against humanity alleged against the Accused, cannot be considered a sufficiently grave violation of the rights of the Accused." (Ibid.) See also Ryngaert 2008, p. 733: "In cases where the tribunal was not involved in the violations of the defendant's rights, the tribunals have only been willing to find abuse of process – and on that basis stay the proceedings – if the defendant was subjected to torture or serious mistreatment. It was also this rather high standard that was applied by the ECCC co-investigating judges in Duch." See also ibid., p. 735: "Careful analysis of the tribunals' case law (…) demonstrates that all tribunals that have heard abuse of process challenges relating to violations of the rights of the accused in which the tribunal itself played no role (either because it did not commit them, or because it did not act in concert with the responsible state) apply this same strict standard; only torture or serious mistreatment could give rise to a stay of the proceedings." See finally also ibid., p. 736: "Consequently, in spite of appearances, there is in reality no contradiction between the application of the abuse of process doctrine by the international (or internationalized) criminal tribunals; in the absence of concerted action by the tribunals and the entity responsible for the violations (typically the state in whose custody the accused was before being transferred to the tribunal), only torture or serious mistreatment by that entity will lead to a stay of proceedings on the basis of abuse of process. As argued above, this principle deserves support, as, under specific circumstances, the international community's desire to bring perpetrators of heinous crimes to justice may outweigh the accused perpetrator's 'less fundamental' due-process rights."

[127] See, for example, ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on the Accused's Holbrooke Agreement Motion' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 8 July 2009, para. 85: "As for the example of "serious mistreatment" of the accused by a third party, such as torture or cruel and/or degrading treatment, there is no indication that the Accused suffered such serious mistreatment or that there was any other egregious violation of his rights, including his right to political activity. In any event, in the opinion of this Chamber, it could only be in exceptional circumstances that actions of a third party that is completely unconnected to the Tribunal or the proceedings could ever lead to those proceedings being stayed [emphasis added and emphasis (of the word "egregious") in original, ChP]."

Leaving the matter of serious mistreatment for now and returning to that other male detentus possibility of the OTP, the violations of international law which can be attributed to the Prosecution: if the tribunals were indeed to refuse jurisdiction in the case of a 'normal' abduction performed by its own people – and it seems that they would – they would fall below the male detentus test at the inter-State level, which, after all, appears to require not only an abduction, but an abduction either 1) accompanied by serious violations/mistreatment or 2) followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect. This lower threshold is to be applauded.[128]

However, as stated earlier, even if the tribunals adopt this lower threshold and even if the abuse of process doctrine accepted by the tribunals seems broader than that at the inter-State level (which is also generally defined but which seems nevertheless restricted to actions by entities which can be connected to the prosecuting forum), the tribunals are still more readily affiliated with the male captus bene detentus rule because no male captus situation has, ultimately, led to a male detentus result. This may be explained by the following two factors.[129]

See also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadzic, 'Appeal of Decision of Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-05/18-AR73.4, 27 July 2009, para. 104: "The Barayagwiza Appeals Chamber never purported to exclude third-party conduct from scrutiny under the abuse of process doctrine or to limit such scrutiny only to extreme cases of severe physical mistreatment or torture." (One can, however, wonder why Karadžić made this point in his appeal as the Trial Chamber apparently shared his view, see the above-mentioned quotation in this footnote and in particular the words "or that there was any other egregious violation of his rights".) See finally also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on Karadžić's Appeal of Trial Chamber's Decision on Alleged Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-AR73.4, 12 October 2009, para. 47: "[T]he Trial Chamber adopted the common standard established by the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza Decision and in the Nikolić Appeal Decision, and not a higher one, by considering whether the Appellant suffered a serious mistreatment or if there was any other egregious violation of his rights [emphasis added, ChP]." See finally ibid., para. 51: "[T]he question before the Appeals Chamber is whether, assuming that the Appellant's factual submission are accepted, proceeding with the trial of the Appellant would contravene to the Tribunal's sense of justice or would be detrimental to the Tribunal's integrity, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct amounting to serious and egregious violations of the Appellant's rights."

[128] See n. 46.

[129] The following two factors assume the existence of a male captus. However, like courts at the inter-State level, tribunals may also be of the opinion that no male captus occurred in the first place, even if one can doubt whether that is accurate. In that case, the judge does not have to turn to the male captus bene/male detentus discussion because the basic requirement for this discussion (the male captus) is lacking. See, for example, the Dokmanović case and the views of the judges in that case on the method of luring (see also ns. 197, 236, 267 and 327 and accompanying text of Chapter VI). See in that respect also Smeulers 2007, p. 109: "From the Dokmanović case, however, it can be concluded that the Trial Chamber does not easily qualify an arrest as illegal. Dokmanović had been lured into entering UNTAES territory in order to be arrested. Although the prosecutor was closely involved in the arrest, the Trial Chamber concluded that the arrest was not unlawful. This is a decision that can be heavily criticized, because it can be seen as a violation of Article 5 European Convention of Human Rights [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Sluiter 2001, p. 153. Cf. also Cazala 2007, p. 838: "[O]n verra en étudiant les critères de qualification de l'arrestation que le juge a une très nette tendance à reconnaître la régularité de celle-ci dans des circonstances qui sont pourtant parfois très contestables (…). (…) L'étude de la jurisprudence permet de constater que l'adage male captus bene detentus est finalement très peu utilisé, les juges préférant avoir une conception assez étroite de l'arrestation irrégulière." Cf. in that respect also Starr 2008, p. 722: "The traditional remedy for speedy trial violations, endorsed by the

First, as the tribunals do not have their own police force, the male captus will often be performed by third parties. This, of course, diminishes the seriousness of the male captus. If a judge is confronted by a male captus, he must determine, taking every single aspect of the case into account, whether that male captus is so serious that to continue the case would undermine his sense of justice/the integrity of the court/the concept of a fair trial broadly perceived. Now, as already explained in the context of the Karadžić case, it can be argued that the nature of the actor responsible for the male captus is, of course, an important element which should be taken into account here.[130] It can certainly be maintained that the integrity of a tribunal will more easily be affected by a certain violation if that violation could be attributed to the tribunal. The Barayagwiza/Nikolić cases 'only' support the idea that serious violations can lead to the ending of the case, irrespective of the entity responsible,[131] but not that actions by a third party may not be given less weight than Appeals Chamber in Barayagwiza, is release and dismissal of charges. But that remedy, as the Barayagwiza case ultimately illustrated, would be catastrophic for the ICTs. Thus, whenever defendants, after a long delay, have complained of speedy trial violations, the ICTs have construed that right narrowly and avoided granting remedies. It is possible that this narrow reading is simply correct and that the ICTs would have adopted it regardless of the remedial cost. But some contrary evidence is provided by the ICTs' greater willingness to enforce the speedy trial right when they consider its scope before a potential violation, in contemplation of some procedural development that would delay trial [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

---

[130] Cf. also Sluiter 2003 B, pp. 946-947: "Crucial factors, in determining whether or not this remedy [this is the termination of the proceedings, ChP] should be provided for are the following: 1. The degree of attribution of the violation to the Tribunal, in particular the Prosecutor (…); 2. The nature of the violation of individual rights (violation of individual rights of an egregious nature (…) may constitute a legal impediment to exercise of jurisdiction by the Tribunal, regardless of whether or not the Tribunal, in particular the Prosecutor, had anything to do with that violation)."

[131] Arguably, the tribunal should apply a broad concept of abuse of process doctrine here, see also the discussion on this point in the context of the Nikolić case. Cf. also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadzic, 'Appeal of Decision of Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-05/18-AR73.4, 27 July 2009, paras. 109-111: "Within national jurisdictions, it will almost always be a single state authority which creates the criminal law, investigates and arrests individuals for breaches of it, and establishes the courts in which to hear the criminal case. It is also the same state authority which is represented by the prosecution that proceeds with the case. In these circumstances, it will be exceedingly rare for an actor unrelated to the state to be involved in the law enforcement and adjudication. As such, it is perhaps rational for an abuse or process doctrine operating in this context to look primarily or solely to misconduct attributable to the state – reserving only an extraordinary or residual category for abusive misconduct attributable to other unrelated actors. The exact opposite is true of international tribunals. These are highly decentralized institutions. Only the actors which create the criminal law (the UNSC) and which hear and prosecute cases for breaches of its (the Tribunal/OTP) are exclusively related to the central authority (the UN). As the Tribunal itself frequently points out, "the International Tribunal has no enforcement arm of its own – it lacks a police force." As such, it is entirely dependent on a diverse range of actors to fill this critical role. A whole host of states, inter-state organizations and international agencies – as well as diplomats, special envoys, local authorities, and military personnel, – routinely fill the key roles of investigating crimes, sharing intelligence, and arresting and transferring suspects. This involvement may be formal or informal, and it may occur with or even without the Tribunal's knowledge. Where so many diverse actors may be involved in creating, enforcing and adjudicating international criminal law – sometimes even without one another's knowledge or consent – it is essential that the doctrine of abuse of process in this setting not be applied in a restrictive or technical manner. (…) A Court operating in these circumstances must have the actions by parties which can be connected to the prosecuting forum if the judge has to determine whether a certain violation is so serious that it must lead to the ending of the case.

The second factor which may explain why the tribunals are still more readily affiliated with the male captus bene detentus rule is that the judges, even if they establish that a serious male captus has occurred, also look at the other side of the coin, namely the fact that the suspect is charged with serious crimes and that the international community demands that such a suspect should, if possible, be prosecuted. Hence, the judges basically have to determine, taking every aspect of their case into account, what is more serious: the male captus or that this person is prosecuted. Although the definition of the abuse of process doctrine from paragraph 74 of the first Barayagwiza decision[132] does not explicitly mention the possibility of taking this element into account, the fact that the doctrine is discretionary would indeed seem to provide room for judges, both at the national and at the international level, to take into account every single aspect of the case, including the importance of continuing the case where the suspect is charged with very serious crimes, in determining whether or not to resort to the extreme remedy of the refusal of jurisdiction. One could hereby refer to the definition of the doctrine as quoted in paragraph 77 of the same decision[133] or to the well-known definition from the Bennett case[134] (to which the Barayagwiza decision also alluded).[135] These last-mentioned definitions more clearly show that within the context of the – for this book – most interesting abuse of process situation, that which focuses not on the fairness of the trial itself but on the broad concept of a fair trial/the integrity of the proceedings (see also Subsection 4.3 of Chapter III), a judge may be of the opinion that a serious violation has occurred but that, taking into account the particulars of the case (which could include the seriousness of the alleged crimes and the importance of prosecution), one cannot say that to continue with the case, notwithstanding this violation, would contravene the court's sense of justice.

---

discretionary authority to look at all the events that have led to the proceedings and decide, regardless of whom they are attributable, whether on the whole they breach the Accused's rights or contravene the Court's sense of justice [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[132] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74: "It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity."

[133] See ibid., para. 77: "[T]he abuse of process doctrine may be relied on in two distinct situations: (1) where delay has made a fair trial for the accused impossible; and (2) where in the circumstances of a particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct [emphasis added, ChP]."

[134] See House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161: "[A] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case [emphasis added, ChP]."

[135] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 75.

Alongside these definitions stemming from the Barayagwiza case, one may also point to the fact that the judges in this case took into account more explicitly the seriousness of Barayagwiza's alleged crimes in determining whether or not the case had to be stopped (although many will argue that they did not attribute enough weight to this element):

> The crimes for which the Appellant is charged are very serious. However, in this case the fundamental rights of the Appellant were repeatedly violated. What may be worse, it appears that the Prosecutor's failure to prosecute this case was tantamount to negligence. We find this conduct to be egregious and, in light of the numerous violations, conclude that the only remedy available for such prosecutorial inaction and the resultant denial of his rights is to release the Appellant and dismiss the charges against him.[136]

Thus, the judges seem to have relative freedom in invoking the doctrine, meaning that they will only refuse jurisdiction under the abuse of process doctrine if, taking all the different elements of the case into account, they deem that to proceed with the case would be detrimental to the court's sense of justice/integrity. The word "relative" has been chosen here because one can understand that there might be such serious circumstances – one could think here of an abduction orchestrated by the Prosecution during which the suspect is seriously mistreated – that the judges would have no option but to refuse jurisdiction if they still want to be taken seriously as custodians of the law, even in the case of a suspect charged with serious crimes.[137] In addition, it should also be pointed out that even though the first situation of the abuse of process doctrine (the one looking at the fairness of the trial itself and which is not the focus of this study, see again Subsection 4.3 of Chapter III) is part of a discretionary doctrine, one can argue that the discretion in this situation is also relative: if it is clear that the suspect can no longer receive a fair trial (in the strict sense of the word) (the minimum requirement of any trial), one can assume/hope that judges will refuse jurisdiction, whether or not that suspect is charged with serious crimes.[138]

---

[136] Ibid., para. 106. See for the element 'seriousness of the charges' also Judge Shahabuddeen's 'Separate Opinion' to the decision of 3 November 1999, under '1. Post-transfer delay': "Matters to be taken into account in evaluating whether that consequence [namely lack of jurisdiction, ChP] follows from a breach of the requirement of promptitude include the seriousness of the offences with which the accused is charged. Here the offences were serious. But the requirement of promptitude was fundamental, and its breach was also grave, the delay extending to a little over three months. On balance, I respectfully agree with the Appeals Chamber that the administration of justice by the Tribunal would suffer from proceeding with the case notwithstanding the delay."

[137] In that respect, one cannot agree with the so-called Eichmann exception, which concept supports the idea that the trial of a suspect charged with very serious crimes should be decoupled from its pre-trial phase, see Higgins 1994, pp. 72-73 and Michell 1996, pp. 423-424. However, this concept is not followed by the tribunals (and rightly so) as very serious cases may, at least in theory, still lead to the ending of the case.

[138] Cf. also the discussion on this point in the context of the Levinge case, see the text following n. 159 and accompanying text of Chapter V.

The element of 'seriousness of the alleged crimes' can also be found in the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić. Although its methodology in distilling this principle from the inter-State context was arguably not without its flaws, it must not be forgotten that the Appeals Chamber, "[d]rawing on these indications from national practice",[139] also added some observations of its own on this matter and that such observations are not without authority. It stated that there is a legitimate expectation that persons accused of 'Universally Condemned Offences' are quickly brought to justice[140] and that this expectation "needs to be weighed against the principle of State sovereignty and the fundamental rights of the accused".[141] This view has been affirmed by different chambers and tribunals,[142] as a result of which one can safely assert that the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes is definitely an element which the international(ised) criminal tribunals take into account in determining whether or not a certain male captus should lead to a male detentus.

Again adding a normative note to this principle from the context of the international(ised) criminal tribunals: one can argue that, to a certain extent (see infra), it may indeed be appropriate for courts, both at the national and at the international level, to take into account the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes when determining the consequences of a certain male captus. As long as there is no clear (inter)national law rule obliging judges to refuse jurisdiction in a certain male captus case[143] and judges consequently have discretion, for example, under the abuse of process doctrine, to decide whether or not the exercise of jurisdiction should be refused, it seems very reasonable for them to take every aspect of the case into account here. And one of those aspects may be that the suspect is charged with international crimes, crimes of which the international community demands that they be prosecuted. Hence, there is nothing strange about the fact that a judge, under the abuse of process doctrine and confronted by a certain male captus, is of the opinion that, taking every aspect of the case into account (including

[139] ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 24.
[140] See ibid., para. 25.
[141] Ibid., para. 26.
[142] See, for example, SCSL, Trial Chamber, Prosecutor Against Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara and Santigie Borbor Kanu, 'Written Reasons for the Trial Chamber's Oral Decision on the Defence Motion on Abuse of Process Due to Infringement of Principles of Nullum Crimen Sine Lege and Non-Retroactivity as to Several Counts', Case No. SCSL-04-16-PT, 31 March 2004, para. 25, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 206, ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 21, ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Decision on Preliminary Motions on the Indictment Pursuant to Rule 72 of the Rules' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 14 December 2007, paras. 19 and 25, ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 31 and ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on Karadžić's Appeal of Trial Chamber's Decision on Alleged Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-AR73.4, 12 October 2009, para. 49. Note that this point could also (but more indirectly) be found in earlier cases, see, for example, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 126.
[143] See n. 103.

the importance of prosecution), it would not contravene the court's sense of justice to continue with the case, notwithstanding the male captus. It is certainly reasonable that, because of the seriousness of the alleged crimes involved, a court should do everything within the limits of the law to prevent the termination of the proceedings. However, what is not justified – and what the Appeals Chamber in Nikolić should have disapproved of more clearly – is that the seriousness of the alleged crimes may be used as an excuse to commit irregularities in the process of bringing suspects of such crimes to justice;[144] it must be stressed that the view that one may take the seriousness of the crimes into account to a certain extent in deciding what the consequences of a certain male captus will be cannot in any way be seen as a green light for using male captus techniques in the context of international crimes.[145] On the contrary: as already submitted, if the tribunal discovers that its own employees have orchestrated an abduction, it should resolutely refuse jurisdiction, even if the suspect is charged with very serious crimes. That would arguably be the only avenue to avoid further damage to the integrity of the proceedings.[146] However, if less serious wrongs (by others?) have been committed in the pre-trial phase, it would

[144] See also Sloan 2006, p. 334: "The Appeal Chamber's focus on the serious nature of the crimes and the indignation of the international community, and its willingness to balance it against violations of human right or sovereignty (and, in the case of sovereignty, to find a good basis for not setting aside jurisdiction in the 'universally condemned' nature of the alleged offences) leaves the impression that the graver the alleged crime, the less troubled an international judicial body should be by the violation."

[145] See also Swart 2001, p. 201: "Persons suspected or accused of international crimes should be no less entitled to respect for their basic individual rights than any other suspects or accused." In that respect, this study cannot disagree more with views such as the one expressed by Mohit (2006, p. 144) who writes on the inter-State context: "It would be absurd to hold that terrorists and serious human rights violators should not be brought to trial by irregular means, for example, by abduction. The interests of society require that such offenders be brought to trial." (Mohit (ibid.) stresses that "[t]hese methods should (…) be utilized by states only once they have exhausted all possible routes to secure the fugitive's return by normal processes", but even then, prosecuting authorities should not debase themselves by resorting to illegal means of obtaining custody over a suspect.) Cf. also De Sanctis 2004, p. 548: "By reason of their strict subject matter jurisdiction and their logistic limits, international tribunals are designed to prosecute a limited number of individuals, thus restricting the cases in which it might be held appropriate to have recourse to transnational abduction." (De Sanctis is of the opinion that transnational abductions may be justified in the context of the tribunals, but not in the inter-State context, because this would encourage "transnational seizure of a potentially too broad category of persons." (Ibid.) In his explanation (ibid.): "This is because this category [namely the category of suspects of 'Universally Condemned Offences', ChP] could be construed by domestic courts as including those suspected of acts of terrorism or even mere membership in a terrorist organisation. The legal definition of 'terrorist act' by national legislations is far more open to political considerations and influences than the notions of 'crimes against humanity' or 'war crimes'. As a result it may often be the product of the political agenda of a government, rather than of a genuine commitment to the preservation of human security. In this context a justification of transnational abduction in violation of State sovereignty on the ground of the universal nature of the crime prosecuted, looses much of its soundness and should, therefore, be rejected.")

[146] See also Starr 2008, p. 759: "[I]n a case of egregious abuse of process, an ICT could determine that even after taking into account all the countervailing interests, the windfall remedy of release with prejudice is necessary to send the message to the prosecution that such conduct will not be tolerated."

only seem natural for judges to opt for less far-reaching remedies which do not jeopardise the trial.[147]

Although this position is arguably not particularly controversial – if judges have certain discretion in deciding what the consequences of a certain male captus will be, it seems natural that they should have the (relative) freedom to opt for those remedies which do not jeopardise the trial of a suspect charged with very serious crimes – one may wonder how one should then deal with the human right to habeas corpus, the right of a suspect to challenge the lawfulness of his detention and to be released in the case of an unlawful (arrest and) detention. A right which, given its customary international law/general international law status, is, in principle, also applicable to the context of the tribunals, even if their regulatory instruments do not contain such a provision.[148] A right also which has also – surprisingly – not been invoked that often in the context of the tribunals.[149]

---

[147] See also Lamb 2000, pp. 241 and 243: "[W]ithdrawal of the indictment altogether and the release of the accused would be required only in extreme cases, where any continuation of the trial proceedings would in all the circumstances be fundamentally incompatible with the right to a fair trial and the integrity of the judicial process. (…) [I]n most cases, the extreme remedy of release of a person indicted for the commission of serious violations of international humanitarian law will not be seen to comport with justice. Nevertheless, the release of the accused must, in extremis, remain as the ultimate remedy on the grounds that it constitutes the strongest deterrent and sanction against the abuse of power by law enforcement personnel and serves as a remedy of last resort in those truly exceptional circumstances where the divestiture of its jurisdiction is thought by the Tribunal to be necessary to safeguard the integrity of the conduct of international criminal justice [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Starr 2008, p. 747: "The most obvious and drastic remedy – release and dismissal of charges with prejudice – will never be a tenable remedy for procedural violations in international criminal trials, except perhaps in truly extraordinary cases. The charges are simply too serious." See finally Sluiter 2003 B, p. 946 (writing on the termination of the proceedings): "It seems now accepted that this remedy is not excluded, but still should not be taken lightly taking account of the nature of the accusations we are dealing with here."

[148] Sluiter (2001, p. 152) notes that, because of the fact that the ICTY Statute and RPE "do not incorporate the right of persons not to be subjected to arbitrary arrest and detention", it is "of vital importance that the Tribunal applies these provisions [namely Artt. 9 of the ICCPR and 5 of the ECHR, ChP] to their full extent, including relevant case law pertaining to these provisions [emphasis added, ChP]." Hence, that should also include the habeas corpus provision of para. 4, including its remedy of release. Cf. in that respect also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Zejnil Delalić, Zdravko Mucić also known as "Pavo", Hazim Delić and Esad Landžo, 'Decision on Application for Leave to Appeal (Provisional Release) by Hazim Delić', Case No. IT-96-21-AR72.4, 22 November 1996, para. 16: "The right to liberty is without question a fundamental human right. The Applicant has cited a number of international human rights instruments in this connection, but the proposition is axiomatic. The right also entails the right to an effective remedy for deprivation or violation of that right." See also ibid., para. 17 where it is clarified that this means that the Chamber must review the lawfulness of a person's deprivation of liberty. Although it is not clearly stated as such, this must arguably also include a release if the deprivation of liberty is deemed unlawful. However, that was not the case here: "The mistake which the Applicant makes, however, is to consider that the Trial Chamber, by denying the motion for provisional release, has violated the Applicant's right to liberty and that the Applicant is therefore entitled to an effective judicial remedy for that violation. The correct analysis is that the Trial Chamber is the effective judicial remedy for any alleged violation of the right to liberty. By applying to the Trial Chamber, the Applicant exercises his right to challenge the lawfulness of his detention and deprivation of liberty. The word "effective" does not mean that the Application has to succeed; this would be a nonsense. It is enough that the competent judicial authority reviews the position in accordance with the

This question is very interesting here as the remedy of release, in contrast to the remedy 'refusal of jurisdiction' under the abuse of process doctrine, is not discretionary: if a judge is of the opinion that a suspect's detention (read: deprivation of liberty) is unlawful, he must, strictly speaking, release that person. In addition, this remedy must be granted to any suspect whose detention is considered unlawful; it cannot be restricted to suspects who are only charged with minor crimes.[150] In other words, any suspect, whether charged with fraud or genocide, appropriate norms and human rights standards, which the Trial Chamber has done quite properly [emphasis in original, ChP]." See also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 88: "Although neither the Statute nor the Rules specifically address writs of habeas corpus as such, the notion that a detained individual shall have recourse to an independent judicial officer for review of the detaining authority's acts is well-established by the Statute and Rules. Moreover, this is a fundamental right and is enshrined in international human rights norms, including Article 8 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Article 9(4) of the ICCPR, Article 5(4) of the ECHR and Article 7(6) of the ACHR [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See further also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v Radoslav Brđanin, 'Decision on Petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus On Behalf of Radoslav Brđanin', Case No. IT-99-36-PT, 8 December 1999, paras. 2-6, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Joseph Kanyabashi, 'Decision on the Defence Extremely Urgent Motion on Habeas Corpus and for Stoppage of Proceedings', Case No. ICTR-96-15-I, 23 May 2000, paras. 27-28, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, paras. 112-113, ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Slobodan Milošević, 'Decision on Preliminary Motions', Case No. IT-99-37-PT, 8 November 2001, para. 38 and ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Samuel Musabyimana, 'Decision on Musabyimana's Motion on the Violation of Rule 55 and International Law at the Time of his Arrest and Transfer', Case No. ICTR-2001-62-T, 20 June 2002, para. 24. See also Zappalà 2002 A, p. 1195 (and Zappalà 2003, p. 75), Knoops 2003, p. 221, ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simić, Milan Simić, Miroslav Tadić, Stevan Todorović and Simo Zarić, 'Separate Opinion of Judge Robinson', Case No. IT-95-9-PT, 18 October 2000, paras. 2-4 and 7, ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Notice of Appeal', Case No. IT-94-2-AR72, 9 January 2003, Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, para. 11 and SCSL, Trial Chamber, The Prosecutor against Tamba Alex Brima, 'Ruling on the Application for the Issue of a Writ of Habeas Corpus Filed by the Applicant', Case No. SCSL-03-06-PT, 22 July 2003, pp. 7 and 9. Note that in the Kanyabashi case, the judges, after having referred to the rather broad scope of some national habeas corpus concepts (they provide, for instance, the example of the US writ of habeas corpus ad subiiciendum (see also n. 42 of Chapter II) which "extends to all constitutional challenges" (ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Joseph Kanyabashi, 'Decision on the Defence Extremely Urgent Motion on Habeas Corpus and for Stoppage of Proceedings', Case No. ICTR-96-15-I, 23 May 2000, para. 24)), stipulate that "[t]he Chamber restates that the Tribunal is not bound by any national law. It finds the notion of habeas corpus at the international level is limited to a review of the legality of detention. The Accused's Motion, apart from the submission of violation of the right to protection from unlawful detention, is beyond that scope and, therefore, is not proper." (Ibid., para. 28.) Although the judges do not mention this point very clearly, it can be argued that the concept of the right to protection from unlawful detention used by the judges must, of course, also encompasses the consequence of release if the detention (and arguably also the arrest) is to be considered unlawful, in conformity with what appears to be the scope of the habeas corpus concept at the international level, see, for example, Art. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR, Art. 5, para. 4 of the ECHR and Art. 7, para. 6 of the ACHR.

---

[149] See, however, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus J[u]v[é]nal Kajelijeli, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Arbitrary Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused and on the Defence Notice of Urgent Motion to Expand and Supplement the Record of 8 December 1999 Hearing', Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, 8 May 2000, para. 11.

[150] Cf. also Knoops 2005, p. 36, noting that "there does seem to be a disjuncture between the approach under international criminal law [Knoops writes here on male captus cases in the context of the must, strictly speaking, be released if the judge is of the opinion that his detention is unlawful.[151]

However, as explained in Chapter III and in the examination of Chapter VI cases such as Dokmanović and Nikolić, this remedy is not without its problems: if a person has been the victim of an unlawful arrest/detention, he must, strictly speaking, be released. However, as was clarified, that does not prevent him being re-arrested on the spot and re-brought to trial. Although a person released by the ICTY/ICTR (in the Netherlands/Tanzania) cannot be re-arrested for 15 days, one can imagine that the ICTY/ICTR would then demand from all UN Member States (which must cooperate with these Tribunals) to immediately transfer the suspect back to the ICTY/ICTR the moment he sets foot on their soil. Thus, one can assume that there is a considerable chance that, after those two weeks, the person is immediately re-arrested and brought to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal in question. In such a case, the prosecuting authorities could assert that this 'remedy' (the 'release') has repaired the initial iniuria of the irregularity and that the trial can continue as normal. However, in that case, the suspect would only be granted a pro forma remedy, comparable with that at the national level (but then only extended over a longer period), which does not comport with the idea that a remedy must be real and effective. In addition, the pro forma release does not take account of the exact seriousness of the irregularity. In other words: it is not only a pro forma remedy but also an over-simplified remedy.

Thus, it was suggested that this specific remedy should be avoided and that a judge should instead simply accord the most appropriate remedy, taking every single aspect of the case into account, not only, among other things, the seriousness of the irregularity, but also the seriousness of the alleged crimes and hence the importance of the continuation of the trial. If one follows that route, then one can still satisfy the common sense idea behind the immediate re-arrest mentioned above, namely that cases involving suspects of serious crimes must be continued if possible – although it should neither be forgotten that a truly serious male captus situation can lead to one remedy only, namely the ending of the case before that particular court, that is, a 'real' release (without the possibility of re-arrest) – but one will also avoid the strange pro forma release and immediate re-arrest and replace it with real remedies, ICTY/ICTR, ChP], and that under human rights law, which does not render such a distinction between the nature of the alleged crimes in order to determine the enforceable rights of the accused."

---

[151] In the Semanza case, the judges' final conclusion was that Semanza's right to be informed promptly of the nature of the charges against him and his right to challenge the lawfulness of his detention were violated. However, they also stated that "the remedy sought by the Appellant, namely his release, is disproportionate, in the instant case." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 129.) However, although the remedy of (final) release may indeed not be a proportionate remedy in this case, the judges did not explain how their conclusion can be reconciled with the strict application of the law mentioned in the main text, which stipulates that such violations lead to an unlawful detention (see also Swart 2001, p. 204 who explains that "a failure to promptly inform the person of the reasons for his arrest and of any charges against him makes his detention illegal"), which in turn, according to para. 4 of Artt. 9 of the ICCPR or 5 of the ECHR, demands the remedy of release. See also the Duch case before the ECCC (see the text following n. 1281 and accompanying text of Chapter VI).

such as a reduction of the sentence (in the case of a conviction) or compensation (in the case of an acquittal).[152] The judge can then take the exact seriousness of the irregularity into account in determining how much the sentence should be reduced or how much compensation one should accord the suspect. For example, one could hereby look at the (perceived)[153] involvement of the tribunal in the male captus situation (one could also think here of the question of whether private individuals were involved in the violation, see Chapter III), the seriousness of the unlawful arrest/detention/deprivation of liberty and the mistreatment suffered by the suspect in the operation.

Such a solution would arguably be fairer to the suspect and better capable of putting flexibility into the system,[154] which sometimes focuses only on the extreme outcomes bene/male detentus/(no) refusal of jurisdiction.[155]

---

[152] See also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 75 (see n. 922 and accompanying text of Chapter VI), ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, under 'Disposition', para. 6 (see n. 1004 and accompanying text of Chapter VI), ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, paras. 255 and 324 (see ns. 1082-1083 and accompanying text of Chapter VI), ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 20 September 2006, para. 218 (see n. 1124 and accompanying text of Chapter VI) and ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007, para. 63 (see n. 1154 and accompanying text of Chapter VI). Note that in the case of Rwamakuba, the judges issued an order for compensation as the suspect had already been acquitted. See also ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 21 (see n. 1233 and accompanying text of Chapter VI), ECCC, Pre-Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Appeal Against Provisional Detention Order of Kaing Guek Eav Alias "Duch"', Criminal Case File No. 001/18-07-2007-ECCC-OCIJ (PTC01), 3 December 2007, para. 25 (see n. 1248 and accompanying text of Chapter VI) and ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, paras. 35-37 (see ns. 1280 and 1282 and accompanying text of Chapter VI). (See, however, for criticism on some parts of the ECCC Trial Chamber's decision ns. 1283-1284 and accompanying text of Chapter VI). As explained in Chapter VI (see n. 246), this construction may be very appropriate, but one must not forget either that provisions like para. 5 of Art. 9 of the ICCPR and Art. 5 of the ECHR state that compensation should not only be awarded in the case of an acquittal. Compensation is, in principle, available to any person whose detention was considered unlawful, whether that person was later acquitted or not. See also Sluiter 2001, pp. 153-154: "[I]t is suggested that creative use be made of (a combination of) other available remedies, such as the reduction of the sentence in case of conviction – and financial compensation, rather than termination of the proceedings and the release of the accused [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[153] Even though an international force working for the tribunal cannot be seen as an organ of the tribunal, one can imagine that the remedy for an abduction committed by such an international force will be greater than in the case of an abduction committee by private individuals having no connection with the tribunal whatsoever, see also n. 93. See also n. 154 of Chapter V.

[154] Cf. the words of Sluiter in n. 152.

[155] See, for example, the Trial Chamber's decision in Nikolić (see n. 548 and accompanying text of Chapter VI), the Appeals Chamber's decision in the same case (see the text following n. 557 and accompanying text of the same chapter) and the Tolimir case, see n. 700 and accompanying text of the same Chapter VI. Nevertheless, as explained, there are also tribunal cases where this focus is less pertinent, see the authorities mentioned in n. 152.

Furthermore, this solution also avoids the (justified) criticism one may expect from various actors if a suspect of serious crimes is released for an irregularity which is not so serious as to lead to the ending of the case (in such serious cases, the public must understand that the court has no option but to refuse jurisdiction and to release (but now in a 'real' way) the suspect), but which nevertheless ensures that the detention must be qualified as unlawful and that, strictly speaking, the suspect must be released, for example, if a suspect's right to be informed promptly of the nature of the charges against him has been violated. In fact, whereas at the national level, one can expect that a suspect of serious crimes would be immediately re-arrested, the context of the ICTY/ICTR may engender more problems because of the above-mentioned two-week immunity period. As already stated, all UN Member States (which must cooperate with the ICTY and ICTR) will probably do everything in their power to ensure that a suspect of serious international crimes is immediately re-arrested and brought to the jurisdiction of the Tribunals, but one cannot exclude the possibility of the suspect fleeing to a non-UN Member State (which, in principle, has no obligation to cooperate with the Tribunals) or to a State which, even though it has an obligation to cooperate, will not do so. This problem will even be greater in the context of the internationalised criminal tribunals because in that context, third States are normally not obliged to cooperate with these institutions. That could mean that a suspect of international crimes, fleeing to such a State, could effectively evade prosecution because of an irregularity which will, strictly speaking, demand the release of the suspect, but which is not considered to be so serious that jurisdiction must be refused. That is to be avoided. Although the law should obviously be obeyed, one must also be careful not to apply the law in such a strict way that it leads to great injustice: summum ius, summa iniuria. This constitutes another reason to continue to exercise jurisdiction in these kinds of (less serious) male captus cases and to grant other remedies which do not jeopardise the trial itself.

One may argue that the practical results of this construction would be the same as the remedies which are already granted in case law. That is indeed true: many cases will not lead to a refusal of jurisdiction, but to other less far-reaching remedies. However, it is submitted that the accuracy of the reasoning leading to these remedies is not unimportant either. And that accuracy in the case law can arguably be improved, see also footnote 151; judges simply grant appropriate remedies. They do not explain, for example, why they do not declare a situation of 'unlawful detention' and invoke its subsequent remedy of release when they conclude that a suspect's right to be informed promptly of the nature of the charges against him has been violated. Because of that, neither do they have to explain what kinds of problems come with a strict application of this remedy of release and how they would solve them. Perhaps, the above-mentioned construction may be helpful in that respect.

Critics may state that taking into account the seriousness of the alleged crimes of the suspect (and hence the importance of prosecution) within the examination of what the consequences of certain irregularities must be is not in conformity with the presumption of innocence, as the quality of the suspect (who is, of course, innocent until proven guilty) plays a role in the judge's balancing exercise.

And indeed, it cannot be denied that there is some tension here. For example, under the abuse of process doctrine, a suspect of less serious crimes may be better off than a suspect of serious crimes. Recall (see the text following footnote 1269 and accompanying text of the previous chapter) the situation in which a suspect of minor domestic crimes becomes the victim of a kidnapping by private individuals in which the authorities of the now prosecuting forum were not involved and during which he was not mistreated before being brought to the national judge. In such a situation, it would not be surprising if the national judge were to refuse to exercise jurisdiction and to release the suspect because of, on the one hand, the rather serious male captus and, on the other, the minor importance of having this person prosecuted. However, if the person is charged with genocide, one can imagine that the judge (whether it be a judge at the national or at the tribunal level) would continue the case and grant the person other remedies instead. Although the seriousness of the male captus is the same in both cases, the importance of having this person prosecuted will probably tip the balance, ensuring that the trial will continue and that the suspect will receive other less far-reaching remedies for the wrongs he suffered.

However, as explained earlier, because of the discretionary nature of the abuse of process doctrine, the judge is able to take every single aspect of the case into account in determining whether it would contravene the court's integrity/sense of justice to continue the case, notwithstanding the irregularities. And one of these aspects is that the person standing before him is charged with very serious crimes of which the international community demands that they be prosecuted. There is no reason why this important element should not be taken into account here. In fact, the judge may be of the opinion that it would contravene the court's sense of justice and other goals of its institution, such as, in the case of the ICTY, contributing to the restoration and maintenance of peace,[156] if he were not to take the importance of prosecution into account.[157]

---

[156] See UNSC Res. 827 of 25 May 1993: "The Security Council, (…) Convinced that in the particular circumstances of the former Yugoslavia the establishment as an ad hoc measure by the Council of an international tribunal and the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law (…) would contribute to the restoration and maintenance of peace [emphasis in original, ChP]".

[157] Cf. also Ryngaert 2008, p. 731, who notes with respect to the Duch case: "[S]erious concerns may be raised over the use of the gravity of the crime as a free-standing criterion (...) in terms of the presumption of innocence. While Duch may be accused of grave and heinous crimes, he should remain innocent until a trial judge has determined his guilt – even if he is ready to confess and reveal the crimes committed by the Khmer Rouge. It would therefore appear unfair to rely on a presumption of his having committed grave crimes, a presumption that may tip the balance in favour of not staying the proceedings. Irrespective of the gravity of his crime(s), should not every suspect be entitled to the same due-process protection?" However, in the end, Ryngaert concurs with the vision of this study, see ibid., p. 732 (writing on the abuse of process doctrine): "Because the tribunal's decision is a discretionary one, it may rely on any criteria it deems fit in order to assess whether application of the abuse of process doctrine to the case would be warranted. There is no reason why gravity of the crime could not be one of them."

However, this stance may be more complicated with respect to the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention as that remedy is not discretionary; it applies to any suspect unlawfully detained. For example, in his commentary on the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić, Sloan notes:

> The Appeal Chamber's focus on the serious nature of the crimes and the indignation of the international community, and its willingness to balance it against violations of human rights or sovereignty (and, in the case of sovereignty, to find a good basis for not setting aside jurisdiction in the 'universally condemned' nature of the alleged offences) leaves the impression that the graver the alleged crime, the less troubled an international judicial body should be by the violation. On the question of human rights, at least, such an approach must surely be misguided: it does not appear to comport with the presumption of innocence. Indeed, if our human rights are to be meaningful, the opposite approach would appear fitting. That is to say, when an accused is charged with a very serious crime – one of the type that is likely to engender severe public outrage, or in the words of the Appeals Chamber one that triggers the 'legitimate expectation' of 'the international community' – a judicial body must be most scrupulous in ensuring that the accused's human rights are observed. For a court to provide no remedy for a human rights violation where the accused is charged with a traffic offence and subject to a fine would be regrettable; to provide no remedy where the accused is charged with mass murder or war crimes and subject to life imprisonment would be unconscionable [emphasis in original, ChP].[158]

Many of these words are to be welcomed; as stated earlier, it can indeed not be the case that "the graver the alleged crime, the less troubled an international judicial body should be by the violation". Furthermore, it is also not hard to agree with the idea that "a judicial body must be most scrupulous in ensuring that the accused's human rights are observed" and that remedies are provided if violations occur.

However, it is again (see also the text following footnote 660 and accompanying text of the previous chapter) submitted that neither should the – indeed very important – presumption of innocence be used in such a way as to lead to absurd results. One must not forget that the tribunals are prosecuting not just any suspects, but suspects charged with the most serious crimes known to the international community as a whole. For example, a judge at the ICTY cannot issue an arrest warrant unless he has confirmed the indictment of the Prosecution, an indictment which can only be prepared if the Prosecutor is of the opinion that a prima facie case exists. Although this fact does not, of course, mean that the person is guilty of the international crime – that would constitute a clear violation of the presumption of innocence – there is no reason why one should not take into account the fact that one is not dealing with a normal suspect here, but with a suspect against whom the independent Prosecutor and an impartial judge are of the opinion that a prima facie case exists and hence that there are reasons to assume that the person may be involved in extremely serious crimes of which the international community demands that they be prosecuted. This is not nothing. This is an important element which should be taken into account when determining the consequences of an unlawful arrest/detention. It is submitted that negating this important element and strictly applying the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, a remedy which was already criticised for the fact that it can be used in a mere pro forma way and for the fact that it totally disregards the specifics of the exact male captus, can possibly lead to absurd results which no longer have anything to do with the concept of justice. For example, if a suspect of the ICTY/ICTR is not promptly informed of the reasons for his arrest, this would, strictly speaking, mean that his detention is unlawful and that he should be released. However, if the suspect is released, the Netherlands/Tanzania would not be able to re-arrest the suspect for 15 days. In that time, he could flee to a non-UN Member State (which, in principle, does not have an obligation to cooperate with the Tribunals) or to a State which, even though it has an obligation to cooperate with them, will not do so. That could mean that a suspect of international crimes, fleeing to such a State, could effectively evade prosecution because of an irregularity which is not considered so serious that jurisdiction must be refused but which, strictly speaking, would demand the release of the suspect. That is to be avoided. As stated supra, although the law should obviously be obeyed, one must also be careful not to apply the law in so strict a way that it leads to great injustice: summum ius, summa iniuria.

[158] Sloan 2006, p. 334. Cf. also the report Extradition. European standards. Explanatory notes on the Council of Europe convention and protocols and the minimum standards protecting persons subject to transnational criminal proceedings, Council of Europe, December 2006, p. 140: "Issues of unlawful arrest and transfer to an international tribunal have been raised in the cases of Todorovic, Nikolic and Krajisnik [see for this latter case n. 659 of Chapter VI, ChP] before the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). The tribunal found itself with a fundamental dilemma; namely, whether to encourage the apprehension of suspects and the bringing to justice of individuals who had engaged in serious crimes, on the one hand; or the safeguard of international legality and fundamental human rights, on the other. It seems that administration of justice considerations have prevailed in the reasoning of the ICTY, which, as mentioned above, poses certain questions concerning the presumption of innocence; an obligation found in Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

In short, the human rights of all suspects must be respected. The fact that one is dealing with suspects of international crimes cannot in any way be used as an excuse to, in the words of Sluiter, "take a more 'flexible' stance towards – read: violate"[159] human rights or to argue that no violation occurred in the first place where such a violation was clearly present.[160] Furthermore, when violations occur, appropriate

[159] Sluiter 2007, p. 15 (own translation, ChP).

[160] Cf. Van der Kruijs (in his practical book on pre-trial detention in the Netherlands), who explains that detention is not often labelled as unlawful in the first place: "The investigating/examining judge (rechter-commissaris) does not often feel inclined to qualify the detention as unlawful. Many irregularities are deemed to be too minor to meet that qualification. The criterion appears to be that one must have acted flagrantly in violation of (the meaning of) the law. (...) In addition, there is the impression that the seriousness of the suspect's alleged conduct plays a role in the sense that the more serious the fact, the more problems are ironed out by the investigating/examining judge (rechter-commissaris) [own translation, ChP]." (Van der Kruijs 2004, p. 8.) This attitude, which was already mentioned in Chapter III (see n. 224 and accompanying text of that chapter) and which can also be found in Mohit 2006, p. 144 ("The moment the individual's violations far outweigh the violation of the abduction, that abduction should be permissible and should not be considered a violation of human rights."), is clearly to be criticised; an irregularity does not become less irregular because one is coping remedies must be granted. However, in granting these remedies, one must be careful that one does not potentially pave the way for absurd consequences which are counter to the concept of justice, for example, through a strict application of the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention. In such a case, it would arguably be better to keep a suspect of international crimes in custody and to grant appropriate and real remedies instead,[161] taking into account the seriousness of the male captus.[162]

One could argue that this reasoning is valid a fortiori with respect to persons who have already been convicted, cf. the inter-State case Mullen. Even though the person's ultimate guilt may not yet be legally established (for the person may, of course, appeal and may, perhaps, then be acquitted), his first conviction is with a suspect of serious crimes. However, the fact that one is dealing with such a suspect should, if possible, lead to remedies which do not jeopardise the trial because prosecution of these suspects is also of paramount importance. Arguably more correct in that sense is the reasoning of Baaijens-van Geloven. She explains, after having referred to the reasoning of the Dutch Supreme Court in its judgment of 25 June 2002 (HR 25 juni 2002, NJ 2002, 625) that one can take into account the seriousness of the offence (this case did not deal with an international male captus situation and has therefore not been included in Part 3 of this book), that there are no objections of principle to this extension of the law by the Supreme Court (in the applicable provision of the Dutch Code of Criminal Procedure on the legal consequences of non-compliance with formal requirements (Art. 359a), one will not find this factor), as long as the seriousness of the offence is regarded as a weighting factor which only plays a role in determining the legal consequence (sanction) after the illegality has been identified. She continues stating that there has to be room for a balancing exercise and that all kinds of factors, including the seriousness of the offence, should be able to play a role here. Nevertheless, the seriousness of the offence cannot constitute a factor which determines the initial unlawfulness. (An exception, however, is the situation in which the principles of proportionality and subsidiarity play a direct role in determining the lawfulness of an exercise of power. In such a case, the seriousness of the charges can also be of importance in determining whether the investigative acts were lawful or not. (See Baaijens-van Geloven 2004, pp. 358-359. See also n. 617 of Chapter III.)

---

[161] Cf. Rule 5 (C) of the ICTY RPE: "The relief granted by a Trial Chamber under this Rule shall be such remedy as the Trial Chamber considers appropriate to ensure consistency with the fundamental principles of fairness." (See n. 558 of Chapter VI.)

[162] See also Smeulers 2007, p. 109: "The severity of the charges must not have any influence on the rights to which the accused are entitled; suspects accused of even the most serious crimes are entitled to full respect of their individual human rights. The severity of the charges might, however, influence a careful balancing of what remedies can be used in order to repair violations." One could assert that the tribunal, if it does not release a person charged with serious crimes if the Prosecution has not promptly informed the suspect of the reasons for his arrest, would also violate a human rights provision (see, for example, Art. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR). However, one can wonder what is worse: a violation of a provision which is arguably not flawless (for example, because it is over-simplified and because it can be used as a pro forma remedy) or the fact that a suspect of whom there are considerable reasons to assume that he has committed a genocide escapes justice because of the simple fact that he was not promptly informed of the reasons of his arrest. In any case, the construction mentioned above, even if it may lead to a violation of a provision such as Art. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR, cannot be used in any way as general support for reasonings which justify violations of human rights because one is dealing with suspects of international crimes. The construction can only be seen as a specific answer to a specific complication, namely on how to avoid the problems caused by the remedy of release, problems which are most clearly present in the context of the tribunals, but which are not restricted to this context.

nevertheless a fact and an important element which a judge should take into account in his balancing exercise – if he has not done so already at an earlier stage.[163]

Two issues still need to be mentioned in this chapter.

The first is that it was suggested above that "when violations occur, appropriate remedies must be granted". This should arguably mean that all violations which occur in the context of a tribunal case must be remedied, not only if those violations can be attributed to the tribunal (although it is, of course, clear that the involvement of the tribunal may lead to more far-reaching remedies).

This point is uncontroversial in the context of the abuse of process doctrine; in the context of the question of whether the male captus is so serious that the judges, in good conscience, can no longer proceed with the case, the tribunals have confirmed that they will look at the violations, irrespective of the entity responsible for those violations.[164] (As explained at the start of this section, this is also the reason why it could be argued that the tribunals do not continue to exercise jurisdiction regardless of the way a person was brought into their jurisdiction, that the tribunals do not adhere to the old(-fashioned) idea behind male captus bene detentus.)

However, this is far less certain regarding less serious violations which do not come within the domain of the abuse of process doctrine. Nevertheless, it can be argued that it would be quite odd for the tribunals to only look at the actions of third parties if those actions reach a certain seriousness. If the tribunal is willing, under the abuse of process, to take the ultimate responsibility for actions of third parties (namely by refusing jurisdiction), it should also be perfectly able to take responsibility for less serious violations. It would be strange for the tribunal to take responsibility for a suspect who suffered egregious violations, but to refuse to do so if the suspect suffered less serious violations because these violations could not be attributed to the tribunal. This does not matter with respect to serious violations in [163] See Starr 2008, pp. 757*ff*, also advocating an interest-balancing approach. Starr, who is of the opinion that "[i]nterest balancing (…) is inherent to criminal procedure – even if it has been largely excluded from the remedial stage [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]" (ibid., p. 759), believes that one can deviate from the so-called "full remedy rule" under certain circumstances, see ibid., pp. 763-764: "[I]n cases involving mass human rights abuses, states and international tribunals have often issued less-than-full-remedies. Scholars have defended those remedies on the basis that it would be impossible to provide full reparation to all of the victims; impossibility is a built-in exception to the full remedy rule under Chorzów Factory [see ibid., p. 699 and n. 553 and accompanying text of Chapter III for the idea behind this full remedy rule, ChP]. But in mass-abuse situations, "impossibility" is often a legal fiction. In most such cases, it would not really be impossible to compensate all victims who bring claims. Rather, other competing interests make it undesirable – for instance, paying out such claims would undermine the state's ability to provide services to other, innocent citizens. So a compromise approach is the best option. But if compromise is permissible in remedying the gravest human rights abuses, it is hard to see why it would not be permissible in smaller-scale cases [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP]." One can indeed agree with this vision, but only in very clear cases where applying the normal rules may lead to absurd results, such as in the case of the remedy of release. However, in the view of this study, this interest-balancing approach should not be abused, for example, by justifying abductions of suspects of international crimes with the argument that full reparation (return of the suspect) is not necessary.

[164] See n. 88 and accompanying text.

the context of the abuse of process doctrine and neither should it matter with respect to 'normal' violations which do not lead to the ending of the case.[165] Hence, the now prosecuting forum should not be selective in such important matters but take into account every violation which occurred in the context of its case.

Although it could be asserted that the suspect must revert to the national level to have such violations repaired, such remedies cannot be effective once the suspect is in the custody of the tribunal. After all, even if the national judge were to decide that a suspect is entitled to be released or to have a reduction of his sentence for these violations (which one can doubt, by the way, will ever happen), the tribunal would not be bothered by these national pronouncements. Hence, to ensure that the suspect does not become the victim of the fact that his proceedings have been fragmented over two or more systems, it is fair that the final adjudicator, the tribunal, in the context of whose case these violations occurred, takes responsibility for every violation.[166] This in turn also implies, of course, that a judge must be able to examine how the arrest/detention/transfer was made 'on the ground', for example, whether the entities making the arrest at the behest/request of the tribunal respected all the (national) arrest procedures. After all, if an arrest was clearly made in contravention of such procedures, it is difficult to maintain that a person's right to liberty and security was not violated, even if all the rules of the tribunal (such as the issuance of a valid indictment and an arrest warrant) were adhered to.[167]

---

[165] In the words of the judges of the ECCC: "Even if a violation of the Accused's right cannot be attributed to the ECCC, international jurisprudence indicates that an international criminal tribunal has both the authority and the obligation to consider the legality of his prior detention. The ICTR Appeals Chamber decision in Barayagwiza held that a violation of an accused person's rights under the law must be acknowledged by an international criminal tribunal before which he seeks relief, even if that violation cannot be attributed to that tribunal [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 16.) This task, according to the judges, was separate from the situation where "previous violations of an Accused's rights are so egregious that they may preclude or restrain the exercise of an international criminal tribunal's jurisdiction on grounds of abuse of process and violation of the fundamental rights of the accused [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.) See also ibid., para. 35: "The case law of the ICTR Appeals Chamber nevertheless indicates that even where these violations cannot be attributed to an international tribunal or do not amount to an abuse of process, an accused may be entitled to seek a remedy for violations of his rights by national authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[166] See Sluiter 2001, p. 156: "It is imperative that the defendant receives the full protection of human rights instruments and should not be the victim of the fragmentation of the criminal procedure over two or even more jurisdictions."

[167] This does not mean that the national judge can invoke certain national irregularities to refuse the transfer of the suspect to a tribunal like the ICTY/ICTR – he cannot, see the words of Swart at n. 24 and accompanying text of Chapter VI – but the international judges should take those irregularities into account when determining an appropriate remedy, for the simple reason that these irregularities occurred in the context of their case. It must be noted that Swart admits that "[t]he only, rather theoretical, situation in which transfer might be refused is that in which jus cogens would forbid a State to transfer a person." (See again n. 24 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.) However, that would be the case if, for example, there is a considerable chance that the suspect be tortured by the Tribunal. In such a theoretical case (because one can assume that such a situation will indeed not occur), the national judge might validly refuse to transfer. However, that would arguably not be the case if the suspect is, for example, abducted from another State. Although the abduction may violate the ius cogens norm of non-intervention, the subsequent transfer of the suspect to the Tribunal, after such an abduction, does

In this specific context, tribunal decisions have been issued which follow a rather non-inquiry[168]/male captus bene detentus-like view and which support the idea that the legality of the national arrest/detention proceedings cannot be examined.[169] However, there are also cases which can be interpreted as meaning that the tribunal will look into what happened at the national level and will in fact repair any violation which occurred in that context, even if the tribunal is, strictly speaking, not responsible for it.[170] arguably not constitute, in itself, a violation of a ius cogens norm. Furthermore, it must also be stressed that a suspect cannot invoke an irregularity which originated from a State's failure to cooperate with the Tribunal either. For example, he cannot invoke a violation of a provision which stipulates that that State cannot transfer nationals to the Tribunal. It must concern genuine violations of real national provisions. In those cases, it can be argued that the irregularities must be considered and remedied by the judges at the Tribunal, for the simple reason that these irregularities occurred in the context of their case.

---

[168] See Sluiter 2003 B, p. 941.

[169] See, for example, ICTY, Trial Chamber I, Motion on Behalf of General Djorde Djukić, 'Decision', Case No. IT-96-19-Misc. 1, 28 February 1996, D211, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus Edouard Karemera, 'Decision on the Defence Motion for the Release of the Accused', Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, 10 December 1999, para. 4.3, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Matthieu Ngirumpatse, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Challenging the Lawfulness of the Arrest and Detention and Seeking Return or Inspection of Seized Items', Case No. ICTR-97-44-I, 10 December 1999, para. 56, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus J[u]v[é]nal Kajelijeli, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Arbitrary Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused and on the Defence Notice of Urgent Motion to Expand and Supplement the Record of 8 December 1999 Hearing', Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, 8 May 2000, paras. 34-35, ICTR, Trial Chamber I, The Prosecutor v. Siméon Nshamihigo, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Seeking Release of the Accused Person and/or Any Other Remedy on the Basis of Abuse of Process by the Prosecutor', Case No. ICTR-2001-63-DP, 8 May 2002, n. 2, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Joseph Nzirorera, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Challenging the Legality of the Arrest and Detention of the Accused and Requesting the Return of Personal Items Seized', Case No. ICTR-98-44-T, 7 September 2000, para. 27 and ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Pauline Nyiramasuhuko, 'Decision on the Defence Motion for Exclusion of Evidence and Restitution of Property Seized', Case No. ICTR-97-21-T, 12 October 2000, para. 28. It is unclear how the supporters of the idea that one cannot review the legality of the arrest/detention at the national level want to reconcile this idea with the established and uncontroversial idea that under the abuse of process doctrine, very serious violations may lead to the ending of the case, irrespective of the entity responsible, see n. 88 and accompanying text. After all, how can one establish that a serious violation has occurred if one cannot examine the national arrest/detention proceedings in the first place? See in that respect also ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Zdravko Tolimir, 'Decision on Submissions of the Accused Concerning Legality of Arrest' (Public), Case No. IT-05-88/2-PT, 18 December 2008, para. 12: "The circumstances surrounding the arrest of the Accused are relevant to the Trial Chamber to the extent that they may affect the jurisdiction of the Tribunal over him."

[170] See, for example, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 85, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 74, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, paras. 78, 87 and 125, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, paras. 226-227, 232, 255 and 322, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba et alia, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Illegal Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused', Case No. ICTR-98-44-T, 12 December 2000, para. 23, ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 20 September 2006, para. 218 and ICTR, Appeals Chamber, André Rwamakuba v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision on Appeal against Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-A, 13 September 2007, para. 24 (although it must also

Nevertheless, if it is indeed true that the case law contains both interpretations, it is submitted that the judge should opt for the second interpretation, the one which does investigate any pre-trial irregularities and which does not demand the attribution of the violations to the tribunal/the tribunal's strict legal responsibility for the violations. Deterrence, the integrity of the proceedings and simple fairness towards the suspect (in that a suspect does not end up in a legal vacuum)[171] demand that the now prosecuting forum remedies all the violations which have been committed in the context of its case.[172] In the words of Zahar and Sluiter:

> When other entities bear primary responsibility for violations of human rights, what matters is the duty of every tribunal bench to protect the fairness and integrity of the trial by determining an appropriate remedy. Obviously, the trial does not start at the seat of the tribunal but extends to every act connected with it.[[173]] While this may be a heavy and seemingly unfair burden on the tribunals – they interact with a wide variety of actors, not all of whom may apply the highest standards of justice, and the tribunals are not in a position to change this – the reverse is even more unfair. The decision of the ICTR Trial Chamber [here, Zahar and Sluiter refer to the decisions of Nyiramasuhuko, Ngirumpatse, Kajelijeli, Karemera and Nzirorera, see n. 169, ChP] be admitted that the Rwamakuba case is arguably less far-going than the other above-mentioned cases). See finally also ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 16 (see n. 165).

---

[171] Cf. n. 849 and accompanying text of Chapter VI (in the context of the Barayagwiza case).

[172] See also Sluiter 2003 B, p. 945. As explained in Chapter VI, it is, of course, difficult to define the exact meaning of violations which have been committed in the context of a tribunal case but one clear example which should definitely fit this definition – besides the obvious example that organs of the tribunal have committed the violations themselves – are violations in the arrest and detention executed by States/international forces if the tribunal has requested that the suspect be arrested and detained by these parties, see, for example, the declaration of Judge Lal Chand Vohrah to the 2000 Semanza decision: "If an accused is arrested or detained by a state at the request or under the authority of the Tribunal, even though the accused is not yet within the actual custody of the Tribunal, the Tribunal has a responsibility to provide whatever relief is available to it to attempt to reduce any violations as much as possible, and this remedy must be proportional to the violations." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, Declaration by Judge Lal Chand Vohrah, para. 6.) Other situations may also very well fit the "in the context of" criterion, but these could be considered on a more case-by-case basis, cf. ibid., para. 7, n. 7. One could think here, for example, of irregularities which occur beyond the constructive custody of the tribunal in question, but which are nevertheless to be seen as irregularities which have been taken place in the context of a tribunal case, see, for example, the Barayagwiza and Duch cases. One could also think of an abduction such as the one suffered by Nikolić. This irregularity could not be attributed to the Tribunal and it could certainly not be seen as an arrest at the behest/request of the Tribunal, but it is, of course, an irregularity which has taken place in the context of the Tribunal case (namely in the context of the process of bringing a suspect into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal) and which should therefore be examined by the judges.

[173] This can be seen as another way of formulating the point mentioned above (see the previous footnote) that the judges must take into account all violations in the context of a tribunal case. See also Sluiter 2003 B, p. 945: "[T]he ICTY or ICTR Trial Chamber should exercise supervisory powers with respect to every violation of individual rights that occurs in the framework of its proceedings [emphasis added, ChP]." (See also the next footnote.)

> not to review national activities is simply untenable from the perspective of the duty to ensure a fair trial [original footnote omitted, ChP].[174]

This position, which is arguably better than the second,[175] but which may admittedly be hard to accept for some practically orientated judges,[176] can also 'soften' the (unpopular) male captus bene detentus image that the tribunals have; providing remedies for all violations which occurred in the context of their cases shows that the tribunals are not only concerned with prosecuting suspects of international crimes but also with ensuring fair proceedings for these suspects. In that context, one can also reassure those who object to this position that granting remedies may not have drastic consequences. One can assume that very often, a judge will only be confronted by minor violations. For those kinds of violations, small remedies will be appropriate, for example, a (minor) reduction of the sentence in the case of

[174] Zahar and Sluiter 2008, pp. 285-286. See also Sluiter 2003 B, pp. 941-942: "From a practical point of view, the most vital question is, to what extent the ICTY should bear responsibility (in the sense of providing remedies) for human rights violations that have occurred in the framework of its proceedings. (…) [T]he trial forum must take account of every human rights violation that occurs in the framework of the criminal proceedings. This view finds its ultimate basis in simple fairness and in the nature of the relationship between the accused and the trial forum."

[175] See also Gordon 2007, pp. 672-673 (referring to several of the cases mentioned in n. 169): "In a string of decisions ruling on defense motions for release, the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda has consistently held that the Tribunal has "no jurisdiction over the conditions of any arrest, detention or other measures carried out by a sovereign State at the request of the Tribunal." This has resulted in questionable due process jurisprudence [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Sluiter 2003 B, p. 943: "When one looks at the jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR one notices that the Chambers are generally aware of their obligation to ensure the fairness of the trial as a whole. The decisions of Trial Chamber II of the ICTR mentioned above [Sluiter refers here to several of the cases mentioned in n. 169, ChP] should be seen as unfortunate exceptions to this rule [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[176] See also Starr 2008, pp. 724-725: "[T]he ICTs have held that they lack jurisdiction to review national authorities' arrest methods and conditions of detention before transfer to Tribunal custody, even when the arrest and detention occur at the Tribunal Prosecutor's request. That rule has been criticized on human rights grounds. But it has an obvious remedial-cost-avoidance advantage for the Tribunals, where the capture of suspects often depends on the cooperation of states with poor human rights records. If they were to assert jurisdiction to review arrest and detention methods, the Tribunals would probably be required to grant significant remedies (perhaps even release) in many cases [original footnote omitted, ChP]." The same can, of course, be said of the quick rejections of male captus claims, see n. 3 of Chapter IV and ns. 138, 801 and 1286 of Chapter VI. In n. 801 of Chapter VI, reference was made to the Akayesu judgment. Starr (2008, pp. 725-726) writes on this judgment: "[T]he Appeals Chamber held that the defendant had waived his unlawful detention claim. This holding relied on a stricter application of the waiver doctrine than the Appeals Chamber had applied in other contexts, suggesting an ad hoc form of remedial deterrence. (…) It might be understood best as a response to the Barayagwiza debacle less than a year earlier. Akayesu's legal argument on appeal was based on the Appeals Chamber's original decision in Barayagwiza. That precedent might have required release if the Appeals Chamber had found that Akayesu had similarly been detained impermissibly – which is at least a possibility, as Akayesu was arrested by Zambian officials several months before the ICTR issued an indictment against him. And the Appeals Chamber, having barely managed to preserve the continued viability of the Tribunal via its forced retreat in the Barayagwiza Review Decision, of course would have been anxious not to repeat the crisis. Again, while it is impossible to show conclusively that remedial costs drove the Appeals Chamber's application of the waiver doctrine, the circumstances are suggestive [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." conviction.[177] This ensures that both the sense of justice of the person in question (in that his violations are remedied) and of the victims/the international community as a whole (in that a suspect of international crimes, if found guilty, receives an appropriate (which very often means stern) penalty for his deeds) are met.

However, even if a tribunal issues a male detentus decision because of the serious male captus involved, one must understand that this does not mean that the suspect cannot be tried for his crimes at all. The fact that this prosecuting forum would refuse the case does not mean that the suspect cannot be tried elsewhere. The tribunal must not forget that it also has a responsibility to fight impunity, even if it is of the opinion that the suspect can no longer be tried before its own judges.[178] Thus, if the State of residence of the suspect requests the return of the suspect, a tribunal could decide to make this return conditional, in that the suspect would only be returned to that State if the latter's authorities are able and willing to prosecute the suspect before their own courts.[179] If this cannot be guaranteed, the tribunal should transfer the suspect to another jurisdiction which can fairly prosecute the suspect. That jurisdiction could then take into account the fact that the suspect has suffered an irregular pre-trial phase and grant him certain remedies. Otherwise, the suspect would still not have received a 'personal' remedy repairing the wrongs. (The fact that the first court refuses jurisdiction and that the second court starts a new trial is not of any 'advantage' to the suspect. Although it is not the case that every remedy must be to the benefit of the suspect, it would arguably contravene the concept of fairness if the suspect is, for example, kidnapped, brought to a court which refuses jurisdiction, brought before a new court and then tried without the latter court providing him a remedy, such as a reduction of his sentence, which, in the suspect's eyes, would effectively repair the wrongs suffered by him.)

The second and last issue which needs to be discussed before turning to Part 4 of this book, is that the previous discussion primarily focused on violations of human rights/due process considerations. However, a few words on violations of State sovereignty in the context of the tribunals should still be made.

It is the case that in the truly vertical context of the ICTY/ICTR (this is different for the internationalised criminal tribunals), "sovereignty by definition cannot play the same role"[180] as in the horizontal context of equal, sovereign States, where "it is of utmost importance that any exercise of (...) national jurisdiction be exercised in full respect of other national jurisdictions"[181] because "[o]bservance of this fundamental principle forms an important asset of peaceful co-operation between States".[182]

---

[177] See the case Semanza (see n. 1005 and accompanying text of Chapter VI).
[178] This was a correct point of criticism vented against the first Barayagwiza case.
[179] See also n. 354 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.
[180] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 100.
[181] Ibid.
[182] Ibid.

Nevertheless, this does not, of course, constitute a carte blanche for such Tribunals, or States/international forces working for them, to violate the sovereignty of States.[183]

Therefore, if an abduction, violating a State's sovereignty, can be attributed to the Tribunal and if that abduction is followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect, there is no reason why the Tribunal should not return the suspect to that State.

It has been asserted that this would make no sense because the State in question would then be under an immediate new obligation to transfer the suspect back to the Tribunal: dolo facit qui petit quod [statim] redditurus est.[184] However, if an abduction can be attributed to the Tribunal and if the judges of the Tribunal were to (correctly) find that this is such a serious male captus that jurisdiction must be refused, this maxim would arguably not apply, for there is no renewed obligation to transfer the suspect back to the Tribunal if that Tribunal has stated that it can no longer exercise jurisdiction over the case. However, as explained supra, what the Tribunal could do in such circumstances is to grant the return on a conditional basis, on the State of residence being under an obligation to prosecute the suspect itself. In less serious male captus cases, where the judge has not refused jurisdiction but where he may nevertheless be of the opinion that a violation of a State's sovereignty (followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect), strictly speaking, demands that the suspect is released and returned to that injured State, it would be better for the Tribunal not to return the suspect at all. After all, in such a situation, the above-mentioned maxim does apply. It would be rather strange for the suspect to be returned to a State which has an immediate obligation to re-transfer the suspect back to the Tribunal (which is, after all, still capable of trying the suspect). In fact, one could argue that if it is clear that that State might not cooperate with the Tribunal, it would be rather ridiculous to return the suspect to that State.[185] Hence, it [183] Cf. also Sloan 2003 B, pp. 549-550: "While it is, of course, true that different considerations must apply as regards relations between the Tribunal and member states of the UN (clearly the Tribunal could not function if its relations with states were constrained in the same manner as between states), it is submitted that there must nevertheless be some limits on the ICTY's power to intervene in a state. Indeed the Decision would have benefited from consideration of whether there are such limits on the ICTY, and, if so, what they are and whether Nikolić's capture in violation of the law of the FRY violated them [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Lamb 2000, p. 223, n. 201: "Potentially at least, a State may plead lawful excuse, on the grounds that the ICTY (and hence by implication its orders) was instituted by the UN Security Council pursuant to a resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. (…) However, such a plea appears unlikely to succeed, on the grounds that while arrest warrants may constitute enforcement measures, these oblige custodial States to effect arrests or direct international forces to carry them out. They stop short of authorizing such States or forces to launch incursions into third States in order to do so".

[184] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 104.

[185] Cf. also the UK submission in the Todorović case where it was argued: "It follows that even if Todorovic were to be released and returned to the FRY, the FRY would be under an absolute obligation immediately to hand him back to the Tribunal. The United Kingdom submits that it would be absurd for the Tribunal to hold that international law required it to release Todorovic and return him to the FRY would arguably better in such a situation if the Tribunal holds the suspect in custody, continues the case and accords other remedies for the wrongs which occurred in the context of its case.

while also requiring the FRY to hand him straight back to the Tribunal. It would be even more absurd to hold that there was a duty to return him to the FRY if there were any chance that the FRY would not comply with its obligations to the Tribunal." (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Blagoje Simi[ć], Milan Simi[ć], Miroslav Tadi[ć], Stevan Todorovi[ć] and Simo Zari[ć], 'Submissions of the United Kingdom Regarding Review of the Decision of Trial Chamber III, 18 October 2000', Case No. IT-95-9-AR108 bis, 15 November 2000, para. 31.)

PART 4

THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

CHAPTER VIII
GENERAL INFORMATION ON THE ARREST AND SURRENDER REGIME

1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter will deal with the procedures as to how a suspect is arrested and brought into the jurisdiction of the ICC. The importance of these procedures cannot be stressed enough: the ICC instruments can have the most detailed provisions on, for example, the exact scope of a certain crime against humanity, the theory of command responsibility or the reparation regime for victims, but these provisions will only become truly relevant if a person is arrested and surrendered to The Hague. This is because – as has already been briefly mentioned in the very first pages of this book – the ICC does not recognise trials in absentia, that is, trials without the suspect (who is called the accused at trial, see footnote 1) being present in the courtroom.[1] This means that unless a person is arrested and surrendered to

[1] See Art. 63, para. 1 of the ICC Statute: "The accused shall be present during the trial." (See also Sluiter 2003 C, p. 606.) It should be clarified that this does not mean that a person, which has already been arrested and surrendered to the ICC, can never be barred from attending a session in court. For example, para. 2 of the same article states: "If the accused, being present before the Court, continues to disrupt the trial, the Trial Chamber may remove the accused and shall make provisions for him or her to observe the trial and instruct counsel from outside the courtroom, through the use of communications technology, if required. Such measures shall be taken only in exceptional circumstances after other reasonable alternatives have proved inadequate, and only for such duration as is strictly required." However, this rule applies to the situation when the person is already in the custody of the ICC. Conversely, the prohibition of in absentia trials mentioned above refers to the hypothetical situation that the ICC starts a trial when the person on trial is not there because he has not been arrested and surrendered to The Hague at all. In that case, the ICC thus starts a trial without having the person tried in its custody. In the in absentia discussion, the procedure from Art. 61, para. 2 of the ICC Statute should also be mentioned. This provision states: "The Pre-Trial Chamber may, upon request of the Prosecutor or on its own motion, hold a hearing in the absence of the person charged to confirm the charges on which the Prosecutor intends to seek trial when the person has: (a) Waived his or her right to be present; or (b) Fled or cannot be found and all reasonable steps have been taken to secure his or her appearance before the Court and to inform the person of the charges and that a hearing to confirm those charges will be held. In that case, the person shall be represented by counsel where the Pre-Trial Chamber determines that it is in the interests of justice." Although this procedure, which very much resembles the already discussed (see n. 76 and accompanying text of Chapter VI) Rule 61 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE, has more characteristics of the in absentia trial mentioned above, it must not be forgotten that Art. 61 of the ICC Statute 'only' deals with the pre-trial confirmation of charges hearing, hence taking place before the actual trial. That is also the reason why the word "truly" has been inserted

The Hague, a proper trial will not take place.[2] And if such a trial does not take place, the above-mentioned provisions can never become truly relevant. In short, if one does not want this to happen, a person needs to be arrested and surrendered first. In the words of Ruxton:

> The arrest process lies at the very heart of the criminal justice process: unless the accused are taken into custody, we will have no trials, no development of the law by the courts; and ultimately, no international justice. (...) [W]ithout arrest mechanisms that work, nothing will be achieved.[3]

This feature is complicated by the fact (see again the very first pages of this book) that the ICC does not have its own police force. It is "a giant without arms and legs"[4] who "needs artificial limbs to walk and work"[5] so to speak, dependent on others to effectuate the arrest and surrender of the suspect to the ICC.[6]

Before looking at the more specific arrest and surrender provisions (Section 3 of this chapter), the next section (Section 2) will first examine the more general cooperation regime between these 'others' (one could hereby think of States, organisations and international forces) and the ICC. After Section 3 (where special attention will be paid to the intriguing and crucial provision of Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute), the cooperation regime (of which the arrest and surrender provisions are obviously part) will be assessed for a second time (in Section 4) so that it is clear what kind of system 'the others' are truly involved in.

---

in the main text: although some substantive concepts may already be addressed during this confirmation of charges hearing, they will only become truly relevant in the context of a proper trial.

[2] As also explained in n. 33 of Chapter I, it will be shown in Subsection 3.1 that a person can also be summoned to come to The Hague (without the necessity of arrest). However, as this book is focusing on the arrest proceedings, it has decided to give this chapter the title it now has. Finally, it must be noted that a suspect may also come voluntarily to The Hague. In that case, an arrest is, of course, not necessary either. Nevertheless, as also already discussed in n. 33 of Chapter I, one can assume that an arrest will normally be necessary (even taking into account the ICC case of Abu Garda, where this was not the case).

[3] Ruxton 2001, p. 19. See also Roper and Barria 2008, p. 458: "The inability to apprehend suspects not only undermines the credibility of a justice system but, more fundamentally, thwarts the prosecution of cases and ultimately denies the possibility of justice to individuals as well as the establishment of a historical record which can serve as a basis for possible national reconciliation. Therefore we regard the apprehension of suspects as a more fundamental problem than just enforcement – the inability to apprehend suspects undermines the entire international human rights regime." See finally Swart 2002 C, p. 1640: "The surrender of suspects and accused to the International Criminal Court is of vital importance to its proper functioning. The duty of States to arrest and surrender persons whose presence before the Court is needed is one of the cornerstones on which the Rome Statute rests. Historical precedents make the fundamental nature of the duty to arrest and surrender abundantly clear. Attempts to create an international system for the adjudication of war crimes and other international crimes in the aftermath of World War I have largely failed because surrender of persons could not be secured. On the other hand, the successes of the International Military Tribunals of Nuremberg and Tokyo and of other tribunals erected after World War II would not have been possible without the operation of a smooth system for arresting and surrendering the accused."

[4] See Cassese's metaphor in Subsection 1.3 of Chapter I.

[5] See ibid.

[6] See also Swart 2002 B, p. 1589 and Sluiter 2003 C, p. 605.

2 MODEL OF COOPERATION: A FIRST APPRAISAL

To properly understand the cooperation regime of the ICC (and its position vis-à-vis other regimes), it may be worth briefly reviewing the two main cooperation regimes which have already been discussed in this book: the inter-State cooperation regime and the cooperation regime between States and the ICTY/ICTR.

Here, the well-known distinction between 'horizontal' and 'vertical' re-enters the scene, see Section 2 of Chapter VI. As may have become clear from n. 6 of that chapter, this book will look at the actual characteristics of a certain regime before giving it a certain label and will not use the more basic distinction that cooperation regimes between States are horizontal and cooperation regimes between States and international criminal tribunals are vertical in nature. (If one were to use that distinction, it is, of course, clear that the ICC's cooperation regime with States can be seen as vertical, as the ICC, like, for example, the ICTY and the ICTR, can be seen as a real international criminal tribunal.)

Horizontal regimes are based on consensus and equality: they are characterised by equal entities which cooperate with each other, because they want to do so.[7]

Conversely, vertical cooperation regimes, such as the ones regulating cooperation between States and the ICTY or the ICTR – as has already been explained in Chapter VI – are based on superiority and non-equality: States must cooperate with the hierarchically higher Tribunals, whether they want to or not. In other words, (the cooperation regimes of) these Tribunals have been imposed on States:[8] in UNSC Resolutions 827 and 955, respectively, one can read that the UNSC, on the basis of Chapter VII of the UN Charter, decided to establish these Tribunals and to clarify that all UN Member States have to cooperate fully with them.[9]

---

[7] See also Swart 2002 B, p. 1590: "Cooperation between States in criminal matters is a matter freely entered into."

[8] See also ibid., p. 1592.

[9] See UNSC Res. 827 of 25 May 1993, paras. 2 and 4 ("The Security Council, (...) Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, (...) Decides hereby to establish an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia between 1 January 1991 and a date to be determined by the Security Council upon the restoration of peace and to this end to adopt the Statute of the International Tribunal (...); (...) Decides that all States shall cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and its organs in accordance with the present resolution and the Statute of the International Tribunal (…) [emphasis in original, ChP].") and UNSC Res. 955 of 8 November 1994, paras. 1-2: "The Security Council, (...) Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, (...) Decides hereby (…) to establish an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994 and to this end to adopt the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (…); (...) Decides that all States shall cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and its organs in accordance with the present resolution and the Statute of the International Tribunal (…) [emphasis in original, ChP]."

In that respect, it seems that a cooperation regime containing a duty to cooperate – and it is clear that the ICC regime contains such a provision[10] – is vertical in nature. However, this does not necessarily have to be the case. After all, one will also find obligations to cooperate in many horizontal instruments treaties. An example is Article 1 of the UN Model Treaty on Extradition,[11] which can perhaps be seen as reflecting "the broadest common international denominator in the field of extradition".[12] Article 1 (entitled 'Obligation to extradite') reads:

> Each Party agrees to extradite to the other, upon request and subject to the provisions of the present Treaty, any person who is wanted in the requesting State for prosecution for an extraditable offence or for the imposition or enforcement of a sentence in respect of such an offence.

However, although this horizontal instrument thus contains an obligation to cooperate/extradite, it is clear that this duty can in no way be compared with provisions such as Articles 86 and 89 of the ICC Statute,[13] because the inter-State duty to extradite is applicable to both sides ("[e]ach Party agrees to extradite to the other"), whereas in the ICC context, only States are obliged to cooperate with the ICC (and not vice versa).[14] In that respect, reciprocity is clearly lacking.[15] In other words, even though the obligation to cooperate may not necessarily constitute a [10] See Art. 86 of the ICC Statute for the general obligation ("States Parties shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Statute, cooperate fully with the Court in its investigation and prosecution of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court.") and Art. 89, para. 1 of the ICC Statute for the more specific obligation with respect to arrest and surrender ("States Parties shall (...) comply with requests for arrest and surrender.").

[11] See the Annex to UNGA Res. 45/116 of 14 December 1990.

[12] Swart 2002 B, p. 1591. For an example of a provision in an actual treaty, see Art. 1 ('Obligation to Extradite') of the Extradition Treaty between the United States of America and the Kingdom of the Netherlands. (Conclusion: The Hague, 24 June 1980. Entry into force: 15 September 1983.) The text of this treaty can be found in Mevis, Reijntjes and Stamhuis 2004, pp. 17-23.

[13] See n. 10.

[14] Although it does not impose an obligation on the ICC to cooperate with States, it may nevertheless be interesting to note that the ICC Statute does contain a 'mutual' provision, see Art. 93, para. 10 of the ICC Statute: "(a) The Court may, upon request, cooperate with and provide assistance to a State Party conducting an investigation into or trial in respect of conduct which constitutes a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court or which constitutes a serious crime under the national law of the requesting State. (b) (i) The assistance provided under subparagraph (a) shall include, inter alia: a. The transmission of statements, documents or other types of evidence obtained in the course of an investigation or a trial conducted by the Court; and b. The questioning of any person detained by order of the Court; (ii) In the case of assistance under subparagraph (b) (i) a: a. If the documents or other types of evidence have been obtained with the assistance of a State, such transmission shall require the consent of that State; b. If the statements, documents or other types of evidence have been provided by a witness or expert, such transmission shall be subject to the provisions of article 68. (c) The Court may, under the conditions set out in this paragraph, grant a request for assistance under this paragraph from a State which is not a Party to this Statute." Note, however, that the ICC Statute does not speak of "mutual assistance" itself. According to Swart, this is because the Statute "tries to avoid terminology that would be reminiscent of inter-State cooperation [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Swart 2002 B, pp. 1594-1595.) See also Rastan 2008, p. 432.

[15] See also Sluiter 2003 C, p. 613.

vertical characteristic, the version in the ICC context in fact lives up to its vertical appearance.[16]

Another vertical aspect of the ICC's cooperation regime is the ICC's position as the final arbiter in disputes.[17] Sluiter explains:

> It is unthinkable that in a horizontal cooperation relationship, either the requesting or the requested side will resolve disputes regarding the duty to provide legal assistance. There is a compulsory dispute settlement mechanism in a vertical cooperation relationship where a hierarchically superior international criminal tribunal is assisted. The task of settling disputes of the requesting party is the most fundamental deviation from the horizontal legal assistance model as it is most indicative of a legal assistance relationship based on hierarchy.[18]

The ICC's status as the final arbiter in disputes can be found in Article 119, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute, which states: "Any dispute concerning the judicial functions of the Court shall be settled by the decision of the Court." According to Clark, commenting on this provision, questions concerning cooperation with and judicial assistance to the Court can probably be seen as part of the judicial functions of the ICC.[19] It is interesting to note that Clark does not categorise an important point relating to the cooperation regime, namely "a failure by a State to comply with a request to cooperate",[20] under the subject of "[a]ny dispute concerning the judicial functions of the Court". However, he does refer to Article 87, paragraph 7 of the ICC Statute, which clarifies:

> Where a State Party fails to comply with a request to cooperate by the Court contrary to the provisions of this Statute, thereby preventing the Court from exercising its functions and powers under this Statute, the Court may make a finding to that effect

[16] Nevertheless, it is not as vertical as the duty in the context of the ICTY/ICTR as the latter duty is truly general in nature. See Swart 2002 B, p. 1595: "[A] duty that is for the Tribunals to specify in individual cases and that finds its limitations only in explicit provisions of the Statutes. This is not the system of the Court's Statute. In Part 9 [This part is entitled 'International Cooperation and Judicial Assistance', ChP], the choice has been made to list the specific obligations of the States Parties exhaustively and to indicate their scope and contents as precisely as possible. It must be assumed that the general obligation to cooperate laid down in Article 86 of the Statute does not create a general supplementary and residual duty to cooperate in situations not covered by other articles. (…) In other words, while the Statutes of the Tribunals have created an 'open' system, that of the Court's Statute is, at least in principle, a 'closed' one. In that fundamental respect, the system established by the Court's Statute is more akin to the structure of inter-State cooperation [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." The words "in principle" used by Swart allude to the exception of Art. 93, para. 1 (l) of the ICC Statute which states: "States Parties shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Part [this is Part 9, ChP] and under procedures of national law, comply with requests by the Court to provide the following assistance in relation to investigations or prosecutions: (…) Any other type of assistance which is not prohibited by the law of the requested State, with a view to facilitating the investigation and prosecution of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court."

[17] See Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 613-615.

[18] Ibid., p. 614.

[19] Clark 2008, pp. 1729-1730.

[20] Ibid., p. 1731.

and refer the matter to the Assembly of States Parties or, where the Security Council referred the matter to the Court, to the Security Council.

Hence, it is indeed the case that ultimately either the ASP or the UNSC may have to decide on this issue,[21] but it is the Court itself which decides whether or not this

[21] In addition, "[f]ailing any action taken or recommended by the Assembly of States Parties or the Security Council, States Parties to the Statute or any Member State of the United Nations, as the case may be, may resort to remedies generally available to them under international law, with a view to ensuring compliance with requests for cooperation by the Court." (Ciampi 2002, p. 1635.) See also Kaul and Kreß 2000, p. 169: "[R]eference to the customary international law on state responsibility is necessary to spell out the consequences of non-cooperation [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See further Rastan 2008, pp. 434-444. Strijards notes that the ICC "will be far more dependent on the willingness of States to comply with requests for cooperation" (Strijards 2001, p. 115) because it cannot, in principle, rely on "the backbone of the UN-Charter" (ibid.). See also Cogan 2002, p. 137. See further Scharf 2000, p. 944: "The experience of the ICTY suggests that states will frequently refuse to provide (…) cooperation despite their clear treaty obligations to comply with the Tribunal's orders. The ICC's only recourse in such a situation is to make a finding that the state has failed to cooperate and then refer the matter to the Assembly of States Parties. The Assembly's only enforcement mechanism is the issuance of a statement condemning the failure to cooperate – which is unlikely to have much effect [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Sluiter 2002 A, p. 134: "It is undeniable that the ICC faces greater difficulties in the field of legal assistance than the ad hoc Tribunals. The latter not only benefited from more extensive obligations for States, but also could rely, at least on paper, on the assistance of practically every State in the world." The words "at least on paper" are important here; although it is true that the ICC in principle cannot rely on the backbone of the UN Charter, the experience of the UN ad hoc Tribunals (see also n. 121 of Chapter VI) has shown that, even if the ICC's case is supported by a UNSC referral, such a backbone may not necessarily be of any help. See, for instance, Scharf 2000, p. 944: "[T]he experience of the ICTY indicates that, even in the most egregious of situations, the Security Council is unlikely to impose sanctions in the event of non-cooperation with the ICC, especially where the target state's trading partners include one or more of the Permanent Members of the Council which wield a veto." See also Roper and Barria 2008, p. 464: "One might argue that having a consensus of the permanent members of the Security Council would provide the ICC with greater leverage with states in securing the surrender of suspects, but the history of the ICTY and the ICTR (both created under Chapter VII authority) demonstrates that this formal power still requires the genuine co-operation of the state". See further Rastan 2008, pp. 438-439, the ICC OTP's 'Informal expert paper: Fact-finding and investigative functions of the office of the Prosecutor, including international co-operation', 2003, available at: http://www2.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/490C317B-5D8E-4131-8170-7568911F6EB2/248459/372616.PDF, para. 5 and Gillett 2008, pp. 18-19. Like the ICTY/ICTR, the ICC will thus also very much depend on (other) mighty States and organisations in favour of its existence and functioning which are able and willing to put pressure on non-cooperative States. See also Rastan 2008, pp. 439-440 and Roper and Barria 2008, p. 467: "[W]e argue more generally that significant economic pressure may be one of the most effective tools available to third parties in order to support the activity of the ICC. (…) Especially for states which are highly export-dependent, third-party economic pressure may be one of the most important means by which the international community can assist the ICC in securing the apprehension of suspects." (See also n. 116 of Chapter VI.) As already explained in Chapter VI, such pressure may not only be based on mere politics but may also have a legal foundation; it was stated at the beginning of this footnote that such actions can be based on the law of State responsibility. In this context, mention should be made of the concepts of 'obligation to cooperate erga omnes' and 'obligation to cooperate erga omnes partes' (see also Chapter VI) – erga omnes meaning towards everyone, towards the international community as a whole and erga omnes partes meaning towards all relevant parties, for example, towards all the members of the UN or towards all the members of the ICC's ASP. Cf. also Kreß and Prost 2008 A, p. 1526, writing about the hypotheses of non-States Parties being obliged to cooperate with the ICC pursuant to a decision stemming from the UNSC acting under Chapter VII or procedure will be followed. Furthermore, this provision arguably is concerned with the consequences of non-cooperation rather than with whether or not one can speak of non-cooperation on the part of the State in question itself. This point of law appears to be the privilege of the ICC alone.[22]

In short, there are unmistakably important vertical characteristics discernible in the general cooperation regime between the ICC and States,[23] but the previous pages have also shown that the ICC's regime may not be as vertical as that of the ICTY and the ICTR.[24] This last point can be confirmed by a key element underpinning the ICC's regime, which is that, unlike the cooperation regimes of the ICTY/ICTR, the cooperation regime of the ICC is not imposed on States; in principle, it is only applicable to States that decide to become a party to the ICC Statute, which is basically a normal international treaty.[25] Hence, even though the ICC cooperation regime may indeed contain important vertical elements, States can still decide for themselves whether they want to be bound by this regime or not. This is also observed by Swart, who states that pursuant to customary international law: "In both hypotheses the obligation applies erga omnes and as a consequence thereof every UN Member State or, respectively, every State has a legal interest in the non-States Parties' cooperation [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Note that countermeasures taken by the ASP against the non-cooperating State are based on the fact that the non-cooperative State's obligation to cooperate applies erga omnes partes, towards all the members of the ASP, see ibid., p. 1530.)

---

[22] See Clark 2008, p. 1730, n. 29. After having stated in the main text that "questions concerning cooperation with and judicial assistance to the Court" can probably be seen as part of the judicial functions of the ICC, Clark continues to write in the footnote: "In the event that the Court is unable to achieve what it wants from a State Party, some questions may end up before the Assembly of States Parties or the Security Council for "enforcement". See article 87 para. 7 (...). The judges would no doubt take the view that this would not be an opportunity for the Assembly to resolve the dispute by second-guessing the Court on matters of law." See finally Pellet 2002 B, p. 1843 who states about Art. 87, para. 7 of the ICC Statute that this provision "empowers the Court to make findings on all questions relating to cooperation between States and the ICC, yet leaves the last word to the Assembly of States Parties or the Security Council."

[23] Another example is provided by Currie 2007, p. 380, referring to Artt. 57, para. 3 (d) and 99, para. 4 of the ICC Statute: "Where the Pre-Trial Chamber determines that there is no competent mechanism or authority to respond to a cooperation request, it may even authorize the Prosecutor to conduct investigations on the territory of a party state, without that state's consent [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (See also Rastan 2008, pp. 437-438.) Swart, however, notes in this context: "Even so, all this is a rather far cry from the system of Articles 18 and 17 of the ad hoc Tribunals' Statutes, with their broad powers for the Prosecutor to carry out investigations on the territory of States, and from the practice that has developed on their basis. Arguably, the system of the Statute is, in these respects, definitely inferior to that of the Tribunals' Statutes, and the fear is, therefore, warranted that this will have negative consequences for the proper functioning of the Court." (Swart 2002 B, p. 1598.) See also Kaul and Kreß 2000, p. 171: "[T]he possibility for the Prosecutor to conduct on-site investigations, though at least included as such, is regrettably limited in scope."

[24] See ns. 16 and 23.

[25] See Artt. 26 ("Every treaty in force is binding upon the parties to it and must be performed by them in good faith": pacta sunt servanda) and 34 ("A treaty does not create either obligations or rights for a third State without its consent": pacta tertiis nec nocent nec prosunt) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. See also Swart 2002 C, p. 1686.

> [t]he general answer must surely be that the Statute has created a regime of cooperation that is a mixture of the 'horizontal' and the 'vertical'. The basic difference between the ad hoc Tribunals and the Court is that the latter's Statute rests on a consensual basis [emphasis added, ChP].[26]

One can make a comparison here with respect to cooperation between the ICC and organisations. The latter cannot become a party to the ICC Statute (which is only reserved for States) but if they consent to cooperate, they may nevertheless sign a cooperation agreement with the Court on the basis of Article 87, paragraph 6 of the ICC Statute.[27] In that case, it can be argued, the organisation is also obliged to cooperate with the ICC.[28] An example in that respect is the 'Agreement between the International Criminal Court and the European Union on Cooperation and Assistance',[29] which also contains a duty to cooperate for both parties.[30]

---

[26] Swart 2002 B, p. 1594.

[27] "The Court may ask any intergovernmental organization to provide information or documents. The Court may also ask for other forms of cooperation and assistance which may be agreed upon with such an organization and which are in accordance with its competence or mandate." Other provisions in the ICC Statute mentioning the interaction between the ICC and organisations (not focusing on the UN now) are Artt. 15, para. 2, 44, para. 4, 54, para. 3 (after the Lubanga Dyilo case a very well-known provision, see n. 523 and accompanying text of Chapter X), 73, 87, para. 1 (b), 93, para. 9 (b) and 116 of the ICC Statute.

[28] See also Ciampi 2002, p. 1633: "Article 87(6) does not explicitly deal with the consequences of a failure of an intergovernmental organization to cooperate with the Court. Cooperation by an intergovernmental organization or arrangement is, in principle, a voluntary one. It is perfectly conceivable, however, that an intergovernmental organization, including a peacekeeping force, might assume an international treaty obligation to cooperate or be under a corresponding obligation because of a Security Council resolution under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. In any such cases, it would incur international responsibility in case of failure to cooperate, and the Court – it is submitted – would have the inherent power to make a finding as to the organization's failure to cooperate [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Rastan 2008, p. 444. To this, one can add that an organisation may also be obliged to cooperate with the ICC if the obligation to cooperate stems from a customary international law rule, see Kreß and Prost 2008 A, p. 1526.

[29] 'Agreement between the International Criminal Court and the European Union on Cooperation and Assistance'. Date of signature: 10 April 2006, date of entry into force: 1 May 2006, available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/6EB80CC1-D717-4284-9B5C-03CA028E155B/140157/ICCPRES010106_English.pdf (ICC-PRES/01-01-06) or at: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=OJ:L:2006:115:0049:0049:EN:PDF (this is the Council Decision of 10 April 2006 concerning the conclusion of the Agreement between the International Criminal Court and the European Union on cooperation and assistance (2006/313/CFSP), OJ L 115, 28 April 2006, p. 49) and: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=OJ:L:2006:115:0050:0056:EN:PDF (OJ L 115, 28 April 2006, pp. 50-56, this is the Agreement itself). It may also be interesting to note that the ICC has concluded several agreements with other organisations, such as the 'Negotiated Relationship Agreement between the International Criminal Court and the United Nations' (ICC-ASP/3/Res.1, adopted and entered into force on 4 October 2004 and available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/916FC6A2-7846-4177-A5EA-5AA9B6D1E96C/0/ICCASP3Res1_English.pdf) and the 'Agreement between the International Criminal Court and the International Committee of the Red Cross on Visits to Persons deprived of Liberty Pursuant to the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court' (ICC-PRES/02-01-06, adopted on 29 March 2006, entered into force on 13 April 2006 and available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/A542057C-FB5F-4729-8DD4-8C0699DDE0A3/140159/ICCPRES020106_English.pdf). Another, more specific agreement which Hence, the obligation to cooperate with the ICC, in principle, only applies to entities which agree to cooperate with the ICC. In principle, because there are three situations where this is not the case.

Before reviewing these three situations, however, it is appropriate to connect the above-mentioned point regarding the cooperation between the ICC and organisations with the importance of cooperation with international (peacekeeping) forces explained in Chapter VI. As mentioned in that chapter, such assistance could be vital to the functioning of the tribunal in question. In the more specific context of the ICC,[31] one should also take into account the fact that the ICC may only start a case if, among other things, 1) there has been no national investigation or prosecution of the case; 2) the State investigating or prosecuting the case is unwilling or unable genuinely to carry out the investigation or prosecution or 3) the State has investigated and has decided not to prosecute the person concerned but the decision not to prosecute resulted from the unwillingness or inability of the State genuinely to prosecute.[32]

Hence, very often, the State which has to surrender has been unable or unwilling to investigate and prosecute a certain case itself.[33] Although this need not necessarily imply that that State is also unable or unwilling to cooperate with the ICC, there may still be a considerable overlap.[34] And, of course, if a State cannot or merits to be mentioned here is the 'Co-operation agreement between the office of the prosecutor of the International Criminal Court and the International Criminal Police Organization-Interpol', signed on 22 December 2004 and available at: http://www.interpol.com/Public/ICPO/LegalMaterials/cooperation/agreements/ICC2005.asp.

---

[30] See Art. 4 of the Agreement (which is entitled 'Obligation of cooperation and assistance'): "The EU and the Court agree that, with a view to facilitating the effective discharge of their respective responsibilities, they shall cooperate closely, as appropriate, with each other and consult each other on matters of mutual interest, pursuant to the provisions of this Agreement while fully respecting the respective provisions of the EU Treaty and the Statute. In order to facilitate this obligation of cooperation and assistance, the Parties agree on the establishing of appropriate regular contacts between the Court and the EU Focal Point for the Court." The sanctions mechanism in the case of non-compliance can also be found in this Agreement, see its Art. 18 ('Settlement of Disputes'): "All differences between the EU and the Court arising out of the interpretation or application of this Agreement shall be dealt with through consultation between the Parties." For more information on the cooperation regime between the ICC and the EU, see Paulussen 2010.

[31] See also Rastan 2008, p. 444 and the ICC OTP's 'Informal expert paper: Fact-finding and investigative functions of the office of the Prosecutor, including international co-operation', 2003, available at: http://www2.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/490C317B-5D8E-4131-8170-7568911F6EB2/248459/372616.PDF, para. 91.

[32] See Art. 17, para. 1 (a) and (b) of the ICC Statute.

[33] This is, of course, different when the surrendering State is not the same State as the State which is the subject of an ICC investigation. One could hereby think of the surrender of Bemba Gombo (see Section 3 of Chapter X): this suspect plays a central role in the ICC's investigation in the situation of the CAR but was arrested in and surrendered by Belgium.

[34] See Harmon and Gaynor 2004, p. 412, n. 26: "[T]he ICC Statute contains a potentially irreconcilable tension: on the one hand, the ICC is entirely dependent on the willingness of states to execute arrest warrants (…) and, on the other, its jurisdiction can only be exercised where a state is unable or unwilling to prosecute (…). If an accused flees to a state which is willing to locate and arrest the fugitive, all is well. But if the accused remains in the state which is unable or unwilling to prosecute him, then it is likely that the state will be unable or unwilling to arrest him." See also Ciampi 2006, p.

does not want to cooperate, the help of international forces is very welcome. Another relevant point in the context of the ICC is the previously mentioned fact (see footnote 47 of Chapter I) that the Court will often have to deal with ongoing conflicts.[35] Consequently, the assistance of peacekeeping forces on the ground may prove to be instrumental to the ICC's success.[36] One of the provisions in which 726: "Now, inability or unwillingness to prosecute the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court cannot automatically be equated to inability or unwillingness to cooperate with the latter. The two concepts are, however, related. For example, the "total" or "substantial" collapse – or unavailability – of a national judicial system which results in the "inability" of the State to investigate and prosecute crimes before its national authorities may well also result in the inability of that State to cooperate with the Court in its investigations and prosecutions. In the case of "unwillingness", the possibility of a coincidence – between unwillingness to prosecute and unwillingness to cooperate – is even more evident." See finally Swart and Sluiter 1999, p. 92.

[35] Note that the fact that there is an ongoing conflict does not necessarily mean that it will be harder for the ICC to have a person arrested. Although Roper and Barria (2008, p. 465) "believe that the ICC will be more successful in gaining the surrender of suspects after hostilities have ended", Burke-White (2008, p. 480) has criticised this point of view, stating: "Their logic is that 'Intervening in an ongoing conflict makes the political ramifications of any investigation more acute.' True enough, but those increased political ramifications during a conflict may actually increase, rather than limit, the ICC's bargaining power. Prior to the end of a conflict, both the government of the territorial state and international actors may have particularly strong interests in apprehending a suspect, precisely because such an apprehension could help to bring about an end to the conflict. Once the conflict is over, in contrast, there may be far less urgency attached to apprehending indictees and the Court's bargaining power may decline. Compare, for example, the limited pressure to secure the apprehension of Radovan Karadžić and Ratko Mladić in Bosnia and Herzegovina, more than ten years after the end of that conflict, with the growing foreign and domestic political support for either a peace deal or the apprehension of Joseph Kony during the conflict in Uganda. The very political urgency created by an ongoing conflict may well increase the ICC's bargaining power [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Note, of course, that by now, Karadžić has been taken into custody by the ICTY.)

[36] See also Kreß and Prost 2008 A, p. 1527. In Chapter VI, the point was examined whether OTP staff could also be involved in the arrest itself. Zhou (2006, p. 211) argues with respect to the ICC context that "no rule in the ICC Statute prevents per se the Prosecutor from participating in enforcement operations within the limits set out under the ICTY regime. The large discretion conferred by Article 54(1)(b) [of the ICC Statute, which, among other things, states that "[t]he Prosecutor shall (…) Take appropriate measures to ensure the effective investigation and prosecution of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court", ChP], along with the use in this provision of the term 'shall', rather suggest that if the Prosecutor believes that the participation of his office in an operation to capture a person indicted by the ICC is required, he would then be under an obligation to provide the appropriate participation from his office for the operation." See also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 37. Gillett (2008, p. 19) in turn notes that the augmentation of the ICC's ability to obtain suspects could be achieved "by explicitly granting the Prosecutor powers of arrest through an amendment to the Rome Statute. However, obtaining the necessary two-thirds majority of State Parties' support to amend the Statute would be difficult. The amendment would likely be seen as too great an encroachment on state sovereignty and the discretion to choose when and how to deliver an accused to the Court. Furthermore, a muscled-up Court would present a threat to the preeminence of the Security Council in the international legal order, due to the cross-border nature of such arrests." In this context, one can, of course, also mention the idea of an international arrest team executing arrest warrants for the ICC. However, as already clarified in n. 107 of Chapter VI, this does not appear to be politically feasible (yet). See also Sadat, who writes about the fact that the ICC lacks a police force and who notes that "it was unthinkable to propose one either before or during Rome, although there was at least some interaction between the ICC and organisations is mentioned[37] is Article 54 of the ICC Statute ('Duties and powers of the Prosecutor with respect to investigations'). Paragraph 3 (c) of this article reads: "The Prosecutor may: (…) Seek the cooperation of any State or intergovernmental organization or arrangement in accordance with its respective competence and/or mandate".[38] The word "arrangement" has been added "to ensure that peacekeeping forces are included. Even in the absence of an express reference in Article 87(6), the Court is thus in a position to cooperate with all kinds of peacekeeping forces, acting within their mandate [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[39]

As it became clear from the experience of the ICTY that commanders in the field may be reluctant to arrest and surrender suspects, especially if the mandate of the peacekeeping force they are working for is rather ambiguous (see Section 2 of Chapter VI), it is evident and paramount that such a mandate be unequivocal and specific.[40]

Preferably, the aim should be to create an explicit obligation for troops to cooperate with the ICC, comparable with the mandates of UNTAES (Croatia), precedent for doing so [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Sadat 2002, p. 120.) With respect to the last point, Sadat hereby refers to Art. 25 ('International Constabulary'), para. 1 of the 1943 Draft Convention for the creation of an International Criminal Court of the London International Assembly, which states: "Near the Court there shall be a body of International Constabulary which will be charged with the execution of the orders of the Court and of the Procurator General." (Historical Survey of the Question of International Criminal Jurisdiction (Memorandum submitted by the Secretary-General), UNGA, ILC, Lake Success, New York, 1949, UN Doc. A/CN.4/7/Rev.1, available at: http://untreaty.un.org/ilc/documentation/english/a_cn4_7_rev1.pdf, p. 102.) Cf. finally C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), pp. 44-45.

---

[37] See also n. 27.

[38] Note that this provision is very broad and thus can include many forms of assistance, not only those related to arrest and surrender, but also those which have to do, for example, with the freezing of assets of suspects. Cf. also n. 300.

[39] Ciampi 2002, p. 1621. Kreß and Prost (2008 A, p. 1527) note, writing on the absence of the term 'arrangement' in Art. 87, para. 6 of the ICC Statute, that "[t]his omission was not deliberate so that the general rule of systematical interpretation should apply pursuant to which the complementary rules in Part 5 [This part is entitled 'Investigation and Prosecution', ChP] and Part 9 must be coherent. The Court is thus in a position to cooperate with all kinds of peacekeeping forces within the latter's mandates. (…) Such a cooperation may extend, in particular, to the arrest and surrender of a person [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Rastan 2008, p. 444.

[40] See also Scharf 2000, p. 964: "If the ICC is to act in the aftermath of international or internal conflicts, it is likely that United Nations or coalition peacekeeping forces will be deployed to areas where persons indicted by the ICC are located. Where these troops are commissioned by the U.N. Security Council or a specific peace agreement, they can be given the authority to arrest such persons pursuant to the ICC's arrest warrants. The experience of the ICTY, however, suggests that the force commanders will be reluctant to undertake this role. It is therefore important that the Security Council Resolution or peace agreement specifically give the troops the responsibility as well as the authority to make arrests – the more explicit the mandate for arresting war criminals, the better."

KFOR (Kosovo) and UNMIL (Liberia),[41] although it must also be admitted that this may not always be politically feasible.[42]

Such an obligation does not appear to exist in the current mandate of peacekeeping forces active in regions where ICC suspects are present. One example relates to the situation in Uganda and the case of the LRA leaders who are believed to move between northern Uganda, eastern DRC and southern Sudan.[43] In June 2006, (then) UNSG Annan issued a report[44] (already alluded to in this book)[45] in which he looked at the possibilities of UNMIS (the UN peacekeeping force in Sudan) and MONUC (the UN peacekeeping force in the DRC) countering the threat caused by the LRA, something of which the Prosecutor would, of course, very much be in favour.[46] In relation to UNMIS, Annan stated:

> UNMIS has no mandate to arrest and can only detain individuals who attack, or threaten to attack, United Nations personnel or installations or local populations within the immediate vicinity of United Nations installations. (…) Detainees would have to be immediately handed over to the Sudanese authorities. While the Sudan is not a State party to the Rome Statute, it has signed a memorandum of understanding with the International Criminal Court pledging to hand over the indicted LRA leaders to The Hague.[47]

Hence, the situation with UNMIS is clear: UNMIS soldiers have no mandate to arrest ICC suspects, although they can detain them and deliver them to national officials who will then surrender them to The Hague if these suspects (threaten to)

---

[41] See ns. 66 and 1174-1175 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[42] One would think that an extended mandate, in favour of the ICC, may be more easily reached in the case of a peacekeeping force under the authority of the EU (where every Member State is a party to the ICC Statute) than in the case of a peacekeeping force under the authority of the UN (where there are still many States not party to the Statute and even some opposing the Court). See also Ciampi 2006, p. 735, n. 47. Cf. finally C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 44, noting that an EU-led operation, because all EU States are parties to the ICC Statute, may have a duty to execute arrests.

[43] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Situation in Uganda, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Joseph Kony, Vincent Otti, Raska Lukwiya, Okot Odhiambo and Dominic Ongwen, 'Submission of Information on the Status of the Execution of the Warrants of Arrest in the Situation in Uganda' (Public Document), ICC-02/04-01/05, 6 October 2006, p. 2.

[44] Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to resolutions 1653 (2006) and 1663 (2006), 29 June 2006, S/2006/478.

[45] See n. 49 of Chapter I.

[46] See, for example, the following words from the ICC's Chief Prosecutor Moreno Ocampo, taken from the 'Eleventh Diplomatic Briefing of the International Criminal Court. Compilation of Statements', The Hague, 10 October 2007 (available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/E1900488-5437-4771-BA50-45271FD9AE72/278575/ICCDB11St_en_fr.pdf), p. 6: "Joseph Kony and the three other indicted commanders have become a regional power, threatening stability in the sub region. We ask all States parties to support collaborative efforts between the DRC and Uganda to address the issue of arrests; we hope that the support of MONUC will remain forthcoming."

[47] Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to resolutions 1653 (2006) and 1663 (2006), 29 June 2006, S/2006/478, para. 25.

attack UN personnel or installations or local populations within the immediate vicinity of UN installations. With respect to MONUC, Annan explained:

> Through resolution 1565 (2004) and subsequent resolutions, MONUC is mandated, inter alia, to use force to deter attacks that could threaten the political process and to ensure the protection of civilians. Acting in support of the Government of National Unity and Transition of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, it should also (…) assist in the promotion and protection of human rights; and continue to cooperate with efforts to ensure that those responsible for serious violations of human rights and international humanitarian law are brought to justice.[48]

Although this statement is still couched in fairly general terms, a few paragraphs later, the UNSG turns to the specific context of the ICC:

> MONUC is aware of its mandate to detain the LRA leaders who have been indicted by the International Criminal Court, and would seek to do so if it came across them while carrying out its mandated duties. The captured LRA leaders would have to be immediately handed over to the Congolese authorities who, since the Democratic Republic of the Congo is a State party to the Rome Statute and has other agreements with the Court, would then be expected to hand over the suspects for arraignment in The Hague.[49]

This language, which closely resembles the language of the North Atlantic Council's resolution of 16 December 1995 (see Section 2 of Chapter VI), stating that "IFOR should detain any persons indicted by the International Criminal Tribunal who come into contact with IFOR in its execution of assigned tasks", seems to mean that MONUC has certain duties, but that arresting and detaining ICC suspects is not one of them. However, if MONUC soldiers, in carrying out these duties, were to come across those suspects, they would be authorised, and indeed would try ("would seek"), to detain them. The detainees would then have to be handed over to the DRC authorities which in turn would have to surrender the suspects to the ICC.

Hence, although arrests are not excluded, they are not within the mandate (UNMIS) or within what MONUC actually should do. Arresting LRA leaders and surrendering them to the ICC is principally the responsibility of the States themselves.[50]

---

[48] Ibid., para. 27.
[49] Ibid., para. 31. See for more information also Rastan 2008, pp. 445-446.
[50] Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to resolutions 1653 (2006) and 1663 (2006), 29 June 2006, S/2006/478, paras. 51-52: "While recognizing the threat posed by LRA, I should like to reiterate that, since UNMIS and MONUC already have challenging tasks to perform in their respective areas of responsibility, they should channel their capacities and resources primarily to address those challenges. (…) Dealing with the regional implications of LRA activities lies within the area of national responsibility of the Governments in the region. UNMIS and MONUC can provide assistance, within their existing mandates and capabilities, but should not be seen as an alternative to authorities in the LRA-affected region in the maintenance of law and order."

Another example is linked to the conflict in Darfur, Sudan. The peacekeeping force employed in that region, the joint UN/AU force UNAMID, does not – much to the ICC's displeasure – have the authority, let alone the obligation, to arrest ICC suspects.[51]

A point which should also be mentioned in this context is the fact that although one should, of course, respect the mandate of the specific international force, one should also be careful that States, which may have strict obligations to arrest and surrender suspects, do not circumvent this obligation by deploying international forces with an ambiguous mandate.[52]

Finally, it must be stressed that the exact arrest procedures of peacekeeping forces, if they have the mandate to arrest suspects, is not very clear. In the remainder of this chapter, the crucial Article 59 of the ICC Statute ('Arrest proceedings in the custodial State') will be examined in detail. However, this provision focuses on arrests by national States alone, see its paragraph 1: "A State Party which has received a request for provisional arrest or for arrest and surrender shall immediately take steps to arrest the person in question in accordance with its laws and the provisions of Part 9."[53] Hall explains that a literal interpretation of Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute would lead to the following scenario:

---

[51] See 'UN decision on Darfur wins global applause', Agence France Presse, 1 August 2007 (available at: http://www.iccnow.org/?mod=newsdetail&news=1751): "The UN resolution authorises the UN-AU force to take 'the necessary action' to protect its personnel, ensure security and freedom of movement for humanitarian workers, prevent attacks and threats against civilians and back implementation of the Darfur Peace Agreement. However, it does not authorise foreign troops to pursue alleged war criminals sought by the International Criminal Court (ICC) – an omission that drew a sharp warning from the tribunal based in The Hague. 'We want to recall that the international community has called for these two arrests. This issue should not be ignored,' an advisor to ICC prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo, told AFP."

[52] See also Zhou 2006, p. 215 (writing on the context of the ICTY) who notes, after having referred to the in Chapter VI mentioned (see its n. 71 and accompanying text) quotation from the Todorović case about the purpose of Art. 29 of the ICTY Statute: "The Tribunal foresaw and, I believe, rightfully wanted to prevent the awkward situation in which individual states are compelled to execute arrest warrants but a collective entity comprising the membership of these same individual states could evade the same request for cooperation and judicial assistance." Zhou, however, also foresees some problems with the ICC in that respect for this latter Court has created a specific procedure for organisations whereas the ICTY in the Todorović case simply applied the general obligation to cooperate for States to international organisations. See ibid., p. 216: "[A]ssuming the ICC Statute would have been the governing statute in the former Yugoslavia and all NATO states members were also States Parties of the Rome Treaty, it would have ensued that the Tribunal would have power to issue and transmit an arrest warrant to a State Party like France but could only ask NATO for its cooperation in the arrest of indicted persons found in Pale in Eastern Bosnia, which was, at the time, a sector under the authority of the French NATO forces. (…) In my view, the vital importance of the role of intergovernmental organizations should have been reflected in the ICC Statute by treating them on the same footing as the individual states."

[53] See also Sluiter 2009, p. 468: "[I]t is unclear what legal regime applies to arrests performed by non-State entities, such as (peace-keeping) forces." Similarly, it is unclear what the role of the Prosecutor can be as concerns the execution of arrest warrants in unable States, see Hall 2008 B, p. 1151: "[I]t is not clear what the scope of the Prosecutor's powers is when taking specific investigative steps pursuant to article 57 para. 3 (d) when a State Party is unable to do so. Presumably, national legislation could permit staff of the Office of the Prosecutor to carry out arrests. As noted above, however, the Court is

> [M]ilitary police of a State Party (custodial State) serving in a peace-keeping operation might carry out an arrest in the territory of another State. A literal interpretation of paragraph 2 would suggest that the military police would have to send the arrested person promptly back to a court in the custodial State, both when the courts in the territorial State were open and when the judicial system has collapsed.[54]

However, Hall also notes that > a degree of flexibility in the implementation of article 59 that is consistent with the purpose of the Statute may be possible, such as bringing the person promptly before a court of the custodial State sitting in the State with jurisdiction where the person was arrested or prompt surrender to the Court, provided that the safeguards for the rights of the suspect, as envisaged in article 59, were fully respected and kidnapping in violation of international law was prohibited. In this respect, the Court should reject the approach of the ICTY in (…) [and then, reference is made to Dokmanović and the 2002 decision in Nikolić, ChP], to allegations that the accused was kidnapped in violation of international law.[55]

Of course, in the situation that the peacekeeping forces directly surrender the suspect to the ICC,[56] the judges of that latter Court must check, just as the national likely to be presented with a number of other novel situations not expressly addressed in article 59 [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." One of those novel situations will now be discussed in the main text.

---

[54] Ibid., p. 1151, n. 20.

[55] Ibid.

[56] Cf. Gillett 2008, p. 21, writing on "unable" States and suggesting agreements "between peacekeeping forces and the territorial State in which they were located, granting the former the authority to carry out arrests in the host state's territory. Ideally, such agreements would contain "assisted arrest" clauses allowing peace-keepers to execute arrest warrants and to hand the accused directly to the ICC in cases of substantial or total collapse of the State's judicial or governmental infrastructure." Gillett even proposes in this context the creation, by the ICC's ASP, of a multilateral reciprocal treaty, see ibid., p. 27: "The acceptance of ad hoc assisted arrest operations, while a positive development in the struggle to try those accused of the most serious crimes known to mankind, would not be an ideal long-term solution to the problem of impunity. To provide an ongoing, regulated basis for assisted arrests to be conducted in States unable to execute warrants through their own agents, the Assembly of State Parties of the ICC would need to conclude an assisted arrest agreement as a subsidiary instrument to the Rome Statute. Within this agreement, State Parties would provide a prior and continuing consent to assistance in executing ICC arrest warrants in situations where they are unable to do so through their own agents, and also would reciprocally agree to aide in the execution of ICC arrest warrants within other State Parties' territories, when those States are unable to do so [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Cf. also Rastan 2008, p. 454: "The 'unable' state could invite capable states or an international peacekeeping presence on its territory to assist it in fulfilling its duties towards the Court. Moreover, although the Court's non-compliance procedure is normally discussed with reference to a state's 'unwillingness' to co-operate, the Court could possibly treat 'inability' also as a failure to comply with a co-operation request. Rather than indicating the international wrongfulness of non-co-operation, the purpose of such a finding would be to invite the ASP or the Security Council, as appropriate, to consider the matter with a view to promoting co-operation. Such considerations may, for example, take the form of the Security Council modifying the mandate of relevant peacekeeping operations to enable regional co-operation and co-ordination with a territorial state that is willing but otherwise unable to perform arrest and authority would do in normal situations (see infra), whether the arrest and detention was properly executed and whether the suspect's rights were respected (among other things).

Going back to the three situations where non-States Parties to the ICC Statute may be obliged to cooperate, the first of these is when the UNSC simply determines that this should be so. This can, for example, be the case if the Council, through a resolution based on Chapter VII of the UN Charter, has referred a situation to the ICC pursuant to Article 13 (b) of the ICC Statute,[57] in which it decides that States not party to the Statute must also cooperate with the ICC.[58] For example, in the previously mentioned (see Section 2 of Chapter VI) UNSC Resolution 1593 of 31 March 2005, the UNSC referred the situation of Darfur, Sudan to the ICC. The relevant section of this resolution reads:

> The Security Council, (...) Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, 1. Decides to refer the situation in Darfur since 1 July 2002 to the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court; 2. Decides that the Government of Sudan and all other parties to the conflict in Darfur, shall cooperate fully with and provide any necessary assistance to the Court and the Prosecutor pursuant to this resolution and, while recognizing that States not party to the Rome Statute have no surrender operations, or may lead to the exertion of political pressure through issue-linkage to secure co-operation from a hitherto 'unwilling' state [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), pp. 42-43, writing on the situation of arrests by peacekeeping forces in unwilling States: "One could (…) easily imagine a Yugoslavia- or Sudan-like situation of international troops being deployed in a certain area, and the local authorities opposing this deployment and any arrest the troops may effectuate. For such a situation, a direct transfer from international custody to ICC custody, without the State acting as an intermediary, appears desirable. There is no legal basis in the State-centered Statute for such a method, though. If the territorial State is indeed not willing to cooperate, a possible solution could however be for the international forces to have the arrestee first transferred to a State that is willing to cooperate. After all, persons could be surrendered to the ICC by any State on the territory of which that person may be found, arguably irrespective of how their presence on that territory was brought about. In order to forestall challenges to the legality of such a detour, a UN Security Council resolution authorizing the transfer by international forces may possibly be sought [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

---

[57] "The Court may exercise its jurisdiction with respect to a crime referred to in article 5 in accordance with the provisions of this Statute if: (...) (b) A situation in which one or more of such crimes appears to have been committed is referred to the Prosecutor by the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations". This is one of the three possibilities for the ICC to exercise jurisdiction. The other two are a State referral (see Artt. 13 (a) and 14 of the ICC Statute) and a proprio motu investigation of the Prosecutor (see Artt. 13 (c) and 15 of the ICC Statute).

[58] As argued earlier (see Section 2 of Chapter VI), the referral as such does not seem to create a duty of cooperation for all UN Member States with the ICC. This arguably depends on the exact content of the decision. Note, by the way, that the UNSC may also determine that non-States Parties have to cooperate with the ICC, even if the Council has not referred a case itself to the ICC, see Ciampi 2002, p. 1611: "[A]n obligation to cooperate with the Court could also be imposed by the Security Council in cases referred to the Court by a State or initiated by the Prosecutor proprio motu should the Security Council decide that cooperation with the Court is needed in a situation amounting to a threat to the peace."

> obligation under the Statute, urges all States and concerned regional and other international organizations to cooperate fully (…) [emphasis in original, ChP].

In other words, Sudan is also under a legal obligation to cooperate with the ICC, even though that State is not a party to the ICC.[59] The same goes for the States which can be considered "parties to the conflict in Darfur" – States which may not have ratified the ICC Statute either.

The second situation in which there exists an obligation for a State not party to the ICC Statute to cooperate is if such a State a) accepts the jurisdiction of the ICC on an ad hoc basis with respect to a particular crime (see Article 12, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute),[60] or b) cooperates with the ICC "on the basis of an ad hoc arrangement, an agreement (...) or any other appropriate basis".[61] In both cases, the non-State Party has a duty to cooperate with the ICC. This is clear with respect to Article 12, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute,[62] but less so with respect to the situation under b, pursuant to Article 87, paragraph 5 (a) of the ICC Statute, which does not explicitly mention such a duty. Nevertheless, as States cooperating under Article 87, paragraph 5 (a) of the ICC Statute are confronted by a comparable[63] sanctions

---

[59] Note, however, that the UNSC does not state that other States not party to the ICC Statute (besides Sudan and those States which are not party to the ICC but which are involved in the conflict in Darfur) must cooperate with the ICC. It is therefore not very accurate to state: "The statement in Resolution 1593 ''that the Government of Sudan and all other parties to the conflict in Darfur shall co-operate fully with and provide any necessary assistance to the Court and the Prosecutor pursuant to this resolution'' clearly shows that all non-party states, including Sudan, must co-operate with and assist the ICC accordingly [emphasis added, ChP]." (Zhu 2006, p. 92.) (Unless Zhu, when speaking of "all non-party states", is, of course, only referring to the parties to the conflict in Darfur. In that case, it is true that all States have an obligation to cooperate with the ICC, whether they are parties to the ICC or not.)

[60] "If the acceptance of a State which is not a Party to this Statute is required under paragraph 2, that State may, by declaration lodged with the Registrar, accept the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court with respect to the crime in question. The accepting State shall cooperate with the Court without any delay or exception in accordance with Part 9." This was done by Côte d'Ivoire in 2003, see ICC, Press Release, 'Registrar confirms that the Republic of Côte d'Ivoire has accepted the jurisdiction of the Court', 15 February 2005, ICC-CPI-20050215-91, available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/exeres/FA0D49A0-69D4-4676-9E77-567B25321CBA.htm.

[61] Art. 87, para. 5 (a) of the ICC Statute.

[62] See the last sentence of this provision: "The accepting State shall cooperate with the Court without any delay or exception in accordance with Part 9." Palmisano 1999, p. 393, states about this issue: "This means that once a State has accepted the Court's jurisdiction over a specific case, this State should no longer be considered a third State, as its position becomes equivalent to that of a State party to the Statute. (...) From the standpoint of its legal qualification, Art. 12(3) should be considered a treaty stipulation in favour of third States. This provision allows, in fact, third States interested in effectively prosecuting a given crime, to accede, in relation to that crime only, to the judicial mechanism provided for by the Statute, on condition that they expressly accept the Court's jurisdiction and the obligation of cooperation and judicial assistance set out in Part 9 of the Statute [original footnote omitted, ChP]." That would thus also mean that in the case of non-cooperation, the sanctions mechanism for 'normal' State Parties (see para. 7 of Art. 87 of the ICC Statute) would also be applicable to the 'accepting State'. Schabas is, however, not sure about this, see Schabas 2004, p. 77.

[63] The mechanism is not identical as can be seen in the following two footnotes. See also Zhu 2006, pp. 107-108, where he argues and explains that "[t]he distinction (...) shows the somewhat differing obligations, in terms of co-operation, of states parties and states not party to the Rome Statute." (Ibid., p. 107.) See also Ciampi 2002, p. 1633: "The reason for the difference in wording is the belief of some mechanism[64] as States Parties are in the case of non-cooperation,[65] it may be concluded that the former also have a duty to cooperate.[66] [67]

A third, and more 'external', duty to cooperate with the ICC for non-State Parties (but then only with respect to a specific category of war crimes) may be found in the Geneva Conventions, whose provisions must be complied with by delegations that weaker language should be used with respect to States not parties to the Statute. It is not easy, though, to find a solid justification for a distinction in substance as the non-cooperating State infringes its obligations in both cases [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

---

[64] See para. 5 (b) of Art. 87 of the ICC Statute: "Where a State not party to this Statute, which has entered into an ad hoc arrangement or an agreement with the Court, fails to cooperate with requests pursuant to any such arrangement or agreement, the Court may so inform the Assembly of States Parties or, where the Security Council referred the matter to the Court, the Security Council."

[65] See para. 7 of Art. 87 of the ICC Statute: "Where a State Party fails to comply with a request to cooperate by the Court contrary to the provisions of this Statute, thereby preventing the Court from exercising its functions and powers under this Statute, the Court may make a finding to that effect and refer the matter to the Assembly of States Parties or, where the Security Council referred the matter to the Court, to the Security Council." See for more information on this provision, Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 615-616.

[66] See also Ciampi 2002, p. 1617: "When an ad hoc arrangement with respect to the investigation and prosecution of a given crime within the jurisdiction of the Court or an agreement to cooperate with the Court in a wider set of cases is concluded with a State not party, such a State undertakes an international obligation to cooperate with the Court vis-à-vis all States Parties to the Statute. (...) [T]his State is free to determine how far it is prepared to go in assuming an obligation to arrest and surrender. The extent of the obligation to cooperate will depend on the content of the agreement. In this respect, however, it seems hardly likely that a non-party State will bind itself to an obligation which is broader in scope than that provided for under the Statute for State Parties. The third State will probably accept to cooperate with the Court to a more limited extent, e.g. by only undertaking to give some, but not all, forms of cooperation specified under Part 9 [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Zhu 2006, p. 107.

[67] Note, however, that the sanctions mechanism of Art. 87, para. 5 (b) of the ICC Statute and the quotation of Ciampi in the previous footnote only speak of a non-State Party which has entered into an ad hoc arrangement or an agreement with the ICC. Does there also exist a duty to cooperate with respect to a non-State Party which has been invited by the ICC to cooperate on "any other appropriate basis"? On the one hand, one could argue that the non-reference to cooperation on "any other appropriate basis" implies that a non-State Party cooperating with the ICC on another basis than an ad hoc arrangement or an agreement does not have a duty to cooperate. On the other hand, one could also read these two paragraphs in context and argue that the sanctions mechanism of Art. 87, para. 5 (b) of the ICC Statute only mentions the two clearest examples of Art. 87, para. 5 (a) of the ICC Statute but that this does not mean that the safety net of Art. 87, para. 5 (a) of the ICC Statute (namely cooperation on "any other appropriate basis") is not covered by the sanctions mechanism of Art. 87, para. 5 (b) of the ICC Statute (meaning that a State cooperating on that basis also has a duty to cooperate). That a State cooperating on "any other appropriate basis" has a duty to cooperate is also confirmed by Condorelli and Ciampi. They argue: "As is well known, according to Article 86 and subsequent provisions laid down in Part IX of the Rome Statute, states party to the Statute are under an obligation to cooperate with the Court. As a treaty-based obligation, this obligation is not binding upon third states, unless they have agreed to cooperate with the Court by way of a declaration of acceptance of the jurisdiction of the Court or on an ad hoc arrangement or agreement with the Court. However, states not party to the Statute may also be brought under an international obligation to cooperate with the Court by 'any other appropriate basis'. And such an 'appropriate basis' could be provided by a resolution of the Security Council under Article 41 of the UN Charter, imposing obligations upon all Member States to apply measures to give effect to SC decisions [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Condorelli and Ciampi 2005, p. 593.)

every State in the world.[68] Common Article 1 of the Geneva Conventions reads that "[t]he High Contracting Parties undertake to respect and to ensure respect for the present Convention in all circumstances". Furthermore, the Geneva Conventions also make it clear that States have a certain duty with respect to the perpetrators of grave breaches of the Conventions,[69] also known as war criminals.[70]

> Each High Contracting Party shall be under the obligation to search for persons alleged to have committed, or to have ordered to be committed, such grave breaches, and shall bring such persons, regardless of their nationality, before its own courts. It may also, if it prefers, and in accordance with the provisions of its own legislation, hand such persons over for trial to another High Contracting Party concerned, provided such High Contracting Party has made out a prima facie case.[71]

This universally accepted aut dedere aut iudicare obligation with respect to grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions[72] might be read broadly so that the term dedere would not necessarily be limited to other States but would also apply to an international institution such as the ICC. That would mean that States have a duty either to prosecute suspects of those grave breaches or hand them over (dedere) to [68] If not because a certain State is a party to these Conventions, then surely because the Conventions can be seen as reflecting customary international law, applicable to any State. See Zhu 2006, p. 92.

---

[69] For GC I (Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field of August 12, 1949), see its Art. 50: "Grave breaches to which the preceding Article relates shall be those involving any of the following acts, if committed against persons or property protected by the Convention: wilful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, including biological experiments, wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, and extensive destruction and appropriation of property, not justified by military necessity and carried out unlawfully and wantonly." For GC II (Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea of August 12, 1949), see its Art. 51. (The text is the same as that of Art. 50 GC I.) For GC III (Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War of August 12, 1949), see its Art. 130: "Grave breaches to which the preceding Article relates shall be those involving any of the following acts, if committed against persons or property protected by the Convention: wilful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, including biological experiments, wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, compelling a prisoner of war to serve in the forces of the hostile Power, or wilfully depriving a prisoner of war of the rights of fair and regular trial prescribed in this Convention." For GC IV (Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of August 12, 1949), see its Art. 147: "Grave breaches to which the preceding Article relates shall be those involving any of the following acts, if committed against persons or property protected by the present Convention: wilful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, including biological experiments, wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, unlawful deportation or transfer or unlawful confinement of a protected person, compelling a protected person to serve in the forces of a hostile Power, or wilfully depriving a protected person of the rights of fair and regular trial prescribed in the present Convention, taking of hostages and extensive destruction and appropriation of property, not justified by military necessity and carried out unlawfully and wantonly."

[70] See also International Committee of the Red Cross, International Humanitarian Law. Answers to your Questions, Geneva, October 2002 (available at: http://www.icrc.org/Web/Eng/siteeng0.nsf/htmlall/p0703/$File/ICRC_002_0703.PDF!Open), p. 35.

[71] Artt. 49 GC I, 50 GC II, 129 GC III and 146 GC IV.

[72] See also n. 162 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

States or the ICC.[73] Even if such a broad reading of the Geneva Conventions were dismissed, it could be argued that the words "to ensure respect" are so broadly formulated that they could encompass a duty to cooperate with the ICC. It seems that Zhu adheres to this idea when he states:

> While legal obligations are created on the basis of the principle that it is necessary to "ensure respect" "in all circumstances," it is still not very clear from the four Geneva Conventions which steps states should take and through which procedures. However, one of the objectives of establishing the ICC is to pursue serious violations of the 1949 Geneva Conventions. States not party to the ICC but party to the Geneva Conventions are obliged to "ensure respect" "in all circumstances"; this includes the extended obligation to co-operate with the ICC. In any event, the obligation to co-operate should be understood as requiring nonparty states at least to make an effort not to block actions taken by the ICC to punish or prevent serious violations of the Geneva Conventions.[74]

[73] Cf. also Swart 2002 C, p. 1688: "It is widely held that the relevant provisions of the Geneva Conventions do not exclude handing over the accused to an international criminal court whose competence has been recognized by the Contracting Parties. In this approach, surrender of an accused to an international court constitutes compliance with the treaty obligation to extradite or prosecute [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[74] Zhu 2006, p. 94. Cf. also Ciampi 2002, p. 1609: "One may argue that, according to current customary international law, all States are under an obligation to cooperate at least with respect to some of the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court (e.g. in relation to war crimes set out in the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, the provisions of which are generally held to correspond to customary rules). But it is doubtful whether a general rule of this kind – were it deemed to exist under customary international law – may imply an obligation to comply with requests by the Court for cooperation outside the Statute framework, for States which do not become a party to it [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally Kaul and Kreß 2000, p. 172 ("[T]he obligation of all states under customary international law not only to respect but also to ensure the respect of international humanitarian law adds a useful complement to the cooperation regime [original footnotes omitted, ChP].") and Palmisano 1999, pp. 420-421: "An obligation to cooperate with the ICC (or, better, with the States parties to the Rome Statute acting together by means of the ICC) may in fact deem to be inherent in the decision of the States parties to such conventions [Palmisano here mentions conventions such as the Geneva Conventions, the Torture Convention, the Genocide Convention and the Apartheid Convention (the latter two will be discussed in the main text in a few moments), ChP] to realize advanced forms of international cooperation in criminal matters, in order to achieve a better prevention and repression of the relevant crimes in comparison with the prevention and repression which is usually achieved unilaterally by each State or by means of bilateral (State-to-State) channels of extradition and mutual judicial assistance. In other words, these States consider clearly it to be in their common interest, and in the interest of the international community as a whole, to prosecute persons accused of war crimes or crimes against humanity in an international coordinated way. States which have solemnly accepted multilateral treaty provisions aimed at achieving prevention and punishment of specific crimes by means of international cooperation and judicial assistance cannot therefore refuse in good faith their assistance to other States parties to the same conventions, only because these latter States have decided to prosecute the crimes in question, in given cases and under particular conditions, by means of a common judicial organ [original footnote omitted, ChP]." In his footnote, Palmisano also refers to UNGA Res. 3074 (XXVII) of 3 December 1973 ('Principles of international co-operation in the detection, arrest, extradition and punishment of persons guilty of war crimes and crimes against humanity') in which the UNGA stated, among other things, in para. 4 that "States shall assist each other in detecting, arresting and bringing to trial persons suspected of having committed such crimes".

In this respect, one should also mention the UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Genocide Convention)[75] and the UN Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid (Apartheid Convention).[76] These conventions are even more specific in providing the possibility, in Articles VI and V respectively, that persons charged with genocide/apartheid[77] shall/may[78] be tried by an international penal tribunal which has jurisdiction over these crimes with respect to those States which have accepted that tribunal's jurisdiction.[79] Obviously, the ICC could be that international penal tribunal. However, States which are not party to the ICC Statute would then still need to accept the jurisdiction of the ICC, for example, through the previously mentioned Article 12, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute.[80] "The real importance of these conventions",[81] Swart therefore notes, "lies elsewhere":[82]

> They both oblige all Parties to punish persons who have committed crimes of genocide or apartheid on their territory. It would seem that the parties to the conventions may be considered to have complied with that obligation by accepting the jurisdiction of the Court in the case at hand and surrendering the person concerned to the Court.[83]

---

[75] Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, approved and proposed for signature and ratification or accession by General Assembly resolution 260 A (III) of 9 December 1948 (entered into force: 12 January 1951).

[76] International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, adopted and opened for signature, ratification by General Assembly resolution 3068 (XXVIII) of 30 November 1973 (entered into force: 18 July 1976).

[77] The crime of apartheid also falls within the jurisdiction of the ICC, namely as a crime against humanity, see Art. 7, paras. 1 (j) and 2 (h) of the ICC Statute.

[78] The verb "shall" is used in the Genocide Convention, whereas the verb "may" is used in the Apartheid Convention.

[79] Art. VI of the Genocide Convention reads: "Persons charged with genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in article III shall be tried by a competent tribunal of the State in the territory of which the act was committed, or by such international penal tribunal as may have jurisdiction with respect to those Contracting Parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction." Art. V of the Apartheid Convention reads: "Persons charged with the acts enumerated in article II of the present Convention may be tried by a competent tribunal of any State Party to the Convention which may acquire jurisdiction over the person of the accused or by an international penal tribunal having jurisdiction with respect to those States Parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction."

[80] See Swart 2002 C, p. 1687: "As long as they have not done so, it is not possible to construe a direct obligation for them to surrender persons to the Court on the basis of the two UN conventions." However, Palmisano (1999, pp. 421-423) is of the opinion that "the obligation of cooperation and judicial assistance should include, in our view, the duty upon all States parties, including those which are not parties to the Rome Statute, to cooperate directly with an organ like the ICC and upon its direct request. (…) [I]n all cases (…) an express refusal to cooperate directly with the Court, or any clear lack of good faith in granting judicial assistance to it, would constitute, in our view, a violation by third States which are parties to instruments such as the Genocide Convention or the Apartheid Convention, of the obligation to afford the greatest measure of mutual cooperation and judicial assistance imposed by them."

[81] Swart 2002 C, p. 1687.

[82] Ibid.

[83] Ibid.

It may be interesting in this context to look at the 2007 Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro case before the ICJ. In this case, Bosnia and Herzegovina requested the Court to adjudge and declare

> [t]hat Serbia and Montenegro has violated and is violating its obligations under the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide for having failed and for failing to punish acts of genocide or any other act prohibited by the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, and for having failed and for failing to transfer individuals accused of genocide or any other act prohibited by the Convention to the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and to fully co-operate with this Tribunal.[84]

This is an implicit reference to the above-mentioned (see footnote 79) Article VI of the Genocide Convention.[85] Although the ICJ concluded that Serbia[86] "cannot be charged with not having tried before its own courts those accused of having participated in the Srebrenica genocide" (for Srebrenica is not located in the territory of Serbia),[87] it did state that Serbia had violated other obligations stemming from the Convention. It explained that once an international penal tribunal, such as the ICTY,[88] has been established, > Article VI obliges the Contracting Parties "which shall have accepted its jurisdiction" to co-operate with it, which implies that they will arrest persons accused of genocide who are in their territory – even if the crime of which they are accused was committed outside it – and, failing prosecution of them in the parties' own courts, that they will hand them over for trial by the competent international tribunal.[89]

This is what Serbia had not done,[90] and by failing to comply, Serbia became the first State in history to violate the Genocide Convention.[91] The considerations of the

---

[84] ICJ, Case Concerning the Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro), 'Judgment', 26 February 2007, para. 440.
[85] See ibid., para. 441.
[86] The proceedings were initially instituted against the FRY, but as from February 2003 (after a change of that State's name), the Respondent was Serbia and Montenegro and finally, as from 3 June 2006 (after the independence of Montenegro), the Respondent was the Republic of Serbia, see ibid., para. 1.
[87] Ibid., para. 442. See also ibid.: "Article VI only obliges the Contracting Parties to institute and exercise territorial criminal jurisdiction; while it certainly does not prohibit States, with respect to genocide, from conferring jurisdiction on their criminal courts based on criteria other than where the crime was committed which are compatible with international law, in particular the nationality of the accused, it does not oblige them to do so."
[88] See ibid., para. 445.
[89] Ibid., para. 443.
[90] See ibid., paras. 448-449. The ICJ hereby paid special attention to the role of General Mladić (see ibid., para. 448): "[T]he Court cannot but attach a certain weight to the plentiful, and mutually corroborative, information suggesting that General Mladić, indicted by the ICTY for genocide, as one of those principally responsible for the Srebrenica massacres, was on the territory of the Respondent at least on several occasions and for substantial periods during the last few years and is still there now, without the Serb authorities doing what they could and can reasonably do to ascertain exactly where he

ICJ in this case certainly leave room for arguing that the ICC would also come under the definition of 'international penal tribunal'. In fact, the ICC seems to fit the probable intention of the Genocide Convention's drafters even more closely than the ICTY.[92]

On a final note and moving away from specific treaties, it may be worth mentioning that Swart notes that "[t]here can be little doubt that customary international law imposes a primary duty on States which have themselves been implicated in international crimes to repress them. Surrender of the alleged offenders to the Court may free them from that obligation."[93] However, as mentioned by Swart, it must be borne in mind that in that case, the aut dedere (to perhaps the ICC) aut iudicare obligation only applies to States which are themselves implicated in those international crimes: "It is, however, more open to doubt whether the obligation to extradite or prosecute has become a rule of jus cogens with regard to other States [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[94]

Now that a few characteristics of the ICC's general cooperation regime have been presented, the next section will focus on the more specific arrest and surrender provisions.

3 THE ARREST AND SURRENDER REGIME

3.1 The arrest and surrender regime Part I

However, before doing that, it is worth pointing out that the ICC regime speaks of surrender (meaning "the delivering up of a person by a State to the Court, pursuant to this Statute")[95] and not of extradition (meaning "the delivering up of a person by

---

is living and arrest him. In particular, counsel for the Applicant referred during the hearings to recent statements made by the Respondent's Minister for Foreign Affairs, reproduced in the national press in April 2006, and according to which the intelligence services of that State knew where Mladić was living in Serbia, but refrained from informing the authorities competent to order his arrest because certain members of those services had allegedly remained loyal to the fugitive. The authenticity and accuracy of those statements has not been disputed by the Respondent at any time."

[91] See ibid., para. 471: "The Court, (…) by fourteen votes to one, Finds that Serbia has violated its obligations under the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide by having failed to transfer Ratko Mladić, indicted for genocide and complicity in genocide, for trial by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, and thus having failed to co-operate with that Tribunal".

[92] See ibid., para. 445: "The notion of an "international penal tribunal" within the meaning of Article VI must at least cover all international criminal courts created after the adoption of the Convention (at which date no such court existed) of potentially universal scope, and competent to try the perpetrators of genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in Article III. The nature of the legal instrument by which such a court is established is without importance in this respect. When drafting the Genocide Convention, its authors probably thought that such a court would be created by treaty: a clear pointer to this lies in the reference to "those Contracting Parties which shall have accepted [the] jurisdiction" of the international penal tribunal [emphasis added, ChP]."

[93] Swart 2002 C, p. 1688.

[94] Ibid. Nevertheless, "it may well acquire that character in the future." (Ibid., p. 1663.)

[95] Art. 102 (a) of the ICC Statute.

one State to another as provided by treaty, convention or national legislation").[96] This difference goes beyond mere semantics and shows that the term extradition (deriving from the horizontal context), including all its characteristics, does not apply to the ICC regime.[97] Examples in that respect are the refusal to extradite

[96] Art. 102 (b) of the ICC Statute.

[97] In the words of Sluiter: "The purpose of this distinction is to ensure that traditional extradition law is not applicable, mutatis mutandis, to the special surrender regime. The application of traditional extradition law creates a number of obstacles to the effective and expeditious capture of war criminals. For this reason, the ICTY and ICTR statutes and rules consistently avoid the term "extradition," and instead use the word "transfer" or "surrender." (...) The drafting history illustrates that the distinction between surrender and extradition was not simply about terminology and "legal sophistry." The entire ICC legal assistance law, in addition to the ICC surrender regime, aspired to base itself on different principles and content when compared to traditional cooperation models between sovereign states [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 607-609.) See also Swart 2002 C, p. 1678: "Article 102 has been included in the Statute in order to make clear that the handing over of a person to the International Criminal Court is fundamentally different in nature from the handing over of a person within the framework of extradition between States." See also Maogoto 2004, p. 120, Prost 2005, p. 81 and Ciampi 2006, p. 721. Cf. also the terminology used in the context of the EAW (Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), OJ L 190/1 of 18 July 2002, available at: http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=OJ:L:2002:190:0001:0018:EN:PDF.) Here also, the concept of surrender was introduced to make clear that the regime of the European Arrest Warrant could not be compared with the normal extradition context, see para. 5 of the above-mentioned Framework Decision: "The objective set for the Union to become an area of freedom, security and justice leads to abolishing extradition between Member States and replacing it by a system of surrender between judicial authorities." (See also Vierucci 2004, p. 279.) See on this point also Deen-Racsmány (2007, p. 175), who makes a comparison between ICC surrender and surrender under the EAW. In contrast to the other authors mentioned above, she believes that "[u]nlike the EAW, apart from proscribing a (semantic) distinction between 'extradition' and 'surrender' in Article 102, the ICC Statute does not evidence any intention to establish substantially new procedures. Indirectly, it even confirms the applicability of procedures existing under domestic (extradition) law to surrendering the accused to the Court [original footnote omitted, ChP]". The provisions to which she refers (Artt. 89 and 91 of the ICC Statute) to back her assertion will be further discussed infra. To mention a final interesting point on the interaction between the ICC and the EAW: note that the EAW, although it cannot be used directly between EU Member States and the ICC, can be used between EU Member States themselves. As such, it will not only be useful in national efforts to prosecute 'ICC crimes' (see Art. 2, para. 2, 30th indent of the EAW: "The following offences, if they are punishable in the issuing Member State by a custodial sentence or a detention order for a maximum period of at least three years and as they are defined by the law of the issuing Member State, shall, under the terms of this Framework Decision and without verification of the double criminality of the act, give rise to surrender pursuant to a European arrest warrant: (...) crimes within the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court") – this is the idea of the ICC's complementarity principle – it may also be helpful with respect to efforts by the ICC to prosecute the crimes over which it has jurisdiction. In the words of Vierucci: "[A]lthough the Court may transmit a request for the arrest and surrender of a person 'to any state on the territory of which that person may be found', between the moment of transmission of the ICC request and its execution within the state, the person sought out might have crossed that state's boundaries to escape apprehension. This is likely to occur in the EU territory, given the principle and practice of free circulation of persons. In such circumstances, the EAW may constitute an effective means for an EU Member State to locate and apprehend a person wanted by the Court who has taken refuge within the EU boundaries. For example, if the Court requests Spain to hand over a national who happens to be on the territory of another EU member, the requested state, instead of simply notifying the Court that its national is no longer on its territory, may have recourse to the EAW in order to track nationals,[98] the refusal to extradite persons accused of having committed political offences and the double criminality requirement.[99] This clearly points to a vertical rather than a horizontal regime.[100]

Now, with respect to the substantive arrest and surrender provisions, the first important provision (in the ICC Statute)[101] dealing with the arrest and surrender regime is Article 58 of the ICC Statute ('Issuance by the Pre-Trial Chamber of a warrant of arrest or a summons to appear'). If the Pre-Trial Chamber, on the application of the Prosecutor,[102] is satisfied that 1) there are reasonable grounds to believe that a certain person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court[103] and 2) the arrest of this person appears necessary,[104] it shall issue a (possibly sealed)[105] warrant of arrest.[106] Such an arrest warrant must contain down, arrest and have the person surrendered, if necessary, through the Schengen Informatic System or Interpol [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Vierucci 2004, p. 277.)

---

[98] See, however, Deen-Racsmány (2007, p. 190): "The semantic distinction between 'surrender' and 'extradition', the fact that the ICC is not a state, or even the nature and purpose of the ICC may not suffice to render a constitutional ban on the extradition of nationals inapplicable."

[99] The fact that these grounds for refusal can be invoked at the horizontal level also shows that the obligation to cooperate/extradite in that context is limited and incomparable with the obligation to cooperate/surrender in the ICC context. For more information on the question as to why these grounds for refusal are and should be invalid in the context of the ICC, see Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 636-642. For the sake of completeness, it may be good to note that the ICC Statute does contain, however, the (inter-State extradition) exception of speciality, see Art. 101 of the ICC Statute. Nevertheless, it should also be noted that this is not a real ground to refuse surrender. "Rather, it imposes conditions on the legal consequences of surrender." (Ibid., p. 643.) For criticism related to the inclusion of this exception in the ICC Statute, see ibid., pp. 643-644 and Swart 2002 B, p. 1596 (or Swart 2002 C, pp. 1698-1701).

[100] See Kreß and Prost 2008 C, p. 1646 (writing on the reasons why the distinction extradition/surrender was made): "Such a clear distinction at the terminological level should, as was the underlying thinking, at the same time contribute to a growing awareness on the national level for the substantial differences between horizontal and vertical cooperation [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[101] Although this study will, where necessary, also look at the relevant provisions of the ICC RPE, the focus is on the ICC Statute. Cf. also Swart 2002 C, p. 1677, who notes that "the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (…) have a role to play, albeit a very modest one, apparently." (At the time Swart wrote his piece, the ICC RPE were not yet adopted.)

[102] This application must contain: "(a) The name of the person and any other relevant identifying information; (b) A specific reference to the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court which the person is alleged to have committed; (c) A concise statement of the facts which are alleged to constitute those crimes; (d) A summary of the evidence and any other information which establish reasonable grounds to believe that the person committed those crimes; and (e) The reason why the Prosecutor believes that the arrest of the person is necessary." (Art. 58, para. 2 of the ICC Statute.)

[103] See Art. 58, para. 1 (a) of the ICC Statute.

[104] See Art. 58, para. 1 (b) of the ICC Statute. This may be the case "(i) To ensure the person's appearance at trial; (ii) To ensure that the person does not obstruct or endanger the investigation or the court proceedings; or (iii) Where applicable, to prevent the person from continuing with the commission of that crime or a related crime which is within the jurisdiction of the Court and which arises out of the same circumstances." (Ibid.)

[105] In all the three ICC male captus cases discussed in this book (Lubanga Dyilo, Bemba Gombo and Katanga), the ICC used this technique stemming from the context of the UN ad hoc Tribunals, see ns. 1, 297 and 367 and accompanying text of Chapter X. Schabas (2007, p. 261) notes, however, that "[t]here is no explicit authorisation in the Statute or the Rules for issuance of sealed warrants, and in making the rules the Pre-Trial Chambers have cited no basis for this."

(a) The name of the person and any other relevant identifying information; (b) A specific reference to the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court for which the person's arrest is sought; and (c) A concise statement of the facts which are alleged to constitute those crimes.[107]

Alongside an arrest warrant, the Pre-Trial Chamber may also issue a summons to appear.[108] This is a less drastic measure to make a person appear before the ICC: although it may restrict a person's liberty,[109] it does not involve arrest and detention, cf. also footnote 2. Thus, a summons to appear, which, by the way, contains comparable requirements to those of an arrest warrant,[110] gives the suspect a chance to 'voluntarily'[111] go to The Hague.

---

[106] Note that, in contrast to the situation at the ICTY/ICTR, the ICC does not require the confirmation of the indictment (but only the reasonable grounds threshold) before arrest warrants can be issued, see n. 50 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. Sluiter (2006 A, p. 152) is of the opinion that "[t]his change in procedure is to be commended" for "[i]t avoids the need for numerous and confusing subsequent amendments in the indictment."

[107] Art. 58, para. 3 of the ICC Statute.

[108] See Art. 58, para. 7 of the ICC Statute: "As an alternative to seeking a warrant of arrest, the Prosecutor may submit an application requesting that the Pre-Trial Chamber issue a summons for the person to appear. If the Pre-Trial Chamber is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person committed the crime alleged and that a summons is sufficient to ensure the person's appearance, it shall issue the summons, with or without conditions restricting liberty (other than detention) if provided for by national law, for the person to appear."

[109] One could hereby think of the measure that: "(a) The person must not travel beyond territorial limits set by the Pre-Trial Chamber without the explicit agreement of the Chamber; (b) The person must not go to certain places or associate with certain persons as specified by the Pre-Trial Chamber; (c) The person must not contact directly or indirectly victims or witnesses; (d) The person must not engage in certain professional activities; (e) The person must reside at a particular address as specified by the Pre-Trial Chamber; (f) The person must respond when summoned by an authority or qualified person designated by the Pre-Trial Chamber; (g) The person must post bond or provide real or personal security or surety for which the amount and the schedule and mode of payment shall be determined by the Pre-Trial Chamber; (h) The person must supply the Registrar with all identity documents, particularly his or her passport." (Rule 119, para. 1 of the ICC RPE.)

[110] See Art. 58, para. 7 of the ICC Statute: "The summons shall contain: (a) The name of the person and any other relevant identifying information; (b) The specified date on which the person is to appear; (c) A specific reference to the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court which the person is alleged to have committed; and (d) A concise statement of the facts which are alleged to constitute the crime."

[111] Although this word was used by the ICC judges themselves ("In the Chamber's view, the issue raised by article 58 of the Statute is whether or not the arrests of these persons appear to be necessary. The application of article 58(7) of the Statute is restricted to cases in which the person can and will appear voluntarily before the Court without the necessity of presenting a request for arrest and surrender as provided for in articles 89 and 91 of the Statute." (ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Ahmad Muhammad Harun ("Ahmad Harun") and Ali Muhammad Ali Abd-Al-Rahman ("Ali Kushayb"), 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Article 58(7) of the Statute' (Public), ICC-02/05-01/07, 27 April 2007, para. 117)), one can wonder how 'voluntary' the coming to The Hague of people summoned to appear really is. The formulation of Art. 60, para. 1 of the ICC Statute may also confirm this: "Upon the surrender of the person to the Court, or the person's appearance before the Court voluntarily or pursuant to a summons, the Pre-Trial Chamber shall satisfy itself that the person has been informed of the crimes which he or she is alleged to have committed, and of his or her rights under this Statute, including the right to apply for interim release pending trial [emphasis added, ChP]." See also Ciampi 2006, p. 720: "According to the Statute,

An example of the correlation between an arrest warrant and a summons to appear can be found in the case of the Sudanese suspects Ahmad Harun and Ali Kushayb.

In his application in this case,[112] the Prosecutor first opted for the summons to appear,[113] on the grounds that the Sudanese Government had previously been quite cooperative and that these summonses might therefore also have a positive result.[114] Nevertheless, the Prosecutor also remarked that his choice was based on past experiences only and that the issuance of the summonses could easily work out differently and negatively.[115] If that were to happen, the Prosecution argued, arrest warrants would have to be issued.[116] The Pre-Trial Chamber, however, decided otherwise. In its decision on the application of the Prosecutor,[117] it stated that Kushayb was detained and could therefore not be summoned to appear before the ICC.[118] a person may come before the ICC in three different ways: first, following the surrender of the person to the Court; second, upon the person's voluntary appearance; and, thirdly, pursuant to a summons to appear [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

---

[112] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in Darfur, The Sudan, 'Prosecutor's Application under Article 58(7)' (Public Redacted Version), ICC-02/05, 27 February 2007.

[113] Ibid., para. 273: "After a careful analysis of the relevant information, the Prosecution (…) has assessed at this stage, and respectfully submits, that a summons to appear should be the alternative first pursued by the Court. This route was introduced in Article 58 in the Statute in Rome as a less intrusive one. The Prosecution's present assessment is that a summons could prove sufficient to ensure the persons' appearance."

[114] See ibid., para. 274: "In particular, the Prosecution considers worthy of the Chamber's consideration that the Government of the Sudan, which would serve the summons, and would have to facilitate and follow up on the summons, thus far has in practice provided a degree of cooperation in response to the Prosecution's requests. (…) [T]he Prosecution foresees the possibility that the Government could cooperate in facilitating the appearance of those persons against whom a summons may be used."

[115] See ibid., para. 274: "The Prosecution cannot prejudge, as a matter proceeds to the Pre-Trial Chamber, the subsequent decisions that will be taken by the Government of the Sudan in relation to this new phase of the proceedings. The prosecution can only call the attention of the Pre-Trial Chamber to past instances."

[116] See ibid., para. 278: "[T]he Prosecution submits that a number of circumstances could lead it to modify its assessment of the likelihood that a summons to appear would prove sufficient in ensuring the persons' appearance. In this regard the Prosecution submits that any official response or action of the Sudanese Government, or of HARUN or KUSHAYB, to the filing of this application, to the effect that they will resist or fail to comply with any decision by the Pre-Trial Chamber on this matter, would modify this assessment of the OTP and would justify, in the Prosecution's view, and subject to the Pre-Trial Chamber's determination, the issuance of warrants of arrest."

[117] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Ahmad Muhammad Harun ("Ahmad Harun") and Ali Muhammad Ali Abd-Al-Rahman ("Ali Kushayb"), 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Application under Article 58(7) of the Statute' (Public), ICC-02/05-01/07, 27 April 2007.

[118] See ibid., paras. 119-121: "119. Regarding Ali Kushayb, the Chamber notes that he is reported to be in prison upon a warrant of arrest issued by the Sudanese authorities and that the Prosecution has not presented any information that would lead to the conclusion that Ali Kushayb would appear voluntarily before the Court while being detained by the Sudanese authorities. 120. Moreover, the Chamber is of the view that issuing a summons to appear for a person currently detained by national authorities would be contrary to the object and purpose of article 58(7) of the Statute. Indeed, the possibility provided for in article 58(7) of the Statute to issue a summons to appear with conditions restricting liberty (other

With respect to Harun, the Pre-Trial Chamber noted that the Prosecution had found that he had shown a willingness to cooperate in the past, but that he had also concealed evidence.[119] More generally, it pointed to the fact that the Sudanese Government had stated that it would not cooperate with the ICC.[120] As a result, the requirements of Article 58, paragraph 7 of the ICC Statute (see footnote 110) were not met.[121] By contrast, the requirements of Article 58, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute were met, meaning that the Pre-Trial Chamber could issue warrants of arrest for these persons,[122] which in fact it did the very same day.[123]

Whereas the summons to appear as such may lead to the appearance of the suspect at the ICC, the arrest warrant by itself is not enough. If the ICC wants a certain State to (provisionally)[124] arrest a suspect, the arrest warrant needs to be followed by a request to arrest and surrender.[125] than detention), and the list of those conditions provided for in rule 119 of the Rules, clearly indicate that a summons to appear is intended to apply only to persons who are not already being detained. 121. In addition, although the Prosecution alleges in its application that Ali Kushayb could appear before the Court under a summons to appear while remaining in custody in the context of the Sudanese legal proceedings, it does not indicate how this would be possible under the legal framework provided for by the Statute and the Rules. Under this framework, it is not possible to envisage a surrender, even a temporary surrender as provided for in rule 183 of the Rules and which seems to be referred to implicitly in the Prosecution Application, without the prior issuance of a warrant of arrest [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

---

[119] See ibid., para. 122.

[120] See ibid., para. 123.

[121] See ibid., para. 124.

[122] See ibid., p. 43.

[123] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Ahmad Muhammad Harun ("Ahmad Harun") and Ali Muhammad Ali Abd-Al-Rahman ("Ali Kushayb"), 'Warrant of Arrest for Ahmad Harun' (Public Document), ICC-02/05-01/07, 27 April 2007 and ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Ahmad Muhammad Harun ("Ahmad Harun") and Ali Muhammad Ali Abd-Al-Rahman ("Ali Kushayb"), 'Warrant of Arrest for Ali Kushayb' (Public Document), ICC-02/05-01/07, 27 April 2007.

[124] A provisional arrest is only possible in urgent situations. See Art. 92 of the ICC Statute: "1. In urgent cases, the Court may request the provisional arrest of the person sought, pending presentation of the request for surrender and the documents supporting the request as specified in article 91 [see n. 126, ChP]. 2. The request for provisional arrest shall be made by any medium capable of delivering a written record and shall contain: (a) Information describing the person sought, sufficient to identify the person, and information as to that person's probable location; (b) A concise statement of the crimes for which the person's arrest is sought and of the facts which are alleged to constitute those crimes, including, where possible, the date and location of the crime; (c) A statement of the existence of a warrant of arrest or a judgement of conviction against the person sought; and (d) A statement that a request for surrender of the person sought will follow. 3. A person who is provisionally arrested may be released from custody if the requested State has not received the request for surrender and the documents supporting the request as specified in article 91 within the time limits specified in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. [According to Rule 188 of the ICC RPE, the time limit shall be 60 days from the date of the provisional arrest, ChP.] However, the person may consent to surrender before the expiration of this period if permitted by the law of the requested State. In such a case, the requested State shall proceed to surrender the person to the Court as soon as possible. 4. The fact that the person sought has been released from custody pursuant to paragraph 3 shall not prejudice the subsequent arrest and surrender of that person if the request for surrender and the documents supporting the request are delivered at a later date." It is interesting here to note that these provisions on provisional arrest, in contrast to their counterparts of the UN ad hoc Tribunals (see Section 2 of Chapter VI), do explicitly

Article 89, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute ('Surrender of persons to the Court') reads:

> The Court may transmit a request for the arrest and surrender of a person, together with the material supporting the request outlined in article 91,[126] to any State on the territory of which that person may be found[127] and shall request the cooperation of that State in the arrest and surrender of such a person. States Parties shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Part [this is Part 9 of the ICC Statute, see also footnote 16, ChP] and the procedure under their national law, comply with requests for arrest and surrender.

---

mention the possibility of release after a certain time-limit even before the surrender of the person to the ICC. As clarified in Chapter VI, the UN ad hoc Tribunals only mention a time-limit after the transfer of the person to the Tribunal. Swart therefore concludes that "[f]rom the point of view of protecting basic rights of individual persons, the system of the Statute is definitely superior to that of Rule 40 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence." (Swart 2002 C, p. 1702.)

[125] See Art. 58, para. 5 of the ICC Statute: "On the basis of the warrant of arrest, the Court may request the provisional arrest or the arrest and surrender of the person under Part 9."

[126] Art. 91 of the ICC Statute ('Contents of request for arrest and surrender') reads: "1. A request for arrest and surrender shall be made in writing. In urgent cases, a request may be made by any medium capable of delivering a written record, provided that the request shall be confirmed through the channel provided for in article 87, paragraph 1 (a) [this general paragraph states that "[t]he Court shall have the authority to make requests to States Parties for cooperation. The requests shall be transmitted through the diplomatic channel as may be designated by each State Party upon ratification, acceptance, approval or accession. Subsequent changes to the designation shall be made by each State Party in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence." ChP]. 2. In the case of a request for the arrest and surrender of a person for whom a warrant of arrest has been issued by the Pre-Trial Chamber under article 58, the request shall contain or be supported by: (a) Information describing the person sought, sufficient to identify the person, and information as to that person's probable location; (b) A copy of the warrant of arrest; and (c) Such documents, statements or information as may be necessary to meet the requirements for the surrender process in the requested State, except that those requirements should not be more burdensome than those applicable to requests for extradition pursuant to treaties or arrangements between the requested State and other States and should, if possible, be less burdensome, taking into account the distinct nature of the Court. 3. In the case of a request for the arrest and surrender of a person already convicted, the request shall contain or be supported by: (a) A copy of any warrant of arrest for that person; (b) A copy of the judgement of conviction; (c) Information to demonstrate that the person sought is the one referred to in the judgement of conviction; and (d) If the person sought has been sentenced, a copy of the sentence imposed and, in the case of a sentence for imprisonment, a statement of any time already served and the time remaining to be served. 4. Upon the request of the Court, a State Party shall consult with the Court, either generally or with respect to a specific matter, regarding any requirements under its national law that may apply under paragraph 2 (c). During the consultations, the State Party shall advise the Court of the specific requirements of its national law."

[127] Note that the ICC, in contrast to the ICTY/ICTR, can only issue 'normal' requests for arrest and surrender and not international arrest warrants, see Rule 61 of the ICTR/ICTR RPE and n. 85 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. In this context, Swart remarks: "Apparently, the framers of the Statute did not want to follow the example of the ad hoc Tribunals in creating a special procedure in the case of refusal of States to comply with requests for arrest and surrender, designed to provide some sort of compensation for the fact that trials in absentia are not allowed under the Statute." (Swart 2002 C, p. 1689.)

Here, one can see that the ICC does not view national procedural law as irrelevant to its arrest and surrender system[128] and that the regime may be even less vertical than initially thought.[129] Nevertheless, one must also understand that "national law procedures should not obstruct the surrender of accused persons to the Court".[130] With respect to national substantive law (which, by the way, may sometimes be hard to discern from national procedural law),[131] it is worth repeating that the traditional refusal grounds for extradition are not valid in the context of the ICC.[132] Nevertheless, the arrest and surrender procedures of the ICC Statute contain provisions that may be understood as referring to more substantive obstacles. For example, the above-mentioned Article 89 of the ICC Statute refers to Article 91 of the ICC Statute,[133] paragraph 4 of which states:

> Upon the request of the Court, a State Party shall consult with the Court, either generally or with respect to a specific matter, regarding any requirements under its national law that may apply under paragraph 2 (c). During the consultations, the State Party shall advise the Court of the specific requirements of its national law.

And Article 91, paragraph 2 (c) of the ICC Statute, in turn, states that the request for arrest and surrender shall contain or be supported by:

> Such documents, statements or information as may be necessary to meet the requirements for the surrender process in the requested State, except that those

[128] See also Art. 88 of the ICC Statute (entitled 'Availability of procedures under national law'): "States parties shall ensure that there are procedures available under their national law for all of the forms of cooperation which are specified under this Part [this is again Part 9 of the ICC Statute, ChP]."

[129] Art. 89, para. 1 of the ICC Statute refers to Art. 91 of the ICC Statute, which, in turn, refers to Art. 87 of the ICC Statute (entitled 'Requests for cooperation: general provisions'). According to the latter article's para. 1 (a), "[t]he Court shall have the authority to make requests to States Parties for cooperation. The requests shall be transmitted through the diplomatic channel or any other appropriate channel as may be designated by each State Party upon ratification, acceptance, approval or accession." Furthermore, para. 2 of the same Art. 87 stipulates that "[r]equests for cooperation and any documents supporting the request shall either be in or be accompanied by a translation into an official language of the requested State or one of the working languages of the Court, in accordance with the choice made by that State upon ratification, acceptance, approval or accession." Sluiter (2003 C, pp. 619-620) (see also (almost identically) Maogoto 2004, p. 118) notes that "[t]hese regulations are similar to those in the Inter-State Cooperation Model. It is clearly a concession to states in favour of a more horizontally oriented cooperation model [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." More information on Art. 87 of the ICC Statute can be found in Kreß and Prost 2008 A.

[130] Young 2001, p. 349.

[131] See ibid., p. 341: "Whether a national law is procedural in nature is not always easy to discern. For example, a constitutional prohibition against arbitrary arrests may be used to test the validity of the criminal process, but it is also a substantive right of the accused."

[132] Swart argues that the reference to national procedures "makes clear that substantive grounds for refusing surrender which are normal in domestic extradition law do not matter here [emphasis added, ChP]." (Swart 2002 C, p. 1680.) See also Young 2001, p. 345 ("It was understood that this qualification [in accordance with (…) the procedure under (…) national law, ChP] referred only to procedural laws and not to the substantive laws of the State.") and Kaul and Kreß 2000, pp. 166-167 ("The obligation to surrender persons to the Court is not subject to substantive national law.").

[133] See n. 126.

> requirements should not be more burdensome than those applicable to requests for extradition pursuant to treaties or arrangements between the requested State and other States and should, if possible, be less burdensome, taking into account the distinct nature of the Court.

Although Young is of the opinion that "[a] wide interpretation of article 91(2)(c), which would open the door to (…) [the traditional grounds of refusal in extradition, ChP], should not be accepted in light of its drafting history and the principle of complementary effective prosecution",[134] he admits that the ICC Statute is ambiguous "[o]n the issue of whether States Parties may impose an evidential sufficiency requirement for surrender".[135]

Another not so vertical feature of the ICC arrest and surrender procedures can be found in the above-mentioned Article 91, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute on consultations in the case of problems.[136] Arguably, consultations are not [135] Ibid. See also ibid., p. 346: "[A]rticle 91 was not intended to preserve or resurrect extradition refusal grounds. If article 91(2)(c) was intended to recognize any domestic authority to refuse surrender, it was only limited to cases where the evidence supporting the commission of the offence was insufficient for surrender [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Kaul and Kreß (2000, p. 166) explain that this provision constitutes a compromise package (caused by the negotiators' dilemma of "necessity, on the one hand, of meeting (...) constitutional concerns and, on the other hand, of not creating a serious loophole which could be abused to circumvent the obligation to surrender") but not a ground for refusal. Recall also the argument made by Deen-Racsmány as alluded to in n. 97 of this chapter (referring to Artt. 89 and 91 of the ICC Statute).

[134] Young 2001, p. 350.

[136] See for another concrete example the reference to consultations in Art. 89, para. 2 of the ICC Statute, a provision which deals with ne bis in idem claims and which also mentions the possibility of postponement of surrender: "Where the person sought for surrender brings a challenge before a national court on the basis of the principle of ne bis in idem as provided in article 20, the requested State shall immediately consult with the Court to determine if there has been a relevant ruling on admissibility. If the case is admissible, the requested State shall proceed with the execution of the request. If an admissibility ruling is pending, the requested State may postpone the execution of the request for surrender of the person until the Court makes a determination on admissibility." The general provision on consultations can be found in Art. 97 of the ICC Statute ('Consultations'): "Where a State Party receives a request under this Part [this is again Part 9 of the ICC Statute, ChP] in relation to which it identifies problems which may impede or prevent the execution of the request, that State shall consult with the Court without delay in order to resolve the matter. Such problems may include, inter alia: (a) Insufficient information to execute the request; (b) In the case of a request for surrender, the fact that despite best efforts, the person sought cannot be located or that the investigation conducted has determined that the person in the requested State is clearly not the person named in the warrant; or (c) The fact that execution of the request in its current form would require the requested State to breach a pre-existing treaty obligation undertaken with respect to another State." Another example of a provision where postponement of (surrender) requests is regulated is Art. 95 of the ICC Statute ('Postponement of execution of a request in respect of an admissibility challenge'). (Note that – the also quite generally formulated – Art. 94 of the ICC Statute ('Postponement of execution of a request in respect of ongoing investigation or prosecution') "only pertains to requests for forms of cooperation other than surrender with article 89 para. 4 being its counterpart as far as requests for surrender are concerned." (Kreß and Prost 2008 B, p. 1589.) Art. 89, para. 4 of the ICC Statute reads: "If the person sought is being proceeded against or is serving a sentence in the requested State for a crime different from that for which surrender to the Court is sought, the requested State, after making its decision to grant the request, shall consult with the Court.") characteristic of a vertical relationship in which the requesting actor has a hierarchically higher status and tells the 'requested' (read: ordered) entity what to do.[137]

Before addressing the remaining arrest and surrender provisions, it should be emphasised that "a person for whom a warrant of arrest or a summons to appear has been issued under article 58"[138] (as well as an accused person)[139] can make a challenge on the basis of Article 19 of the ICC Statute ('Challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case'). Although admissibility matters are not relevant to the male captus discussion,[140] jurisdiction challenges most assuredly are, even if Article 19 of the ICC Statute does not explicitly mention a male captus situation as an example of a jurisdictional challenge. (In fact, Article 19 of the ICC Statute does not mention any examples of jurisdictional challenges.) One can certainly imagine that a suspect who is the victim of a serious male captus situation will use this provision in the future. Even if such a male captus challenge is, strictly speaking, not a challenge to the ICC's jurisdiction, but to its exercise of jurisdiction, one should not focus too strongly on this difference. After all, if a suspect making such a challenge succeeds, the ICC will refuse to exercise jurisdiction over that person, meaning that the person can no longer be tried before the ICC. In other words: it will have lost jurisdiction ratione personae with respect to that person.[141] Article 19 of the ICC Statute stipulates that a challenge can, in principle, only be made prior to or at the commencement of the trial.[142]

[137] See also Swart and Sluiter 1999, pp. 103-105.

[138] Art. 19, para. 2 (a) of the ICC Statute.

[139] In addition, jurisdictional challenges can also be made by States, see Art. 19, para. 2 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute.

[140] See Art. 17, para. 1 of the ICC Statute: "Having regard to paragraph 10 of the Preamble and article 1, the Court shall determine that a case is inadmissible where: (a) The case is being investigated or prosecuted by a State which has jurisdiction over it, unless the State is unwilling or unable genuinely to carry out the investigation or prosecution; (b) The case has been investigated by a State which has jurisdiction over it and the State has decided not to prosecute the person concerned, unless the decision resulted from the unwillingness or inability of the State genuinely to prosecute; (c) The person concerned has already been tried for conduct which is the subject of the complaint, and a trial by the Court is not permitted under article 20, paragraph 3; (d) The case is not of sufficient gravity to justify further action by the Court."

[141] Cf. also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 19: "[T]he Appeals Chamber wishes to clarify that what is at issue here, is not jurisdiction ratione materiae but jurisdiction ratione personae. Jurisdiction ratione materiae depends on the nature of the crimes charges. The Accused is charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity. As such, there is no question that under the Statute, the International Tribunal does have jurisdiction ratione materiae. In this case, jurisdiction ratione personae depends instead on whether the Appeals Chamber determines that there are any circumstances relating to the Accused which would warrant setting aside jurisdiction and releasing the Accused. It is to this determination that the Chamber now turns." (See also n. 591 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.) Cf. finally ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 206: "[T]he Appeals Chamber does not find that these newly and more detailed submitted breaches rise to the requisite level of egregiousness amounting to the Tribunal's loss of personal jurisdiction." (See also n. 1047 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.)

[142] See Art. 19, para. 4 of the ICC Statute.

Furthermore, the Pre-Trial Chamber (prior to the confirmation of the charges) or the Trial Chamber (after confirmation of the charges) shall look at the challenges and their decisions on these challenges can be appealed to the Appeals Chamber.[143]

Returning now to the arrest and surrender provisions themselves, if a State Party has received a request for (provisional) arrest and surrender, and if (potential) problems with competing requests[144] or other international obligations States may have[145] are solved,[146] the first paragraph of Article 59 of the ICC Statute ('Arrest proceedings in the custodial State') clarifies that the State "shall immediately take steps to arrest the person in question in accordance with its laws and the provisions of Part 9". The reference to "its laws" (which, by the way, may also refer to provisions from human rights treaties)[147] reaffirms that the arrest and surrender regime of the ICC contains horizontal elements as well. In the words of Swart:

> As is generally the case for cooperation between the Court and States under the Rome Statute, the provisions on arrest proceedings in the custodial State present an interesting mixture of elements inspired by traditional inter-State practice and the law of the ad hoc Tribunals.[148]

3.2 The arrest and surrender regime Part II: Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute

After the suspect has been arrested, he > shall be brought promptly before the competent judicial authority in the custodial State which shall determine, in accordance with the law of that State, that:

>
> (a) The warrant applies to that person;
> (b) The person has been arrested in accordance with the proper process; and
> (c) The person's rights have been respected.[149]

As will also be shown in the next chapter (where the drafting history of this provision will be reviewed), this habeas corpus-like provision is one of the most important in the arrest and surrender proceedings, where the national and international levels meet, and therefore deserves a subsection of its own.

---

[143] See Art. 19, para. 6 of the ICC Statute.
[144] See Art. 90 of the ICC Statute. For more information on this topic, see, for example, Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 629-631.
[145] See Art. 98 of the ICC Statute. For more information on this topic, see, for example, ibid., pp. 631-633.
[146] This is, of course, a huge deviation from the regimes of the ICTY/ICTR, which were covered by Art. 103 of the UN Charter ("In the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail."). See also Swart 2002 C, pp. 1680-1681, Ciampi 2002, p. 1631 and Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 612 and 629-630.
[147] See Swart 2002 A, p. 1252.
[148] Ibid., p. 1251.
[149] Art. 59, para. 2 of the ICC Statute.

Before turning to the main problem connected with this provision, it is worth first establishing the precise meaning of the three elements to be determined by the competent judicial authority. The first is quite plain: whether the person standing before the judicial authority is indeed the person sought by the ICC. The second and third elements are less clear, however.[150]

To start with the second, what does "arrested in accordance with the proper process" mean? This is probably different from State to State, but its scope is potentially rather broad. In the words of El Zeidy:

> One commentator argues that although Article 59(2) does not 'tackle the criteria of proper process', it implies that the arrest warrant 'be duly served on the person arrested'. This interpretation seems insufficient. What is meant by these words is a matter to be determined and clarified either through domestic implementation of the Statute or by the national judge of the requested state. Several possibilities may be taken into account in considering the implications of this provision. The first possibility is that the provision refers to the law of criminal procedure that regulates the process of arresting a person under investigation and presenting him/her to the national judge. A second possibility refers to the lawfulness of the domestic arrest warrant executing the international arrest warrant issued by the ICC.[[151]] Finally, one may extend the argument to include the way in which the person has been brought before the domestic court in general (if the means are illegal they may include: deportation, luring or trickery-abductions or other uses of force).[[152]] (...) It could be argued, therefore, that the meaning is broad enough to carry with it all unlawful means of deprivation of liberty [original footnote omitted, ChP].[153]

In addition, one must not forget (see footnote 147 and accompanying text) that the process not only needs to be in conformity with national law,[154] but that neither can this national law, of course, violate international (human rights) law.[155]

---

[150] Nevertheless, one can already note that the idea that the national authority must perform these checks can be welcomed. (Recall that Swart noted in the context of the ICTY/ICTR (see Section 2 of Chapter VI) that the arrest and transfer provisions of these Tribunals are "mainly concerned on the duties of States vis-à-vis the Tribunals" (Swart 2002 A, p. 1251) and "[t]o a certain extent (...) neglect the rights of the individual persons concerned". (Ibid.) See also Sluiter 2003 C, p. 622.)

[151] See n. 127.

[152] Although Art. 59 of the ICC Statute ('Arrest proceedings in the custodial State') only seems to focus on the proceedings in the custodial State, and not on, for example, operations which may occur in a third State and in which a suspect may be involved before being brought before the competent judicial authority of the custodial State, one can assume (or perhaps hope) that that authority will also look at, for example, allegations of trans-border male captus situations. (In that respect, all the different inter-State situations discussed in Chapters IIII and V remain of relevance to the ICC context.) In addition, one must also be aware of the fact that Art. 59 of the ICC Statute assumes the issuance of a request for arrest and surrender/for provisional arrest. However, one can also imagine that a male captus may already have taken place before such a request has been issued. One could hereby think of a person who claims to have been placed in illegal detention even before the ICC had sent its official requests. This point will come back in the ICC cases of Lubanga Dyilo and Katanga (see Sections 2 and 4 of Chapter X). (Cf. also the Duch case, see Subsection 5.1 of Chapter VI.)

[153] El Zeidy 2006, pp. 454-455.

[154] See the words "in accordance with the law of that State". Although there is thus room for national law, it "cannot be read in a manner that defeats the object and purpose of the Statute – namely the

The third element is also not very clear. Swart writes that "[o]ne may think here of the rights of the person under national law and human rights treaties to which the requested State is a party. Equally relevant are the provisions of Article 55[[156]] of the Statute itself."[157] One could also think here of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, which states, among other things, that "[t]he application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article [this is the law of the ICC as can be found in Article 21 of the ICC Statute, ChP] must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights". (This crucial provision will be discussed in detail in Section 4 of Chapter IX.)

With respect to the most important right in which this book is interested, although Article 59 of the ICC Statute does not give the arrested person an explicit right to have the lawfulness of his arrest and detention checked by a court, such a right "may nevertheless follow from human rights conventions to which the requested State is a party".[158] An analogy to international human rights law may be helpful here, even if Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute itself does not use this term (but speaks of "[t]he person's rights"), which may mean that the drafters of the ICC Statute may have wanted to give their term a connotation other than that obligation to comply with the Court's requests." (Ibid., p. 453.) Cf. in that respect the already-mentioned (see n. 130 and accompanying text) remark from Young when he addressed national procedural law and stated that "national law procedures should not obstruct the surrender of accused persons to the Court." (Young 2001, p. 349.)

---

[155] See Hall 2008 B, p. 1152: "The arrest proceedings are governed by the law of the custodial State. Article 59 does not address the criteria of proper process. Basically, it means that the warrant be duly served on the person arrested and that the process be consistent with international law and standards [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also Swart 2002 A, pp. 1252-1253: "The expression 'proper process' seems primarily to refer to the national law of the requested State, including its obligations under human rights conventions."

[156] Art. 55 of the ICC Statute ('Rights of persons during an investigation') reads: "1. In respect of an investigation under this Statute, a person: (a) Shall not be compelled to incriminate himself or herself or to confess guilt; (b) Shall not be subjected to any form of coercion, duress or threat, to torture or to any other form of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment; (c) Shall, if questioned in a language other than a language the person fully understands and speaks, have, free of any cost, the assistance of a competent interpreter and such translations as are necessary to meet the requirements of fairness; and (d) Shall not be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention, and shall not be deprived of his or her liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established in this Statute. 2. Where there are grounds to believe that a person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court and that person is about to be questioned either by the Prosecutor, or by national authorities pursuant to a request made under Part 9, that person shall also have the following rights of which he or she shall be informed prior to being questioned: (a) To be informed, prior to being questioned, that there are grounds to believe that he or she has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; (b) To remain silent, without such silence being a consideration in the determination of guilt or innocence; (c) To have legal assistance of the person's choosing, or, if the person does not have legal assistance, to have legal assistance assigned to him or her, in any case where the interests of justice so require, and without payment by the person in any such case if the person does not have sufficient means to pay for it; and (d) To be questioned in the presence of counsel unless the person has voluntarily waived his or her right to counsel."

[157] Swart 2002 A, p. 1253. See also Young 2001, pp. 341, 349 and 351, Swart 2002 C, p. 1689, Sluiter 2003 C, p. 621 and Hall 2008 B, p. 1152.

[158] Swart 2002 A, p. 1252.

of 'human rights'.[159] Looking for the moment only at the human right to liberty and security – paragraph 2 (c) may, of course, encompass many other rights – and taking the ICCPR's human right to liberty and security as an example here, it was already explained in Subsection 2.2.1 of Chapter III that not only must a person's deprivation of liberty be "on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as are established by law" (lawful); it must not be arbitrary either.[160] Hence, not only must the deprivation be legal ("on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as are established by law"), "[t]he law itself must not be arbitrary, and the enforcement of the law in a given case must not take place arbitrarily".[161]

Now, it is true that the competent authority of the custodial State cannot check the substantive part of the legality requirement, namely whether the deprivation of liberty was made "on such grounds (...) as are established by law".[162] That is up to [159] See also Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 622-623. It may be interesting to note that the Dutch authorities, when addressing Art. 59, para. 2 of the ICC Statute, refer to "the rights which the person pursuant to national and international law enjoys in this situation", see the Explanatory Memorandum to the International Criminal Court Implementation Act (Tweede Kamer der Staten-Generaal, Vergaderjaar 2001-2002, 28 098 (R 1704), Uitvoering van het Statuut van het Internationaal Strafhof met betrekking tot de samenwerking met en bijstand aan het Internationaal Strafhof en de tenuitvoerlegging van zijn vonnissen (Uitvoeringswet Internationaal Strafhof), Nr. 3, Memorie van Toelichting), p. 25: "The reference to article 59, paragraph 2 of the [ICC] Statute has been included because the Statute prescribes that the public prosecutor [the officier] checks with respect to a(n) (provisionally) arrested person whether there is perhaps a case of mistaken identity, whether the (national) arrest procedure has been correctly applied and whether the rights which the person pursuant to national and international law enjoys in this situation, have been respected [own translation, ChP]." See also the Dutch Explanatory Memorandum to the approval of the ICC Statute (Tweede Kamer der Staten-Generaal, Vergaderjaar 2000-2001, 27 484 (R 1669). Goedkeuring van het op 17 juli 1998 totstandgekomen Statuut van Rome inzake het Internationaal Strafhof (Trb. 2000, 120), Nr. 3, Memorie van Toelichting), p. 50: "When the Dutch judge, on the basis of Article 59, para. 2 (c), assesses whether the rights of the arrested person have been respected, that assessment includes, among other things, the rights stemming from the Constitution and the ECHR [own translation, ChP]." See also Hall 2008 B, p. 1152: "The rights referred to in this Subparagraph would include both rights under national and under international law, including the rights recognized in article 55".

[160] See Nowak 2005, p. 223.

[161] Ibid., p. 224.

[162] Note that the Dutch Government clarifies at p. 50 of the Explanatory Memorandum to the approval of the ICC Statute (Tweede Kamer der Staten-Generaal, Vergaderjaar 2000-2001, 27 484 (R 1669). Goedkeuring van het op 17 juli 1998 totstandgekomen Statuut van Rome inzake het Internationaal Strafhof (Trb. 2000, 120), Nr. 3, Memorie van Toelichting) that "the person who has been arrested at the request of the International Criminal Court must be brought immediately before the national judge who shall determine the validness and lawfulness of the deprivation of liberty (gegrondheid en rechtmatigheid van de vrijheidsbeneming) [own translation, ChP]." However, this is arguably not what Art. 59 of the ICC Statute stipulates. It is not for the competent judicial authority to determine the validness/the substantive grounds for the arrest – this is the prerogative of the ICC. Hence, the national authority can only to a certain extent review the lawfulness of the deprivation of liberty. (It appears, however, that the Dutch Government, agrees with this latter point when it writes, at the same page, that "the only point which the competent judicial authority can absolutely not check is whether the Pre-Trial Chamber, in view of the parameters established by article 58 [of the ICC Statute], was entitled to issue the (in that article defined) warrant of arrest [own translation, ChP]." Hence, it seems that the Dutch Government agrees that the competent judicial authority cannot look at the correctness of the substantive grounds for/validness of the arrest after all.)

the ICC[163] and not up to the competent (judicial)[164] authority of the custodial State to decide, see Article 59, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute: "It shall not be open to the competent authority of the custodial State to consider whether the warrant of arrest was properly issued in accordance with article 58, paragraph 1 (a) and (b)."[165]

[163] See also Rule 117, para. 3 of the ICC RPE: "A challenge as to whether the warrant of arrest was properly issued in accordance with article 58, paragraph 1 (a) and (b), shall be made in writing to the Pre-Trial Chamber. The application shall set out the basis for the challenge. After having obtained the views of the Prosecutor, the Pre-Trial Chamber shall decide on the application without delay."

[164] Although it is possible that this will often be the same judicial authority as the one of Art. 59, para. 2 of the ICC Statute, paras. 3, 4 and 5 of Art. 59 of the ICC Statute do not speak of the competent judicial authority, but of the competent authority in the custodial State. Hence, it appears that no competent authority of the custodial State, whether judicial or executive, can consider whether the warrant of arrest was properly issued in accordance with article 58, paragraph 1 (a) and (b) of the ICC Statute. It seems that the idea that "[i[t shall not be open to the competent authority of the custodial State to consider whether the warrant of arrest was properly issued in accordance with article 58, paragraph 1 (a) and (b)" has a rather broad application (see also the previous footnote and its reference to Rule 117, para. 3 of the ICC RPE, which generally states that such a challenge must be made with the ICC) but it must also be admitted that the just-quoted words can be found in a provision which deals with an application of interim release, see Art. 59, para. 4 of the ICC Statute. This may mean that the competent authority may not consider whether the warrant of arrest was properly issued in accordance with article 58, paragraph 1 (a) and (b) merely in the context of such an application of interim release, which does not exclude that problems related to the arrest warrant may nevertheless constitute, for example, a reason for the Executive [which, as clarified above, can also play a role in the surrender, see also n. 179, ChP] to refuse surrender altogether. See also Sluiter (2009, pp. 469-470) who, however, writes about the "national court" in the context of Art. 59, para. 4 of the ICC Statute, whereas it was clarified above that this provision speaks of "competent authority in the custodial State" more generally: "One also notices in Article 59 (4) that it is not open to the national court to consider whether the arrest warrant was properly issued in accordance with Article 58 of the Statute. However, this seems to me very much moving problems around. Whereas the national court may not do this, the executive branch could still raise this as an obstacle to cooperation, applying Article 97. Thus, a national court, which operates in extradition in conjunction with the executive, could inform the Minister of Justice of any doubts it has in relation to the legality of an arrest warrant issued by the ICC. Though this may not be a ground for interim release, it can be a reason not to cooperate [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[165] See for the contents of Art. 58, para. 1 (a) and (b) of the ICC Statute ns. 103-104 and accompanying text. As such, the competent authority can be compared (note, however, that extradition is not the correct concept in the ICC proceedings!) with a judge from a requested State who extradites a person to the court of the requesting State. (See also the Dutch Explanatory Memorandum to the approval of the ICC Statute (Tweede Kamer der Staten-Generaal, Vergaderjaar 2000-2001, 27 484 (R 1669). Goedkeuring van het op 17 juli 1998 totstandgekomen Statuut van Rome inzake het Internationaal Strafhof (Trb. 2000, 120), Nr. 3, Memorie van Toelichting), p. 50.) Such a judge cannot check either whether there are, for example, substantial grounds to believe that this person has committed a certain crime. This is the privilege of the court of the requesting State. Cf. in that respect also the European Commission for Democracy through Law (also known as the Venice Commission) – the Council of Europe's advisory body on constitutional matters – Report on Constitutional Issues Raised by the Ratification of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (adopted by the Commission at it[s] 45th Plenary Meeting (Venice, 15-16 December 2000), Strasbourg, 15 January 2001, CDL-INF (2001) 1 Or.Fr. and available at: http://www.venice.coe.int/docs/2001/CDL-INF(2001)001-e.asp), in which it first remarked that "it has been claimed that Article 59 paras. 4 and 5 [of the ICC Statute, these provisions will be examined in a few moments in the main text, ChP] endanger the principle of habeas corpus as outlined specifically within Article 5 of the European Convention of Human Rights." The Commission then explained that "the character of deprivation of liberty in question is not of the nature foreseen in Article 5 para. 1 (c) of the European Convention of Human Rights, which states that a person may be detained "for the purpose of bringing him before the competent judicial authority on

Nevertheless, it can arguably check several other elements of the concept of the right to liberty and security, namely the procedural part of the legality requirement and, to a certain extent, the prohibition of arbitrariness.

The procedural part of the legality requirement is uncontroversial: that the competent judicial authority can check whether the arrest was made in accordance with the correct procedures can also be discerned from the previously examined Article 59, paragraph 2 (b) of the ICC Statute.

The prohibition of arbitrariness is a little more complicated: as mentioned above, it contains two elements, namely that the law on which the arrest was made (and this seems to include both substantive and procedural law) was not itself arbitrary, and that the enforcement of the law in this specific case was not arbitrary. This last element implies that one should look at the correctness of the specific manner in which an arrest was made.[166]

To start with the first element, as with the point already made that the competent (judicial) authority cannot check whether the ICC is correct in deciding that there are substantive grounds for an arrest warrant, it can be argued that neither can the competent judicial authority check whether the substantive law on which the arrest was made was arbitrary or not; whether the suspect is arrested on the basis of a national arrest warrant stemming from the custodial State's legislation implementing its cooperation obligations with the ICC or whether the suspect is arrested on the basis of the ICC request for (provisional) arrest and surrender itself, the ultimate substantive legal basis for the arrest will be the ICC Statute, and it is, of course, not for the competent judicial authority in the custodial State to determine that the ICC Statute is arbitrary. (In fact, one can safely state that the ICC Statute, even though it is not perfect, can never be awarded that accolade.) However, can the reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence or when it is reasonably considered necessary to prevent his committing an offence or fleeing after having done so". It is rather a deprivation of liberty within the meaning of Article 5 para. 1 (f) which authorises a deprivation of liberty if it is "...the lawful arrest or detention of a person ... against whom action is being taken with a view to deportation or extradition." In effect, the surrender of a person to an international organisation can be assimilated in this respect to an extradition. The scope of the obligation contained within Article 5 para. 4 is not identical for each type of deprivation of liberty; indeed this is particularly so as regards the scope of the judicial review required. The Convention requires a review of the necessary conditions for the legality of a deprivation of liberty of an individual in relation to paragraph 1 of Article 5. In respect of Article 5 para. 1 (f), the competent authority is not required to examine whether a "reasonable suspicion" exists to believe that the person arrested and detained has committed a crime, nor whether there is risk of fleeing, collusion or commission of other crimes. These elements are related to police custody and interim detention before criminal trial (envisaged in Article 5 para. 1 (c)). In the context of detention under Article 5 para. 1 (f), the judicial authority must investigate whether the detention was "lawful" with the frame of this provision; it must thus verify whether a procedure of extradition is effectively underway. The competent authority is not therefore asked to look into the elements referred in Article 58 paras. [1, ChP] (a) and (b) of the Statute of Rome [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also n. 182 and accompanying text.

---

[166] See also Nowak 2005, p. 225 (or n. 218 and accompanying text of Chapter III): "Cases of deprivation of liberty provided for by law must not be manifestly disproportional, unjust or unpredictable, and the specific manner in which an arrest is made must not be discriminatory and must be able to be deemed appropriate and proportional in view of the circumstances of the case [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

competent judicial authority verify whether the procedural legality of the deprivation of liberty was in conformity with the prohibition of arbitrariness? In principle, this would seem possible. Since the arrest is executed on the basis of national procedural law, the competent judicial authority must be able to ascertain whether these procedures are not themselves arbitrary. However, it may be assumed that this will not be the case (too often). After all, the national procedures must, of course, be in conformity with the arguably non-arbitrary ICC Statute.

Although the substantive and procedural legal bases for the deprivation of liberty will not readily be labelled arbitrary, this may be different with respect to the second element of arbitrariness, which relates to the enforcement of the law in a specific case. Even if the arrest was based on the correct grounds and executed in accordance with a prescribed procedure, and even if these substantive and procedural legal bases are generally to be viewed as non-arbitrary, the factual execution of the specific arrest on the ground may still be qualified as arbitrary or incorrect. And arguably, this is surely something the competent judicial authority can and should review.

The fact that Swart, Sluiter and Hall all note the relevance, for the scope of Article 59 of the ICC Statute, of Article 55 of the ICC Statute (which also mentions, in a very general way, the importance of the non-arbitrariness of arrests and detentions)[167] may constitute additional proof for the above-mentioned view.[168]

---

[167] See the already-mentioned (see n. 156) Art. 55, para. 1 (d) of the ICC Statute: "In respect of an investigation under this Statute, a person: (…) Shall not be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention, and shall not be deprived of his or her liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established in this Statute."

[168] See Swart 2002 A, p. 1253, Sluiter 2003 C, p. 621 and Hall 2008 B, p. 1152. The fact that Swart notes that "a determination of whether there has been a violation of the person's right not to be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention and not to be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds, and in accordance with such procedures, as are established in the Statute, mentioned in Article 55(1)(d), is largely outside the competence of the national authority" (Swart 2002 A, pp. 1253-1254), does not necessarily have to contradict this. After all, as explained in the main text, it is indeed true that a considerable part of the right to liberty and security cannot be checked by ("is largely outside the competence of") the competent (judicial) authority in the custodial State, namely the substantive part of the legality requirement and part of the prohibition of arbitrariness. However, what the competent judicial authority in the custodial State can arguably check is whether the arrest was made in accordance with the correct national procedures. (The reference in Art. 55, para. 1 (d) of the ICC Statute to the fact that deprivation of liberty is only possible "in accordance with such procedures as are established in this Statute" probably means that all the arrest and detention provisions in the ICC Statute, including Art. 59, which, in turn, refers to, among other things, national procedural law, must be complied with before one can speak of a proper deprivation of liberty in the context of the ICC.) Furthermore, the competent judicial authority in the custodial State can arguably also check parts of the prohibition of arbitrariness. See in that respect also Young 2001, who first notes the relevance of Art. 55 of the ICC Statute for the domestic arrest and surrender procedures (at p. 341) but then states (at pp. 352-353) that "[a] difficult issue arises when the individual raises a rights complaint which requires consideration of the merits of the allegations, such as a complaint of arbitrary detention. There are a number of reasons why national courts should defer determination of this issue to the ICC without exploring the factual underpinnings of the arrest warrant. First, the Statute provides that in deciding an interim release application, the national court is not to consider whether the warrant of arrest was properly issued. The intent of this prohibition would be undermined if an accused could circumvent it by requiring the domestic court to go behind the warrant in a complaint about arbitrary detention.

Now that the scope of these three elements has been addressed, it is time, as promised, to turn to the main problem connected with this provision, namely the indistinctness with respect to the question as to what will happen if the competent judicial authority in the custodial State finds that a person has not been arrested in accordance with the proper process or that his rights have not been respected[169] (if the person standing before that authority is not the one sought by the ICC, then he is, of course, not to be surrendered to the ICC).[170] It may be asked, for example, whether the authority in that case is authorised, after consultation with the ICC – this is obligatory, pursuant to Article 97 of the ICC Statute[171] – to actually release that person (other than granting interim release pending surrender, which is in any case a possibility pursuant to Article 59, paragraphs 3-6 of the ICC Statute (these provisions will be dealt with shortly)). In addition, it can be wondered if the national authority not only has the possibility to release a person (which, as already clarified in Subsection 4.4 of Chapter III, may not preclude the possibility of a new arrest)[172] but perhaps also has the possibility to refuse the surrender in the case of a Secondly, States that do not have an evidential sufficiency requirement would nevertheless be forced to review the factual allegations in an arbitrary detention challenge. Such a result would undermine the Statute's aim to ensure the least burdensome means to surrender. Thirdly, the ICC is the more suitable forum to decide an issue of arbitrary detention. The Court would be better placed to apply definitions of international crimes to standardize the legal tests for verifying the legality of the individual's detention. Furthermore, it is only after surrender that the accused is entitled to full disclosure of the prosecution's evidence, which can be extremely helpful to the defence in preparing the complaint or in deciding whether to raise the issue. Finally, there are safeguards in the Statute which attempt to minimize the degree of impairment to the individual's liberty interest [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Arguably, this view does not seem to contradict this study's position either as it is true that it is not up to the competent judicial authority in the custodial State to consider a claim of arbitrary arrest if that means that this authority must look at the substantive legal grounds on the basis of which the arrest has been made. This is indeed the ICC's domain. However, this does not say anything about the other elements of the prohibition of arbitrariness which, it is submitted, can very well be checked by the competent judicial authority in the custodial State.

---

[169] See also Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 624-625.

[170] See, for example, Sections 25, 27, para. 2 and 30, para. 4 of the 'Kingdom Act of 20 June 2002 to implement the Statute of the International Criminal Court in relation to cooperation with and the provision of assistance to the International Criminal Court and the enforcement of its decisions' (available at: http://www.icrc.org/ihl-nat.nsf/a24d1cf3344e99934125673e00508142/b7883c35b0a31661c1256d79005c007c!OpenDocument) (Dutch International Criminal Court Implementation Act) which clarify that the District Court in The Hague shall declare the surrender to be inadmissible in its ruling if the person brought before it is not the person whose surrender has been requested and that the Minister of Justice in that case shall refuse the ICC's request. See also Young 2001, p. 350: "If the reviewing judicial officer is not satisfied that the person named in the arrest warrant is the arrested person then that person should ordinarily be released [original footnote omitted, ChP]." This indeed seems the most logical thing to do, even if the ICC Statute does not mention this outcome. See also ibid., n. 112: "The Statute, however, does not expressly stipulate this. Instead, art. 97(b) simply lists this determination as an example of when the State Party must consult with the Court without delay in order to resolve the matter."

[171] See for the contents of Art. 97 of the ICC Statute n. 136.

[172] Cf. in that respect, for example, also the release of a provisionally arrested person "if the requested State has not received the request for surrender and the documents supporting the request as specified in article 91 within the time limits specified in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence" (Art. 92, para. 3 of the ICC Statute.) Para. 4 of this article stipulates: "The fact that the person sought has been released serious[173] violation of the elements mentioned in Article 59, paragraph 2 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute.[174]

First of all, it should be stressed that "the ICC Statute does not envisage any ground for denying a request for arrest and surrender".[175] Recall in that respect the non-applicability in the ICC context of the traditional grounds for refusal of extradition, such as the surrender of nationals, the surrender of persons accused of having committed political offences and the double criminality requirement. Nevertheless, the previously discussed unclear scope of Article 59 of the ICC Statute may perhaps create other obstacles. Although it is true that this provision does not explicitly mention the possibility of a release or, further, a refusal to surrender if the competent judicial authority in the custodial State determines that the person concerned has not been arrested in accordance with the proper process or from custody pursuant to paragraph 3 shall not prejudice the subsequent arrest and surrender of that person if the request for surrender and the documents supporting the request are delivered at a later date." See also the release in the context of Rule 182, para. 2 of the ICC RPE ("[w]hen the time limit provided for in article 89, paragraph 3 (e), has expired"): "such a release is without prejudice to a subsequent arrest of the person in accordance with the provisions of article 89 or article 92". (Art. 89, para. 3 (e) of the ICC Statute states: "If an unscheduled landing occurs on the territory of the transit State, that State may require a request for transit from the Court as provided for in subparagraph (b). The transit State shall detain the person being transported until the request for transit is received and the transit is effected, provided that detention for purposes of this subparagraph may not be extended beyond 96 hours from the unscheduled landing unless the request is received within that time.")

---

[173] A rather simple procedural violation should, of course, not lead to a refusal. See also Young 2001, p. 350: "Putting aside for the moment human rights considerations, it is difficult to accept that every procedural error should lead to the refusal of a surrender request. Most procedural breaches will likely be technical ones where the individual suffers little if any prejudice in making full answer and defence to the charges. Absent such prejudice, failing to surrender due to a procedural defect undermines the principle of effective prosecution and amounts to a failure to cooperate in breach of the Statute." Note, however, that a judge may perhaps refuse surrender in cases of violations, which may not have caused much "prejudice in making full answer and defence to the charges", but which are nevertheless to be considered very serious. As already earlier explained, most male captus cases will not affect the fairness of the trial in the strict sense of the word, but the concept of a fair trial broadly perceived/the integrity of the proceedings.

[174] For the sake of completeness, it may also be good to note that one can also ask oneself whether a State may also refuse surrender for quite some other reasons related to the human rights context, for instance, if there are reasonable grounds to believe that by surrendering the person to the ICC, human rights will be violated. Although this point, which can be connected with the well-known Soering case before the ECtHR (see for more information Van den Wyngaert 1990 and n. 610 of Chapter V), has nothing to do with pre-trial irregularities and the male captus discussion, it may, however, be interesting to provide one famous quote from the ECtHR in the Naletilić case (ECtHR (Fourth Section), 'Decision as to the admissibility of Application No. 51891/99 by Mladen Naletilić against Croatia', 4 May 2000). In this case, the suspect, who was awaiting transfer in Croatia to the ICTY, claimed, among other things, under Art. 6, para. 1 of the ECHR that the ICTY is not an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. (See ibid.) The European Court (ibid.) recalled "that exceptionally, an issue might be raised under Article 6 of the Convention by an extradition decision in circumstances where the applicant risks suffering a flagrant denial of a fair trial. However, it is not an act in the nature of an extradition which is at stake here, as the applicant seems to think. Involved here is the surrender to an international court which, in view of the content of its Statute and Rules of Procedure, offers all the necessary guarantees including those of impartiality and independence." For more information on this issue, see, for example, Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 645-648.

[175] Ciampi 2002, p. 1630. See also Prost 2005, p. 75.

that the person's right have not been respected,[176] it does not explicitly exclude these options either. An analogy can be drawn here to Article 59, paragraph 2 (a) of the ICC Statute: this provision also does not state that a State can refuse to surrender a suspect if he is not the person in whom the ICC is interested, but it is obvious that any State, after consultation with the ICC pursuant to Article 97 of the ICC Statute (it must again be stressed that this avenue is always to be taken),[177] will release a person if that person is not the person 'wanted' by the ICC.

Hence, the case is perhaps not as clear-cut as it seems.[178] It appears that it is up to the national authorities to decide in their national laws what position they wish to follow.[179] And this may differ from State to State. Of course, in this context, a

---

[176] See also ibid., pp. 80-81: "[I]f the judge finds any procedural irregularities or a violation of the rights of the person, the ICC Statute does not authorise him or her to take remedial action in relation to such failings. In recognition of this, some domestic laws specifically prohibit such action by the domestic judge and provide for a report to be submitted back to the ICC. If the applicable legislation is not specific on this point, an argument to that effect should be mounted based on the language of the Statute [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[177] Although Art. 97 of the ICC Statute does not mention problems related to human rights/due process considerations (it does, however, mention the problem that the arrested person is not the person in whom the ICC is interested), it must not be forgotten that the problems listed in Art. 97 of the ICC Statute ("(a) Insufficient information to execute the request; (b) In the case of a request for surrender, the fact that despite best efforts, the person sought cannot be located or that the investigation conducted has determined that the person in the requested State is clearly not the person named in the warrant; or (c) The fact that execution of the request in its current form would require the requested State to breach a pre-existing treaty obligation undertaken with respect to another State.") are not exhaustive, see the words: "Such problems may include, inter alia". (See n. 136.)

[178] See also Young 2001, p. 318: "The substantive problem of domestic law objections to surrender cannot be dismissed simply on the basis of the orthodox position that international law trumps national law. The Statute itself considers the processing of arrest and surrender requests as essentially a matter of national law." In that respect, the system of the ICC is clearly different from the system of the ICTY/ICTR where Rule 58 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE (see also n. 22 and accompanying text of Chapter VI) stated that "[t]he obligations laid down in Article 29 of the Statute [or Art. 28 of the ICTR Statute, ChP] shall prevail over any legal impediment to the surrender or transfer of the accused or of a witness to the Tribunal which may exist under the national law or extradition treaties of the State concerned." See also Young 2001, p. 340.

[179] To give one concrete example of a domestic situation, in the ICC's host State, the Netherlands, it is the public prosecutor (officier van justitie) at The Hague District Court which questions the arrested person in accordance with, among other things, Art. 59, para. 2 of the ICC Statute, see the Dutch International Criminal Court Implementation Act (see n. 170) Sections 14 (with respect to provisional arrest) and 18 (with respect to arrest). Here, no mention is made of a possibility to release. However, according to para. 1 of Sections 16 (with respect to provisional arrest) and 20 (with respect to arrest), the investigating/examining judge (rechter-commissaris) may, if the ICC has been consulted on this issue, order "that on account of urgent and exceptional circumstances the deprivation of liberty (...) be ended or discontinued or suspended subject to conditions. The conditions to be imposed shall in any event be designed to prevent absconding." Although it is not clear from the text of the provision itself whether the investigating judge can only grant interim releases pending surrender (or whether he can also grant more final releases blocking the surrender), it arguably addresses interim releases only. This can be derived from the second paragraph of Section 16 (see also the second paragraph of Section 20, referring to the second paragraph of Section 16) where one can read that "[t]he investigating judge shall not make an order as referred to in subsection 1 until the ICC, having been consulted for this purpose through the intermediary of Our Minister, has made recommendations pursuant to article 59, paragraph 5 of the Statute within a period to be determined by Our Minister [emphasis added, ChP]."

State's view of the male captus discussion (see Chapter V) may perhaps also have a role to play, even if the competent judicial authority in the custodial State is not there to decide whether or not it can exercise jurisdiction over the case notwithstanding the male captus (because the ICC and the ICC alone will decide whether to try the case (or not)).[180] This may mean that a State in favour of the male captus bene detentus rule may perhaps be more readily inclined to surrender a person than a State adhering to the male captus male detentus rule, and vice versa.[181] However, it may also be the case that a judge following a male captus bene detentus stance in normal cases, see the English Bennett case, will not do so if he is not going to try the suspect, but if he is merely going to surrender him to another jurisdiction, such as the ICC, see the English male captus bene deditus case of Schmidt.[182] (Note that here, the cases Bennett and Schmidt have been chosen

(Art. 59, para. 5 of the ICC Statute deals with interim release (pending surrender).) In addition, it can also be derived from the fact that the judicial authority holding the surrender hearing, the District Court in The Hague (see Chapter 4 of the Dutch International Criminal Court Implementation Act), which, according to Section 26, para. 3, also has possibilities to release comparable with the one of the investigating judge, cannot declare the surrender inadmissible except for in the situation that the person brought before it is not the person whose surrender has been requested by the ICC, see Section 27. This means that the District Court, except for in the above-mentioned situation, always has to declare the surrender admissible. This, however, does not necessarily have to mean that a serious unlawful arrest, for example, can never lead to a refusal to surrender the person in question to the ICC. This is because the Dutch surrender system not only has a judicial but also a political phase, involving the Minister of Justice (see also Sluiter 2004 A, p. 163). Although the District Court apparently cannot declare the surrender inadmissible in the case of, for example, an unlawful arrest, it must send the Minister not only its ruling, but also "its advisory opinion on the action to be taken on the request for surrender." (Section 28, para. 2.) Such an advisory opinion could, of course, contain negative advice (see also ibid., p. 165), for example, in case a serious male captus situation has occurred. Now, the Minister of Justice must make the final surrender decision and there are many possibilities for him, again after having consulted with the ICC, to refuse the surrender. This may perhaps also include the possibility of the serious male captus situation. Although this point is not explicitly mentioned in the list of possible reasons to refuse surrender (see Section 7), this list is not limitative.

[180] See also El Zeidy 2006, p. 455 (n. 29).

[181] See also Bekou and Shah 2006, p. 528: "[S].10(1)(b) of the South African Act stipulates that persons may not be surrendered to the Court if they have not been 'arrested in accordance with procedures laid down by domestic law'. S.10(1)(c) of the Act goes on to provide that surrender may not be executed if 'the rights of the person, as contemplated in Chapter 2 of the Constitution have not been respected'. This is analogous to the approach to domestic prosecutions following procedural irregularities taken by the South African [Supreme] Court (…) in the Ebrahim case [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Bekou and Shah then go on noting that "[t]his emphasis on the rights of individuals [which is also present in the draft Senegalese cooperation legislation to which the authors refer on the same page, ChP] is worthy of praise, but, in terms of the processes set out by the Rome Statute, it is not compliant. A violation of an individual's rights does not constitute a reason for non-surrender to the Court." However, even though it is true that the ICC Statute does not contain an explicit reason for non-surrender because of such violations, one cannot say that such a refusal is non-compliant with the ICC law either. After all, Art. 59 of the ICC Statute is silent on the consequences of the determination, by the competent judicial authority, that the suspect has not been arrested according to the proper process or that his rights have not been respected.

[182] See also n. 165. However, as was also shown in the Schmidt case, one can agree with Justice Sedley of the Divisional Court in that case that all courts (whether it is a trial court or an 'extraditing' court) have an obligation to prevent abuse of their process, see n. 331 and accompanying text of Chapter V. Thus, with the exception of the marginal role of the national courts in the context of the strict merely to illustrate the problem; in the UK, another mechanism applies concerning the cooperation with the ICC, see footnotes 187 and 190.)

The vision a certain State has on the division of responsibilities between the State and the ICC may also be important in the context of this determination. For example, a State may be of the opinion that at the stage of the proceedings of Article 59 of the ICC Statute, it is purely operating on behalf of the ICC[183] and that it is only there to (swiftly) arrest and surrender the person to the ICC. That may lead to the conclusion that the competent judicial authority in the custodial State, although it must make a determination with respect to the arrest and detention, cannot grant a remedy which would jeopardise the surrender.[184] (However, in that cooperation regimes of the UN ad hoc Tribunals (but see n. 22 of Chapter VI), one could argue that also a court which is merely there to surrender the suspect to the ICC should be careful that its process is not abused and hence that it may steps to prevent such abuse. Cf. also Currie 2007, pp. 385-386: "In Canada (…), where the surrender process is assimilated to the domestic extradition procedure, any request for surrender by the ICC will engage a judicial hearing wherein it is well-established that the judge is competent both to scrutinize the process for compliance with domestic human rights norms, and to adjudicate claims of abuse of process. Particularly under the latter heading, it would be entirely within the discretion of the extradition court to dismiss the surrender proceedings where the circumstances of the fugitive's detention were manifestly illegal, particularly if domestic or foreign police forces were implicated [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

---

[183] Cf. in that respect El Zeidy 2006, p. 458. After having referred to the Milošević v. The Netherlands case (see ns. 222 et seq. and accompanying text) where the Dutch District Court stated that it lacked jurisdiction to consider an application for release filed by Milošević because the Netherlands "had transferred its jurisdiction" to the ICTY (see also n. 418 and accompanying text of Chapter VI), he explains: "Thus, it could equally be argued that at the stage when Article 59 applies, that is after an arrest warrant has already been issued against a person, the state in question has already transferred its jurisdiction to the ICC. Although the ICC Statute is based on the principle of complementarity, which grants primacy to national courts, technically the state in question loses its primacy and the ICC gains control over the case once the case has been rendered admissible. The fact that Article 59(2) expressly leaves part of the proceedings to national authorities does not mean that the ICC lacks competence over the case. At this stage, the state involved is executing part of the proceedings on behalf of the ICC [emphasis in original, ChP]."

[184] See Zhu 2006, p. 104: "In principle, in order to ensure the operation and success of the Court, the transfer of accused to the Court by states should not to be refused on any grounds." See also Young 2001, pp. 347-348: "The unique relationship between States Parties and the ICC supports an interpretation favouring a strict and unimpeded surrender regime in the Statute. Further support for this interpretation can also be found in the Statute's underlying purposes. The Statute represents an agreement amongst States Parties to enforce laws prohibiting the worst international crimes, in accordance with principles of effective prosecution and complementarity. Assuming a case is admissible, the principle of effective prosecution favours an expeditious and unimpeded surrender to the Court. Unless the Court is allowed to exercise jurisdiction, the accused will be free from prosecution. Effective prosecution can also be undermined by protracted domestic litigation over surrender. Delays will tend to jeopardize the truth-seeking function of the prosecution as witnesses tend to be more difficult to locate, and memories fade with time. Implicit in the principle of complementarity is the notion that States and the ICC have their respective spheres of competence. As States are responsible for executing arrest and surrender requests within their territory, it should be left to their courts to review the validity of that execution process. On the other hand, any issues relating to the conduct of the prosecution and trial should be left to be decided by the ICC after surrender. While the principle of complementarity involves some deference to state sovereignty interests, it should still be seen as a means to implement effective prosecution, not a substitute for such prosecution. Sensitivity to State interests should yield if the alternative to surrender is that the accused will go without case, the determination of the competent judicial authority in the custodial State that an arrest was, for example, not executed according to the correct procedures may play a role in the proceedings before the ICC, once the suspect has been surrendered to The Hague.)[185] Currie, for example, argues: "What is missing from the Rome Statute is any entitlement of the requested state to decline to surrender a fugitive on the basis of an illegal arrest of some sort. (…) It seems clear that the intention is for the ICC to deal with any arrest irregularities itself."[186]

However, a State may also believe that its competent judicial authority has an important role in the supervision of the arrest and detention procedures as well and prosecution. In other words, complementarity informs the question of whether the ICC or States should prosecute, but a prosecution there must be. Under Part 9, the Statute imposes obligations of 'ends' and leaves States to decide the 'means' to achieve them. The manner of implementation should be respected so long as the substance of the obligation is satisfied. Thus complementarity is best understood as affording a margin of appreciation to the manner in which States implement their Part 9 duties insofar as effective prosecution is not compromised, e.g. by creating undue delays or otherwise tainting the trial process [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[185] See also Young 2001, p. 352: "If remedial issues for rights violation should generally be left to be decided post-surrender in the ICC, then one might ask why the custodial State should have any competence to consider such violations. It is conceivable that the custodial State may order non-trial related remedies short of releasing the individual or excluding evidence at trial, e.g. ordering damages for physical or mental harm. But more importantly, by allowing individuals to raise these issues in the domestic forum, an evidential record of the complaint may be created and used as the factual basis for an application in the ICC. The individual will likely benefit from this opportunity, while memories are fresh and witnesses are more accessible. Additionally, one should not ignore the possibility of detainees filing human rights complaints against the custodial State in international fora. Where this occurs, the international human rights tribunal will require that the applicant exhaust local remedies or otherwise demonstrate that the remedies were unavailable or ineffective [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[186] Currie 2007, p. 374.

that this involvement does not exclude the granting of (far-reaching) remedies in the case of (serious) violations.[187] A State taking this stance may perhaps argue that its

[187] Cf. in that respect, for example, Sluiter who certainly sees a role for the competent judicial authority in the custodial State with respect to the supervision of human rights and who argues that the remedy of release, after consultation with the ICC, may indeed be among the remedies which the competent judicial authority in the custodial State can grant: "Do the national authorities grant the remedies they deem appropriate? Although this may follow from the role attributed to the national authorities, as envisaged by Article 59(2), the competent national court cannot grant remedies that may impede the execution of the request without first consulting with the court. As such, immediate release would be in violation of a state's obligations under the Statute [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Sluiter 2003 C, p. 625.) One of Sluiter's footnotes (ibid., n. 66) states: "The abduction of the person accompanied by serious mistreatment is an exception for egregious violations of human rights in the apprehension of the requested person. [This phrase was not correctly printed in this journal (cf. also n. 499 of Chapter V). It should read: "One could, however, make an exception for egregious violations of human rights in the apprehension of the requested person (for example, abduction of the person accompanied by serious mistreatment)." After the author of this study had asked Sluiter about these words, the latter confirmed this (and kindly provided the correct words), ChP.] In this situation, the competent national judge may rightfully assume that his duties under Article 59(2) do not tolerate any further detention." See also ibid., p. 644: "National courts should serve as the first protectors of the individual rights of arrested persons, with the ICC serving an important supervisory role." Note that the text at ibid., pp. 625-626 ("A court may not easily grant the release of a person accused of the most serious international crimes. However, with respect to serious human rights violation in the course of or following the arrest, the effective legal remedies provision may be indispensable in preserving the integrity of the subsequent international criminal proceedings [original footnotes omitted, ChP].") also seems to confirm that the competent judicial authority in the custodial State can grant the remedy of release, but this text has also been misprinted in the journal in question. The original (by Sluiter provided) text shows that Sluiter is not addressing the competent judicial authority in the custodial State here, but the ICC itself: "As far as the legal remedies are concerned to be provided by the Court [the capital 'C' clearly shows that Sluiter is writing about the ICC here, ChP], it is self-evident that the Court will not easily grant the release of a person accused of the most serious international crimes. Yet, in case of serious human rights violations in the course of or following arrest the provision of effective legal remedies may be indispensable with a view to preserving the integrity of the subsequent international criminal proceedings [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Be that as it may, Sluiter is in any case of the opinion that a release is amongst the remedies available to the competent judicial authority in the custodial State confronted by a male captus. Whether the remedy of a refusal to surrender is also at the authority's disposal in the case of a male captus is less clear. Although Sluiter mentions the possibility that human rights considerations may lead to an "obstacle to surrender" – this may include a refusal to surrender, although it must be admitted that a decision to release could also already be seen as a (temporary) obstacle to surrender – see ibid., p. 651 ("Following the procedure envisaged by Article 97, the requested state must not be hesitant to review the surrender in light of human rights obligations and must submit to human rights considerations, if necessary, as an obstacle to surrender."), he appears to connect this remedy not with past human rights violations, but with possible future violations, see ibid., pp. 647-648: "[I]t may be difficult to imagine a situation in which the Soering jurisprudence [see ns. 610 of Chapter V and 174 of the present chapter, ChP] may prevent surrender to the court. (…) It would go too far, however, to categorically exclude the possibility of the "Soering ground for refusal" in relation to international criminal proceedings." Although Sluiter does refer to male captus situations, which may, of course, involve human rights violations (see ibid., pp. 648-650), he does not seem to explicitly connect the remedy of refusal to surrender to such violations. (Note nevertheless, as already mentioned in this footnote, that he does consider that the remedy of release may be an appropriate remedy for "egregious violations of human rights in the apprehension of the requested person", and that such a release may not be limited to a formal release, but to a real release, blocking the surrender, see also Sluiter's use of the concept of 'release' in the ICTY Dokmanović case, see Chapter VI.) To provide a few other positions on this point: Young first argues that not every human rights violation must lead to competent judicial authority should in fact be able to grant remedies such as release in the case of an irregular arrest, because the ICC Statute prima facie does not contain this remedy (see Article 55 of the ICC Statute[188] and Chapter IX, where the

a refusal. This seems to imply that serious human rights violations can lead to a refusal. And indeed, he also mentions this possibility. However, a little later, he argues that the competent judicial authority should not have the jurisdiction to order a stay of the proceedings. See Young 2001, p. 352: "The principle of effective prosecution implies that not every violation results in a refusal to surrender, especially since rights violation can vary greatly in severity. It must be remembered that a State's refusal to surrender, when no country is willing and able to prosecute, is equivalent to a judicial stay of proceeding, which is tantamount to an acquittal. To warrant such an outcome, the rights violation must be so egregious that it is not reasonably possible for the accused to be guaranteed a fair trial. Most rights violations do not rise to this level and can be remedied by something short of a stay of the proceedings. (…) While rights violations may be remedied by a stay of proceeding or exclusion of evidence, it is suggested that the judicial officer in a surrender proceeding should not be given the jurisdiction to order these two remedies. These remedies have significant ramifications for the trial, and accordingly its implications should be left for the ICC to decide after surrender. Without the capability of obtaining all the relevant evidence, domestic courts will often be in a difficult position to decide on these issues pre-surrender." El Zeidy (2006, p. 456) is also of the opinion that "the national judge should not be competent to decline jurisdiction or stay proceedings at this point" (as is the case in the British ICC implementation act, see ibid. and n. 190), even though he admits that, because Art. 59 of the ICC Statute has not arranged anything in this respect, national laws (such as the ICC implementation acts of New Zealand, Australia and South Africa, see ibid.), may provide otherwise, see ibid., p. 455: "The apparent shortcoming of Article 59(2)(b) and (c) lies in the fact that the paragraphs lack any reference to a remedy in case of a state's failure to comply, thus leaving this problem to be resolved by the national authorities of the state. This leaves the national judge with wide discretionary powers to rule on the legality of the process (yet excluding the grounds set out in Article 58(1)(a) and (b)). For example, a manifest procedural error such as unlawful arrest and detention, or a violation of the person's rights, or any form of illegal rendition may sometimes result in a decision by the competent authorities to release the person in question [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (It may be interesting to note that El Zeidy, after these words, states (in n. 29) that "[t]his may prompt the Court to decline to exercise jurisdiction" and then refers to the male captus discussion, mentioning both the bene detentus cases of Eichmann and Alvarez-Machain and the male detentus cases of Hartley, Ebrahim and Toscanino.) Hall argues that the judicial authority can award reparations in the case of violations, but that "neither the determination by the national judicial authority that the suspect's rights were violated nor the remedies it adopted could prevent surrender to the Court." (Hall 2008 B, p. 1152.) It may, however, be good to note that Hall, when writing about the possible forms of reparation, also refers to restitution. As shown in Subsection 4.1 of Chapter III, where – it must be noted – reparation was not used in the human rights context but in the context of State responsibility, restitution means the re-establishment of the situation which existed before the wrongful act was committed. Restitution in the case of an unlawful arrest could thus mean the release of the unlawfully arrested person. That would mean (if Hall also accepts this reparation/remedy in the case of an unlawful arrest) that the release does not mean that the person will not be surrendered to the ICC. After all, whatever form of reparation (including restitution which may mean the release of the unlawfully arrested person) is chosen, it will not lead, according to him, to the non-surrender of the suspect to the ICC. Be that as it may, lesser forms of reparation, such as compensation, in any case seem to be a possibility, see Oosterveld, Perry and McManus 2002, p. 785 (writing about the Swiss cooperation law with the ICC): "The Swiss Law provides compensation for unjustified detention. The procedures and conditions for awards of compensation for the unjustified detention of persons subject to arrest and surrender to the ICC are the same as those provided in Switzerland under its federal law [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[188] Zappalà (2002 A, p. 1183) welcomes Art. 55 of the ICC Statute ("These provisions are certainly the most advanced text on the protection of pre-trial rights of persons during international criminal investigations. No such provisions were contained in the Nuremberg and Tokyo Charters, nor are present, at least certainly not in such a detailed form, in the ICTY and ICTR Statutes or RPEs. It is drafting history of this provision will be examined) and that at least one judicial authority, be it a national or international one, should be able to grant such a remedy if the suspect is not to become the victim of a process which is fragmented over two or more legal systems – a situation which can very easily occur.[189]

The competent judicial authority could hereby refer to the important status of the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest and detention, see the habeas corpus rights of Articles 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR and 5, paragraph 4 of the ECHR.[190] indisputable that, in the ICC Statute, there has been a clear attempt to improve the protection of rights relating to the administration of criminal justice, on the assumption that this is one of the parameters that will be examined in evaluating the fairness of the proceedings before the ICC."), but also criticises the most interesting (at least for the purpose of this book) provision here, para. 1 (d). However, he does not criticise the fact that the remedy of release is missing; he criticises the fact that the provision is in fact too faithful to other international texts (which, to a certain extent, is true, but also untrue given the fact that the remedy of release is missing). (The other remedy in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention (compensation) is also missing in this article, but it can be found in another article, namely in Art. 85, para. 1 of the ICC Statute.) See ibid., pp. 1197-1198: "[I]ts main defect is in its being too faithful to the other international texts. In particular, this fidelity becomes a defect when the ICC norm refers to other rules of the Statute without explicitly specifying which rules ('on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established in the Statute'). While this kind of drafting was necessary in international instruments concerning interstate judicial cooperation as the drafters could not be aware of the content of national laws on arrest and detention, the same reasoning does not apply to the Statute. Hence, it does not seem appropriate to refer to the criteria set forth in the Statute, without referring either to the criteria themselves or to the article(s) where they are expressed. As it stands the rule does not contain any precise content and it is therefore necessary to look at other norms of the Statute to identify the precise regulation to be applied in such cases. The grounds for arrest and concrete guarantees for persons arrested are provided for in the Statute elsewhere." (And then, reference is made to Art. 58 of the ICC Statute.) See also ibid., p. 1202: "Finally, a substantial criticism may be raised to the regulation of the rights of individuals in the ICC Statute. It relates to the issue of personal liberty. In spite of the generally very advanced model in terms of protection of individual rights, the protection of the right to liberty does not seem sufficiently developed. The normative framework for measures for provisional detention should have been more detailed. The Statute, although respectful at least of the minimum requirements, more for its silence than for express norms, comes close to abridging international human rights standards. It can be affirmed that in the field of the right to liberty and the issue of provisional detention, the evolution from the Nuremberg model towards more developed forms of international criminal justice has been less remarkable [original footnote omitted, ChP]." The footnote in question (40) reads: "Naturally, this can be explained by the peculiar nature of these Tribunals, the absence of enforcement agents, the difficulties in securing the presence of defendants and so on. This, however, in spite being a serious problem should not be a justification for contrasts with internationally recognized standards to be applied in the administration of criminal justice."

---

[189] Cf. also Klip 1997, p. 309, writing on the inter-State context and the ECHR: "The European Convention on Human Rights was drafted on the presumption that all implementation and applicability of the law is a responsibility of a single (clearly identified) state. The developments described no longer correspond to that presumption. States can also cooperate in a violation of the Convention. It seems fair to say that, the more states are responsible for ensuring the guarantees of the Convention, the less protection exists in reality [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[190] For another view, see Rastan 2008, p. 433: "The role of national bodies in relation to Court requests, moreover, is strictly confined. In arrest proceedings, for example, while the judicial authorities of the custodial state are to determine whether proper process has been served and the arrested person's rights have been respected, they may not examine the legality of the warrant itself or rule on a habeas corpus challenge." See also Samuels 2006, p. 19, writing about the International Criminal Court Act 2001 (implementing the Rome Statute in the law of England, Wales and Northern Ireland): "The Office of

The competent judicial authority may even decide that the stronger remedy of refusal to surrender (note again that a release does not preclude the re-arrest and hence the surrender) may be appropriate, for example, in the (admittedly rather theoretical but not inconceivable) case that the competent judicial authority has credible information that the ICC itself is responsible for a male captus operation. Furthermore, it may also argue that Article 59 of the ICC Statute only stipulates minimum requirements[191] and that it cannot be prevented from granting greater protection in the field of due process/human rights.[192]

What should also be taken into account is the previously mentioned point (see footnote 34 and accompanying text) which can be connected to the concepts of inability and unwillingness; very often, the State which has to surrender a person to the ICC is considered unable or unwilling to investigate and prosecute a certain case itself. Although this may not necessarily mean that that State is also unable or unwilling to cooperate with the ICC, there may still be a considerable overlap. Now, if a State is clearly unwilling to cooperate with the ICC, it could, of course, abuse Article 59 of the ICC Statute and argue that a person, even if this is not the case, was not arrested in accordance with the proper process or that the person's rights were not respected, and that this determination should lead to that person's release or even a refusal to surrender.[193] In such cases, one may be tempted to argue that it should not be up to the national authorities to grant far-reaching remedies or even to review the arrest and detention,[194] see also footnote 119 of Chapter VII.

---

the Prosecutor will then issue a warrant, which must be endorsed in a pre-trial ICC chamber, requesting the Member State where the accused happens to be to be arrested and surrendered. The Member State, i.e. in the UK the Secretary of State, must comply; in effect the surrender will be automatic. The suspect has certain rights (…) [b]ut the warrant cannot be challenged on the merits. (…) The UK court will simply make a delivery order and he will be handed over. Reliance upon the Bail Act, habeas corpus, judicial review or Article 5 of the European Convention on Human Rights will not avail, provided that the ICC powers have been complied with. A Pinochet-type case lasting many months and going to the highest court in the land will not happen." Indeed, in Chapter 7 of this Act, one can read in Part 2 ('Arrest and Delivery of Persons') under 5 ('Proceedings for Delivery Order'), para. 8: "If the court determines (a) that the person has not been lawfully arrested in pursuance of the warrant, or (b) that the person's rights have not been respected, it shall make a declaration or declarator to that effect, but may not grant any other relief." (See also n. 187.)

[191] See Young 2001, p. 341.

[192] It should, by the way, be noted that Art. 119 of the ICC Statute ('Settlement of disputes') does not seem to jeopardise the possibility of a State granting remedies obstructing the surrender of the suspect. Although the ICC may, after the State has notified the ICC that it cannot surrender the person in question and after consultations, determine that the State in question is nevertheless obliged to surrender the person, this State can still refuse to do so. In other words: Art. 119 of the ICC Statute cannot force a State to surrender a person: it only gives the ICC the power to have the final say in settling the dispute. This means that the ICC, pursuant to Artt. 119 and 87, para. 7 of the ICC Statute, can make a finding that the State in question has failed to comply with the request to cooperate by the Court and refer the matter to the ASP or, where the UNSC referred the matter to the Court, to the UNSC.

[193] Cf. the concerns of the ICTY Prosecutor in Todorović and Nikolić, see ns. 344 and 476 of Chapter VI.

[194] Gillett (2008, p. 23, writing about the topic of "assisted arrests", arrests executed by other States or international forces, see also n. 56) suggests with respect to "unable" States that the procedure of Art. 59 of the ICC Statute may perhaps also be executed in the State assisting in the arrest: "In the scenarios

One could think here of the situation in Darfur. Even though Sudan may be obliged, pursuant to UNSC Resolution 1593 of 31 March 2005, to "cooperate fully" with the ICC (which may[195] mean it should follow the normal arrest and surrender provisions that apply to States Parties), "Sudan has always openly expressed its dissatisfaction with the Court and its intention not to cooperate".[196] Sluiter very clearly points to the dangers of abusing Article 59 of the ICC Statute in such situations:

> Elsewhere[[197]] I argue that this provision – the purpose of which is laudable, namely improving the protection of arrested persons in the custodial state – may in the hands of uncooperative states turn out to be a Trojan horse. Article 59 grants arrested individuals a number of rights, but the question is whether, in case these rights are violated, domestic courts can take binding and final decisions as to the appropriate remedy. For example, if Sudanese police officers do not comply with the proper procedural rules (Article 59(2)(b)), can the competent court decide that the arrested person has to be released, with prejudice to the arresting authorities? Article 59 does not provide for such a far-reaching remedy, but does not exclude it either. It does, however, allow for granting interim release pending the surrender process, and the ICC appears not to be able to exercise much control over this. In a way, it is a paradox that the state that is generally uncooperative is expected to implement in good faith the protection of Article 59; it is almost an invitation for abuse [original footnote omitted, ChP].[198] of substantial state collapse, where an assisted arrest would generally be envisaged, it is unlikely that the competent authorities in the territorial state would be operational. However, the failure to accord the accused with such an initial appearance would be a significant breach of the provisions of the Statute. Consequently, if, following an assisted arrest, the initial appearance could not be held either in the regular courts or in a specially constituted tribunal in the territorial state, then, as a fallback position, it could be held on the territory of the state making the arrest. This possibility is left open through the Statute's use of the term "custodial State" in Article 59, rather than the term "the State on the territory of which a person may be found" as is used in relation to transfers of requests for arrest [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

---

[195] The exact meaning of these words is, however, unfortunately unclear, see Sluiter 2008 B, pp. 876*ff*. Sluiter further shows that this uncertainty may also have its effect on a person's right to liberty and security, see ibid., pp. 877-878: "An individual enjoys the right not to be subjected to arbitrary arrest and detention. This implies that any deprivation of liberty should take place 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law'; at a minimum, procedures must have a legal basis and correspond to the requirements of foreseeability and accessibility. One may wonder whether this standard is met when the arrest and detention ultimately hinge on the vague aspiration of 'full cooperation', without further concretization. In any event, an arrested person is deprived of adequate opportunity to challenge arrest and subsequent surrender if he cannot even have the slightest clue as to the content of the obligations incumbent upon Sudan [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[196] Ibid., p. 873. For instance, even when he was not yet under investigation by the ICC himself, "President Omar Bashir took an oath "thrice in the name of Almighty Allah that I shall never hand any Sudanese national to a foreign court."" (E. Reeves, 'Darfur and the International Criminal Court', Middle East Report Online, 29 April 2005, available at: http://www.merip.org/mero/mero042905.html.) As noted above (see n. 47 and accompanying text), this is different for the matter of the LRA leaders as Sudan has signed a memorandum of understanding with the ICC pledging to hand over these persons to The Hague.

[197] See Sluiter 2009, p. 468.

[198] Sluiter 2008 B, pp. 882-883.

Sluiter therefore concludes, and it is hard not to agree with him, that > Part 9 is not a very helpful legal tool in obtaining cooperation from a state like Sudan. For the future, the Assembly of States Parties would be well advised to re-assess Part 9 in light of the Court's experiences with the Darfur situation. Undeniably in my view, more corrective mechanisms must be inserted in relation to clearly uncooperative states.[199]

A view that is linked to the above-mentioned "unable or unwilling" formula is that in any case, whatever the situation may be at the national level, the ICC – if the suspect asks for this or when the ICC itself is aware of certain irregularities – should also check the correctness of the arrest and surrender procedures at the national level. This is because it may very well be the case that, if it is determined by the ICC that the State in question is unable to investigate or prosecute a case itself, the State's national legal system may be in ruins. In fact, this is not so unusual in the conflict zones or post-conflict zones in which the ICC is investigating. In this context, one can wonder how thorough the national check pursuant to Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute will be.[200] In addition, one can imagine that a State will be under considerable pressure from the international community to surrender the person in its custody to the ICC as soon as possible. Hence, it may at least be wise – but probably also legally mandatory under certain circumstances; the following chapters will examine this last point in more detail – if the ICC judges were also to check for themselves, thereby functioning as an extra safety net, whether the national arrest and detention have been executed as they should have been and if not, to grant the suspect the appropriate remedies.[201]

---

[199] Ibid., p. 883. Sluiter therefore recommends, among other things, that "the Assembly of States Parties should recognize that Part 9 of the Statute is ill-suited for (i) Security Council referrals affecting states non-parties and (ii) uncooperative states. It is advisable to amend the Statute in two respects. First, a degree of flexibility regarding the cooperation law applicable in case of Security Council referrals is fully justified. Second, the Statute must provide for stronger corrective mechanisms in relation to uncooperative states. For example (…), the protection offered by Article 59 cannot – even in exceptional circumstances, such as an uncooperative state – result in the (interim) release of the arrested person." (Ibid., p. 884.) (Arguably, the word "even" must be deleted here: Art. 59 of the ICC Statute clearly permits, and Sluiter also acknowledges this, see ibid., p. 883, an interim release and perhaps also a 'real' release. However, one can agree with Sluiter that in exceptional cases, such as with uncooperative States, these remedies should not be allowed.) Cf. also Henquet 1999, p. 998, writing about the cooperation obligations of States in the context of a UNSC referral: "It would have been preferable if the drafters of the ICC Statute had made adequate arrangements in Part 9 of the ICC Statute."

[200] See also Sluiter 2006 A, p. 153.

[201] See also Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 644 ("National courts should serve as the first protectors of the individual rights of arrested persons, with the ICC serving an important supervisory role.") and 651, where he writes that the ICC Statute "makes the right to liberty and security of persons its primary concern by imposing clear obligations on the arresting and detaining state. The respect for this right in practice depends on the question of whether the arresting and detaining state and the ICC can mutually supervise their respective activities. Thus, the court should supervise the legality of the arrest and detention at the national level. The provision of effective legal remedies, if necessary, is an indispensable element of such supervision." See also ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the

A final interesting point in this context is the previously mentioned fact[202] that, in certain situations, domestic authorities may argue that the national situation is one of emergency/war, justifying a certain derogation from human rights provisions. In such situations, domestic authorities may be of the opinion that the arrest/detention of a suspect was in accordance with the domestic procedures, even if these procedures omit human rights provisions. One can question what the ICC should do in such situations if it reviews, as an extra safety net, these national procedures. In principle, such arrests/detentions cannot indeed be seen as violating national law. Nevertheless, one can argue that the ICC should also ensure that every suspect in the context of an ICC case receives a minimum of human rights protection. See in that respect, for example, Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute which states that "[i]n respect of an investigation under this Statute, a person: (…) Shall not be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention, and shall not be deprived of his or her liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established in this Statute." As clarified in footnote 168, the reference in this provision to the fact that deprivation of liberty is only possible "in accordance with such procedures as are established in this Statute" probably means that all the arrest and detention provisions in the ICC Statute, including Article 59 of the ICC Statute, which, in turn, refers to, among other things, national procedural law, must be complied with before one can speak of a proper deprivation of liberty in the context of the ICC. Hence, in reviewing whether this human right has been complied with in the context of an ICC case, ICC judges should not only check whether the national procedures (which may deviate from the normal procedures

---

Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the powers of the Pre-Trial Chamber to review proprio motu the pre-trial detention of Germain Katanga' (Urgent, Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 18 March 2008, p. 8: "[A]ccording to articles 55, 57 and 67, one of the functions of the Chamber is to be the ultimate guarantor of the rights of the Defence, including the right "not to be deprived of his or her liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established in the Statute"". Note that Art. 67 of the ICC Statute ('Rights of the accused'), strictly speaking, only applies to accused, to persons of whom the charges have been confirmed, to persons at the actual trial (see also n. 30 of Chapter I). However, it is also clear that some elements of this provision have a pre-trial dimension. See, for example, Rule 121 of the ICC RPE ('Proceedings before the confirmation hearing'), para. 1: "A person subject to a warrant of arrest or a summons to appear under article 58 shall appear before the Pre-Trial Chamber, in the presence of the Prosecutor, promptly upon arriving at the Court. Subject to the provisions of articles 60 and 61, the person shall enjoy the rights set forth in article 67." See also Schabas 2008, p. 1251: "[R]ights during an investigation are set out in a distinct provision of the Statute. Nevertheless, the phrase "in the determination of any charge" is essentially identical to the wording of the international models, such as article 6 para. 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights. The European Court of Human Rights considers this to be "the official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he has committed a criminal offence" or an act that has "the implication of such an allegation and which likewise substantially affects the situation of the suspect". An individual might become "substantially affected", to borrow the Strasbourg terminology, once a State party has asked that a case be examined, or upon the application by the Prosecutor to initiate an investigation. If notions of complementarity are factored in, the right may even be extended to encompass proceedings under domestic law prior to exercise of jurisdiction of the Court [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also n. 261.

[202] See n. 395 of Chapter III.

because of the emergency situation) have been complied with. They must also check whether the arrest/detention in general can be seen as non-arbitrary. These general words, including the still-to-discuss paragraph 3 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute (see the next chapter), can be used by the ICC judges to ensure that every suspect receives the same minimum human rights protection, whatever the domestic situation may be.[203]

The above exposition shows that it is difficult to come up with a clear-cut solution to the problems engendered by Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute. As previously explained, much will depend on the national situation and how a State views its duties vis-à-vis the ICC. Nevertheless, one can agree with most authors that States should be very reluctant to refuse the surrender of a suspect. Even though the national competent judicial authority is, of course, in the best position to consider the national regulations, the ICC is seemingly best positioned to consider all the different elements playing a role in the process of an arrest and surrender. Hence, it would be very unfortunate if the ICC were not to even get the chance to consider these matters. The fact that under certain circumstances States could abuse Article 59 of the ICC Statute in refusing surrender also argues in favour of such a position. If a State has determined pursuant to Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute that the arrest of the suspect was not in accordance with the proper procedure or that the rights of the suspect were not respected, but nevertheless decides to surrender the person to the ICC, its determinations can then be taken into account at the ICC level so that the ICC judges can consider them (and accord appropriate remedies).[204]

---

[203] Sluiter notes that "one can imagine a difference in degree of the ICC's supervisory role; clearly, its supervision of respect for national process should be far more marginal than supervision of the internationally protected rights of each arrested person." (Sluiter 2009, p. 472.) As clarified in the main text, it is indeed true that the ICC judges should focus on human rights (so that every suspect receives the same minimum protection) rather than on national procedures (which may, after all, differ from State to State and which may be very low in protection because of a derogation caused by an emergency situation), see ibid., p. 474: "In my view, the purpose of Article 59 is not only to ensure the application of a (national) legal framework to the implementation of arrest warrants, but also the application of a framework and overall practice which are consistent with international human rights standards. A different view, dramatically decreases protection and subjects an arrested person to the whims of domestic law and approaches. As these may vary for each State, we furthermore may be confronted with unacceptable inequality in treatment." Nevertheless, as also clarified in the main text, one must not forget either that supervising human rights may also, de facto, involve a review of national procedures. For example, if the ICC wants to check whether a suspect's right to liberty and security was not violated, it must also examine whether the arrest/detention at the national level was executed in conformity with the correct (national) procedures. In addition, a focus on human rights is good, but not enough. As earlier submitted in this study, it may very well be that (serious) irregularities occur which need to be remedied, but which may, strictly speaking, not be seen as proper human rights violations. (One could hereby think of an abduction performed by private individuals. The judge reviewing this male captus may be of the opinion that private individuals cannot violate human rights and thus that no human rights violation has occurred, see n. 123 of Chapter VII and Subsection 3.2 of Chapter III.)

[204] See the already-mentioned situation in the UK as described in n. 190. See also Bekou and Shah 2006, pp. 528-529, describing the comparable approach taken by Uganda: "S.30 of the Ugandan Bill provides a detailed procedure for dealing with the irregularities of arrest. A magistrate is to investigate

Nevertheless, certain extreme circumstances – and obvious problems such as the fact that the person arrested is not the person in which the ICC is interested – may also lead to justified refusals on the part of the custodial State, for example, in the – again highly unlikely but not impossible – situation that the suspect arrived in the custody of the custodial State because of an abduction orchestrated by the ICC. Similarly, the State may refuse surrender on the basis of the Soering and Naletilić jurisprudence,[205] even though it is expected/hoped that this will not happen. If, however, the State ultimately decides not to surrender the person in question, it should try to ensure that the person is brought to justice elsewhere. The fact that the State deems the ICC not to be the appropriate authority for adjudication – for example, because of the two above-mentioned extreme circumstances – does not mean that the person in question may then not be judged by a national court which also has jurisdiction over that person and which has nothing to do with the deficiencies of the ICC, cf. also the point made earlier that a male detentus outcome cannot be equated with impunity of the suspect. (In that case, the surrendering court may perhaps request the other national court to take into account the due process/human rights violations committed at the pre-trial stage and to grant appropriate remedies.)

Although a refusal may thus be seen as an exception, a State may very well be right to argue that a release (which does not preclude a re-arrest and surrender) may constitute the correct legal remedy if one accepts that human rights law, which, in principle, includes the remedy of release as can be found in Articles 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR and 5, paragraph 4 of the ECHR, is to be taken into account when looking at the scope of Article 59 of the ICC Statute. Nevertheless, judges may also be of the opinion in such circumstances, see also earlier chapters of this book, that the remedy of release is problematic (because it may be seen as an over-simplified pro forma remedy for an unlawful detention and because it may lead to a suspect absconding) and should therefore be avoided. Judges may then argue that they will surrender the suspect instead, while requesting the ICC that the suspect receives an the lawfulness of arrest and determine whether the rights of the arrestee were respected or not. Should the magistrate determine that the arrest was conducted unlawfully or that the rights of the individual were violated, then a declaration should be made to that effect. Such a declaration should then be transmitted to the Court, giving the Court the opportunity to assess the allegations and, should they be upheld, to decide upon the appropriate remedy. The magistrate 'may not grant any other form of relief', apart from requiring an explanation for the unlawful behaviour. Therefore, under Ugandan legislation, surrender will still go ahead [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Bekou and Shah very much favour this approach (see ibid., p. 529): "[M]any States Parties have not opted to use such processes. Instead, there is a tendency to deal with domestic procedural and rights issues themselves, rather than submit such issues for adjudication by the Court. This is understandable in the sense that to allow the Court effectively to pass judgment on the failures of a domestic system is an intrusion into the realms of State sovereignty which is, of course, zealously guarded. Such an approach is only compliant with the Rome Statute if the remedies for a rights violation do not preclude surrender to the Court. [But see n. 181, ChP.] The Ugandan method is clearly preferable and should be adopted by other African States. This approach allows the Court to determine whether a violation of the individual's rights is so grave as to constitute an abuse of process that would render a trial against the interests of justice, or, in less severe situations, compensation to be awarded [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

---

[205] See n. 174.

appropriate remedy for the pre-trial irregularities, taking all the different aspects of the case into account.

3.3 The arrest and surrender regime Part III

Now that paragraph 2 of Article 59 of the ICC Statute has been examined in more detail, it is time to look at its other paragraphs (and at the remaining provisions of the ICC arrest and surrender regime). Paragraphs 3-6 of Article 59 of the ICC Statute address a person's right to apply for interim release/bail[206] pending surrender (this is different from interim release pending trial, which will be discussed infra).[207] The fact that there exists such a possibility on paper constitutes an important deviation from the 'pure' vertical arrest and surrender regimes of the ICTY and ICTR where it is, in principle, impossible for national authorities to release a person pending surrender/transfer.[208] Yet it is fair to wonder how often this will actually happen in the future. According to paragraph 4 of this provision, "the competent authority in the custodial State shall consider whether, given the gravity of the alleged crimes, there are urgent and exceptional circumstances to justify interim release".[209] The words "exceptional circumstances", of course, are reminiscent of the criticised Rule 65 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE which also contained (until 1999 and 2003, respectively) this requirement.[210] In addition, the national authority must also take into account the ICC's recommendations relating to the request for interim release pending surrender.[211] One can imagine that these conditions will not easily lead to an interim release. However, as also explained in Chapter VI, even though the formulation of this provision may be problematic[212]

---

[206] See Prost 2005, p. 81.

[207] See Art. 59, para. 3 of the ICC Statute: "The person arrested shall have the right to apply to the competent authority in the custodial State for interim release pending surrender."

[208] See Swart 2002 A, p. 1254, Sluiter 2003 C, p. 623 and Hall 2008 B, p. 1153. See also n. 1028 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[209] The remainder of this paragraph stipulates that the competent authority in the custodial State shall consider "whether necessary safeguards exist to ensure that the custodial State can fulfil its duty to surrender the person to the Court. It shall not be open to the competent authority of the custodial State to consider whether the warrant of arrest was properly issued in accordance with article 58, paragraph 1 (a) and (b)." This last point is very important and has already been discussed earlier, namely that the competent authority may not perform the substantive legality check of the habeas corpus concept; the authority may not examine whether the arrest was made on the correct grounds. This is the domain of the ICC alone.

[210] See n. 97 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[211] See Art. 59, para. 5 of the ICC Statute: "The Pre-Trial Chamber shall be notified of any request for interim release and shall make recommendations to the competent authority in the custodial State. The competent authority in the custodial State shall give full consideration to such recommendations, including any recommendations on measures to prevent the escape of the person, before rendering its decision." The influence of the ICC on this issue can also be identified after the release has been granted, see para. 6 of Art. 59 of the ICC Statute: "If the person is granted interim release, the Pre-Trial Chamber may request periodic reports on the status of the interim release."

[212] But see Sluiter 2009, p. 469: "[T]he reference to 'urgent and exceptional circumstances to justify interim release' is reminiscent of the ICTY and ICTR approach to pre-trial detention as a rule. However, here it is fully justified, in light of the fact that the Court has already decided pursuant to and may receive the same criticism as the older version of Rule 65 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE,[213] one can expect that with a different provision on interim release pending surrender, the factual outcome may very well also be that detention is the rule and release the exception. And furthermore, the fact that the competent authority will not quickly provisionally release a person pending surrender in the context of ICC proceedings, may very well have justified grounds, such as social disturbance and the risk of absconding, grounds which have their origin in the seriousness of the person's alleged crimes.

A few observations from Swart about the detention pending surrender which deserve to be mentioned here is that first, "[t]he rights of the person being held in custody and the treatment he will receive are determined by the laws of the requested State";[214] secondly, that "the time spent in detention by the convicted person on the territory of the requested State in accordance with an order of the Court must be deduced from a sentence of imprisonment"[215] and thirdly, that > Article 85(1) grants an enforceable right to compensation to anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention. It does not seem to matter whether the unlawfulness of arrest or detention was due to the conduct of the Court or that of the requested State.[216]

Article 58 that it is necessary to arrest the person concerned, and any deviation from that decision should be based on very strong grounds."

[213] See Vandermeersch 2004, p. 153, n. 116 (writing about Art. 59, para. 4 of the ICC Statute and its counterpart in the Belgian (draft) Implementation Law): "In other words, detention is regarded as the rule to which release is the exception: this is at odds with municipal criminal law on pre-trial detention." This is also noted, for example, by Oosterveld, Perry and McManus (2002, pp. 782-783) with respect to the Swiss cooperation law: "The general principle is that persons should be kept in detention pending surrender to the Court [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Khan 2008, p. 1162, discussing the "onerous requirements of Article 59(4)": "Article 59 (detention in the custodial state) effectively creates a presumption in favour of custody by making detention the norm unless "there are urgent and exceptional circumstances to justify interim release" [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Prost (2005, p. 81) writes that "[t]he test applicable to such bail applications is a high one and probably varies from the normal tests applicable to common crimes under domestic laws." However, the test may not be that different from the national level if the national judge is not dealing with common crimes but with serious crimes, see Swart (2002 A, p. 1254), who notes that the fact that the competent authority must "balance the gravity of the alleged crimes against any urgent and exceptional circumstances that may justify interim release" reflects "current practices in the field of extradition".

[214] Swart 2002 A, p. 1255.

[215] Ibid. (Note that Art. 78, para. 2 of the ICC Statute also states that "[t]he Court may deduct any time otherwise spent in detention in connection with conduct underlying the crime.")

[216] Ibid. See also Sluiter 2009, p. 468: "[W]hen the procedure of Article 59 is not followed – or not followed correctly – there is a direct basis for the applicability of Article 85, in my view. The latter provision stipulates that 'anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention shall have an enforceable right to compensation'. Put in these broad terms, adopting verbatim the wording of Article 9 (5) ICCPR, it should not matter who was responsible for the unlawful arrest, and certainly applies in my opinion to direct violation of the Court's own statutory provision [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally DeFrancia 2001, p. 1408, Staker 2008, pp. 1501-1502 and Hall 2008 B, p. 1153.

The broad responsibility enclosed in this provision, which will not be found in the context of the ICTY and ICTR,[217] and which will be returned to in the remainder of this book, is to be welcomed since it minimises the chance that a suspect falls into a legal vacuum caused by the fragmentation of his criminal process over two or more legal systems.

Finally, the last paragraph of Article 59 of the ICC Statute states that "[o]nce ordered to be surrendered by the custodial State, the person shall be delivered to the Court as soon as possible".[218]

One can imagine that a person who believes that his rights were not respected at this stage but whose claims were rejected by the custodial State, may try to argue before human rights bodies such as the ECtHR and the HRC that the custodial State, in rejecting these claims, violated its obligations under human rights treaties. Much attention has already been paid to the human rights context and the view of the human rights courts on the right to liberty and security and the right not to be arrested/detained so at this point, it will suffice to establish whether litigation before these human rights bodies is in fact possible in the context of the ICC surrender phase.[219] In addition, one might wonder what would happen if these bodies were indeed to determine that the custodial State violated certain human rights provisions to which a suspect was entitled. Would this also have an effect on the ICC proceedings, for example? Finally, the question arises as to whether ICC decisions themselves can also be assessed by such supervisory bodies.

First of all, it would seem, naturally taking into account that much also depends on the situation in the custodial State,[220] that a suspect may indeed file a complaint in this context[221] but that the tribunal in question will probably not wait for a decision to be rendered. The Milošević v. The Netherlands case may serve as an example. As was already explained in Chapter VI, after he was transferred to the ICTY on 29 June 2001, Milošević "brought summary civil proceedings (kort geding) against the Netherlands State before the President of the Regional Court (arrondissementsrechtbank) of The Hague".[222] He asked the Court primarily to

[217] See also Gordon 2007, p. 669: "Article 85 of the Rome Statute recognizes a degree of ICC "cradle-to-grave supervisory power" by granting an "enforceable right to compensation" for anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention. Once again, there is no comparable provision in the statutes or rules of the ad hoc Tribunals [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[218] Art. 59, para. 7 of the ICC Statute.

[219] Although this topic is discussed here, in the context of the provisions where a person has not yet been surrendered to The Hague, litigation before the human rights bodies may perhaps also take place after a person's surrender to the ICC, see El Zeidy 2006, p. 460.

[220] Obviously, a State needs to be a party to a certain human rights instrument. One may also think of the question whether, if so, individuals can file complaints with the supervisory body in question.

[221] See Sluiter 2003 C, p. 625: "[D]epending on the custodial state, the arrested person may request the international human rights courts or supervisory mechanisms to review the arrest and surrender in light of the state's obligations under certain human rights treaties [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[222] ECtHR (Second Section), 'Decision as to the admissibility of Application No. 77631/01 by Slobodan Milošević against the Netherlands', 19 March 2002, p. 3. For the Dutch kort geding, see Arrondissementsrechtbank 's-Gravenhage, Sector Civiel Recht – President, Vonnis in kort geding van 31 augustus 2001, gewezen in de zaak met rolnummer KG 01/975 van: Slobodan Milošević tegen de Staat der Nederlanden, LJN: AD3266. The English translation can be found at: http://icrc.org/ihl-

order the defendant, the Dutch State, to release him unconditionally because, among other things, "[t]he so-called Tribunal, elements in the Serbian government and the defendant blatantly kidnapped and abducted him in a coordinated action, which must be regarded as a flagrant breach of his human rights".[223] However, the President of the District Court in The Hague determined that the Netherlands had transferred its jurisdiction to hear an application for release from detention to the Tribunal and hence that this, or any other, Dutch court did not have jurisdiction to decide on Milošević's application for release.[224]

Such a decision would probably also be rendered in the ICC context if that context is confronted by a similar case. After all, with the exception that Dutch law would be applicable to the pre-surrender phase (see Article 59, paragraphs 1 and 2 of the ICC Statute), once the suspect has been surrendered to the ICC, he can no longer apply to the Dutch authorities for release.[225]

To return to the ICTY context, after the decision of the District Court, Milošević "lodged an appeal against this judgment, but withdrew it again as of 17 January 2002",[226] apparently because he believed that it would be to no avail since the District Court had stated that the Dutch courts (plural!) have no jurisdiction to decide on the application. Finally, on 20 December 2001, Milošević's counsel lodged a series of complaints with the ECtHR,[227] but the European Court quickly declared his entire application inadmissible, explaining that domestic remedies had not been exhausted. Although Milošević claimed that the judgment of the District Court (which stated that Dutch courts have no jurisdiction to decide on the application) showed that no adequate and effective domestic remedies were available, the ECtHR stated that > the applicant did not make use of the opportunities offered by Netherlands law to challenge this finding; he withdrew his appeal to the Court of Appeal and in so doing also deprived himself of the possibility of lodging a subsequent appeal on points of law to the Supreme Court. The Court reiterates that the existence of mere doubts as nat.nsf/46707c419d6bdfa24125673e00508145/012854276cd2950dc1256da20051ac68!OpenDocument. See finally also Strijards 2001, p. 97.

---

[223] The English translation of the Dutch kort geding at: http://icrc.org/ihl-nat.nsf/46707c419d6bdfa24125673e00508145/012854276cd2950dc1256da20051ac68!OpenDocument.

[224] See ibid.

[225] See Bevers, Blokker and Roording 2003, p. 151: "Article 88 of the ICC Implementation Act, like Article 17 of the Implementation Act for the ICTY, provides that Dutch legislation is not applicable to detention by and on behalf of the Court in its premises." Sluiter (2004 A, p. 173, n. 50) wonders "whether this position is in line with recent jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, on the basis of which a certain 'residual responsibility' could be established for the 'host-state' in respect of human rights violations committed by the international organisations on its territory." This point will also be discussed in the main text (and in n. 243) in a few moments.

[226] ECtHR (Second Section), 'Decision as to the admissibility of Application No. 77631/01 by Slobodan Milošević against the Netherlands', 19 March 2002, p. 4.

[227] Milošević claimed that the following rights of the ECHR had been violated: Art. 5, paras. 1 (among other things, because of his unlawful transfer from the FRY to The Hague), 2 and 4, Art. 6, paras. 1, 2 and 3 (c), Artt. 10, 13 and 14. See ibid., pp. 4-6.

> to the prospects of success of a particular remedy which is not obviously futile is not a valid reason for failing to exhaust domestic remedies (...).[228]

The ICTY had not adjourned its proceedings pending the ECtHR proceedings[229] and it is to be expected that the ICC will not do so either. However, it is still unclear what would have happened if the human rights body in question had determined that the surrendering State had violated its human rights obligations. Would this also have an effect on the ICC proceedings? This question basically boils down to the issue of the extent to which the ICC is bound by decisions from these human rights bodies. In principle, the ICC is not bound by these decisions as it is not a party to the ECHR/ICCPR.[230] Nevertheless, as will also be shown in the next chapter, human rights law, and this includes decisions from human rights bodies, may still have considerable influence on the ICC proceedings. Therefore, the case may not be as clear-cut as initially thought. This point will be further discussed in the next chapter.

A related question is to what extent human rights bodies can review the ICC decisions themselves. For example, if a suspect believes that certain ICC decisions or procedures have violated his human right to liberty and security, can he then go to such supervisory bodies as the HRC and the ECtHR? Although human rights law, including decisions from human rights bodies, may influence the decisions of the ICC judges, see again the next chapter, these decisions themselves cannot be reviewed by the supervisory bodies for consistency. The ICC itself "is not subject to the human rights international supervisory mechanisms [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[231] This is because "[a]ll supervisory mechanisms regarding human rights only receive complaints against states".[232] Klip has criticised this situation[233] in the

---

[228] Ibid., p. 6.

[229] See also El Zeidy 2006, p. 461, who likewise refers to the Naletilić case (see n. 174) where "the ICTY proceeded with the surrender of the accused to the Tribunal without waiting for a decision of the ECHR."

[230] See also ibid.

[231] Sluiter 2003 C, p. 646.

[232] Klip 1997, p. 301. See also Zappalà 2003, p. 9.

[233] See Klip 1997, p. 310: "It should not be neglected that the [European] Court [of Human Rights] itself established an important nexus: "the Convention must be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions (…) and it is designed to safeguard the individual in a real and practical way as regards those areas with which it deals." In the light of the developments described in this article, it requires that complaints against two or more states concerning international cooperation and complaints against a collectivity of states concerning decisions of organisations established by these states, be declared admissible. The question of the individual responsibility of a state should be dealt with after establishing that a violation of the Convention took place. To declare an application inadmissible on the ground that it is not directed against one party but to a collectivity of states (…) would make the Convention meaningless for a lot of violations in the field of international criminal law [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

context of the ICTY/ICTR[234] and the (then future) ICC,[235] a point that has also been aired by Sluiter.[236]

One can question whether States, which have responsibilities in the field of human rights protection, do not circumvent human rights safeguards by, for example, establishing international courts whose decisions cannot be reviewed by national courts or supervisory bodies. It is interesting to refer in that respect to the 1999 case Waite and Kennedy v. Germany before the ECtHR, which involved another international organisation, the ESA (European Space Agency). Waite and Kennedy complained that Germany had violated Article 6, paragraph 1 of the ECHR (which, among other things, states that everyone is entitled to a hearing by a tribunal), because "they had been denied access to a court for a determination of their dispute with ESA in connection with an issue under German labour law".[237] Although Waite and Kennedy were able to bring their problem to the attention of several German courts, their applications were declared inadmissible as the German courts found that ESA could rely on its immunity from their jurisdiction[238] – an immunity which would also be available to the ICC incidentally.[239] The European Court wondered whether "this degree of access limited to a preliminary issue was sufficient to secure the applicants' "right to a court"".[240] This point also involved the matter of immunity from jurisdiction of course. In this context, the European Court stressed more generally the importance of immunity from jurisdiction accorded to international organisations,[241] but also warned:

---

[234] See ibid., pp. 300*ff*.

[235] See ibid., p. 304.

[236] See, for example, Sluiter 2007, pp. 19-20. Nevertheless, Zappalà (2003, pp. 13-14) argues: "At this stage of development of the international community, an institutional relationship between human rights monitoring systems and international criminal tribunals or the ICC does not exist, nor is it realistic to think it will be set up in the near future. (…) In the international legal order each subsystem tends to be self-contained and to operate as a 'monad'. Additionally, there does not seem to be an appropriate international organ to conduct such a review: regional human rights courts, on account of their non-universal character, are not suitable as they do not have international legitimacy, while the UN Committee does not really operate as a judicial body. The most realistic perspective is to strengthen human rights protection within the system and ensure that rules are thoroughly respected both by national and international organs. Nonetheless, a monitoring process need not be realized perforce on an institutional basis, but may be effectively conducted by States, NGOs, international media, and the academic community [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[237] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Waite and Kennedy v. Germany, Application No. 26083/94, 'Judgment', 18 February 1999, para. 43.

[238] See ibid., para. 51.

[239] See Bevers, Blokker and Roording 2003, pp. 152-153: "If a suspect appeals to a Dutch court in relation to a procedure before the ICC, the Dutch court will be obliged to honour a claim of immunity."

[240] ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Waite and Kennedy v. Germany, Application No. 26083/94, 'Judgment', 18 February 1999, para. 58.

[241] Ibid., para. 63: "Like the Commission, the Court points out that the attribution of privileges and immunities to international organisations is an essential means of ensuring the proper functioning of such organisations free from unilateral interference by individual governments. The immunity from jurisdiction commonly accorded by States to international organisations under the organisations' constituent instruments or supplementary agreements is a long-standing practice established in the interest of the good working of these organisations. The importance of this practice is enhanced by a trend towards extending and strengthening international cooperation in all domains of modern society."

> The Court is of the opinion that where States establish international organisations in order to pursue or strengthen their cooperation in certain fields of activities, and where they attribute to these organisations certain competences and accord them immunities, there may be implications as to the protection of fundamental rights. It would be incompatible with the purpose and object of the Convention, however, if the Contracting States were thereby absolved from their responsibility under the Convention in relation to the field of activity covered by such attribution. It should be recalled that the Convention is intended to guarantee not theoretical or illusory rights, but rights that are practical and effective. (…) For the Court, a material factor in determining whether granting ESA immunity from German jurisdiction is permissible under the Convention is whether the applicants had available to them reasonable alternative means to protect effectively their rights under the Convention.[242]

Hence, much will also depend on the level of human rights protection afforded by international organisations in their own proceedings. If this level is adequate, then there is no need to doubt the appropriateness of the fact that their decisions cannot be reviewed by supervisory bodies. If the protection is inadequate, then the possibility cannot be excluded that the Netherlands, as the host State of the ICC, can be held internationally responsible for serious violations.[243] As the ICC instruments give such a prominent place to human rights protection (as Chapter IX will show), it is to be expected that the ECtHR, if it ever has to consider this issue, will argue that as the ICC proceedings provide sufficient human rights protection, it

---

[242] Ibid., paras. 67-68.

[243] See also Bevers, Blokker and Roording 2003, p. 153: "The [Dutch] Minister of Justice concluded on the basis of this case law [Waite and Kennedy v. Germany, ChP] in the context of the ICC Implementation Act that the ECHR permits the transit of jurisdiction to an international organization, and that state responsibility only arises in exceptional cases in which there is a flagrant and gross violation of the ECHR [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Cf. in that respect Sluiter (referring to Waite and Kennedy v. Germany, but also to Beer and Regan v. Germany (ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Beer and Regan v. Germany, Application No. 28934/95, 'Judgment', 18 February 1999, para. 57) and Matthews v. United Kingdom (ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Matthews v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 24833/94, 'Judgment', 18 February 1999, para. 32)) who writes about the "residual responsibility" which "could be established for the 'host-state' in respect of human rights violations committed by the international organisations on its territory." (See Sluiter 2004 A, p. 173, n. 50 and n. 225 of this chapter.) See further Zappalà 2003, pp. 12-13. One may also refer to the Dutch Government's Explanatory Memorandum to the International Criminal Court Implementation Act (Tweede Kamer der Staten-Generaal, Vergaderjaar 2001-2002, 28 098 (R 1704), Uitvoering van het Statuut van het Internationaal Strafhof met betrekking tot de samenwerking met en bijstand aan het Internationaal Strafhof en de tenuitvoerlegging van zijn vonnissen (Uitvoeringswet Internationaal Strafhof), Nr. 3, Memorie van Toelichting). Here, one can read (at pp. 6-7) that Artt. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR and 5, para. 4 of the ECHR do not oblige the surrendering judge to assess the jurisdiction and admissibility of a case before the ICC – in fact, the ICC Statute does not allow it – but that nevertheless extraordinary cases may arise in which, because of the surrender of a person to the ICC, a (gross) violation of a ECHR right may threaten to materialise. (See also the Naletilić case, see ns. 174 and 229.) If such a situation occurs, then the Dutch Minister of Justice can take this into account when making his decision on the request to surrender. (The fact that the Netherlands, to a certain extent, has transferred jurisdiction to the ICC does not relieve it completely from that State's obligations stemming from other international treaties such as the ICCPR and the ECHR, see ibid., p. 6.)

is justified that ICC decisions cannot be challenged before national courts or supervisory bodies.[244] However, much will perhaps also depend on the actual decisions in practice and on whether they actually implement the human rights protection provided for in the ICC documents.[245] Finally, it must be remarked that the host State of the ICC, the Netherlands, has pointed out in the Explanatory Memorandum to the act regulating its cooperation obligations with the ICC that it "reserves the right to review ICC decisions which require the active cooperation of the host-state in light of obligations incumbent on the Netherlands under the ECHR [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[246]

Going back to the actual arrest and surrender provisions of the ICC, once the person is surrendered (via the territories of other States)[247] to the Court or appears in The Hague voluntarily or pursuant to a summons, "the Pre-Trial Chamber shall satisfy itself that the person has been informed of the crimes which he or she is alleged to have committed, and of his or her rights under this Statute".[248]

One of these rights is the (already briefly mentioned, see footnote 207 and accompanying text) right to interim release pending trial.[249] Although Article 60, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute grants this right to any person appearing before the Court (even those voluntarily appearing in The Hague), it is arguably only relevant for arrested or detained persons as only these can be released. The first sentence of Article 60, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute does in that respect arguably not refer to a specific situation but to the only situation applicable here: "A person subject to a warrant of arrest may apply for interim release pending trial."

Be that as it may, if an arrested person applies for interim release pending trial, he shall[250] only be released (with or without conditions) if the conditions of Article 58, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute – these are the previously discussed conditions

---

[244] Note that in the Naletilić case, the ECtHR remarked that the ICTY "offers all the necessary guarantees including those of impartiality and independence" (see also n. 174). This arguably also goes for the ICC. It can even be maintained that the regime of the ICC can be seen as an improvement when compared to the regime of the ICTY (and that of the ICTR), see Sluiter 2003 C, p. 647: "The ICC Statute appears to offer all the necessary safeguards during the pre-trial, trial and sentence execution phases. It is an improvement from the ICTY and ICTR legal frameworks [original footnote omitted, ChP]".

[245] See also ibid., p. 648: "The proof of the pudding will, as always, be in the eating."

[246] Sluiter 2003 B, pp. 947-948 (and Sluiter 2004 A, p. 172). See Explanatory Memorandum to the International Criminal Court Implementation Act (Tweede Kamer der Staten-Generaal, Vergaderjaar 2001-2002, 28 098 (R 1704), Uitvoering van het Statuut van het Internationaal Strafhof met betrekking tot de samenwerking met en bijstand aan het Internationaal Strafhof en de tenuitvoerlegging van zijn vonnissen (Uitvoeringswet Internationaal Strafhof), Nr. 3, Memorie van Toelichting), p. 46.

[247] See Art. 89, para. 3 of the ICC Statute for more information on the topic of transit.

[248] Art. 60, para. 1 of the ICC Statute. The fact that this article speaks about a person's appearance voluntarily or pursuant to a summons is additional fuel for the uncertainty regarding the idea that a summons to appear has anything to do with a voluntary coming to The Hague. See also n. 111.

[249] See Art. 60, para. 1 of the ICC Statute.

[250] There is no discretion here. See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"' (Public Document), [ICC-]01/04-01/06 (OA 7), 13 February 2007, para. 134.

which must be fulfilled if the ICC wants to issue an arrest warrant – are not met.[251] This means that a person can be released if the Pre-Trial Chamber is not satisfied that 1) there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; and 2) the arrest (read: the continued detention) of the person appears necessary.[252]

To give an example of the second element, in the Lubanga Dyilo case, the Pre-Trial Chamber found that the suspect's detention remained necessary for two reasons: to ensure his appearance at trial and to prevent him from obstructing the proceedings of the Court.[253] The Pre-Trial Chamber thereby considered, among other things, that > because of the gravity of the crimes with which Thomas Lubanga Dyilo is charged, there is a substantial risk that he may wish to abscond from the jurisdiction of the Court[[254]] (…) and (…) that Thomas Lubanga Dyilo now knows the identities of certain witnesses; that the Prosecution states that if Thomas Lubanga Dyilo were to be released and were thus to be in a position to have completely unmonitored communications with the outside world, there would be a risk that he would, directly,

[251] See Art. 60, para. 2 of the ICC Statute: "A person subject to a warrant of arrest may apply for interim release pending trial. If the Pre-Trial Chamber is satisfied that the conditions set forth in article 58, paragraph 1, are met, the person shall continue to be detained. If it is not so satisfied, the Pre-Trial Chamber shall release the person, with or without conditions."

[252] For example "(i) To ensure the person's appearance at trial; (ii) To ensure that the person does not obstruct or endanger the investigation or the court proceedings; or (iii) Where applicable, to prevent the person from continuing with the commission of that crime or a related crime which is within the jurisdiction of the Court and which arises out of the same circumstances." (See Art. 58, para. 1 (b) of the ICC Statute.)

[253] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Application for the interim release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 18 October 2006, p. 5.

[254] The Chamber hereby refers to two judgments of the ECtHR, namely Tomasi v. France (ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Tomasi v. France, Application No. 12850/87, 'Judgment', 27 August 1992, para. 89) and Mansur v. Turkey (ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Mansur v. Turkey, Application No. 16026/90, 'Judgment', 8 June 1995, para. 52). In the first case, the Court stated with respect to the ground for continuing detention 'seriousness of the alleged offences' that "[t]he existence and persistence of serious indications of the guilt of the person concerned undoubtedly constitute relevant factors, but the Court considers, like the Commission, that they cannot alone justify such a long period of pre-trial detention." In the second case, the relevant paragraph is arguably 55 (instead of 52): "52. It falls in the first place to the national judicial authorities to ensure that, in a given case, the detention of an accused person pending trial does not exceed a reasonable time. To this end they must examine all the facts arguing for or against the existence of a genuine requirement of public interest justifying, with due regard to the principle of presumption of innocence, a departure from the rule of respect for individual liberty and set them out in their decisions on the applications for release. (…) The persistence of reasonable suspicion that the person arrested has committed an offence is a condition sine qua non for the validity of the continued detention, but, after a certain lapse of time, it no longer suffices; the Court must then establish whether the other grounds cited by the judicial authorities continue to justify the deprivation of liberty (…). 55. The Court points out that the danger of an accused's absconding cannot be gauged solely on the basis of the severity of the sentence risked. It must be assessed with reference to a number of other relevant factors which may either confirm the existence of a danger of absconding or make it appear so slight that it cannot justify detention pending trial".

> or indirectly with the help of others, exert pressure on the witnesses, thus obstructing or endangering the court proceedings (…) [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[255]

One can see here that the gravity of the crimes with which the suspect is charged again (see Article 59, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute (regulating the interim release pending surrender)) is an element to be taken into account when considering an application for interim release, even if the element is referred to less directly in Article 60 of the ICC Statute than it is in Article 59 of the ICC Statute.[256]

With respect to the first element, the first sentence of Article 60, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute refers to interim release pending trial and, of course, a person with respect to whom the Pre-Trial Chamber believes that there are still "reasonable grounds to believe that the person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court" but whose arrest/detention is not deemed necessary (for example, because that person has promised – and the judges believe him – that he will show up in court anyway), may be granted interim release pending trial. However, even though the provision speaks of "interim release pending trial", the release may also be more definite in the sense that it blocks the continuation of the trial). After all, if the Pre-Trial Chamber is of the opinion that there are no "reasonable grounds to believe that the person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court", then there is, of course, no reason to proceed with the trial. In that case, a person should obviously not merely be granted interim release pending trial (because there will not be a trial in the future) but a 'final' release.

Every decision on a request for interim release by the Pre-Trial Chamber shall be periodically reviewed (at least every 120 days)[257] and alongside this, the Pre-Trial Chamber may also review its decision whenever the person in question or the

---

[255] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Application for the interim release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 18 October 2006, pp. 5-6. See also ICC, Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision reviewing the Trial Chamber's ruling on the detention of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo in accordance with Rule 118(2)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 1 February 2008, para. 10: "In relation to the requirements of Article 58(1)(b)(i), the Chamber considers that the defendant faces grave charges and if released is likely to return to the Democratic Republic of the Congo, with the probable consequence that the Court would no longer be able to ensure his attendance at trial. Furthermore, the Chamber considers that the defendant is highly unlikely to attend his trial voluntarily. For these reasons the Chamber concludes that it is necessary to continue to detain the defendant."

[256] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"' (Public Document), [ICC-]01/04-01/06 (OA 7), 13 February 2007, para. 136: "The Appeals Chamber is not persuaded by the argument of the Appellant that the Pre-Trial Chamber should not have taken into account the gravity of the crimes allegedly committed by the Appellant. As the Prosecutor correctly notes, the Pre-Trial Chamber did not take into account the gravity of the crimes in isolation but as part of its consideration that the Appellant might abscond. If a person is charged with grave crimes, the person might face a lengthy prison sentence, which may make the person more likely to abscond."

[257] See Rule 118, para. 2 of the ICC RPE.

Prosecutor requests the Pre-Trial Chamber to do so.[258] It is important to understand that these reviews will only take place after a decision on a request for interim release has been taken. The Pre-Trial Chamber is thus not obliged to review every 120 days the detention of a suspect who has not first requested interim release.[259]

Nevertheless, this does not mean that the ICC should disregard the total duration of the detention. This 'assignment' can be found in the rather vaguely formulated[260] paragraph 4 of Article 60 of the ICC Statute:

> The Pre-Trial Chamber shall ensure that a person is not detained for an unreasonable period prior to trial due to inexcusable delay by the Prosecutor. If such delay occurs, the Court shall consider releasing [there is thus no obligation to release here, ChP] the person, with or without conditions.[261]

---

[258] See Art. 60, para. 3 of the ICC Statute.

[259] This was clarified in ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Application for the interim release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 18 October 2006, p. 4: "CONSIDERING (…) that the two abovementioned provisions [namely Art. 60, para. 3 of the ICC Statute and Rule 118, para. 2 of the ICC RPE, ChP] appear after provisions which specifically deal with applications for interim release brought after the person subject to a warrant of arrest has been surrendered to the Court; CONSIDERING, therefore, that the ruling on "[…] detention" referred to in article 60(3) of the Statute and rule 118(2) of the Rules cannot be confused with the warrant of arrest issued pursuant to article 58 of the Statute ordering the initial detention of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo (…)." See also the following confirmation by the Appeals Chamber: "94. The ruling that the Pre-Trial Chamber is required to review pursuant to article 60 (3) of the Statute is the determination that it has made in response to an application for interim release pending trial under article 60 (2). This is clear from the order of the statutory provisions. As the Pre-Trial Chamber correctly pointed out, both article 60 (3) and Rule 118 (2), which require the Pre-Trial Chamber to review its ruling on release or detention, appear directly after provisions which provide for applications for interim release by the person subject to a warrant of arrest. It is therefore logical to interpret the review under article 60 (3) to follow from, and be dependent upon, a ruling on a previous application by the detained person for interim release. 95. The Appeals Chamber does not accept the arguments of the Appellant that the ruling referred to in article 60 (3) must be read more broadly and that the Warrant of Arrest amounts to such a ruling." (ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"' (Public Document), [ICC-]01/04-01/06 (OA 7), 13 February 2007, paras. 94-95.)

[260] See Khan 2008, pp. 1167-1168.

[261] Cf. in that respect the more general provision in Art. 67, para. 1 (c) of the ICC Statute that an accused shall be entitled to be tried without undue delay. As stated earlier (see n. 201), although Art. 67 of the ICC Statute, in principle, applies at the trial stage, it may also have pre-trial dimensions. This also goes for Art. 67, para. 1 (c) of the ICC Statute, see Schabas 2008, pp. 1258-1259: "The provision is identical to that of its model in the ICCPR. (…) Case law and academic comment on the ICCPR provision have considered that the time limit begins to run at the moment the suspect or accused is informed that the authorities are taking steps towards prosecution [emphasis in original, ChP]." See also ibid., p. 1273: "Although article 67 applies at the trial stage of the proceedings, it may be threatened by pre-trial events, such as irregular or illegal investigation, either by the national authorities or by the Prosecutor's office. The Statute provides the Court with the power to exclude evidence in cases of abuse but there may be breaches of article 67 for which this may be an insufficient or inappropriate remedy. For example, what is the Court to do in cases of violation of the right to a speedy trial, set out in article 67 para. 1 (c) [emphasis in original, ChP]?"

Thus, it may very well be the case that the judges, every time they have to review the decision on interim release, are of the opinion that at that specific moment in time, detention is in principle justified, but that does not prejudice their discretion to release a person nonetheless (namely when, taking the whole period together, this person is in unreasonably long pre-trial detention because the Prosecution delays his detention unreasonably). This provision is, in other words, completely independent of the above-mentioned provision (Article 60, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute).[262]

In finding out exactly what is meant by an "unreasonable period prior to trial due to inexcusable delay by the Prosecutor", it is first of all worth stressing that this provision focuses on the (in)activity of the Prosecutor alone. For example, if a suspect is detained by a State, at the request of the ICC, and becomes the victim of an unreasonable period of pre-trial detention caused by the fact that the Prosecutor simply forgot about the case (that this is not impossible was clearly shown in the Barayagwiza case),[263] a suspect, when surrendered to the ICC, may refer to Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute. However, if the Prosecutor has done his best and if the delay is caused by (in)activity of the State itself, the person will not be released pursuant to this article. Likewise, if the Registry or another organ is responsible for the delay, release, pursuant to this provision, will not follow. This is strange and has consequently been (correctly) criticised.[264] However, again, even if in such circumstances, a suspect is not released on the basis of Article 60, paragraph

[262] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"' (Public Document), [ICC-]01/04-01/06 (OA 7), 13 February 2007, para. 4: "Article 60 (4) of the Statute is independent of article 60 (2) in the sense that even if a detainee is appropriately detained pursuant to article 60 (2), the Pre-Trial Chamber shall consider releasing the detainee under article 60 (4) if the detainee is detained for an unreasonable period prior to trial due to inexcusable delay by the Prosecutor." See also ibid., paras. 98 and 120.

[263] See ns. 865-869 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[264] See Khan 2008, p. 1167, who notes that the provision "does not protect a person from unreasonable lengths of detention, but only unreasonable lengths of detention occasioned by inexcusable delay by the Prosecutor [emphasis added, ChP]." He then continues (ibid.): "There is no provision allowing for release to ameliorate a person[']s detention for an unreasonable period caused by inexcusable delay occasioned by other factors, such as insufficiency in the number of judges, lack or insufficiency of court rooms, or budgetary and resource problems. This is unsatisfactory. It will not matter to accused persons whether their detention for an "unreasonable period" is the fault of the Prosecutor, the judges, the Registry or any other third party. All organs of the Court should be clearly prohibited from unnecessary, never mind inexcusable delays, and paragraph 4 suffers from the defect of only focusing on inexcusable delay on the part of the Prosecutor." Indeed, one could refer here to the above-mentioned Barayagwiza case that one should be concerned about the violations, irrespective of the entity responsible, see the famous dictum of the ICTR at ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 73 (see n. 841 and accompanying text of Chapter VI). This reasoning was also referred to, in the context of Art. 60, para. 4 of the ICC Statute, in the still-to-discuss Katanga case (see Section 4 of Chapter X), see ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga, 'Response of the Defence to the Prosecution's Observations on the Pre-Trial Detention of Mr. Germain KATANGA, pursuant to the Statute and the Rules' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 7 February 2008, para. 37. See also Sluiter 2009, p. 464.

4 of the ICC Statute, other bases for release may nevertheless exist in the context of the ICC. This will be discussed in greater detail in the following two chapters.

Another point must be made here. In a 2007 decision from the Lubanga Dyilo case, the Appeals Chamber referred to its male captus decision issued a couple of months earlier, a decision (also from the Lubanga Dyilo case) which will be examined at length in Section 2 of Chapter X, to explain the scope of Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute. It held:

> The Appeals Chamber also sees no merit in the argument of the Appellant that the Pre-Trial Chamber in its consideration of article 60 (4) of the Statute should have taken into account the periods that the Appellant had spent in detention and house arrest in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The Appeals Chamber has already noted in paragraph 42 of the (…) "Judgment on the Challenge to Jurisdiction" (…) that the alleged crimes for which the Appellant had been held in detention in the Democratic Republic of the Congo prior to his surrender to the Court were separate and distinct from the alleged crimes that led to the issuance of the warrant for his arrest. There is no reason to depart from this finding in the present appeal. As noted by the Appeals Chamber in paragraph 44 of the Judgment on the Challenge to Jurisdiction, issues regarding prior detention are relevant where they are part of the "process of bringing the Appellant to justice for the crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings before the Court." As the Appellant's prior detention was not part of that process and was thus not part of the detention pursuant to the Warrant of Arrest issued by the Pre-Trial Chamber, there is no reason to take that period into account for the purpose of article 60 (4) of the Statute.[265]

It can be argued that the use of the 2006 male captus decision of the Appeals Chamber (which in itself can be criticised, see Section 2 of Chapter X), is odd as that decision did not look at the scope of Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute; it looked more generally at the effect of pre-trial irregularities on the jurisdiction of the ICC. However, the fact that the Appeals Chamber, in its decision of 2006, wants to restrict itself to examining irregularities when these are part of "the process of bringing the [a]ppellant to justice for the crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings before the Court" does not mean that this (criticisable) scope should also be followed in the context of Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute. That latter provision is, in principle, clear when it talks about an unreasonably long pre-trial detention due to inexcusable delay by the Prosecutor. Although that implies that the Prosecutor must be involved in the case, this does not necessarily have to be triggered by an ICC arrest warrant and thus by detention based on the ICC charges. It may be the case that the suspect is already in custody at the national level for other crimes and that the Prosecutor is interested in prosecuting this case, but is not yet ready. If there is a danger that the suspect will be released at the national level, it is not impossible that the Prosecutor may informally request the national authorities to keep the suspect in custody so that he has more time to prepare the arrest warrant. If the Prosecutor in such a case also causes inexcusable delay in preparing the arrest warrant, it could very well be argued that the suspect, on arrival in The Hague, can use Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute. Even if the national detention was based on other crimes and even if an arrest warrant was not yet issued, one could argue that in such a case, the suspect suffered from an unreasonably prolonged pre-trial detention as a result of inexcusable delay caused by the Prosecutor as well.

[265] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"' (Public Document), [ICC-]01/04-01/06 (OA 7), 13 February 2007, para. 121. Note that this reasoning was also confirmed by the Pre-Trial Chamber in the Katanga case, a case which will be addressed in more detail in Chapter X as well, see ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the powers of the Pre-Trial Chamber to review proprio motu the pre-trial detention of Germain Katanga' (Urgent, Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 18 March 2008, p. 11.

Now, in which other situations can one say that a person is "detained for an unreasonable period prior to trial due to inexcusable delay by the Prosecutor"? In fact, this can be any delay caused by the Prosecutor which cannot be justified. Hence, the Prosecutor must be able to demonstrate that every step he took in the pre-trial stage was aimed at bringing a case to trial as soon as possible, of course acknowledging that the Prosecutor also needs time (and given the complexity of trials at the international level, a fair amount of it) to prepare his case before going to trial.[266] However, one can assume that this will normally be the case and that the Prosecutor will do everything in his power to bring a case to court as quickly as possible. If a delay nevertheless occurs in this context, for example because of the complexity of the case, it should not be qualified as unreasonable. Only if the Prosecutor is not doing his job properly and, as a result, causes an inexcusable delay, may the ICC judges release the suspect. In any case, much will depend on the facts of the case.[267]

---

[266] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"' (Public Document), [ICC-]01/04-01/06 (OA 7), 13 February 2007, para. 123: "Nor is the Appeals Chamber persuaded by the argument of the Appellant that the Pre-Trial Chamber should not have taken into account the location and amount of evidence when determining the reasonableness of the period of detention because such factors would always be present in international criminal proceedings. This contention is unfounded. While it is likely that most of the cases that will come before the Court will tend to be complex, this alone does not mean that the complexity of the case, and in particular the amount and location of the evidence, cannot be taken into account when assessing the reasonableness of the period of detention pursuant to article 60 (4) of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber notes in this context the references by the Prosecutor to decisions of the ICTY and ICTR, where the complexity of the case was taken into consideration in respect of the reasonableness of the period of pre-trial detention." See also Khan 2008, p. 1168.

[267] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"' (Public Document), [ICC-]01/04-01/06 (OA 7), 13 February 2007, para. 122: "The Appeals Chamber agrees with the finding of the Pre-Trial Chamber that the unreasonableness of

It is unclear whether the remedy of release as mentioned in Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute only refers to an interim release/a release pending trial or perhaps also to a 'final' release with prejudice/obstructing the continuation of the trial, comparable with the outcome of the first Barayagwiza decision.[268] As the provision is 'surrounded' by provisions in which the term 'interim release' can be found, one may think that Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute refers only to an interim release. On the other hand, the provision itself only speaks of the general term release, which does not exclude a more permanent release,[269] see in that respect also the release of Articles 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR or 5, paragraph 4 of the ECHR. Although these provisions do not speak of releases with prejudice either, it is very well possible that a judge confronted by very serious violations of a person's human right to liberty and security may nevertheless be of the opinion that these provisions allow him to release a person with prejudice. Cf. also in that respect the reasoning mentioned above when discussing Article 60, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute: this provision does not exclude a final release either, namely if there are no reasonable grounds to believe that the person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court. The fact that the provision uses quite harsh words ("unreasonable period" and "inexcusable delay") may also lead to the assertion that a final release must not be excluded. One could hereby argue that the rights of the suspect may have been so seriously violated by the unreasonable pre-trial detention due to inexcusable delay by the Prosecutor, that it would undermine the integrity of the Court to proceed with the case. In fact, one could even refer here to the first abuse of process situation (the one on which this study did not focus and which looks at the trial proceedings itself), namely that such delay could jeopardise the fairness of the trial in the strict sense.[270] In that view, an interim release (which after all does not jeopardise the trial itself) would constitute too light a remedy for the serious violations suffered by the suspect.

---

any period of detention prior to trial cannot be determined in the abstract, but has to be determined on the basis of the circumstances of each case." See also Khan 2008, p. 1167.

[268] See also Fernández de Gurmendi and Friman 2002, p. 305, n. 91.

[269] See, however, Knoops 2003, p. 220 (or Knoops 2002, p. 226), who argues that the remedy of release in Art. 60, para. 4 of the ICC Statute "seems to exclude the more rigorous remedy and specific view endorsed by the ICTR Appeals Chamber in both Barayagwiza v. Prosecutor and Semanza v. Prosecutor. Considering the diverse subject matter that habeas corpus writs may address as to the legality of detention, the "gliding scale" approach of the Appeals Chamber seems more favourable [original footnote omitted, ChP]." One can agree with Knoops on this last point, however. As earlier explained in the context of Artt. 9 of the ICCPR and 5 of the ECHR, the remedy of release is unclear and over-simplified. As a result, the judges should keep the suspect in custody and provide the most appropriate remedy, taking the exact circumstances of the case into account. Cf. also n. 45 and accompanying text of Chapter IX.

[270] See House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161: "[A] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case."

A point that should also be made about this provision is the already briefly mentioned discretionary power of the ICC to release the person in question: "If such delay occurs, the Court shall consider releasing the person, with or without conditions [emphasis added, ChP]".[271] One can question whether there is not some tension between this provision and what appears to be its international human rights counterpart (although that provision seems to be more clearly focused on releases pending trial only) which states more pointedly that a person shall be released pending trial if he is not tried within a reasonable time and which does not even use the more reproachful word "inexcusable".[272] Nevertheless, the discretion from Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute would be appropriate if the provision is indeed used as a sort of abuse of process tool: if the judge is of the opinion that this provision can be used to stop the process in very serious cases of delay, he should definitely have discretion in deciding whether or not this far-reaching remedy is to be granted, taking every single aspect of the case into consideration.[273]

A final aspect of this provision to be discussed here is that, assuming for now that this provision will only lead to a provisional release, that is, a release pending trial, one can imagine that there might indeed be good reasons not to grant interim release under this provision too readily (even when the unreasonable detention is the result of inexcusable delay caused by the Prosecutor). It should be borne in mind that when the Pre-Trial Chamber releases a person pursuant to Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute, it does so because of an unreasonable detention due to inexcusable delay caused by the Prosecutor. It does not release the person because it is not convinced that 1) there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; and 2) the arrest (read: the continued detention) of the person appears necessary. In other words, if the Pre-Trial Chamber releases a person under Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute, it remains convinced that the conditions of Article 58, paragraph 1 (a) and (b) of the ICC Statute apply. (If it were not so convinced, the Chamber would already have to release the person under Article 60, paragraph 2 of the ICC

[271] Note in that respect the difference with Art. 60, para. 2 of the ICC Statute where it is clarified that if the grounds for detention are lacking, "the Pre-Trial Chamber shall release the person, with or without conditions [emphasis added, ChP]."

[272] See, for example, Art. 9, para. 3 of the ICCPR ("Anyone arrested or detained on a criminal charge shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release. It shall not be the general rule that persons awaiting trial shall be detained in custody, but release may be subject to guarantees to appear for trial, at any other stage of the judicial proceedings, and, should occasion arise, for execution of the judgement.") and Art. 5, para. 3 (c) of the ECHR ("Everyone arrested or detained in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1(c) of this article shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release pending trial. Release may be conditioned by guarantees to appear for trial."). In the next chapter, the correlation between provisions of the Statute and international human right provisions will be further addressed.

[273] This would be different, however, in case it is determined that the delay has entailed that one can no longer speak of a fair trial in the strict sense of the word (see n. 270 and accompanying text). In such a case, jurisdiction should be refused, see the text following n. 159 and accompanying text of Chapter V. See also n. 138 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.

Statute.)[274] It is not unusual for the Pre-Trial Chamber not to quickly release a person if it still believes that 1) there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; and 2) the arrest (read: the continued detention) of the person appears necessary. After all (and again referring to the observations of the Pre-trial Chamber in that respect), > because of the gravity of the crimes with which Thomas Lubanga Dyilo is charged, there is a substantial risk that he may wish to abscond from the jurisdiction of the Court (…) and (…) that Thomas Lubanga Dyilo now knows the identities of certain witnesses; that the Prosecution states that if Thomas Lubanga Dyilo were to be released and were thus to be in a position to have completely unmonitored communications with the outside world, there would be a risk that he would, directly, or indirectly with the help of others, exert pressure on the witnesses, thus obstructing or endangering the court proceedings (…) [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[275]

If the judges of the ICC believe that these risks remain, it is not strange for a person not to be released very quickly in the case of an unreasonably prolonged detention as a result of inexcusable delay caused by the Prosecutor. In fact, one can even assert that, besides the fact that very serious cases of delay should lead to the real ending of the case, it is rather odd to release a person in less serious cases if one is still of the opinion that arrest/detention is necessary. See in that respect also the problems related to the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention. Perhaps, it may also be better in the context of this provision of the ICC Statute that the remedy of release (which may lead to social disturbance and a risk of absconding) is avoided and that other, appropriate remedies for the delay are granted instead.[276] Although certain conditions may prevent this[277] – conditions which are, by the way, absent from paragraph 4 of Articles 9 of the ICCPR and 5 of the ECHR – the risk of absconding may even be greater in the context of the ICC than in the context of the ICTY/ICTR. After all, whereas all UN Member States are obliged to cooperate with the ICTY/ICTR, there are many States in the world which do not need to cooperate with the ICC because they are not States Parties. If a suspect were able to flee to such a State, he might very well escape justice. Such an escape is possible as the ICC and its host State, the Netherlands, have agreed – like the ICTY has done with the Netherlands and the ICTR has done with Tanzania[278] – that the Netherlands cannot re-arrest a suspect released from the ICC without conviction for a period of fifteen days.[279]

[274] See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Defence Appeal Against the 'Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire Thomas Lubanga Dyilo'' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 1 November 2006, para. 19: "[I]t is only natural that before analysing the applicability of Article 60 (4) the Chamber decided to, as required by Article 60 (2), satisfy itself as to whether the conditions for detention in Article 58 continued to apply. If they did not, then the Applicant would have been entitled to release, independently of any determination under Article 60 (4), which would have actually become unnecessary. Once the Chamber satisfied itself that the condition continued to apply, it proceeded to discuss whether the requirements for release under Article 60 (4) had been met in the present case [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[275] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Application for the interim release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 18 October 2006, pp. 5-6. See also ICC, Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision reviewing the Trial Chamber's ruling on the detention of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo in accordance with Rule 118(2)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 1 February 2008, para. 10: "In relation to the requirements of Article 58(1)(b)(i), the Chamber considers that the defendant faces grave charges and if released is likely to return to the Democratic Republic of the Congo, with the probable consequence that the Court would no longer be able to ensure his attendance at trial. Furthermore, the Chamber considers that the defendant is highly unlikely to attend his trial voluntarily. For these reasons the Chamber concludes that it is necessary to continue to detain the defendant."

Be that as it may, one cannot escape the more general observation, considering that releases will not be granted too readily in the context of ICC proceedings (see both the interim release pending surrender and (perhaps to a lesser extent)[280] the interim release pending trial), that the international human rights rule that "[i]t shall not be the general rule that persons awaiting trial shall be detained in custody"[281] will probably not apply to the ICC[282] (or perhaps to any international criminal

[276] One could hereby think of a reduction of the sentence or financial compensation, comparable with the Barayagwiza solution. The reduction or compensation could then depend on the question how unreasonable the detention (caused by the inexcusable delay by the Prosecutor) was. (Note that compensation is already a remedy for unlawful arrest/detention more generally (whether a person is acquitted or not) accepted by the Statute, see Art. 85, para. 1 of the ICC Statute. See also Rules 173-175 of the ICC RPE.) See also n. 269.

[277] "The Pre-Trial Chamber shall ensure that a person is not detained for an unreasonable period prior to trial due to inexcusable delay by the Prosecutor. If such delay occurs, the Court shall consider releasing the person, with or without conditions [emphasis added, ChP]."

[278] See n. 243 of Chapter VI.

[279] See Art. 51 ('Limitation to the exercise of jurisdiction by the host State') of the 'Headquarters Agreement between the International Criminal Court and the Host State' (ICC-BD/04-01-08, Date of entry into force: 1 March 2008): "1. The host State shall not exercise its jurisdiction or proceed with a request for assistance or extradition from another State with regard to persons surrendered to the Court in accordance with Part 9 of the Statute, persons granted interim release or persons who appear before the Court voluntarily or pursuant to a summons, for any acts, omissions or convictions prior to the surrender, the transfer or the appearance before the Court except as provided for in the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. 2. Where a person referred to in paragraph 1 of this article is, for any reason, released from the custody of the Court without conviction, that paragraph shall continue to apply for a period of fifteen consecutive days from the date of his or her release."

[280] See Khan 2008, pp. 1162-1163: "Article 59 (detention in the custodial state) effectively creates a presumption in favour of custody by making detention the norm unless "there are urgent and exceptional circumstances to justify interim release". The same language, however, is absent from Article 60. It is suggested that absent such clear language, the onerous requirements of Article 59(4) should not be transplanted or read into Article 60 in any way [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also O'Dowd 2004, p. 99: "The criteria applicable by the national authority appear more restrictive than those governing the ICC's power to grant interim release".

[281] Art. 9, para. 3 of the ICCPR.

[282] See also O'Dowd 2004, p. 99: "The relevant provisions of Articles 59 and 60 have already been the subject of scholarly comment and analysis. There seems to be a general consensus that, whatever formal doctrine the ICC adopts on the question, in practice detention will be the norm and release the tribunal, cf. the discussion in Chapter VI on Rule 65 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE).[283] However, as previously explained, the fact that release will not often[284] be granted may have legitimate grounds, such as the risk of absconding and social disturbance – grounds which have their origin in the seriousness of the person's alleged crimes.

---

exception, given the gravity of the crimes within the court's jurisdiction [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[283] See the text following n. 93 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. See also n. 4 of Chapter VI (with respect to the IMTs of Nuremberg and Tokyo) and C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 55. It may be interesting to note that the remark of STL Pre-Trial Judge Fransen that "freedom is the principle, detention the exception" (see n. 1299 and accompanying text of Chapter VI), and his subsequent order to provisionally release the generals in question, can in that respect be seen as break with this situation. However, the kinds of crimes prosecuted at the STL (which is, by the way, not a 'real' international criminal tribunal, but an internationalised criminal tribunal) may also play a role here. Although they are of a serious nature, they fall outside the category of core international crimes prosecuted by, for example, the ICTY/ICTR/ICC (and the IMTs of Nuremberg and Tokyo), see Swart 2007, pp. 1153-1154.

[284] Although the ICC keeps repeating that pre-trial detention is not the general rule but the exception (see, for example, ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the powers of the Pre-Trial Chamber to review proprio motu the pre-trial detention of Germain Katanga' (Urgent, Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 18 March 2008, pp. 6-7; ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the Conditions of the Pre-Trial Detention of Germain Katanga' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 21 April 2008, p. 6; ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision on Application for Interim Release' (Public), ICC-01/05-01/08, 16 December 2008, para. 31; ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision on Application for Interim Release' (Public), ICC-01/05-01/08, 14 April 2009, para. 36 and ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa' (Public Document), ICC-01/05-01/08, 14 August 2009, paras. 36 and 77), in practice, one can expect not many provisional releases. An exception in that respect can be found in the Pre-Trial Chamber II's decision of 14 August 2009 in the Bemba Gombo case (see ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa' (Public Document), ICC-01/05-01/08, 14 August 2009) but in the end, this decision, by which Judge Trendafilova ordered the conditional interim release of Bemba Gombo, was also reversed by the Appeals Chamber, see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against Pre-Trial Chamber II's "Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa"' (Public Redacted Version), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA 2, 2 December 2009. Cf. also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), pp. 56-57.

Furthermore, neither must one forget that this situation may also very well be applicable to national courts dealing with serious/international crimes.[285]

Leaving this interesting matter for now and taking the above-mentioned Articles 59 (including 55) and 60 of the ICC Statute together, it can be asserted that they cover quite a considerable part of the important habeas corpus concept as laid down in Articles 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR and 5, paragraph 4 of the ECHR[286] and as such constitute improvements when compared to the legal context of the ICTY and ICTR.[287] For example, Article 60, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute ensures that the ICC judges address the substantive legality part (namely that the deprivation of liberty must be on such grounds as are established by law) and provides the remedy of release if these grounds are lacking. In addition, the national authority must verify whether the person was arrested in accordance with the proper process, thereby fulfilling the procedural legality part (namely that the deprivation of liberty must take place in accordance with such procedure as is established by law). In addition, the prohibition of arbitrariness also enters the ICC's arrest and surrender regime via Article 55 of the ICC Statute. However, as already explained, the exact scope of these provisions and the exact division between the national authority and the ICC is not very clear. Hence, it is equally unclear whether the ICC arrest and surrender regime is in full conformity with the above-mentioned international habeas corpus rights.[288] This could have been solved if an unequivocal right were [285] See n. 213 and the remark of Swart.

[286] See in that respect also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the admissibility of the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la confirmation des charges" of 29 January 2007 (…)' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 OA8, 13 June 2007, para. 13: "The human right [and then the ICC judges refer to Artt. 21, para. 3 of the ICC Statute, 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR, 5, para. 4 of the ECHR and 7, para. 6 of the ACHR, ChP] of a person to have recourse to judicial review of a decision affecting his liberty is entrenched in article 60 of the Statute [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[287] See Sluiter 2009, p. 462. See also ibid., p. 467.

[288] It may be interesting to note that the Dutch Government is, however, of the opinion that Artt. 59 and 60 of the ICC Statute do not violate the Dutch version of the Artt. 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR and 5, para. 4 of the ECHR: Art. 15, para. 2 of the Dutch Constitution (see also Bevers, Blokker and Roording 2003, p. 137). This provision reads: "Anyone who has been deprived of his liberty other than by order of a court may request a court to order his release. In such a case he shall be heard by the court within a period to be laid down by Act of Parliament. The court shall order his immediate release if it considers the deprivation of liberty to be unlawful." (Note, by the way, that this provision also speaks of release if the deprivation of liberty more generally is unlawful and not merely of release if the detention is unlawful, see n. 583 and accompanying text of Chapter III.) (For more information on Art. 15 of the Dutch Constitution, see Mevis and Blom 2000.) In its Explanatory Memorandum to the approval of the ICC Statute (Tweede Kamer der Staten-Generaal, Vergaderjaar 2000-2001, 27 484 (R 1669). Goedkeuring van het op 17 juli 1998 totstandgekomen Statuut van Rome inzake het Internationaal Strafhof (Trb. 2000, 120), Nr. 3, Memorie van Toelichting), the Dutch Government addresses Art. 15, para. 2 of the Dutch Constitution and then states at p. 8: "Now that the Rome Statute contains a provision dealing with judicial intervention in case of a deprivation of liberty, one cannot object to approval from this point of view. In that respect, one can refer to Articles 59 and 60 of the Rome Statute (and their clarifications). Therefrom, it is shown that an arrested person has the right to request the national judge for interim release and, at a later stage of the procedure, the Pre-Trial Chamber of the ICC for provisional or interim release [own translation, ChP]." However, as mentioned in the main text, included in the ICC regime (whether at the national or at the international ICC level) for a suspect to challenge the legality of his arrest and detention and to be released if his deprivation of liberty is deemed unlawful. However, such a right is missing, which is rather peculiar, given the fact that the entire right to liberty and security, including its habeas corpus part, can be considered to have, at least, the status of customary international law/general international law.[289] This intriguing point will be returned to in the next chapter.

Returning to the actual arrest and surrender provisions, "within a reasonable time after the person's surrender or voluntary appearance before the Court, the Pre-Trial Chamber shall hold a hearing to confirm the charges on which the Prosecutor intends to seek trial".[290] On the basis of this hearing to confirm the charges, which under certain circumstances may be held in the absence of the person in question,[291] the Pre-Trial Chamber shall "determine whether there is sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe that the person committed each of the crimes charged".[292] If the judges believe that there is sufficient evidence to confirm the charges, then the person in question will be committed to a Trial Chamber for trial on the confirmed charges.[293] In that case, the trial phase before the ICC will commence, thereby ending the pre-trial phase (and this chapter's section).

4 MODEL OF COOPERATION: A SECOND APPRAISAL

Now that the more specific arrest and surrender regime (which is part of the general cooperation regime) has been discussed, the nature of the ICC cooperation regime can be determined more accurately. Section 2 has shown that the ICC's cooperation regime – in particular[294] because States can in principle decide for themselves whether they want to be bound by it – is already less vertical than, for example, the one can wonder whether this fully covers the habeas corpus concept (as mentioned in Artt. 15, para. 2 of the Dutch Constitution, 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR or 5, para. 4 of the ECHR).

---

[289] See Chapter III of this book.

[290] Art. 61, para. 1 of the ICC Statute.

[291] See Art. 61, para. 2 of the ICC Statute: "The Pre-Trial Chamber may, upon request of the Prosecutor or on its own motion, hold a hearing in the absence of the person charged to confirm the charges on which the Prosecutor intends to seek trial when the person has: (a) Waived his or her right to be present; or (b) Fled or cannot be found and all reasonable steps have been taken to secure his or her appearance before the Court and to inform the person of the charges and that a hearing to confirm those charges will be held. In that case, the person shall be represented by counsel where the Pre-Trial Chamber determines that it is in the interests of justice." See also n. 1. See finally n. 76 and accompanying text of Chapter VI for more information on a comparable provision in the context of the ICTY/ICTR: Rule 61 of the ICTY/ICTR RPE.

[292] Art. 61, para. 7 of the ICC Statute.

[293] See Art. 61, para. 7 (a) of the ICC Statute. The same article explains (see (b) and (c)) the other possible outcomes of the confirmation of the charges hearing. The Pre-Trial Chamber shall "(b) Decline to confirm those charges in relation to which it has been determined that there is insufficient evidence; (c) Adjourn the hearing and request the Prosecutor to consider: (i) Providing further evidence or conducting further investigation with respect to a particular charge; or (ii) Amending a charge because the evidence submitted appears to establish a different crime within the jurisdiction of the Court."

[294] See, however, also ns. 16 and 23.

cooperation regime between the ICTY or the ICTR and States, but the previous section has identified even more horizontal elements.

For example, the ICC arrest and surrender regime contains the (inter-State extradition) exception of speciality,[295] generally pays much attention to national procedural law, specifies possibilities to consult with the ICC and even to postpone[296] requests for arrest and surrender (to which the quite horizontal general provisions related to requests for cooperation also apply),[297] acknowledges to a certain extent an evidentiary requirement,[298] regulates potential problems with competing requests and other international obligations States may have and authorises (at least on paper) interim releases at the national level.

No longer restricting the focus on the arrest and surrender regime, one can see comparable horizontal elements in the ICC cooperation regime more generally.[299] In fact, with respect to requests for assistance other than for arrest and surrender,[300]

---

[295] See n. 99.
[296] See n. 136.
[297] See Art. 87 of the ICC Statute and n. 129.
[298] See Art. 91, para. 2 (c) of the ICC Statute.
[299] See, for example, Artt. 73 ("If a State Party is requested by the Court to provide a document or information in its custody, possession or control, which was disclosed to it in confidence by a State, intergovernmental organization or international organization, it shall seek the consent of the originator to disclose that document or information. If the originator is a State Party, it shall either consent to disclosure of the information or document or undertake to resolve the issue of disclosure with the Court, subject to the provisions of article 72. If the originator is not a State Party and refuses to consent to disclosure, the requested State shall inform the Court that it is unable to provide the document or information because of a pre-existing obligation to confidentiality to the originator.") and 93, para. 9 (i) of the ICC Statute ("In the event that a State Party receives competing requests, other than for surrender or extradition, from the Court and from another State pursuant to an international obligation, the State Party shall endeavour, in consultation with the Court and the other State, to meet both requests, if necessary by postponing or attaching conditions to one or the other request."). Swart (2002 B, p. 1595) notes that national authorities have much more discretion in handling requests of assistance than they had in the context of the ICTY/ICTR: "Here, the Statute appears to steer a middle course between the law of the Tribunals and the practice of inter-State cooperation."
[300] Note that such requests may also be useful to boost the pressure on suspects and their support networks and, as such, may contribute to more arrests and surrenders, see, for example, Art. 93, para. 1 (k) of the ICC Statute: "States Parties shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Part and under procedures of national law, comply with requests by the Court to provide the following assistance in relation to investigations or prosecutions: (…) The identification, tracing and freezing or seizure of proceeds, property and assets and instrumentalities of crimes for the purpose of eventual forfeiture, without prejudice to the rights of bona fide third parties". Prost (2005, p. 91) notes that "[t]he ICC Statute does not specifically provide for the Court to issue a freezing or seizure order with respect to assets. However, it is possible that the Pre-Trial Chamber may be empowered to do so under Article 57(3)(a) by the Prosecutor [original footnote omitted, ChP]." This provision reads: "In addition to its other functions under this Statute, the Pre-Trial Chamber may: (a) At the request of the Prosecutor, issue such orders and warrants as may be required for the purposes of an investigation". See also n. 38 and accompanying text and its reference to the broad provision Art. 54, para. 3 (c) of the ICC Statute ("The Prosecutor may: (…) Seek the cooperation of any State or intergovernmental organization or arrangement in accordance with its respective competence and/or mandate"). Furthermore, asset freezing could, of course, also be imposed by the UNSC when a situation has been referred to the ICC by the UNSC, cf. in that respect also the words of Scharf, see n. 115 of Chapter VI.

there are even clauses which "come close to a ground for refusal",[301] such as when a particular measure of assistance is prohibited in the requested State on the basis of an existing fundamental legal principle of general application (Article 93, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute) or when a request concerns the production of documents or disclosure of evidence which relates to the State's national security (Article 93, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute).[302] It is because of characteristics of this kind that Kaul and Kreß rightfully state, after having reiterated the point already alluded to above that "[t]he Statute's cooperation regime does not include the traditional interstate grounds for refusal to cooperate",[303] that "Part 9 rather makes use of more sophisticated instruments of conflict resolution".[304]

In other words, the ICC's cooperation regime (including its arrest and surrender rules) does have vertical characteristics, but it is clearly not as vertical in nature as that of the ICTY and the ICTR.[305] This is recognised by many authors, who use, however, different ways to describe this point. Sluiter (and subsequently Maogoto),[306] for example, admitting that the ICC regime is not as vertical as that of the ICTY and the ICTR,[307] concludes "that the ICC surrender regime is still of predominantly hierarchical, vertical nature".[308] Swart (and subsequently Rastan)[309] for his part makes the more neutral statement that "the Statute has created a regime of cooperation that is a mixture of the 'horizontal' and the 'vertical'".[310] Prost [302] See also Art. 72 of the ICC Statute ('Protection of national security information'). Ciampi (2002, p. 1630) notes that "with respect to a request by the Court for a type of assistance which is not specified under Article 93(1)(a)-(k), the obligation is limited to assistance 'which is not prohibited by the law of the requested State' (Article 93 (1)(l)".

[301] Kaul and Kreß 2000, p. 170.
[303] Kaul and Kreß 2000, p. 170.
[304] Ibid. Cf. also Rastan 2008, p. 433: "[C]o-operation is made subject to numerous qualifications, any one of which could impact on the provision of judicial assistance."
[305] See also Fernández de Gurmendi and Friman 2002, pp. 328-329.
[306] See Maogoto 2004, p. 133.
[307] See Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 650-651: "In general, the ICC surrender regime is weaker than that of the ICTY and ICTR. (...) From the perspective of the ad hoc tribunals, the ICC cooperation model is disappointing."
[308] Sluiter 2003 C, p. 651. Cf. also the view of the Dutch Government: "The relationship between the International Criminal Court on the one hand and the national legal system on the other hand is more vertical than horizontal [own translation and emphasis added, ChP]." (Explanatory Memorandum to the International Criminal Court Implementation Act (Tweede Kamer der Staten-Generaal, Vergaderjaar 2001-2002, 28 098 (R 1704), Uitvoering van het Statuut van het Internationaal Strafhof met betrekking tot de samenwerking met en bijstand aan het Internationaal Strafhof en de tenuitvoerlegging van zijn vonnissen (Uitvoeringswet Internationaal Strafhof), Nr. 3, Memorie van Toelichting), p. 4.) See finally Bevers, Blokker and Roording 2003, p. 142: "The relations between states in inter-state extradition procedures are of a horizontal nature. In this case, however, the relationship is more hierarchical, whereby the Criminal Court is placed above the national legal orders [emphasis added, ChP]."
[309] See Rastan 2008, p. 432.
[310] Swart 2002 B, p. 1594. See also Swart 2002 C, p. 1640: "It is clear that these provisions [the provisions of the Rome Statute with regard to arrest and surrender, ChP] have been strongly influenced by the examples of both ad hoc international criminal tribunals and that lessons have been drawn from their experiences. On the other hand, there is much in them that reminds one of the traditional features of extradition law. In a sense, the system of the Rome Statute is a compromise between traditional extradition law and the 'new law' of the ad hoc Tribunals."

asserts that the regime is "modelled on State to State schemes for international cooperation, but there are important differences".[311] A new and original way to typify the ICC (cooperation) regime, hence deserving some more attention here, is presented by Currie. He introduces the term 'lateral'.

> [I]t may be useful to identify, if not a new paradigm, then at least a new label that defines the unique set of relationships within which the ICC exists. A term that suggests itself is "lateral". Without delving too deeply into dictionary definitions of the term, it is appealing because it evokes a sort of continuum, where the Court and states are always to one side of each other. Certainly as between the Court and member states the relationship is not "horizontal," as the member states do bear certain obligations to surrender jurisdiction to the Court in some circumstances and are obligated to cooperate with the Court in various ways when this occurs. Neither, however, is the relationship "vertical," as there is a substantial measure of primacy accorded to the exercise of criminal jurisdiction by the states themselves, and even the cooperation obligations are tempered and qualified in various ways that differentiate the relationship from that, say, between the ICTY and UN member states [original footnote omitted, ChP].[312]

This may still be somewhat difficult to visualise, but Currie's explanation of the lateral effect of the complementarity principle (as stated above, Currie discusses the term lateral not only in the context of the ICC cooperation regime but in the context of the ICC regime as a whole) is perhaps clearer (at least for persons familiar with the beautiful game of rugby):

> The convoluted design of the complementarity regime was deliberate, the objective being both to create opportunities for legitimate international criminal trials, and "to encourage national institutions to comply with their responsibilities under international humanitarian law to investigate and prosecute". This, arguably, is the "lateral" effect of complementarity – in the sense of a lateral pass on the rugby pitch, where the player best-placed to pursue the objective is handed the ball, but with more of a compulsory flavour [original footnote omitted, ChP].[313]

But even if this does not ring a bell,[314] Currie also explains his term very clearly in the context of the cooperation regime:

> The system (...) is one of mutual support (and doubtless no little friction) between the Court and state parties. The Rome Statute envisions a Court with some power but mandates ongoing consultations and negotiations as the mode by which the criminal justice work gets done in the pre-trial phase. Formally states must cooperate, but there are roadblocks to be thrown up and some provisions that may amount to [311] Prost 2005, p. 73.

[312] Currie 2007, p. 378.
[313] Ibid., p. 379.
[314] Those who wish to become familiar with (the lateral pass in) rugby are commended to the information available at this site: http://www.coachingrugby.com/rugby/coaching/indskills/passing/lateral.htm.

> grounds for refusal of a Court request. Both vertical and horizontal approaches were combined, and distorted, in order to produce a mutually agreeable package. The Court and its members work laterally, in parallel fashion, ostensibly moving towards the same goal of ensuring international crime is punished and impunity extinguished.[315]

Currie's metaphor of the rugby pitch and the term 'lateral' will be returned to later in this book (this was also the reason why different descriptions of his submission have been presented here), but now that the ICC's cooperation regime (and the arrest and surrender provisions in particular) have been clarified in more detail, it is time to first address the internal evaluative framework of this book.

[315] Currie 2007, p. 382.

CHAPTER IX
CREATING AN INTERNAL EVALUATIVE FRAMEWORK: ARTICLE 21 OF THE ICC STATUTE

1 INTRODUCTION

As stated in Section 2 of this book's first chapter, this study does not merely want to describe and analyse the current ICC position on the male captus issue (this will be done in the next chapter), it also wants to assess it. In Part 3 of this book, an external framework was created which should enable the reader, after having read the following chapter, to see how similar or different the ICC position with respect to the male captus issue is in comparison with the position of other courts. However, the aim of this study's assessment is broader than comparing the ICC decisions with decisions from other courts. It will also include an internal evaluative assessment, which focuses on what the ICC is actually obliged to do according to its own legal framework. With the help of this less non-committal framework, one should be able to see how the ICC decisions are doing vis-à-vis its own law.

The central provision of this framework is Article 21 of the ICC Statute (entitled: 'applicable law').[1]

It constitutes "the first codification of sources of international criminal law"[2] and is one of the most complicated articles in the ICC Statute.[3] It reads:

[1] Note that the discussion on the law of the ICC is predominantly, and, taking into account the nullum crimen sine lege principle (of Art. 22 of the ICC Statute), understandably, focused on substantive law issues, such as the exact scope of the crimes which the ICC must adjudicate. See also Edwards 2001, p. 369, n. 193. Nevertheless, as Art. 21 of the ICC Statute refers to, among other things, documents which discuss many issues of procedural law (such as the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence) and human rights (which arguably also cover procedural human rights), it is submitted that Art. 21 of the ICC Statute also has a procedural law dimension and may thus also be looked at for the present procedural law discussion on male captus bene/male detentus. Cf. also Caracciolo 2000, p. 225, Edwards 2001, p. 368 and Degan 2005, p. 79.

[2] Hafner and Binder 2004, p. 165. See also McAuliffe deGuzman 2008, p. 703.

[3] See Pellet 2002 A, p. 1053: "[T]he system of sources to which the Statute refers is extremely complex, sometimes even uncertain, and the order of precedence between the different provisions is equally ambiguous."

> 1. The Court shall apply:
>
> (a) In the first place, this Statute, Elements of Crimes and its Rules of Procedure and Evidence;
> (b) In the second place, where appropriate, applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict;
> (c) Failing that, general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate, the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime, provided that those principles are not inconsistent with this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards.
>
> 2. The Court may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions.
>
> 3. The application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights, and be without any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender as defined in article 7, paragraph 3, age, race, colour, language, religion or belief, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, wealth, birth or other status.

In the following pages, these paragraphs will be looked at in detail to determine their exact scope. It must be emphasised that the entire article will be reviewed so that the reader has sufficient information on all these provisions, even if this study comes to the conclusion that the answer to the male captus problem can already be found in an early paragraph, thereby perhaps – this will be dealt with in the following pages – making it unnecessary to continue looking for answers.

2 ARTICLE 21, PARAGRAPH 1

2.1 Correlation between the three parts of paragraph 1

Before examining the actual content of the first part – part (a) – of paragraph 1, it is worth first reviewing the correlation between that paragraph's three parts. One may encounter some problems here. On the one hand, one could argue that the sources mentioned in part (a) are clearly superior to those of part (b) and (c) given the words "in the first place" (part (a)), "in the second place, where appropriate" (part (b)) and "failing that" (part (c)).[4] In the words of Edwards:

[4] See also, for example, Pellet 2002 A, p. 1078: "Article 21 (…) stipulates the superiority of the Statute compared with the other sources of law which the Court may apply. This is witnessed by the enumeration of the sources itself: 'in the first place…', the Statute; 'in the second place', and only 'where appropriate', treaties and the principles and rules of international law; and, 'failing that', general principles of law [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

> Article 21 provides that all law to be applied by the Court to resolve all issues is to be drawn from seven sources of "applicable law" listed within article 21. The sources are listed hierarchically, in a manner reminiscent of the sources of international law contained in article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice. Thus, the applicable law is to be consulted in the following order: (1) the Rome Statute itself; (2) the Elements of Crimes; (3) the Rules of Procedure; (4) "where appropriate,[5] applicable treaties;" (5) "where appropriate…the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict;" (6) "general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world;" and (7) "principles and rules of law as interpreted" in previous Court decisions.[6] The Court is instructed to begin with the first-listed source and proceed to a lower-ranked source only if the first source proves inadequate, until the Court identifies the appropriate law to resolve the issue at hand [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[7]

On the other hand, Verhoeven is of the opinion that "[i]ntrinsic primacy of those rules [namely the rules from part (a), ChP] over the treaties and principles of international law referred to in paragraph 1(b) of Article 21 does not exist".[8] One can, however, wonder in that case as to the meaning of the words "in the second place, where appropriate". Verhoeven explains:

> The mention of a 'second place' only means that such treaties, principles or rules only apply to issues that are not settled by the first category rules, either because the Statute is incomplete in certain respects, or because the point at stake is not as such concerned with its provisions (the existence of a state of war or the validity of a treaty, for instance), i.e., with the (judicial) activity of the ICC. This is probably the meaning that is to be given to the rather strange terms: 'where appropriate' (should ever a rule be applied 'where inappropriate'?). Needless to say, such a 'complementarity' does not imply or entail any 'superiority' of the rules of the first category over the ones of the second.[9]

Thus, Verhoeven, in contrast to Edwards, is of the opinion that part (b) is equal in status to part (a), meaning that those parts should be considered together. The terminology used in Article 21 may lead to the same conclusion. The fact that part

---

[5] The meaning of "where appropriate" is not clear to Edwards, see Edwards 2001, p. 384, n. 264 ("The Rome Statute suffers from its use of the unfortunate adjective "appropriate" to describe the "applicable treaties" as a source of law in article 21(1)(b).") and p. 385, n. 266: "Again, we have the imprecise and ambiguous "where appropriate" language. "Appropriate" has been defined as: "suitable or fitting for a particular purpose." This offers little guidance."

[6] Note that the seventh source is not part of para. 1, but of para. 2 of Art. 21 of the ICC Statute. As such, it is not part of the hierarchy of para. 1 either; it is only a discretionary source ("The Court may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions [emphasis added, ChP]") which the ICC may seemingly always apply, not only when the first six sources have brought no relief.

[7] Edwards 2001, pp. 369-370.

[8] Verhoeven 2004, p. 11.

[9] Ibid. Following that reasoning, one could also argue that part (c) complements parts (a) and (b) (namely if the latter parts have brought no relief) and as such should not be seen as inferior to these parts either. That conclusion, however, is not explicitly mentioned by Verhoeven.

(c) begins with the words "failing that" seems to mean that it can only be applied when the above-mentioned provisions, namely parts (a) and (b), have brought no relief, hence implying that those parts should be considered together. Stated otherwise, if one is of the opinion that part (b) can only be looked to if part (a) has left a legal lacuna, then why does part (b) not start with the identical words "failing that"?[10] If one accepts this view, then part (b) should not only be looked to if part (a) has not brought a solution to the case at hand but in fact every time part (a) is applied.

Now, if part (a) does not provide an answer to a certain problem, one can, of course, turn to the rules from part (b) (comparable with the view of Edwards). However, what happens if part (a) does provide an answer and that answer is inconsistent with part (b)? One can argue that, in Edwards' view, part (a) must then be followed as one should only turn to part (b) if part (a) has not provided the answer to the problem. However, what is Verhoeven's position on this? This is not very clear: the above-mentioned quotation seems to indicate that such a problem will never occur as the rules from part (b), even though they should be considered when applying part (a), will only be followed if part (a) leaves a legal lacuna, see the words "such treaties, principles or rules only apply to issues that are not settled by the first category rules".[11] Nevertheless, Verhoeven also explains:

> General international law should indeed be duly taken into consideration – even if it is not strictly 'applicable' – when applying the first category rules. There is no reason to construe the latter in a way that is inconsistent with the former, if this is not clearly the intent of the drafters of the statute; the rarity of general international law rules governing either the functioning of courts or the punishment of crimes considerably limits, however, the practical relevance of this point. But it concerns in any case general international law only, i.e., rules that are necessarily in force between all the > members of the international community; it cannot be maintained when treaties, i.e., rules specific to some states only are concerned, provided they are not declaratory of customary international law.[12]

[10] See also an older (namely the 1993) version of Art. 21 (then Art. 28) which read: "The Court shall apply: (a) this Statute; (b) applicable treaties and the rules and principles of general international law; (c) as a subsidiary source, any applicable rule of national law." (Report of the Working Group on a Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, to be found in: Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-fifth session, 3 May – 23 July 1993, UNGA OR, Forty-eighth session, Supplement No. 10, A/48/10, p. 111.)

[11] See also Verhoeven 2004, pp. 8-9: "Apart from treaties expressly aimed at in the Rome Statute, there is no difficulty in accepting that other 'treaties' or 'rules of international law' could normally be applicable to the extent they are relevant to deciding issues which are not dealt with in the specific ICC provisions, i.e., in the Statute, in the Elements of Crime or in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." With "treaties expressly aimed at in the Rome Statute", Verhoeven means, for example, Art. 98 of the ICC Statute (see ibid., p. 8, n. 5). This article ('Cooperation with respect to waiver of immunity and consent to surrender') reads: "1. The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender or assistance which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international law with respect to the State or diplomatic immunity of a person or property of a third State, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of that third State for the waiver of the immunity. 2. The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international agreements pursuant to which the consent of a sending State is required to surrender a person of that State to the Court, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of the sending State for the giving of consent for the surrender."

Does this mean that general international law (and treaties which are declaratory of customary international law) are also applied if part (a) does provide an answer and that, in such an event, part (b) supersedes part (a) unless this was clearly not the drafters' intent? The words "[g]eneral international law should indeed be duly taken into consideration – even if it is not strictly 'applicable' – when applying the first category rules. There is no reason to construe the latter in a way that is inconsistent with the former" appear to indicate this, but this seemingly contrasts with Verhoeven's earlier remarks that part (b) only applies to issues which are not settled by part (a). In other words: Verhoeven argues that "[t]here is no reason to construe the latter in a way that is inconsistent with the former", but how can one construe part (a) inconsistently with part (b) if part (a) does not say anything?

The remainder of Verhoeven's words do not clarify this. They read as follows:

> To the extent the application of treaties and general international law rules results from the existence of lacunae in the statute, the (b) of paragraph 1 could have started with terms identical to the ones used at the beginning of its (c): 'failing that', i.e., failing – as far as (b) is concerned – an adequate answer in the rules referred to in the (a) of the paragraph.[13]

The words "[t]o the extent the application of treaties and general international law rules results from the existence of lacunae in the statute [emphasis added, ChP]" show that treaties and general international law may also be applied by the judges in cases other than those where part (a) has left lacunae. However, this may mean two different things. On the one hand, this may confirm the idea presented above that part (b) must be applied, even if part (a) does provide an answer. On the other hand, "[t]o the extent the application of treaties and general international law rules results from the existence of lacunae in the statute" may also confirm the previously mentioned idea that part (b) may only be applied if part (a) has left a legal lacuna because part (a), in itself, can also refer, for example, to treaties, see footnote 11 and the reference to Article 98 of the ICC Statute. In such a case, the judges will also apply treaties, not as part (b) (because part (a) has left a legal lacuna), but simply as part (a).

Leaving aside these scholarly discussions for now, it may be worth noting that the ICC has also pronounced itself on the issue of the exact correlation between part (a) and the other parts of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute. In the still-to-discuss male captus decision of Lubanga Dyilo (see Section 2 of Chapter X), the Appeals Chamber explained, referring to another decision from the Appeals Chamber issued half a year earlier, that

[12] Ibid., p. 11.
[13] Ibid., pp. 11-12.

> [t]he previous decision of the Appeals Chamber in Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo "Judgement on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal" is instructive on the interpretation of article 21 (1) of the Statute of the Statute, particularly whether a matter is exhaustively dealt with by its text or that of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, because in that case no room is left for recourse to the second or third source of law to determine the presence or absence of a rule governing a given subject [original footnote omitted, ChP].[14]

The Appeals Chamber states here that if part (a) is exhaustive on the matter, there is no need to look to parts (b) and (c) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute.[15]

---

[14] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 34.

[15] It should be noted that this idea is probably from the Appeals Chamber in its decision of December 2006 itself because the Appeals Chamber's decision of 13 July 2006 (to which the December decision refers) can, strictly speaking, not be seen as support for that view. In that case, a case involving the issue of victim participation, the Prosecution did not agree with a decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I to uphold a certain application of victims to participate in the proceedings related to the situation in the DRC. (See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, para. 1.) It sought leave to appeal this decision under Art. 82 ('Appeal against other decisions'), para. 1 (d) of the ICC Statute which reads: "Either party may appeal any of the following decisions in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence: (…) A decision that involves an issue that would significantly affect the fair and expeditious conduct of the proceedings or the outcome of the trial, and for which, in the opinion of the Pre-Trial or Trial Chamber, an immediate resolution by the Appeals Chamber may materially advance the proceedings." However, this appeal was refused. (See ibid., para. 2.) As a consequence, the Prosecution sought "the review of the above decision, albeit a review of an extraordinary nature, styled "Extraordinary Review", in that no provision is made in the Statute or the Rules of Procedure and Evidence for such an "extraordinary" step." (Ibid., para. 3.) According to the Prosecution, the Statute left "a lacuna apt to be filled by the provisions of article 21 (1) (c) of the Statute introducing what are termed general principles of law deriving (…) from the national legislation of countries adhering to "the principal legal systems of the world" [original footnote omitted, ChP]". (Ibid., para. 5.) The Appeals Chamber did not agree. It found that the Prosecution's general principle of law did not exist (see ibid., para. 32) and that, perhaps even more importantly, part (c) of para. 1 of Art. 21 of the ICC Statute could not be looked at in the first place (see ibid.). This was because part (a) was exhaustive of the matter; there was no gap/legal lacuna here to be filled by part (c) (see ibid., para. 39). However, this statement can arguably not be seen as evidence for the idea that part (b) (which was not under examination in this decision) cannot be applied either if part (a) is exhaustive on the matter. It is recalled that part (c) starts with the words "[f]ailing that", words which are absent in the context of part (b). That may mean that it is indeed true that part (c) can only be looked at if parts (a) and (b) have left a legal lacuna, but that does not say anything on the (perhaps different) correlation between parts (a) and (b). In that sense, the Appeals Chamber, in its December 2006 decision, is probably only referring to the July 2006 decision because the latter is instructive on the question as to whether a certain issue is exhaustively dealt with by the ICC legislation or not. In any case, the July 2006 decision can arguably not be seen as evidence for the idea that one may not turn to parts (b) and (c) if part (a) is exhaustive on the matter because part (b) was simply not discussed in this decision. For another opinion on this matter, see Bitti 2009, p. 296: "[T]he decision by the Appeals Chamber is a clear affirmation that the external sources of law described in Article 21 (1) (b) and (c) are subsidiary sources of law and not additional sources of law. They will

This view is similar to that of Edwards and to that of Verhoeven, if one is of the opinion that Verhoeven's words must be interpreted to mean that parts (b) and (c) will only be applied if part (a) has left a legal lacuna. However, the Appeals Chamber's view contrasts with Verhoeven's position if one is of the opinion that Verhoeven's words must be interpreted to mean that part (b) must also be looked to if part (a) does provide an answer and that part (a) can only overrule part (b) if this was clearly the intent of the drafters (because part (a), in principle, cannot be construed inconsistently with part (b)).

It must be stressed that the views of authors like Edwards and Verhoeven, even if they are not followed by the ICC in a certain decision, will remain interesting for the future because the ICC, see Article 21, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute, is not obliged to follow its own decisions.[16] That may mean that later Chambers may not follow the above-mentioned decision of the Appeals Chamber and may turn instead to the theories of authors like Edwards and Verhoeven to solve their problems.

Almost a year later, a Trial Chamber also discussed the correlation between the different elements of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute, see the following passage (which is about the issue of whether 'witness proofing' – the preparation of witnesses before trial – can be applied in the context of the ICC).

> [I]f ICC legislation is not definitive on the issue, the Trial Chamber should apply, where appropriate, principles and rules of international law. In the instant case, the issue before the Chamber is procedural in nature. While this would not, ipso facto, prevent all procedural issues from scrutiny under Article 21(l)(b),[17] the Chamber does not consider the procedural rules and jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals to be automatically applicable to the ICC without detailed analysis.
>
> 45. The ICC Statute has, through important advances, created a procedural framework which differs markedly from the ad hoc tribunals, such as, for example, in the requirement in the Statute that the prosecution should investigate exculpatory as well as incriminatory evidence, for which the Statute and Rules of the ad hoc tribunals do not provide. Also, the Statute seemingly permits greater intervention by the Bench, as well as introducing the unique element of victim participation. Therefore, the Statute moves away from the procedural regime of the ad hoc tribunals, introducing additional and novel elements to aid the process of establishing the truth. Thus, the procedure of preparation of witnesses before trial is not easily transferable into the system of law created by the ICC Statute and Rules. Therefore, while acknowledging the importance of considering the practice and jurisprudence at the ad hoc tribunals, the Chamber is not persuaded that the application of ad hoc procedures, in the context only be applied when a gap arises in the application of the Statute or the Rules of Procedure and Evidence which has to be filled by subsidiary sources in order to give effect to the provisions of the Statute or the Rules of Procedure and Evidence."

---

[16] "The Court may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions [emphasis added, ChP]."

[17] This is, by the way, additional evidence for the assertion that Art. 21 of the ICC Statute has a procedural dimension as well (as was argued in the first footnote of this chapter).

> of preparation of witnesses for trial, is appropriate [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP].[18]

Unfortunately, this passage does not go into the question of whether principles and rules of international law must also be looked at if part (a) does provide an answer to a certain problem. It only says that the judges should apply, where appropriate, principles and rules of international law if ICC legislation is not definitive on the issue. These words as such do not exclude that the ICC may also apply principles and rules of international law if the ICC legislation does provide an answer to a certain matter.[19] After all, they do not say that the principles and rules of international law will only be looked if ICC legislation does not provide an answer. Nevertheless, the passage is still interesting. Not only for a question which still needs to be discussed infra, but also for the fact that it clarifies the rather unclear[20] words "where appropriate". These words must apparently be understood to mean: 'where it (according to the judges) fits' (the quite specific system of the ICC). This signifies that if the instruments of part (a) leave a legal lacuna, which will probably not happen too readily given their highly detailed character,[21] the ICC must ("shall")[22] apply solutions from applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, but only if the judges find it appropriate to transplant these solutions into the sui generis system of the ICC. Hence, the obligation to apply ("shall") is tempered with discretion ("where appropriate").[23]

2.2 Article 21, paragraph 1 (a)

Leaving aside this issue for now and focusing on the actual content of part (a), only the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence need to be examined here, as the Elements of Crimes focus merely on substantive law issues. (They "shall assist the Court in the interpretation and application of articles 6 [genocide], 7 [crimes against humanity] and 8 [war crimes]".)[24] Although they are not explicitly mentioned in part (a), the Regulations of the Court, which were adopted for the Court's routine functioning,[25] may also be looked at.[26]

---

[18] ICC, Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision Regarding the Practices Used to Prepare and Familiarise Witnesses for Giving Testimony at Trial' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 30 November 2007, paras. 44-45.

[19] Although it must, of course, be recalled that if the ICC judges were to take that stance, they would not follow the (still authoritative) Appeals Chamber's position on this matter, see supra.

[20] See n. 5 and n. 9 and accompanying text.

[21] See Bitti 2009, pp. 295-296 and 300, Nerlich 2009, p. 316 and Vasiliev 2009, pp. 212-213.

[22] See the first words of Art. 21 of the ICC Statute: "The Court shall apply".

[23] See in that respect also the meaning attached to these words by McAuliffe deGuzman: "The inclusion of the phrase "where appropriate" serves to emphasize the discretion that the Court enjoys in determining when treaties or principles and rules of international law are applicable." (McAuliffe deGuzman 2008, p. 705.)

[24] Art. 9, para. 1 of the ICC Statute.

[25] See Art. 52, para. 1 of the ICC Statute.

Do these documents take a position on the male captus bene/male detentus discussion? One can be very brief here; none of these instruments say anything on this subject.

Now, silence on the part of the proper instruments of the ICC does not necessarily mean that there is a lacuna which must be filled by parts (b) or (c) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute.[27] In this context, one should turn to Article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (the general rule of interpretation)[28] and the supplementary means of interpretation as found in Article 32 of the same Convention.[29] After all, in the end, the ICC Statute is 'just' a normal international treaty between States as any other treaty to which this Convention applies.[30] Via textual/contextual/teleological interpretation (Article 31, paragraph

[26] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Practices of Witness Familiarisation and Witness Proofing' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 8 November 2006, para. 28 where the Pre-Trial Chamber includes the regulations under the scope of Art. 21, para. 1 (a) of the ICC Statute: "Unlike the first component of the definition of the practice of witness proofing advanced by the Prosecution, the Chamber observes that the goals and measures encompassed by the second component of such a definition are not covered by any provision of the Statute, the Rules or the Regulations. Therefore, the Chamber, prior to undertaking any analysis under article 21 (3) of the Statute, shall first analyse whether this second component is embraced by any provision, rule or principle which could be considered as part of the applicable law of the Court pursuant to article 21 (1) (b) and (c) of the Statute [emphasis added, ChP]." See also ibid., para. 11. Although there are more regulations within the context of the ICC (such as the Regulations of the Registry), what is meant here are the Regulations of the Court, see ibid. See also Nerlich 2009, pp. 311-312 and n. 29. The hierarchy between the proper instruments of the ICC is: Statute > RPE > Regulations of the Court, see Pellet 2002 A, p. 1077. Note, however, that Vasiliev (2009, p. 213) also mentions the Regulations of the Registry within the context of part (a) of para. 1 of Art. 21 of the ICC Statute.

[27] See also Nerlich 2009, p. 312, n. 31: "[T]he mere fact that the legal instruments of the ICC are silent on a specific issue or do not provide for a specific remedy does not necessarily mean that (…) a lacuna exists. Rather, it has to be analysed whether the fact that the founding documents do not provide for a specific rule must be construed as a decision against such a rule, or whether the non-existence of such a rule is unintended. Only in the latter case may the ICC rely on the sources listed in Article 21 (1) (b) or Article 21 (1) (c) of the Statute."

[28] "1. A treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose. 2. The context for the purpose of the interpretation of a treaty shall comprise, in addition to the text, including its preamble and annexes: (a) any agreement relating to the treaty which was made between all the parties in connection with the conclusion of the treaty; (b) any instrument which was made by one or more parties in connection with the conclusion of the treaty and accepted by the other parties as an instrument related to the treaty. 3. There shall be taken into account, together with the context: (a) any subsequent agreement between the parties regarding the interpretation of the treaty or the application of its provisions; (b) any subsequent practice in the application of the treaty which establishes the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation; (c) any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties. 4. A special meaning shall be given to a term if it is established that the parties so intended."

[29] "Recourse may be had to supplementary means of interpretation, including the preparatory work of the treaty and the circumstances of its conclusion, in order to confirm the meaning resulting from the application of article 31, or to determine the meaning when the interpretation according to article 31: (a) leaves the meaning ambiguous or obscure; or (b) leads to a result which is manifestly absurd or unreasonable."

[30] See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006

1)[31] or recourse to the travaux préparatoires of the treaty (Article 32), one can find out how a certain provision is to be understood if this is not entirely clear. It may be that these means of interpretation show that it was the clear intention of the drafters not to include a certain rule/remedy in the treaty. In that case, there is, of course, no legal uncertainty or lacuna because the Statute is clear, namely that the remedy/rule cannot be relied upon in the context of the ICC. This will be further discussed infra, in the context of a problem related to the male captus issue, namely the fact that the ICC Statute contains a right to liberty and security but not (see also Chapter VIII) its remedy of release. Via the above-mentioned means of interpretation, one may be able to ascertain whether the fact that the remedy of release was not incorporated in the right to liberty and security was a deliberate choice by the drafters (in which case there would not be a lacuna) or whether it is unclear why this remedy is lacking (in which case there would be a lacuna, justifying recourse to parts (b) and (c) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute). This method is unproblematic in the context of the right to liberty and security as there is at least a provision whose terms can be interpreted. However, this is not the case with respect to the male captus issue as the proper instruments of the ICC do not seem to say anything on the problem as to the effect of a male captus on the exercise of jurisdiction by the ICC.

However, perhaps an examination of a number of provisions from the proper instruments of the ICC which could be seen as being (indirectly) relevant to the male captus discussion may show that the drafters were more in favour of either male captus bene detentus or male captus male detentus. Likewise, it is conceivable that an examination of the travaux préparatoires may shed some light on this issue.

To start with an examination of the ICC's proper instruments; in the Preamble of the ICC's Statute (which is "an integral part of the Statute"),[32] one can find a very

---

Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, para. 33: "The interpretation of treaties, and the Rome Statute is no exception, is governed by the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (23 May 1969), specifically the provisions of articles 31 and 32 [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., para. 6. See also ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58' (Under Seal, Ex Parte, Prosecution Only), ICC-01/04-01/07, 10 February 2006 (see Annex 2 to ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Court Record not available, confidential document, ICC-01/04-02/06, 10 February 2006), para. 43. See finally Edwards 2001, p. 363.

[31] Cf. also ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Final System of Disclosure and the Establishment of a Timetable' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 15 May 2006, Annex I ('Discussion of the Decision on the Final System of Disclosure'), para. 1 and ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Practices of Witness Familiarisation and Witness Proofing' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 8 November 2006, para. 8.

[32] Bergsmo and Triffterer 2008, p. 4. See also para. 2 of Art. 31 ('General rule of interpretation') of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties: "The context for the purpose of the interpretation of a treaty shall comprise, in addition to the text, including its preamble and annexes: (a) any agreement relating to the treaty which was made between all the parties in connection with the conclusion of the treaty; (b) any instrument which was made by one or more parties in connection with the conclusion of the treaty and accepted by the other parties as an instrument related to the treaty [emphasis added, ChP]." important, if not the most important, objective of the ICC, namely "that the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole must not go unpunished and that their effective prosecution must be ensured".[33] One can imagine that such a goal might perhaps lead to the acceptance, if not explicitly then implicitly, of male captus bene detentus.

Nevertheless, the fact that the Preamble, which reminds States that the ICC is complementary to the national level and thus that national States also have an important task in the prosecution of suspects of international crimes,[34] warns those States that "nothing in this Statute shall be taken as authorizing any State Party to intervene in an armed conflict or in the internal affairs of any State",[35] arguably tends towards a more general disapproval of male captus bene detentus. Although a condemnation of a male captus technique[36] which violates the non-intervention principle does not, as such, exclude the application of the maxim male captus bene detentus, one can assume that an entity condemning such a technique may have more problems in upholding the male captus bene detentus maxim than an entity not publicly denouncing such a technique. The words 'more general disapproval' have been chosen here as this warning is addressed to States and not (so much) to the ICC itself. Nevertheless, the ICC also seems to take this warning into account when more generally stating in the Preamble: "Reaffirming the Purposes and Principles of the Charter of the United Nations [emphasis in original, ChP]".[37] In addition, such warnings are not limited to purely inter-State situations, for example where a [33] See also Young 2001, p. 321, writing on the "overriding purpose of effective prosecution". See also ibid., p. 355: "The principle of effective prosecution is the Court's raison d'être."

[34] See the following words from the Preamble: "Recalling that it is the duty of every State to exercise its criminal jurisdiction over those responsible for international crimes"; "Emphasizing that the International Criminal Court established under this Statute shall be complementary to national criminal jurisdictions [emphasis in original, ChP]".

[35] See also the following words from the Preamble: "Reaffirming the Purposes and Principles of the Charter of the United Nations, and in particular that all States shall refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations [emphasis in original, ChP]". (However, one must also be aware of the fact that these latter words were mainly inserted to emphasise that States must not commence wars, because wars lead to the crimes which the ICC wishes to prevent, see Bergsmo and Triffterer 2008, p. 12.)

[36] It may be good to mention that the ICC Statute itself condemns abduction, namely in the context of enforced disappearances (as a possible crime against humanity), see Art. 7, paras. 1 (i) and 2 (i) of the ICC Statute.

[37] One investigative possibility of the ICC Prosecutor may perhaps be seen as going against these principles, see again (see also n. 23 of the previous chapter) Currie 2007, p. 380, referring to Artt. 57, para. 3 (d) and 99, para. 4 of the ICC Statute: "Where the Pre-Trial Chamber determines that there is no competent mechanism or authority to respond to a cooperation request, it may even authorize the Prosecutor to conduct investigations on the territory of a party state, without that state's consent [original footnote omitted, ChP]." However, besides the fact that this possibility is not without conditions (such as the fact that the Prosecutor must first send a request for assistance), it cannot be seen as a possible male captus route as Art. 99, para. 4 is only applicable to the requests of Artt. 93 and 96 of the ICC Statute, which deal with other forms of assistance than arrest and surrender. Furthermore, the provision can only be used for requests "which can be executed without any compulsory measures". (Art. 99, para. 4 of the ICC Statute.) One could hereby think, for example, of "the interview of or taking evidence from a person on a voluntary basis". (Ibid.)

suspect of international crimes is not (initially) 'wanted' by the ICC.[38] Such warnings also apply to situations where the States interact with the ICC. One could hereby think of the situation where State A threatens to abduct an 'ICC wanted' person from State B before surrendering him to the ICC premises in The Hague, see the remark of Museveni in the very first chapter of this book. Thus, the Statute warns States not to violate international law not only in the inter-State context, but also in the context of the ICC, namely when those States are part of that permanent Court's enforcement mechanism.

Another feature of the ICC, mentioned in the Preamble,[39] which can be taken into account here is the fact that it is permanent.[40] This feature has also been briefly mentioned in the first chapter of this study. What if the ICC were an ad hoc tribunal whose mandate was ending some day and what if, for example, Al Bashir, suspect in the Darfur case, were still not apprehended because Sudan continued to refuse to cooperate with the ICC? It is not difficult to imagine that an ad hoc tribunal, under pressure by the international community and the victims, both demanding results, might perhaps be more easily inclined than a permanent court to look for more 'creative' (and perhaps even illegal) methods in arresting the suspect. This is not because a permanent court may not feel the heat from the international community or victims at a certain point: it will (see also Subsection 1.3 of the first chapter).[41] However, if the ICTY in its final days of existence is involved in a not-wholly legal operation to bring Mladić before the Tribunal and if the judges, because of the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged, decide not to refuse jurisdiction, the ICTY may receive criticism for both actions but such criticism would be irrelevant for its future success as the ICTY will cease to exist. The ICC, on the other hand, is permanent and will need the constant goodwill of the international community (read: its enforcers) if it wants to have suspects surrendered to The Hague. It can be argued that such a feature may make an operation such as that mentioned above, in a way 'approved' by a male captus bene detentus decision, less likely.

Of course, it may also be argued that some States may criticise the Court if it were to issue a male captus male detentus decision in such a situation, cf. the reaction of Rwanda in the context of the first Barayagwiza decision. However, one must not forget that the criticism in that decision was perhaps not so much directed

[38] See the following words from the Preamble: "Recalling that it is the duty of every State to exercise its criminal jurisdiction over those responsible for international crimes [emphasis in original, ChP]".
[39] And also in Art. 1 of the ICC Statute.
[40] See the Preamble ("Determined to these ends and for the sake of present and future generations, to establish an independent permanent International Criminal Court [emphasis in original, ChP]") and Art. 1 of the ICC Statute: "An International Criminal Court (…) is hereby established. It shall be a permanent institution".
[41] The moment the international community or the victims get impatient and start mounting pressure is, of course, not linked with the (non-)permanent character of the court in question. After all, although the ICC may be permanent, the victims do not have eternal life. The same goes, of course, also for the suspects themselves as justice cannot be done if they have already deceased. Expeditiousness is thus required, whether a court is permanent in nature or not.

towards the fact that the ICTR can issue a male captus male detentus decision, but more that it did so in this specific case (where the violations were probably indeed not so serious as to refuse jurisdiction) and that it did not properly take care of the aftermath of its decision, forgetting that it has a more general responsibility to fight impunity, whether before the ICTR or not. It may very well be the case that the ICC will have to make a male captus male detentus decision in the future. However, if it does, it must clearly explain to the international community why such a decision would be necessary under the specific circumstances and what it has done to ensure that the suspect, now that he can no longer be tried before the ICC, will be tried elsewhere.

Alongside the more general international law dimension, to be found in the ICC Statute's Preamble, the Statute also has a clear human rights dimension, even if the protection of the human rights of the suspect/accused is not mentioned as an explicit[42] objective of the ICC Statute as such.[43] One of the most important provisions in that respect is paragraph 3 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute, which states, among other things, that "[t]he application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights".

In an effort not to complicate matters too much at this stage, this crucial provision will only be discussed at the end of this chapter. The fact that this is the final paragraph of Article 21 of the ICC Statute also justifies this. Nevertheless, it can already be clarified here that there is no internationally recognised human right to a male captus male detentus outcome. Hence, this provision does not seem to provide new insights into the present male captus discussion, although it does, of course, stress the importance of human rights in the context of the ICC.

Another general human rights provision can be found in Article 54 ('Duties and powers of the Prosecutor with respect to investigations'), paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute, which states that "[t]he Prosecutor shall (…) Fully respect the rights of persons arising under this Statute".

In addition to these general provisions, there are more specific rights which may be of interest here.

A number of them were already mentioned in the previous chapter where the arrest and surrender provisions were examined.[44] Although, as already explained at [42] Note, however, that, as already explained, the ICC reaffirms the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and that purpose number three has a clear human rights dimension: "To achieve international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion [emphasis added, ChP]". See also Edwards 2001, p. 366.

[43] See ibid.: "Though the Preamble reaffirms the principles of the U.N. Charter, which endorse international human rights, it does not expressly state that human rights safeguards are an object or purpose of the Rome Statute."

[44] An interesting provision which has not yet been mentioned earlier (because it is not part of the ICC's arrest and surrender provisions) is Art. 85, para. 3 of the ICC Statute. This provision states: "In exceptional circumstances, where the Court finds conclusive facts showing that there has been a grave and manifest miscarriage of justice, it may in its discretion award compensation, according to the criteria provided in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, to a person who has been released from the beginning of this subsection, none of them explicitly take a position on the male captus discussion, there is one provision which could perhaps be seen as constituting a possible male detentus avenue for a serious male captus, namely Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute.[45] However, if so, that provision is restricted to irregular detentions. Is the ICC Statute silent on irregular arrests?

Here, one must turn to Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute, a provision which has already been reviewed in Chapter VIII. This article reads: "In respect of an investigation under this Statute, a person: (…) Shall not be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention, and shall not be deprived of his or her liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established in this Statute." Although this right does not explicitly take a position on the male captus discussion and although the inclusion of this right does not necessarily mean that the ICC would never issue a decision which could be summarised with the words male captus bene detentus,[46] one could argue that serious violations of this right may nevertheless lead to a male detentus outcome. However, this previously mentioned idea, that serious violations of the right to liberty and security can lead, not to 'merely' a normal release, but to a real ending of the case/a male detentus outcome,[47] of course, first assumes the existence of the remedy of release. However, detention following a final decision of acquittal or a termination of the proceedings for that reason." It could perhaps be argued that a serious male captus can be seen as a grave and manifest miscarriage of justice which may lead to the termination of the proceedings. However, even though the concept of miscarriage of justice has been addressed in the context of male captus cases, see, for example, the case of Dokmanović (see n. 187 and accompanying text of Chapter VI) the case of Barayagwiza (see ns. 817 and 918 and accompanying text of Chapter VI), the case of Semanza (see n. 960 and accompanying text of Chapter VI) and (especially) the case of Rwamakuba, see ns. 1130, 1134, 1136 and 1138 and accompanying text of Chapter VI, these cases also show that the concept of 'miscarriage of justice' is not so much linked with the question as to how a person came into the jurisdiction of the now prosecuting court but more with the question as to whether the judges can fairly establish if the person standing before them is guilty or not. One may hereby think, in particular, of evidentiary issues. For example, if evidence has been manipulated or withheld to enforce a conviction from the judges, a miscarriage of justice has occurred, as a result of which that person has been wrongfully detained and can claim compensation. Although such irregularities may, of course, very well be committed in the context of a male captus situation, the male captus situation itself does arguably not constitute the miscarriage of justice. Another provision which may finally be mentioned here is Art. 55, para. 1 (b) of the ICC Statute, which could be relevant for male captus situations involving serious mistreatment: "In respect of an investigation under this Statute, a person: (…) Shall not be subjected to any form of coercion, duress or threat, to torture or to any other form of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment".

---

[45] "The Pre-Trial Chamber shall ensure that a person is not detained for an unreasonable period prior to trial due to inexcusable delay by the Prosecutor. If such delay occurs, the Court shall consider releasing the person, with or without conditions." Cf. in that respect also the more general provision in Art. 67, para. 1 (c) of the ICC Statute that an accused shall be entitled to be tried without undue delay, see also ns. 201 and 261 of Chapter VIII.

[46] See, however, Gillett 2008, p. 24. After having discussed the male captus bene detentus approach, he argues: "However, in addition to the questionable legal and political merits of the doctrine, Article 55(1)(d) of the Rome Statute makes it very clear that there is no room for such an approach before the ICC." (See also n. 43 of Chapter I.)

[47] See the following, already earlier-mentioned, words of Swart 2001, p. 206: "[B]oth Article 9 of the ICCPR and Article 5 of the ECHR make it imperative that a person be released if his detention was the remedy of release is missing here; as mentioned in the previous chapter, the ICC Statute does not contain a habeas corpus provision comparable with Article 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR and Article 5, paragraph 5 of the ECHR which entitles a person to challenge the legality of his arrest and detention and to be released if his (arrest and) detention is deemed unlawful.[48]

This is rather strange, given the fact that the entire right to liberty and security, including its habeas corpus element, can be considered to have, at least, the status of customary international law/general international law.[49] This point was already observed by the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights in 1999:

> The ICC Statute does not include the right of a person provisionally arrested or arrested to a judicial determination without delay on the lawfulness of detention and to release if detention is unlawful, as provided for in Article 9 (4) of the ICCPR and Principles 32[[50]] and 37[[51]] of the Body of Principles. The Statute provides for the right of a person arrested by national authorities (under Article 59) or surrendered to the Court (under Article 60) to apply for interim release pending surrender or trial, respectively, but does not provide for the right to challenge the lawfulness of detention. The draft Rules should explicitly provide for this very important right. Its omission is curious given that the Statute, in Article 85 (1), grants an "enforceable right" to compensation to "anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention," in accordance with Article 9 (5) of the ICCPR.[52]

The question of how the omission of this remedy from the right to liberty and security must be interpreted will be examined infra, but first, this study will delve into the ICC's travaux préparatoires to see whether they say anything on the real unlawful. I take it for granted that, in the case of more serious violations of these Articles, the nature of this particular remedy rules out any possibility of re-arresting the suspect or the accused."

---

[48] See also Hall 2008 A, p. 1105.

[49] See Chapter III of this book.

[50] Principle 32 of the Body of Principles (for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment) (UNGA Res. 43/173 of 9 December 1988, available at: http://www2.ohchr.org/english/law/bodyprinciples.htm) reads: "1. A detained person or his counsel shall be entitled at any time to take proceedings according to domestic law before a judicial or other authority to challenge the lawfulness of his detention in order to obtain his release without delay, if it is unlawful. 2. The proceedings referred to in paragraph 1 of the present principle shall be simple and expeditious and at no cost for detained persons without adequate means. The detaining authority shall produce without unreasonable delay the detained person before the reviewing authority."

[51] Principle 37 of the Body of Principles (for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment) (UNGA Res. 43/173 of 9 December 1988, available at: http://www2.ohchr.org/english/law/bodyprinciples.htm) reads: "A person detained on a criminal charge shall be brought before a judicial or other authority provided by law promptly after his arrest. Such authority shall decide without delay upon the lawfulness and necessity of detention. No person may be kept under detention pending investigation or trial except upon the written order of such an authority. A detained person shall, when brought before such an authority, have the right to make a statement on the treatment received by him while in custody."

[52] Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, 'Pre-Trial Rights in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', International Criminal Court Briefing Series, Vol. 2, No. 3, February 1999, available at: http://www.iccnow.org/documents/LCHRPreTrialRightsFeb99.pdf. See also Edwards 2001, pp. 329-330, n. 21.

male captus issue. This is not only interesting, but in fact necessary as the above-mentioned examination has not clarified whether the provisions in the ICC Statute, including its object and purpose, can be seen as clearly in favour of either male captus bene detentus or male captus male detentus. After all, it is indeed true that the main purpose of the ICC is to effectively prosecute suspects of international crimes (which would suggest more easily male captus bene detentus) but it is also clear that this goal cannot be pursued at any cost; international law, due process and human rights (including the right to a fair trial) must also be respected.[53] That, including the fact that the ICC is of a permanent character and thus in need of the constant goodwill of the international community, may lead more readily to male captus male detentus.

[53] See also the very first Strategic Goal ('Quality of Justice') as can be found in the ICC's first Strategic Plan (ICC, ASP, Fifth session, The Hague, 23 November to 1 December 2006, 'Strategic Plan of the International Criminal Court', ICC-ASP/5/6, 4 August 2006 (available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/library/asp/ICC-ASP-5-6_English.pdf), p. 5: "Conduct fair, effective and expeditious public proceedings in accordance with the Rome Statute and with high legal standards, ensuring full exercise of the rights of all participants [emphasis in original, ChP]". See also the mission of the ICC at p. 4 of the same plan: "As an independent judicial institution in the emerging international justice system, the International Criminal Court will: ▪ Fairly, effectively and impartially investigate, prosecute and conduct trials of the most serious crimes; ▪ Act transparently and efficiently; and ▪ Contribute to long lasting respect for and the enforcement of international criminal justice, to the prevention of crime and to the fight against impunity." See finally on this plan its para. 22, which states: "The core functions of the Court are to carry out investigations, prosecutions and trials. The manner in which these activities are conducted is fundamental to the Court's achieving the aims of the Rome Statute. The Court can only realize these aims if its activities are fair, effective and impartial." In 2008, the 'Revised strategic goals and objectives of the International Criminal Court 2009 – 2018' were issued, but the first goal of the ICC (now entitled 'A Model of International Criminal Justice') has not changed, see the Annex to ICC, ASP, Seventh session, The Hague, 14 – 22 November 2008, Report on the activities of the Court, ICC-ASP/7/25, 29 October 2008 (available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/asp_docs/ASP7/ICC-ASP-7-25%20English.pdf). See further ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, para. 37: "The self-evident purpose of the Statute is to make internationally punishable the heinous crimes specified therein in accordance with the principles and the procedure institutionalized thereby [emphasis added, ChP]." See also the 1993 preliminary version of the 1994 ILC Draft Statute, in which one can read the following commentary on the purpose of the future ICC: "The purpose of the establishment of the Tribunal, contemplated in article 1, is to provide a venue for the fair trial of persons accused of crimes of an international character, in circumstances where other trial procedures may not be available or may be otherwise less preferable." (Report of the Working Group on a Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, to be found in: Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-fifth session, 3 May – 23 July 1993, UNGA OR, Forty-eighth session, Supplement No. 10, A/48/10, p. 101.) See finally Edwards 2001, pp. 366-367 and Young (2001, p. 321) who first notes that "[t]he principle of effective prosecution requires that conditions exist to contribute to a reliable outcome at trial [original footnote omitted, ChP]" and then states, among other things, that the ICC requires "strict impartiality and fairness from the prosecutors". (Ibid.)

Although it is often stated that the ICC has no official travaux préparatoires,[54] the documents which come closest to the official records of the Rome Conference may be found in paragraph 23 of the Final Act of the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court (although these may not give the full picture to some).[55] Here, it is stated that the Conference drew up the ICC Statute on the basis of:

> the deliberations recorded in the records of the Conference (A/CONF.183/SR.1 to SR.9) and of the Committee of the Whole (A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.1 to SR.42) and the reports of the Committee of the Whole (A/CONF.183/8) and of the Drafting Committee (A/CONF.183/C.1/L/64, L.65/Rev.1, L.66 and Add.1, L.67/Rev.1, L.68/Rev.2, L.82-L.88 and 91) (…).[56]

In addition to this, it may also be worth looking at pre-Rome documents. This may not only be instructive;[57] one could even argue that these documents fall under the legal definition of the travaux préparatoires. In the words of Ris:

> Travaux préparatoires consist of the written record of negotiations preceding the conclusion of a treaty. Lord McNair defined travaux préparatoires as "all the documents, such as memoranda, minutes of conferences, and drafts of the treaty under negotiation." Travaux préparatoires thus include materials which documents

[54] See Cassese 1999, p. 145: "First of all, unlike most multilateral treaties concluded under the auspices of the United Nations, in the case of the Rome Statute there hardly exist preparatory works reflecting the debates and negotiations that took place at the Rome Diplomatic Conference."

[55] See Edwards 2001, p. 368, n. 191: "Some would argue that the travaux pr[é]paratoires can only consist of official documentation, as otherwise the door would be open for fraudulent assertions of what transpired during the negotiations. Like news reports, the unofficial documents are unchecked for accuracy by the delegates. The Final Act of the Rome Conference identified the recording of the Rome Conference deliberations as follows: "On the basis of the deliberations recorded in the records of the Conference (A/CONF.183/SR.1 to SR.9) and of the Committee of the Whole (A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.1 to SR.42) and the reports of the Committee of the Whole (A/CONF.183/8) and of the Drafting Committee (A/CONF.183/C.1/L/64, L.65/Rev.1, L.66 and Add.1, L.67/Rev.1, L.68/Rev.2, L.82-L.88 and 91), the Conference drew up the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court." (…) However, it is abundantly clear that voluminous written material, and oral discussions were not memorialized in the conference records referred to in the Final Act."

[56] Final Act of the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court (to be found in United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. I: Final Documents, A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. I), pp. 65*ff*), para. 23 (p. 69 of the above-mentioned document A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. I)).

[57] See the 'Letter dated 24 June 2005 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council', 15 July 2005 (S/2005/458), Annex II: Report to the Secretary-General of the Commission of Experts to Review the Prosecution of Serious Violations of Human Rights in Timor-Leste (then East Timor) in 1999, 26 May 2005, para. 452: "There is no authoritative compilation of travaux préparatoires for the Statute that may serve as a supplementary means of interpretation in accordance with article 32 of the Vienna Convention. Nonetheless, references to drafts negotiated in advance of the Rome Conference may be instructive."

> the negotiations and other circumstances that culminated in the formal conclusion of a treaty [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[58]

If travaux préparatoires consist of all the documents that culminated in the formal conclusion of a treaty (including drafts of the treaty in question) then there is no reason to maintain that the travaux préparatoires can only be found in the period of the Rome Conference itself (the summer of 1998) as the negotiations for the ICC Statute (including the drafting of statutes) started much earlier.

Before the Statute was negotiated in Rome in the summer of 1998, several drafts and reports on the ICC had already been prepared by commissions and committees. The following documents were reviewed:[59] the 1993 Report of the Working Group on a Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court,[60] the 1994 ILC's Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court,[61] the 1995 Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court,[62] the 1996 Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Volume I (Proceedings of the Preparatory Committee during March-April and August 1996)[63] and Volume II (Compilation of Proposals),[64] the Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court as can be found in the 1998 Report of the Inter-Sessional Meeting – again of the Preparatory Committee – from 19 to 30 January 1998 in Zutphen, the Netherlands[65] and the Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court as can be found in the final 1998 Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court.[66]

In one of these pre-Rome documents, one can find a small surprise. In paragraph 122 of the 1996 Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court (Volume I: 'Proceedings of the Preparatory

---

[58] Ris 1991, p. 112.

[59] One could go even further back in time. Edwards (2001, pp. 341 and 343), for example, also mentions the 1951 and 1953 ILC Draft Statutes and the 1981 Bassiouni Draft. Nevertheless, it is submitted that the 1993 document, the first document reviewed here, is certainly 'old' enough, as the ILC Draft, a document which appeared one year later, "was used as a starting point for negotiations at formal and informal pre-Rome Conference sessions". (Ibid., p. 351.) Cf. also Arsanjani 1999, p. 22: "The Rome Conference was the culmination of a negotiating process that began in 1989 with a request by the General Assembly to the International law Commission to address the establishment of an international criminal court. In 1993 the Assembly asked the Commission to elaborate a draft statute for such a court as a matter of priority. The Commission completed its draft in 1994 [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[60] See the Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-fifth session, 3 May – 23 July 1993, UNGA OR, Forty-eighth session, Supplement No. 10, A/48/10, pp. 100-132.

[61] See the Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, to be found in: Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-sixth session, 2 May – 22 July 1994, UNGA OR, Forty-ninth session, Supplement No. 10, A/49/10, pp. 43*ff*.

[62] UNGA OR, Fiftieth Session, Supplement No. 22 (A/50/22, 6 September 1995).

[63] UNGA OR, Fifty-first Session Supplement No. 22 (A/51/22, 13 September 1996).

[64] UNGA OR, Fifty-first Session Supplement No. 22A (A/51/22, 13 September 1996).

[65] Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 16 March – 3 April 1998, UNGA A/AC.249/1998/L.13, 4 February 1998.

[66] This report (A/CONF.183/2, 14 April 1998) can be found in: United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. III, Reports and other documents (A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. III)), pp. 5-92.

Committee during March-April and August 1996'),[67] which falls under the general problem of the trigger mechanism of the ICC and the more specific issue 'Acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction, State consent requirements and the conditions for the exercise of jurisdiction: articles 21 and 22',[68] one can read:

> Some delegations supported the requirement, set out in article 21 (1) (b), calling for the consent of the custodial State and the State where the crime was committed. In their view, such a consent requirement was essential, since the Court could not function without the cooperation of these States. A comment was made that custody over a suspect, however, should be in accordance with international law; the maxim male captus, bene detentus should have no application to the jurisdiction of the Court. It was further stated that, as a general rule, the number of States whose consent was required should be kept to the minimum. Otherwise, the likelihood of one of these States not being party to the Statute would increase, precluding the Court from initiating proceedings [underlined emphasis in original and italicised emphasis added, ChP].[69]

This comment, which seems to have been made particularly in the context of international law in general (and not so much in the context of international human rights law),[70] was made by the Jamaican delegate Patrick Robinson[71] and repeated by him in 1997 during the 52nd session of the UNGA's Sixth (Legal) Committee:

> We would also wish to emphasize, as we did in our Statement at the 49th Session that, if a system is adopted whereby acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction is required by the custodial State in relation to a specific crime, the Statute must stipulate that such a State must have acquired custody in accordance with international law. For we cannot presume to be establishing a Court on the basis of the principles of international law, and at the same time, give succour to the maxim, male captus, bene detentus.[72]

Comparable statements, although it is not sure whether the words male captus bene detentus were also used, were issued during the Rome negotiations. The first statement is again from Patrick Robinson, made during the 30th meeting of the Committee of the Whole on 9 July 1998.[73] In the 'Summary records of the meetings

---

[67] UNGA OR, Fifty-first Session Supplement No. 22 (A/51/22, 13 September 1996).
[68] Ibid., p. 28.
[69] See also Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 25 March – 12 April 1996, 'Summary of the Proceedings of the Preparatory Committee During the Period 25 March – 12 April 1996', Rapporteur: Mr Jun Yoshida (Japan), A/AC.249/1, 7 May 1996, para. 139.
[70] See the context in which this comment was made, namely the question of States' consent in the process of cooperation with the ICC.
[71] Although this study could merely assume that it was Mr Robinson who made the statement (see his comparable statement in the next footnote and accompanying text), Mr Robinson himself was so kind as to confirm this assumption.
[72] 'Statement by Mr. Patrick Robinson, of the Jamaican delegation to the Sixth Committee on Agenda Item 150: Establishment of an International Criminal Court' (23 October 1997, New York), available at: http://www.un.int/jamaica/item150.htm.
[73] See document A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.30 of 20 November 1998 (United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, Italy, of the Committee of the Whole', one can read: "He [Patrick Robinson, ChP] supported option 3 for article 7, paragraph 1,[74] but proposed the addition at the end of subparagraph (b) of the phrase "in accordance with international law". The Court should not have jurisdiction on the basis of an unlawful arrest."[75]

The second statement was made a couple of hours later by the Mexican delegate González Gálvez, during the 31st meeting of the Committee of the Whole.[76] In the 'Summary records of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole', one can read the following words, which (again) focused on traditional international law (between States):

> Option 1 in article 7 was the most promising,[77] subject to certain amendments. Its paragraph 1 (b) should be amended by the addition of the words "in accordance with 15 June – 17 July 1998, Committee of the Whole, Summary Record of the 30th Meeting, Held at the Headquarters of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations on Thursday, 9 July 1998, at 3 p.m.) or pp. 305*ff* of document A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. II): United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. II, Summary records of the plenary meetings and of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole).

---

[74] See p. 11 of document A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53 of 6 July 1998 (Discussion Paper prepared by the Bureau of the Committee of the Whole on Part 2 of the Draft Statute: Jurisdiction, Admissibility and Applicable Law): "Option 3 Where a situation has been referred to the Court by a State Party or where the Prosecutor has initiated an investigation, the Court shall have jurisdiction with respect to a crime referred to in article 5 provided that the following States are Parties to the Statute or have accepted the jurisdiction of the Court with respect to the crime in question in accordance with article 7 ter: (a) The State on the territory of which the act or omission in question occurred or, if the crime was committed on board a vessel or aircraft, the State of registration of that vessel or aircraft; and (b) The State that has custody of the suspect with respect to the crime."

[75] Para. 14 of document A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.30 of 20 November 1998 (United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, Italy, 15 June – 17 July 1998, Committee of the Whole, Summary Record of the 30th Meeting, Held at the Headquarters of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations on Thursday, 9 July 1998, at 3 p.m.) or p. 306 of document A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. II): United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. II, Summary records of the plenary meetings and of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole).

[76] See document A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.31 of 20 November 1998 (United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, Italy, 15 June – 17 July 1998, Committee of the Whole, Summary Record of the 31st Meeting, Held at the Headquarters of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations on Thursday, 9 July 1998, at 6 p.m.) or pp. 313*ff* of document A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. II): United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. II, Summary records of the plenary meetings and of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole).

[77] See pp. 10-11 of document A/CONF.183/C.1/L.53 of 6 July 1998 (Discussion Paper prepared by the Bureau of the Committee of the Whole on Part 2 of the Draft Statute: Jurisdiction, Admissibility and Applicable Law): "Option 1 In the case of article 6, paragraph (a) or (c), the Court may exercise its jurisdiction with respect to a crime referred to in article 5 if one or more of the following States are Parties to the Statute, or have accepted jurisdiction in accordance with article 7ter: (a) The State on the territory of which the act or omission in question occurred or, if the crime was committed on board a vessel or aircraft, the State of registration of that vessel or aircraft; (b) The State that has custody of the > international law", to exclude the possibility of nationals of one country being kidnapped and brought before the courts of another country in violation of the rights of the territorial State.[78]

González Gálvez made a comparable statement four days later, during the 34th meeting of the Committee of the Whole on 13 July 1998.[79] In the 'Summary records of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole', one can read: "In article 7, he [González Gálvez, ChP] was in favour of option 1 for paragraph 2,[[80]] but there was a problem regarding subparagraph (b), which could be solved by the addition of the words "as long as the detention was in accordance with international law"."[81] However, the different options (to which both delegates made suggestions) did not make it through. Although this fact seems to have been one of the reasons for at least one delegation (namely the Mexican one) to abstain in the vote,[82] the non-suspect with respect to the crime; (c) The State of which the accused of the crime is a national; or (d) The State of which the victim is a national."

---

[78] Para. 35 of document A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.31 of 20 November 1998 (United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, Italy, 15 June – 17 July 1998, Committee of the Whole, Summary Record of the 31st Meeting, Held at the Headquarters of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations on Thursday, 9 July 1998, at 6 p.m.) or p. 317 of document A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. II): United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. II, Summary records of the plenary meetings and of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole).

[79] See document A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.34 of 20 November 1998 (United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, Italy, 15 June – 17 July 1998, Committee of the Whole, Summary Record of the 34th Meeting, Held at the Headquarters of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations on Thursday, 13 July 1998, at 3 p.m.) or pp. 327*ff* of document A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. II): United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. II, Summary records of the plenary meetings and of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole).

[80] See p. 9 of document A/CONF.183/C.1/L.59 of 10 July 1998 (A proposal by the Bureau of the Committee of the Whole on Part 2 of the Draft Statute (Jurisdiction, Admissibility and Applicable Law): "Option 1 In the case of article 6, paragraph (a) or (c), the Court may exercise its jurisdiction with respect to a crime referred to in articles 5 ter and 5 quarter if one or more of the following States have accepted jurisdiction in accordance with article 7 bis or ter: (a) The State on the territory of which the act or omission in question occurred or, if the crime was committed on board a vessel or aircraft, the State of registration of that vessel or aircraft; (b) The State that has custody of the accused/suspect with respect to the crime; (c) The State of which the accused/suspect of the crime is a national; or (d) The State of which the victim is a national."

[81] Para. 113 of document A/CONF.183/C.1/SR.34 of 20 November 1998 (United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, Italy, 15 June – 17 July 1998, Committee of the Whole, Summary Record of the 34th Meeting, Held at the Headquarters of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations on Thursday, 13 July 1998, at 3 p.m.) or p. 334 of document A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. II): United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. II, Summary records of the plenary meetings and of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole).

[82] In the 'Summary records of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole', one can read: "Further specific reservations by his [González Gálvez, ChP] delegation pertained (…) to the powers given to the Court to override national law and authorize the kidnapping of Mexican citizens in order to bring them inclusion of the suggested words of these two delegates does not say much about the general opinion of the 120 States which voted in favour of the ICC Statute with respect to the male captus issue as the relevant documents do not clarify why these suggestions were not accepted. It may indeed be that they were not accepted because the other delegations were of the opinion that the ICC should follow the male captus bene detentus rule, but it may also have been the case, and this is more likely, that they were not accepted for other reasons, for example, because the other delegates did not agree with the exact formulation. As explained earlier in this book, because many different male captus situations can be identified, one should be wary of making general statements on the male captus bene/male detentus maxim. The other delegations may have been of the opinion that the suggestions mentioned above were too generally formulated, and that these matters should not be regulated in abstracto in the ICC Statute itself, but that it should be up to the judges to determine, on a case-by-case basis, and taking every aspect of the specific case into account, what the consequences of a certain male captus will be.

Be that as it may, the examination of several provisions from the ICC Statute and its travaux préparatoires have brought no clarity with respect to the male captus issue. Hence, this arguably means that on this issue, there is a legal lacuna which must be filled by looking at parts (b) and (c) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute.

However, before doing so, it is time to return to the problem related to the male captus issue, that of the release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention. As explained earlier, how should the deletion of the remedy of release from the right to liberty and security, as can be found in Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute, be viewed? Should it be seen as a deliberate choice by the drafters that this remedy is not applicable to suspects or was it simply forgotten or not deemed essential enough to mention in the ICC Statute?

It would, of course, be far clearer if the ICC Statute were unequivocally to have stated that the remedy is not applicable to suspects unlawfully arrested or detained, but that is not the case here.

Furthermore, neither does the context of a provision such as Article 55 of the ICC Statute bring any relief. On the one hand, one could argue that the fact that that other, and also very broadly formulated,[83] remedy in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention – financial compensation – was not left out of the ICC Statute, see to trial in foreign countries." See para. 67 of document A/CONF.183/SR.9 of 25 January 1999 (United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, Italy, 15 June – 17 July 1998, Summary Record of the 9th Plenary Meeting, Held at the Headquarters of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations on Friday, 17 July 1998, at 10.30 p.m.) or p. 126 of document A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. II): United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. II, Summary records of the plenary meetings and of the meetings of the Committee of the Whole).

[83] See ns. 216-217 of the previous chapter.

Article 85, paragraph 1,[84] may mean that the negotiators did not want to connect the general remedy of release with the right of liberty and security. This is the expressio unius est exclusio alterius argument: "[t]he expression of one thing is the exclusion of another".[85] On the other hand, one could also assert that this provision is in fact the best evidence that there is hence a right to challenge the lawfulness of one's arrest and detention (which normally includes the remedy of release if that arrest/detention is unlawful).[86] The fact that the remedy of release is missing does not necessarily mean it is unavailable. Cf. in that respect the discussion in the previous chapter with respect to Article 59 of the ICC Statute. Neither does this provision mention the remedy of release/refusal of surrender if the competent judicial authority determines that the person standing before it is not the one in whom the ICC is interested, but it is, of course, obvious that that authority can release the person/refuse surrender of that person if that person is not the one whom the ICC seeks to prosecute. In this context, one could also refer to Rule 185 of the ICC RPE ('Release of a person from the custody of the Court other than upon completion of sentence'), paragraph 1, which may perhaps be seen as evidence for the assertion that the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention is covered by the proper instruments of the ICC:

> Subject to sub-rule 2, where a person surrendered to the Court is released from the custody of the Court because the Court does not have jurisdiction, the case is inadmissible under article 17, paragraph 1 (b), (c) or (d), the charges have not been confirmed under article 61, the person has been acquitted at trial or on appeal, or for any other reason, the Court shall, as soon as possible, make such arrangements as it considers appropriate for the transfer of the person, taking into account the views of the person, to a State which is obliged to receive him or her, to another State which agrees to receive him or her, or to a State which has requested his or her extradition with the consent of the original surrendering State. In this case, the host State shall facilitate the transfer in accordance with the agreement referred to in article 3, paragraph 2, and the related arrangements [emphasis added, ChP].

Nevertheless, it is also clear that this provision is very generally formulated.

Finally, the object and purpose of the ICC Statute are not very illuminating either as both the importance of prosecution (which may more readily lead to a denial of the remedy) and prosecution in a correct, human rights respecting way (which may [84] "Anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention shall have an enforceable right to compensation." See also Chapter 10 of the RPE.

[85] Garner 2004, p. 1717. Cf. also Edwards 2001, p. 371, writing about the (comparable) inclusio unius est exclusio alterius argument. See finally Acquaviva 2007, p. 633 (writing on Art. 85 of the ICC Statute more generally): "[T]hat rule would seem to exclude the possibility of immediate release of the accused subject to the most serious violations, a remedy still contemplated by ICTY judges, at least in extreme cases."

[86] See also Zappalà 2003, p. 77: "[I]t must be remembered that the fact that Article 85 of the ICC Statute provides for a right of compensation for unlawful arrest necessarily implies the existence of a right to challenge the lawfulness of arrest."

more readily lead to an acceptance of the remedy) are stressed, see also supra (in the context of the male captus problem).

As textual/contextual/teleological interpretation of this provision has brought no relief (Article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties), one should turn, again, to the travaux préparatoires of the ICC Statute (Article 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties). These may possibly shed a light on the question why this remedy of release is lacking in the ICC Statute. It is important to find out whether the drafters – perhaps anticipating the problems of a court without an enforcement arm[87] or being aware of the problems of the remedy already identified in Chapter III of this study – may have deliberately left out this remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention. After all, if that were the case, then part (b) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute (which, as will be shown, does include this remedy of release) cannot be looked at because part (a) is clear – in that the remedy of release is not available to suspects unlawfully arrested/detained – and hence does not leave a legal lacuna which must be filled by part (b). That would not only be the position of Edwards, but also of the judges in the December 2006 decision of the Appeals Chamber mentioned supra. They would argue that ICC legislation is exhaustive on the matter (namely in that the drafters only wanted to maintain the general words which can be connected to the right to liberty and security[88] and not the more specific remedy of a release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention) and hence that part (b) does not need to be looked to. Finally, one could argue that the views of Verhoeven would also lead to this result. This is, of course, unproblematic if one interprets Verhoeven's words to support the idea that part (b) will only be applied if part (a) has left a legal lacuna. However, even if one follows the interpretation that Verhoeven's words mean that part (b) must also be applied if part (a) does provide an answer, one would reach the same result because "[t]here is no reason to construe the latter in a way that is inconsistent with the former, if this is not clearly the intent of the drafters of the statute [emphasis added, ChP]". Hence, even if part (b) can be applied if part (a) has provided an answer and even if part (a) cannot be construed inconsistently with general international law, this is different when this was clearly the drafters' intent. If it was clearly the drafters' intention to leave out the remedy of release, then part (b)/general international law cannot be applied in this view.

However, if it is not clear that the drafters intended to delete this remedy (for example, because an examination of the travaux préparatoires shows that the deletion may have been caused by the complexities of the negotiations leading up to the ICC Statute),[89] then part (a) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute can be qualified as unclear, leaving a legal lacuna and justifying looking to part (b).

---

[87] Cf. the final words of n. 188 of the previous chapter.

[88] Namely that a person shall not be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention, and shall not be deprived of his or her liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established in this Statute.

[89] Cf. in that respect Edwards, writing about the search and seizure right to privacy: "It might be argued that the conspicuous omission of the express search and seizure privacy right evidences the drafters' intent to excise the right from Rome Statute coverage. However, the express search and seizure privacy

In short, one must now turn to the travaux préparatoires of the ICC Statute to see whether these provide an answer to this issue. In this context, the same documents which were examined with respect to the male captus issue will be reviewed here.

First of all, the documents which come closest to the official records of the Rome Conference, which can be found in paragraph 23 of the Final Act of the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court,[90] say nothing on the omission of the remedy of release.

Thus, it may be good to also look at the pre-Rome documents, namely the 1994 ILC's Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court,[91] the 1995 Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court,[92] the 1996 Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Volume I (Proceedings of the Preparatory Committee during March-April and August 1996)[93] and Volume II (Compilation of Proposals),[94] the Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court as can be found in the 1998 Report of the Inter-Sessional Meeting – again of the Preparatory Committee – from 19 to 30 January 1998 in Zutphen, the Netherlands[95] and the Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court as can be found in the final 1998 Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court.[96]

With respect to the 1994 document, it is first interesting to note that the provision on arrest (Article 28) says nothing on illegal arrests or detentions or their consequences.[97] Nevertheless, in the commentary to this provision, the more general right was omitted not because the drafters believed that suspects and accused persons did not deserve the right, but rather because delegates believed that the right was or should be incorporated elsewhere in the treaty's collateral instruments." (Edwards 2001, p. 349.)

---

[90] See n. 55 and accompanying text.

[91] See the Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, to be found in: Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-sixth session, 2 May – 22 July 1994, UNGA OR, Forty-ninth session, Supplement No. 10, A/49/10, pp. 43*ff*. Note that the 1993 preliminary version of this Draft Statute will not be mentioned in this overview as it does not deal with releases in the case of unlawful arrests/detentions. (It only addresses releases on bail, see Art. 35, Report of the Working Group on a Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, to be found in: Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-fifth session, 3 May – 23 July 1993, UNGA OR, Forty-eighth session, Supplement No. 10, A/48/10, p. 116.)

[92] UNGA OR, Fiftieth Session, Supplement No. 22 (A/50/22, 6 September 1995).

[93] UNGA OR, Fifty-first Session Supplement No. 22 (A/51/22, 13 September 1996).

[94] UNGA OR, Fifty-first Session Supplement No. 22A (A/51/22, 13 September 1996).

[95] Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 16 March – 3 April 1998, UNGA A/AC.249/1998/L.13, 4 February 1998.

[96] This report (A/CONF.183/2, 14 April 1998) can be found in: United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. III, Reports and other documents (A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. III)), pp. 5-92.

[97] However, para. 2 does clarify that a provisional detention, without a confirmation of the indictment, cannot last forever: "A suspect who has been provisionally arrested is entitled to release from arrest if the indictment has not been confirmed within 90 days of the arrest, or such longer time as the Presidency may allow." See the Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, to be found in: Report remark is made that "[p]rovisions dealing with the arrest and detention of an accused person are drafted so as to ensure compliance with relevant provisions of the ICCPR, especially article 9".[98] Article 29 ('Pre-trial detention or release') is more specific and most interesting for this discussion. Here, the right to liberty and security can be found, including the remedy of release if the arrest or detention[99] is deemed unlawful.[100] What does the commentary to this provision say? First, the general remark is again made that this provision "is drafted so as to ensure conformity with article 9 of the ICCPR".[101] What follows next, at first sight, quite clearly describes the different responsibilities of the national judicial officer and the ICC in the arrest and detention procedure and therefore merits reproduction here in its entirety:

> It requires that any person arrested pursuant to a warrant issued under article 28 should be brought promptly before a judicial officer of the State in which the arrest occurred, who should determine, in accordance with the procedures applicable in that State, whether the warrant has been duly served and that the rights of the accused have been respected. The Commission acknowledges that there is some risk in entrusting these powers to a State official (usually a magistrate or some similar person exercising similar functions under national law) rather than before an organ of the Court. However, it is essential under article 9 (3) of the ICCPR that this preliminary opportunity for review of the arrest be provided promptly, and in practice this can only be done in this way. Since ex hypothesi the arresting State will be cooperating with the Court, there is no reason to expect that this preliminary procedure will cause difficulties. (…) On the other hand, release whether unconditionally or on bail pending trial is a matter for the Presidency. In conformity with article 9 (4) of the of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-sixth session, 2 May – 22 July 1994, UNGA OR, Forty-ninth session, Supplement No. 10, A/49/10, p. 97.

---

[98] Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, to be found in: Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-sixth session, 2 May – 22 July 1994, UNGA OR, Forty-ninth session, Supplement No. 10, A/49/10, p. 97.

[99] This, by the way, again confirms the position taken in this study that a judge must not only release a person if he finds that his detention is unlawful, but also if his arrest is unlawful. This is arguably to be welcomed for it is the entire deprivation of liberty (arrest and detention) which should matter. See n. 583 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[100] See Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-sixth session, 2 May – 22 July 1994, UNGA OR, Forty-ninth session, Supplement No. 10, A/49/10, p. 98: "1. A person arrested shall be brought promptly before a judicial officer of the State where the arrest occurred. The judicial officer shall determine, in accordance with the procedures applicable in that State, that the warrant has been duly served and that the rights of the accused have been respected. 2. A person arrested may apply to the Presidency for release pending trial. The Presidency may release the person unconditionally or on bail if it is satisfied that the accused will appear at the trial. 3. A person arrested may apply to the Presidency for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of the arrest or detention. If the Presidency decides that the arrest or detention was unlawful, it shall order the release of the accused, and may award compensation. 4. A person arrested shall be held, pending trial or release on bail, in an appropriate place of detention in the arresting State, in the State in which the trial is to be held or if necessary, in the host State [emphasis added, ChP]."

[101] Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, to be found in: Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-sixth session, 2 May – 22 July 1994, UNGA OR, Forty-ninth session, Supplement No. 10, A/49/10, p. 98.

> ICCPR, it is provided that a person arrested pursuant to a warrant issued under article 28 may apply to the Court for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of the arrest or detention: see paragraph 3. The Court must decide whether the arrest and detention were lawful, and if not it shall order the release of the accused. In the case of wrongful arrest it may award compensation accordingly, as required by article 9 (5) of the ICCPR (…). The Commission believes that the full range of guarantees to suspects and accused persons should be provided in the draft Statute.[102]

Hence, in this version of the right, both the national judicial officer and the ICC review the legality of the arrest (and detention). Notwithstanding this, only the ICC, in the form of the Presidency, has the power to release a person. The national authorities are merely there to check whether the rights of the suspect have been respected. In that respect, one can wonder why the Commission states that it is aware of the fact "that there is some risk in entrusting these powers to a State official (…) rather than before an organ of the Court". After all, the national authorities cannot release the suspect. An explanation may therefore be that the ICC finds it risky to involve the national authorities, not in the enforcement of ICC requests to arrest and the like (which is, of course, a normal feature of an international criminal court without its own police force), but in the actual legal process, for example, because a legal determination of what happened in the pre-trial phase made at the national level may have consequences for the legal phase in The Hague.

Be that as it may, it is also interesting to note that the following phrase from Article 29, paragraph 3 of this 1994 document, even though it states quite generally that "[i]f the Presidency decides that the arrest or detention was unlawful, it shall order the release of the accused, and may award compensation",[103] is preceded by the words: "A person arrested may apply to the Presidency for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of the arrest or detention [emphasis added, ChP]". This is reminiscent, of course, of the present Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute, stating that a person under investigation "[s]hall not be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention, and shall not be deprived of his or her liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established in this Statute [emphasis added, ChP]". In Chapter VIII, see footnote 168 of that chapter, it was argued that this probably means that all the arrest and detention provisions in the ICC Statute, including Article 59 of the ICC Statute, which in turn refers to, among other things, national procedural law, must be complied with before one can speak of a proper deprivation of liberty in the context of the ICC. In that respect, national law would also enter this habeas corpus provision. The reference to national law in the 1994 document is not absent either, although it is more restricted.[104] One can, of course, speculate as to what would happen under this regime if a suspect were arrested or detained in clear contravention of the national legal rules of the State where he was arrested/detained (including that State's international legal (human rights) obligations). It seems that in such a case, the national legal authority would conclude that the suspect's rights were violated but would not have the power to order his release. Although this power of release is explicitly granted to the Presidency, the latter would only release a person if the arrest/detention was unlawful under the Statute. And since the reference to national law, in this 1994 Statute, is quite restricted, one can wonder whether the Presidency could release a person in such a case. A more general statement that an arrest or detention cannot be arbitrary (which is present in the current Statute) might have solved this, but such a general statement is lacking in the 1994 document.

[102] Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, to be found in: Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-sixth session, 2 May – 22 July 1994, UNGA OR, Forty-ninth session, Supplement No. 10, A/49/10, pp. 98-99.
[103] See n. 100.
[104] See Art. 29, para. 1 of the 1994 document (see n. 100).

Perhaps because of this possible lacuna in the suspect's human rights protection, questions regarding the exact scope of this right cropped up in the 1995 Ad Hoc Committee's report. For example, Annex I of this report (entitled 'Guidelines for the consideration of the question of the relationship between States parties, non-States parties and the International Criminal Court') includes the following questions on the issue 'accused's challenges to the lawfulness of detention':

> - Decided by the court (art. 29(3)) or by national authorities? - Does recourse to the court under article 29(3) exclude accused's fundamental rights under national law to challenge in national courts the lawfulness of detention? If not, what is locus standi of the international criminal court in proceedings before a national court?[105]

In the 1996 Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, another effort was made to divide the responsibility between the national authorities and the ICC in the context of reviewing the legality of the actual arrest and detention. In Volume I of this report, suggestions were made to shift responsibility to review the legality of the arrest and detention to the national authorities. The ICC could then review such issues as the legality of the arrest warrant and the orders for detention. Although it is not mentioned very clearly, it seems that the national authority would in that case also be authorised to release a person in the case of an unlawful arrest or detention – though the Statute must make guidelines (for the national authorities?) "for the grounds for detention and release for those occasions when the Court [through the national authorities?, ChP] has custody of the suspect".[106] Another excerpt from the report related to this discussion [105] See UNGA OR, Fiftieth Session, Supplement No. 22 (A/50/22, 6 September 1995), p. 53. In the report itself (and not its annex), one can read comparable information in paras. 147-152 and in paras. 204 and 216.

[106] UNGA OR, Fifty-first Session Supplement No. 22 (A/51/22, 13 September 1996), para. 243. The entire paragraph goes: "It was felt that article 29 on pre-trial detention or release needed further clarification in respect, inter alia, of the determination by the judicial officer of the warrant duly served and the purpose of such determination. It was suggested that the determination of the lawfulness of the arrest or detention, as well as bail, should be made by the relevant national authorities. A view was expressed that what the Court could determine was the lawfulness of its arrest warrants and its requests for the detention of the suspect. However, the Statute should provide guidelines for the grounds for is not very clear either. Although it states (arguably quite broadly) "that the requested State should ensure that the views of the Prosecutor in regard to any release of the suspect or the accused should be brought to the attention of the judicial officer [emphasis added, ChP]"[107] (this could thus also encompass a release after a determination of the unlawfulness of the arrest or detention), this sentence is preceded by the words: "It was further suggested that issues of detention prior to surrender, including bail or provisional release, should be determined by national authorities and not by the International Criminal Court, as envisaged in the draft statute."[108] The words "issues of detention prior to surrender" could, of course, include the situation that the surrender would never take place because a person has already been released as a result of an unlawful arrest or detention, but is seems that the sentence containing the words "any release" seems more focused on 'mere' interim releases pending/prior to surrender/trial.

However, in Volume II of the 1996 report, under the question 'If the Court (or the appropriate national authorities) decides that the arrest or detention was illegal, what are the consequences of that decision?',[109] the proposals not only state that the ICC must review the legality of the arrest warrants and the orders for detention (as detention and release for those occasions when the Court had custody of the suspect [emphasis added, ChP]."

[107] Ibid., para. 323. The entire paragraph goes: "On the question of the role of national authorities, in particular the judiciary, in the execution of the Court's requests for provisional arrest, pre-surrender detention or surrender of the accused to the Court, there was general support for the view that the Statute should permit involvement of national courts in the application of national law where those requirements were considered fundamental, especially to protect the rights of individuals, as well as to verify procedural legality. Mention was made in this connection, of the difficulties that many States would have with a direct enforcement of an arrest warrant issued by the Court, as opposed to an indirect enforcement through available national mechanisms. It was suggested that, as a minimum, it should be possible to challenge in a national court of the requested State a document purporting to be a warrant – without the examination of the warrant in relation to substantive law – and that there should be a national forum in which to adjudicate upon any admissibility dispute, at least as regards double jeopardy. It was further suggested that issues of detention prior to surrender, including bail or provisional release, should be determined by national authorities and not by the International Criminal Court, as envisaged in the draft statute. It was considered necessary, however, that the requested State should ensure that the views of the Prosecutor in regard to any release of the suspect or the accused should be brought to the attention of the judicial officer. In this regard, it was emphasized that there must be a very close working relationship between the Prosecutor and States parties in implementing the Court's request for assistance and surrender, and that the Statute should be sufficiently flexible so as to take this into account, while at the same time giving due attention to the rights of the individuals and the State's international obligations. The view was also expressed that the transfer of the accused to the Court or to the detaining State could be an appropriate point for shifting the primary responsibility over the accused from the national authorities to the International Criminal Court. With regard to the question of who should execute surrender, it was suggested that, for practical reasons, the Statute should provide for an option for execution by the custodial State, although there was also the view in favour of execution, in principle, by officials of the Court only [emphasis added, ChP]."

[108] Ibid. (See the previous footnote).

[109] UNGA OR, Fifty-first Session Supplement No. 22A (A/51/22, 13 September 1996), p. 143.

one can find back in Volume I),[110] but also that the ICC must decide more generally on the lawfulness of the arrest and detention.[111] This possible discrepancy between Volume I and Volume II may be explained by the fact that these proposals are not exhaustive,[112] but they show in any case that there was as yet no clear consensus in 1996 on the division of responsibility in this area and on the exact scope of the right, including perhaps (but probably not) the question of whether or not the remedy of release was to be included in this right.[113] A final interesting point from Volume II

[110] See, for example, Proposal No. 4: "If the Presidency decides that the arrest warrant or order of detention was unlawful, it shall order the withdrawal of all requests for surrender and for provisional arrest made pursuant to the warrant of order, and may award compensation." (Ibid., p. 143.)

[111] See ibid., pp. 143-144. Proposal No. 1 (identical to the 1994 ILC Draft) goes: "A person arrested may apply to the Presidency for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of the arrest or detention. If the Presidency decides that the arrest or detention was unlawful, it shall order the release of the accused, and may award compensation." (Ibid., p. 143.) Proposal No. 2 reads: "If the Preliminary Investigations Chamber decides to release the person concerned because his arrest or detention was unlawful, it may award him compensation." (Ibid.) Proposals Nos. 3 and 5 do not go into the matter of release. Proposal No. 3 goes: "The Court shall make compensation to those who were: (a) pronounced innocent by an irrevocable adjudication; (b) arrested or detained for the purpose of prosecution, although the prosecution against him did not eventually take place; (c) arrested or detained but the lawfulness of that arrest or detention was denied in accordance with this Statute; or (d) illegally inflicted losses upon by an officer of the Court, intentionally or negligently in the course of performing its duties. Procedures and criteria for compensation shall be provided in the rules, including the expenses to be borne by a complaint State if that State lodged a complaint without enough reason." (Ibid.) The (incomplete) Proposal No. 5 reads: "A person arrested may apply to the Presidency for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of the arrest or detention. The Presidency shall in any case review ex officio every 30 days the lawfulness under this Statute of the arrest or detention. If the Presidency decides...[emphasis in original, ChP]". (Ibid.) The last proposal, No. 6, is a combination of Proposals Nos. 1, 2 and 4. It does state more generally that the reviewing authority shall order the release in the case of an unlawful arrest or detention, but this sentence is preceded by the sentence in which the request of the accused is limited to the lawfulness 'of any arrest warrant or order of determination': "A person arrested may apply to the Presidency for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of any arrest warrant or order of determination issued by the Court. If the Presidency decides that the arrest or detention was unlawful under the Statute, it shall order the release of the accused, and may award compensation." (Ibid., p. 144.)

[112] See the note at ibid., p. 108 (where Part 4 ('Investigation and Prosecution') starts): "The following is a compilation prepared by an informal group dealing with procedural questions, fair trial and rights of the accused covering parts 4, 5 and 6. It neither represents a text agreed upon among delegations nor suggests that every provision should be included in the Statute. It contains only written proposals. Proposals for some of the articles have been consolidated to various degrees by some of their authors and may not necessarily represent the views of all the delegations who submitted proposals. The order of the articles as well as the proposed content and headings are only of an indicative character and have not been finally agreed upon. The compilation does not prejudice discussion on other topics related to the establishment of an international criminal court."

[113] One could argue that the proposals mentioned in ns. 110-111 in general would accept this remedy. It is true that Proposal No. 3 does not mention the remedy of release, but this proposal only seems to focus on the question in which situations one should provide compensation. Proposal No. 4 does not mention release either but it seems clear that if the ICC withdraws requests for surrender, the person who was to be surrendered will also be released. Finally, Proposal No. 5 does not mention release either but this proposal is incomplete. Besides the proposals mentioned under the question 'If the Court (or the appropriate national authorities) decides that the arrest or detention was illegal, what are the consequences of that decision?', it may also be good, for the sake of completeness, to refer to a proposal for the entire Art. 29 prepared by the informal group on judicial cooperation and enforcement. See of the 1996 report is that the following general statement (which was still lacking) was proposed: "No person shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. Nor shall any person be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established by the rules of the Court."[114] Even if the last sentence were only to refer to the provisions of the Statute (and not, for example, to national procedures, although provisions in the Statute may, of course, in turn refer to national procedures), the first sentence is generally formulated and, given the word "nor", clearly separated from the second sentence, which would mean that any deprivation of liberty in the context of an ICC case, including the crucial part at the national level, must be non-arbitrary.

During the Inter-Sessional Meeting of the Preparatory Committee in Zutphen in January 1998, another Draft Statute was prepared.

In the new Article 29 (Article 53), the division of responsibility had apparently finally been settled: the national judicial authority was there to "determine, in accordance with the law of that State, that the warrant applies to that person and the person has been arrested in accordance with the proper process and that the person's rights have been respected".[115] What would happen were the national judge to decide that the person had been arrested or detained unlawfully remains unclear. In any case, the remedy of release is not explicitly mentioned.[116] Conversely, the ICC does have the explicit power to release a person but here again, the formulation of the provision is quite ambiguous. Although it states quite generally that the ICC – whether in the form of the Presidency or the Pre-Trial Chamber – shall order the release of the person in the case of an unlawful arrest or detention under the Statute[117] – note, however, the previously mentioned and possibly restrictive power of the words "under the Statute"[118] – this sentence is preceded by the following

---

UNGA OR, Fifty-first Session Supplement No. 22A (A/51/22, 13 September 1996), p. 145. Paras. 2 and 3 go as follows: "2. A person arrested shall be brought promptly before a judicial officer in the custodial State who shall determine, in accordance with the law of that State, that the person has been arrested in accordance with the proper process and that the person's rights have been respected. 3. A person arrested may apply to the Presidency for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of any arrest warrant or order of determination issued by the Court. If the Presidency decides that the arrest or detention was unlawful under the Statute, it shall order the release of the accused, and may award compensation." This proposal is very much reminiscent of the old Art. 29 (paras. 1 and 3) from the 1994 ILC document, see n. 100.

[114] See Proposal No. 4 (at UNGA OR, Fifty-first Session Supplement No. 22A (A/51/22, 13 September 1996), p. 130) to the question "Is it possible – and on which grounds – to order measures restricting or suppressing the liberty of an accused before the indictment?" (ibid., p. 128).

[115] Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 16 March – 3 April 1998, UNGA A/AC.249/1998/L.13, 4 February 1998, p. 102, para. 2.

[116] The national judicial authority, on the other hand, does have the explicit right to grant interim release but that is, of course, quite another issue. (See ibid., para. 3.) The same right is explicitly granted to the ICC as well, see ibid., para. 4.

[117] See ibid., para. 8: "If the [Presidency] [Pre-Trial Chamber] decides that the arrest or detention was unlawful under the Statute, it shall order the release of the person, [and may award compensation] [in accordance with article...] [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[118] However, note also that that refers to the provisions in the Statute, which, in turn, may refer to national proceedings (which are more often mentioned in this document than in the one of 1994). It must be remarked that also in the Zutphen document (cf. n. 65 and accompanying text), mention was made of restricting words: "A person arrested may apply to the [Presidency] [Pre-Trial Chamber] for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of any arrest warrant or order of detention issued by the Court." The question thus arises as to whether the ICC would also have the power to release a person if more generally it finds that his arrest or detention was unlawful under the Statute or whether this remedy would only be granted if the arrest warrant or order of detention is found to be unlawful.

The final pre-Rome document, the report of the Preparatory Committee from 14 April 1998,[119] presents two options for the present discussion. In the provision on pre-trial detention or release (now numbered as Article 60), one can read that the national judicial authority and the ICC have exactly the same authority as already granted to them in the Zutphen Draft.[120] Nevertheless, one page later, one will find a heading entitled 'Further option for articles 58 to 61'. In a footnote in this report, one can read the rationale behind this inclusion, which, by the way, also received criticism for omitting "procedures of a substantive nature which have been included in the text of the same articles above":[121]

---

the following general statement which could offer a broad protection, both with respect to the provisions of the ICC Statute and the national law provisions on arrest and detention. This statement was made in the context of (then) Art. 52 (cf. the old Art. 28 from the 1994 Draft), the provision on arrest: "No person shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. Nor shall any person be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established by the rules of the Court." (Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 16 March – 3 April 1998, UNGA A/AC.249/1998/L.13, 4 February 1998, p. 100, para. 1.) In a footnote attached to this statement (see ibid., n. 171), which was put between brackets, one can read that "[i]t was suggested that this provision could be moved to article 47[26], paragraph 6."

[119] Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Document A/CONF.183/2, 14 April 1998, to be found in United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. III, Reports and other documents (A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. III)), pp. 5-92.

[120] For the national context, see United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. III, Reports and other documents (A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. III)), pp. 48-49 (Art. 60, para. 3): "A person arrested shall be brought promptly before a competent judicial authority in the custodial State who shall determine, in accordance with the law of that State, that the warrant applies to that person and the person has been arrested in accordance with the proper process and that the person's rights have been respected." For the international context, see ibid., p. 49 (Art. 60, para. 9): "A person arrested may apply to the [Presidency] [Pre-Trial Chamber] for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of any arrest warrant or order of detention issued by the Court. If the [Presidency] [Pre-Trial Chamber] decides that the arrest or detention was unlawful under the Statute, it shall order the release of the person, [and may award compensation] [in accordance with article...] [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Note also that the general statement, which could be found in Art. 52 of the Zutphen Draft and about which it was suggested that it be moved to another provision (see n. 118), can now be found in the new provision on arrest (Art. 59), but also here, one can read, again in a footnote (see ibid., p. 48, n. 156), that "[i]t was suggested that this provision could be moved to article 54, paragraph 10."

[121] United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. III, Reports and other documents (A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. III)), p. 50, n. 167.

> The proposal represents a simplified and somewhat restructured text for articles 58 to 61. This simplified version of these articles has been achieved as a result of the adoption of the framework outlined in document A/AC.249/1998/WG.4/DP.36 and the withdrawal or abbreviation by many delegations of their proposals currently contained in document A/AC.249/1998/L.13 [this is the Zutphen Draft, ChP]. This reflects a decision by many of the authors to move away from national positions towards a single, straightforward procedural approach, acceptable to delegations representing different national legal systems. The proposal does not attempt to resolve issues such as the trigger mechanism or powers of the Prosecutor. Similarly, it does not attempt to incorporate at this time procedures relating to challenges to admissibility or jurisdiction. The purpose of the proposed text, if delegations agree, is to provide a basis for a more focused and efficient discussion in Rome of the procedural stages addressed in the above articles 58 to 61.[122]

Although the most relevant article for the present discussion so far was entitled 'Pre-trial detention or release', the remedy of release was left out in the title of the most relevant article under this new proposal: Article 59 ('Arrest proceedings in the custodial State'). In this article, one can read that the national judicial authority has maintained its powers, which again do not explicitly mention a remedy (including the remedy of release) if this authority determines that a person was not arrested according to the proper process or that his rights were violated.[123] With respect to the ICC's role in this context, it states:

> [4. Pending a decision on [surrender][extradition], a person may apply to the Pre-Trial Chamber for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of any arrest warrant issued by the Court. If the Pre-Trial Chamber decides that the arrest warrant was unlawful under the Statute, it shall order the release of the person. [original footnote omitted, ChP]][124]

What one can see here is that the legality test of the ICC has been restricted to the arrest warrant alone.[125] The previously mentioned and broader formulation "if the Presidency/Pre-Trial Chamber decides that the arrest or detention was unlawful under the Statute, it shall order the release of the person" has suddenly disappeared. Moreover, the footnote attached to this proposal reads: "Serious questions were [122] Ibid., p. 50, n. 166.

[123] See ibid., p. 51, Art. 59, para. 2: "A person arrested shall be brought promptly before a competent judicial authority in the custodial State who shall determine, in accordance with the law of that State, that the warrant applies to that person, that the person has been arrested in accordance with the proper process, and that the person's rights have been respected."
[124] Ibid., p. 51, Art. 59, para. 4.
[125] Note, however, that in document A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.40 of 1 July 1998 – a discussion paper of the Committee of the Whole's Working Group on Procedural Matters – one can see that the scope of Art. 59, para. 4 was apparently perceived to be bigger. The Working Group listed a number of (potential) functions of the Pre-Trial Chamber and (potential) function 12 reads: "Determination of lawfulness of arrest pending surrender. Article 59 (4)." See also the French version of this document: "Déterminer la légalité de l'arrestation en attendant la remise. Article 59 [(]4)." The Spanish version does, however, focus on the arrest warrant alone: "Determinación de la legalidad de la orden de detención en espera de una decisión sobre la entrega. Artículo 59(4)."

raised about the grounds on which such a challenge would be based and whether this provision was needed at all in the light of the procedures for judicial review of the arrest warrant and judicial confirmation of the charges for trial."[126]

As can be seen in the final Statute, the new streamlined proposal ('Further option for articles 58 to 61') was indeed accepted to a great extent. This means that first, the role of the national judicial authority was maintained (without explicitly mentioning the possibility for this authority to release a person if it is decided that the person was not arrested according to the proper process or that his rights were violated)[127] and secondly, that the more generally formulated power of the ICC to release a person in the case of an unlawful arrest or detention (which could still be found in the first (but not second, streamlined) option of the final report of the Preparatory Committee) was deleted. The new and restricted power of the ICC as proposed in the streamlined proposal, namely to release a person in the case of an unlawful arrest warrant, was also deleted,[128] following the remark mentioned above, namely "whether this provision was needed at all".[129]

Has this review brought a solution to the question of whether it was clearly the intent of the drafters of the ICC Statute not to grant the remedy of release to a person unlawfully arrested or detained? This is an important question but also one which is very difficult to answer.

On the one hand, one could argue that this was indeed the intention of the drafters. After all, how else can one explain the fact that this remedy was omitted in the final Statute whereas one could still read the following words in the 1998 final report of the Preparatory Committee (this is not the streamlined proposal): "If the [Presidency] [Pre-Trial Chamber] decides that the arrest or detention was unlawful under the Statute, it shall order the release of the person, [and may award compensation] [in accordance with article…] [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[130] This can only point to a deliberate choice not to grant this remedy to persons unlawfully arrested or detained.

On the other hand, one could also argue that it is not clear that the drafters of the ICC really wanted this remedy not to be available to suspects and that it may very [126] United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. III, Reports and other documents (A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. III)), p. 51, n. 172.

[127] See also Sluiter 2003 C, pp. 624-625: "[T]he provision is silent as to what happens upon a determination that a person's rights have in fact been violated. Do the national authorities grant the remedies they deem appropriate?"

[128] See also the version of Art. 59 from the Report of the Working Group on Procedural Matters (A/CONF.183/C.1/WGPM/L.2 of 24 June 1998).

[129] See n. 126 and accompanying text.

[130] United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June – 17 July 1998, OR, Vol. III, Reports and other documents (A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. III)), p. 49 (Art. 60, para. 9). Note, however, the possible restrictions of this article, namely the fact that it speaks of "unlawful under the Statute [emphasis added, ChP]" and the fact that this phrase was preceded by this one: "A person arrested may apply to the [Presidency] [Pre-Trial Chamber] for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of any arrest warrant or order of detention issued by the Court [emphasis added, ChP]."

well be the case that they thought that the remedy would be moved to another part of the Statute or that it was unnecessary to mention it at all (because it was clear that such a remedy, perhaps on the basis of implied powers,[131] could be granted in situations of unlawful arrest and detention). That view can be supported by the following three arguments.

The first argument has to do with the disappearance of the above-mentioned words that "If the [Presidency] [Pre-Trial Chamber] decides that the arrest or detention was unlawful under the Statute, it shall order the release of the person, [and may award compensation] [in accordance with article…] [original footnote omitted, ChP]." This deletion was triggered by the new streamlined proposal in the final report of the Preparatory Committee. This (simplified!) proposal was 'only' negotiated "to provide a basis for a more focused and efficient discussion in Rome of the procedural stages in the above articles 58 to 61". This purpose, combined with the proposal's disclaimer that it "does not attempt to incorporate at this time procedures relating to challenges to admissibility or jurisdiction", may be used as an argument to state that the negotiators did not want to delete the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention altogether, but only at this time (to speed up the negotiations) and only in this place (the negotiators may have thought that the remedy was perhaps going to be included in the articles pertaining to the challenges to admissibility or jurisdiction). In that context, one may again refer, see supra, to the release from Rule 185 ('Release of a person from the custody of the Court other than upon completion of sentence'), paragraph 1 of the ICC RPE.

The second argument is that the drafters may have thought that the possibility for release in the case of an unlawful arrest or detention was included in the powers of the national judicial authority. In the first (1996) report of the Preparatory Committee, it was stated "that the transfer of the accused to the Court or to the detaining State could be an appropriate point for shifting the primary responsibility over the accused from the national authorities to the International Criminal Court".[132] That could mean that the ICC is of the opinion that the pre-surrender phase is mainly the responsibility of the national judicial authority and that – apart

[131] See El Zeidy 2006, p. 458: "[T]he ICC 'must be deemed' to have implied powers to rule on any violation resulting from the non-compliance with the terms of the Statute, which are essential to the 'performance' of its functions, despite the lack of an explicit provision to that effect." That is indeed true, although it must also be stressed that one must not resort to implied powers too quickly in the context of the ICC either. See Swart and Sluiter 1999, pp. 102-103: "Can it be excluded that the Court will, in the future, assert powers which, "although not expressly conferred, arise by necessary implication as being essential to the performance of its duties"? In our view, this question should not a priori be answered in the affirmative, although it should be borne in mind that given the detailed character of the Statute, it was clearly the objective of the framers to limit the powers of the Court to those set out in the Statute [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., p. 96: "In Rome, there was an overall and widely supported desire to eliminate the need for judge-made law of the kind developed by the ad hoc Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia." See finally Ciampi 2003, pp. 1614-1615 and the ICC OTP's 'Informal expert paper: Fact-finding and investigative functions of the office of the Prosecutor, including international co-operation', 2003, available at: http://www2.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/490C317B-5D8E-4131-8170-7568911F6EB2/248459/372616.PDF, paras. 9-10.

[132] UNGA OR, Fifty-first Session Supplement No. 22 (A/51/22, 13 September 1996), para. 323.

from the fact that the ICC ensures that the national judicial authority, at a minimum, follows the procedure mentioned in Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute[133] and is able to grant the suspect interim release pending surrender[134] – it is up to the national judicial authority to determine what happens if it finds that a person was, for example, not arrested in accordance with the proper process or that his rights were not respected. Although this runs counter the fact that the remedy of release has never been explicitly mentioned in the context of the powers of the national judicial authority[135] and that the commentary of the first Draft Statute was quite clear in that respect (namely that the national authority would not have that power), the indistinctness of Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute (see Chapter VIII and the scholarly views presented there) may not exclude such power either.

If that were indeed the division of responsibility envisaged (which, by the way, was never very clear),[136] then it would be less strange for the remedy of release in the international context, which was already focused on the ICC procedures as from 1994,[137] to 'shrink' even more in subsequent years.[138] After all, in that division, one can assume, at least in theory, that if a suspect is surrendered to the Court and if the national judicial authority had indeed the possibility to release a person in the case of an unlawful arrest or detention, then the fact that he is being surrendered means that his arrest and detention were in fact lawful. In other words: if his arrest and [133] Namely to determine that: "(a) The warrant applies to that person; (b) The person has been arrested in accordance with the proper process; and (c) The person's rights have been respected." One may argue that even though this procedure is not formulated as a right/remedy, it very much resembles the idea of habeas corpus.

[134] See Art. 59, paras. 3-6 of the ICC Statute.

[135] See Art. 29, para. 1 of the 1994 ILC Draft, Art. 53, para. 2 of the 1998 Zutphen Draft and Art. 59, para. 2 of the 1998 Draft Statute in the final report of the Preparatory Committee (streamlined version).

[136] See UNGA OR, Fiftieth Session, Supplement No. 22 (A/50/22, 6 September 1995), p. 53 where one can read the following questions on the issue 'accused's challenges to the lawfulness of detention': "- Decided by the court (art. 29(3)) or by national authorities? - Does recourse to the court under article 29(3) exclude accused's fundamental rights under national law to challenge in national courts the lawfulness of detention? If not, what is locus standi of the international criminal court in proceedings before a national court?"

[137] See the words "lawfulness under this Statute" in Art. 29, para. 3 of the 1994 ILC Draft.

[138] From a quite full (but again possibly restricted, see the previous footnote) remedy in the case of an unlawful arrest or detention (Art. 29, para. 3 of the 1994 ILC Draft: "A person arrested may apply to the Presidency for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of the arrest or detention. If the Presidency decides that the arrest or detention was unlawful, it shall order the release of the accused, and may award compensation."), via a remedy which looks the same as the ILC one but which is preceded by more restrictive words (Art. 53, para. 8 of the 1998 Zutphen Draft: "A person arrested may apply to the [Presidency] [Pre-Trial Chamber] for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of any arrest warrant or order of detention issued by the Court. If the [Presidency] [Pre-Trial Chamber] decides that the arrest or detention was unlawful under the Statute, it shall order the release of the person, [and may award compensation] [in accordance with article...] [original footnote omitted, ChP]."") to the (ultimately deleted) remedy of release if the arrest warrant was found unlawful (Art. 59, para. 4 of the 1998 Draft Statute in the final report of the Preparatory Committee (streamlined version): "[4. Pending a decision on [surrender][extradition], a person may apply to the Pre-Trial Chamber for a determination of the lawfulness under this Statute of any arrest warrant issued by the Court. If the Pre-Trial Chamber decides that the arrest warrant was unlawful under the Statute, it shall order the release of the person. [original footnote omitted, ChP]]").

detention were already found to be lawful by the national judicial authority (evidenced by the fact that the suspect was not released but in fact surrendered), then one could argue that there would be no need for the ICC to grant a remedy of release and thus to include it in the Statute.[139] Nevertheless, the fact that the ICC itself would not be able to grant a remedy of release is not the same as arguing that a person unlawfully arrested or detained in the context of the ICC case does not deserve the remedy of release altogether.

The third argument to argue that it is very unlikely that the drafters really did not want suspects of the ICC to enjoy the (customary international law) remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest or detention can be explained by the fact that the ICC has granted a prominent position to human rights law in the ICC Statute. This can not only be inferred from the still-to-discuss paragraph 3 of Article 21, but also from, for example, the explicit idea mentioned in the 1994 Draft Statute that the drafters wanted the provisions on arrest and detention to be in conformity with the ICCPR. Hence, in the same way as the authorities mentioned in footnote 863 of Chapter VI argued that a habeas corpus remedy is present in the legal frameworks of their Tribunals, even if their Statutes/Rules do not contain such an explicit remedy, it could be argued that the ICC must have this power.[140] In this context, it could be asserted that only granting compensation to persons unlawfully arrested/detained does not comply with (the preventative objective of) human rights law.[141]

Because of the above-mentioned arguments, it is the belief of this study that it is hard to maintain that it is clear that the drafters of the ICC Statute intentionally deleted the remedy of release because they did not want this remedy to be available for a suspect unlawfully arrested or detained. Since the ICC legislation is arguably unclear on this point, and thus leaves a legal lacuna, there is justification for looking to part (b) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute.

In short, part (b) must be looked to, not only in the case of the real male captus bene/male detentus question, but also in the case of the issue related to the male captus discussion, namely the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention (because the ICC instruments are unclear and thus also leave a legal lacuna on this matter).

---

[139] One could, however, wonder in that case why the remedy of compensation, in contrast to release, was included but that may then be explained by the fact that the ICC may have thought it appropriate, even if the suspect was already released by the national judicial authority, to compensate him financially because it was in the context of the ICC proceedings against him that he was unlawfully arrested or detained.

[140] See also Hall 2008 A p. 1105: "Perhaps the most important right which has not been expressly recognized in the Rome Statute is the right guaranteed in article 9 para. 4 of the ICCPR (…) to have the Court review the lawfulness of detention and, if that detention is unlawful, to be released. Although the Court has the inherent power to provide this remedy, the failure to include it expressly in the Rome Statute is certainly to be regretted [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Hall's footnote (n. 53) refers to a number of authorities also mentioned in n. 863 of Chapter VI.

[141] Cf. in that respect DeFrancia 2001, p. 1409: "An enforceable right to compensation in the case of illegal arrest will not necessarily serve as a deterrent to unlawful detention and could potentially lead to an enforcement scheme in which violations of due process are merely bought off."

2.3 Article 21, paragraph 1 (b)

Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) reads: "In the second place, where appropriate, applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict". This part, including the third part, which will be addressed in a moment ('general principles of law'), is reminiscent of Article 38, paragraph 1 of the ICJ Statute,[142] which is "widely recognised as the most authoritative statement as to the sources of international law [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[143] This is not that strange as these parts were indeed inspired by Article 38 of the ICJ Statute.[144]

2.3.1 Applicable treaties

There are a number of treaties which could be applied by the ICC, of which two important ones shall be mentioned here. However, before doing so, it should first be stated that these treaties are silent on the male captus issue. As a result, they are only of interest with respect to related issues, such as, for example, the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention.

The first treaty is the previously mentioned (and used) Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. As clarified earlier, in the end, the ICC Statute is 'just' a normal international treaty between States as any other treaty to which this Convention applies.[145]

The second treaty which is often viewed as applicable to the ICC and which may be interesting here is the ICCPR. In the words of Edwards:

> The ICCPR and other such treaties will likely be deemed "applicable treaties" because a substantial number of Rome Statute signatories and ratifiers have adhered to the ICCPR; the travaux pr[é]paratoires repeatedly refer to incorporation of ICCPR provisions into the Rome Statute;[[146]] ICCPR rights are customary international law, which is an article 21 source of applicable law [this will be discussed when addressing the terms "principles and rules of international law", ChP]; and because the ICC's status as an inter-governmental organization created under U.N. auspices renders the ICCPR applicable to the ICC.[147]

---

[142] "The Court, whose function is to decide in accordance with international law such disputes as are submitted to it, shall apply: a. international conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting states; b. international custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law; c. the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations; d. subject to the provisions of Article 59, judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law."

[143] Shaw 2003, p. 66. See in that respect also Raimondo 2008, p. 150: "In Article 21, paragraph 1 one may identify the so-called 'proper law' of the ICC (…) and the traditional sources of international law, namely conventions, custom, and general principles of law, notwithstanding the peculiar wording employed by the drafters of the Statute [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[144] See Arsanjani 1999, p. 28.

[145] See also Edwards 2001, p. 385.

[146] See n. 30 and accompanying text.

[147] Edwards 2001, p. 384.

McAuliffe deGuzman, when writing about the term 'applicable treaties', also mentions the ICCPR:

> Treaties may be relevant for two purposes. First, a particular treaty may have a direct bearing on a case. For example, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights is relevant to determining the international human rights of the accused.[148] Second, widely ratified treaties may be viewed as evidence of the "rules and principles of international law". In this regard, for example, the Genocide Convention, along with its [travaux], and the Hague and Geneva Conventions may be relevant to the determination of an issue before the Court.[149]

The second example of McAuliffe deGuzman is connected to another part of Article 21 (namely the part "rules and principles of international law") and will be discussed in a few moments, but her first example apparently views the ICCPR as a treaty that can be applied as such, under the terms "applicable treaties", in part (b). Pellet has criticised this observation, however. He is of the opinion that all these treaties referred to (except for one) have to be seen as part of the "rules and principles of international law."[150] However, whether one agrees with this or not does not really matter with respect to the practical outcome: if it is determined that

---

[148] See also Degan 2005, p. 80: "The applicable treaties (other than the Rome Statute itself) may, for instance, include the 1966 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, or regional conventions such as the 1950 European Convention on the Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms with protocols attached to it. The provisions of these applicable treaties concerning fair trial and similar problems that are perhaps not entirely regulated by the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICC can be of special importance."

[149] McAuliffe deGuzman 1999, p. 440.

[150] See Pellet 2002 A, pp. 1068-1070. After having presented the exact same observation of McAuliffe deGuzman as mentioned here, he states: "This is not very convincing. In neither of these two cases are the treaties in question applicable as such. Although it is true that the 1966 Covenant (or the 1907 and 1949 Conventions) may be relevant in determining the principles to be applied by the Court, the latter will be seen as principles and rules of general international law, and not as conventional norms. The ICTY has proceeded in this manner on several occasions. (...) It is difficult to imagine, however, a situation in which the Court would have to apply a treaty other than its Statute, unless two or more States agreed to accord it some specific jurisdiction or to require the application of particular principles. In any case, it is most unlikely, given that the Court has only been granted limited subject-matter jurisdiction, that it would be obliged, or even able, to apply such agreements. There is, however, an exception to this general principle. It is a consequence of the unfortunate drafting of Article 8(2)(a) of the Statute, which defines war crimes, in particular as '[g]rave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949'. (...) This is regrettable for a number of reasons. In the first place, Article 8(2)(a) (...) rewrites common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. (...) Secondly, the express reference to the 1949 Convention only serves to underline the absence of any reference to the 1977 Protocols (...). Finally, and most importantly, rather than being a step forward, the express reference to the Geneva Conventions is a step back compared with the London and Tokyo Statutes of the International Military Tribunals, which did not refer to any text in particular: 'conventionalizing' the incrimination gives the false impression that the right to pursue criminals depends on the ratification of the treaty in question. The universal character of the crime and its customary definition are thus weakened. As for the reference to 'applicable treaties' in Article 21 of the Rome Statute, the reference to the 1949 Conventions, pointless and open to criticism, stems from the eminently debatable criminal law vision, according to which only written law is of a nature to assure respect for the nullum crimen principle [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

part (a) leaves a legal lacuna (as was argued supra), then part (b), which both authors believe covers the ICCPR, may be applied, whether one views the ICCPR to be an applicable treaty or a rule/principle of international law. Whether the judges actually apply provisions from the ICCPR, which includes the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, will then depend on the question as to whether they believe it is also appropriate to transplant the remedy of release into the specific context of the ICC – recall the words "where appropriate".[151] As already clarified several times in this study, the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention is not without problems. This may convince the judges, even though they may have to admit that they are, in principle, obliged to apply the remedy ("shall"), will use their discretion not to do so.

2.3.2 Principles and rules of international law

The exact meaning of the remainder of the above-mentioned part of the first paragraph of Article 21 of the ICC Statute is also unclear: "the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict".[152] First, it is appropriate to determine whether there is a clear difference between rules and principles and if so, what this difference encompasses. McAuliffe deGuzman addresses both categories separately and is thus of the opinion

[151] See n. 20 and accompanying text.

[152] In contrast, the more on substantive law issues focused "established principles of the international law of armed conflict" seem less vague but they do not say anything about the male captus discussion. Well-known principles in this context are, for example, the principles of necessity and proportionality. See for more concrete rules Degan 2005, pp. 80-81: "Established principles of the international law of armed conflict consist most often of customary rules confirmed in codification conventions. Hence, they include numerous provisions from the four 1949 Geneva Conventions and the two 1977 Protocols, but not the definitions of their "grave breaches". These "established principles" may include, inter alia, rules concerning proper qualification of armed conflicts; specific prohibitions of reprisals against protected persons, buildings or equipment; localities and zones under special protection and on demilitarized zones; conditions to be fulfilled for belligerent occupation; neutrality in a conflict; or rules of the warfare at sea, when there is room for their application. These rules are most often conventional, but can also be found in the practice of warfare." Note, by the way, that these "established principles of the international law of armed conflict" may very well be identified in decisions from institutions specifically dealing with the international law of armed conflict such as the ICTY and ICTR. However, as will be shown infra: if one is of the view that the principles and rules of international law (of which the established principles of the international law of armed conflict form part) in essence mean customary international law and if one follows the traditional (statal) concept of customary international law, then these decisions can only identify existing and not create new principles. (See also the discussion on this point in the examination of the Al-Moayad case, see Subsection 2.2 of Chapter V.) For an arguably middle-road solution (using the word "consolidate": strengthen), see Caracciolo 2000, p. 227: "[T]he explicit reference to the established principles of the international law of armed conflict seems excessive, since it is in any case a branch of international law, even though it could enable the Court to apply those principles consolidated in the decisions of the ad hoc tribunals for Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda." Nevertheless, even though the jurisprudence of the UN ad hoc Tribunals may thus perhaps be looked at to examine the more substantive principles of the international law of armed conflict, this does not mean that the jurisprudence of international criminal tribunals on more procedural issues such as male captus situations also fall under this term. (It may perhaps fall, however, under the more general notion "principles and rules of international law" but that will be discussed infra.)

that principles and rules should be distinguished from each other. She believes that "[t]he "principles" of international law referred to in article 21 include such widely recognized principles as the principles of proportionality and the principle of legality (nullum crimen sine lege) [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[153] whereas the phrase "rules of international law", even though its exact content is not clear, in any case covers customary international law:

> Apart from treaties, rules of customary law are traditionally treated as the most persuasive source of international law. It is unclear, therefore, why the drafters of the ICC Statute eschewed use of the word "custom" in identifying the applicable law. It may be that the concept of gradually evolving custom was considered too imprecise for the purposes of international criminal law. Nonetheless, since custom represents the primary source of rules in the international legal system, the phrase "rules of international law" must be interpreted as encompassing customary rules.[154]

On the other hand, Pellet believes that, although a distinction may be drawn between the principles and rules of international law,[155] both in fact refer to customary norms.[156] He thus argues, when discussing the "principles and rules of international law" in general: "The sibylline drafting of this provision (...) gives cause for perplexity. Why use such an indirect expression when a simple reference to international custom would have sufficed?"[157] This again is reminiscent of the

[153] Less certain about the meaning of the principles of international law is Verhoeven, see Verhoeven 2004, p. 9: "Customary rules are surely part of the 'rules' referred to in the (b) of paragraph 1 of Article 21, their 'generality' contrasting with the 'particular' character of conventional rules binding only the contracting states this is clear. The mention of 'principles', apart from rules, is, however, vague. What is indeed the exact nature of those 'principles', as distinguished from rules? Normally, they should be different from the 'general principles of law' aimed at in the (c) of said paragraph, ... at least to avoid confusions. But what then are those 'principles' and where are they coming from? One explanation could be that they constitute what is referred to in French doctrine as the 'principes généraux du droit internationa[l]', as opposed to the 'principes généraux de droit international', i.e. general rules making explicit some basic requirements of interstate relations whose binding character does not rest on a general practice of states as 'vitalized' by the opinio juris, which makes the issue somewhat mysterious. That said, the explanation possibly is also that the reference to 'principles' is simply illustrating an – unfortunate – language habit aiming at basic customary rules ... which clearly is the case as far as the 'established principles of the international law of armed conflicts' mentioned at the end of the (b) of paragraph 1 are concerned."

[154] McAuliffe deGuzman 1999, p. 442.

[155] See Pellet 2002 A, p. 1072: "Is it necessary to make a distinction between 'principles' of international law on the one hand, and 'rules' on the other? Undoubtedly not, at least with regard to their nature: in both cases, they are customary norms. One may thus consider that the double reference is a verbal tic, a 'ready-made' expression to refer to custom. It remains that under international criminal law, the appropriateness of reliance on 'principles' (except as an aid to interpretation of 'rules') is open to question. Upon a more rigorous inspection, the word 'rules' has a more precise connotation and implies a higher degree of determinacy than the term 'principles'; and the nullum crimen principle could be breached by the undiscerning application of the latter if they were to be relied upon to found a conviction [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[156] See also Vasiliev 2009, pp. 210-211, n. 63, criticising McAuliffe deGuzman.

[157] Pellet 2002 A, p. 1070. See also ibid, p. 1071: "It may be that the letter of Article 21(1)(b) of the Statute should not be accorded an unmerited importance. In reality, there is little doubt that this above-mentioned Article 38 of the ICJ Statute which states that the ICJ shall apply, among other things, "international custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law". Although it may seem practical and logical to draw an analogy to Article 38 of the ICJ Statute (as already mentioned: the drafters of the ICC Statute were also inspired by this article), one should not forget that the words used in the Statute are different from those of Article 38 of the ICJ Statute and thus may have a different meaning.[158] Edwards, for example, asserts that the words "international law" in Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) of the ICC Statute is broader than customary international law.[159] It may indeed be the case that the "principles and rules of international law" are broader than mere customary international law, but many agree that the principles and rules of international law, in any case, cover customary international law.[160] Hence, before delving into the question of whether the principles and rules of international law also cover more than just customary international law, the latter concept will first be examined.

---

provision refers, exclusively, to customary international law, of which the 'established principles of the international law of armed conflict' clearly form an integral part." It is not very clear whether Pellet is of the opinion that the whole of Article 21 (1)(b) is referring to customary international law or only the part "the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict". Although the above-mentioned quotation can be found under the heading 'The Principles and Rules of International Law', he is in fact referring twice to "Article 21 (1)(b)" which includes "applicable treaties". However, this may not be that important as Pellet, in contrast to the "principles and rules of international law", does not give much weight to the reference "applicable treaties": "That is not to say that (...) [the reference to treaties among the sources of law to be applied by the Court] is clearly indispensable, or even useful." (Ibid., p. 1068.)

[158] Cf. also Arsanjani 1999, p. 28 (who served as the Secretary of the Committee of the Whole of the Rome Conference, the organ of the Conference responsible for the development of the ICC Statute): "Even though the three categories [this is 1) the three sources mentioned in para. 1 (a); 2) the two sources mentioned in para. 1 (b) and 3) the source mentioned in para. 1 (c), ChP] were inspired by Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, they are substantially and structurally different from that article." See in that respect also McAuliffe deGuzman 1999, p. 436: "The applicable law elaborated in article 21 derive generally from the sources enumerated in article 38 of the ICJ Statute. Article 38 of the ICJ Statute represents the most authoritative statement of the sources of general international law. The ICC Statute modifies the approach taken in the ICJ Statute to fit the context of international criminal law [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[159] See Edwards 2001, p. 387: "Under Rome Statute, article 21(1)(b), "international law" (or public international law) includes bodies of law beyond just customary international law. For example, under article 21(1)(b), "international law" also includes the areas of international human rights law and international humanitarian law [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[160] See Sadat 2000, p. 918: "[T]he Statute itself contemplates that the Court will use customary international law outside the ICC Statute in its decisions. Article 21, on applicable law, permits the Court to apply "where appropriate, applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict [original footnote omitted, ChP]."" See also Caracciolo 2000, p. 227 ("Since the Court constitutes an international jurisdiction (...) the second category of sources of law which it can apply could only be treaties and customary international law [original footnote omitted, ChP]"), Gallant 2003 A, p. 787 ("[P]rinciples and rules of international law (presumably meaning international custom) [original footnote omitted, ChP]"), Schabas 2004, pp. 91-92 ("There is no express mention of customary international law, but it is surely covered by the reference to 'principles and rules of international law'.") and Degan 2005, p. 80. See finally Vasiliev 2009, p. 210 and Nerlich 2009, p. 313.

2.3.2.1 Customary international law…

What does customary international law say on the male captus problem? To answer this question, one may turn to the conclusion of Section 2 of Chapter VII of this book. And now, something special has cropped up; even though the non-committal external evaluative framework of this study was (merely) created to see how different or similar the current ICC position on the male captus problem is in comparison with the position of other courts, this external evaluative framework has now entered, via the concept of customary international law, the less non-committal internal evaluative framework, a framework established to see how the actual ICC position should be assessed in view of the Court's own law.

Section 2 of Chapter VII of this book has clarified that one cannot generally state that either male captus bene detentus or male captus male detentus has reached customary international law status, because such general assertions do not do justice to the enormous variety of possible male captus situations and the different ways how those varying situations were received by courts. In fact, Chapter VII concluded that only one male captus situation can probably be seen as having customary international law status, namely the situation that judges will refuse jurisdiction in the case of an abduction performed by the authorities of the prosecuting forum followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect by the injured State. That would mean that in such a situation, the ICC, if it is also of the opinion that the principles and rules of international law cover customary international law, and if it believes that it is appropriate to transplant this rule into the specific system of the Court, would have to refuse jurisdiction. As also pointed out in the context of the ICTY and ICTR, however,[161] one can ask whether this would indeed be appropriate as one could argue that national courts would probably refuse jurisdiction in such cases to protect the fragile international legal order based on the equality of States (and to repair what the Executive should have done). However, for the ICTY and ICTR – and this also goes for the ICC (but to a lesser extent)[162] – the concept of State sovereignty plays a less important role (even if that observation, of course, cannot constitute a carte blanche to violate State sovereignty); a protest from a State will have less influence in the rather vertical context of the ICC than it will have in the horizontal context of States. However, even if this customary international law rule, for that reason, cannot be transplanted into the context of the ICC, and that Court would hence not have to follow it, it is submitted that the ICC, like the ICTY and ICTR, should resolutely refuse jurisdiction if it were implicated in an abduction, whether or not that abduction was followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from the injured State.

Of course, a very interesting and exciting[163] question to be addressed now is whether Section 3 of Chapter VII (the principles distilled from the international(ised) criminal tribunals' male captus case law) may also enter the internal evaluative framework. Can these principles perhaps also fall under the notion of customary international law?

[161] See n. 652 of Chapter VI.
[162] Because the ICC is not as 'vertical' as the ICTY and ICTR are, see Chapter VIII of this study.
[163] See also Bitti 2009, p. 296: "The most exciting issue in relation to Article 21 (1) (b) has been the relevance of the jurisprudence of the ad hoc tribunals in the context of the ICC proceedings."

Focusing first on the decisions of the ICTY/ICTR, this would seem difficult to accept under the traditional concept of customary international law, whose two constituent elements are 1) State practice ("the actual behaviour of states")[164] and 2) opinio iuris sive necessitates ("the belief by a state that behaved in a certain way that it was under a legal obligation to act that way").[165] As explained earlier in Chapter V (in the context of the Al-Moayad case), decisions from international criminal tribunals can, of course, be consulted to find out whether a certain rule exists in State practice as many of these international cases, see also Chapter VI of this book, include overviews of national positions on certain matters.[166] It is unproblematic if those overviews (and hence the decisions to be found in those overviews) are examined by judges to determine the position of States towards a certain rule. However, decisions of international tribunals as such (which do not delve into the practice of States) arguably have nothing to do with the practice of States, even though these tribunals were established by States.

However, this may perhaps be different with respect to (the decisions of) internationalised criminal tribunals, such as the ECCC. Although it is true that these Extraordinary Chambers are established and supported with help of the international community and that they try international crimes, they also form part of the domestic system of Cambodia. It could be asserted that although their decisions are issued by chambers in which both national and international judges participate (the majority are however of local origin), they are nevertheless to be seen as decisions from, in essence, a Cambodian court and thus as evidence of the practice of Cambodia. This may be different, however, with respect to other internationalised criminal tribunals such as the SCSL, which is arguably more 'international' in nature than the ECCC because the majority of the SCSL judges are international and because the Court does not form part of the domestic system of Sierra Leone. In short, it is clear that much will depend on the specific nature of these tribunals to find out whether their decisions can be seen as expressions of State practice.

---

[164] Shaw 2003, p. 70.
[165] Ibid., p. 71.
[166] Cf. also ibid., p. 78, explaining that rules of State practice can be found in, for example, the decisions of international judicial institutions: "It is how states behave in practice that forms the basis of customary law, but evidence of what a state does can be obtained from numerous sources. A state is not a living entity, but consists of governmental departments and thousands of officials, and state activity is spread throughout a whole range of national organs. There are the state's legal officers, legislative institutions, courts, diplomatic agents and political leaders. Each of these engages in activity which relates to the international field and therefore one has to examine all such material sources and more in order to discover evidence of what states do. The obvious way to find out how countries are behaving is to read the newspapers, consult historical records, listen to what governmental authorities are saying and peruse the many official publications. (...) In addition, one may note resolutions in the General Assembly, comments made by governments on drafts produced by the International Law Commission, decisions of the international judicial institutions, decisions of national courts, treaties and the general practice of international organisations [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

Nevertheless, the above-mentioned observations are based on the traditional concept of customary international law, which is interested in the practice of States. However, one can ask whether the formation of customary international law can still be seen as the privilege of States. It is clear that in today's world, the monopoly of States on the international scene is diminishing and the influence of non-State entities such as international organisations and tribunals is growing, especially in the field of international criminal law.[167] One could argue that this development demands that, if one wants to determine whether a certain rule exists in customary international law, one should look to the practice of the international community in general and not only to the statal dimension of this community.[168] See, in that respect, the following words on the concept of customary international law from the German Al-Moayad case:

> [I]ts evolution depends on two preconditions: firstly, on conduct that is continuous in time and as uniform as possible, and which takes place with a broad and representative participation of states and other subjects of international law with law-making authority; secondly on the opinion that is behind this practice "to act in the framework of what is required and permitted or necessary under international law" (opinio iuris sive necessitatis (…)) [emphasis added, ChP].[169]

It is therefore legitimate to ask oneself questions such as:

> Has the concept of state practice as an element of custom become outdated, at least in some fields of international law? On the same vein, how much does the jurisprudence of the courts like the ICTY have influence on the subsequent practice and opinio juris, or could it be said that decisions themselves crystallize or even create new customary norms [emphasis in original, ChP]?[170]

---

[167] See also Zahar and Sluiter 2008, p. 93: "The formula of state practice plus opinio juris represents the theory of 'custom' in its elementary form, yet in a world of non-state organizations whose purpose is to unite, regulate, critique, or compete with states, the notion of customary law and the mechanisms of its formation have been broadened".

[168] It appears that tribunals themselves have already accepted this, see, for example, Degan 2005, p. 75 (who, by the way, also notes that "the ICJ tried to legislate by asserting the existence of new "customary rules" without proof of any former State practice and opinio juris [original footnote omitted, ChP]"): "The ICTY and ICTR (…) do not refer in their decisions to former State practice and opinio juris as the only, or even as the main, evidence of customary law. They rather rely on the practice of former ad hoc military tribunals established by Allied Powers after World War II in occupied Germany and in the Far East, as well as to their own practice. They thus call that former judicial practice, as a whole, "customary law" [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Cf. also Verhoeven 2004, p. 18: "[T]here does not exist many conventional or customary rules concerning the punishment of criminals in international law, despite the few elements contained in the statutes or case-law of the ad hoc international tribunals that were established as a result of conflicts".

[169] German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03, B., I., para. 3 a)), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), p. 782.

[170] Working Group on International Criminal Law, European University Institute (Law Department), Meeting of 9 May 2007 (devoted to the issue of : 'Customary International Law in International Criminal Tribunals' – introduced and presented by Noora Arajärvi), available at:

Arajärvi has dedicated an entire doctoral thesis to these questions,[171] which are important and very interesting, but clearly go beyond the compass of the present study. Because the results of Arajärvi's research are not available yet, this study will play safe and use the traditional notion of customary international law, which focuses on what States do/believe.[172]

However, that does not mean that the decisions from the ICTY and ICTR on the male captus issue may not enter the internal evaluative framework of this study in another way. This will be discussed in the next subsection when addressing the question of whether the concept of "principles and rules of international law" encompasses more than just customary international law.

However, before doing so, a few words must be dedicated to the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention. One can be very brief here: as already explained earlier in this book, the right to liberty and security, including the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, can be seen as having customary international law status. One can refer here, for example, to the fact that the ICCPR has many (165) States Parties. Thus, if the (ICCPR) remedy of release would not already fall under the notion "applicable treaties", it will in any case be covered by the "principles and rules of international law". Hence, it is definite that this remedy falls under part (b) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute.

---

http://www.eui.eu/Documents/DepartmentsCentres/Law/ResearchTeaching/WorkingGroups/WGOnCriminalLaw9May07.pdf, p. 15.

[171] Ibid., p. 2: "Noora [Arajärvi] subsequently illustrated some of the main research questions on which her PhD will focus, for instance: whether it is necessary to use the 'words and language' of traditional customary international law for international customary criminal law; whether the case-law and jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals represent a 'new source' of law; whether the concept of 'state practice' in customary law is out of date [emphasis in original, ChP]."

[172] This does not mean, however, that this study is not aware of the fact that in the world of today, in which non-State entities play an increasingly important role, 'modern' customary international law may be more focused on opinio iuris than on State practice. See Roberts 2001, p. 758: "What I have termed traditional custom results from general and consistent practice followed by states from a sense of legal obligation. It focuses primarily on state practice in the form of interstate interaction and acquiescence. Opinio juris is a secondary consideration invoked to distinguish between legal and nonlegal obligations. Traditional custom is evolutionary and is identified through an inductive process in which a general custom is derived from specific instances of state practice. (…) By contrast, modern custom is derived by a deductive process that begins with general statements of rules rather than particular instances of practice. This approach emphazises opinio juris rather than state practice because it relies primarily on statements rather than actions. Modern custom can develop quickly because it is deducted from multilateral treaties and declarations by international fora such as the General Assembly, which can declare existing customs, crystallize emerging customs and generate new customs [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP]." However, this is clearly a different discussion than the questions posted by Arajärvi. Roberts indeed shows that modern customary international law tends to look more at opinio iuris, but she is still focused, like this research, on what States do (or more importantly in modern customary international law: what States, for example in international organizations such as the UNGA, declare to which rules they will abide by). Thus, Roberts' customary international law definition is still focused on the statal context. The emphasis is, however, more on what States declare than on what they actually do. Arajärvi arguably goes a step further and wonders whether this statal context altogether (whether the focus is on State practice or on the opinio iuris of States) in itself is losing importance to, for example, the context of international criminal tribunals in the formation of customary international law.

However, here also (see the final words of Subsection 2.3.1), it must be stressed that the ICC will only apply that remedy if it is of the opinion that it is appropriate to transplant this remedy into the specific context of the ICC, which may be difficult in view of the identified problems which can be connected to this remedy.

2.3.2.2 …or more?

Although many agree that customary international law is covered by the concept of "principles and rules of international law", this notion may encompass more than just customary international law.[173] Might it be possible that the practice of the international criminal tribunals (which do not fall under the traditional concept of State practice/customary international law) falls under the term 'principles and rules of international law'? Even if the practice of other international (criminal) tribunals may not easily fit into the specific system of the ICC (in the sense that it would often not be "appropriate" to apply solutions from other international criminal jurisdictions), one can ask why the words "international law" would be ab initio restricted to the traditional, statal context of international law. This is especially odd for the international criminal law context in which the ICC operates and in which the practice of the other international criminal tribunals (but also the practice of human rights bodies) may be of particular interest. Although it is true that it is often stated that the principles and rules of international law refer to customary international law, which, if one follows the traditional view, is limited to the statal context, it is also true that the words do say something different and that the ICC might use this different terminology to include the practice of other international (criminal) institutions not also linked to the statal context.[174]

In fact, it seems that the ICC itself holds the same opinion on this issue. At the beginning of this chapter, a passage from the Lubanga Dyilo case about 'witness proofing' (the preparation of witnesses before trial) was presented in the context of explaining the correlation between parts (a) and (b) of Article 21, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute. (This was the passage in which the meaning of the words "where appropriate" was also elucidated.) It had already been revealed by then that this excerpt was also very interesting for the discussion as to whether the practice of the other international criminal tribunals may fall under the notion "principles and rules of international law". The more complete passage goes as follows:

---

[173] See in that respect the already-mentioned words (see n. 159 and accompanying text) of Edwards: "Under Rome Statute, article 21(1)(b), "international law" (or public international law) includes bodies of law beyond just customary international law. For example, under article 21(1)(b), "international law" also includes the areas of international human rights law and international humanitarian law [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Edwards 2001, p. 387.) See also Nerlich 2009, p. 313: "[I]t is submitted that certain principles of international criminal law (…) may be subsumed under this term."

[174] See Degan 2005. p. 80: "Under "principles and rules of international law", it should be understood to include customary rules of general international law. Probably because of the frequent misuse of these terms in the past, they were not referred to as such. But this less precise wording has the advantage that the Court will not need to prove the customary character of "principles and rules" it wishes to apply, especially not the communis opinio juris."

43. Turning to the practices of international criminal tribunals and courts, the prosecution submitted that the practice of witness proofing is here permissible, endorsed and well established. The Trial Chamber notes, as has been established by recent jurisprudence from the International Criminal Tribunals of the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, that witness proofing, in the sense advocated by the prosecution in the present case, is being commonly utilized at the ad hoc Tribunals.

44. However, this precedent is in no sense binding on the Trial Chamber at this Court. Article 21 of the Statute requires the Chamber to apply first the Statute, Elements of Crimes and Rules of the ICC. Thereafter, if ICC legislation is not definitive on the issue, the Trial Chamber should apply, where appropriate, principles and rules of international law. In the instant case, the issue before the Chamber is procedural in nature. While this would not, ipso facto, prevent all procedural issues from scrutiny under Article 21(l)(b), the Chamber does not consider the procedural rules and jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals to be automatically applicable to the ICC without detailed analysis.

45. The ICC Statute has, through important advances, created a procedural framework which differs markedly from the ad hoc tribunals, such as, for example, in the requirement in the Statute that the prosecution should investigate exculpatory as well as incriminatory evidence, for which the Statute and Rules of the ad hoc tribunals do not provide. Also, the Statute seemingly permits greater intervention by the Bench, as well as introducing the unique element of victim participation. Therefore, the Statute moves away from the procedural regime of the ad hoc tribunals, introducing additional and novel elements to aid the process of establishing the truth. Thus, the procedure of preparation of witnesses before trial is not easily transferable into the system of law created by the ICC Statute and Rules. Therefore, while acknowledging the importance of considering the practice and jurisprudence at the ad hoc tribunals, the Chamber is not persuaded that the application of ad hoc procedures, in the context of preparation of witnesses for trial, is appropriate [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP].[175]

[175] ICC, Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision Regarding the Practices Used to Prepare and Familiarise Witnesses for Giving Testimony at Trial' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 30 November 2007, paras. 43-45. See also the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision in the same case where the judges did not concur with the conclusion of the Prosecutor but did not seem to disapprove of the idea that decisions from other tribunals might be used under certain circumstances either: "29. The Prosecution asserts that the practice of witness proofing as defined by the Prosecution "is a widely accepted practice in international criminal law" and therefore the Prosecution implies that it should be considered as part of the applicable law of the Court pursuant to article 21 (1) (b) of the Statute. 30. In support of this submission, the Prosecution cites (i) two Trial Chamber decisions of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia ("the ICTY"); (ii) one Trial Chamber decision of the Sierra Leone Special Court ("the SLSC"); and (iii) the statement of Justice Hassan B. Jallow, Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda ("the ICTR"), to the UN Security Council on 29 June 2004. 31. Firstly, the Chamber observes that the Prosecution has not put forward any jurisprudence from the ICTR authorising the practice of witness proofing as defined by the Prosecution. The Chamber also observes that the precedent from the SLSC relied on by the Prosecution does not deal with the practice of witness proofing but addresses "the related legal issues of the exclusion of supplemental statements of prosecution witnesses on the grounds that they contain or introduce new allegations against the Accused persons, and whether, if the allegations are new, there has been a breach of Rule 66 of the Rules on the

Thus, even though the practice of the ICTY/ICTR (and this may perhaps also be valid for other international (judicial) institutions such as the HRC, the ECtHR and certain internationalised criminal tribunals) is not automatically applicable to/binding on the ICC system (which, of course, seems very logical given the latter's relative sui generis character),[176] neither is it impossible that it might be applied by the ICC judges if those judges, after a detailed analysis, are of the opinion that certain practices from these tribunals can be transplanted into the specific system of the ICC as a principle/rule of international law. In that case, the jurisprudence of the other tribunals is not merely a source from which inspiration may be drawn (which is, of course, always possible),[177] but a source which can identify law which part of the Prosecution." Moreover, the Chamber finds that out of the two ICTY Trial Chamber decisions cited by the Prosecution, the decision in the Jelisić case does not refer to the practice of witness proofing prior to the witness testimony because it is confined to the issue of contact with a witness once the witness has taken the stand and made the solemn undertaking. 32. Hence, the only decision identified by the Prosecution in which the practice of witness proofing is expressly authorised is the 10 December 2004 decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II of the ICTY in the Limaj case. Moreover, such a decision, despite authorising the practice of witness proofing, does not regulate in detail the content of such a practice. 33. Under these circumstances the Chamber finds that the Prosecution assertion that the practice of witness proofing as defined by the Prosecution in the Prosecution Information "is a widely accepted practice in international criminal law", is unsupported [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Practices of Witness Familiarisation and Witness Proofing' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 8 November 2006, paras. 29-33.) Bitti 2009, pp. 297-298 notes with respect to this decision that "[t]he question which should have been answered first is to what extent "practices in international criminal law" may be seen as "principles and rules of international law" under Article 21 (1) (b) of the Rome Statute."

[176] Cf. also Bitti 2009, p. 296.

[177] See, for example, ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Situation in Uganda, 'Decision on Prosecutor's Application for Leave to Appeal in Part Pre-Trial Chamber II's Decision on the Prosecutor's Applications for Warrants of Arrest under Article 58' (Under Seal, Ex Parte, Prosecutor Only), ICC-02/04-01/05, 19 August 2005, paras. 18 et seq., where reference is made to the case law of the ICTY, ICTR and SCSL and ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS1, VPRS2, VPRS3, VPSR4, VPSR5 and VPRS6' (Public Redacted Version), ICC-01/04, 17 January 2006, paras. 51-53, where the Pre-Trial Chamber referred to several cases of the ECtHR and the IACtHR to back its opinion on the role of the victims in the proceedings of the ICC. See also El Zeidy 2006, p. 462 and Nerlich 2009, pp. 305-306, n. 3. See finally the ICC's male captus decisions of 3 October 2006 and 14 December 2006 (to be discussed in the second section of the next chapter), where reference was made to male captus cases from human rights bodies and the ICTY/ICTR.

is applicable to the ICC, namely principles and rules of international law.[178] Hence, in that case, the conclusions from Section 3 of Chapter VII, the conclusions with [178] See also Friman 2003, p. 380 (writing about the law on evidence): "It is not entirely clear (…) on which basis the ICC may make use of the laws of evidence as developed by the Tribunals. However, it is arguable that such practice constitutes "principles and rules of international law" and, thus is applicable "where appropriate"." See also El Zeidy 2006, p. 462: "Although Article 21 does not state clearly whether decisions of the other international judicial bodies is considered an applicable source of law, arguably the phrase 'principles and rules of international law' mentioned in Article 21(1)(b) covers those decisions as a secondary source." El Zeidy (ibid.) then refers to a decision by the ICC's Pre-Trial Chamber II which, according to him, "treated the jurisprudence of the ad hoc tribunals as being covered by the 'principles and rules of international law' as long as they do not go 'beyond the scope of article 21' [original footnote omitted, ChP]." The decision El Zeidy refers to is ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Situation in Uganda, 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Position on the Decision of Pre-Trial Chamber II to Redact Factual Descriptions of Crimes From the Warrants of Arrest, Motion for Reconsideration, and Motion for Clarification' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/05, 28 October 2005 and the paragraph in question (19) reads: "As to the relevance of the case law of the ad hoc tribunals, the matter must be assessed against the provisions governing the law applicable before the Court. Article 21, paragraph 1, of the Statute mandates the Court to apply its Statute, Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence "in the first place" and only "in the second place" and "where appropriate", "applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict". Accordingly, the rules and practice of other jurisdictions, whether national or international, are not as such "applicable law" before the Court beyond the scope of article 21 of the Statute. More specifically, the law and practice of the ad hoc tribunals, which the Prosecutor refers to, cannot per se form a sufficient basis for importing into the Court's procedural framework remedies other than those enshrined in the Statute." Vasiliev is a little more hesitant in that respect. He explains, referring to the words of El Zeidy and this paragraph: "Although it is sometimes accepted that the case law of other international criminal tribunals could become applicable at the ICC as 'the principles and rules of international law' under Article 21(1)(b), it is more accurate to say that this jurisprudence is not a source, but only serves, where appropriate, as the evidence of such principles and rules. If one were to borrow the formula of the ICJ Statute, it would amount to a 'subsidiary means for the determination of the rules of law' by the ICC in the context of its own procedural regime. The emerging ICC jurisprudence has embraced this view [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Vasiliev 2009, p. 222.) Cf. also Nerlich 2009, p. 313: "[I]n order to identify principles and rules of international law, the ICC may turn to the jurisprudence of the ad hoc tribunals as well as the jurisprudence of other international courts." However, it is submitted that the judges can not only use the jurisprudence of other tribunals to identify principles and rules of international law stemming from other sources; if the judges are of the opinion that certain practices of these tribunals, in themselves, constitute principles and rules of international law, such principles and rules can, of course, also be applied. In any case, prudence is warranted here. See Kreß 2007, p. 543: "Pre-Trial Chamber II has already stressed, and rightly so, that anyone should, in the ongoing process of moulding the pertinent law, beware of hastily adopting the established acquis of both ad hoc Tribunals." See also Schabas 2007, p. 196: "[O]ne of the Pre-Trial Chambers of the International Criminal Court has cautioned against mechanistic application of the case law of the ad hoc tribunals". See finally, and very eloquently, Nerlich 2009, p. 325: "[T]he ICC will not have to reinvent the wheels that have already been invented by the ad hoc tribunals. But before mounting such wheels, the Court will have to consider carefully whether they really fit. Otherwise, the ICC may jolt, and the reliance on the jurisprudence of the ad hoc tribunals would not strengthen, but weaken the jurisprudence of the Court." A last interesting point that should be mentioned here has to do with the 1993 preliminary version of the 1994 ILC Draft. In that 1993 version, Art. 21 (then 28) read: "The Court shall apply: (a) this Statute; (b) applicable treaties and the rules and principles of general international law; (c) as a subsidiary source, any applicable rule of national law." In the commentary to this provision, one can read: "[I]t is (…) understood that the expression "rules and principles of general international law" includes "general principles of law", so that the Court can legitimately have recourse to the whole corpus of criminal law, whether found in national forums or in international practice, respect to the external evaluative framework of this study which focused on the international(ised) criminal tribunals, may also enter the internal evaluative framework of this study via the concept of "principles and rules of international law".

That would mean that certain established practices of the international criminal tribunals which can be linked to the male captus discussion can also be applied by the ICC if the judges are of the opinion that it is appropriate to transplant those practices, as principles/rules of international law, into the specific ICC system. One could hereby think of the acceptance of a broad concept of abuse of process (in that jurisdiction may be refused in very serious male captus cases, irrespective of the entity responsible) and the fact that the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged can be taken into account when applying the abuse of process doctrine. With respect to the related issue of the remedy of release, one could think of the fact that all these tribunals have stressed the importance of habeas corpus, even if the regulatory instruments of the tribunal in question did not explicitly contain such a provision.

However, if the ICC judges were of the opinion that it would not be appropriate to transplant the established practices of the international criminal tribunals with respect to the male captus issue, as principles and rules of international law, into the specific system of the ICC, or if they were of the opinion that one should not look at the jurisprudence of these tribunals in the context of this provision at all, then part (c) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute must be examined. Perhaps this part may then bring more clarification on how the ICC judges should decide a particular male captus case.

---

whenever it needs guidance on matters not clearly regulated by treaty." (Report of the Working Group on a Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, to be found in: Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-fifth session, 3 May – 23 July 1993, UNGA OR, Forty-eighth session, Supplement No. 10, A/48/10, p. 111.) (See also the Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court, to be found in: Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-sixth session, 2 May – 22 July 1994, UNGA OR, Forty-ninth session, Supplement No. 10, A/49/10, p. 103.) This could be seen as additional evidence for the assertion that the practice of other international criminal tribunals could fall under part (b). Even though this passage has been criticised, see Pellet 2002 A, p. 1071 ("why [corpus of] criminal law, given that the Article related to international law?") and n. 113 ("The ILC here confuses the general principles of international law (which are of a customary nature) and the general principles of law mentioned in Art. 38(1)(c) of the Statute of the ICJ"), the ICC Prosecutor has already referred to it to back his assertion that "[t]he applicability of the jurisprudence of international Tribunals is supported by Article 21 of the Rome Statute and its drafting history." (ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Situation in Uganda, Case 01/05, 'Update of Proposed Treatment of All Relevant Documents of the Record and Application for Entry of Reasons for Sealing into Public Record' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/05, 14 November 2005, p. 5, n. 3.)

2.4 Article 21, paragraph 1 (c)

This third part of paragraph 1 reads:

> Failing that, general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate, the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime, provided that those principles are not inconsistent with this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards.

One would only turn to this source, "the most controversial aspect of article 21",[179] if sources such as the proper instruments of the ICC (paragraph 1 (a)) and those focused on international law (paragraph 1 (b)) bring no relief ("failing that"). In the words of Edwards:

> [I]t was evident to the drafters that the lacuna might need to be filled, as it was impractical, if not impossible, for each applicable rule or principle of law to be enumerated in the Rome Statute. Instances would undoubtedly arise in which superior sources of international law contained in the hierarchy would either be silent or would fail to provide a relevant, appropriate law to apply. The drafters concluded that the Court would turn to national law, but would only glean principles from it without adopting it wholesale. (…) The rationale is that if a common principle exists within the domestic laws of nations, such a principle ought to be attributable to international law to fill in the gap [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[180]

Now, can one identify a general principle of law with respect to the male captus problem?[181] To answer this, one must first know what, according to this article, a general principle of law is and how it can be found. Pellet is of the opinion that these general principles of law "are covered by section (c) of the above provision [this is Article 38, paragraph 1 of the ICJ Statute, ChP] under the title 'general principles of

[179] McAuliffe deGuzman 1999. p. 442. See also ibid., p. 437.
[180] Edwards 2001, pp. 406-407.
[181] It must again (see also n. 1) be stressed that although these principles are predominantly referred to when discussing substantive law issues, it is submitted that these principles may also relate to the procedural context. After all, national law is used to fill the legal lacunae of the other sources of Art. 21 but the latter may not be restricted to substantive law issues only. As a result, national law may also be looked at if parts (a) and (b) of para. 1 of Art. 21 of the ICC Statute have no answer to a certain procedural question. Cf. in that respect the scope of the "general principles of law recognized by civilised nations" (Art. 38, para. 1 of the ICJ Statute) with which the general principles of law from Art. 21 of the ICC Statute may be compared (see also the following footnote and accompanying text): "The importance of the "general principles" in litigation before international tribunals is not limited to the area of substantive law. Many questions of procedure and evidence (...), which necessarily arise in treaty and non-treaty cases alike, are not regulated by specific provisions of treaty or charter; in filling the gap, an international court will expressly or silently resort to procedural and evidentiary principles which are felt to be inherent in all civilized legal systems [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Schlesinger 1957, p. 736.)

law recognized by civilised nations' [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[182] According to him, "the general principles of law require a triple mental operation: a comparison between national systems, the search for common 'principles', and their transposition to the international sphere".[183] He explains that it is not necessary, however, to make a comparison of all national legal systems as the Statute refers to national laws of legal systems of the world.[184]

> [I]t is (…) necessary (…) only to ensure, by 'polling', that the norms in question are effectively found in the 'principal legal systems of the world'. These can probably be reduced to a small number in the contemporary world: the family of civil-law

[182] Pellet 2002 A, p. 1073. In the travaux préparatoires of Art. 38, para. 1 of the ICJ Statute, one can find, among other things, the following two well-known examples of general principles of law: res iudicata and good faith, see Cheng 1953, p. 25. In Appendix 1 of his book, entitled 'Draft Code of General Principles of Law', Cheng enumerates 16 articles, among which the above-mentioned two, but also other interesting examples, such as Art. 3: "Responsibility involves an obligation on the part of the State concerned to make integral reparation for the damage caused, in so far as it is the proximate result of the failure to comply with the international obligation. The State shall, wherever possible, make restitution in kind. If this is not possible, a sum corresponding to the value which restitution in kind would bear shall be paid. Whenever restitution in kind, or payment in lieu of it, does not cover the entire loss suffered, damages shall be paid in order that the injured party may be fully compensated. The damage suffered shall be deemed to be the proximate result of an act if it is the normal and natural consequence thereof, or if it would have been foreseen by a reasonable man in the position of the author of the act, or if it is the intended result of the act." (Ibid., p. 397.) (Cf. n. 553 of Chapter III and its reference to the Chorzów case.) In addition, on p. 187 of his book, Cheng speaks of the "general principle: ex injuria non oritur jus." However, one can seriously doubt whether this latter principle is still valid in the context of this book's topic, given the fact that Chapter VII has clearly shown that many decisions can still be qualified as male captus bene detentus cases, see also n. 208.

[183] Pellet 2002 A, p. 1073. It is clear that domestic views cannot automatically be transplanted into the specific international system of the law. Hence, also here, the ICC judges appear to have a certain discretion before they apply the national views, cf. the words "where appropriate" in the context of part (b) of para. 1 of Art. 21 of the ICC Statute. Pellet hereby refers to a quotation from the Blaškić case (see ibid., p. 1074) in which the Trial Chamber applied the national (US) 'ripeness doctrine' (under which "a court should refrain from determining issues that are only hypothetical or speculative, or at any rate devoid of sufficient immediacy and reality as to warrant adjudication" (ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Tihomir Blaškić, 'Judgement on the Request of the Republic of Croatia for Review of the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 18 July 1997', Case No. IT-95-14-AR108 bis, 29 October 1997, para. 22)). The Appeals Chamber however determined "that it is inappropriate to resort to this doctrine in these proceedings" (ibid.) because, amongst other things, "it appears to the Appeals Chamber to be inapposite to transpose it into international criminal proceedings. The Appeals Chamber holds that domestic judicial views or approaches should be handled with the greatest caution at the international level, lest one should fail to make due allowance for the unique characteristics of international criminal proceedings." (Ibid., para. 23.) See also the (by Pellet applauded, see Pellet 2002 A, pp. 1075-1076) words of Cassese in the Erdemović case: ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dražen Erdemović, 'Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Cassese', Case No. IT-96-22-A, 7 October 1997, paras. 2-6. See finally Bitti 2009, p. 300: "[E]ven if such a principle existed, it would be difficult to apply it before an international criminal court since the structure of courts in a State is fundamentally different from the structure of an international court."

[184] See Pellet 2002 A, p. 1073. Pellets on the same page also refers to the indeed clearer French version of these terms: les lois nationales représentant les différents systèmes juridiques du monde, this is the national laws representing the different legal systems of the world.

> countries, the common law, and, perhaps, Islamic law [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[185]

This view was also used by the Prosecutor in his 'Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal',[186] in which he delved into "the law of 24 national jurisdictions representing both the Civil [sometimes also referred to as "Romano-Germanic",[187] ChP] and the Common law traditions, and the law of a further three jurisdictions with a strong Islamic law component"[188] in order to find a general principle of law.[189]

However, Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute goes further. It talks of > general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate, the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime, provided that those principles are not inconsistent with this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards [emphasis added, ChP].

According to Pellet, it seems legitimate that the ICC, on the basis of the first part of the italicised words, "give[s] priority to the legal systems with which the defendant is familiar [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[190] Verhoeven explains that "the intent probably is to refer to the state or states which would be competent according to the connecting criteria traditionally used by states to determine criminal jurisdiction (place of the crime, nationality of the accused or of the victim, etc.)".[191]

That national aspect will, however, not be analysed in this research because the framework of this chapter aims to be of general application, potentially interesting for every male captus case the ICC is confronted by. Thus, what is sought here are the general principles which may be applicable to any case/defendant and not to a specific crime/case/defendant. This means that one cannot look to "the national laws

---

[185] Ibid., pp. 1073-1074.

[186] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 24 April 2006, para. 16 (explicitly referring to Pellet).

[187] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, para. 25. See also ns. 5 and 8 and accompanying text of Chapter IV.

[188] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 24 April 2006, para. 21.

[189] It must be noted that although the Appeals Chamber dismissed the Prosecutor's application because it found, among other things, 1) that his suggested principle did not exist and 2) that Art. 21, para. 1 (c) of the ICC Statute did not have to be looked at in the first place (see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, para. 32, see also n. 15) it arguably did not attack the Prosecutor's method in finding his general principle of law.

[190] Pellet 2002 A, p. 1075.

[191] Verhoeven 2004, p. 10.

of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime" as a general framework is supposed to be 'crime/case/defendant-neutral'. Of course, when deciding a specific male captus case, the ICC judges may perhaps look at "the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime" – even if this study is of the opinion that this appears to be in contradiction with the concept of general principles[192] – but it goes beyond the scope of this general framework to take this element into account.[193] In addition, even if the ICC judges were to look to the general principles of law derived from "the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime",[194] those principles

[192] Saland shows that this provision (like many others in the Statute) was not so much the result of legal logic, but rather of political compromise: "Where views diverged widely was on the direct applicability of national law. Some thought that national law was directly applicable. Others were of the view that national law should only be an indirect source, with the Court deriving common principles from the different legal systems. The debate showed a great majority in favor of the latter approach which was subsequently reflected in sub-paragraph (c), but the former represented a view held strongly by Japan (which later changed position), China, some Arab countries and Israel. During the Rome Conference the issue of the role of national law was settled by a compromise originally proposed by Norway and followed up by Canada and the United States. After the reference to "national laws of legal systems of the world", from which the Court would derive general principles, it was inserted that those national laws would include "as appropriate, the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime." There is of course a certain contradiction between the idea of deriving general principles, which indicates that this process could take place before a certain case is adjudicated, and that of looking also to particular national laws of relevance to a certain case; but that price had to be paid in order to reach a compromise." (Saland 1999, pp. 214-215.) Cf. also Verhoeven 2004, p. 10: "[T]he exact purpose of that specification ('including …') remains unclear. Apparently, a national law as such is not a legal system; if it were, the reference to the latter would indeed be useless. But how could a national law not be part of a legal system if it does not by itself constitute such a system? This is difficult to understand. In other words, the national laws of the legal systems of the world' necessarily include – at least at first sight – 'the national laws of states that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime'. What then is the reason for making a reference to them expressly?"

[193] Furthermore, it has also been argued that these specific words of part (c) of para. 1 of Art. 21 of the ICC Statute only relate to substantive criminal law issues, and not to procedural criminal law issues (such as the ones discussed in this book), see the following words of Klamberg on his very practical 'ICL Database & Commentary' (available at: http://www.iclklamberg.com/Statute.htm): "It is submitted that the first part of Article 21(1)(c) covers principles relating to substantive as well as procedural law, while the latter part of the article, which allows the Court to also apply "the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime provided", relates only to national substantive criminal law (such as practice regarding prison sentences) and not procedural rules." See also Pellet 2002 A, p. 1075, n. 138: "This system brings to mind the directions set out in Arts. 24 and 23, respectively, of the Statutes of the ICTY and ICTR, which invite the ad hoc Tribunals to 'have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts' of, respectively, former Yugoslavia and Rwanda."

[194] It is to be stressed that if the judges were to do so, they would have to focus on the general principles derived from those national laws and not on the national laws themselves. See Pellet 2002 A, p. 1076: "[T]here is never any question of purely and simply applying the law of any State; for which one may give thanks. As has been pointed out, '[t]he application as such of national law before an international tribunal is very problematic for a variety of reasons, not least the variation and possible inconsistency of relevant domestic norms with regard to the same international situation. Reference to national legal concepts via, for example, general principles of law, on the other hand, is accepted international practice'. This provides a marginal but useful safety net that can help to fill any deficiency in treaty or still have to be consistent with "this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards" (the second part of the italicised words).[195] Furthermore, also here, it seems that those principles can only be applied if the ICC judges are of the opinion that it is appropriate to transplant those principles into the context of the ICC case ("as appropriate"). Hence, the importance of the national legal context is perhaps less significant than this provision suggests. This seems apt: if this were not the case, then a suspect from State A may be confronted by a different legal system than a suspect from State B, even if they are both prosecuted before the same international court. This is clearly to be avoided for reasons of legal certainty and equality.[196] In addition, it would also obstruct the development of international criminal law as a distinct field of law.[197]

With respect to the exact meaning of the words "not inconsistent with this Statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards", they are reminiscent of the previously discussed paragraph 1 (b) ("the principles and rules of international law") and the still-to-discuss paragraph 3 ("internationally recognized human rights") of Article 21 of the ICC Statute. It is hereby submitted that the words "international law and internationally recognized norms and standards" are indeed covered by the words from paragraph 1 (b) and paragraph 3 and therefore will not be examined here separately.[198] customary law which may become apparent [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also McAuliffe deGuzman 1999, p. 443.

---

[195] McAuliffe deGuzman states on these words: "Provided that the Court conducts broad comparative law analysis in arriving at general principles, this provision should prove relatively unimportant. Such general principles constitute international law and therefore cannot, by definition, be inconsistent with international law. They are also unlikely to conflict with the ICC Statute, which represents a codification of international law. Nonetheless, this qualifier is significant in that it emphasizes that the Statute and norms of international law always take precedence over principles derived from national laws [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (McAuliffe deGuzman 1999, p. 444.) Moreover, Verhoeven quite rightly points out: "Since the general principles referred to in (c) are only applicable in the absence of one of the rules referred to in paragraph 1, (a) (Statute, Elements of Crimes, Rules of Procedure and Evidence) or (b) ('treaties and rules and principles of international law'), it is difficult to understand how they could be contradicting a – by hypothesis – non-existent rule." (Verhoeven 2004, p. 12.)

[196] See also Chin 1998, p. 341: "The principles which the Court applies must be independent of links to the individual case in question. To provide otherwise would be to risk breaching the principle of equality before the law in that different principles might be applied depending on which states would "normally exercise jurisdiction" in that particular case. What the Court should be doing is deriving these general principles from an overall survey of the legal systems of the world without giving particular attention to any one national legal system [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[197] See Shaw 1998, pp. 68-69: "The dangers of importing into international criminal proceedings, norms of national law, which may vary from instance to instance depending upon the identity of the accused, must be clear. Inconsistency and lack of clarity would become distinct risks and the concept of autonomous international criminal law in practice threatened. International courts are used to dealing with municipal law concepts within the context of general principles of law as means of filling lacunae in the norms of public international law. Using the particular national laws of particular states as a direct source of law for an international criminal court should be avoided [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also McAuliffe deGuzman 1999, p. 439 (and n. 25 in specific), presenting the arguments of those opposing the importance of national law, and Caracciolo 2000, p. 223.

[198] Cf. in that respect also, for example, Human Rights Watch's 'Summary Of The Key Provisions Of The ICC Statute' (from September 1998), available at: http://www.hrw.org/campaigns/icc/docs/icc-

It is now worth looking at whether there exist general principles of law which can be connected to the male captus problem. Which exact sources must be consulted to find them? The ICC Statute speaks of "general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world". This seems to point to legislation/statutory law, including perhaps constitutions (as they can be seen as the supreme laws of States). However, in the common law system, legal rules/'the law' are/is not only formed by legislators but to a great extent also by judges. For example, when the Prosecutor in his above-mentioned application reviewed the civil law system, the focus was clearly on statutory law such as national codes of criminal procedure,[199] but in his review of the common law system, he looked at both statutory law (including a constitution)[200] and law formed by case law[201] to find out 'the law' of these legal systems in relation to his claimed principle.[202] Hence, it seems, even though it must be admitted that this matter statute.htm). Here, it used the words "international human rights" to refer to the last words of (now) Art. 21, para. 1 (c) of the ICC Statute: "Article 33 provides that the law to be applied by the court will be firstly, the statute, elements of crimes and the rules of evidence and procedure, secondly, international law and thirdly, general principles derived from national systems so far as consistent with international human rights." See also Degan 2005, p. 81.

[199] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 24 April 2006, ns. 24-25 and paras. 24-25.

[200] See ibid., para. 26.

[201] See ibid.

[202] See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, paras. 26 ("To begin the Prosecutor referred the Appeals Chamber to the relevant law finding application in fourteen countries belonging to the Romano-Germanic system of justice (...) exemplifying in his view a practice recognizing competence to the appeals court to review decisions disallowing an appeal. A right to do so is conferred by statutory law, often referred to as a "complaint motion" [original footnotes omitted, ChP].") and 28 ("The citations of the Prosecutor with regard to countries adhering to the common law system of justice (...) are on the one hand confined as in the case of the Romano-Germanic systems of law to statutory provisions allowing for a decision by the hierarchically higher court to grant "special leave" to hear an appeal and on the other hand to the jurisdiction of an hierarchically higher court to grant writs of certiorari and mandamus. These writs derive[d] from England [and] evolved in the context of common law, acknowledging power to the High Court a branch of the Supreme Court to oversee the exercise of judicial functions by inferior courts [original footnotes omitted, ChP]".). See also the following decision of the ICC's Trial Chamber in the Lubanga Dyilo case: "[T]he Trial Chamber does not consider that a general principle of law allowing the substantive preparation of witnesses prior to testimony can be derived from national legal systems worldwide, pursuant to Article 21(1)(c) of the Statute. Although this practice is accepted to an extent in two legal systems, both of which are founded upon common law traditions, this does not provide a sufficient basis for any conclusion that a general principle based on established practice of national legal systems exists. The Trial Chamber notes that the prosecution's submissions with regard to national jurisprudence did not include any citations from the Romano-Germanic legal system [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICC, Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision Regarding the Practices Used to Prepare and Familiarise Witnesses for Giving Testimony at Trial' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 30 November 2007, para. 41.)

remains quite unclear,[203] that case law may be looked at in the common law context.[204] Indeed, one could argue that case law may be looked at in the context of the civil law system as well if a topic is not regulated in legislation and if judges consequently have created 'the law' on this issue themselves. As was shown earlier, the male captus bene/male detentus problem seems to be such an area: it appears that how a judge is to decide on a male captus is not normally prescribed by legislation; it is often left to the discretion of the judge himself to decide what the consequences of a certain male captus on the jurisdiction of the court are.[205] As a consequence, the analysis of decisions from judges can arguably be resorted to in order to determine 'the law' of a certain legal system. (In addition, one could argue that a certain rule in case law may also say something about the written law – if there exists such written law – as most judges will merely apply the existing law instead of creating new law themselves.) As a result, it is submitted that the overviews of Chapter V – which focused on, but which were not restricted to, the common and civil law context[206] – and the principles distilled in Section 2 of

[203] See Cogan 2002, p. 117, n. 30: "It is unclear whether domestic case law can be considered under the Article 21(1)(c) rubric "general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world"."

[204] Cf. also Bos 1984, p. 270: "Examining continental legal orders or systems, codes are destined to figure prominently on the list of objects for study. In common law countries, case-law will command most of one's attention. Generally speaking, legal doctrine should be looked at closely [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[205] Cf. also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 28: "The power to stay proceedings is par excellence a power assumed by the guardians of the judicial process, the judges, to see that the stream of justice flows unpolluted."

[206] Note that cases from States with an Islamic law component were not absent either in these overviews (see, for example, ns. 623 and 630 of Chapter V) but it must be admitted that their influence on the male captus discussion does not seem to be grand. In that context, one may also refer to Hamid's article from 2004 which was used in this study as well. The fact that Hamid, in 2004 an associate professor and now a professor of law at the International Islamic University Malaysia, did not refer in his overview of the practice of national courts towards the male captus rule to States with an Islamic law component (other than the Israeli courts in Eichmann), may also constitute evidence for the assertion that there are not many (known) male captus cases from the Islamic law tradition. Be that as it may, it must also be stressed that in order to find a general principle of law, one could argue that the principle must, at least, be found in the common and civil law system, arguably still the most important systems of law for the ICC, see also n. 7 and accompanying text from Chapter IV. (See also the hesitant ("perhaps") referral by Pellet to the Islamic law tradition (Pellet 2002 A, pp. 1073-1074: "[I]t is (…) necessary (…) only to ensure, by 'polling', that the norms in question are effectively found in the 'principal legal systems of the world'. These can probably be reduced to a small number in the contemporary world: the family of civil-law countries, the common law, and, perhaps, Islamic law [original footnotes omitted, ChP].") That means that if the overviews of Chapter V, which mainly addressed (but again, were not limited to) the common and civil law context, do not bring about a common principle, one could argue that there is no general principle of law which could be applied by the ICC. See in that respect also ICC, Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision Regarding the Practices Used to Prepare and Familiarise Witnesses for Giving Testimony at Trial' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 30 November 2007, para. 41: "[T]he Trial Chamber does not consider that a general principle of law allowing the substantive preparation of

Chapter VII can be used to determine whether there exist general principles related to the male captus problem. Hence, here also, the results from the external evaluative framework can be used for the internal evaluative framework.

With respect to the male captus bene/male detentus maxim itself, the overviews of Chapter V have clearly shown that one cannot make the general assertion that one of these maxims can be seen as a general principle of law nowadays. After all, many different male captus decisions were issued, one leading to a bene detentus and another leading to a male detentus outcome, depending on the exact circumstances of the case. Hence, even if it could be argued that male captus bene detentus was a general principle of law in the old days[207] (but see the French Jolis case), it can be maintained that this is not the case in this day and age. Likewise, because decisions are still issued which could be seen as male captus bene detentus decisions, it is arguably also very hard to maintain that the male captus male detentus/ex iniuria ius non oritur maxim can be seen as a general principle of law.[208]

However, there are certainly elements from the male captus case law which were shared by most systems of law, elements which may perhaps – again taking into account the overviews of this study being extensive but not exhaustive – be seen as general principles of law falling under the terminology used in Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute.[209] For example, one could think of the fact that most courts confronted by a male captus will use their discretion, for instance (in the common law system) under the abuse of process doctrine, to balance all the different elements of the case to decide whether or not the male captus is so serious that witnesses prior to testimony can be derived from national legal systems worldwide, pursuant to Article 21(1)(c) of the Statute. Although this practice is accepted to an extent in two legal systems, both of which are founded upon common law traditions, this does not provide a sufficient basis for any conclusion that a general principle based on established practice of national legal systems exists. The Trial Chamber notes that the prosecution's submissions with regard to national jurisprudence did not include any citations from the Romano-Germanic legal system [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

---

[207] See Borelli 2004, p. 654. (Note only that Borelli is not referring here to Art. 21 of the ICC Statute but to the concept as mentioned in Art. 38 of the ICJ Statute ('general principles of law recognized by civilized nations').)

[208] See also Bugnion 2002, p. 531 (who, like Borelli (see the previous footnote), is also writing on the concept as can be found in Art. 38 of the ICJ Statute): "En doctrine, on doit en premier lieu constater que la maxime "ex iniuria jus non oritur" connaît de sérieuses exceptions, aussi bien dans l'ordre interne qu'en droit international, de telle sorte qu'il n'est pas certain qu'on puisse y reconnaître l'un des principes généraux du droit mentionnés à l'article 38, chiffre 1, lettre c, du Statut de la Cour internationale de Justice [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., p. 531, n. 16: "En ce qui concerne le droit interne, on peut mentionner la maxime "male captus, bene judicatus" en vertu de laquelle une cour pénale se déclare compétente pour juger un prévenu, même si ce dernier a été conduit devant elle par des moyens illégaux, par exemple à la suite d'un enlèvement dans un autre État." But see Shaw 2003, p. 98 (writing on general principles of law): "A further principle to be noted is that of ex injuria jus non oritur, which posits that facts flowing from wrongful conduct cannot determine the law [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also n. 182.

[209] It must be noted that to find these elements, one can look at all the male captus decisions and not only at those where the courts issued a certain decision because they were of the opinion that international law dictated them to do so. That latter point is only important for the customary international law question, which is not being addressed here.

jurisdiction must be refused.[210] In addition, most courts seem to refuse jurisdiction only if their own authorities are involved in the male captus. Finally, it appears that quite a number of courts – although it is unclear whether "quite a number" is enough to lead to a general principle of law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute – would also take into account the seriousness of the crimes with which the victim of the male captus is charged in deciding whether or not jurisdiction must be refused.

The above-mentioned elements can be connected with the actual male captus problem itself, but it is also worth addressing the related issue of the remedy of release here. Can this remedy, of which it was earlier established that it has customary international law/general international law status, be seen as a general principle of law?

In this context, it may be instructive to refer to the 1993 research from Cherif Bassiouni, who reviewed all the national legal systems having a written constitution (139 in total)[211] in order to see whether certain rights had become general principles (of international law).[212] Of the 11 rights examined,[213] at least two should be

[210] It may be interesting to note that Starr, whose support for an interest-balancing approach was already mentioned in n. 163 of Chapter VII, is of the opinion that such an approach can find support in the concept of equity, a concept which has been qualified as a general principle of law recognised by civilised nations under Art. 38, para. 1 (c) of the ICJ Statute. See Starr 2008, p. 764: "[I]nternational courts could find support for an interest-balancing approach in the tradition of equity, which has often been treated as a source of international law. The case law of the ICJ has increasingly incorporated certain equitable principles, and arbitral tribunals have long done so. One influential early argument for equity as a formal source of international law came from Judge Hudson's separate opinion in the River Meuse case [PCIJ, The Diversion of Water from the Meuse, 'Judgment', 28 June 1937, Publications of the Permanent Court of International Justice, Series A./B., Fascicule No. 70 (pp. 73-80), ChP], in which he argued for application of the "clean hands" principle. Judge Hudson wrote that "principles of equity have long been considered to constitute a part of international law" and, specifically, qualify as "general principles of law recognized by civilized nations" – a source of law under the ICJ Statute. While stating that the Chorzów Factory rule [see n. 553 and accompanying text of Chapter III and n. 182 of the present chapter, ChP] is "sound" as a "general principle," he argued that courts devising remedies in particular cases "cannot ignore special circumstances which may call for the consideration of equitable principles." [original footnotes omitted, ChP]" In fact, even the ICC Prosecutor, in its examination of Art. 21 of the ICC Statute and its nexus with Art. 38 of the ICJ Statute, has referred to the same case of the PCIJ, see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 24 April 2006, para. 19: "The jurisprudence stemming from the Permanent Court of International Justice, the International Court of Justice, the Iran-U.S. Mixed Claims Tribunal and the ICTY provides relevant examples of the type of general principles of law identified and applied by international judicial bodies: ○ The Diversion of Water from the Meuse Case: Lord Hudson held that "It would seem to be an important principle of equity that where two parties have assumed an identical or a reciprocal obligation, one party which is engaged in a continuing non-performance of that obligation should not be permitted to take advantage of a similar non-performance of that obligation by the other party." He thus appears to have understood "principles of equity" as being principles common to national legal systems generally and part of international law by virtue of article 38 (…) (3) of the Statute of the PCIJ [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[211] See Cherif Bassiouni 1993, p. 244: "This research focuses on all national legal systems which have a written constitution irrespective of their inclusion in any one of the major families of legal systems."

[212] Although Cherif Bassiouni in the end was trying to find "internationally recognized general principles" (ibid., p. 239) or "general principles of international law" (ibid., p. 243) (he also looked mentioned here.[214] The first is the more general right to life, liberty and security of the person, "a cornerstone of international human rights law and of civil rights in all countries which recognize the supremacy of the rule of law".[215] Cherif Bassiouni concludes that this right can be found explicitly, "(in whole or in part) sometimes together and sometimes separately",[216] in 51 national constitutions. The more specific right to be free from arbitrary arrest and detention was even found in at least 119 constitutions (including constitutions adhering to the Islamic law system).[217] Of whether the rights examined were found in ten international instruments), it is fair to say that the part of his study dedicated to the national context can be compared with the present discussion on the national general principles of law. See ibid., p. 247: "[T]he identification of principles of criminal justice procedures is done by identifying and then comparing basic criminal procedure rights in various national legal systems in order to determine the existence of "general principles" common to the major legal systems of the world." (It is therefore perhaps a little confusing that he also refers to "general principles" when he arguably means "internationally recognized general principles"/"general principles of international law", see ibid., p. 239: "The rights found in the [international] instruments evidence their international recognition, while their counterparts in the national constitutions evidence national legal recognition. The congruence of both indicate the existence of a "general principle"." See also ibid., pp. 239-240: "This study uses a purely empirical model of searching for repetition and similarity among the various rights to prove that similar rights evidence the existence of principles common to international law and national law, and that they are binding "general principles of law".") [213] Those 11 are the following: 1) the right to life, liberty, and security of the person (pp. 254*ff*), 2) the right to recognition before the law and equal protection of the law (pp. 258*ff*), 3) the right to be free from arbitrary arrest and detention (pp. 259*ff*), 4) the right to freedom from torture and cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment (pp. 262*ff*), 5) the right to be presumed innocent (pp. 265*ff*), 6) the right to a fair trial and corresponding subrights (such as the right to have procedures established by law) (pp. 267*ff*), 7) the right to assistance of counsel and corresponding subrights (pp. 280*ff*), 8) the right to a speedy trial (pp. 285*ff*), 9) the right to appeal (p. 286), 10) the right to be protected from double jeopardy (pp. 288*ff*) and 11) the right to be protected from ex post facto laws (pp. 290*ff*).

[214] Other interesting rights are for example the right to freedom from torture and cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment or punishment and the right to a fair trial and corresponding subrights (such as the right to have procedures established by law).

[215] Cherif Bassiouni 1993, p. 254. This crucial right can at least be traced back to Art. 39 of the 1215 Magna Carta: "No free man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised, outlawed, banished, or in any other way destroyed, nor will We proceed against or prosecute him, except by the lawful judgment of his peers and by the law of the land." (Howard 1998, p. 45.)

[216] Cherif Bassiouni 1993, p. 255.

[217] See ibid., p. 261. See also n. 239 of Chapter V of this book, where the following view of the US Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in the context of the civil case of Alvarez-Machain was presented: "Unlike transborder arrests, there exists a clear and universally recognized norm prohibiting arbitrary arrest and detention. This prohibition is codified in every major comprehensive human rights instrument and is reflected in at least 119 national constitutions." (US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, Alvarez-Machain v. United States et al. (No. 99-56762) and Alvarez-Machain v. Sosa et al. (No. 99-56880), 3 June 2003 (331 F.3d 604), p. 620.) Not very surprisingly, the Court of Appeals also referred here to the study of Cherif Bassiouni. The Supreme Court in the same case agreed that Cherif Bassiouni's study showed "that many nations recognize a norm against arbitrary detention" (US Supreme Court, Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-339) and United States v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-485), 29 June 2004 (542 US 692), p. 736, n. 27) but it was also of the opinion that this was to no avail to Alvarez-Machain, who, it is recalled, was arguing that there exists, in customary international law, "a general prohibition of "arbitrary" detention defined as officially sanctioned action exceeding positive authorization to detain under the domestic law of some government, regardless of the circumstances." (Ibid., p. 736.) This was, according to the Supreme Court, because the consensus of the States examined by Bassiouni "is at a high level of generality." (Ibid., p. 736, n. 27.)

all 11 rights examined, none is acknowledged more frequently.[218] Hence, one can safely conclude that the right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily can be seen as a general principle of law.[219]

However, can the more specific remedy of release (in contrast to the more general right to liberty and security or the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily) also be seen as a general principle of law? Although Cherif Bassiouni's survey does not explicitly say so, one can argue that this is indeed the case. To back this assertion, it is arguably not necessary to examine all the constitutions reviewed by Cherif Bassiouni. As was already shown in Chapter III and as will again be shown infra when discussing paragraph 3 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute, the ICCPR, in which the right to liberty and security, including the remedy of release, can be found, has many (165) States Parties. The fact that a State has joined an international treaty means that the content of that treaty is part of that State's law, whether that State adheres to a dualistic system of law (by which international law must be implemented in national laws first) or a monistic system of law (by which international is directly applicable in the national State).

A study by Maki shows that the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful (arrest or) detention was accepted by many States even before the ICCPR was drafted. In her article 'General Principles of Human Rights Law Recognized by All Nations: Freedom From Arbitrary Arrest and Detention', she refers to the previously mentioned[220] 1964 UN Commission on Human Rights' 'Study of the Right to Everyone to be Free from Arbitrary Arrest, Detention and Exile'.[221] Maki explains that the Commission first examined various national arrest and detention procedures and then prepared the so-called "Draft Articles" on the right to be free from arbitrary arrest and detention.[222]

> The Draft Articles were a compilation of selected laws from various countries, which rendered the fullest protection of the right to liberty and security of person in regard to arrest and detention. The Draft Articles represent the highest standards for individual protection as determined by the Commission; they represent those standards to which laws and practice should conform [emphasis in original, ChP].[223]

These Draft Articles were then sent to UN Member States for comment. "The comments received were individual state assessments of the Draft Articles vis-à-vis

---

[218] See Cherif Bassiouni 1993, p. 292.
[219] Cf. also Rayfuse 1993, pp. 890-891 (who is also claiming that these rights have customary international law status, see n. 197 and accompanying text of Chapter III): "Among the most well-recognised and documented fundamental human rights are the right to liberty and security of the person and the right to freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention. (…) These rights are (…) guaranteed by the constitutions of many nations".
[220] See ns. 216 and 583 of Chapter III.
[221] Commission on Human Rights, Study of the Right of Everyone to be Free from Arbitrary Arrest, Detention and Exile, UN Doc. E/CN.4/826/Rev.1 (1964).
[222] See Maki 1980, p. 284.
[223] Ibid., p. 285.

each state's own existing legal system."[224] It turned out that the 48 governments submitting comments – and "representing a wide diversity of legal systems"[225] – were "in surprising agreement"[226] with these Draft Articles. Maki argues that

> [a] careful examination of the comments to the Draft Articles indicates that certain provisions of the Draft Articles can be summarized into principles upon which all commenting countries can agree. (…) The summaries are meant to include only those principles of the Draft Articles which are totally acceptable to the countries submitting comments.[227]

Alongside the main summarised principle that "no one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention",[228] the second summarised principle reads: "Anyone who is arrested or detained shall be entitled to initiate proceedings before an authority in order to challenge the legality of his arrest or detention and obtain his release from that authority without delay if it is unlawful."[229] Maki notes: "It is significant that none of the countries submitting comments to the Draft Articles suggested that the result of the proceeding be anything but the detainee's release, if the arrest or detention is unlawful."[230] According to Maki, additional information on States' municipal laws and procedures regarding this topic, to be found in the 1950 Yearbook on Human Rights[231] "supports the assertion that the summarized principles are general principles of law recognized by all nations".[232]

Hence, one could conclude that not only the general right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily but also its more specific habeas corpus provision (including release in the case of an unlawful (arrest or) detention) can be seen as a general principle of law. This is also confirmed by Rodley. After having concluded that there is strong evidence that the following two elements, namely "(a) the right in criminal cases of a detained person to be brought promptly before a judge and (b) the right of anyone deprived of liberty to challenge the lawfulness of detention and to be released if the detention is found to be unlawful",[233] express a rule of general international law,[234] he turns to the national level, explaining:

> While (...) the rights referred to here are frequently not respected, yet there are few legal systems that do not have provisions reflecting them in their ordinary law. This suggests that, rather than binding only the parties to the relevant instruments, the

[224] Ibid.
[225] Ibid., pp. 285-286.
[226] Ibid., p. 286.
[227] Ibid.
[228] Ibid.
[229] Ibid., p. 295.
[230] Ibid.
[231] See ibid., p. 300.
[232] Ibid., p. 301.
[233] Rodley 1999, p. 340. See also n. 416 of Chapter III.
[234] See ibid.

> principles have universal application, reflecting as they appear to do 'general principles of law recognized by civilized nations' (...) [original footnote omitted, ChP].[235]

Finally, reference should be made to the following words from a very recent report, which, even though it is limited in scope,[236] confirms the importance of the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful (arrest and) detention, although it is also true that special procedures may apply to high level suspects such as alleged terrorists:[237]

> Lawful detention (…) requires not only a procedure prescribed by law and that everyone who is arrested is informed promptly, in a language which he understands, of the reasons for his arrest and the charge against him, but as an extra safeguard that everyone arrested or detained is entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of such deprivation of liberty will be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful (habeas corpus). Although countries report that special conditions and procedures apply with regard to special categories of detainees (notably organised criminals and terrorists), (…) by and large under normal circumstances they all comply with these requirements.[238]

---

[235] Ibid., pp. 340-341.

[236] See Brants 2009, p. 2: "The AIDC [Académie Internationale de Droit Comparé/International Academy of Comparative Law, ChP] reporters received answers to their questionnaire from fourteen countries, in alphabetical order: the Republic of Croatia, the Czech Republic, England & Wales, Finland, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Romania, South Africa, Spain, Switzerland, Taiwan, the United States of America and Venezuela [original footnote omitted, ChP]." With respect to Switzerland, Brants explains (at ibid., p. 2, n. 5): "Partly because of the unique situation in Switzerland, where profound reforms of criminal process are taking place, the Swiss reporter was unable to answer the questionnaire in a form that made comparison feasible. For this reason, the reporters have elected to omit references to Switzerland from the general report as reproduced here." See also ibid., p. 5 (writing on both the AIDC report and a report from AIDP, the Association Internationale de Droit Pénal/International Association of Penal Law, a report which examined 17 States, namely Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Colombia, Croatia, Finland, Germany, Hungary, Italy, the Netherlands, Poland, Romania, Spain, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States): "In conclusion, what do these two general reports have to tell us about the state of criminal justice in the world in what must surely be termed a troubled global era? As a prior remark, it should be noted that it is difficult to generalise about the world, with ten of the fourteen national reports for the AIDC and thirteen of the seventeen for the AIDP being from European countries. South American and Asian countries are sorely underrepresented, and the continent of Africa not at all (with the exception of South Africa, which is hardly the most representative of African nations)."

[237] This is elaborated in more detail in the AIDP report (see the previous footnote), under the question whether the legal system of the State in question allows for limiting the right to habeas corpus with respect to serious offences, see Vervaele 2009, p. 89: "[I]n all reporting countries, except in the US, the right to habeas corpus applies to all offences, including serious offences and terrorist offences. No special rules of proactive detention have been elaborated, but some countries do report administrative forms of liberty-limiting or liberty-depriving measures. What has changed in some reporting countries is the moment ab quo when the habeas corpus procedure can be triggered, in other words the delay between the police detention and the subsequent judicial review. (…) What has also changed is the maximum duration of pre-trial detention."

[238] Brants and Franken 2009, p. 31.

Concluding this subsection, one can argue that if the ICC judges are of the opinion that parts (a) and (b) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute have brought no relief, then one may turn to part (c) and that following elements may perhaps be applied by the ICC judges as general principles of law, namely the fact that discretion can be used to decide whether or not the male captus is so serious that jurisdiction must be refused, that jurisdiction will normally only be refused if the prosecuting forum's own authorities are involved in the male captus and that unlawfully arrested/detained persons must be released. Furthermore (but it is less clear whether this may also constitute a principle), in the balancing exercise, the seriousness of the crimes with which the victim of the male captus is charged can be taken into account.

However, also with respect to part (c) (cf. the words "where appropriate" in the context of part (b)), the ICC judges will probably only use these solutions from the national level if they believe that it is appropriate to transplant these solutions into the specific context of the ICC, recall again the words of Pellet: "[T]he general principles of law require a triple mental operation: a comparison between national systems, the search for common 'principles', and their transposition to the international sphere [emphasis added, ChP]".[239] That could mean that the ICC judges may follow the principles which can be related to the proper male captus issue mentioned above but may be more reluctant with respect to the problematic remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention.

3 ARTICLE 21, PARAGRAPH 2

This paragraph states that "[t]he Court may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions". The word "may" shows that other ICC decisions do not need to be followed by the ICC judges examining a male captus situation and hence cannot be part of an internal evaluative framework which is aimed at finding out whether certain ICC decisions are in conformity with what the law of the ICC prescribes the judges to decide. After all, and in contrast to the first paragraph ("[t]he Court shall apply [emphasis added, ChP]") and the still-to-discuss third paragraph ("[t]he application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with [emphasis added, ChP]"), the second paragraph is non-obligatory in nature. If the ICC is not obliged to follow its own decisions, if there is no stare decisis, a view stating that although a certain ICC decision has outcome A, but ought to have outcome B (because the ICC, in another decision, reached that outcome B) is, of course, not convincing. In other words, one cannot assert, on the basis that the ICC previously reached outcome B, that the ICC must now also follow that conclusion if the Court is not obliged to follow that decision. This is clearly different from paragraph 1, discussed above, and paragraph 3, which will be addressed in the following section: as their language is mandatory, their content can easily be used in an internal evaluative framework to find out whether a certain ICC decision is in conformity with those paragraphs.[240]

[239] Pellet 2002 A, p. 1073. See also n. 183 and accompanying text.

4 ARTICLE 21, PARAGRAPH 3

The third and final paragraph of this crucial article in the ICC Statute reads:

> The application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights, and be without any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender as defined in article 7, paragraph 3,[[241]] age, race, colour, language, religion or belief, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, wealth, birth or other status.

It can be argued that paragraph 3, in principle, is not a source of law as such, but a provision stating that the application and interpretation of law from the first two paragraphs must be consistent with the principle of non-discrimination (which will not be further discussed here) and internationally recognised human rights.[242] In that

[240] Even though the ICC judges do not need to follow previous ICC case law, one can imagine that judges will often refer to decisions of other Chambers. Indeed, this has already happened. (See Bitti 2009, pp. 292-293.) In that context, one can also wonder whether the case law of the Appeals Chamber, in practice, will be considered by other Chambers to be of special importance. (See also Degan 2005, p. 82.) This is not the case (which is consistent with the Statute), but Bitti also rightly shows that this may cause some problems in the future: "[T]he case-law of the Appeals Chamber does not seem to be placed on a higher level than the case-law of other Chambers of the Court, which seems to be in line with the wording of Article 21 (2) which refers to the Court and does not give a particular weight to the jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber. This will certainly produce some instability in the jurisprudence of the ICC for the next decades as Chambers are not bound by their previous case law and the modification of their composition, taking into consideration the fact that judges shall hold office for a term of nine years and are not eligible for re-election, may provoke important changes in the jurisprudence in all Chambers of the ICC, including the Appeals Chamber [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[241] This provision reads: "For the purpose of this Statute, it is understood that the term 'gender' refers to the two sexes, male and female, within the context of society. The term 'gender' does not indicate any meaning different from the above."

[242] See, for example, Edwards 2001, p. 369: "Recognizing that international law is dynamic and always evolving, the Rome Statute drafters noted the impracticality of precisely delineating within the Rome Statute or its collateral instruments every principle and rule of law to be used by the Court. They arguably saw a need for flexibility, while incorporating precision and certainty in identifying the applicable law to be used. Therefore, a balance was struck between a full exposition and a flexible approach, resulting in a list of sources of law, identified in articles 21(1) and 21(2), as constrained by article 21(3) in their interpretation and application [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Note, however, the following words of Bitti: "The most important source of law (in addition to the Statute and Rules of Procedure and Evidence), is likely to be Article 21 (3) of the Statute, i. e., "internationally recognized human rights"." (Bitti 2009, p. 300.) See also ibid., p. 304: "[I]nternationally recognized human rights may constitute an additional source of law." Nevertheless, even though these words can be interpreted as meaning that Bitti is of the opinion that para. 1 and para. 3 present the same kinds of sources, it will be explained in n. 253 that Bitti believes that there is certainly an important difference here, namely in that para. 1 enumerates the formal sources of law, whereas para. 3 provides a material source of law, cf. also the still-to-discuss vision of Pellet (see n. 253 and accompanying text), explaining the difference between sources and norms.

respect, it 'only' colours the application and interpretation of law from the first two paragraphs and hence in principle does not 'produce' new law itself.[243] Nevertheless, such a consistency test may go a relatively long way and may, although strictly speaking perhaps not as such,[244] but nevertheless de facto, function as a provision allowing the entry of new law into the ICC context.[245] This can be explained as follows: when one is looking for a provision/rule under paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute, one should not only take into account the most specific provision of the ICC Statute relevant to the case at bar, but also the more general provisions which are always applicable to any ICC case. If those generally formulated provisions were also subject to a consistency test with internationally

[243] See Edwards 2001, p. 370: "When the Court resolves a legal issue, it must identify the "applicable law" from the article 21 sources list before determining the "consistency question". See also the following and already-mentioned (see n. 26) quotation from the ICC decision on 'witness proofing': "Unlike the first component of the definition of the practice of witness proofing advanced by the Prosecution, the Chamber observes that the goal and measures encompassed by the second component of such a definition are not covered by any provision of the Statute, the Rules or the Regulations. Therefore, the Chamber, prior to undertaking any analysis under article 21 (3) of the Statute, shall first analyse whether this second component is embraced by any provision, rule or principle which could be considered as part of the applicable law of the Court pursuant to article 21 (1) (b) and (c) of the Statute [emphasis added, ChP]." (ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Practices of Witness Familiarisation and Witness Proofing' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 8 November 2006, para. 28.) See also ibid., para. 10: "[T]he Chamber recalls the general principle of interpretation set out in article 21 (3) of the Statute, according to which "the application and the interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights". In this regard, the Chamber considers that prior to undertaking the analysis required by article 21 (3) of the Statute, the Chamber must find a provision, rule or principle that, under article 21 (1) (a) to (c) of the Statute, could be applicable to the issue at hand [emphasis added, ChP]."

[244] See Vasiliev 2009, pp. 218-219: "The provision does not serve as a regular channel for the direct import of 'external' human rights standards, but as a principle guiding the interpretation and application of the ICC's own legal framework. Indeed, in exceptional circumstances, the Article could be used for interpreting and applying that framework in a manner that comes close to devising a new procedural remedy. However, seeing it as an extraordinary trouble-shooting device would not be fully accurate. Even where not explicitly foreseen in the Statute or Rules, the said remedy will certainly lie in the broad competences of the judges and/or the relevant rights of the participants (for example, the duty to ensure and the right to receive a fair trial). Thus, the 'revelation' of a potential remedy by the judges would not be gap-filling by way of direct application of the standards specified in Article 21(3), but rather a logical corollary of the interpretation and application of the ICC in light of those standards [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[245] Cf. also Arsanjani 1999, p. 29: "While the original intent behind this paragraph may have been to limit the court's powers in the application and interpretation of the relevant law, it could have the opposite effect and broaden the competence of the court on these matters." See also Sluiter 2009, p. 464: "[T]he potential of Article 21 (3) is enormous, especially from a defence perspective. The provision is a clear rejection of 'black letter lawyering', and entails that the effect and importance of written law is quite relative." However, notwithstanding this potential, Sluiter is pessimistic about the actual effect of Art. 21, para. 3 of the ICC Statute in the future, see ibid., pp. 466-467: "One wonders whether Article 21 (3) may have any effect in filling gaps within the Statute; in other words, could it serve as a basis for some sort of law-making by the judiciary? (…) As in a number of areas, (…) the Judges have already turned the Statute into something which it is not and which i[t] i[s] not intended to be, I am therefore not confident that Article 21 (3) will in practice have the effect, which it should have bearing in mind its ordinary meaning and its object and purpose."

recognised human rights, new law may indeed enter into the ICC context (although some will say that this is not new law, but the existing law, interpreted and applied consistently with internationally recognised human rights). One could hereby think, for example, of Article 1 of the ICC Statute which states:

> An International Criminal Court ('the Court') is hereby established. It shall be a permanent institution and shall have the power to exercise its jurisdiction over persons for the most serious crimes of international concern, as referred to in this Statute, and shall be complementary to national criminal jurisdictions. The jurisdiction and functioning of the Court shall be governed by the provisions of this Statute.

It could be argued that this entails that whenever the ICC exercises its jurisdiction, whenever it is involved in a case, that involvement, that exercise of jurisdiction, must be applied and interpreted in conformity with those internationally recognised human rights which are relevant to the ICC's functioning. That exercise of jurisdiction/involvement, of course, includes the proceedings in the courtroom, when the ICC is actually trying the case, but it would also include the exercise of jurisdiction/involvement in the pre-trial phase[246] and hence also, for example, the actions of third parties when these parties make arrests/detentions/surrenders at the request of the ICC, even though Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute seems to apply to the ICC only.[247] Before continuing on this topic, it should be remarked that this is the path the ICC should follow in any case: ensuring that whenever the ICC is involved in a case (including the actions of third parties working at the behest of the ICC), that involvement is consistent with internationally recognised human rights. However, it can be argued that it would even be fairer for the ICC to take its responsibility for violations in the context of its case more generally. Although arrests/detentions made at the behest of the ICC will cover a large part of the ICC's arrest/detention 'stock', the ICC may always be confronted by male captus claims which go beyond such situations (cf. abduction by private individuals). It would be highly just if the ICC, as the ultimate prosecuting forum, would also repair those violations, even if it was not involved in the male captus.

---

[246] See ibid., p. 465: "The protection of Article 21 (3), like the protection of the right to a fair trial, should extend to the pre-trial phase. Any other approach deprives individuals of essential protection and may make the Court the beneficiary of activities it would not wish to be associated with." See also ibid., pp. 472 and 474 (where he connects Art. 21, para. 3 of the ICC Statute with Art. 59 of the ICC Statute). On the last page, he writes, for example, that "[t]he proposed interpretation is therefore that the reference to 'rights' in Article 59 (2) be interpreted independently from the national law; what matters are internationally protected rights of the arrested person."

[247] See Edwards 2001, p. 348: "The human rights obligations imposed by article 21(3) extend to all law to be applied and interpreted by the ICC, and to all aspects of the operation of the Court, including acts of the Prosecutor, the judges, and the Assembly of States Parties, and, quite probably, to acts of States parties themselves, IGOs [inter-governmental organisations, ChP] and others who cooperate with the ICC [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., n. 93: "Though article 21(3) arguably may not directly apply to States Parties, IGOs, or others who might engage in cooperation with the ICC, States Parties and other entities that do cooperate may be required to comply with norms contained in article 21(3)." Cf. finally Hafner and Binder 2004, p. 173.

Returning to the internationally recognised human rights which are relevant to the ICC's functioning in the context of the pre-trial phase, one could think here, for example, of a broad concept of the right to a fair trial, a right which should, as will be shown infra, definitely be seen as an internationally recognised human right.[248] Thus, one may argue that the complete exercise of the ICC's jurisdiction, the entire proceedings must be in conformity with those internationally recognised human rights which are relevant to the ICC, even if these rights are not explicitly mentioned in the ICC Statute. See also in that respect the following words of Edwards:

> Perhaps the most compelling argument favoring the existence of a search and seizure privacy right under the Rome Statute [which does not mention this right, ChP] is that the right is an "internationally recognized human right," which must be enforced by the Court because Rome Statute, article 21(3) mandates the Court to apply all law "consistent with internationally recognized human rights." Thus, all "internationally recognized human rights" relevant to the Court's functioning must be enforced. Since the search and seizure right to privacy is relevant to the right to a fair trial, such privacy rights must be enforced [original footnote omitted, ChP].[249]

In such cases, no conflict will arise as there is no original provision from the ICC Statute which can be viewed as being in contrast with the newly applied human right. However, what happens if there does exist a provision in the Statute, but that provision is viewed as being incompatible with internationally recognised human rights? Arsanjani writes on this subject:

> While the original intent behind this paragraph may have been to limit the court's powers in the application and interpretation of the relevant law, it could have the opposite effect and broaden the competence of the court on these matters. It provides a standard against which all the law applied by the court should be tested. This is sweeping language, which, as drafted, could apply to all three categories in Article 21. For instance, if the court decides that certain provisions of the Elements of Crimes or the Rules of Procedure and Evidence are not compatible with the standards set out > in paragraph 3 of Article 21, it would not have to apply them. The provision also lays down special rules of interpretation for Article 21.[250]

[248] Note that the ICC Statute does not contain an explicit provision entitled 'the right to a fair trial', but many aspects of this right are regulated in several provisions of the ICC Statute. One could hereby think, for instance, of Art. 64, para. 2 ("The Trial Chamber shall ensure that a trial is fair and expeditious and is conducted with full respect for the rights of the accused and due regard for the protection of victims and witnesses"), Art. 67 (entitled 'Rights of the accused') and Art. 69, para. 4 ("The Court may rule on the relevance or admissibility of any evidence, taking into account, inter alia, the probative value of the evidence and any prejudice that such evidence may cause to a fair trial or to a fair evaluation of the testimony of a witness, in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence") of the ICC Statute.

[249] Edwards 2001, p. 372. See also Gallant 1999, p. 707 (also writing on this right): "[T]he Court must apply all internationally recognized human rights relevant to its activities [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Hafner and Binder 2004, p. 172: "[A]ny discriminatory application of the Statute would be prevented by paragraph 3. Furthermore, the measures designed to implement the duties arising from the Statute have to be taken with due respect for human rights. In other words, an arrest or a house search of a suspect will have to be guided by the relevant human rights standards (i.e. the right to privacy), even if these are not explicitly mentioned in the Statute [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

Although Arsanjani in 1999 was still uncertain about this paragraph's exact scope (see the words "could" in the above-mentioned quotation), Pellet (in 2002) is more confident. After having referred to part of the above-mentioned quotation by Arsanjani, Pellet states: "Nothing then, should prevent the Court from refusing to apply an Element of Crimes, a Rule of Procedure and Evidence, or even a provision of its Statute, if its application were considered to infringe an 'internationally recognized human right'."[251] This is because the words of paragraph 3 indicate that "these 'internationally recognized human rights' take precedence over all other applicable rules [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[252] Pellet explains in that context that the > formal hierarchy created between the sources of applicable law is overlaid by another substantial hierarchy between the applicable norms: some are superior to others, not by reason of their formal source, but due to their subject-matter or their veritable substance [emphasis in original, ChP].[253]

In that sense, the previously explained correlation between the different parts of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute should be re-assessed. (This was also the reason not to discuss paragraph 3 in the context of paragraph 1 for it would unnecessarily complicate matters at that stage.) After all, part (a) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute must be interpreted and applied in accordance with the internationally recognised human rights of paragraph 3. That means that one would have to take into account this third paragraph before one could conclude whether or not part (a) of paragraph 1 leaves a legal lacuna which must be filled by parts (b) and (c).[254] In other words, one would have to take one additional step, the [250] Arsanjani 1999, p. 29.

---

[251] Pellet 2002 A, p. 1080.

[252] Ibid. See also Sluiter 2002 C, p. 46.

[253] Pellet 2002 A, p. 1077. See also Vasiliev 2009, pp. 214-215: "Norms falling under internationally recognized human rights and the non-discrimination principle remain valid at all stages of the law determination process under Article 21(1), no matter what source they are derived from. These norms defy the 'hierarchy of sources', since their applicability is not dependent on the category of sources indicated in Article 21(1)(a) to (c). As vigilant 'watchdogs' entrusted with a task to ensure order within the boundaries of the ICC legal regime, the standards specified in Article 21(3) prevail, by virtue of higher normative force, over any other applicable norm of the ICC law, by shaping the manner in which it must be interpreted and applied. In this sense, the said standards are 'extra-hierarchical' [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Cf. also Bitti, referring to Pellet, who is of the opinion that para. 3 constitutes a material source of law (as opposed to the formal sources of law as can be found in para. 1). See Bitti 2009, pp. 287-288. See also ibid., pp. 293-294. (See also n. 242.)

[254] See also the following words from the Al Bashir case: "[T]he consistent case law of the Chamber on the applicable law before the Court has held that, according to article 21 of the Statute, those other sources of law provided for in paragraphs (1)(b) and (1)(c) of article 21 of the Statute, can only be resorted to when the following two conditions are met: (i) there is a lacuna in the written law contained in the Statute, the Elements of Crimes and the Rules; and (ii) such lacuna cannot be filled by the application of the criteria of interpretation provided in articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention on consistency test of paragraph 3, in examining part (a) of paragraph 1. However, that also means that if there are certain rules of customary international law (part (b)) or general principles of law (part (c)) which can be seen as representing internationally recognised human rights (paragraph 3), these rules already become relevant in examining the law of part (a), namely as part of the consistency test of paragraph 3 with which part (a) must comply. Put another way, one can still be of the opinion that part (b) can only be looked to if part (a) has left a legal lacuna, and that part (c) will only be examined if parts (a) and (b) have brought no relief, but this correlation is only valid to the extent that parts (b) and (c) do not represent internationally recognised human rights. If they do, they become part of paragraph 3 and thus of the examination of part (a) of paragraph 1. In the same vein, and returning to the words of Verhoeven: if his words must be interpreted to mean that parts (a) and (b) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute ought to be considered together and that part (b) will supersede part (a) in the case of conflict, unless it was the specific intention of the drafters that part (a) be inconsistent with part (b), this position may still be valid, but not if the norms of part (b) can be seen as internationally recognised human rights. If that were the case, then part (b), 'coloured' by paragraph 3, would take precedence, even if this would go against the intention of the drafters.[255]

Hafner and Binder, however, disagree with Pellet's view of the 'super-legality'[256] of internationally recognised human rights.[257] They present seven considerations which, according to them, indicate the superiority of the Statute over the Law of the (…) Treaties and article 21(3) of the Statute [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in Darfur, Sudan, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir ("Omar Al Bashir"), 'Decision on the Prosecution's Application for a Warrant of Arrest against Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir' (Public Redacted Version), ICC-02/05-01/09, 4 March 2009, para. 44.) See also ibid., para. 126.

---

[255] Cf. on this issue also Vasiliev 2009, p. 214 (following the view of Pellet): "In case of a – at this stage admittedly hypothetical – collision of a statutory norm with a rule of customary law or a general principle of law, the norm originating from the Statute would not prevail over such a rule or principle automatically, solely on the basis of its origin in the Statute. Consideration has to be given to the normative weight of the provision derived from the source other than the Statute, as it may hold a higher position in the normative hierarchy. Specifically in the ICC context, a hallmark of the norms occupying a supreme position in such hierarchy is their subject-matter: more precisely, the pertinence to internationally recognized human rights and non-discrimination principle according to Article 21(3). This Article requires the Court to apply and interpret the law flowing from the sources listed in Article 21(1)(a) to (c) in the manner consistent with these standards [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[256] See Pellet 2002 A, pp. 1079-1081.

[257] See also Gallant 1999, pp. 702-703: "[I]nternationally recognized human rights are adopted as part of the ICC Statute, and are superior to Rules of Procedure and Evidence adopted under the Statute. They are not stated as superior to the ICC Statute itself. (...) Thus, should there be an explicit inconsistency between a provision of the ICC Statute and an internationally recognized human right, there is no automatic preference for the right." Cf. also Verhoeven 2004, pp. 14-15, arguing the same, but then with respect to the substantive provisions of the ICC Statute, see ibid., p. 15: "[I]t could probably be contrary to the very purpose of the Rome statute to look at its – at least substantial as opposed to procedural or organizational – criminal provisions as not being of a 'general' nature. If this is true, there cannot be an 'automatic' primacy of human rights over those provisions, both having a jus cogens character."

paragraph 3.[258] Although Hafner and Binder, as well as Pellet are of the opinion that this discussion is mainly an academic one as the Statute will not easily contradict internationally recognised human rights,[259] the previous pages have clarified that this may not always be that easy to determine.

The remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention constitutes, of course, an excellent example in that respect. It was argued supra that it is not clear that the drafters of the Statute intentionally deleted the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention from the general right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily. Because of that, it was submitted, part (b) (which includes customary international law and hence the remedy of release) could be applied by the ICC judges, "where appropriate", because part (a) left a legal lacuna. It was also argued that the remedy of release could be applied by the judges if they were of the opinion that parts (a) and (b) had failed to provide an answer to the problem. In that case, the remedy of release could be applied as a general principle of law under part (c) (if the judges are of the opinion that this domestic principle can be transplanted into the context of the ICC).

The information on paragraph 3 has changed this position, however. After all, in interpreting part (a) of paragraph 1 (the right to liberty and security without the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention), the ICC judges must take into account paragraph 3. Assuming for now that the remedy of release can be seen as (part of) an internationally recognised human right (which, given its customary international law/general international law status, appears to be the case, although this will be examined in more detail infra), this entails that the right to liberty and security, as can be found in the ICC Statute, must be interpreted as encompassing the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention. Although this may seem to engender the same outcome as that of the position discussed earlier (where it was said that the remedy of release could be applied as a rule of customary international law or as a general principle of law) this is arguably not the case. After all, the remedy of release from part (b) could only be applied by the judges "where appropriate", if the judges were of the opinion that this solution could be transplanted into the specific context of the ICC. Likewise, the remedy of release as a general principle of law had to be transposed in the international sphere, to use the words of Pellet. That may mean that judges may modify a certain principle from the national level so that it can 'fit' the specific ICC context. Hence, in these two situations, the judges have some freedom of movement with respect to the rules of customary international law/general principles of law. However, that does not seem to be the case with respect to paragraph 3. The law to be applied and interpreted must be in accordance with paragraph 3.[260]

[258] See Hafner and Binder 2004, pp. 173*ff*.
[259] See ibid., p. 173, n. 42 and Pellet 2002 A, p. 1082.
[260] Cf. also Sluiter 2009, p. 463: "The provision (…) posits the view that 'internationally recognised human rights' are applicable fully, and thus need not be 're-interpreted' in light of the unique mandate and context of the ICC. More concretely, the mandatory and specific content of Article 21 (3) of the Statute appears to prevent Judges from adjusting the content of human rights law to the unique ICC-context".

That would mean that the remedy of release, in principle, would have to be applied. Not taking into account for the moment the problems which can be related to this remedy and how these problems are to be solved (this will be discussed infra), this outcome is perhaps not so problematic because this study argued that it was not clearly established that the drafters of the ICC Statute intentionally wanted to delete this remedy. However, matters may turn out to be more complicated if one is of the opinion, on the basis of the information presented in the previous pages, that it was in fact clearly the intention of the drafters to delete this remedy. In that case, one must ascertain which solution takes precedence here: the intention of the drafters (no remedy of release) or the remedy of release pursuant to paragraph 3 (again assuming for now that this remedy can be seen as (part of) an internationally recognised human right). In that case, one may either follow Pellet (whose approach would lead to the remedy of release) or Hafner and Binder (whose approach would not lead to the remedy of release).[261]

Returning now to the seven considerations presented by Hafner and Binder, the first is that "[t]he literal interpretation of Article 21(3) can be seen as expressing the primacy of the ICC Statute".[262] Although it is true that paragraph 3 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute does not explicitly mention the superiority of the human rights, it does state that the interpretation and application of the ICC law (including the Statute) must be consistent with internationally recognised human rights, thereby apparently granting a higher status to human rights. The second consideration has to do with the formulation and the structure of Article 21 of the ICC Statute. Hafner and Binder state:

> If the drafters had wanted to introduce a super-legality of human rights, they would have had to draft Article 21 in a different way. For instance, the drafters could have made the consistency of the applicable law with human rights a precondition for its application by the Court. (i.e. with the formulation: "subject to its consistency with human rights, the Court shall apply […]"). Furthermore, if a super-legality of human rights had been intended, it would have been more sensible to place the duty to comply with them at the beginning of Article 21 rather than simply adding a paragraph 3.[263]

This is not very convincing. It may be true that the phrase should have been formulated differently and placed at the beginning of Article 21 of the ICC Statute if a 'super-legality of human rights' was intended (although one could even doubt that),[264] but this in no way prejudices the above-mentioned meaning of the present

[261] According to Sluiter, practice is not clear yet, although the provision does not seem to be used as a corrective tool for the ICC Statute: "Looking at the practice of the ICC, one has difficulty assessing the effect of Article 21 (3) of the Statute. In my view, it tends to be used to confirm provisions and practice in place; any corrective force cannot (yet?) be discerned." (Ibid., p. 464.)
[262] Hafner and Binder 2004, p. 174.
[263] Ibid.
[264] It is arguably not that strange to first explain what the law is and then to explain how this law should be interpreted and applied.

phrase, which is formulated as it is and which is placed at the end of Article 21 of the ICC Statute.

The third consideration explains that in several cases in the ICC Statute, such as Article 69, paragraph 7[265] and Article 17, paragraph 2,[266] > international human rights standards are directly referred to in the Statute on an equal footing and have the same status in the hierarchy of norms as the Statute itself. In fact, these provisions would not be necessary, if the superiority of human rights were established by Article 21(3).[267]

Although this is undoubtedly true, it may be that Hafner and Binder have perhaps too much faith in the internal consistency of the Statute, a treaty whose different parts were drafted by different working groups. It may very well be that these inconsistencies are only drafting inaccuracies which do not bring with them the meaning argued by Hafner and Binder.[268]

The fourth, and more convincing, consideration argues that "the ICC Statute establishes an extensive and well considered set of rules and mechanisms to achieve its object and purpose"[269] and that "[i]f one allows a notion as imprecise as "internationally recognized human rights" to trump the Statute, the sophisticated mechanism of the Statute seems at risk [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[270] It is indeed true that the ICC Statute is quite sophisticated – note, however, the possible drafting inaccuracies mentioned above – and that "the entire Statute demonstrates an effort to restrain the margin of appreciation of the judges to the greatest possible extent [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[271] Nevertheless, it must also have been clear to the drafters that they could not foresee every detail by which the ICC judges

---

[265] "Evidence obtained by means of a violation of this Statute or internationally recognized human rights shall not be admissible if: (a) The violation casts substantial doubt on the reliability of the evidence; or (b) The admission of the evidence would be antithetical to and would seriously damage the integrity of the proceedings."

[266] "In order to determine unwillingness [of a State to carry out the investigation or prosecution, ChP] in a particular case, the Court shall consider, having regard to the principles of due process recognized by international law, whether …".

[267] Hafner and Binder 2004, p. 175.

[268] See also Pellet 2002 A, p. 1083: "[T]he Statute bears the mark of the rush with which it was drafted and the process of compromise, which are ominous for its credibility. Some of the formulae finally retained are open to technical criticism, or incoherent. Others are useless." See also n. 192, where Saland explained that a certain provision may not have been the result of legal logic, but rather of political compromise. See further Edwards 2001, p. 343, n. 70: "The divergent backgrounds and relative levels of expertise and experience of Rome Conference delegates contributed to internal inconsistencies in the Rome Statute and its collateral instruments, and contributed to the lack of clarity on various treaty terms". Cf. finally Henquet 1999, p. 986, writing on another inaccuracy in the ICC Statute: "Pursuant to article 59(7), the custodial state is to deliver the person to the ICC when so "ordered." This is confusing because (…) the term 'order' does not feature in Part 9 of the ICC Statute. Perhaps this is the result of the speedy and somewhat isolated negotiations of the Working Group on International Co-operation and Judicial Assistance, and the Working Group on Procedural Matters at the Rome Conference."

[269] Hafner and Binder 2004, p. 175.

[270] Ibid.

[271] Ibid.

could be confronted in the future. Although it seems indeed correct, especially within the context of a criminal court, that judges should first and foremost follow the proper instruments of the ICC, it also seems reasonable that a provision which is in contravention of an internationally recognised human right – on the exact meaning of this concept, see infra – should not be applied by them.

The fifth consideration is more of an exception to the fourth consideration. It states that "an exception exists which results from the inviolability of certain core human rights, namely those considered to constitute peremptory norms of general international law (ius cogens). They trump the provisions of the ICC Statute by their very nature."[272] This point is related to the actual content of the term internationally recognised human rights and will be examined infra.

The sixth observation is a summary of the previous five[273] and the seventh explains that everything referred to above only concerns the Statute as the other rules from Article 21 must indeed be consistent with internationally recognised human rights.[274]

It has probably become clear from the above-mentioned comments with respect to the views of Hafner and Binder that this study is more in favour of Pellet's view. However, the considerations also showed that the meaning of the concept of internationally recognised human rights is still unclear. What can be said on this issue? Pellet explains in this context:

> One cannot help but think, in this respect, of 'peremptory norms of general international law', as defined in Article 53 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. Without doubt, Article 21(3) of the Statute does not give the ICC express jurisdiction to declare null the totality of a treaty, or even one of its provisions, which is contrary to 'internationally recognized human rights', although this would be the effect of a breach of jus cogens under Article 53 of the Vienna Convention. Nevertheless, it creates a sort of international 'super-legality' by clearly authorizing the Court to hold such a norm to be 'ultra vires' and thus inapplicable. This provision is all the more remarkable because it extends the ambit of this 'super-legality' not [272] Ibid. See also Degan 2005, pp. 82-83: "The matter is here not of "super-legality". The matter is only of confirmation of peremptory norms of general international law in that domain, including the principle of non-discrimination. These norms are obligatory for judges in any national or international criminal proceedings, even if they were not expressly provided."

[273] Hafner and Binder 2004, p. 176: "One can conclude from the above and notwithstanding the exception concerning peremptory norms that wording, structure and context of Article 21 indicate a primacy of the Statute."

[274] Ibid., pp. 176-177: "The wording of paragraph 3 (…) suggests that rules that are guiding the application and interpretation of the Statute (as are the Rules of Procedure and Evidence as well as the Elements of Crimes) would be trumped in case of an inconsistency with "internationally recognized human rights". (…) As regards Article 21(1.b) (…) one can easily argue that a treaty inconsistent with human rights should not be applied by the Court. It would simply not be "appropriate" to apply a treaty or a rule of international law contradicting human rights. [It is hard not to agree with this. However, why then would it be possible to apply the Statute (also a treaty) if it would contradict human rights? Would that then be "appropriate"?, ChP.] In the case of Article 21(1.c), the necessary consistency of general principles of law with human rights is established in this provision itself [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

> only to fundamental human rights, traditionally quoted as examples of peremptory rules, but to all internationally recognized human rights [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP].[275]

Although this quotation explains that these rights are not restricted to fundamental human rights/peremptory norms (of general international law)/ius cogens,[276] their exact scope is still not clear. According to Hafner and Binder, who look at both the use of these words in international instruments and their literal interpretation, > [n]o uniform content is attributed to the phrase in international relations. One can however presume that rights considered as peremptory norms as well as [universal, ChP][[277]] customary international law classify as "internationally recognized". The rights stipulated in the major universal human rights instruments (UDHR, CESR, CCPR, CERD, CAT, CEDAW, CRC) enjoy a presumptio iuris of international recognition unless the contrary has been established.[278]

---

[275] Pellet 2002 A, pp. 1080-1081. See for this difference also the already discussed (see Chapter III) American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third, Foreign Relations Law of the United States, 1987, para. 702 ('Customary International Law of Human Rights'), comment under 'm' ('Consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights'): "All the rights proclaimed in the Universal Declaration and protected by the principal International Covenants (...) are internationally recognized human rights, but some rights are fundamental and intrinsic to human dignity."

[276] Cf. also Vasiliev 2009, p. 214, n. 76: "It appears reasonable to argue that jus cogens should also be read into Article 21(3)."

[277] See Hafner and Binder 2004, pp. 186-187, explaining that this term "covers all human rights recognized as universal customary international law. (…) [A] practice has to be accepted as law by the subjects of international law, which could participate in this practice or whose interests are affected. These States should represent the different geographic regions as well as the different socio-political systems of the world although there is no requirement that all States participated in the creation of the norm [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Hence, even though the rights must have universal (and not merely regional) customary international law-status, it is not required that the rights are universally recognised (recognised by all States). See ibid., p. 185: "[P]roposals to use "universal human rights" or "universally recognized human rights" were rejected by either the Preparatory Committee or the Rome Conference as they were considered to be too limiting. Therefore, one can conclude that for a human right to be accepted as "internationally recognized" standard in terms of paragraph 3, recognition by the international community needs to be widespread but not total [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also see Edwards 2001, p. 377: "Article 7(1)(h) and Draft Elements, article 7(1)(h)(3), in reciting a list of anti-discrimination groups or collectivities, might easily have described the groups or collectivities as "internationally recognized" (as in article 21(3)) rather than as "universally recognized." This suggests that "universally recognized" differs from "internationally recognized," and that in fact "universally recognized" reflects a more select group than "internationally recognized," and that proof of "universally recognized" would have a higher threshold than proof for "internationally recognized." (…) [I]t is appreciated that "internationally recognized" is perhaps not be defined as "universally recognized," and that "universally recognized" is the narrower of the two categories [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See finally Bitti 2009, p. 301. Nevertheless, it must also be noted that in para. 38 of ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, the judges used the words "internationally" and "universally" (recognised human rights) interchangeably.

[278] Hafner and Binder 2004, p. 190.

Finally, ICC judge Pikis stated in the Lubanga Dyilo case that "[i]nternationally recognized may be regarded those human rights acknowledged by customary international law and international treaties and conventions".[279]

One could argue that the habeas corpus right, the right to challenge the lawfulness of one's detention and to be released in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, can definitely be seen as an internationally recognised human right. This was already assumed because of its customary international law/general international law status as established in Chapter III of this book, but the above-mentioned observations on the meaning of this specific ICC term do not contradict this.

This – again – means that the ICC judges, if they were to follow the view of Pellet, must apply this remedy, even if it was clearly the intention of the drafters not to grant it. However, as clarified, that problem does not arise here as this study is of the opinion that it cannot clearly be established that it was the intention of the drafters to delete this remedy in the context of the ICC.

This may indeed be the case, but the fact that the remedy of release, in principle, should be applied by the ICC judges does not make the problems which can be related to this over-simplified and pro forma remedy and which were discussed at length in this study suddenly disappear. Because of this, judges, it is submitted, could opt for the solution presented in this research; they could, while realising that this remedy, in principle, has to be respected and thus that remedies must be granted in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, keep the suspect in custody instead and grant proper remedies, depending on the exact circumstances of the case.[280]

They could thereby also rely on the right to an effective remedy, a right which can certainly be seen as an internationally recognised human right. Support for that view can be found in the ICTR Rwamakuba case, in which the judges explained that a right to an effective remedy for violations of human rights "undoubtedly forms part of customary international law"[281] and is expressly provided for in many international human rights instruments.[282] In addition, the judges stated,

---

[279] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Prosecutor's "Application for Leave to Reply to 'Conclusions de la défense en réponse au mémoire d'appel du Procureur'" (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 12 September 2006, Separate opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 3.

[280] The idea that one has, in principle, to respect the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, even if one does not apply this remedy, is important. After all, if one does not even assume that one has, in theory, an obligation to grant the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention first, one will not be very inclined either to grant other remedies replacing that remedy of release (such as a reduction of the sentence or financial compensation). See in that respect also the comments made in the context of the Kanyabashi case, see n. 863 of Chapter VI.

[281] ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007, para. 40. See also M. Federova, S. Verhoeven and J. Wouters, 'Safeguarding the Rights of Suspects and Accused Persons in International Criminal Proceedings', Working Paper No. 27 – June 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: http://www.ggs.kuleuven.be/nieuw/publications/working%20papers/new_series/wp27.pdf), p. 21.

[282] See ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007, para. 40. In more detail: "[T]he Universal

> [r]elying upon international human rights instruments, and particularly the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the Appeals Chamber of this Tribunal has recognized on several occasions [the judges refer here to the cases of Barayagwiza, Semanza and Kajelijeli, ChP][283] that an Accused has a right to an effective remedy [original footnote omitted, ChP].[284]

The judges then concluded that they had the power to grant an effective remedy for human rights violations and that this power arose out of "the combined effect of the Tribunal's inherent powers and its obligation to respect generally accepted international human rights norms".[285]

It was explained at the beginning of this section that internationally recognised human rights, and thus also the granting of remedies for violations, would be applicable whenever the ICC exercises its jurisdiction, whenever the ICC is involved in a specific case, including the actions of third parties working at the behest of the ICC. However, it was also argued that it would even be fairer for the ICC to remedy any violation in the context of its case more generally, whether or not the ICC was involved in the case.

In granting the remedies, the ICC judges should, of course, give proper weight to, among other things, the (seriousness of the) human rights violations which occurred in the case in question and the involvement of the ICC in the violations.[286]

Declaration of Human Rights, the ICCPR, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment, the Convention Concerning Indigenous and Tribal Peoples in Independent Countries, the UN Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power, the ECHR, the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man and the American Convention of Human Rights [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)

[283] See ns. 919, 997 and 1081 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. See also n. 1124 and accompanying text of the same chapter.

[284] ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007, para. 41.

[285] Ibid., para. 45. See also ibid., para. 47: "[T]his power is essential for the carrying out of judicial functions, including the fair and proper administration of justice."

[286] Cf. also Sluiter 2009, pp. 470-471. At these pages, Sluiter writes about violations in the context of Art. 59 of the ICC Statute. As argued before, violations in which the ICC (or third parties working at the behest of the ICC) is involved already fall under the scope of Art. 21, para. 3 of the ICC Statute. This means that in such cases, the ICC would be obliged pursuant to this latter provision (which includes the right to an effective remedy) to repair violations. However, even though Sluiter writes about Art. 59 of the ICC Statute, his words at the end of this footnote can arguably also be seen as support for the idea in the main text that the ICC should remedy any violation occurring in the context of its case more generally, whether or not the ICC (or third parties working at its behest) was involved in the violations: "It is self-evident that violations in the application of Article 59 need to be addressed by the Court. Only the latter is in a position to effectively address any violation and has in that respect an obligation to ensure the fairness of the trial as a whole. In itself, this imposes a duty upon the Court to address relevant violations, including those committed by others than organs of the Court. Traditionally, one can identify three compelling reasons to do so: 1. to offer a remedy for violation of rights (cp. Article 85); 2. to prevent future violations, via deterrence; 3. to preserve the integrity of court proceedings. [This (hopefully) reminds the reader of the Barayagwiza case, see n. 849 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. See also n. 171 and accompanying text of Chapter VII, ChP.] These are alternative reasons and depending upon the degree and nature of violation as well as the involvement of actors the Court can

This may then lead to a refusal of jurisdiction (and a 'real' release, cf. the abuse of process doctrine) or to the continuation of the trial and other, less far-reaching remedies such as a reduction of the sentence or financial compensation.[287] This is arguably the fairest solution for the suspect (and also, by the way, for the other interests involved here).[288]

Three points still need to be discussed in this chapter. The first is that the above-mentioned words of Hafner and Binder only refer to truly international treaties. Although one could argue that the rights which can be found in regional instruments (such as the ACHR) and which have been clarified by regional institutions (such as the ECtHR) are to a certain extent also international (namely inter-State) in nature, Hafner and Binder are of the opinion that "[t]he epitheton "international" (...) must be understood as reaching beyond a solely regional recognition. This particular interpretation does not only result from the practice of international negotiations, but also from the global significance of the ICC."[289] Notwithstanding this, one can assume that the ICC will probably also refer to regional treaties and case law from regional supervisory bodies interpreting those regional treaties if these constitute support for the assertion that a certain human right must be seen as internationally recognised or if they shed an authoritative light on how to interpret certain provisions from the ICC instruments.[290] (This also means that all the cases from the human rights supervisory bodies discussed in this book, not only those from the decide how to react. For example, the very fact that there has not been concerted action between the ICC Prosecutor and national authorities may result in the non-applicability of the second rationale, but does not mean that measures should not be taken sub 1 or 3 [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

---

[287] Perhaps, the remainder of the already-mentioned words of Sluiter (see n. 260) may be viewed as support for the idea that the problematic remedy of release may be replaced by other appropriate remedies: "The provision (…) posits the view that 'internationally recognised human rights' are applicable fully, and thus need not be 're-interpreted' in light of the unique mandate and context of the ICC. More concretely, the mandatory and specific content of Article 21 (3) of the Statute appears to prevent Judges from adjusting the content of human rights law to the unique ICC-context; while this offers certain safeguards, a too rigid stance on this matter should be rejected. What matters is not that human rights cannot be re-interpreted, but that this exercise should be conducted on adequate reasons, cautiously and not by definition result in a loss of protection." (Sluiter 2009, p. 463.)

[288] As explained earlier, the right to a fair trial can definitely be seen as an internationally recognised human right under para. 3 of Art. 21 of the ICC Statute. See in that respect the remainder of the already-mentioned (see n. 279 and accompanying text) words of Judge Pikis in the Lubanga Dyilo case: "Internationally recognized may be regarded those human rights acknowledged by customary international law and international treaties and conventions. The right to a fair trial belongs to this class of rights." (ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Prosecutor's "Application for Leave to Reply to 'Conclusions de la défense en réponse au mémoire d'appel du Procureur'" (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 12 September 2006, Separate opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 3.) See also Verhoeven 2004, p. 14.

[289] Hafner and Binder 2004, pp. 187-188.

[290] Cf. also Sluiter 2002 C, p. 46: "Given the universal aspiration of the Court, it first and foremost includes universal human rights law, such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), the Convention against Torture (CAT), and the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CROC). Regional human rights treaties play in principle a less prominent role, but may be applied in practice frequently, because of the highly developed character of certain regional human rights systems, such as the ECHR."

HRC, but also from, for example, the ECmHR and ECtHR, may become relevant for the ICC judges under this provision.) In fact, it seems that the ICC has already adopted this stance.[291] One very interesting example in that respect[292] is the [291] See also Bitti 2009, p. 301: "It seems that the jurisprudence of the Court has given a broad meaning to "internationally recognized human rights". It has relied heavily on the jurisprudence of regional courts such as the European Court of Human Rights and the Inter American Court of Human Rights, and also on resolutions adopted by the United Nations General Assembly." See also Sluiter 2009, p. 466.

[292] However, there are more examples. See, for example, ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Warrants of Arrest, Article 58' (Under Seal, Ex Parte, Prosecution Only), ICC-01/04-01/07, 10 February 2006 (see Annex 2 to ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Court Record not available, confidential document, ICC-01/04-02/06, 10 February 2006), paras. 11-12: "In the Chamber's view, the review which article 58 (1) of the Statute requires that the Chamber undertake is consistent with the fact that, apart from other collateral consequences of being the subject of a case before the Court, the fundamental right of the relevant person to his liberty is at stake. Accordingly, the Chamber emphasises that it will not take any decision limiting such a right on the basis of applications where key factual allegations are fully unsupported. As required by article 21 (3) of the Statute, the Chamber considers this to be the only interpretation consistent with the "reasonable suspicion" standard provided for in article 5 (1) (c) of the European Convention on Human Rights and the interpretation of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in respect of the fundamental right of any person to liberty under article 7 of the American Convention on Human Rights [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, para. 38, where the judges use the words "internationally" and "universally" (recognised human rights) interchangeably and even introduce a new term, namely 'indispensable right of man': "Like every other article of the Statute, article 82 must be interpreted and applied in accordance with internationally recognized human rights, as declared in article 21 (3) of the Statute. Is a right to appeal against every decision of a hierarchically subordinate court to a court of appeal, or specifically an interlocutory decision of a criminal court to the court of appeal, acknowledged by universally recognized human rights norms? The answer is in the negative. Only final decisions of a criminal court determinative of its verdict or decisions pertaining to the punishment meted out to the convict are assured as an indispensable right of man. This is reflected in article 14 (5) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and many regional conventions and treaties giving effect to universally recognized human rights norms. This right is assured to the accused under article 81 of the Statute [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Prosecutor's "Application for Leave to Reply to 'Conclusions de la défense en réponse au mémoire d'appel du Procureur'" (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 12 September 2006, Separate opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, paras. 3 and 6, ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Decision on the Applications for Participation in the Proceedings of VPRS1, VPRS2, VPRS3, VPSR4, VPSR5 and VPRS6' (Public Redacted Version), ICC-01/04, 17 January 2006, paras. 81, 115-116, 131, 145-146, 161, 172 and 182, ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Application for the interim release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 18 October 2006, pp. 5-8 and ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the confirmation of charges' (Public Redacted Version with Annex I), ICC-01/04-01/06, 29 January 2007, para. 38 (referring to case law of the ECtHR): "To define the concept of "substantial grounds to believe", the Chamber relies on internationally recognised human rights jurisprudence." See finally ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the confirmation of charges' (Public Redacted Version), ICC-01/04-01/07, 30 September 2008, para. 65 (referring to the above-mentioned decision of 29 January 2007 in the Lubanga Dyilo case): "In the Decision on the following statement of Judge Pikis in his separate opinion to a(nother) decision from the Lubanga Dyilo case:

> Article 21 (3) of the Statute ordains the application and interpretation of every provision of the Statute in a manner consistent with internationally recognized human rights. Internationally recognized human rights in this area, as may be distilled from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and international and regional treaties and conventions on human rights, acknowledge a right to an arrested person to have access to a court of law vested with jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the lawfulness and justification of his/her detention. Such a right is afforded to the arrestee from the outset [emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP].[293]

These words can not only be seen as evidence for the above-mentioned idea that regional human rights treaties may also be relevant in the context of paragraph 3,[294] but also as additional evidence for the idea that a person arrested/detained is entitled to challenge the lawfulness of his detention[295] and, in principle (but see: supra), to be released in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, even though the remedy of release is not explicitly mentioned here by Pikis.[296] This is so, even if the proper instruments of the ICC do not explicitly contain this right.

Confirmation of Charges ("the Lubanga Decision") in the case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo ("the Lubanga case"), the Chamber relied on internationally recognised human rights jurisprudence for its interpretation of the evidentiary standard of "substantial grounds to believe" in accordance with article 21(3) of the Statute. In the current case, the Chamber sees no compelling reason to depart from its application of the standard as established in the Lubanga case".

[293] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"' (Public Document), [ICC-]01/04-01/06 (OA 7), 13 February 2007, Separate Opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 16.

[294] See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Prosecutor's "Application for Leave to Reply to 'Conclusions de la défense en réponse au mémoire d'appel du Procureur'" (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 12 September 2006, Separate opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 3, where Judge Pikis refers to the UDHR, ICCPR, ECHR, ACHR and ACHPR to argue that "[t]he extent to which the right to a fair trial has been proclaimed as a legal norm and its incorporation in international instruments denotes comprehensive assent to its emergence as a principle of customary international law [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also Verhoeven 2004, p. 14, commenting on para. 3: "[T]hose rights normally are the rights listed in the universal or regional treaties protecting human rights, to the extent at least that they have a customary (general) character [emphasis added, ChP]."

[295] See also n. 201 of the previous chapter. (ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the powers of the Pre-Trial Chamber to review proprio motu the pre-trial detention of Germain Katanga' (Urgent, Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 18 March 2008, p. 8: "[A]ccording to articles 55, 57 and 67, one of the functions of the Chamber is to be the ultimate guarantor of the rights of the Defence, including the right "not to be deprived of his or her liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established in the Statute"".)

[296] But see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"' (Public Document), [ICC-]01/04-01/06 (OA 7), 13 February

The second point which still needs to be addressed here is the following. In the examination of paragraph 3, the problem with respect to the remedy of release was discussed. The real male captus problem was not examined as it could be argued – this may already have become clear from information provided earlier in this book – that there is no internationally recognised right to a male captus male detentus outcome. Notwithstanding this, paragraph 3 may still become relevant for the real male captus problem, namely for its human rights dimension. As explained at the beginning of this section, judges may look to paragraph 3, not only with respect to specific provisions of part (a), but also with respect to the more general provisions which are always applicable to any ICC case (such as Article 1 of the ICC Statute). Thus, they may be of the opinion that any exercise of jurisdiction, whenever the ICC is involved in a case, that exercise of jurisdiction, that involvement must be in conformity with internationally recognised human rights. Although there is no internationally recognised human right to a male captus male detentus outcome, judges may nevertheless be of the opinion that serious violations of other internationally recognised human rights, such as the right to liberty and security and the right to a fair trial broadly perceived, should lead to a refusal of jurisdiction nonetheless. In that case, part (a), interpreted and applied consistently with paragraph 3, may already solve the problem, in which case there would be no need to resort to parts (b) and (c) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute. However, it must also be understood that this would 'only' cover the human rights dimension of the male captus issue, an issue which clearly goes beyond that dimension. (Recall the other values which can be violated by a male captus situation, such as State sovereignty and the rule of law.)

The third and final point that should be mentioned here is what happens if the judges cannot decide the case on the basis of Article 21 of the ICC Statute. What if paragraph 1, interpreted and applied consistently with paragraph 3, leaves a legal lacuna and subsequently resorting to paragraph 2, again interpreted and applied consistently with paragraph 3, brings no relief either? What should the judges do in such a case of non liquet?[297] Should the judges permit a certain rule advocated by either the Defence or the Prosecution, stating that it can be allowed now that it is not prohibited? Or should they opt for a more restrictive approach, arguing that it is prohibited, now that it is not allowed? This is not very clear. However, perhaps, the 2007, Separate Opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 16, ns. 19 and 20. In these footnotes, which can be connected to the words "international [footnote 19] and regional [footnote 20] treaties" in the main text, one will find references to the entire Artt. 9 of the ICCPR and 5 of the ECHR (and other regional provisions on the right to liberty and security). Cf. also n. 286 of the previous chapter. (ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the admissibility of the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la confirmation des charges" of 29 January 2007 (…)' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 OA8, 13 June 2007, para. 13: "The human right [and then the ICC judges refer to Artt. 21, para. 3 of the ICC Statute, 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR, 5, para. 4 of the ECHR and 7, para. 6 of the ACHR, ChP] of a person to have recourse to judicial review of a decision affecting his liberty is entrenched in article 60 of the Statute [original footnote omitted, ChP].") fact that the Appeals Chamber has stated (see also supra) that one can only resort to part (b) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute if part (a) is not exhaustive on a certain matter may mean that it is more in favour of the restrictive approach.[298]

---

[297] See also Vasiliev 2009, pp. 228-229.

Be that as it may, one can also assume that a non liquet will not occur too often, given the extensive regulation of the law within the ICC's proper instruments. This is especially so if one agrees with the argument made above that one should also apply and interpret the more general provisions of the ICC Statute (such as its Article 1) consistently with internationally recognised human rights. And if that brings no relief, one can always resort to the safety net of parts (b) and (c) of paragraph 1 and finally to paragraph 2 (all interpreted and applied consistently with paragraph 3).

Now that the law which the ICC judges must apply in deciding their cases has been examined in detail, it is time to determine the current ICC position on the male captus issue. This will be done in the next chapter, the final chapter of this part of the book.

[298] See ibid., p. 229.

CHAPTER X
FINDING THE CURRENT ICC POSITION ON THE MALE CAPTUS ISSUE

1 INTRODUCTION

In this chapter, the current ICC position on the male captus issue will be sought. Section 2 will deal with arguably the most authoritative case of the ICC, that of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, which relates to the situation in the DRC. The third section will address the allegations of irregularities in the surrender of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, a case stemming from the situation in the CAR. In this case, the allegations were less serious and the male captus issue less prominent in the discussions, meriting a briefer examination of the case. Finally, Section 4 will examine the (aftermath of the) male captus allegations of Germain Katanga, whose case also pertains to the situation in the DRC. Admittedly, the examinations of the cases of Lubanga Dyilo and Katanga are quite extensive, closely following the original texts of the different motions/responses/observations/decisions, but this can be explained by the fact that in this chapter, the two main subjects of this book, the male captus topic and the ICC context come together. This deserves more detailed examination, especially now that in only those two cases, the male captus topic played a major role.

2 LUBANGA DYILO

Already in the very first case in which a suspect was surrendered to the ICC, that of Lubanga Dyilo, a(n alleged) male captus problem occurred. On 10 February 2006, Pre-Trial Chamber I of the ICC issued a sealed warrant of arrest against Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, charging him with the war crime of enlisting children under the age of fifteen, the war crime of conscripting children under the age of fifteen and the war crime of using children under the age of fifteen to participate actively in hostilities.[1] After a request for his arrest and surrender (dated 24 February 2006)[2]

[1] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Warrant of Arrest' (Under seal), ICC-01/04-01/06, 10 February 2006, p. 4.

[2] See CPI, La Chambre Préliminaire I, Situation en République Démocratique du Congo, Affaire Le Procureur c/ Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Demande d'arrestation et de remise de M. Thomas Lubanga was sent to the authorities in the DRC on 14 March 2006, Lubanga Dyilo was formally arrested within the context of the ICC proceedings on 16 March 2006 and surrendered to The Hague the following day. However, by that time, he was already in custody. Lubanga Dyilo claimed that had been illegally deprived of his liberty by the Congolese authorities from as early as August 2003. In more detail, counsel for Lubanga Dyilo asserted on 23 May 2006:

> Mr Thomas Lubanga Dyilo travelled to Kinshasa in July/August 2003 in connection with the policy of reconciliation and integration of the political forces in Ituri into national politics at the invitation of the national government and the international community. Nonetheless, he was deprived of his liberty when he arrived in Kinshasa and was placed under house arrest from 13 August 2006[3] and prohibited from leaving the town. No arrest warrant was issued against him. No order was issued in this respect.[4]

Counsel continued, stating that two years later, on 2 March 2005, Lubanga Dyilo was imprisoned at the Centre pénitencier/pénitentiaire[5] et de rééducation de Kinshasa.[6] Here also, irregularities allegedly occurred:

> No arrest warrant was served on him at that time or subsequently. Two supposed "arrest warrants" appear in the case-file: - the document dated 19 March 2006[7] for "endangering national security", bearing no confirmation of receipt signature, - the document dated 29 March 2006[8] for "murder and unlawful detention followed by torture," bearing no confirmation of receipt signature (…)[.] During his detention in the DRC, he did not appear before an auditeur militaire each month, as required by military law, or where appropriate, quod non.[9]

Dyilo adressée à la République Démocratique du Congo' (Sous scellés), ICC-01/04-01/06, 24 février 2006.

[3] This must be: 13 August 2003, see ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Application for Release' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 23 May 2006, para. 9.

[4] Ibid., para. 3.

[5] Although the Defence writes pénitencier here, the organs of the ICC use the term pénitentiaire, see, for example, n. 371 and accompanying text.

[6] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Application for Release' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 23 May 2006, para. 3.

[7] Given the fact that by that time, Lubanga Dyilo was already in The Hague, this date is obviously incorrect. It must be 19 March 2005, see also ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Submission of Further Information and Materials' (Under Seal, Ex Parte, Prosecutor Only), ICC-01/04-01/06, 25 January 2006, para. 3: "The detention file on Thomas LUBANGA DYILO contains the DRC arrest warrants against him of 19 March 2005 and of 29 March 2005."

[8] See the previous footnote.

[9] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Application for Release' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 23 May 2006, para. 3.

According to Lubanga Dyilo's counsel, these points, namely Lubanga Dyilo's "arbitrary detention with no judicial examination phase against him"[10] and the "fact that he was never heard by any Congolese court",[11] were repeated when Lubanga Dyilo appeared on 16 March 2006 before the representative of the Auditeur Général des FARDC (Forces Armées de la République Démocratique du Congo: the DRC armed forces), the Premier Avocat Général des FARDC/of the DRC armed forces (in the context of the ICC surrender proceedings).[12] The allegations were, however, very swiftly rejected by the Premier Avocat Général the same day:

> - [A]s regards the arbitrary detention, that such was warranted by the existence of serious, grave and corroborating indicia against the accused and the risk that he might abscond; - that if he was not heard by any Congolese court it was because his case was still investigated by the state prosecution officer [emphasis in original, ChP];[13]

The fact that the Premier Avocat Général/Auditeur Général of the DRC armed forces looked into these allegations (even if only briefly) shows that the review of the competent judicial authority in the context of Article 59 of the ICC Statute may not be restricted to the correctness of the official ICC arrest procedures, but may also include the domestic phase prior to the official ICC arrest. That is to be welcomed. After all, it may very well be the case that this part must be seen as falling within the context of an ICC case and it is important that every alleged violation which took place in that context is considered and, if needed, remedied.

After having provided the above-mentioned background information, counsel for Lubanga Dyilo turned to the merits of his case. He divided this part of the application in three sections: 1. Unlawful detention in the DRC prior to 16 March 2006 (paragraphs 8-20 of the application), 2. Violations of the Rome Statute (paragraphs 21-23 of the application) and 3. Violations of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (paragraphs 24-29 of the application).

With respect to the first section, he maintained that the above-mentioned irregularities in the DRC had brought about a number of violations of (inter)national

---

[10] Ibid., para. 6.

[11] Ibid. See also the arguments of Lubanga Dyilo's counsel Flamme during Lubanga Dyilo's initial appearance before the ICC on 20 March 2006 (the transcripts of this session are available at: http://www.amicc.org/docs/Lubanga%20Arraignment.pdf): "We have to realise that my client has been deprived of his liberty since August 2003. He has been confined to forced residence in Kinshasa, and following that he was incarcerated on the date which is in the record. If I remember correctly, in March 2005. I questioned my client concerning the conditions in which he was arrested and deprived of his liberty and incarcerated. I was informed that this arrest was not under any specific warrant and that no hearing was held such as should have been held according to national and international standards, and therefore he was kept incarcerated for approximately one year without having right -- access to any trial and without having been informed of any of the charges held against him." (P. 9 of the document.)

[12] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Application for Release' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 23 May 2006, para. 6.

[13] Ibid.

law provisions, such as Articles 17,[14] 18[15] and 19, paragraph 2[16] of the Congolese Constitution,[17] Article 9 of the ICCPR[18] and Articles 5 and 6 of the ECHR.[19]

In this context, counsel for Lubanga Dyilo interestingly (see also footnote 395 and accompanying text of Chapter III and footnote 202 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII) turned to the topic of derogation, maintaining "that there existed no situation within the DRC (insofar as it existed in Kinshasa at the time, quod non) that justified suspending the legal safeguards against arbitrary arrests and unlawful detention".[20]

Counsel then turned to the violations in more detail, some of which were mentioned earlier.[21] It was also emphasised that it had been unlawful to bring Lubanga Dyilo before the military judicial authorities because he was "president of the UPC (Union des Patriotes Congolais) political party"[22] and "was never a soldier (…) in the official Congolese army or, insofar as it is relevant, in the FPLC [Forces Patriotiques pour la Libération du Congo, ChP]".[23] According to him, this had led to a violation of the right to a fair and impartial trial, a violation which had not

[14] "A person's individual freedom shall be guaranteed. This shall be the rule and detention shall be the exception. A person may be prosecuted, arrested, detained or convicted only under the law and in the forms which [it] provides [emphasis in original, ChP][.]" (Ibid., para. 8.)

[15] "Any person arrested must be informed forthwith of the reasons for his arrest and of any charges against him in a language which he understands. He must be informed of his rights forthwith. Any person kept in police custody shall have the right to contact his family or lawyer immediately. The period spent in police custody may not exceed 48 hours. Upon expiry of this period, any person in custody must be released or made available to the competent judicial authority [emphasis in original, ChP]." (Ibid.)

[16] "All persons shall be entitled to have their case heard by a competent judge within a reasonable time [emphasis in original, ChP][.]" (Ibid.)

[17] Counsel for Lubanga Dyilo also referred to violations of the Congolese Code of Criminal Procedure, see ibid., para. 11.

[18] See ibid., para. 8.

[19] See ibid., para. 13.

[20] Ibid., para. 8.

[21] See ibid., para. 9: "The applicant was not informed of the grounds for his arrest (…) when he was deprived of his liberty on 13 August 2003 or when he was imprisoned on 2 March 2005. No warrant of arrest was served on him. No case file was made available to him. No judicial examination was conducted. He was not therefore informed of the grounds for his arrest or of the charges against him. He was kept in detention arbitrarily for over 18 months. [These 18 months probably refer to his alleged arbitrary deprivation of liberty before his detention (between 13 August 2003 and 2 March 2005) and not to his alleged arbitrary detention, which 'only' lasted for about a year, ChP.] Furthermore, the applicant was not brought before the competent judicial authority within the 48 hour time-limit." It was also maintained that "the two supposed arrest warrants" (ibid.) (see also ns. 7-9 and accompanying text) did not change this, see ibid.: "[E]ven if the documents entitled "arrest warrant" are considered valid and as having been served upon the applicant, note must be taken of the fact that the charges are not clearly set out therein: - the two arrest warrants specify completely different charges which, furthermore, also differ from those specified in the documents entitled "decision on extension of provisional detention" in which "genocide" and "crimes (…) against humanity" are stated; - the two supposed arrest warrants do not set out any facts. It follows that the applicant was never informed of the charges against him or of the reasons for those charges."

[22] Ibid., para. 10.

[23] Ibid.

suddenly disappeared now that the ICC had taken over the case.[24] Counsel argued that even if Lubanga Dyilo had to be brought before the military authorities, these military proceedings were nonetheless characterised by many irregularities.[25]

He concluded this section of the application, stating that because of his arbitrary arrest and unlawful detention at the national level, Lubanga Dyilo should have been released in the DRC.[26] Now that this had not happened, his subsequent surrender to the ICC also had to be considered unlawful.[27] What mattered greatly to the Defence was also the fact that the ICC "took into consideration the possibility that the applicant had been arbitrarily arrested and that he might subsequently be released".[28] In other words, the Defence claimed that the ICC issued the arrest warrant against Lubanga Dyilo, among other things, because it was aware of the possibility that Lubanga Dyilo was indeed arbitrarily arrested/detained at the national level and that that could lead to his release. According to the Defence, this was "tantamount to saying that the ICC did not meet its obligations as set out in this application, that is, to ensure that arrests and detentions effected under national law are lawful".[29] It must be noted that it is, of course, primarily the obligation of the arresting/detaining State to ensure that arrests and detentions are executed in accordance with national law.[30] Nevertheless, as explained earlier, as one can assume that the national review of Article 59 of the ICC Statute may not always be very thorough, it would be wise for the ICC, as an extra safety net, to supervise the legality of the national proceedings in that respect. In fact, it would not only be wise,[31] it would arguably even be mandatory if the arrest/detention were seen as falling within the context of the ICC's investigation (see Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute:[32]

---

[24] See ibid.: "The subsequent referral of his case-file to the ICC cannot "cleanse" the proceedings and "wash away" the initial violations of the right to a fair and impartial trial."

[25] See ibid., paras. 14-19. To provide a few examples, it was argued that no order was issued by the auditeur militaire to restrict his liberty on 13 August 2003 (see ibid., para. 15), that "the commander of the unit of which the applicant is alleged to be a member (quod non) was not kept informed" (ibid.), that no arrest warrant was served on him (see ibid., para. 16), that the so-called arrest warrants (see again ns. 7-9 and accompanying text) were "not dated with the day of the arrest but with a latter date" (ibid.) (note that in this paragraph, the application confusingly states that the date of arrest was 2 March 2006, instead of 2 March 2005), that he "did not appear before the auditeur militaire each month, as should have been the case" (ibid., para. 17), that no investigation was carried out (see ibid.), that "the extension of detention on remand was not authorised by the competent court and no hearing was held nor any order issued in this respect" (ibid., para. 18) and that the 16 March 2006 hearing was out of time and carried out before an incompetent court (see ibid., para. 19).

[26] See ibid.

[27] See ibid.

[28] Ibid., para. 20.

[29] Ibid.

[30] See Art. 59, para. 1 of the ICC Statute: "A State Party which has received a request for provisional arrest or for arrest and surrender shall immediately take steps to arrest the person in question in accordance with its laws and the provisions of Part 9." See also Art. 89, para. 1 of the ICC Statute: "States Parties shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Part and the procedure under their national law, comply with requests for arrest and surrender."

[31] See also n. 201 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.

[32] "In respect of an investigation under this Statute, a person: (…) Shall not be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention, and shall not be deprived of his or her liberty except on such grounds and in applicable as from the initiation of the investigation) or if the ICC were otherwise involved in that arrest/detention (see Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute: applicable as from the moment the ICC gets involved in the case). These provisions arguably demand such a supervisory role. With respect to the last provision, it is worth recalling (see Section 4 of the previous chapter) that Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute undoubtedly contains the right to an effective remedy. Hence, it can be argued that Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute prescribes that the final adjudicator, the ICC, ensures that violations which occur as from the moment the ICC is involved in a case are remedied.

With respect to the second section (violations of the Rome/ICC Statute), counsel for Lubanga Dyilo claimed, not very surprisingly (see supra), that Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute was violated; according to the Defence, this was in fact acknowledged by the Congolese judicial authorities.[33] Furthermore, the Defence was of the opinion that because the ICC's Prosecutor had decided to disregard this unlawfulness, the formal ICC arrest had to be considered illegal as well.[34]

Alongside Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute, it was argued that "a flagrant violation"[35] of Article 59, paragraphs 1-3 of the ICC Statute had occurred.[36] Finally, Article 89, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute had allegedly been violated.[37] accordance with such procedures as are established in this Statute." This provision arguably entails that the ICC has an obligation to repair violations of the suspect's right to liberty and security which take place in the context of an ICC's investigation, violations which by definition take place at the national level. However, although this provision will cover most part of an ICC case, it is submitted that the ICC should go one step further and also accept responsibility for violations which more generally occur in the context of an ICC case. After all, Art. 55, para. 1 (d) of the ICC Statute 'only' speaks of rights "[i]n respect of an investigation". However, situations may occur which, strictly speaking, cannot be seen as falling within the ICC investigation, but which are nevertheless to be seen as falling more generally within the context of the ICC case and as such should be considered by the judges. One could hereby think of the irregular arrest and detention of a person about whom the arresting authority has stated for years that this person ought to be tried by the ICC and that it will hold the suspect in detention until the ICC makes a move. If the ICC indeed consequently starts an official investigation and requests the surrender of the person, the ICC judges may be of the opinion that the irregular arrest and detention has to be seen as falling within the context of the ICC case, even if the investigation, at the time of the irregular arrest and detention, was not yet officially initiated. Cf. also Hall 2008 A, p. 1093: "The chapeau of paragraph 1 states expressly that it applies "[i]n respect of an investigation". However, it is likely that the Court will hold that the fundamental rights recognized in article 55 para. 1 apply at other stages of proceedings and even before an investigation is opened, including during a preliminary examination."

---

[33] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Application for Release' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 23 May 2006, para. 21. See also ibid., para. 19.

[34] See ibid., para. 21.

[35] Ibid., para. 22.

[36] See ibid.: "- the applicant was not arrested in accordance with its laws, - he did not appear before the competent judicial authority, - the authority before which he appeared disregarded the fact that the applicant had not been arrested according to the normal procedure, in spite of the fact that this was acknowledged in the reasons given in its order, - that same authority failed to have regard for the fact that the applicant's rights had not been respected. One of the direct consequences of the fact that the applicant did not appear before the competent authority in accordance with the procedures laid down is

With respect to the third section (violations of the ICC RPE), counsel for Lubanga Dyilo argued that Rules 117, paragraph 1[38] and 121, paragraph 1[39] of the ICC RPE had been violated.

Regarding the first rule, the Defence claimed that the ICC had not fulfilled its duty in ensuring that Lubanga Dyilo's detention in the DRC was lawful and that it had not verified "the lawfulness of the proceedings relating to the arrest and detention of the applicant in the DRC". As stated above, one can easily argue that the ICC should indeed be the final supervisor of the legality of a suspect's arrest and detention, at least as from the moment the ICC is involved in a case. However, whether this assumed task can be derived from Rule 117, paragraph 1 of the ICC RPE, which, among other things, only states that the ICC "shall take measures to ensure that it is informed of the arrest", seems doubtful. The Defence also claimed that this rule was violated because Lubanga Dyilo had only received a copy of the request for arrest and surrender and not a copy of the arrest warrant.[40] A copy of the actual arrest warrant was allegedly only received on 17 March 2006, when Lubanga Dyilo had already been transferred out of the DRC.[41] Because of that, he was no longer in a position "to be apprised of the charges brought against him by the ICC and to exercise all the rights set down, in particular, in article 89 (2) of the Statute and rule 117 before departure from his national territory [emphasis in original but bold and underlined emphasis changed into italicised emphasis, ChP]".[42]

Regarding the second rule, the Defence claimed, among other things, that Lubanga Dyilo had "been detained for more than two months without being informed promptly of the cause of the charges against him".[43] As a result, Article 67 of the ICC Statute, via Rule 121 of the ICC RPE, had been violated.[44]

In the penultimate section of the application, the Defence returned to the violations which occurred in the DRC. It explained that the ICC Prosecutor had to be held responsible that this made it impossible for him to request provisional release before his country's courts [emphasis in original but bold and underlined emphasis changed into italicised emphasis, ChP]."

---

[37] See ibid., para. 23.

[38] "The Court shall take measures to ensure that it is informed of the arrest of a person in response to a request made by the Court under article 89 or 92. Once so informed, the Court shall ensure that the person receives a copy of the arrest warrant issued by the Pre-Trial Chamber under article 58 and any relevant provisions of the Statute. The documents shall be made available in a language that the person fully understands and speaks."

[39] See n. 201 of Chapter VIII for the contents of this provision. Note that the title of the paragraphs addressing this violation speaks about Rule 11 of the ICC RPE but this is clearly a mistake, see ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Application for Release' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 23 May 2006, para. 29. (This is, by the way, not the first error/unclear point in this application.)

[40] See ibid., para. 26.

[41] See ibid.

[42] Ibid.

[43] Ibid., para. 29.

[44] See ibid. See also n. 201 of Chapter VIII.

> for the extended period the applicant spent in arbitrary detention in the DRC, in compliance with article 55 (1) (d) of the Statute and further to his failure to intercede in the DRC. This holds all the more true since he was aware that he would apply to the Court for the applicant's arrest. Moreover, the ICC clearly has the duty not to endorse or assist in the violation of fundamental rules of international law.[45]

It further explained, with reference to the Loizidou case from the ECtHR,[46] that Article 1 of the ECHR "imposes upon member states a general obligation to protect the relevant rights of all persons under their jurisdiction"[47] and that "[t]he Court's case-law may be applied by analogy to the present instance insofar as the ICC takes the view that the matter came under its jurisdiction only as of the date the applicant was transferred to The Hague".[48]

Moreover, the Defence referred to Article 12 ('Aid or assistance in the commission of an internationally wrongful act') of (an older version of) the previously alluded to[49] ILC's draft articles on the responsibility of international organisations,[50] and argued that > since the ICC's mandate as set down in the statute encompasses the prevention of crime, the Court may not simultaneously punish crimes such as unlawful detention and deprivation as war crimes and crimes against humanity and yet draw advantage from the "fruits" of the applicant's unlawful detention.[51]

This is, again, a view one can adhere to, but one can question to what extent Article 12/13[52] of the draft articles on the responsibility of international organisations can be seen as support for that position. After all, is taking advantage of a certain situation the same as aiding or assisting in its irregularities?[53]

Not very surprisingly, the Defence in this context also referred to the Barayagwiza case and its dictum that under the abuse of process doctrine, it is

---

[45] Ibid., para. 30.
[46] Cf. also n. 369 of Chapter III.
[47] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Application for Release' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 23 May 2006, para. 31.
[48] Ibid., para. 33.
[49] See n. 483 of Chapter VI.
[50] This article reads: "An international organization which aids or assists a State or another international organization in the commission of an internationally wrongful act by the State or the latter organization is internationally responsible for doing so if: (a) That organization does so with knowledge of the circumstances of the internationally wrongful act; and (b) The act would be internationally wrongful if committed by that organization." (Note that this Art. 12 has become Art. 13 in the 2009 document mentioned in n. 483 of Chapter VI.)
[51] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Application for Release' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 23 May 2006, para. 32.
[52] See n. 50.
[53] Cf. also the discussion with respect to the acknowledgment and adoption test, see Subsection 3.3.3 of Chapter III.

irrelevant which entity is responsible for the violations of the suspect's rights.[54] However, in doing so, it did not explain how this doctrine can be incorporated into the system of the ICC/Article 21 of the ICC Statute, see the previous chapter. This important point will be returned to infra.

In the final section of the application, the conclusions, the Defence emphasised the importance of the presumption of innocence and again referred to the Barayagwiza case. Finally, it requested the release of Lubanga Dyilo. It is not entirely clear whether the release requested here must be seen as a release with prejudice to the Prosecutor; the reference to the Barayagwiza case can be seen as support for such a remedy, but in the application, one can also find references to less far-reaching releases.[55]

This lack of clarity with respect to the remedy also became apparent when the Pre-Trial Chamber asked the Defence to which State Lubanga Dyilo had to be released if he were to be granted interim release.[56] Although Lubanga Dyilo's application does not clarify whether the remedy requested is a release or a release with prejudice to the Prosecutor, it is also clear that the remedy requested was in any case not an interim release. In that respect, the Pre-Trial Chamber's request shows that Lubanga Dyilo's application was not read/understood correctly. This point was also clarified by the Defence when it, in response to the Pre-Trial Chamber's request, made clear that the remedy requested was not an interim release, but a release based on Rule 185 of the ICC RPE (see on this rule also the text following footnote 86 and accompanying text of the previous chapter).[57] However, also in this response, the exact sort of release requested (with prejudice or not) was not elucidated.

On 13 June 2006, Deputy Prosecutor Bensouda filed her response to Lubanga Dyilo's application for release. She also noted that the application was not a request for interim release. According to her, it rather seemed to be a challenge to the ICC's jurisdiction,[58] "based on the alleged illegality of Thomas LUBANGA DYILO's prior detention in the DRC and of the process of his arrest for and surrender to the

[54] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Application for Release' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 23 May 2006, para. 33.

[55] See ibid., para. 20: "The applicant should have been released in the DRC before being lawfully arrested in accordance with current DRC legislation for the purposes of the international arrest warrant [emphasis added, ChP]." Note that such a release may encompass a pro forma release – in that Lubanga Dyilo is released and immediately re-arrested by the authorities. Such a remedy should, of course, be avoided. (This point was already often made earlier in this book.) Note finally that in the context of the ICC, there does not exist a term like 'international arrest warrant', see n. 127 of Chapter VIII.

[56] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Order on the application for release' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 29 May 2006.

[57] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Submission relative to the Order of 29.5.2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 31 May 2006.

[58] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Application for Release' (Public Formatted and Redacted Version), ICC-01/04-01/06, 13 June 2006, para. 6.

Court [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[59] and pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute,[60] an article which has already been predicted will play a role within the male captus discussion, see footnote 141 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII. (Bensouda correctly clarified the fact that Rule 185 of the ICC RPE only deals with the procedure after the ICC has decided to release the suspect and that it does not constitute, in itself, a basis for release.)[61]

Turning to the merits of the case, she first looked at the alleged illegality of Lubanga Dyilo's arrest and detention in the DRC.

She opined "that the information on the duration of Thomas LUBANGA DYILO's alleged house arrest and subsequent detention in the DRC is, at the very least, misrepresenting the facts".[62] According to her, the allegation that Lubanga Dyilo had been deprived of his liberty since 13 August 2003 was "both unsubstantiated and factually incorrect",[63] among other things, because "the evidence and information available to the Prosecution shows that he throughout 2003 and 2004 was able to move freely and to communicate, without restrictions, with whomever he wanted, including individuals within the UPC and the FPLC [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[64] It was further argued that he was only placed "under various forms of house arrest for about two weeks immediately prior to 19 March 2005",[65] the date of his arrest.

With respect to the proceedings in the DRC as from 19 March 2005, the Prosecution was "aware of the criticism expressed by international NGOs in relation to the DRC proceedings, including, inter alia, in respect of Thomas LUBANGA DYILO".[66] See in that respect, for example, the following words from Human Rights Watch, writing about the "poorly functioning judicial system"[67] of the DRC:

> In some of the few cases where justice has been pursued, authorities have failed to observe international standards of due process. In February and March a number of influential armed group leaders from Ituri were arrested in Kinshasa following the killings of nine U.N. peacekeepers. Several of those arrested, including Thomas Lubanga, Floribert Njabu[[68]] and Germain Katanga,[[69]] were accused by Human Rights Watch and others of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Authorities

[59] Ibid.
[60] See ibid., para. 7.
[61] See ibid.
[62] Ibid., para. 8.
[63] Ibid., para. 9.
[64] Ibid.
[65] Ibid., para. 10.
[66] Ibid., para. 12, n. 35.
[67] Human Rights Watch, 'Democratic Republic of Congo. Elections in sight: "Don't Rock the Boat"?', 15 December 2005 (available at: http://www.hrw.org/legacy/backgrounder/africa/drc1205/drc1205.pdf), p. 14. See also ibid., p. 16, where Human Rights Watch writes about the "absence of a functioning judicial system" and the "absence of an independent and effective judiciary".
[68] One can expect that Njabu, if he is brought before the ICC one day, will raise similar allegations as Lubanga Dyilo.
[69] Not very surprisingly, Katanga also argued that his arrest and detention in the DRC were illegal when he was brought before the ICC, see Section 4 of this chapter.

> arrested several of them without charge and held them for weeks before bringing any charges against them, in clear violation of Congolese legal procedures. By early December, they had been in detention for ten months but there has been no effort to bring them to trial [original footnote omitted, ChP].[70]

However, the Prosecution, which had already referred to these words as supporting material to convince the Pre-Trial Chamber of the urgency of issuing an arrest warrant (because these alleged irregular circumstances could lead to Lubanga Dyilo's release),[71] stated that on the basis of the official information,[72] "there was (…) and still is no reason to believe that the arrest and detention of Thomas LUBANGA DYILO in the DRC was illegal".[73] According to this official information, there was a legal basis for the proceedings against Lubanga Dyilo and Lubanga Dyilo was informed of the allegations which led to his arrest.[74] That may, of course, be true, but neither should one forget that this official information is also one-sided, namely information provided by the DRC authorities.[75] One can imagine that these authorities will not readily admit that their own proceedings were conducted in an irregular way. It is therefore a pity that the Prosecution did not try to determine, with help of the information provided by Human Rights Watch, what really happened to Lubanga Dyilo in the DRC, especially now that it did use this 'unofficial' information from Human Rights Watch for another purpose, namely to convince the Pre-Trial Chamber of the urgency of issuing an arrest warrant against Lubanga Dyilo.

Be that as it may, the Deputy Prosecutor submitted that even if violations of DRC law had occurred, these could not be attributed to the ICC and thus could not

---

[70] Human Rights Watch, 'Democratic Republic of Congo. Elections in sight: "Don't Rock the Boat"?', 15 December 2005 (available at: http://www.hrw.org/legacy/backgrounder/africa/drc1205/drc1205.pdf), p. 15.

[71] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Submission of Further Information and Materials' (Under Seal, Ex Parte, Prosecutor Only), ICC-01/04-01/06, 25 January 2006, para. 11.

[72] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Application for Release' (Public Formatted and Redacted Version), ICC-01/04-01/06, 13 June 2006, para. 12: "The knowledge of the Prosecution in respect of the reasons for and details of Thomas LUBANGA DYILO's detention in the DRC prior to his arrest for and surrender to the Court was determined by and limited to the information contained in the NOTE SYNOPTIQUE SUR ETAT DE LA PROCEDURE-DOSSIER DE L'ITURI of 10 August 2005 (NOTE SYNOPTIQUE), the copy of the DRC file on Thomas LUBANGA DYILO's detention, and discussions with representatives of the DRC authorities [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[73] Ibid.

[74] See ibid.

[75] This is clear with respect to the DRC file on Lubanga Dyilo's detention and the discussions with representatives of the DRC authorities, but also with respect to the 'Note Synoptique' of 10 August 2005, which was signed by DRC Brigadier General Joseph Ponde Isambwa, see ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the confirmation of charges' (Public Redacted Version with Annex 1), ICC-01/04-01/06, 29 January 2007, para. 195.

impact on the legality of the ICC arrest, surrender and detention.[76] For example, she rejected the allegation that the ICC had failed to intercede in the DRC, had endorsed and assisted in the violation of fundamental rules of international law and taken advantage of the alleged male captus;[77] in this context, she also refused to accept the analogy to, for example, the Loizidou case of the ECtHR as support for the idea that the ICC is under a duty to investigate the legality of Lubanga Dyilo's arrest and detention in the DRC.[78] As explained earlier, such a duty would only exist from the moment the ICC was involved in the case. Nevertheless, it is submitted that the ICC should go beyond that reasoning and should supervise any violation which occurs in the context of its case more generally. That is the only way to prevent a suspect from becoming the victim of his proceedings being fragmented over two or more jurisdictions.

The Deputy Prosecutor then went on to reject the Defence's assertion[79] that both the OTP and the Pre-Trial Chamber had considered the illegality of Lubanga Dyilo's arrest and detention in the DRC.[80] She explained that "[b]oth the Prosecution and the Pre-Trial Chamber had indeed reason to believe that Thomas LUBANGA DYILO could be released in the near future",[81] and that "[t]his belief was based on the fact that the local investigations against him turned out to be very difficult",[82] but that this consideration "had no bearing on the legality of Thomas LUBANGA DYILO's arrest and detention in the DRC".[83] That may indeed be true, but one can question whether this is what the Defence had asserted in the first place. After all, the Defence had only argued that "the Chamber took into consideration the possibility that the applicant had been arbitrarily arrested and that he might subsequently be released [emphasis added, ChP]".[84]

Subsequently, the Deputy Prosecutor stressed the fact that the arrest and detention of Lubanga Dyilo before 14[85]/15[86]/16[87] March 2006 could not be attributed to the ICC as follows:

---

[76] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Application for Release' (Public Formatted and Redacted Version), ICC-01/04-01/06, 13 June 2006, para. 11.
[77] See ibid., para. 13.
[78] See ibid., n. 43.
[79] See ibid., para. 14.
[80] See ibid.
[81] Ibid.
[82] Ibid.
[83] Ibid.
[84] See n. 28 and accompanying text.
[85] The day the ICC's Registrar transmitted the request for arrest and surrender to the Procureur Général de la République, see ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, p. 7.
[86] The day the Auditeur Général des FARDC was notified of the request for arrest and surrender (which was sent to him by the Procureur Général de la République on 14 March 2006, see ibid.).
[87] The day Lubanga Dyilo was arrested in the context of the ICC proceedings.

> [T]he arrest and detention of Thomas LUBANGA DYILO in March 2005 was not triggered by a request or any other involvement of the OTP, nor had the OTP or any other organ of the Court prior to the notification of the Auditeur Général des FARDC (…) of the DRC pursuant to Article 87 of the Statute on 15 March 2006 made a request to keep Thomas LUBANGA DYILO in custody. Thus, given that (1) Thomas LUBANGA DYILO was not arrested and detained in the DRC "at the behest of"[88] the OTP and, consequently, (2) that he was not in the Court's "constructive custody"[89] prior to his arrest and surrender on 16 March 2006, the alleged violation of the rights of Thomas LUBANGA DYILO cannot be attributed to the OTP or the Court [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[90]

First of all, it is interesting to note that the Deputy Prosecutor apparently recognises a point which was already argued before in this study,[91] namely that if violations occur in the context of constructive custody/during arrest/detention at the behest of the ICC (hence executed by third parties), these violations can be attributed to the ICC, even if, strictly speaking, third parties were responsible for them. That is to be welcomed: one can indeed assert that the ICC must take the general responsibility for violations which occur in those contexts. Furthermore, one can also agree with the Deputy Prosecutor that if the ICC were otherwise involved in the irregularities (for example, prior to the official constructive custody), such irregularities can also be attributed to the ICC. Nevertheless, involvement of the ICC is arguably only one situation which can lead to legal attribution. One could also think of conduct of third parties acknowledged and adopted by the ICC as its own, see Subsection 3.3.1 of [88] Here, the Prosecution referred to the first decision in the ICTR case of Barayagwiza and explained that the Defence's reliance on this case was misplaced as it had "neglected the fundamental differences in respect of the underlying facts between the case of The Prosecutor vs. Barayagwiza and the instant case: Barayagwiza's detention in Cameroon from 4 March 1997 until his transfer to the ICTR's Detention Unit on 19 November 1997 was triggered by an official request of the ICTR Prosecutor [emphasis in original, ChP]." (ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Application for Release' (Public Formatted and Redacted Version), ICC-01/04-01/06, 13 June 2006, para. 15, n. 45.) There are, of course, indeed important differences between these two cases, but as earlier explained in Part 3 of this book, the ICTR arguably also took responsibility for violations which occurred even when Barayagwiza was not detained at the behest/in the constructive custody of the ICTR, see n. 857 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. (Moreover (and from a more factual point of view), it should neither be forgotten that Barayagwiza was also held at the behest of the ICTR before 4 March 1997, namely between 17 April 1996 and 16 May 1996, see ns. 824-825 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.) The Prosecution also referred here to paras. 30 and 33 of the Rwamakuba decision of 12 December 2000. This reference is arguably more convincing as the Rwamakuba case seems to be less far-going on this issue than a case like Barayagwiza, see Subsections 3.1.6 (within the discussion of the Karadžić case), 3.2.4 (within the discussion of the Rwamakuba case itself) and 5.1 (within the context of the Duch case). See also n. 170 of Chapter VII.

---

[89] Here also, the Prosecution referred to the Barayagwiza case. Like this study (see the final words of n. 829 and n. 855 of Chapter VI), the Prosecution apparently views the concepts of 'detention at the behest of' and 'in the constructive custody of' as equal concepts.

[90] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Application for Release' (Public Formatted and Redacted Version), ICC-01/04-01/06, 13 June 2006, para. 15.

[91] See the text following n. 830 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

Chapter III and footnote 484 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. In addition, it can be argued that the fact that a male captus cannot be legally attributed to the ICC does not mean that it should not act upon it. The ICC should follow the reasoning of, for example, the Barayagwiza case and should supervise any violations which occur in the context of its case more generally, whether or not the violations can be legally attributed to it. An example often discussed is the kidnapping by private individuals, bringing a suspect, of whom it was clear to some that the ICC was interested, into the jurisdiction of the Court. In such a case, the male captus cannot be attributed to the ICC, for example, because it did not commit the abduction itself, because it was not otherwise involved in the abduction, because it had not yet officially initiated the investigation, because it did not acknowledge or adopt the abduction of its own, because it cannot be seen as an arrest/detention at the behest/request of the Court, etc. However, notwithstanding this, the male captus can arguably be seen as falling within the context of the Court's case more generally. Deterrence, the integrity of the proceedings and simple fairness towards the suspect[92] demand that in such a case, the male captus is considered and properly remedied by the final prosecuting forum (of course, taking into account that the male captus cannot be legally attributed to it).

Finally, the Deputy Prosecutor argued that even if the alleged irregularities at the national level could be attributed to the ICC (quod non), the requested remedy, release, was disproportionate to the violations.[93] In this context, she referred to the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić, the second decision of the ICTR Appeals Chamber in Barayagwiza and the 31 May 2000 decision of the ICTR Appeals Chamber in Semanza, explaining "that the jurisprudence of the ad hoc Tribunals requires that the violation of the rights be of "egregious nature" for the extraordinary remedy of release to be granted [emphasis in original, ChP]".[94] This shows again (see footnote 58 and accompanying text) that the Prosecution viewed the requested remedy as a bar to the exercise of jurisdiction/as a male detentus remedy/as a release with prejudice to the Prosecution remedy.

Now that the alleged illegality of Lubanga Dyilo's arrest and detention in the DRC prior to the ICC arrest had been addressed, the Deputy Prosecutor looked at the allegation that violations had occurred in the context of the proceedings based on Article 59 of the ICC Statute. She maintained that Lubanga Dyilo was arrested and surrendered to the ICC in compliance with all the requirements; in particular, the proceedings were held before the competent judicial authority of the DRC, the [92] See n. 849 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. See also n. 171 and accompanying text of Chapter VII and n. 286 of the previous chapter.

[93] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Application for Release' (Public Formatted and Redacted Version), ICC-01/04-01/06, 13 June 2006, para. 16.
[94] Ibid., n. 47.

Auditeur Général, and Lubanga Dyilo had been served with, among other things, a copy of the arrest warrant in the DRC on 16 March 2006.[95]

Finally, it was argued that no violation of Article 67, paragraph 1 (a) of the ICC Statute had occurred because Lubanga Dyilo had been comprehensively informed of the charges against him.[96]

The Defence subsequently requested, and was granted, the possibility to react on the Prosecution's observations. In its confidential 'Conclusions en réplique à la réponse du Procureur à la demande de mise en liberté' of 10 July 2006, the Defence argued "that the Application for Release is grounded, on the one hand, on article 55 (1) (d) juncto article 85 of the Statute, and, on the other hand, on the inadmissibility of the case against Thomas Lubanga Dyilo".[97]

On 13 July 2006, Pre-Trial Chamber I considered "that in the various documents submitted to the Chamber regarding the Application for Release, the Defence has resorted to a variety of procedural remedies".[98] As a result, it ordered the Defence "to make clear which procedural remedy it is using for the Application for Release of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo".[99]

The response of the Defence was filed on 17 July. In this document, the Defence re-characterised its application as a challenge to the jurisdiction of the ICC[100] (as was already assumed by Deputy Prosecutor Bensouda in her response of 13 June 2006 to Lubanga Dyilo's application for release, see footnote 58 and accompanying text). In doing so, the Defence again referred to the Barayagwiza case and repeated (see footnote 54 and accompanying text) the relevance of the abuse of process doctrine, without again, however, clearly explaining how this doctrine fits the system of the ICC:[101]

> The application of the doctrine of "abuse of process" consists of making the Court state that it declines to exercise its jurisdiction in proceedings where continuing to exercise this competence and jurisdiction in relation to violations of the Accused's fundamental rights would cause irreparable damage to the integrity of the judicial process. For the reasons previously set out, the Court, within the context of its supervisory powers, could not endorse a violation of the Accused's fundamental [95] See ibid., para. 17. See for more information with respect to the point that proceedings were held before the competent authority ibid., para. 18 and for more information with respect to the point that Lubanga Dyilo had been served with an arrest warrant in the DRC ibid., paras. 19-20.

[96] See ibid., paras. 21-22.
[97] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, p. 3.
[98] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Order relating to the Application for Release' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 13 July 2006, p. 3.
[99] Ibid., p. 4.
[100] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Submissions Further to the Order of 13 July 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 17 July 2006, para. 8.
[101] See the text following n. 54 and accompanying text.

> rights by continuing to exercise its jurisdiction over him. In this respect, the Court no longer has personal jurisdiction over the applicant. Since the Court must reject the Prosecutor's criminal proceedings in their entirety, release is also essential under this current challenge to jurisdiction [original footnote omitted, ChP].[102]

After this, the DRC and the victims presented their observations on this matter (and, not surprisingly, requested the ICC to reject the application).[103] Although the observations of the DRC are confidential and hence cannot be discussed here,[104] those of the victims are not and are indeed very interesting. The legal representatives of the victims first of all indirectly showed their adherence to a strict male captus bene detentus view.[105] For example, they argued that "[a]n irregularity that was committed at the time of the arrest or detention of an accused person should not have any consequence on the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court [emphasis added, ChP]"[106] and that

> [n]o provision of the Statute states that the Court will lose its jurisdiction over such a person, even if that person was arrested or detained illegally, or even arbitrarily, which should cause any challenge to jurisdiction based on an irregularity committed at the time of the accused's arrest or detention to be rejected [emphasis added, ChP].[107]

---

[102] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Submissions Further to the Order of 13 July 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 17 July 2006, paras. 8-9.

[103] Note that in contrast to, for example, the context of the ICTY and ICTR, victims have a much greater role to play in the context of the ICC. See, for example, Fernández de Gurmendi and Friman 2002, pp. 312-324.

[104] Some general information can, however, be found in ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, p. 4, where the judges explain that the DRC requested the ICC "(i) to deny the Defence challenge to the jurisdiction of the Court on the ground that the said challenge has no legal basis; (ii) to reject the Defence assertion based on the alleged illegal detention of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo in the DRC; (iii) to reject the Defence assertion concerning the irregularities surrounding the arrest and surrender to the Court of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo; and (iv) to declare the Defence Application for Release admissible but without merit and thereby dismiss the request". See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 6: "The DRC (…) maintained that Mr. Lubanga Dyilo was brought before the judicial authorities having competence in the matter of enforcement of the warrant of the Court and that the process followed was the one ordained by law."

[105] See also ns. 119 and 121 and accompanying text.

[106] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Observations of Victims a/0001/06, a/0002/06 and a/0003/06 Regarding the Challenge to Jurisdiction Raised by the Defence in the Application of 23 May 2006' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 24 August 2006, para. 7.

[107] Ibid., para. 9.

It is, of course, true that the ICC Statute does not contain any explicit provisions in that respect, see also the previous chapter of this book, but the more interesting question is obviously whether an article such as Article 21 of the ICC Statute may nevertheless provide some direction in that respect.

The legal representatives then turned to the two main aspects of the case, namely 1) the alleged illegal detention of Lubanga Dyilo in the DRC before 16 March 2006 and 2) the alleged irregularities related to the ICC arrest and surrender pursuant to Article 59 of the ICC Statute.

A few interesting observations which are related to the first aspect and which should be mentioned here are the fact that the legal representatives stressed the limited scope of Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute[108] – see on this matter also footnote 32 and accompanying text – and that "an illegal detention under national law is not necessarily arbitrary detention within the meaning of article 55 or article 9 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights [emphasis in original but bold emphasis changed into italicised emphasis, ChP]".[109]

With respect to this last point, it may be instructive to refer back to footnote 216 of Chapter III of this book where "one of the most important interpretations of "arbitrary" [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[110] (from the 1964 UN Committee's 'Study of the Right of Everyone to be Free from Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, and Exile') was presented:

> Arrest or detention is arbitrary if it is (a) on grounds or in accordance with procedures other than those established by law or (b) under the provisions of a law, the purpose of which is incompatible with the right to liberty and security of person [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[111]

This means that arbitrariness is broader than illegality and that an arrest which, strictly speaking, is not unlawful may nevertheless be seen as arbitrary (namely if the law on which it is based is in itself incompatible with the right to liberty and security).[112] However, this interpretation also clarifies the fact that an illegal arrest/detention can also be seen as an arbitrary arrest. After all, "[a]rrest or detention is arbitrary if it is (a) on grounds or in accordance with procedures other than those established by law".[113]

---

[108] See ibid., paras. 13-15.
[109] Ibid., para. 16.
[110] Marcoux, Jr. 1982, p. 366.
[111] See n. 216 of Chapter III.
[112] See also Hall 2008 A, p. 1096, commenting on Art. 55, para. 1 (d) of the ICC Statute: "The prohibition in the second part of paragraph 1 (d) is independent of the prohibition in the first part of arbitrary arrest and detention; an arrest or detention made on grounds and in accordance with procedures established by the Statute could still be arbitrary in certain circumstances." Although this statement may also be seen as support for the statement of the legal representatives of the victims that an illegal detention is not necessarily arbitrary (see the words "is independent of"), Hall refers to the 1964 UN Committee's 'Study of the Right of Everyone to be Free from Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, and Exile' as well (see ibid., n. 24), which may mean that he follows the reasoning mentioned in the main text.
[113] See also the final words of n. 216 of Chapter III.

The legal representatives of the victims also referred to the seriousness of Lubanga Dyilo's alleged crimes, arguing that these "are so serious that any violations of the accused's procedural rights could not lead to a straightforward release or stop any proceedings making it possible to determine his responsibility".[114] It can be argued that this view should be resolutely rejected: the fact that Lubanga Dyilo's alleged crimes are very serious does not mean that serious violations of his procedural rights can never lead to the ending of the case. If that were the case, then an abduction of Lubanga Dyilo by the ICC's OTP, accompanied by serious mistreatment – to provide an extreme example – would not lead to the ending of the case either. That would be unacceptable: some male captus cases are so serious that jurisdiction must be refused if the Court wants to be taken seriously as a true institution based on law, whether or not one is dealing with suspects of international crimes.

Interestingly, the legal representatives also referred to the state of emergency in the DRC, an argument which the Defence had earlier rejected, see footnote 20 and accompanying text.[115] In this context, they made the statement that "[i]n a situation of armed conflict, the rules governing the detention of a person accused of war crimes are to be judged more on the basis of the law of armed conflicts, and more specifically the 1949 Geneva Conventions and additional protocols, than on the basis of instruments ensuring human rights".[116] However, it must not be forgotten that human rights law is, in principle, applicable at all times, not only in times of peace, but also in times of war. This is only different if the State has validly derogated from its human rights obligations because of the emergency/war situation, see Chapter III. (Note, furthermore, that some rights, and the right to habeas corpus appears to be one of them,[117] are of a non-derogable status and can thus never be neglected.)

With respect to the second aspect of the case (the one related to the alleged irregularities in the context of the ICC arrest and surrender pursuant to Article 59 of the ICC Statute), the legal representatives noted, among other things, that > the Democratic Republic of the Congo was obligated to deliver the accused to the Court, regardless of the legal or illegal nature of his detention and regardless of whether its domestic legislation was adhered to in the period preceding the issuing of the arrest warrant; it would even have been obligated to arrest him and deliver him to the Court if he had been free or if he had been detained arbitrarily by forces outside the State's control.[118]

---

[114] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Observations of Victims a/0001/06, a/0002/06 and a/0003/06 Regarding the Challenge to Jurisdiction Raised by the Defence in the Application of 23 May 2006' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 24 August 2006, para. 22.
[115] See ibid., paras. 23-27.
[116] Ibid., para. 26.
[117] See n. 426 and accompanying text of Chapter III.
[118] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Observations of Victims a/0001/06, a/0002/06 and a/0003/06

This is another way of saying that notwithstanding any sort of male captus, the suspect must always be surrendered to the ICC. As explained in Chapter VIII, how the exact scope of Article 59 of the ICC Statute is to be seen and what has to be done if the competent judicial authority determines that a suspect was not arrested according to the proper process or that his rights were not respected will depend from State to State. Although there may indeed be States which will always surrender the suspect, notwithstanding irregularities in either the official ICC arrest process or the domestic phase preceding the official ICC arrest, it may also be the case that States, after consultation with the ICC (which is in any case mandatory), will refuse the surrender because of serious irregularities. As also clarified in Chapter VIII, the State's position on the male captus issue may also play a role here. (It was explained earlier that it is obvious that the legal representatives of the victims adhere to the traditional male captus bene detentus position.)[119] Furthermore, States may be of the opinion that certain (less serious) violations demand the release of the suspect. However, as explained earlier, this remedy should be avoided as it can be used as a pro forma remedy, to be immediately followed by a new arrest. In that case, the authorities could claim that the wrong has been repaired by the pro forma release and that the surrender can continue as if nothing had happened.[120] It would be better if national authorities in that case were to surrender the suspect and report the alleged irregularities to the ICC so that the judges in The Hague can accord appropriate and real remedies.

Not surprisingly,[121] the legal representatives also argued that the ICC itself could rely on "the principle of "male captus, bene detentus" which has been consistently applied before international and national courts [original footnotes omitted, ChP]".[122] As has hopefully become clear from this book, such a statement is, of

---

Regarding the Challenge to Jurisdiction Raised by the Defence in the Application of 23 May 2006' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 24 August 2006, para. 29.

[119] See n. 105 and accompanying text. See also n. 121 and accompanying text.

[120] Cf. also ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Observations of Victims a/0001/06, a/0002/06 and a/0003/06 Regarding the Challenge to Jurisdiction Raised by the Defence in the Application of 23 May 2006' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 24 August 2006, para. 32 where the legal representatives of the victims state that Lubanga Dyilo was in fact released at the national level before being arrested in the context of the ICC proceedings, but that he was not actually released: "While Defence Counsel writes in his application that "The applicant should have been released in the DRC before being lawfully arrested in accordance with current DRC legislation for the purposes of the international arrest warrant" it must be noted that this is indeed what happened: if a detainee released by a judicial authority must be arrested for another reason (in the present case, the warrant of the Court), it is not necessary to authorise him to exit the prison in order to arrest him subsequently on the outside, since one order for detention can replace another [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]." As explained, it is indeed wise to avoid the pro forma release, but it should neither be forgotten that negating the pro forma release, and surrendering the suspect, means that it will then be up to the final prosecuting authority, the ICC, to look into the irregularities to avoid the situation that no authority will properly remedy the irregularities. See also n. 55.

[121] See ns. 105 and 119 and accompanying text.

[122] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Observations of Victims a/0001/06, a/0002/06 and a/0003/06

course, far too over-simplified. At the national level, for example, one can also find several male captus male detentus cases. However, these were not mentioned by the legal representatives, who were thus too selective in their choice of male captus case law.[123] As explained earlier, much will depend on the exact circumstances of the case here. In fact, it was submitted that, with respect to certain serious male captus situations, such as an abduction executed by the authorities of the prosecuting forum and followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from the injured State or an abduction executed by the authorities of the prosecuting forum and accompanied by serious mistreatment, State practice indicates that courts will refuse jurisdiction. With respect to the first male captus situation, it was even argued that this is a rule of customary international law. Furthermore, it is true that at the level of the international courts, all the male captus cases ultimately led to a bene detentus outcome,[124] but this does not mean that judges follow the traditional male captus bene detentus maxim in that "a court may exercise jurisdiction over an accused person regardless of how that person has come into the jurisdiction of that court [emphasis added, ChP]".[125] This traditional definition of the maxim has clearly been abandoned. Also in this context, much will depend on the exact circumstances. It is confusing that the legal representatives, on the one hand, refer to the traditional definition of the male captus bene detentus maxim, but, on the other, also (correctly) acknowledge that certain serious situations may nevertheless lead to a refusal of jurisdiction.[126]

Finally, the legal representatives of the victims stated that it was not even necessary to refer to the male captus bene detentus principle as "unlike the situation in the Barayagwiza case, any violations of the accused's rights in the present case are in no way attributable to the Court, not even for a short time, since the accused was in The Hague barely 24 hours after a request for surrender was served in the DRC".[127] However, counsel forget here that Barayagwiza[128] (and the rest of the tribunal male captus case law)[129] acknowledges that judges can refuse jurisdiction

---

Regarding the Challenge to Jurisdiction Raised by the Defence in the Application of 23 May 2006' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 24 August 2006, para. 38.

[123] They only referred to Ker, Frisbie, Alvarez-Machain, Argoud, Barbie and Eichmann, see ibid., n. 21. This is especially remarkable now that they also refer (see ibid., para. 38, n. 20) to paras. 70-93 of the ICTY Trial Chamber's decision in Nikolić, which contain many male captus male detentus cases such as Toscanino, Mackeson, Bennett, Hartley, Levinge, Ebrahim, Jolis and Beahan. Another odd point is that these paragraphs are referred to as support for the assertion that the principle male captus bene detentus has been consistently applied before international courts, whereas these paragraphs, for the most part (paras. 79-93), address national case law. The only cases before international courts mentioned in these paragraphs are Dokmanović and Barayagwiza. However, later in the document, the legal representatives of the victims also refer to cases like Todorović, Semanza, Kajelijeli and Rwamakuba (but strangely not to arguably the most important one, the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić), see ibid., para. 40.

[124] See also ibid., paras. 43-45.

[125] Ibid., para. 38, n. 19.

[126] See ibid., para. 41.

[127] Ibid., para. 46.

[128] See n. 841 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[129] See ns. 88 and 164 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.

under the abuse of process doctrine, irrespective of the entity responsible for the violation. Hence, in very serious cases, the tribunal can refuse jurisdiction, even if the violations could not be attributed to the tribunal. In addition, it was earlier argued that the tribunal should more generally take responsibility for violations which occur in the context of its case, whether or not these violations could be attributed to it and whether or not they were so serious that it would lead to the ending of the case.

The Defence and Prosecution then filed their responses to the observations of the DRC and the victims. Although these responses are confidential, some information on these responses can nevertheless be found in the paragraphs describing this case's background information in the still-to-discuss Appeals Chamber's decision. In those paragraphs, it was explained that > Mr. Lubanga Dyilo submitted that the Prosecutor was privy to his prior illegal detention by the Congolese authorities with a view to facilitating his unimpeded arrest under the warrant of the Court. There was, in his submission, complicity on the part of the Prosecutor in the action of the Congolese authorities to secure his arrest by devious means; shifting thereby the weight of his submission from responsibility of the Prosecutor for acts of the DRC to responsibility attributed to him on account of underhanded dealings with the authorities of that state.[130]

In response,

> [t]he Prosecutor refuted the allegation that he was party to any surreptitious dealings or arrangements with a view to bypassing the legal process or infringing the rights of the suspect or that he connived in any act of ill-treatment of the suspect. He submitted that the process for the enforcement of the warrant before the Congolese authorities followed the path envisaged by law (…) [original footnote omitted, ChP][.][131]

After all the submissions and responses of the participants had been filed, it was finally time for the ICC judges to address their very first male captus case. On 3 October 2006, Pre-Trial Chamber I issued its decision. The judges first of all recapitulated Lubanga Dyilo's two main allegations of this case, namely

> (i) the alleged arbitrary arrest by the DRC authorities on 13 August 2003 and the alleged subsequent illegal detention of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo in the DRC prior to 16 March 2006; and (ii) certain alleged irregularities in the execution of the Court's cooperation request for the arrest and surrender of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo (…) sent to the DRC on 14 March 2006 [original footnote omitted, ChP][.][132]

---

[130] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 6.
[131] Ibid., para. 7.
[132] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the

They then made it clear that Lubanga Dyilo had challenged the ICC's jurisdiction on the basis of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute – an important provision which was discussed at length in Section 4 of the previous chapter but which was not yet explicitly mentioned in the public submissions of the Defence – and the abuse of process doctrine.[133] Furthermore, they explained that Lubanga Dyilo had claimed that, in the context of the execution of the ICC's cooperation request, his rights under Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute, again a crucial provision, see Chapters VIII and IX, had been violated.[134]

Starting with this last point, the judges clarified the fact that the phrase "in accordance with the law of the State" (as can be found in Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute) "means that it is for national authorities to have primary jurisdiction for interpreting and applying national law [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[135] but > that this does not prevent the Chamber from retaining a degree of jurisdiction over how the national authorities interpret and apply national law when such an interpretation and application relates to matters which, like those here, are referred directly back to that national law by the Statute [original footnote omitted, ChP][.][136]

This appears to be a good division of responsibilities, one which leaves room for the previously mentioned idea that national authorities are, of course, the experts when interpreting and applying their own law in determining, for example, whether the person has been arrested in accordance with the proper process and whether that person's rights have been respected but that the ICC should also have a supervising role to play here to ensure that the suspect does not become the victim of the fact that his criminal process is fragmented over two or more jurisdictions and that every violation in the context of an ICC case is ultimately properly remedied.

The judges then explained that the DRC authorities were obliged to determine the points mentioned in Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute in the context of the ICC's request for arrest and surrender, but that there was no obligation for them to look into the lawfulness of the arrest and detention prior to the date this request was sent (14 March 2006) "insofar as that detention was related solely to national proceedings in the DRC".[137] Earlier in this chapter, it was explained that the DRC authorities also looked (albeit only briefly) at Lubanga Dyilo's arrest and detention

---

Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, p. 5.

[133] See ibid.

[134] See ibid.

[135] Ibid., p. 6. Interestingly, the ICC judges referred here to the Barbie (Altmann) case before the ECtHR, see n. 334 and accompanying text of Chapter III. Unfortunately, however, they did not explain what kind of role such case law plays within the context of the ICC, for example, whether it is only used as an authoritative source or whether it may enter the law of the ICC itself pursuant to Art. 21 of the ICC Statute, see the previous chapter.

[136] Ibid., p. 6. The ICC judges referred here to the Winterwerp case, see again (see the previous footnote) n. 334 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[137] Ibid.

related to the national DRC proceedings, prior to the official ICC arrest in the context of Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute and that that stance is to be welcomed for it may very well be that this part must be seen as falling within the context of an ICC case and it is important that every alleged violation which took place in that context is considered and, if needed, remedied. The ICC judges explained that the DRC authorities could indeed review that arrest/detention, even though they were not obliged to do so. The words of the judges also indicate that if the detention was not only related to national proceedings (read: but also to the proceedings of the ICC), the DRC authorities would also have been obliged, under Article 59 of the ICC Statute, to look into the lawfulness of that arrest/detention prior to sending of the request for arrest and surrender on 14 March 2006. This can not only be a reference to an arrest/detention based on an ICC's request for provisional arrest pending presentation of the actual request for arrest/surrender, but also to an arrest/detention in which the ICC was somehow involved and which can somehow be seen as being related to the ICC proceedings, even before the sending of these official requests.

These provisions having been explained in more detail, the judges turned to the specifics of the case. First of all, they concluded that Lubanga Dyilo had been brought before the competent judicial authority of the DRC, the Auditeur Général des FARDC (in this case his representative: the Premier Avocat Général des FARDC),[138] "because he was being detained at that time in relation to national proceedings before the Congolese Military Courts [emphasis added, ChP]".[139] In addition, they opined, "no material breach of article 59 (2) of the Statute can be found in the procedure followed by the competent Congolese national authorities during the execution of the Court's Cooperation Request".[140] Although it indeed appears that, in the context of the execution of the ICC arrest, the procedures were correctly followed and Lubanga Dyilo's rights were respected (see footnote 140 for more details), it would nevertheless have been even clearer had the judges explicitly addressed the points mentioned in Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute, namely that there was no violation of that provision because the competent judicial

[138] See ibid., p. 7.
[139] Ibid., p. 8. See also ibid., p. 7.
[140] Ibid., p. 9. In more detail, "the Premier Avocat Général des forces Armées de la République Démocratique du Congo: (i) notified Thomas Lubanga Dyilo that as of that moment he was under arrest pursuant to an arrest warrant issued by the Court; (ii) provided to Thomas Lubanga Dyilo all materials attached to the Court's Cooperation Request, including (a) a copy of the arrest warrant for Thomas Lubanga Dyilo issued by this Chamber on 10 February 2006, (b) a copy of the Chamber's Decision of 10 February 2006, (c) a copy of the relevant provisions of the Statute and the Rules in a language that Thomas Lubanga Dyilo understands and speaks, including those relating to his rights under the Statute and the Rules; and (iii) informed Thomas Lubanga Dyilo of his right to oppose his arrest under a Court's arrest warrant and his surrender to the Court [original footnote omitted, ChP]". (Ibid., p. 8.) With respect to this last point, the judges also noted "that Thomas Lubanga Dyilo did exercise his right to oppose his arrest under a Court's arrest warrant and his surrender to the Court; and that, prior to confirming Thomas Lubanga Dyilo's arrest and surrender to the Court, the Auditeur Général des Forces Armées de la République Démocratique du Congo ruled on the merits of the grounds put forward by Thomas Lubanga Dyilo in support of his claim [original footnotes omitted, ChP]". (Ibid.)

authority in the DRC had determined that the warrant applied to Lubanga Dyilo, that he had been arrested in accordance with the proper process and that his rights had been respected (and that there was no reason to assume that the competent judicial authority erred in his rulings).[141] In addition, even though the Pre-Trial Chamber seemingly implied that the competent judicial authority must also look into the lawfulness of the arrest and detention prior to the official ICC arrest if that arrest/detention is somehow related to the ICC proceedings (and that it may do so if the arrest/detention was not related to the ICC proceedings), the ICC judges, as the supervisors which must marginally check the determinations of Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute, did not clearly go into that matter themselves. Hence, it is unclear to what extent the ICC judges, under Article 59 of the ICC Statute, would also look into the prior arrest and detention, but one can assume that they would consider that arrest/detention if that arrest/detention could somehow be linked to the proceedings before the ICC. In addition, the Pre-Trial Chamber can be criticised for not discussing provisions which are arguably relevant for the context of Article 59 of the ICC Statute, such as Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute[142] and Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute.[143] These provisions arguably play a role once the ICC has started an investigation (55) and once the ICC is involved in a case (21). That is certainly the case in the context of Article 59 of the ICC Statute.

The judges then turned to the first allegation of Lubanga Dyilo and explained > that the Defence is currently challenging the jurisdiction of the Court by stating that "Article 21 (3) […] vests the Court with the obligation to consider whether its exercise of personal jurisdiction over Thomas Lubanga Dyilo is consistent with such general principles of human rights, or whether, given the serious violations of his human rights, it would be an abuse of process to exercise personal jurisdiction over him in such circumstances" [original footnote omitted, ChP][.][144]

The judges held that, according to Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, > any violations of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo's rights in relation to his arrest and detention prior to 14 March 2006 will be examined by the Court only once it has been established that there has been concerted action between the Court and the DRC authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP][.][145]

---

[141] See also n. 272 and accompanying text.
[142] See also n. 156 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.
[143] Cf. also ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 26 October 2006, para. 40, n. 62 and para. 41.
[144] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, p. 9.
[145] Ibid.

In making this statement, the Pre-Trial Chamber, again without clearly explaining what kind of role such case law plays within the context of the ICC,[146] referred to the ECtHR's case Stocké,[147] the ECmHR's case Barbie[148] and the ICTR cases Semanza and Rwamakuba, these last two as authorities for the idea that the ICTR "has repeatedly stated that the Tribunal is not responsible for the illegal arrest and detention of the accused in the custodial State if the arrest and detention was not carried out at the behest of the Tribunal".[149] Hence, it appears that the Pre-Trial Chamber followed the view of the Deputy Prosecutor mentioned at footnote 90 and accompanying text, namely that the ICC will take its responsibility, first, for violations which occur after the official request has been sent (violations taking place in the constructive custody of the ICC/violations in the arrest/detention at the behest/request of the ICC: Semanza and Rwamakuba)[150] and secondly, for violations which occurred prior to these official requests if these violations stem from concerted action between the ICC and the external authorities (in the case of Lubanga Dyilo: the DRC authorities): Stocké and Barbie. This second situation can be compared with the Prosecutor's words "or any other involvement of the OTP", as in: "[T]he arrest and detention of Thomas LUBANGA DYILO in March 2005 was not triggered by a request or any other involvement of the OTP".[151] In those two situations, the violations can be attributed to the ICC.

That which was said in the context of the Deputy Prosecutor's remarks can also be said here: it is good that both the Deputy Prosecutor and the Pre-Trial Chamber are of the opinion that violations which occur in the context of constructive custody/arrest/detention at the behest/request of the ICC can be attributed to the ICC and will thus be considered. Furthermore, one can also agree with the point that, prior to the sending of the official request, irregularities can be attributed to the ICC/can be considered by the Court if they stem from concerted action between the ICC and third parties. This also accords with the previously made assumption in the context of Article 59 of the ICC Statute that the ICC, as the supervisors marginally checking this provision, would also look at an arrest/detention prior to the official ICC arrest if that arrest/detention was somehow related to the ICC proceedings. This is comparable with the idea that the ICC would look at the arrest/detention prior to the official ICC arrest if the ICC was somehow involved in that arrest/detention/if there was concerted action between the ICC and third parties.

---

[146] See also n. 135.
[147] See n. 384 and accompanying text of Chapter III.
[148] See n. 334 and accompanying text of Chapter III.
[149] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, pp. 9-10, n. 30.
[150] Although Semanza can indeed be seen as a case where the judges stated that they would take responsibility for any violations occurring in the constructive custody/arrest/detention at the behest/request of the Tribunal, Rwamakuba appears to be less far-going than the Pre-Trial Chamber states here as in that case, the judges also opined that they would only focus on certain elements of that constructive custody, see n. 1103 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.
[151] See n. 90 and accompanying text.

However, one should not forget that there are also other situations (besides concerted action) which entail that certain conduct can be attributed to the ICC, for example, if the ICC acknowledges and adopts the conduct of third parties as its own. It is regrettable that this point was not mentioned. In addition, it must be repeated that the fact that a male captus cannot be legally attributed to the ICC does not mean that it should not be considered. The better solution would be if the judges were to take responsibility for any violation which occurs in the context of their case more generally and then, in deciding the kind of remedy, take into account, for example, whether these violations can be legally attributed to the ICC (using all the possibilities in that respect: constructive custody, involvement, acknowledgment and adoption as its own, etc.).

Only this more general view will arguably bring greater flexibility and fairness into a system which is sometimes overly focused on the ultimate remedy: refusal of jurisdiction (male detentus). In that respect, it is to be regretted that the ICC judges restrict the scope of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute to violations in the context of constructive custody and in the context of an arrest/detention which resulted from concerted action between the ICC and third parties. Although this seemingly comports with what Article 21, paragraph 3 requires, see Chapter IX[152] where it was explained that the provision covers any situation in which the ICC is involved, including, for example arrest/detentions executed by national authorities at the behest of the ICC, it was argued in the same chapter that it would be even fairer for the ICC to repair any violations which occur in the context of its case more generally. After all, the judges may always be confronted by violations which, strictly speaking, cannot be seen as falling under the above-mentioned situations but which it would be very unfair not to consider/repair.[153] Again, one can mention abduction by private individuals here. If the judges are of the opinion that, in that situation, internationally recognised human rights were violated, they should be able under Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute to repair these violations. (Cf. also the similar argument made in the context of Article 55 of the ICC Statute.)[154]

This more general reasoning can arguably be found in several tribunal cases, see footnote 170 and accompanying text of Chapter VII. Furthermore, support for this more general reasoning can also be found in the context of the extreme cases; the tribunals have argued that under the abuse of process doctrine, courts may refuse jurisdiction in very serious male captus cases, irrespective of the entity responsible. As submitted before, if the tribunals take the ultimate responsibility for violations which occur in the context of their case (refusal of jurisdiction), irrespective of the entity responsible, they should also do so (more clearly) in the case of less serious violations.[155]

---

[152] See the text following n. 245 and accompanying text of that chapter.
[153] See the text following n. 247 and accompanying text of Chapter IX.
[154] See n. 32 and accompanying text.
[155] Cf. also ns. 1253-1254 and 1280 and accompanying text of Chapter VI (in the context of the Duch decision of 15 June 2009).

Although this last idea is not shared by the Pre-Trial Chamber, it did look at the context of the extreme cases, holding > that whenever there is no concerted action between the Court and the authorities of the custodial State, the abuse of process doctrine constitutes an additional guarantee of the rights of the accused;[156] and that, to date, the application of this doctrine, which would require that the Court decline to exercise its jurisdiction in a particular case,[157] has been confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal[158] [original footnotes omitted, ChP][.][159]

Before going into the merits of this statement, which were briefly discussed in the Duch case, see Chapter VI, it should be said that it should be welcomed that the ICC judges accept the abuse of process doctrine, although it can be maintained that it is unclear how the Pre-Trial judges incorporate this doctrine (and the same goes for the international (criminal) tribunal case law)[160] into the system of the ICC/Article 21 of the ICC Statute.[161] In Chapter IX of this book, it was explained that the reasoning behind this doctrine, namely that courts have the power to refuse jurisdiction in certain serious male captus cases (one should not focus too much on the common law label 'abuse of process' here) can perhaps be seen as a principle/rule of international law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) of the ICC Statute[162] or otherwise as general principle of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute.[163] Because so many courts seem to recognise this power, it could be held that it is an inherent power[164] of any court of law, a point which was made earlier in this study.[165]

---

[156] Here, the judges referred to para. 30 of the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić (see n. 619 and accompanying text of Chapter VI), para. 206 of Kajelijeli (see n. 1047 and accompanying text of Chapter VI) and paras. 70-75 of Dokmanović (see ns. 221 et seq. and accompanying text of Chapter VI).

[157] Here, the judges referred to paras. 74-77 of the first Barayagwiza decision (see ns. 845 et seq. and accompanying text of Chapter VI) and again (see the previous footnote) to para. 206 of Kajelijeli.

[158] Here, the judges referred to the same sources as mentioned in n. 156.

[159] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, p. 10.

[160] See also ns. 135 and 146 and accompanying text.

[161] This point was already raised in the context of the arguments of the Defence, see the text following n. 54 and accompanying text and n. 101 and accompanying text.

[162] See the final text of Subsection 2.3.2.2 of the previous chapter.

[163] See n. 210 and accompanying text of the previous chapter.

[164] Lord Diplock described inherent power/jurisdiction of a court as "the doing by the court of acts which it needs must have power to do in order to maintain its character as a court of justice." (House of Lords, Lord Diplock, Bremer Vulkan v. South India Shipping, 22 January 1981, [1981] A.C. 909, at p. 977.)

[165] See n. 878 and accompanying text of Chapter VI and n. 19 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.

Hence, it could be argued that the ICC also has this inherent power to refuse jurisdiction in very serious male captus cases, irrespective of the entity involved. If the ICC agrees that it has an inherent abuse of process-like power, it should follow the broad abuse of process doctrine of the other international tribunals, which accepts that jurisdiction can be refused, irrespective of the entity responsible. It is submitted that that is the only appropriate abuse of process doctrine for an institution with no police force of its own. However, it is also clear that involvement of the prosecuting forum's own authorities (such as the OTP) is an important element in deciding whether or not a male detentus outcome must follow, cf. the national level and the abuse of process doctrine in that context.

Thus, while recognising that one must be careful with implied/inherent powers in the context of the ICC,[166] it is submitted that even if the judges do not accept that the reasoning behind the abuse of process doctrine can be seen as a principle/rule of international law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) of the ICC Statute or otherwise as a general principle of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute, they may nevertheless be of the opinion that it must be seen as an inherent power of the ICC judges. In the words of Currie:

> The ICC must, like any other court, have the ability to control its own process and to address any abuse of its process – up to, and including, the ability to impose dismissal as a remedy. This is a matter of simple credibility for any court, and goes to basic notions of legality; as Professor Morgenstern wrote many decades ago, "[I]t is the duty of courts to administer the law with an eye not only to the merits of each individual case but also to higher considerations of legality." Both the ICTY and ICTR have invoked such inherent/implied powers, including the ability to remedy abuse of process, though it is not spoken to in their respective Statutes or Rules of Evidence and Procedure [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[167]

As explained in Chapter VI, it is indeed true that the abuse of process doctrine shows that tribunals will refuse jurisdiction in the event of very serious male captus situations, even if the authorities which can be linked to the tribunal in question were not involved in the male captus. However, these situations do not necessarily need to be confined to torture or serious mistreatment. The only real test is that judges can refuse jurisdiction in very serious male captus cases and that it is for them to judge whether the male captus in question is serious enough to refuse jurisdiction. It is obvious that the male captus does not need to be restricted to serious mistreatment/torture-like practices when the tribunal is involved – the first Barayagwiza decision is, of course, the best example of this[168] – but also when the tribunal is not involved in the alleged male captus, the situation on which the ICC is focusing here, it might be possible that judges nevertheless find the male captus serious enough to refuse jurisdiction. One could perhaps think here of an forceful abduction, executed by national special forces, backed up by the peacekeeping force in the area, accompanied by mistreatment inflicted on the suspect (albeit not serious mistreatment) and followed by protests and a request for the return of the suspect from the injured State and condemnations of other States.

[166] See n. 131 of Chapter IX.
[167] Currie 2007, p. 375.
[168] The fact that in the end, the factual outcome of this case was altered in a second decision, does not in any way jeopardise this reasoning.

It may perhaps seem odd, but at this point, it is worth returning to Currie's rugby pitch and his introduction of the term 'lateral' mentioned at the end of Chapter VIII. That chapter clarified that the ICC's cooperation regime has both horizontal and vertical elements and that it is clearly not as vertical as the system of the ICTY and ICTR. Now, in Section 2 of this book's Chapter VII (the principles distilled from the cases between States), it was argued that the male captus situation of an abduction executed by the prosecuting forum's authorities and followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect can be seen as having customary international law status. In Section 3 of that chapter (the principles distilled from the cases between States and international(ised) criminal tribunals), it was consequently explained[169] that such a rule, now that it has customary international law status, should in principle also apply to the context of the tribunals, but that judges in national courts would probably refuse jurisdiction in such cases to, among other things, protect the fragile legal international order based on the equality of sovereign States and that that rationale is less important (albeit not absent) in the vertical context of the ICTY and ICTR. It was then stated that one can thus question whether this rule of customary international law can be applied mutatis mutandis to the context of these Tribunals.[170] However, to what extent would this rule be applicable to the not-so-vertical context of the ICC? One should not be too surprised if the ICC judges (correctly) attached more importance to a protest from an injured State and the violation of that State's sovereignty than, for example, the ICTY Appeals Chamber's 'carte blanche decision' of Nikolić. Perhaps, the ICC judges would feel bound by the above-mentioned customary international law rule and would thus refuse jurisdiction, not because they believe that they ought to, but because they believe that they must do so. Likewise, if the above-mentioned scenario of the forceful abduction were to materialise (a situation in which the tribunal itself is not involved), one can expect that the truly vertical (and merely temporal) ICTY and ICTR would not be very impressed by a protest from the injured State and a request for the return of the suspect. But this may be different for the (permanent) ICC, in whose "lateral" context the sovereignty of States plays a much bigger role. In the words of Currie:

> In the lateral system (…) the case for of universally condemned offences as the overarching threats to international peace and order cannot be made with either the [169] See n. 104 of Chapter VII. See also n. 652 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[170] Note, however, that even though this would mean that there would be no obligation for these Tribunals to refuse jurisdiction in such cases, it was already submitted earlier that in the case of an abduction orchestrated by these Tribunals, the latter should return (conditionally) the suspect back, whether or not there has been a protest from the injured State.

legal or normative force that it was by the ICTY in Nikolić. While the ICC has a large number of state parties, it is by no means a universal treaty; third party states will inevitably be engaged, since international criminals will not necessarily respect borders.[171] The state parties, moreover, exist as sovereign equals in what is essentially a glorified treaty regime. The obligations under the Rome Statute are for parties to cooperate with the Court, even to the point of surrendering jurisdiction in appropriate circumstances, but those obligations are ultimately owed to the state parties themselves. The lack of "verticality" deprives ICC proceedings of some of the moral suasion that attaches to the ad hoc tribunals.[172]

[171] Of course, where the sovereignty of non-States Parties, especially those hostile to the ICC, is violated by the male captus, the judges of the ICC simply cannot afford not to address that dimension of the male captus, see Currie 2007, p. 386, who notes that an abduction of a national from a non-State Party (irrespective of the place of the abduction) may lead to similar serious consequences, see ibid.

[172] Ibid., p. 385. See also ibid., p. 389: "The Appeal Chambers' suggestion in Nikolić that a reviewing court should not attribute any significance to international law violations stemming from abduction must be rejected. The legality of this holding is questionable even before that body, but it is entirely inappropriate for the lateral system in which the ICC exists. The ICC must engage with, and must be seen to engage with, the issues of abduction, illegal rendition and illegal arrest, and in a manner which makes the Court's jurisdiction ratione personae a live issue; unlike the UN tribunals, it does not have the freedom not to." This point was also already made by Sloan 2006, p. 333 (see n. 642 of Chapter VI): "[T]o simply observe that the violation [of State sovereignty, ChP] may lead to 'consequences for the international responsibility of the State or organization involved', without establishing meaningful parameters regarding when such violations will be tolerated by the ICTY, gives a blank cheque to those who would violate state sovereignty in what they perceive to be the best interests of international criminal justice. If this were to be considered a precedent for capture of those indicted by the International Criminal Court (ICC) residing in non-cooperating member states, the ramifications could be very damaging to international peace and security [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Currie (2007, pp. 387-388), elaborating more on this issue, notes that "[i]ronically enough, if the Nikolić line of reasoning prevails before the ICC there may be certain cases where prosecuting universally condemned offences will create threats to international peace and security – different from those underpinning the offence itself but no less destructive for that. The prospect of dousing a smaller fire only to start a larger one is troubling, but very real. Even the more "minor" political conflicts can only hurt the cause, legitimacy and credibility of a Court which already has to operate in a highly-charged political atmosphere; if it is seen to be encouraging or approving of international illegality, then the Court may very well play into the hands of those who view it as a politicized and biased forum. A wholesale application of the mala captus bene detentus rule should have no future before the ICC [emphasis in original and original footnote omitted, ChP]." It may finally be interesting to note that Currie also sees a role for the ASP here. He suggests (ibid., p. 391): "The Assembly of States Parties should enact some form of formalized mechanism to address abduction or other illegality, perhaps by way of amending the Rome Statute to add some kind of complaints-resolution mechanism or at least a subforum in which these issues could be discussed, and to which non-state parties could bring complaints. While it is difficult to imagine the state parties adopting anything beyond a fairly toothless kind of "talk shop," this forum could nonetheless act as a sort of pressure valve, allowing states to engage each other on the issues without having recourse to other measures, e.g. claims before the ICJ." Although a forum where States can talk about these issues is always useful, one wonders whether it would be necessary to set up a complete new mechanism within the context of the ICC if States have already enough opportunities to discuss such matters in existing international fora such as the UN (or in simple bilateral talks). As concerns a sort of complaints-resolution mechanism: that indeed does not appear to be achievable as States will know beforehand that it can never be truly effective. After all, even if the abducting State were to agree with the ultimate complaint of the injured State that the latter's sovereignty has been violated by the male captus and that the suspect must be returned, they both know that the case is now before international and independent judges who will not release a suspect simply because that is the

One can argue that the above-mentioned view, that the abuse of process doctrine, in cases where the tribunal in question is not involved in the male captus, should not be limited to serious mistreatment/torture situations and that the ICC may more easily refuse jurisdiction in serious male captus situations which are not accompanied by serious mistreatment/torture than the ICTY/ICTR because it will probably attach more importance to a concept such as State sovereignty,[173] does not seem to be rejected by the ICC judges. After all, they state that the application of the abuse of process doctrine, "to date, (…) has been confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal [emphasis added and original footnotes omitted ChP][.]"[174] However, the fact that until October 2006, the application of this doctrine has been restricted to a certain situation does not mean that the ICC will also restrict itself to such situations.[175] result of a (political) forum. However, what is important is, of course, that these judges are aware of all the facts of the case so that they can issue the most just decision (which may indeed be the final release of that suspect). Hence, if a State (whether a State Party or not) is of the opinion that a male captus has occurred on its territory and that the ICC judges should know about this violation of its sovereignty (this would be especially important if there are indications that the OTP was involved in this violation) the ICC should, of course, allow that State to file its views with the ICC so that the judges have all the information at their disposal to be able to issue the most just decision.

---

[173] Related to this point is that the ICC hopefully sees that its model function vis-à-vis national courts may even be greater than that of the ICTY and the ICTR (see n. 127 and accompanying text of Chapter VI and n. 106 and accompanying text of Chapter VII). See Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, 'Pre-Trial Rights in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence', International Criminal Court Briefing Series, Vol. 2, No. 3, February 1999, available at: http://www.iccnow.org/documents/LCHRPreTrialRightsFeb99.pdf, where it is written that the ICC "will act as a standard setting mechanism in the interpretation and application of international law and provide a model for national authorities in the administration of criminal justice." See also Stapleton 1999, p. 546: "Ideologically, one of the purposes of an international tribunal like the ICC is to extend "the rule of law and … [to bring] … national courts up to the standards of international law." International human rights and humanitarian conventions are committed to providing an expansive view of rights and to extending the rights of individuals so that national governments will follow their example. Allowing the ICC, an aggressive enforcer of human rights, to deviate from the minimum international standards for a fair trial would undermine the credibility of existing human rights norms. How can a national government be expected to follow "minimum" standards for a fair trial if an international tribunal does not [original footnote omitted, ChP]?"

[174] See also n. 1276 of Chapter VI.

[175] Cf., for example, the following decisions from 2009: ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on the Accused's Holbrooke Agreement Motion' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 8 July 2009, para. 85: "As for the example of "serious mistreatment" of the accused by a third party, such as torture or cruel and/or degrading treatment, there is no indication that the Accused suffered such serious mistreatment or that there was any other egregious violation of his rights, including his right to political activity [emphasis added and emphasis (of the word "egregious") in original, ChP]." See also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on Karadžić's Appeal of Trial Chamber's Decision on Alleged Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-AR73.4, 12 October 2009, para. 47: "[T]he Trial Chamber adopted the common standard established by the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza Decision and in the Nikolić Appeal Decision, and not a higher one, by considering whether the Appellant suffered a serious mistreatment or if there was any other egregious violation of his rights [emphasis added, ChP]." See also ibid., para. 51: "[T]he

Before returning to that point, another issue must be addressed, an issue which was briefly mentioned in Chapter VI.[176] The Pre-Trial Chamber talks about "instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]".

The problem is that under the abuse of process doctrine in the tribunal context, the italicised words are not required: the male captus does not need to have been committed by national authorities. Jurisdiction can be refused, irrespective of the entity responsible: think, for example, of the actions of the private individuals in the Nikolić case. However, whether this is a mistake of the Pre-Trial Chamber is not clear. On the one hand, it does refer to tribunal cases alone (Nikolić (Appeals Chamber), Kajelijeli and Dokmanović) [177] but on the other, the test from the Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić case was not very clear (see Subsection 3.1.4 of Chapter VI), Kajelijeli involved the actions of State authorities working at the behest of the ICTR and the exact paragraphs from the Dokmanović case to which the Pre-Trial Chamber refers contain examinations of national cases. (And in the national context, the abuse of process doctrine appears to require the involvement of authorities which can be linked to the prosecuting forum.) The following does not solve this issue either: one could argue that the Pre-Trial Chamber adheres to the normal abuse of process doctrine from the tribunal context (not requiring the involvement of State authorities) but only applies the specifics of the case before it to the theory in question. However, even though a number of quotations from this decision can be seen as such,[178] this particular quotation cannot, for it is too generally formulated. Hence, it is not clear whether the Pre-Trial Chamber would refuse jurisdiction irrespective of the entity responsible or whether it would only do so in the case of a male captus committed by the national authorities of the custodial State.

---

question before the Appeals Chamber is whether, assuming that the Appellant's factual submission are accepted, proceeding with the trial of the Appellant would contravene to the Tribunal's sense of justice or would be detrimental to the Tribunal's integrity, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct amounting to serious and egregious violations of the Appellant's rights."

[176] See ns. 1216, 1273-1274 and 1276 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[177] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, p. 10, n. 33. See also n. 156.

[178] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, pp. 9 ("[A]ny violations of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo's rights in relation to his arrest and detention prior to 14 March 2006 will be examined by the Court only once it has been established that there has been concerted action between the Court and the DRC authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP]") and 10: "[N]o issues has arisen to any alleged act of torture against or serious mistreatment of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo by the DRC national authorities prior to the transmission of the Court's Cooperation Request on 14 March 2006 to the said authorities".

Returning now to the point that the Pre-Trial Chamber had stated that the application of the abuse of process doctrine, to date, has been confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal and that this statement does not mean that the ICC will restrict itself to such situations; unfortunately, when the Pre-Trial Chamber moved from the theory to the facts of this specific case, it did not more generally determine for itself whether the male captus was so serious that jurisdiction had to be refused: it only focused on the examples of serious mistreatment/torture and concluded > that in the course of the present proceedings under article 19 of the Statute, no issues has arisen to any alleged act of torture against or serious mistreatment of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo by the DRC national authorities[[179]] prior to the transmission of the Court's Cooperation Request on 14 March 2006 to the said authorities[.][180]

Now that the abuse of process doctrine could not be relied upon, the judges turned to the question of "whether there was concerted action between the Court and the DRC authorities in connection with the arrest and detention of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo prior to 14 March 2006 [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[181] Here, the judges concluded > that there is no evidence indicating that the arrest and detention of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo prior to (…) 14 March 2006 was the result of any concerted action between the Court and the DRC authorities; and that the Court will therefore not examine the lawfulness of the arrest and detention of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo by the DRC authorities prior to 14 March 2006[.][182]

The final conclusion was thus that Lubanga Dyilo's challenge to the ICC's jurisdiction was deemed unfounded and consequently dismissed. As the Pre-Trial Chamber was only prepared to look at the lawfulness of Lubanga Dyilo's arrest/detention prior to 14 December 2006, if that arrest/detention resulted from concerted action between the ICC and the DRC authorities (quod non) and as it was only prepared to look beyond that test in the context of the abuse of process doctrine (which is focused on the ultimate remedy, refusal of jurisdiction, only), Lubanga

---

[179] In this specific case, in which, for example, no private individuals were involved in the male captus, the Pre-Trial Chamber could restrict itself here to the national authorities, see the previous footnote and accompanying text. Nevertheless, it is to be recalled that the general abuse of process doctrine from the tribunals is not restricted to actions of the national authorities.

[180] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, p. 10.

[181] Ibid., pp. 10-11.

[182] Ibid., p. 11.

Dyilo was not granted any other, less far-reaching remedies for his alleged irregular arrest/detention in the DRC prior to the official ICC arrest.

Again, it can be argued that a better method would be for the ICC judges to first try to find out exactly what happened to Lubanga Dyilo in the DRC before his official ICC arrest and whether the violations, if they did in fact occur, can be seen as falling within the context of the ICC case. It may very well be that the judges would then still be of the opinion that the violations – if they did occur – cannot be seen as falling within the context of the ICC case.[183] If that were so, then the ICC would not have to remedy the violations. (Of course, the context of an ICC case must have some boundaries.) However, in that case, the judges would at least have used a test which is arguably fairer than that used now.

Lubanga Dyilo subsequently filed a confidential appeal, which was followed by a confidential response by the Prosecution, observations from the DRC and the victims and a reply from the Defence. After that, the long-awaited decision of the Appeals Chamber was issued. Although the appeal by the Defence and the response by the Prosecution themselves are confidential, the Appeals Chamber summarised their contents. Furthermore, publicly available redacted versions of the Defence's appeal[184] and the Prosecutor's response were filed.[185] As a result, it is possible to examine their (counter)arguments. As many arguments of the Defence and the Prosecution have been reviewed supra, this study will, in principle, follow the summary of the Appeals Chamber. However, a few interesting observations from the Defence's appeal and the Prosecutor's response will also be mentioned.

The appeal of the Defence contained five grounds, namely:

> 1st ground: Adoption by the Pre-Trial Chamber "of an incorrect legal test for the determination as to whether to stay the exercise of jurisdiction over Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"[;] 2nd ground: Failure of the Chamber "to consider relevant and significant [183] In the Appeals Chamber's decision, which will be discussed in a moment in the main text, it was stated that "[p]rior to his arrest on the authority of the warrant of the Court, Mr. Lubanga Dyilo was held in custody by the Congolese authorities for crimes other than those that were found to justify the issue of a warrant for his arrest by the Court." (ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 5.) See also ibid., para. 42: "It is worth reminding that the crimes for which Mr. Lubanga Dyilo was detained by the Congolese authority were separate and distinct from those which led to the issuance of the warrant for his arrest." This fact may, of course, play a role in determining whether or not any violations in that detention can be seen as falling within the context of the ICC case, although it is arguably not the only element which should be taken into account. This point will be returned to infra.

[184] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 26 October 2006.

[185] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Redacted Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 17 November 2006.

> indicia concerning the relationship between the DRC and the ICC prosecution"[;] 3[rd] ground: Application by the Chamber of "an incorrect legal standard for assessing the relevant law of the DRC in the context of article 59 (2) of the Statute"[;] 4[th] ground: Failure of the Chamber "to consider the cumulative effect of the violations of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo's rights"[;] 5[th] ground: Failure of the Chamber "to consider whether a lesser remedy would be appropriate" [original footnotes omitted, ChP][.][186]

As well as noting that the subject of the fifth ground of appeal was already addressed supra, it is interesting to examine a few points mentioned by the Appeals Chamber after it had presented these five grounds. The judges explained that the Defence had argued, among other things, that > the concept of human rights and the implications of their violations (…) should not be viewed statically but from an ever-evolving perspective of the impact of human rights violations on judicial proceedings. Reference was made to inter alia the jurisprudence of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights and the test of "due diligence" adopted as the measure of testing the propriety of action of the prosecuting authorities as well as the conduct of private actors [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[187]

These are certainly interesting thoughts which can be seen as additional support for the already – so often – expressed idea of this study that the tribunal in question, in this case the ICC, should be the ultimate guarantor that violations which take place in the context of an ICC case are, ultimately, properly remedied, irrespective of the entity responsible for these violations (thus including the actions of private individuals).

Another interesting point made by the Defence was that

> [t]orture or serious mistreatment (…) should not be confined to isolated acts but may be configured by the cumulative effect of a series of acts involving violations of the rights of a person. The appellant depicted inter alia his stay while in custody and the conditions of his detention as an act of torture [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[188]

The Defence here wanted to convince the Appeals Chamber that (the conditions of) his detention at the national level amounted to torture, for the simple reason that that qualification, torture, is one of the most accepted avenues towards a male detentus result. However, and without qualifying Lubanga Dyilo's detention in the DRC as torture, there is no need to prove this. As stated before in this study, serious mistreatment or torture is 'only' an example of such a serious male captus that jurisdiction must be refused. However, it may very well be that judges are of the

---

[186] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 13.
[187] Ibid., para. 14.
[188] Ibid.

opinion that a certain male captus is so serious that male detentus must follow, even if the male captus was not accompanied by serious mistreatment/torture. And indeed, many not so serious violations can cumulate and lead to such a serious male captus that jurisdiction must be refused nevertheless, cf. the Barayagwiza case, see footnote 875 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. This should, of course, be clear if the male captus was executed by staff from the ICC itself, but judges may also refuse jurisdiction if the male captus was not executed by authorities which can be linked to the ICC, see also the example mentioned after footnote 168 and accompanying text.

A final interesting point mentioned by the Defence was that "[t]he deference by the Pre-Trial Chamber to national law and the process followed by the Congolese authorities in enforcing the arrest warrant was unjustified".[189] Although it appears that the ICC quite properly checked whether the official ICC arrest was executed correctly – even though it was also noted that it would have been even clearer for it to have explicitly addressed the points mentioned in Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute[190] – one can indeed agree with the Defence that the Pre-Trial Chamber can be criticised for not examining provisions which arguably must play a role within the context of Article 59 of the ICC Statute, namely Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute and Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute.[191]

Conversely, the Prosecution supported the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision in every respect.[192] A few interesting remarks from the redacted version of its response should definitely be mentioned here.

First of all, the Prosecutor stressed that, even though the principle that justice must be done with full respect for the rights of the suspect/accused should be cherished, the ICC is not required to provide a remedy "for violations that occurred outside of its jurisdiction, custody or control, and in respect of separate national investigations or proceedings".[193] In this context, it also referred, among other things, to the scope of Article 55 of the ICC Statute (which only talks about rights in the context of an investigation).[194] As clarified before, one can argue that, strictly speaking, the Prosecutor is right: according to such provisions as Article 21, paragraph 3 and Article 55 of the ICC Statute, the ICC must focus on the rights which occurred when the ICC exercised jurisdiction in the case/was involved in the case (Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute) or when it initiated the [191] This point was already made earlier, see n. 143 and accompanying text.

[189] Ibid.
[190] See n. 141 and accompanying text.
[192] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 15.
[193] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Redacted Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 17 November 2006, para. 7.
[194] See ibid., paras. 13-14 and 32.

investigation (Article 55 of the ICC Statute). However, it is submitted that the final adjudicators, the judges, should determine for themselves whether an irregularity is to be seen as falling within the context of their case more generally and hence whether it should be remedied. One can reassure the Prosecutor that if the suspect was in custody at the national level for other crimes, if the ICC was not yet officially involved in the case and if the ICC had not concerted with the authorities responsible for violations committed in the context of the suspect's national detention, prior to the initiation of the investigation, judges will not quickly determine that these violations can be seen as falling within the context of their case. However, neither is it impossible that if the suspect, quite soon after such violations, is surrendered to the ICC, which profited from the fact that the suspect was in detention at the national level, judges may nevertheless feel that the violations are to be seen as falling within the context of their case and thus need to be repaired.[195] This is so, even if the fact that the judges benefited from the fact that he was already in detention at the national level does not mean that the ICC is thus also, in a strict legal sense, responsible for the violations. (That would, however, be different in the case of, for example, acknowledgement and adoption of the conduct as its own,[196] which, in turn, might be more easily to establish if the ICC were to benefit from [195] An analogy can be drawn here to the abuse of process doctrine. If judges are willing to take the ultimate responsibility (namely the refusal of jurisdiction) for violations in which the ICC was not involved and which are not directly related to the process of arrest and surrender to the ICC – this point is not only shared by the Defence (see ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 26 October 2006, para. 21), but also by the Prosecution (see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Redacted Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 17 November 2006, para. 22: "The Prosecution also acknowledges that there is no strict requirement that the violations in question necessarily be directly connected with the arrest and surrender process [original footnote omitted, ChP]") – they should also consider less serious violations which can be seen as falling within the context of the ICC's case. Note that the Defence did not agree with the Pre-Trial Chamber's view "that an applicant must always demonstrate that the breach of his rights occurred in connection with arrest and transfer proceedings to the international judicial forum, or that each concrete breach must amount to torture or other serious mistreatment." (ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 26 October 2006, para. 17.) However, one can agree with the Prosecution here (see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Redacted Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 17 November 2006, para. 23) that this is not what the Pre-Trial Chamber was asserting, because the latter did not only use the words "to date" but also the more general words "in some way related to". Hence, it appears that both the Defence, Prosecution and Pre-Trial Chamber share the same broad (and welcome) vision in that respect.

[196] Cf. also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Redacted Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 17 November 2006, para. 17.

these violations without reviewing whether they have to be seen as falling within the context of their case and thus are in need of reparation.)[197] If that happened, the judges would have to be able to grant remedies, even if the relevant provisions, strictly speaking, do not go that far. It is submitted that the final adjudicators of the case, the judges, should have the final say in this; they are in the best position to determine whether or not the violation can be seen as falling within the context of the case and hence needing to be repaired. However, in that case, they must, of course, have this test at their disposal, and that is what this study is submitting here. One could respond that this broader task would divert the ICC from its main objective, which is to fight impunity.[198] However, as Chapter IX has already shown, the ICC must not only fight impunity, it must do so in a way which respects, among other things, international law, due process and human rights, including the right to a fair trial. In other words: it must fight impunity fairly. If the judges are of the opinion that it is not fair to disregard irregularities which can more generally be seen as falling within the context of their case, they must be able to remedy them. In addition, it is not to be expected that this broader task will derail the ICC as one can expect that judges would normally view irregularities which occur beyond the involvement of the ICC as not falling within the context of their case. Furthermore, the ICC judges do not stand alone in this task, for they can use the determinations of the competent judicial authority as a first indication of how certain irregularities at the national level must be assessed.

Another interesting remark by the Prosecutor is that "[t]he Appellant never discusses the implications of the relief that he seeks: that the Court would be ruling that the violations of his rights were so severe as to justify granting him impunity for the crimes with which he is charged".[199]

However, as already made clear, even though one can assume that the male captus of Lubanga Dyilo would not be seen as being that serious that jurisdiction must be refused, a refusal of jurisdiction (if it were nevertheless granted) 'only' means the ending of the case before this institution. However, that does not mean that the suspect may not be tried before another court. It does not necessarily lead to impunity. While it must be admitted that such an operation may indeed be complicated – as was explained earlier,[200] the ICC Statute does not contain an explicit provision empowering it to transfer suspects to States which can prosecute the case when the ICC refuses jurisdiction – the lack of such an explicit provision does not mean that the ICC judges, with reference to the ICC's overarching objective to fight impunity, should not do everything in their power to ensure that a

[197] See Sluiter 2009, p. 465: "[A] refusal to review the national activities that have benefited the Court can with good reason be seen as acceptance of them, and implicates the integrity of international proceedings."
[198] Cf. ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Redacted Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 17 November 2006, para. 25.
[199] Ibid., para. 8.
[200] See n. 924 of Chapter VI.

case is tried elsewhere if they refuse jurisdiction. In that context, they could perhaps make use of a provision such as Rule 185, paragraph 1 of the ICC RPE, see the text following footnote 86 and accompanying text of the previous chapter.[201]

Inspiration may also be drawn from Rule 215, paragraph 3 of the ICC RPE, even if it applies to another situation (namely one in which the ICC had jurisdiction and in fact had finished the case against the suspect):

> The Presidency may authorize the temporary extradition of the sentenced person to a third State for prosecution only if it has obtained assurances which it deems to be sufficient that the sentenced person will be kept in custody in the third State and transferred back to the State responsible for enforcement of the sentence pronounced by the Court, after the prosecution.

Moreover, it must also be stressed that a suspect will normally raise his male captus claims before the actual trial starts, meaning that the 'new' court's jurisdiction cannot be challenged through a ne bis in idem claim.[202]

However, notwithstanding all this, it is, of course, also clear that the inclusion of a more specific provision in the ICC rules, comparable with Rule 11 bis of the ICTR/ICTY RPE, may be very welcome.

Another important aspect of the Prosecutor's response – as will become even clearer in the remainder of this book – was the fact that the Prosecution (correctly) agreed that "there is power to stop proceedings for abuse of process [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[203] Moreover, it also addressed the point of the Defence with respect to the deference to the law and procedures of the custodial State (see supra) and opined that such deference is implicit from Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute and reinforced by Article 99, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute.[204] As

---

[201] Cf. also Sluiter 2003 C, p. 644 (writing on the (identical) provision of the Draft ICC RPE): "According to Paragraph 1 of this provision, a released person may only be transferred to a third state for the purpose of prosecution with the consent of the surrendering state [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[202] See n. 353 of Chapter VI.

[203] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 15. However, here also, it was not clarified how this doctrine enters the system of the ICC. The Prosecution merely stated that "[t]he manner in which the Pre-Trial Chamber exercised its discretion on whether in all the circumstances it would constitute an abuse of process to exercise jurisdiction over the Appellant was entirely reasonable and consistent with established jurisprudence [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Redacted Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 17 November 2006, para. 21.)

[204] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 15. Although the point is clear, one should not forget that Art. 99, para. 1 of the ICC Statute ("Requests

clarified supra, it is indeed true that the national authorities are, of course, the ultimate experts in assessing whether or not the arrest and detention was executed in accordance with the proper national laws. Furthermore, it is also true, as submitted by the Prosecutor, that, strictly speaking, "[n]either the Prosecutor nor the Court bear responsibility or can be held accountable for the detention of the appellant by the Congolese authorities or his treatment while in custody".[205] However, this does not mean that the ICC should not keep an eye on alleged violations which occur at this national level for it is the ICC which must be the ultimate guarantor that violations which occur in the context of the ICC case (whether they occur at the national level or not) are ultimately properly remedied.

Finally, the DRC and the victims observed that Lubanga Dyilo's appeal had to be dismissed,[206] a point which was, of course, rejected by the Defence in its final responses.[207] for assistance shall be executed in accordance with the relevant procedure under the law of the requested State and, unless prohibited by such law, in the manner specified in the request, including following any procedure outlined therein or permitting persons specified in the request to be present at and assist in the execution process.") deals with the execution of requests under Artt. 93 and 96 of the ICC Statute (these are requests of cooperation other than requests pertaining to arrest and surrender). Perhaps, a reference to Art. 89, para. 1 of the ICC Statute ("States Parties shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Part and the procedures under their national law, comply with requests for arrest and surrender.") would have been more appropriate. However, in the original response, this is better formulated, see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Redacted Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 17 November 2006, para. 51: "The Court's limited supervisory role in relation to the manner in which States perform cooperation tasks is further emphasized by Article 99(1)".

---

[205] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 16.

[206] See ibid., para. 17. For more information on the views of the DRC, see [ICC, Appeals Chamber,] Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Observations of the Democratic Republic of the Congo', [ICC-01/04-01/06, 4 December 2006] (this is the English translation of the French document of 21 November 2006). Note that the DRC, like the Prosecution, also agreed with the Pre-Trial Chamber's "sufficient explanation of the scope of (…) the abuse of process doctrine". (Ibid., para. 13.) For more information on the views of the victims, see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Observations of Victims a/0001/06, a/0002/06 and a/0003/06 with respect to the Defence appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19(2)(a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 22 November 2006. In these observations, one can find the same arguments with respect to the male captus bene detentus maxim as were already used in their first, and not uncriticised, observations, see ns. 105 et seq. and accompanying text.

[207] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 18. For more information, see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Defence Reply to the Observations of

It was then up to the Appeals Chamber. In its decision of 14 December 2006, it presented the issues it wished to address as follows:

> A. The parameters of the jurisdiction of the Court
> B. The doctrine or principle of abuse of process, its ambit and applicability in proceedings before the ICC
> C. Article 21 (3) of the Statute, and its relevance to the assumption of jurisdiction by the Court in any given case > D. The validity of the findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber respecting > a. the absence of wrongdoing on the part of the Prosecutor in the detention and sequential treatment of the appellant by the Congolese authorities;
> b. the absence of evidence of mistreatment, grave or otherwise, of the appellant; and > c. the application of article 59 (2) of the Statute.[208]

Starting with issue A, the judges explained that > the conclusion to which the Appeals Chamber is driven is that the application of Mr. Lubanga Dyilo and the proceedings following do not raise a challenge to the jurisdiction of the Court within the compass of article 19 (2) of the Statute. What the appellant sought was that the Court should refrain from exercising its jurisdiction in the Government of the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 27 November 2006 and ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Defence Reply to the Observations of the Victims' Representatives' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 28 November 2006. It may be interesting to note that in this last response, the Defence noted "that the Prosecution concurred with the Defence that the arguments submitted by the victims' representatives pertaining to the doctrine of male captus bene detentus were misconceived [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 7.) As this Prosecution's response is confidential (see (the text preceding) n. 131 and accompanying text), the accuracy of this point of the Defence cannot be assessed. However, if it is indeed true, then it can be seen as support for the criticism which this study vented against the observations of the victims on these matters, see ns. 105 et seq. and accompanying text. A final interesting point is that the Defence also referred to the words of Arbour which were already mentioned in ns. 23-24 of Chapter I of this book, see also the final words of n. 878 of Chapter VI. In those footnotes, one can read that Arbour argued that terrorism suspects "are being arrested, detained and interrogated with no apparent intention of bringing them to trial. And I say 'with no apparent intention of bringing them to trial' because the circumstances of their arrest, detention and interrogation – take only the length of their detention – would in any credible jurisdiction amount to such an abuse of process that trial jurisdiction, if it ever existed, could never be exercised." Although one can doubt that Arbour would also agree with the Defence that Lubanga Dyilo had to be released by the ICC because of his alleged irregular detention in the DRC, one must not forget either that in principle, any circumstance (such as, indeed, a long irregular pre-trial detention), and not only serious mistreatment/torture, can lead to a refusal of jurisdiction, as long as the judges find this male captus so serious that it would undermine the integrity of the Court to continue with the case nonetheless.

---

[208] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 19.

> the matter in hand. Its true characterization may be identified as a sui generis application, an atypical motion, seeking the stay of the proceedings, acceptance of which would entail the release of Mr. Lubanga Dyilo.[209]

As already made clear in Chapter VIII (see footnote 141 and accompanying text of that chapter), it is true that, strictly speaking, a suspect who files a challenge to the jurisdiction of the ICC because of his serious male captus, is not claiming that the ICC has no jurisdiction but that it should refrain from exercising its jurisdiction. However, one should not focus too strongly on this difference. After all, if the Court indeed decides to follow the suspect's claim and to refuse to exercise its jurisdiction, the Court's jurisdiction ratione personae over that person is permanently lost.[210] This means that if the Prosecutor nevertheless wants to restart the trial, the Court would say that it has no jurisdiction ratione personae because it cannot try this person, in the same way as the ICC would state that it has no jurisdiction ratione temporis if it is confronted by crimes committed before 1 July 2002. Hence, because the result of the suspect's challenge, if it succeeds, would lead to a loss of jurisdiction ratione personae, it is perfectly understandable that not only the Defence, but also the Prosecution[211] and the Pre-Trial Chamber[212] were of the opinion that this application of Lubanga Dyilo (seemingly) constituted a challenge to the ICC's jurisdiction under Article 19 of the ICC Statute.

One can assert that if the ICC were to dismiss a challenge purely because it cannot, strictly speaking, be seen as a challenge to the ICC's jurisdiction, this would constitute a violation of the suspect's right to challenge the lawfulness of his arrest/detention, a crucial right[213] which is covered by Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute.

Be that as it may, the Appeals Chamber was of the opinion that the challenge could not be seen as a challenge to the ICC's jurisdiction and that the sui generis application of Lubanga Dyilo could only survive if the ICC is "vested with jurisdiction under the Statute or endowed with inherent power to stop judicial proceedings where it is just to do so".[214] It then explained that the Pre-Trial Chamber had

---

[209] Ibid., para. 24.

[210] See also n. 102 and accompanying text: "For the reasons previously set out, the Court, within the context of its supervisory powers, could not endorse a violation of the Accused's fundamental rights by continuing to exercise its jurisdiction over him. In this respect, the Court no longer has personal jurisdiction over the applicant."

[211] See ns. 58-60 and accompanying text.

[212] See ns. 144 and 180 and accompanying text.

[213] It is to be recalled – see Subsection 2.2.5 of Chapter III – that this right has customary international law/general international law status and cannot even be derogated from in times of emergency and war.

[214] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 24.

> identified two related grounds, as may be summarized, that might provide justification to refuse to exercise jurisdiction in a case brought before it: a) abuse of process and b) serious violations of the rights of the suspect or the accused, resulting from "concerted action" between the Prosecutor and the DRC, derailing the process to an extent making it antagonistic to the ends of justice to put him/her on trial.[215]

To this one could, of course, also add serious violations which occur in the context of an arrest/detention at the request/behest of the ICC/the ICC's constructive custody, when the ICC has sent its official requests, but perhaps, the Appeals Chamber views this as a form of "concerted action" between the ICC and the executing authorities.

The judges started with the abuse of process doctrine and thus moved to issue B. They first of all noted that abuse of process "is a principle evolved by English case law constituting a feature of the common law adopted in many countries where this system of law finds application".[216] The doctrine/principle[217] was then further explained with help of case law, such as the already discussed cases of Bennett, Hartley, Ebrahim,[218] Levinge and – as an exception to Alvarez-Machain – Toscanino.[219]

However, the Appeals Chamber also opined that "[t]he doctrine of abuse or process as known to English law finds no application in the Romano-Germanic systems of law".[220]

Nevertheless, as previously explained, although the concept of 'abuse of process' as such may not be used by courts in the civil law system, it appears that also in this system (as in mixed systems incidentally),[221] judges can refuse jurisdiction if they are confronted by such a serious male captus that it would undermine the integrity of the court if they were to nonetheless continue with the case.[222] The Appeals

---

[215] Ibid., para. 25.
[216] Ibid., para. 26.
[217] The judges noted on this point that "[a]buse of process is a principle associated with the administration of justice, referred to as a doctrine because of wide adherence to the principle involved [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)
[218] Note that the South African legal system is a mixture of civil law and common law, see n. 650 of Chapter V. Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber also referred to a case from Cyprus, whose legal system is also a mixture of common and civil law, see JuriGlobe's 'Alphabetical Index of the Political Entities and Corresponding Legal Systems', available at: http://www.juriglobe.ca/eng/sys-juri/index-alpha.php.
[219] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, paras. 29 and 32.
[220] Ibid., para. 33.
[221] See, for example, the systems of South Africa and Cyprus, to which the Appeals Chamber itself refers, see n. 218. Cf. also the Zimbabwean case Beahan and the reasoning of Acting Justice of Appeal O'Linn in the Namibian case Mushwena.
[222] See n. 878 and accompanying text of Chapter VI and ns. 18-19 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.

Chamber's subsequent explanation as to why the doctrine finds no application in the romano-germanic systems of law is not terribly convincing. It stated:

> The principle encapsulated in the Latin maxim male captus bene detentus has received favourable reception in the French case of re Argoud but not an enthusiastic one in the old case of re [Jolis]. The German Constitutional Court too appears to have endorsed like principles to those approved in re Argoud. But where serious violations of the fundamental rights of the accused or international law are involved, the rule is mitigated [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[223]

The Appeals Chamber explains here that it appears that the German Constitutional Court also accepts the male captus bene detentus rule, except for the situation where serious violations of the fundamental rights of the accused or international law are involved. In that case, the (male captus bene detentus) rule is mitigated.

Before commenting on the abuse of process point, it should be noted that the use of the word "mitigated" can be seen as something of an understatement of what the German Federal Constitutional Court really decided in the case to which the Appeals Chamber refers, the previously discussed Al-Moayad case. After all, in that case, the German Federal Constitutional Court held:

> In this context, it need not be decided whether a national obstacle precluding criminal proceedings or extradition results from customary international law if the prosecuted person has been taken from his or her state of origin to the state of the forum or to the requested state by use of force. Admittedly, more recent state practice, in particular as a consequence of dealing with the U.S. Supreme Court decision in the Alvarez-Machain case (…) indicates that the principle male captus, bene detentus is rejected at any rate if the state of the forum got hold of the prosecuted person by committing serious human rights violations, and if the state whose territorial sovereignty was violated protested against such procedure (…).[224]

Hence, the Constitutional Court is arguably of the opinion that more recent State practice indicates that male captus bene detentus is rejected at any rate in the case of 1) an abduction accompanied by serious human rights violations or 2) an abduction followed by a protest from the injured State. Thus, according to the German judges, in those two situations, more recent State practice indicates that male captus bene detentus is rejected and jurisdiction refused.

Returning to the abuse of process point now, even though the German Court does not use this term here, it does hold that judges in general ("more recent state practice") refuse jurisdiction in two very serious male captus cases.[225] It can be argued that there is no substantive difference between a common law judge refusing jurisdiction under the abuse of process doctrine and a judge from another law system who, without perhaps using the explicit label 'abuse of process', or another label such as 'supervisory powers',[226] refuses jurisdiction in exactly the same manner because he is confronted by such a serious male captus that he feels that he cannot proceed with the case without undermining the integrity of the court/his sense of justice. In the words of Oehmichen: "Im Ergebnis folgt das Bundesverfassungsgericht damit in Fällen völkerrechtswidriger gewaltsamer Entführung der „abuse of process-Doktrin,"".[227]

[223] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 33.

[224] See n. 569 and accompanying text of Chapter V.

Of course, the test leading to a refusal of jurisdiction may differ from State to State (the male detentus test of cases like Bennett, Hartley, Ebrahim and Levinge is far lower (and arguably better) than the test mentioned here by the German Court, although it must also be borne in mind that this is a test by which male captus bene detentus is rejected at any rate, which means that courts can also use a lower threshold), but one can expect that any judge will refuse jurisdiction if he is of the opinion that the male captus is so serious that he can, in good conscience, no longer proceed with the case.[228]

If even in the State which is so often seen as the champion of male captus bene detentus, the US, it appears that judges would refuse jurisdiction in certain serious male captus situations,[229] one can expect that judges in France (to also address that point made by the Appeals Chamber) would similarly refuse jurisdiction in certain serious male captus situations, even if their male detentus test may be stricter than in other States.[230]

---

[225] Note, by the way, that the ICC's Appeals Chamber, when arguing that "[t]he German Constitutional Court too appears to have endorsed like principles to those approved in re Argoud [original footnote omitted, ChP]", referred to, among other things, the Stocké case, hereby not mentioning that this case also contains exceptions to the male captus bene detentus rule, see ns. 505, 512, 516-517 and accompanying text of Chapter V.

[226] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 76: "Closely related to the abuse of process doctrine is the notion of supervisory powers. It is generally recognised that courts have supervisory powers that may be utilised in the interests of justice, regardless of a specific violation."

[227] Oehmichen 2007, p. 237.

[228] See again n. 222.

[229] See n. 206 and accompanying text of Chapter V and n. 23 and accompanying text of Chapter VII (the Toscanino case). This point was also explicitly recognised by the ICC's Appeals Chamber, see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 32: "In the United States of America, the doctrine of abuse of process has had a mixed reception, recognising on the one hand its existence but confining its application within very narrow straits [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (The Appeals Chamber refers here to Toscanino and Alvarez-Machain.)

[230] In Chapter V (see n. 402 and accompanying text of that chapter), it was explained that Argoud appears to support the idea that even if there would be a clear-cut violation of international law (which, it is reminded, was not the case in Argoud as it was not clearly established that his abduction was carried out by French agents acting in that capacity and had violated the sovereignty of the Federal Republic of

The judges then asked themselves the question as to whether "the principle or doctrine of abuse of process find application under the Statute as part of the applicable law and in particular under the provisions of article 21 (1) (b) and (c)".[231]

First of all, it must be noted that the fact that the judges of the Appeals Chamber, in contrast to their colleagues at the Pre-Trial Chamber[232] and other participants,[233] examine to what extent the abuse of process doctrine falls within the ICC's system of applicable law (Article 21 of the ICC Statute) should be applauded.

Now, the abuse of process doctrine cannot be found, as such, in the ICC Statute: "Abuse of process is not listed as a ground for relinquishing jurisdiction"[234] under the ICC Statute. However, this does not mean that the ICC does not have the power to refuse jurisdiction in very serious male captus situations. It was discussed earlier in the present chapter that, as explained in Chapter IX of this book, the reasoning behind this doctrine, namely that courts have a discretion to refuse jurisdiction in certain serious male captus cases (one should not focus too much on the common law label 'abuse of process' here) can perhaps be seen as a principle/rule of international law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) of the ICC Statute or otherwise as general principle of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute. In addition, because so many (inter)national courts seem to recognise this power, it could be held that it is an inherent power of any court. That would mean that the ICC would also have this inherent power.

However, the judges – arguably focusing too much on the specific label 'abuse of process' – did not concur. The Appeals Chamber held that it > shall not examine the implications of article 4 (1) of the Statute[[235]] for under no circumstances can it be construed as providing power to stay proceedings for abuse of process. The power to stay proceedings for abuse of process, as indicated, is not Germany), the Court would still be of the opinion that the international law problem had to be solved by the Governments of the two States involved. (In that sense, Argoud goes clearly further than other courts which may already refuse jurisdiction in such a situation.) However, one can only guess how a modern French judge (note that the French Court of Cassation issued its decision in Argoud on 4 June 1964) would have reacted if it was established that Argoud had indeed been kidnapped by French State agents and, in the course of his abduction, had moreover been seriously mistreated by those agents.

[231] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 34.

[232] See n. 161 and accompanying text.

[233] See the text following n. 54 and accompanying text, n. 101 and accompanying text and n. 203.

[234] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 34.

[235] This provision states: "The Court shall have international legal personality. It shall also have such legal capacity as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions and the fulfilment of its purposes."

> generally recognised as an indispensable power of a court of law, an inseverable attribute of the judicial power.[236]

The Appeals Chamber concluded that "the Statute does not provide for stay of proceedings for abuse of process as such"[237] and noted that Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute did not have to be looked to since paragraph (a) of that provision was exhaustive on the matter.[238]

Clearly, this study does not agree with this conclusion. It seems far too easy to conclude that the ICC Statute is exhaustive on the matter simply because the abuse of process doctrine is not explicitly mentioned or implicitly covered (via – the seemingly irrelevant[239] – Article 4, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute) by the ICC instruments.[240] The judges do not seriously review other relevant provisions which

---

[236] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 35.

[237] Ibid.

[238] See ibid., para. 34. The judges referred here to ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, a decision which was already discussed in the previous chapter.

[239] This provision appears to focus on very different issues, see Rückert 2008, p. 124: "This standard provision clarifies that the Court shall possess at the municipal level the legal capacity essential for it to carry out its functions. This provision makes it incumbent upon the States Parties to ensure that the ICC enjoys such legal status under national law as may be necessary for it to perform its functions. (…) The legal capacity of the ICC, however, extends only as far as the purpose and functioning of the ICC requires. Here, the functional limitation of the legal capacity is explicitly provided for in the Statute. Article 2 of the Draft Agreement on the Privileges and Immunities of the ICC illustrates the extent of the Court's legal capacity. According to this provision on the legal status and juridical personality of the Court, it shall in particular have the capacity to contract, to acquire and to dispose of immovable and movable property and to participate in legal proceedings [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." However, the fact that the abuse of process power cannot be seen as an inherent power under this (seemingly irrelevant) provision does not mean that the ICC does not have such an inherent power nonetheless.

[240] Cf. also the comparable criticism of Manning (2007, p. 837) who states: "The decision (…) concludes its dizzying survey by stopping short of determining whether the abuse of process doctrine merits status as a genuine general principle of law, which the Court might rightfully derive from national laws of the legal systems of the world. The decision leaves the question unanswered because the Statute's treatment of jurisdiction is found to be "exhaustive." Thus "no room is left for recourse to the second or third source of law." This conclusion is confusing because it renders the three previous pages of the decision irrelevant. It is surprising because it is made in the absence of any reference to the drafting history to suggest that the omission of authority to decline jurisdiction was deliberate [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Although this study does concur with the last point, it does not agree with Manning's remark that "[t]his conclusion is confusing because it renders the three previous pages of the decision irrelevant." After all, the ICC's examination of the cases was arguably not made in the context of Art. 21, para. 1 (b) or (c) of the ICC Statute, even if the judges asked themselves whether "the principle or doctrine of abuse of process find application under the Statute as part of the applicable law and in particular under the provisions of article 21 (1) (b) and (c) [emphasis added, ChP]?" (see n. 231 and accompanying text), but in the context of Art. 21, para. 1 (a) of the ICC Statute: to show that the ICC Statute, which does not explicitly recognise the doctrine, does not implicitly recognise the doctrine either under Art. 4, para. 1 of the ICC Statute.

might shed light on the question of whether the ICC has power to issue a male detentus verdict in the case of a serious male captus, taking into account the rules of interpretation of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (as was done in Chapter IX of this book). A more extensive review arguably shows that Article 21, paragraph 1 (a) of the ICC Statute, taking into account Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, is not exhaustive on the matter and thus that one can turn to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute to fill this legal lacuna. And as argued in Chapter IX, the power of a court to refuse jurisdiction in the case of a serious male captus might be seen as a principle/rule of international law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) of the ICC Statute (namely as practice of international courts) or as a general principle of law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute. In addition, because the power of a court to refuse jurisdiction in very serious male captus cases, without looking at the exact label of this power (such as abuse of process/supervisory powers), is used by so many (inter)national courts, it could be seen as an inherent power of any court, including of the ICC.

The judges then turned to issue C, Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute. They noted that, even though the abuse of process doctrine as such could not be found in the ICC Statute, the doctrine > had ab initio a human rights dimension in that the causes for which the power of the Court to stay or discontinue proceedings were largely associated with breaches of the rights of the litigant, the accused in the criminal process, such as delay, illegal or deceitful conduct on the part of the prosecution and violations of the rights of the accused in the process of bringing him/her to justice.[241]

And that aspect of the doctrine, the human rights dimension, was obviously covered by the ICC Statute, as can be discerned from provisions such as Articles 55 and 67 of the ICC Statute and, most importantly, Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, which "requires the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court in accordance with internationally recognized human rights norms".[242] Before continuing with the reasoning of the ICC judges, it must be noted that this last point can be seen as support for the interpretation at footnotes 246-247 and accompanying text of Chapter IX, namely that Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute covers any situation in which the ICC exercises jurisdiction/any case in which the ICC is involved, including the pre-trial actions from third parties, for example, when arrests/detentions are made at the behest of the ICC. This view arguably also comports with the position of the Pre-Trial Chamber that the scope of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute extends to constructive custody/arrest/detention at the request/behest of the ICC and to "concerted action" between the ICC and third parties. This, of course, covers quite a considerable part of the context of the ICC case and that is to be welcomed. However, as there may always occur situations which do not fall within such concepts, but which are nevertheless to be seen as falling within the context of an ICC case, it would be better and fairer for the ICC to go even beyond those concepts and to repair any violations which occur in the context of its case more generally.[243]

[241] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 36.
[242] Ibid.

Returning to the words of the ICC judges, the following eloquent statement was then made:

> Human rights underpin the Statute; every aspect of it, including the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court. Its provisions must be interpreted and more importantly applied in accordance with internationally recognized human rights; first and foremost, in the context of the Statute,[244] the right of a fair trial, a concept broadly perceived and applied, embracing the judicial process in its entirety.[245] The Statute itself makes evidence obtained in breach of internationally recognized human rights inadmissible in the circumstances specified by article 69 (7) of the Statute.[246] Where fair trial becomes impossible because of breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect or the accused by his/her accusers, it would be a contradiction in terms to put the person on trial. Justice could not be done. A fair trial is the only means to do justice. If no fair trial can be held, the object of the judicial process is frustrated and the process must be stopped [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[247]

---

[243] See also n. 32 and accompanying text (with respect to Art. 55 of the ICC Statute).

[244] Here, the judges referred to, among other things, Art. 64, para. 2 of the ICC Statute ("The Trial Chamber shall ensure that a trial is fair and expeditious and is conducted with full respect for the rights of the accused and due regard for the protection of victims and witnesses") and Art. 67, para. 1 of the ICC Statute. See for this latter provision (and the argument that it applies in the pre-trial phase as well) ns. 201 and 261 of Chapter VIII and n. 45 of Chapter IX. See finally ns. 44, 96 and 242 and accompanying text of the present chapter.

[245] It may be interesting to note that the judges referred here to Nowak 1993, p. 244, see also n. 194 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

[246] See n. 265 of Chapter IX.

[247] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 37. Note this refusal of jurisdiction would, of course, be the final ending of the case before the ICC. It was already discussed in Chapter III that a stay of the proceedings may be lifted (as happened in another decision of the Lubanga Dyilo case, decided some two years after this one, see n. 623 of Chapter III) but that would only be possible with regard to irregularities which can truly be repaired. However, certain male captus situations are so serious that they can no longer be fixed. In such cases, the judges will permanently stay the proceedings/refuse jurisdiction as a remedy. See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber I entitled "Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Article 54(3)(e) agreements and the application to stay the prosecution of the accused, together with certain other issues raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008"' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 OA 13, 21 October 2008, paras. 79-80: "The above statements in the Judgment of 14 December 2006 [here, the Appeals Chamber referred to paras. 37 and 39 of the 14 December 2006 decision, ChP] were made in the context of allegations by the appellant in that case that he had been illegally detained and ill-treated by the Congolese authorities and that the Prosecutor had illegally colluded with these authorities, in

First of all, one should welcome the broad (pre-trial) interpretation the ICC gives here to a fair trial. This point was already suggested in Chapter IX (see footnote 248 and accompanying text of that chapter) but it is very good to see that the ICC shares this position. However, one should not be dazzled by these beautiful words.[248] After all, the male detentus test states that "[w]here fair trial becomes impossible because of breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect or the accused by his/her accusers, it would be a contradiction in terms to put the person on trial [emphasis added, ChP]". The words "by his/her accusers" typically seems to refer to the ICC (Prosecution), which obviously includes concerted action between the ICC and third parties.[249] Given the information provided in the previous pages, one can arguably also include here violations committed by third parties working at the behest of the ICC.

However, what if the President of State A (a State Party to the ICC), who has called upon the international community for months to arrest a certain suspect from State B (a non-State Party to the ICC) who keeps committing serious international crimes in State A, is frustrated by the inaction of the international community and contravention of the rights of the appellant. The nature of the allegations was such that, if established, the breaches of the rights of the appellant might have led to an objectively irreparable and incurable situation. Accordingly, the Judgment of 14 December 2006 envisaged that a stay of proceedings imposed on such a basis would be absolute and permanent. The Judgment of 14 December 2006, however, did not rule out the imposition of a conditional stay of proceedings in suitable circumstances. If the unfairness to the accused person is of such nature that – at least theoretically – a fair trial might become possible at a later stage because of a change in the situation that led to the stay, a conditional stay of the proceedings may be the appropriate remedy. Such a conditional stay is not entirely irreversible: if the obstacles that led to the stay of the proceedings fall away, the Chamber that imposed the stay may decide to lift it in appropriate circumstances and if this would not occasion unfairness to the accused person for other reasons, in particular in light of his or her right to be tried without undue delay (see article 67 (1) (c) of the Statute). If a trial that is fair in all respects becomes possible as a result of changed circumstances, there would be no reason not to put on trial a person who is accused of genocide, crimes against humanity or war crimes – deeds which must not go unpunished and for which there should be no impunity (see paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Preamble to the Statute)."

---

[248] Cf. also Sluiter 2009, p. 465.

[249] Cf. also the following references under issue C of the decision: "The doctrine of abuse of process had ab initio a human rights dimension in that the causes for which the power of the Court to stay or discontinue proceedings were largely associated with breaches of the rights of the litigant, the accused in the criminal process, such as delay, illegal or deceitful conduct on the part of the prosecution and violations of the rights of the accused in the process of bringing him/her to justice [emphasis added, ChP]." (ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 36.) See also ibid., para. 38, the paragraph immediately following the quotation mentioned at n. 247 and accompanying text: "The decision of the European Court of Human Rights in the Case of Teixeira de Castro v. Portugal, a case of entrapment by undercover agents, provides an example of serious breaches of the rights of the accused by the investigating authorities, rendering the holding of a fair trial impossible. The following passage from the judgment puts the matter in perspective as to the implications that such conduct may have on the holding of a fair trial. Improper conduct by the investigating authorities and the use of evidence resulting therefrom "in the impugned criminal proceedings meant that, right from the outset, the applicant was definitively deprived of a fair trial." [emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP]" orders the kidnapping of the suspect (at a moment when that suspect was back in State B) – a kidnapping which was accompanied by mistreatment (albeit not serious mistreatment)[250] and followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from State B. State A ignores these protests and subsequently places the suspect in detention. The ICC, which was already making initial inquiries to find out whether a proper investigation could be initiated, now requests the arrest and surrender of the suspect from State A which subsequently surrenders the suspect to The Hague.[251] Such a male captus may be deemed by judges to be so serious (note that the ICC judges will probably attach more weight to an abduction (followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect, see supra)) and falling within the context of the ICC case, even if the ICC was not yet formally involved in the case, that jurisdiction must be refused. Under the abuse of process doctrine advocated in this study (which merely demands such a serious male captus in the context of an ICC case that judges, in good conscience, can no longer continue with the case), this would not have constituted any problem. However, under the above-mentioned ICC test, this would not be possible. After all, the violations did not occur at a time when the ICC was involved in the case, cannot be seen as being executed "by his/her accusers" (the abduction was not executed by State A on behalf of the ICC). In addition, and this point was already briefly made at the end of the previous chapter, under the abuse of process doctrine, violations of State sovereignty (and of other values such as the rule of law more generally) can easily be taken into account, whereas one can question whether this would also be possible under the ICC test, which only focuses on human rights violations.[252] In another scenario, one could replace the kidnappers of State A with private individuals. Here, an additional problem could arise. Even if the judges, using the above-mentioned test, accept that those private individuals can be seen as "his/her accusers", one or more of them may be of the opinion that private individuals simply cannot violate internationally recognised human rights (or the sovereignty of another State).[253] In that case, jurisdiction cannot be refused, [250] The serious mistreatment/torture issue is complicated and will be separately addressed infra.

[251] See also Currie 2007, pp. 383-384. (See also n. 50 of Chapter I.)
[252] See also the problems identified by Currie (ibid., p. 393) in that respect: "[I]n rejecting the use of the abuse of process doctrine the Appeals Chamber has taken a distinctly different tack on its powers than that taken by the ICTY and ICTR. On the whole, by way of a strict interpretation of its powers regarding jurisdiction and process, the Court may have painted itself into a corner on the abduction issue. If it has no access to abuse of process powers, then the justiciability of sovereignty violations in the apprehension of an accused (as opposed to human rights violations) is in doubt. Yet, as argued above, a failure by the Court to deal with this issue when presented is likely to wreak havoc. A possible solution is to treat the sovereignty violation as a human rights issue. If an individual is abducted in state A by officials/agents of state B, then the arresting parties are acting illegally under the laws of state A and the apprehension itself amounts to, in human rights terms, an arbitrary detention or illegal deprivation of liberty. This is a workable solution that nonetheless leaves the inter-state conflict outside the Court's purview, and will only cover some situations. Alternatively, perhaps the answer lies in the inherent powers of the Court to which the Appeals Chamber briefly averred, but this is currently far from clear."
[253] See Subsection 3.2 of Chapter III. Currie has a simple solution in that respect, see ibid., p. 389: "In a Nikolić-type situation where the fugitive was "apprehended" by persons unknown who have no provable connection to state forces, the acts of these persons should be treated as those of state authorities, in whereas this would, in principle, be unproblematic under the broad abuse of process doctrine, which merely demands that judges have to assess whether the male captus is so serious that jurisdiction must be refused.[254]

However, the criticism does not stop here. The test itself is not clear either. After all, two paragraphs later, the judges state: "Where the breaches of the rights of the accused are such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence within the framework of his[/her] rights, no fair trial can take place and the proceedings can be stayed."[255] First of all, there is a clear difference between the obligation to stop the proceedings in the first formulation of the test ("If no fair trial can be held, the object of the judicial process is frustrated and the process must be stopped [emphasis added, ChP]") and the discretion mentioned in the second formulation of the test, where it is explained that if no fair trial can take place, "the proceedings can be stayed [emphasis added, ChP]". However, more importantly, although the first formulation (correctly) appears to acknowledge that certain violations of the fundamental rights of the suspect can already entail that one can no longer speak of a fair trial (in the broad sense of the word), the second formulation seemingly demands more, namely that the violations of the accused have to be "such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence within the framework of his[/her] rights". Hence, only if those violations are such as to entail the accused no longer being able to mount his defence, one can say that no fair trial can be held. This reasoning, which was also identified in the ICTY Karadžić case,[256] can be criticised as it can be seen as a return to the old-fashioned concept of a fair trial, focusing on the fair trial in the courtroom.[257] Under this formulation, the accused order to dispense with any argument as to whether the accused enjoys human rights vis-à-vis private actors [original footnote omitted, ChP]".

---

[254] See also n. 738 of Chapter VI.

[255] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 39.

[256] See ns. 727 and 733 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. For another more recent case, one could perhaps also refer here to the French case of Carlos the Jackal (Ramirez Sánchez), where the French Supreme Court agreed with the following statement of the Court of Appeal: "Moreover, case-law also provides that the circumstances in which someone, against whom proceedings are lawfully being taken and against whom a valid arrest warrant has been issued, has been apprehended and handed over to the French legal authorities are not in themselves sufficient to render the proceedings void, provided that they have not vitiated the search for and process of establishing the truth, nor made it impossible for the defence to exercise its rights before the investigating authorities and the trial courts." See ns. 535 and 537 and accompanying text of Chapter V. See also, but arguably to a lesser extent, the Barbie case, see n. 496 and accompanying text of the same chapter.

[257] This also clearly contradicts the Appeals Chamber's earlier and welcome words on "the right of a fair trial, a concept broadly perceived and applied, embracing the judicial process in its entirety", see n. 245 and accompanying text. See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, para. 11: "The principles of a fair trial are not confined to trial proceedings but extend to pre-trial proceedings as well as the investigation of crime; a fact directly borne out by the provisions of article 55 and 54 (1) may suffer very serious violations, but if he is still able, in spite of these violations, to make his defence, the ICC could conclude that a fair trial can still take place. However, in such a case, the judges should consider whether the serious violations as such are not already so serious that one can no longer speak of a fair trial in general/that it would be unfair to have a trial in the first place/that it would undermine the integrity of the Court to proceed[258] and thus that jurisdiction must be refused, whether or not the accused is still able to make his defence. In that respect, the subsequent words of the ICC judges are to be welcomed – also because they emphasise the importance of a fair trial to anyone, even to persons charged with very serious crimes – but they arguably do not comport with the idea mentioned in the second formulation:

> Unfairness in the treatment of the suspect or the accused may rupture the process to an extent making it impossible to piece together the constituent elements of a fair trial. In those circumstances, the interest of the world community to put persons accused of the most heinous crimes against humanity on trial, great as it is, is outweighed by the need to sustain the efficacy of the judicial process as the potent agent of justice.[259]

Another point concerning (what could be seen as) the third formulation of the male detentus test should be mentioned. These words (and see also the words mentioned at footnotes 241 and 255 and accompanying text) show that the Appeals Chamber seems mostly concerned with the violations as such and not with the question as to whether these violations were, for example, committed intentionally or not.[260] This

---

(c) of the Statute. Breach of or deviation from the rules of a fair trial at the pre-trial stage of the proceedings may have implications on the proceedings and may affect the outcome of the trial. Purging the pre-trial process of errors consequential in the above sense is designed as a safeguard for the integrity of the proceedings." Cf. finally the words of Sluiter in n. 246 of Chapter IX or in n. 276 of the present chapter.

[258] In the words of Choo 1994 B, p. 629, commenting on the Bennett case: "Central to the decision of the House of Lords was the notion that a criminal court should not be concerned solely with accurate fact-finding or, to put it another way, the determination of the 'truth.' A court also has a duty to protect the moral integrity of the criminal process." It appears that Groenhuijsen and Knigge also focus on this broad concept of a fair trial. They state (see Groenhuijsen and Knigge 2004, p. 154 or n. 617 of Chapter III) that the inadmissibility of the Prosecution is especially then the appropriate answer when the non-compliance entails that one can no longer speak of a fair trial and that the question is not whether the non-compliance seriously violates the principles of proper procedure but whether initiating or continuing a prosecution in spite of such non-compliance would violate fundamental principles of law. In this context, they note the emergence of a suspect's right to a fair trial and the principle of fair balancing as central criteria.

[259] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 39.

[260] See also ICC, Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Urgent Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Article 54(3)(e) agreements and the application to stay the prosecution of the accused, together with certain other issues raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008' may be viewed as a rather broad stance as other courts have often demanded, in their male detentus test, an intention on the part of the prosecuting authorities to commit the male captus.[261] Nevertheless, even though the ICC does not explicitly demand an intent, it seems clear that it requires serious violations – cf. the words "[w]here fair trial becomes impossible because of breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect or the accused by his/her accusers" – and that it is very well possible that the ICC may only view those violations which are committed intentionally (note, by the way, that some male captus situations, such as an abduction, can arguably not be committed unintentionally)[262] as serious violations which can lead to the ending of the case.[263] In any case, one can assume that the ICC will more readily refuse jurisdiction if the violations are committed intentionally, even if its test does not require the violations to be intentional.

Before turning to issue D, one final, and not unimportant, point must be made. In the previous pages, three formulations of a test which could lead to the ending of an ICC case were presented. As this case's central problem deals with the consequences of an alleged male captus, with problems related to the way a person was brought to justice/into the jurisdiction of the Court, the three formulations were also applied to that specific situation. This seems logical. Indeed, as will be shown at footnote 292 and accompanying text, the Appeals Chamber clarified the fact that this decision dealt with "the process of bringing the appellant to justice" (the remainder of the Appeals Chamber's words will be discussed infra) and that it had examined whether "in relation to this process (…) breaches of the rights of the suspect or the accused may provide ground for halting the process." In addition, one could also refer here to the already-mentioned (see footnote 247) words of the Appeals Chamber almost two years later that the paragraphs in which one can find these three formulations were made in the context of Lubanga Dyilo's male captus allegations.

Nevertheless, it is also possible – and this might explain the differences between the (broader) first and third formulation on the one hand and the (restricted) second

---

(Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 13 June 2008, para. 90, where the Trial Chamber, after having referred to paras. 36 and 39 of the 14 December 2006 decision states: "It is not a necessary precondition, therefore, for the exercise of this jurisdiction [this word is a little confusing but arguably refers to the power of the court to stay the proceedings, see ibid., ChP] that the prosecution is found to have acted mala fides. It is sufficient that this has resulted in a violation of the rights of the accused in bringing him to justice."

[261] See n. 20 of Chapter VII (for the inter-State context). In the male captus decisions of the tribunals, the intent is not explicitly mentioned, but some reasonings could definitely contain this element, see ns. 120-122 of Chapter VII. Note finally that the first male detentus possibility proposed by the OTP itself in the case of Nikolić also clearly contains this element, see ns. 114 and 116 and accompanying text of Chapter VII and n. 263 of the present chapter.

[262] See n. 20 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.

[263] Cf. in that respect also the Prosecution in Nikolić which clarified, after having mentioned its first male detentus possibility, which contains the element of intent ("[u]nambiguous, advertent violations of international law which can be attributed to the Office of the Prosecutor [emphasis added, ChP]"): "(i.e. the Prosecution's own conduct would have to be in some way egregious [emphasis in original, ChP])". See ns. 114 and 116 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.

formulation on the other – that the second formulation is not dealing with alleged male captus situations but with problems relating to the actual trial proceedings. The words would then not be a more strict and demanding version of the Appeals Chamber's test regarding male captus problems (see the first and third formulations which could very well be applied to such problems), but simply another, additional possibility for the judge to stay the proceedings. A possibility which is not focused on problems related to the way a person was brought into the jurisdiction of the now trying forum, but on problems which occur during the actual trial proceedings. In that case, the second formulation supports the idea that a judge, alongside staying the proceedings because of a male captus situation, because of irregularities in the way a person was brought into the jurisdiction of the prosecuting forum (see the first and third formulations), can also stay the proceedings when during the trial, serious violations occur which entail that the accused can no longer make his defence. The fact that the Appeals Chamber was also interested in other situations which could lead to a stay of the proceedings, see footnote 241 and accompanying text, may also lead to that conclusion. A final point which could be used as support for the view that the second formulation may be focused on irregularities in the actual trial proceedings is the fact that both the first and third formulation speak of "suspect or the accused", whereas the second formulation only uses the word "accused". However, with respect to this last point, it could also be argued that the use of the word "accused" does not necessarily mean that the second formulation may not be applied to male captus problems; even though most male captus claims will be made by suspects like Lubanga Dyilo, before the confirmation of the charges, it is not impossible either that an accused makes such a claim. See in that respect also the already-mentioned words of the Appeals Chamber at footnote 241 and accompanying text, where it talked about "violations of the rights of the accused in the process of bringing him/her to justice [emphasis added, ChP]."

Having said that, it is now time to see how the Appeals Chamber tackled issue D. It noted the Defence's claim that the Pre-Trial Chamber had "adopted an unduly restrictive approach to the relinquishment of jurisdiction for violations of the fundamental rights of the accused [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[264] The Appeals Chamber did not concur, however. In fact, it held that the Pre-Trial Chamber had adopted an even broader standard "than the one warranted in law in that it failed to require the specific consideration of whether a fair trial remained possible in the particular circumstances of the case".[265] According to the Appeals Chamber, the Pre-Trial Chamber's conclusion that no ill-treatment took place in Lubanga Dyilo's arrest and surrender to the ICC "sideline[d] the importance of the precise ambit of the test".[266] What the Pre-Trial Chamber apparently should have considered, according to the Appeals Chamber, was whether there were violations and if so, whether, in spite of these violations, a fair trial would still be possible. Only if the violations were such that one could no longer speak of a fair trial, could jurisdiction be refused. This can be seen as a repetition of the first and third formulation of the male detentus test mentioned above. However, it is arguably different from the second formulation – if that formulation can indeed be applied to male captus situations in the first place, see supra – which requires that these violations must in fact make it impossible for the accused to make his defence.

[264] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 40.
[265] Ibid.
[266] Ibid.

Another complaint of the Defence, the Appeals Chamber continued, was > that the Pre-Trial Chamber applied the wrong standard in reviewing the efficacy of the process leading to the arrest and surrender of the suspect, allegedly ignoring or paying inadequate attention to the supervisory role of the Pre-Trial Chamber under article 59 (2) of the Statute [original footnote omitted, ChP].[267]

According to the Defence, "the Pre-trial Chamber is charged under this article to review the correctness of the decision of the Congolese authority to sanction the enforcement of the warrant of arrest".[268] However, the Appeals Chamber did not agree with this either: "[n]o such role is cast on the Court".[269] Nevertheless, in its subsequent explanation, the Appeals Chamber did admit – and arguably correctly so – a certain supervisory role with respect to the points which the competent judicial authority in the custodial State must determine pursuant to Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute. It explained:

> The Court does not sit in the process (…) on judgment as a court of appeal on the identificatory decision of the Congolese judicial authority. Its task is to see that the process envisaged by Congolese law was duly followed and that the rights of the arrestee were properly respected.[270]

Although it is, of course, true that the ICC is not a court of appeal with respect to the decisions of the competent judicial authority under Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute, it would nevertheless be extremely wise for the ICC to check whether the person surrendered to the ICC is indeed the person in which it is interested (if there are reasons to doubt the correct identity of the surrendered person). Otherwise, the wrong person will be tried. With respect to determinations (b) (has the person been arrested in accordance with the proper process) and (c) (have the rights of the person been respected) of Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute, the ICC clearly states that it has a role to play here. This can not only be deduced from the word "[i]ts", which refers to "[t]he Court", the ICC, but also from the remainder of the paragraph, where it is stated that

---

[267] Ibid., para. 41.
[268] Ibid.
[269] Ibid.
[270] Ibid.

> the Pre-Trial Chamber determined that the process followed accorded with Congolese law. There is nothing to contradict this statement in light of the fact that the suspect was in custody for crimes coming within the purview of the military authorities. The suspect was afforded an opportunity to voice his views before the judicial authority that examined the request for his surrender. Moreover, there is nothing to indicate that his arrest or appearance before the Congolese authority involved or entailed any violation of his rights.[271]

It is good that the Appeals Chamber, like the Pre-Trial Chamber, (marginally) checks whether Lubanga Dyilo's was arrested in accordance with the proper process and whether his rights were respected. In addition, it is to be welcomed that in doing so, the Appeals Chamber, in contrast to the Pre-Trial Chamber,[272] explicitly and systematically turns to the points mentioned in Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute. Unfortunately, however, and again in contrast to the Pre-Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber does not delve into whether the competent judicial authority, in determining points (b) and (c) of Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute, could also look at the phase prior to the official ICC arrest. Although it stated that "[t]he suspect was afforded an opportunity to voice his views before the judicial authority that examined the request for his surrender" – which views also concerned this phase prior to the official ICC arrest – the Appeals Chamber only mentions this point to explain that Lubanga Dyilo's rights, including the right to voice his concerns before the competent judicial authority, were respected in the context of the execution of the official ICC request for arrest and surrender. Because of that, it is also unclear whether the ICC judges, as the supervisors marginally checking the scope of Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute, would also look into the arrest/detention prior to the official ICC arrest under Article 59 of the ICC Statute. Both the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Appeals Chamber can be criticised for not clearly elucidating this point.[273]

In addition, and this point was also mentioned in the context of the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision, the Appeals Chamber does not explain whether the competent judicial authority (or the Appeals Chamber marginally supervising the competent judicial authority), in the context of Article 59 of the ICC Statute, must also look to provisions such as Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute and Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute. The Appeals Chamber agreed with the Pre-Trial Chamber "that the process followed accorded with Congolese law" and that "there is nothing to indicate that his arrest or appearance before the Congolese authority involved or entailed any violation of his rights". However, this appears to refer to national law only. It was explained in Chapter VIII that Article 59, paragraph 2 (b) of the ICC Statute implied that the national process cannot violate international (human rights) law[274] and that Article 59, paragraph 2 (c) of the ICC Statute may also refer to consistency with human rights treaties.[275] In addition, Chapter IX clarified the fact that whenever the ICC exercises jurisdiction, whenever the ICC is involved in a case (including actions of third parties working at the behest of the ICC), that involvement must be consistent with Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute: internationally recognised human rights. Finally, it must not be forgotten that Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute applies as from the initiation of the investigation. This apparently restricted interpretation by the Appeals Chamber of the scope of Article 59 of the ICC Statute can be criticised. In the words of Sluiter:

[271] Ibid.
[272] See n. 141 and accompanying text.
[273] Note that in the context of the Pre-Trial Chamber's discussion of the scope of Art. 59 of the ICC Statute, it was assumed that the ICC judges would look at irregularities in the context of an arrest/detention prior to the official ICC arrest if that arrest/detention was somehow related to the ICC proceedings. It can be argued that this assumption found support in the Pre-Trial Chamber's later remark that it will look at irregularities even prior to the official ICC arrest if the ICC was involved in these irregularities, in the case of concerted action between the ICC and third parties.

> This ruling leaves us in the dark as to (i) the applicable law – only Congolese law, or also internationally protected human rights law, and (ii) the level of review – what margin of appreciation is left to national courts? The Appeals Chamber emphasis seems to be, however, on an interpretation of Article 59 (2) as essentially – or merely – offering the protection of national law. This can in my opinion be inferred from the conclusion in this section that 'the process followed accorded with Congolese law'. The logical follow-up question, whether Congolese law – or simply the process as it was applied in practice – was consistent with internationally protected human rights, at least those rights set out in treaties to which Congo is a party, is not addressed. Hereby, Article 59 (2) loses much of its protective force and its interpretation is not in keeping with Article 21 (3) of the Statute.[276]

Then, "[t]he gravamen of the appellant's complaint, where the essence of the appellant's case lies",[277] was addressed, namely "that the Pre-Trial Chamber ignored

[274] See n. 155 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.
[275] See n. 157 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.
[276] Sluiter 2009, pp. 473-474. See also ibid., p. 465: "Another matter which was not tackled head-on by the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga concerns the effect of Article 21 (3) for the pre-trial phase. Clearly, the applicable law of the ICC and the right to a fair trial is not confined to what happens in the courtroom, or at the seat of the Court. The protection of Article 21 (3), like the protection of the right to a fair trial, should extend to the pre-trial phase. Any other approach deprives individuals of essential protection and may make the Court the beneficiary of activities it would not wish to be associated with. A number of provisions in the Statute, like Articles 55 and 59, are illustrative of a deliberate and wise choice for closer supervision of the pre-trial phase. However, (…) the initial case law of the ICC reveals a tendency to retreat within the safe limits of The Hague and a strong desire to keep hands clean by refusing to supervise activities within domestic jurisdictions. By doing so, the adverse effect may be achieved: a refusal to review the national activities that have benefited the Court can with good reason be seen as acceptance of them, and implicates the integrity of international proceedings. And since we are dealing with proceedings that extend over many jurisdiction, with a great variety in the national level of protection, a strong supervisory effect triggered by Article 21 (3) seems to me indispensable, simply to save the credibility of the Court in human rights terms." (See also n. 197 and accompanying text.)
[277] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of breaches of his human rights prior to his appearance before the Court and the directions for the enforcement of the warrant of arrest [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[278] (these "directions for the enforcement of the warrant of arrest" is probably a reference to the request for arrest and surrender), and that the Prosecution was involved in these breaches.[279] However, the Appeals Chamber concurred with the Pre-Trial Chamber that there was no concerted action between the ICC and the DRC authorities,[280] emphasising that "[m]ere knowledge on the part of the Prosecutor of the investigations carried out by the Congolese authorities is no proof of involvement on his part in the way they were conducted or the means including detention used for the purpose".[281] This appears to mean that the Appeals Chamber agrees with the Pre-Trial Chamber's test mentioned at footnote 145 and accompanying text that if there was concerted action prior to the sending of the request for arrest and surrender, the Appeals Chamber would look into these violations.[282] This also corresponds with what seemingly is the Appeals Chamber's view of the ambit of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, which extends to situations in which the ICC exercises jurisdiction, to situations in which the ICC is involved ("by his/her accusers"). As stated earlier, this will cover a fair amount of the context of the ICC's case, but it is arguably not enough. The ICC should consider any violations which occur in the context of its case more generally, whether or not the ICC (or third parties working for it) was involved in it.

Finally, the Appeals Chamber also concluded that "the findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber respecting the absence of torture or serious mistreatment have not been shown to be erroneous in any way".[283]

It can be argued that it is not very clear how this last point should be assessed. It does mean, of course, that the Appeals Chamber concurs factually with the Pre-Trial Chamber that there was no serious mistreatment/torture in this case, but does it mean more than that?

Of course, one can expect that the serious mistreatment/torture point can be integrated in the Appeals Chamber's own male detentus test. Although this test is not entirely clear because of the different formulations used, the first formulation appears to have some additional support in the decision. This formulation reads:

> Where fair trial becomes impossible because of breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect or the accused by his/her accusers, it would be a contradiction in terms to the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 42.

---

[278] Ibid.

[279] See ibid.

[280] See ibid.

[281] Ibid.

[282] See also n. 1215 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[283] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 43.

> put the person on trial. Justice could not be done. A fair trial is the only means to do justice. If no fair trial can be held, the object of the judicial process is frustrated and the process must be stopped.[284]

Obviously, if the suspect's male captus, executed by "his/her accusers" (which should be read to include third parties working at the request of the ICC), is accompanied by serious mistreatment/torture (surely breaches of his fundamental rights), it would be very difficult for the judges to maintain that this would not jeopardise the (fairness of the) trial.

However, the more interesting question is, of course, whether the words of the Appeals Chamber must be understood to mean that it would also refuse jurisdiction in the case of serious mistreatment/torture irrespective of the entity responsible, for example, when the male captus was perpetrated by private individuals alone,[285] cf. the Nikolić case?

In the Duch case before the ECCC, the co-investigating judges referred to the paragraph which contained the words of the Appeals Chamber that "the findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber respecting the absence of torture or serious mistreatment have not been shown to be erroneous in any way"[286] to argue that the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo followed the Trial Chamber's decision in Nikolić, in which it was clearly stated that the ICTY, under the abuse of process doctrine, would refuse jurisdiction in the case of serious violations of the rights of the suspect, such as serious mistreatment/torture, irrespective of the entity responsible, for example, if the male captus was committed by private individuals.[287] Hence, the co-investigating judges in Duch were of the opinion that the ICC Appeals Chamber would also refuse jurisdiction in such a case.[288]

---

[284] Ibid., para. 37. See also n. 247 and accompanying text.

[285] Who arguably would not fall under such concepts as his/her accusers/constructive custody/arrest and detention at the behest of/concerted action.

[286] See ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 19, n. 19.

[287] See ibid., para. 18, where the co-investigating judges quoted the following words of the Trial Chamber in Nikolić: "Whether such a decision should be taken also depends entirely on the facts of the case and cannot be decided in the abstract. Accordingly, the level of violence used against the Accused must be assessed. Here, the Chamber observes that the assumed facts, although they do raise some concerns, do not at all show that the treatment of the Accused by the unknown individuals (…) was of such an egregious nature."

[288] See ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 21: "The Co-Investigating Judges are (…) compelled to follow the solution adopted in Nikolic and Lubanga which requires, for the application of the abuse of [process] doctrine, the existence of grave violations of the rights of the Accused. Where it has not been established or even alleged that DUCH suffered incidents of torture or serious mistreatment prior to his transfer before the Extraordinary Chambers, the prolonged detention under the jurisdiction of the Military Court, in comparison with the crimes against humanity alleged against the Accused, cannot be considered a sufficiently grave violation of the rights of the Accused." See also ibid., para. 19 where the judges explain that the ICC had "held that the violation of the rights of the defendant at the time of his prior arrest and detention could only be taken into account in two cases: if the court acted in concert with the external authorities, or if the defendant was the victim of torture or serious mistreatment." See (arguably equally incorrect) ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for

However, whether the ICC's Appeals Chamber would refuse jurisdiction in the case of serious mistreatment/torture, irrespective of the entity responsible, is not clear at all.

First, one must not forget that the remarks made by the Pre-Trial Chamber on serious mistreatment/torture were made in the context of the abuse of process doctrine, a doctrine which the Appeals Chamber has explicitly rejected. It could, of course, be argued that it is true that the abuse of process doctrine was rejected, but that the Appeals Chamber nevertheless accepted the human rights dimension of that doctrine and that the serious mistreatment/torture exception could fall under that Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute dimension. However, as stated above, within that human rights dimension, the Appeals Chamber already created its own male detentus test, one which seemingly requires that the violations (which indeed may include serious mistreatment/torture) must be executed by "his/her accusers", which refers to the ICC/involvement of the ICC/actions of third parties working at the behest of the ICC, cf. concepts like concerted action and constructive custody.

Secondly (and this point was also briefly made earlier in this chapter),[289] the Pre-Trial Chamber's view of the abuse of process doctrine itself is not clear. This is because it writes that the application of this doctrine, to date, "has been confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]".

This is arguably incorrect, but it is uncertain whether the Pre-Trial Chamber is aware of this mistake. It is unclear whether it is of the opinion that this is the correct test (requiring that the male captus be committed by national authorities) or whether it would now be of the opinion that these words were indeed incorrectly formulated and that it would also refuse jurisdiction in the case of serious mistreatment/torture, irrespective of the entity responsible, hence also including, for example, the actions of private individuals.

Because of the Appeals Chamber's rejection of the abuse of process doctrine and the lack of clarity with respect to the Pre-Trial Chamber's view of the abuse of process doctrine, it is not clear how the Appeals Chamber would act in the case of serious mistreatment/torture by, for example, private individuals.[290]

In other words, even though others have interpreted the decision to mean that the ICC Appeals Chamber would refuse jurisdiction in the case of serious mistreatment/torture, irrespective of the entity responsible, the fact that the Appeals Chamber explicitly rejected the (abuse of process) doctrine in which context that male detentus avenue was created and the lack of clarity with respect to the Pre-

---

Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 16 (or n. 1254 of Chapter VI). See also n. 1275 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[289] See n. 176 and accompanying text.

[290] In addition, one can wonder whether the Appeals Chamber, if it were to follow the Pre-Trial Chamber here, is also aware of the fact that the Pre-Trial Chamber correctly noted that to date, the application of that doctrine has been restricted to a certain situation – meaning that other male detentus avenues may be accepted in the future.

Trial Chamber's view of the abuse of process doctrine means that it is possible that the serious mistreatment/torture example only applies to the Appeals Chamber's own male detentus test, which demands violations by the ICC/violations in which the ICC is involved/violations by third parties working at the behest of the ICC ("by his/her accusers"). Hence, the only thing one can be clear of is that the test is unclear. (A conclusion, unfortunately, often made in this study.)

A final point which must be made about this decision before moving to the next case, the Bemba Gombo case, is that one can question to what extent Lubanga Dyilo would be entitled to less far-reaching remedies (than a refusal of jurisdiction) since that the Appeals Chamber has concluded that there was no serious mistreatment/torture in this case. Even if it is true that Lubanga Dyilo had not asked for this earlier in the proceedings,[291] judges should consider the issue. This is valid a fortiori for the judges of the Appeals Chamber as Lubanga Dyilo had mentioned this point in his fifth ground of appeal, see footnote 186 and accompanying text. In fact, one could argue that the ICC judges are obliged to look into any violation (and remedy that violation) in the event it can be said that the ICC was involved in the case, see Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, which covers the internationally recognised human right to an effective remedy against a violation. And going beyond that obligation: it would be good if the ICC were to remedy every violation occurring in the context of its cases more generally, whether or not the ICC was involved. However, unfortunately, the Appeals Chamber, in its final words before dismissing the appeal, did not go into that and focused only on the ultimate remedy, refusal of jurisdiction:

> At issue is the process of bringing the appellant to justice for the crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings before the Court. The Pre-Trial Chamber determined that it is in relation to this process that breaches of the rights of the suspect or the accused may provide ground for halting the process. And none was shown.[292]

This is truly to be regretted. Given the allegations of irregularities at the national level, irregularities which were partly confirmed by Human Rights Watch, it is a pity that the Appeals Chamber did not make a more serious effort to find out what happened to Lubanga Dyilo, whether the violations – if they did indeed occur – could be seen as falling within the context of the ICC case and if so, what kind of remedies Lubanga Dyilo would be entitled to.[293]

---

[291] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Redacted Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 17 November 2006, para. 62.

[292] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 44.

[293] See also Sluiter 2009, pp. 471-472.

In that context, it must also be stressed that the above-mentioned point of the Appeals Chamber that it would only look at irregularities which occur in "the process of bringing the appellant to justice for the crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings before the Court" does not seem to comport with the earlier statement that it would look at irregularities in the context of concerted action between the ICC and third parties.

This must be clarified further. In the discussion of the Pre-Trial Chamber's remarks on the scope of Article 59 of the ICC Statute, the ICC judges stated that the competent judicial authority was not obliged to look into the lawfulness of the suspect's arrest/detention prior to the sending of the request for arrest and surrender insofar as that detention was related solely to national proceedings. That implies that that authority was obliged to look at irregularities in the context of an arrest/detention prior to the official ICC arrest if that arrest/detention was somehow related to the ICC proceedings. Although the Pre-Trial Chamber did not itself clearly go into the role of the ICC judges, the supervisors of Article 59 of the ICC Statute, it was assumed that these words probably meant that the ICC judges would look into irregularities in the context of an arrest/detention prior to the official ICC arrest if that arrest/detention were somehow related to the ICC proceedings, an assumption which arguably found support in the Pre-Trial Chamber's later, more general, remark that the ICC judges would look into irregularities prior to the official ICC arrest if they were the result of concerted action between the ICC and third parties. Hence, if there is involvement of the ICC in the irregularities, if the national detention is somehow related to the ICC proceedings, if there is concerted action between the ICC and third parties, the irregularities stemming therefrom will be considered.

Now, one could argue that the Appeals Chamber's agreement with the Pre-Trial Chamber on the concerted action point means that the Appeals Chamber would also look into irregularities in the above-mentioned contexts, for example, if the national detention were somehow related to the ICC proceedings.

Nevertheless, the Appeals Chamber now requires an additional point, namely that it would not look into a national detention if the suspect was in detention for crimes other than the ones for which the ICC was now prosecuting this suspect. However, that is arguably a stricter view than the idea that one would look at the national detention if that detention was somehow related to the ICC proceedings, if there was concerted action between the ICC and third parties.

To provide an example, it is not impossible that the Prosecutor informally requests national authorities to keep a suspect, who is in detention for crimes other than those in which the ICC is interested, in custody so that the Prosecutor has more time to prepare a request for arrest and surrender. In such a case, it can be argued that the ICC should definitely be able to consider alleged violations occurring in this arrest/detention, for the simple reason that the ICC was involved in it, because that national detention was somehow related to the ICC proceedings, whether that suspect was in detention at the national level for the same crimes in which the ICC is now interested or not.[294]

In fact, it could be argued, see also supra, that the judges should adopt an even broader stance. It is submitted that the ICC judges should decide for themselves whether the irregularities can be seen as falling within the context of their case more generally. Of course, the fact that somebody is in custody at the national level for crimes other than those in which the ICC is interested and the fact that the ICC is not somehow involved in that arrest/detention may very well constitute good reasons to argue that irregularities occurring in that context cannot be seen as falling within the context of the ICC case. However, judges may also take other elements into account here. It is very well possible that judges feel that this detention made the surrender to the ICC in the end possible and thus that it can be seen as falling within the context of the ICC case more generally. If the judges in that case were also to follow the normal abuse of process doctrine, it is by no means unthinkable that, if a person, during this national detention, is seriously mistreated by the national authorities and then, after the ICC becomes involved in the case, is subsequently surrendered to the ICC, the judges may nevertheless refuse jurisdiction, even if the national charges were not exactly the same as those of the ICC and even if the ICC was not yet involved in the case. They could then adopt the following, and more general, task assigned to courts (even if that task stems from a decision addressed by the ICC judges in the context of the (later rejected) abuse of process doctrine), namely that they accept their "inescapable duty to secure fair treatment for those who come or are brought before them [emphasis added, ChP]".[295]

---

[294] Cf. also the discussion of the scope of Art. 60, para. 4 of the ICC Statute in Chapter VIII of this book. As argued in that chapter, involvement of the Prosecutor does not necessarily have to be triggered by an ICC arrest warrant and thus by detention based on the ICC charges. For another opinion, see the references in n. 510 of the present chapter or n. 265 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.

[295] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 29. This quotation is from Lord Devlin's opinion in the Connelly case as discussed in Bennett and has already been mentioned earlier in this study, see n. 127 and accompanying text of Chapter V. The example from the main text could also fall under the abuse of process doctrine of the Pre-Trial Chamber, which demands "instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]". (This broad stance was arguably also accepted by the Defence and the Prosecution in that case, see n. 195.) See also the abuse of process doctrine under Duch: "Where the violations in question are not attributable to an international tribunal, this doctrine appears to be confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by the external authorities and has most usually been applied in relation to the process of arrest and transfer [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 33.) See further the following formulation from Bennett (a formulation which was also used in the ICTY Milošević case (see n. 411 of Chapter VI) and the ICTR Barayagwiza case (see n. 842 of Chapter VI)): "[A] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the

3 BEMBA GOMBO

The second ICC case under discussion here is the case of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo,[296] former vice-President and senator of the DRC and alleged President and Commander-in-chief of the Mouvement de Libération du Congo (MLC), an armed group which intervened, among other things, in the conflict in the CAR, a neighbouring country of the DRC, between October 2002 and March 2003.

On Friday 23 May 2008, Pre-Trial Chamber III of the ICC issued a sealed warrant of arrest for Bemba Gombo,[297] including a request for provisional arrest.[298] The arrest warrant found that in the context of the MLC intervention in the CAR, there were reasonable grounds to believe that Bemba Gombo was criminally responsible for a number of war crimes and crimes against humanity.[299] The next morning, the Registry of the ICC notified the request for provisional arrest to the authorities of (ICC State Party) Belgium[300] because it had become known that Bemba Gombo was at that moment in Belgian territory.[301] The ICC used a request for provisional arrest pursuant to Article 92 of the ICC Statute instead of the normal request for arrest and surrender pursuant to Article 91 of the ICC Statute, as it was discovered that Bemba Gombo wanted to leave Belgium a few days later, namely on accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case [emphasis added ChP]." (House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161.) See finally the ICTY Trial Chamber's view in Nikolić, arguing that "[d]ue process of law also includes questions such as (…) how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal [emphasis added, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111.) See also ibid., para. 114: "[I]n a situation where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subjected to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment to the exercise of jurisdiction over such an accused [emphasis added, ChP]."

---

[296] Much of the following has been taken from Paulussen 2010, pp. 195-205.

[297] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Urgent Warrant of Arrest for Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo' (Under seal), ICC-01/05-01/08, 23 May 2008.

[298] See CPI, La Chambre Préliminaire III, Situation en R[é]publique Centrafricaine, Affaire Le Procureur c. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Demande d'arrestation provisoire de M. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo adressée au Royaume de Belgique' (Sous scellés), ICC-01/05-01/08, 23 mai 2008.

[299] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Urgent Warrant of Arrest for Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo' (Under seal), ICC-01/05-01/08, 23 May 2008, para. 21.

[300] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision to Unseal the Warrant of Arrest for Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo' (Public Document), ICC-01/05-01/08, 24 May 2008, para. 5.

[301] See CPI, La Chambre Préliminaire III, Situation en R[é]publique Centrafricaine, Affaire Le Procureur c. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Demande d'arrestation provisoire de M. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo adressée au Royaume de Belgique' (Sous scellés), ICC-01/05-01/08, 23 mai 2008, para. 3: "Lors de l'audience, le Procureur a soutenu que M. Jean-Pierre Bemba aurait quitté la République portugaise pour se rendre au Royaume de Belgique, dans une demeure à l'extérieur de Bruxelles".

25 May.[302] Only 13 hours later,[303] at around 10 p.m. on Saturday evening,[304] Bemba Gombo was apprehended by Belgian authorities in Sint-Genesius-Rode, a small town near Brussels, where he had acquired a home.[305]

The next day (Sunday 25 May), Bemba Gombo was brought before Hervé Louveaux, juge d'instruction (investigating judge)[306] in Brussels.[307] According to the Loi de 29 mars 2004 concernant la coopération avec la cour pénale internationale et les tribunaux pénaux internationaux, the Belgian law describing Belgium's cooperation obligations with the ICC and other international criminal tribunals (hereinafter: the Belgian cooperation law),[308] Bemba Gombo needed to appear before this judge within 24 hours after his deprivation of liberty,[309] which was indeed what happened. The Belgian cooperation law also states that this judge must verify whether the person arrested is indeed the person sought and whether the documents as mentioned in Article 92, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute – which are the documents which must accompany the request for provisional arrest[310] – have been provided by the ICC.[311] In addition, this judge must issue a national arrest warrant, on which basis the ICC's request for provisional arrest can be executed.[312]

It must be noted that the Belgium cooperation law, in contrast to, for example, the Explanatory Memorandum to the Dutch International Criminal Court

---

[302] See ibid.: "Le Procureur a souligné l'urgence qu'il y avait pour la Chambre de traiter sa requête au regard des risques de fuite de M. Jean-Pierre Bemba. Lors de l'audience, le Procureur a soutenu que M. Jean-Pierre Bemba aurait quitté la République portugaise pour se rendre au Royaume de Belgique, dans une demeure à l'extérieur de Bruxelles qu'il compte apparemment quitter le 25 [m]ai 2008, pour une destination non connue à ce jour."

[303] See 'Jean-Pierre Bemba, former Congo warlord, arrested in Belgium', International Herald Tribune, 25 May 2008, available at: http://www.iht.com/articles/ap/2008/05/25/europe/EU-GEN-War-Crimes-Bemba.php.

[304] See the International Federation for Human Rights (FIDH) Legal Action Group's report FIDH and the situation in the Central African Republic before the International Criminal Court. The case of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, July 2008, No. 502a (available at: http://www.iccnow.org/documents/CPIaffbemba502ang2008.pdf), p. 20.

[305] See 'Jean-Pierre Bemba, former Congo warlord, arrested in Belgium', International Herald Tribune, 25 May 2008, available at: http://www.iht.com/articles/ap/2008/05/25/europe/EU-GEN-War-Crimes-Bemba.php.

[306] The English translations of the names of the different Belgium authorities have been taken from Vandermeersch 2004, pp. 133-157.

[307] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Application for interim release' (Public Document), [ICC-]ICC-01/05-01/-8, 23 July 2008, para. 8.

[308] This law can be consulted through the very practical University of Nottingham, Human Rights Law Centre, International Criminal Justice Unit's 'Database of National Implementing Legislation', available at: http://www.nottingham.ac.uk/law/hrlc/international-criminal-justice-unit/implementation-database.php.

[309] See Art. 14, para. 2 of the Belgian cooperation law. (The Belgian procedures regarding a request for provisional arrest can be found in the second section ('Demande d'arrestation provisoire') of Chapter 4 ('Arrestation, transfert, transit et remise de personnes à la Cour') of the Belgian cooperation law (Artt. 14-15).)

[310] See n. 124 of Chapter VIII.

[311] See again Art. 14, para. 2 of the Belgian cooperation law.

[312] See ibid.

Implementation Act,[313] does not explicitly mention the points of Article 59, paragraph 2 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute, namely that the judge also has to determine that the person has been arrested in accordance with the proper process and that the person's rights have been respected, see Chapter VIII. Looking at the literal text, one will only find that the investigating judge has to verify that the person before him is indeed the person sought by the ICC, thereby fulfilling the requirement as mentioned in Article 59, paragraph 2 (a) of the ICC Statute. Vandermeersch, in his article on the (then draft) Belgian cooperation law,[314] explains, however, that the requirement under (b) has also been included in the Belgian cooperation law and that the requirement under (c) is not particularly relevant.

To start with the first requirement (under (b), namely that the competent judicial authority has to determine that the person has been arrested in accordance with the proper process), Vandermeersch is of the opinion that this condition is fulfilled by the fact that the Belgian authority has to verify that the information required under Article 92, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute has been duly received.[315] Although it was earlier clarified in Chapter VIII that the exact meaning of this provision may differ from State to State, it is clear that this is a very restrictive view. In fact, one can assert that checking whether the ICC has provided all the necessary paperwork so that the request for provisional arrest can be executed is merely a small part of the process of verification that the person was arrested according to the proper process.

---

[313] See the Explanatory Memorandum to the International Criminal Court Implementation Act (Tweede Kamer der Staten-Generaal, Vergaderjaar 2001-2002, 28 098 (R 1704), Uitvoering van het Statuut van het Internationaal Strafhof met betrekking tot de samenwerking met en bijstand aan het Internationaal Strafhof en de tenuitvoerlegging van zijn vonnissen (Uitvoeringswet Internationaal Strafhof), Nr. 3, Memorie van Toelichting), p. 25: "The reference to article 59, paragraph 2 of the [ICC] Statute has been included because the Statute prescribes that the public prosecutor [the officier] checks with respect to a(n) (provisionally) arrested person whether there is perhaps a case of mistaken identity, whether the (national) arrest procedure has been correctly applied and whether the rights which the person pursuant to national and international law enjoys in this situation, have been respected [own translation, ChP]." The Dutch International Criminal Court Implementation Act itself (see n. 170 of Chapter VIII) only uses more general references, see Section 14 for provisional arrest ("After the person claimed has been questioned in accordance with article 55, paragraph 2, and article 59, paragraph 2 of the Statute, the public prosecutor may order that he be detained in police custody for three days from the moment of the provisional arrest [emphasis added, ChP].") and Section 18, para. 2 for arrest ("The person claimed shall be brought before the public prosecutor within 24 hours of his arrest. After questioning the person claimed in accordance with article 55, paragraph 2, and article 59, paragraph 2 of the Statute, the public prosecutor may order that he be detained in police custody until the date on which the District Court decides on his remand in custody [emphasis added, ChP].").

[314] See Vandermeersch 2004.

[315] Or at least, that is the impression one gets. After all, after each requirement from Art. 59, para. 2 of the ICC Statute, Vandermeersch adds a footnote arguably explaining what these requirements entail. After Art. 59, para. 2 (a) of the ICC Statute for example, he explains in n. 91 of his article: "Verification of the identity of the person." Likewise, one can read in n. 92 of his article (positioned after Art. 59, para. 2 (b) of the ICC Statute): "Verification that the information required under Art. 92.2 of the Statute has been duly received."

The competent judicial authority should also check whether the arrest itself was executed procedurally correctly.[316]

With respect to the second requirement (under (c), namely that the competent judicial authority has to determine that the person's rights have been respected), Vandermeersch comments: "This general formula is not of particular relevance within the present context, as the requirement to respect the rights of the accused is satisfied simply by following the relevant procedures prescribed by law."[317] This is, again, a rather restrictive view, see Subsection 3.2 of Chapter VIII. As explained in that subsection, where a – careful – analogy to the human right to liberty and security was drawn,[318] the competent judicial authority could, in fact, make a more substantive review, namely with respect to the prohibition of arbitrariness; although the substantive and procedural legal bases of the deprivation of liberty would not be readily labelled as arbitrary, this may be different with respect to the second element of arbitrariness, which relates to the enforcement of the law in a given case. Hence, even if the arrest were based on the correct grounds (this is up to the ICC to decide), were executed in accordance with a certain procedure (see the requirement under (b)), and even if these substantive and procedural legal bases are generally to be viewed as non-arbitrary, the factual execution of a person's specific arrest may still qualify as arbitrary/incorrect. In addition, it must also be stressed that the fact that Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute mentions the procedural dimension of the national arrest separately (under (b)) also seems to indicate that the meaning of the words under (c) cannot be restricted to mere procedural issues. If that were the case, then the words under (c) could, of course, also have been left out completely (which they were not).

Be that as it may, three days after his 'Belgian' arrest and detention were authorised by the juge d'instruction, on Wednesday 28 May, Bemba Gombo appeared before the Chambre du Conseil (the Closed Court) of Brussels.[319] This again was in conformity with the Belgian cooperation law,[320] which clarifies the fact that this Court – like the juge d'instruction – must check whether the person standing before it is indeed the person sought and whether the documents as mentioned in Article 92, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute have been provided by the ICC.[321] Furthermore, this Court must decide, after having heard the ministère public (the Public Prosecutor), the suspect and his lawyer, whether or not the provisional arrest must be confirmed.[322] In the Bemba Gombo case, the Chambre du Conseil decided on the very same day to keep Bemba Gombo under arrest.

---

[316] See El Zeidy 2006, pp. 454-455 (see n. 153 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII).
[317] Vandermeersch 2004, p. 149, n. 93.
[318] See n. 159 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.
[319] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Application for interim release' (Public Document), [ICC-]ICC-01/05-01/-8, 23 July 2008, para. 8.
[320] See Art. 14, para. 4 of the Belgian cooperation law.
[321] See ibid.
[322] See ibid.

According to the Belgium cooperation law, both the Public Prosecutor and the suspect can appeal the decision of the Chambre du Conseil before the Chambre des Mises en Accusation (Court of Appeal's Indictments Chamber) within 24 hours of the decision of the Chambre du Conseil.[323] After hearing all the parties, this Court of Appeal's Indictments Chamber must promulgate its decision within eight days.[324] On 29 May, Bemba Gombo appealed the decision of the Chambre du Conseil and one week later, Bemba Gombo appeared before the Chambre des Mises en Accusation in Brussels which shortly afterwards dismissed the appeal of Bemba Gombo as well as his request for provisional release.[325]

Then, on 10 June 2008, the ICC issued a revised arrest warrant[326] and a request for arrest and surrender pursuant to Article 91 of the ICC Statute.[327] On 1 July 2008, the highest court in Belgium,[328] the Cour de Cassation (the Court of Cassation)

[323] See Art. 14, para. 5 of the Belgian cooperation law.

[324] See ibid.

[325] See the International Federation for Human Rights (FIDH) Legal Action Group's report FIDH and the situation in the Central African Republic before the International Criminal Court. The case of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, July 2008, No. 502a (available at: http://www.iccnow.org/documents/CPIaffbemba502ang2008.pdf), p. 20. (It must be noted that this report speaks of 5 June 2008 as the date that the Chambre des Mises en Accusation rejected Bemba Gombo's appeal whereas Bemba Gombo's defence lawyers use the date of 6 June 2008, see ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Application for interim release' (Public Document), [ICC-]ICC-01/05-01/-8, 23 July 2008, para. 9.) A request for interim release pending surrender can be made by the arrested person to the Chambre des Mises en Accusation pursuant to Art. 16, para. 1 of the Belgian cooperation law (which implements Art. 59, para. 3 of the ICC Statute).

[326] See CPI, La Chambre Préliminaire III, Situation en République Centrafricaine, Affaire Le Procureur c. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Mandat d'arrêt à l'encontre de Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo remplaçant le mandat d'arrêt décerné le 23 mai 2008' (Public), ICC-01/05-01/08, 10 juin 2008.

[327] See CPI, La Chambre Préliminaire III, Situation en R[é]publique Centrafricaine, Affaire Le Procureur c. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Demande d'arrestation et de remise de Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo adressée au Royaume de Belgique' (Public), ICC-01/05-01/08, 10 juin 2008. (The Belgian procedures regarding a request for arrest and surrender can be found in the first section ('Demande d'arrestation et de remise') of Chapter 4 ('Arrestation, transfert, transit et remise de personnes à la Cour') of the Belgian cooperation law (Artt. 11-13).) As also explained in n. 124 of Chapter VIII, Art. 92, para. 3 of the ICC Statute and Rule 188 of the ICC RPE entail that the requested State must have received the request for surrender (including the documents supporting that request) at the latest two months after the provisional arrest. If not, then the person provisionally arrested may be released from custody. The Belgian cooperation law states that the provisionally arrested person must in any case be released from custody if three months have passed, see its Art. 15.

[328] An interesting point which deserves to be mentioned here is that the fact that a Belgian case can be litigated up to the highest court in the State, the Cour de Cassation, does not mean that this is the procedure to be followed in each and every country executing an ICC request. As explained in Chapter VIII, the arrest and surrender must be executed on the basis of the Statute and national law and national implementations of the ICC's cooperation obligations may, of course, differ from State to State. For example, in the Netherlands, there is no appeal possible against the decision of the District Court in The Hague, see Section 27, para. 4 of the Dutch International Criminal Court Implementation Act (see n. 170 of Chapter VIII). Nevertheless, it is also possible that States may allow a person's case to be litigated up to for example the ECtHR. See Sluiter 2003 C, p. 625. Note finally that according to Bemba Gombo's defence lawyers, the decision of the Chambre des Mises en Accusation (of either 5 or 6 June 2008, see n. 325) was only brought to Bemba Gombo's attention on 18 June 2008. Although Bemba Gombo lodged an appeal against this decision to the Cour de Cassation, this Court never looked into the merits finally "rejected the requests of Bemba's lawyers, concerning, in particular, the alleged irregularity of the Belgian proceedings",[329] thereby removing the final obstacles from the path leading to Bemba Gombo's surrender to The Hague. Hence, two days later, on Thursday 3 July, he was surrendered to the ICC[330] where he is now facing justice.

Although this case is interesting in many respects, see, for example, the topic of provisional release,[331] this study will naturally focus on those alleged irregularities in the Belgian surrender proceedings.

In their application of 23 July 2008, Bemba Gombo's counsel argued that Bemba Gombo's rights pursuant to Article 55, paragraph 2 (c) and (d) of the ICC Statute were violated during the surrender proceedings in Belgium.[332] These provisions read:

> Where there are grounds to believe that a person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court and that person is about to be questioned either by the Prosecutor, or by national authorities pursuant to a request made under Part 9, that person shall also have the following rights of which he or she shall be informed prior to being questioned: (…) (c) To have legal assistance of the person's choosing, or, if the person does not have legal assistance, to have legal assistance assigned to him or her, in any case where the interests of justice so require, and without payment by the person in any such case if the person does not have sufficient means to pay for it; and (d) To be questioned in the presence of counsel unless the person has voluntarily waived his or her right to counsel.

More concretely, the Defence claimed:

> During Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba's questioning at the investigating judges in regard to the arrest warrant of the 23rd of May 2008 [this took place on 25 May 2008, ChP] Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba asked to be represented by his lawyer Maître Pierre Legros of the Bar of Brussels (…)[.] Neither the investigating judge nor the registrar respected Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba's wish to be represented by Maître Legros. Therefore Mr (…) Jean-Pierre Bemba was deprived of his fundamental right to be assisted by a counsel of his own choice. In regard to the execution of the arrest warrant of the 10th of June of the case because it considered the appeal to have become futile given the fact that the arrest warrant of 23 May 2008 had been replaced by the revised one on 10 June 2008. (See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Application for interim release' (Public Document), [ICC-]ICC-01/05-01/-8, 23 July 2008, para. 9.)

---

[329] The International Federation for Human Rights (FIDH) Legal Action Group's report FIDH and the situation in the Central African Republic before the International Criminal Court. The case of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, July 2008, No. 502a (available at: http://www.iccnow.org/documents/CPIaffbemba502ang2008.pdf), p. 20.

[330] See ibid.

[331] See also n. 284 of Chapter VIII.

[332] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Application for interim release' (Public Document), [ICC-]ICC-01/05-01/-8, 23 July 2008, paras. 12-13.

> 2008 it is submitted, that this was not fulfilled in a lawful way because Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba was neither heard nor represented in these proceedings.[333]

As a result, it was submitted "that the arrest warrants of the 23rd of May 2008 and the 10th of June 2008 are null and void and that Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba (…) should be put into liberty".[334]

Judge Kaul of Pre-Trial Chamber III did not agree, however. In its decision of 20 August 2008, the Chamber held, while stressing the relevance of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute[335] and the importance of the right to liberty,[336] that the ICC "is not a court of appeal in relation to the national authorities and that its power to review questions of substance and procedure before national courts is limited [original footnotes omitted, ChP]".[337] Judge Kaul referred here to the two decisions in the Lubanga Dyilo case which were already discussed in the previous section. Kaul was of the opinion "that such questions should primarily be raised and pursued before the national authorities as these are better placed than international jurisdictions to deal with such questions and, as the case may be, to provide for an adequate remedy [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[338] As also clarified in the Lubanga Dyilo case, one can agree with this stance, but it should also be repeated that this does not mean that the ICC does not have the ultimate responsibility for its own cases, including the pre-trial phase at the national level; the ICC should ensure that all violations are, ultimately, remedied and that it steps in if the national authorities, for whatever reason, do not grant appropriate remedies for violations.[339]

After these general observations, Judge Kaul turned to the specifics of this case and concluded "that the defence has not substantiated sufficiently its allegations of procedural irregularities at the national level so as to allow unequivocally to establish the facts and to verify their compliance with the applicable legal regime".[340]

---

[333] Ibid., paras. 13-14.

[334] Ibid., para. 15. See also ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision on application for interim release' (Confidential), ICC-01/05-01/08, 20 August 2008 (available as the annex to the decision ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision concerning the public version of the "Decision on application for interim release" of 20 August 2008' (Public Document), ICC-01/05-01/08, 26 August 2008), para. 27.

[335] See ibid., para. 36.

[336] See ibid., para. 37: "The Single Judge observes at the outset that the right to liberty is of fundamental importance for everyone and that for any deprivation of liberty to be acceptable, it must be on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as are established by the applicable legal regime. Furthermore, it must not be arbitrary [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (It may be interesting to note that Judge Kaul refers here not only to, among other things, Artt. 9 of the ICCPR, 5 of the ECHR and 7 of the ACHR, but also to para. 54 of the Bozano case, see n. 266 of Chapter III.)

[337] Ibid., para. 42.

[338] Ibid.

[339] See also the words of Sluiter (2003 C, pp. 644 and 651) at n. 201 of Chapter VIII.

[340] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision on application for interim release' (Confidential), ICC-01/05-01/08, 20 August 2008 (available as the annex to the decision ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in

For example, with respect to the alleged violation during the hearing of 25 May in relation to the arrest warrant of 23 May 2008, Judge Kaul was not sure whether this hearing was real questioning pursuant to Article 55, paragraph 2 (d) of the ICC Statute.[341] According to him, it rather appeared to be a mere interview to establish Bemba Gombo's identity and to inform him of his rights.[342] In that case, "the allegedly unlawful absence of the counsel would only entail a potential exclusion pursuant to article 69(7) of the Statute of evidence obtained in the interview".[343] This remark implies that if the hearing were seen as true questioning pursuant to Article 55, paragraph 2 (d) of the ICC Statute, the consequences of the absence of counsel could be greater than mere exclusion of evidence obtained in the interview. Finally, Judge Kaul observed that the absence of counsel during the meeting of 25 May did "not seem to have resulted into any actual prejudice to him [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[344] That may, of course, be true, but one could argue that the level of prejudice should only have an influence on the question of how serious the violation was (and consequently, what kind of remedy must be provided), and not on the question of whether there was a violation in the first place/whether the suspect is entitled to a remedy. It could be argued that any violation of the rights of the suspect[345] constitutes some injustice/prejudice to the suspect and that it is not necessary to demand actual/material prejudice before granting remedies, although the level of prejudice can, of course, be taken into account when determining the exact remedies.[346] As explained in Chapter IX, pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, a right to an effective remedy against a violation enters the law of the ICC. This means that whenever the ICC is involved in a case, it must grant appropriate remedies for violations which occur in that context.

With respect to the alleged violations in the context of the second/revised arrest warrant, Judge Kaul noted "that Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba had effective legal representation and that he was afforded adequate procedural protection with ample opportunities to raise any objections that he had at the national level at the appropriate time".[347] As a result, he concluded that he had the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision concerning the public version of the "Decision on application for interim release" of 20 August 2008' (Public Document), ICC-01/05-01/08, 26 August 2008), para. 44.

---

[341] See ibid., para. 45.

[342] See ibid.

[343] Ibid.

[344] Ibid., para. 46.

[345] It must be borne in mind, however, that not every error in the proceedings amounts to a violation, which, in turn, should lead to a remedy. One could hereby think, for example, of a simple and small technical error in the arrest warrant. Cf. n. 603 of Chapter III (with reference to the Brima case and the question when an arrest/detention can be qualified as unlawful/illegal). See also ns. 205, 242 and 832 of Chapter VI.

[346] Cf. also ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 125 (see also n. 997 and accompanying text of Chapter VI): "[A]ny violation, even if it entails only a relative degree of prejudice, requires a proportionate remedy." See also n. 1164 and accompanying text of Chapter VI (with respect to the Rwamakuba case).

[347] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision on application for interim release' (Confidential), ICC-01/05-> found no indication of any irregularity or arbitrariness in the procedure followed by the competent Belgian authorities that would constitute a material breach of article 59(2) of the Statute affecting the proceedings before the Court or render the detention of Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba on the authority of the Court otherwise unacceptable [original footnote omitted, ChP].[348]

Two days later, Bemba Gombo filed a notice of appeal[349] and on 16 December 2008, the ICC's Appeals Chamber issued its own decision.[350] Unfortunately, as the alleged irregularities in the way Bemba Gombo was surrendered to the ICC were not (clearly)[351] part of Bemba Gombo's appeal,[352] any views of the Appeals Chamber on this issue are not to be found.

01/08, 20 August 2008 (available as the annex to the decision ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision concerning the public version of the "Decision on application for interim release" of 20 August 2008' (Public Document), ICC-01/05-01/08, 26 August 2008), para. 48.

[348] Ibid., para. 49.

[349] Three (see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, para. 7) or four (see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, Dissenting opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 1) days later (on 25 or 26 August 2008), the document in support of the appeal was filed. However, as this document (including the response of the Prosecution to the appeal) were filed confidentially, they can unfortunately not be discussed here, see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, para. 8.

[350] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008.

[351] Perhaps, the words "the Appellant states that the Impugned Decision: was not based on reliable evidence" (see the next footnote) could be seen as a general statement, also challenging the views of Pre-Trial Chamber III regarding the alleged irregularities in Belgium.

[352] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, para. 10: "In the Document in Support of the Appeal, the Appellant states that the Impugned Decision: was not based on reliable evidence and the Single Judge: a. Erred in failing sufficiently to establish the existence of a risk that Jean-Pierre Bemba would abscond; b. Erred in failing to demonstrate that Jean-Pierre Bemba would obstruct or endanger the investigation or the Court proceedings; c. Erred in failing sufficiently to establish a causal link between the alleged risks of absconding or threats and the interim release of Jean-Pierre Bemba [original footnote omitted, ChP]". See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, Dissenting opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 5.

However, what the Appeals Chamber, like Pre-Trial Chamber III, did mention is the relevance of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute and the importance of the right to liberty. In this context, it specifically cited, in the main text of the decision, paragraphs 2-4 of Article 5 of the ECHR,[353] which may be seen as additional support for the view that the ICC considers the remedy of release in paragraph 4, in principle, to be relevant for the Court's functioning, something which was already argued in the previous chapter.[354] The Appeals Chamber also more generally referred to the importance of a suspect being able to challenge the lawfulness of his detention (see also Chapter IX, footnotes 290 and 292 and accompanying text), an avenue which is not explicitly mentioned in the ICC Statute.[355]

In his dissenting opinion to this decision, Judge Pikis does not go into these irregularities either, but he did note that Judge Kaul "summarily dismissed"[356] the contentions of Bemba Gombo regarding the alleged irregularities in Belgium. Furthermore, he also referred to Judge Kaul's conclusion as mentioned at footnote 340 and accompanying text "because it reflects the Single Judge's understanding of the law, that it is not for the prosecutorial authority to establish and justify the prolongation of the arrestee's detention, but for the latter to justify his release from captivity".[357] (Something with which Judge Pikis does not agree.)[358] Furthermore, Judge Pikis also repeats (see footnote 293 and accompanying text of Chapter IX) the [353] It also referred to paras. 2-4 of Art. 9 of the ICCPR and paras. 4-6 of Art. 7 of the ACHR in ns. 64-65, respectively.

[354] See also ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa' (Public Document), ICC-01/05-01/08, 14 August 2009, para. 35, writing about the scope of Art. 21, para. 3 of the ICC Statute: "The right of an arrested person to have access to a judicial authority vested with the power to adjudicate upon the lawfulness and justification of his or her detention is enshrined in many international human rights instruments, such as article 9 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, article 9 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, article 5 of the (European) Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, article 6 of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights and article 7 of the American Convention on Human Rights [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[355] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, para. 32: "Based on the jurisprudence of the ECtHR, the Appeals Chamber considers that, in order to ensure both equality of arms and an adversarial procedure, the defence must, to the largest extent possible, be granted access to documents that are essential in order effectively to challenge the lawfulness of detention, bearing in mind the circumstances of the case." These considerations are, of course, very interesting for the situation in which the ICC is confronted by a Todorović-like situation where the peacekeeping force in question refuses to disclose evidence as to the manner by which the suspect was brought into the jurisdiction of the ICC.

[356] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, Dissenting opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 5.

[357] Ibid.

[358] See ibid., para. 36.

importance of a suspect's right to challenge the lawfulness of his detention, a right which is not explicitly mentioned in the ICC Statute, but which may nevertheless be inferred from a provision such as Article 60, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute.[359] A final point from Judge Pikis' dissenting opinion should be mentioned and that is that he states that "everything that would enable the person to effectively challenge the lawfulness of his detention must be disclosed".[360] Although Judge Pikis makes this remark in the context of the substantive grounds and reasons of the detention, his words may nevertheless be interesting for the situation – see also footnote 355 – in which the ICC is confronted by a Todorović-like situation where the peacekeeping force in question refuses to disclose evidence as to the manner by which the suspect was brought into the jurisdiction of the ICC.

Before turning to the last case, that of Germain Katanga, a final point of the Bemba Gombo case should be addressed, namely his allegations with respect to a violation of Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute, a provision which was discussed in the previous two chapters.

On 3 November 2008, Bemba Gombo filed an urgent application for interim release, requesting, "as his primary relief, to be released unconditionally and, in the alternative, to be granted interim release with conditions".[361] This was because he was of the opinion "that he has been detained for an extended period prior to the trial due to unjustified delay by the Prosecutor in the conduct of the proceedings".[362] Although the request to be released unconditionally might be seen as a request for final release, comparable with the release with prejudice of the first Barayagwiza decision, it appears that in this case, Bemba Gombo views this unconditional release to also constitute an interim release, not jeopardising the trial itself, see the title of his application. As also explained in Chapter VIII, as this provision is surrounded by provisions addressing the concept of interim release, one can imagine that it would normally be used for an interim release.[363] Nevertheless, as also argued in the same

[359] See ibid., para. 20: "If there were no provision in the Statute affording the arrested person the opportunity to contest the deprivation of his/her liberty, we would be confronted with a dire denial of his/her human rights. Every person is assured the right to contest the lawfulness of his/her detention. Lawfulness in this context signifies the soundness in law of the factual basis of the decision, as well as the correctness of the legal provisions by reference to which the case is decided. The right of a person to contest the lawfulness of his detention, ordered in his absence and without hearing him, is safeguarded by the provisions of article 60 (2) of the Statute, requiring the Pre-Trial Chamber to evaluate, in proceedings held in the presence and with the participation of the person affected, the lawfulness and sequentially the justification of the deprivation of liberty. The provisions of article 60 (2), like every other provision of the Statute, must (…) be construed and applied in accordance with internationally recognized human rights." See also ibid., para. 31: "[A]rticle 21 (3) assures to every individual the right to effectively contest the deprivation of liberty."

[360] Ibid., para. 29.

[361] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Urgent Application for Interim Release' (Confidential, Including 3 Confidential Annexes), ICC-01/05-01/08, 3 November 2008, para. 1.

[362] Ibid., para. 8.

[363] See also ibid., para. 9, where counsel for Bemba Gombo refers to the following words of Pre-Trial Chamber III in another decision: "The Single Judge would take this opportunity to recall that any inexcusable delay which can be ascribed to the Prosecutor might have consequences in respect of the chapter, the word "release" itself does not preclude a further-reaching release, a release with prejudice, ending the entire trial, in very serious violations of Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute.[364] This interesting provision also played a role in this book's final case, which will now be discussed.

4 KATANGA

The final male captus case is that of Germain Katanga, the alleged commander of the FRPI, the Force de Résistance Patriotique en Ituri. That this case is addressed here will hopefully not come as a real surprise, as in the Lubanga Dyilo case, the following passage of a report from Human Rights Watch on the situation in the DRC was presented:

> In some of the few cases where justice has been pursued, authorities have failed to observe international standards of due process. In February and March a number of influential armed group leaders from Ituri were arrested in Kinshasa following the killings of nine U.N. peacekeepers. Several of those arrested, including Thomas Lubanga, Floribert Njabu[[365]] and Germain Katanga, were accused by Human Rights Watch and others of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Authorities arrested several of them without charge and held them for weeks before bringing any charges against them, in clear violation of Congolese legal procedures. By early December, they had been in detention for ten months but there has been no effort to bring them to trial [original footnote omitted, ChP].[366]

On 2 July 2007, a sealed warrant of arrest was issued against Katanga, charging him with a number of war crimes and crimes against humanity related to the attack on the village of Bogoro on 24 February 2003.[367] Four days later, the ICC Registrar Chamber's examination of any request for interim release by Mr Jean-Pierre Bemba pursuant to article 60(4) of the Statute [emphasis added, ChP]."

---

[364] See n. 269 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.

[365] As also stated in the context of the Lubanga Dyilo case, one can expect that Njabu, if he is brought before the ICC one day, will raise similar allegations as Lubanga Dyilo and Katanga.

[366] Human Rights Watch, 'Democratic Republic of Congo. Elections in sight: "Don't Rock the Boat"?', 15 December 2005 (available at: http://www.hrw.org/legacy/backgrounder/africa/drc1205/drc1205.pdf), p. 15. See also n. 70 and accompanying text.

[367] For more information, see ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga, 'Urgent Warrant of Arrest for Germain Katanga' (Under seal), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2007, p. 6: "[T]here are reasonable grounds to believe that Germain Katanga is criminally responsible under article 25(3)(a) or, in the alternative, under article 25(3)(b) of the Statute, for: i) murder as a crime against humanity, punishable under article 7(1)(a) of the Statute; ii) wilful killing as a war crime, punishable under article 8(2)(a)(i) or article 8(2)(c)(i) of the Statute; iii) inhumane acts as a crime against humanity, punishable under article 7(1)(k) of the Statute; iv) inhuman treatment as a war crime, punishable under article 8(2)(a)(ii) or cruel treatment as a war crime, punishable under article 8(2)(c)(i) of the Statute; v) the war crime of using children under the age of fifteen years to participate actively in hostilities, punishable under article 8(2)(b)(xxvi) or article 8(2)(e)(vii) of the Statute; vi) sexual slavery as a crime against humanity, punishable under article 7(1)(g) of the Statute; vii) sexual slavery as a war crime, punishable under article 8(2)(b)(xxii) or article 8(2)(e)(vi) of the Statute; viii) the war crime of intentionally directing attacks against the civilian filed an urgent and sealed request to the DRC for the arrest and surrender of Katanga,[368] including an urgent and sealed request for the identification, tracing, freezing and seizure of Katanga's property and assets.[369] Although it is not entirely clear when this latter request was actually issued to the DRC (although it is probably the same date as the date of transmission of the request for arrest and surrender), the request for arrest and surrender was transmitted to the DRC on 18 September 2007.[370] In any case, Katanga was already in custody at the time, at the same detention centre where Lubanga Dyilo was imprisoned. On 17 October 2007, Katanga was removed from this Centre pénitentiaire[371] et de rééducation de Kinshasa so that the DRC authorities could surrender him to the ICC on 18 October 2007.[372] At the initial hearing before the ICC on 22 October 2007, duty counsel for Katanga, Xavier-Jean Keita, made comparable male captus allegations as Lubanga Dyilo had done before,[373] but it was only much later, on 30 June 2009, after the population as such or against individual civilians not taking direct part in hostilities, punishable under article 8(2)(b)(i) or article 8(2)(e)(i) of the Statute; ix) pillaging a town or place, even when taken by assault as a war crime, punishable under article 8(2)(b)(xvi) or article 8(2)(e)(v) of the Statute".

---

[368] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga, 'Urgent Request to the Democratic Republic of the Congo for the Arrest and Surrender of Germain Katanga' (Under seal), ICC-01/04-01/07, 6 July 2007.

[369] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga, 'Urgent Request to the Democratic Republic of the Congo for the Purpose of Obtaining the Identification, Tracing, Freezing and Seizure of the Property and Assets of Germain Katanga' (Under seal), ICC-01/04-01/07, 6 July 2007.

[370] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, p. 10 or ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 3.

[371] See n. 5.

[372] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 6. It may be interesting to note that pictures from Katanga's surrender can be viewed at http://www.digitalcongo.net/article/47548#.

[373] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation [in the] Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, First Appearance Hearing – Open Session, Transcript ICC-01-04-01-07-T-5-ENG, 22 October 2007, available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/doc/doc357321.PDF, pp. 16-21. At these pages, it was claimed, among other things, that Katanga was deprived of his liberty in February 2005 and that he was officially placed in detention on 10 March 2005. (See ibid., p. 16.) Furthermore, the Defence contended that according to Congolese law, Katanga had to be brought before a judge within 12 months but that this did only happen after 14 months, on 1 May 2006, when he appeared before a military court. (See ibid., pp. 16-17.) (However, note that Katanga's lawyer also explained that before that time, namely on 20 January 2006, Katanga was heard once by a certain Colonel Tsino – this must be Tsinu, see n. 390 and accompanying text – and that in that interview, which was held in the absence of Katanga's lawyer, Katanga was asked about Bogoro, see ibid., p. 18.) (Note furthermore that it will be shown infra that the Defence later claimed that there were in fact multiple hearings in May 2006, the first one starting on 5

confirmation of the charges (on 26 September 2008), but before the commencement of the actual trial (on 24 November 2009), that the Defence filed an official male captus submission.[374]

In this submission, of which the publicly available redacted version was filed on 2 July 2009, the Defence argued that Katanga, who had become an accused in the meantime (see footnote 30 of Chapter I), > was unlawfully arrested and detained by the authorities of the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo (…) with a consequent flagrant breach of his human rights in international law and under the Statute of the ICC. It is submitted that these violations must be viewed in the light of the actions and omissions of the Office of the Prosecutor and the Registry, and in the context that this detention was in part at the behest and for the purposes of the International Criminal Court. The accused is entitled to an effective remedy for the violation of those rights.[375]

That the Defence tries to convince the judges that the ICC was involved in the male captus and that this was in part at the behest of the ICC may not come as a surprise. After all, if the ICC judges were to agree with that, the arrest/detention would fall under concepts such as concerted action/action "by his/her accusers"/constructive custody, see the case of Lubanga Dyilo, concepts which trigger the application of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute. In addition, if the male captus were

---

May 2006, and that Katanga was not brought before a court until 1 December 2006.) At the meeting(s) in May 2006, Katanga's lawyer challenged the irregularity of Katanga's detention. However, this plea was apparently unsuccessful as Katanga's detention was extended by 60 days. Nevertheless, it was only on 30 November 2006 that Katanga was brought before the military court for the second time (see the point mentioned above that it will be explained infra that Katanga appeared before a court for the first time on 1 December 2006), which – again – extended his detention by 60 days. He was allegedly not brought before the Court two months later, however, but some four and a half months later, on 10 April 2007. At this hearing, his detention was again extended for two months. (See ibid., p. 17.) It was also claimed, among other things, that during the official ICC arrest and surrender, irregularities occurred, see, for example, ibid., p. 19, where it is claimed that Katanga did not receive a copy of his arrest warrant. In that context, it was also argued that "he was not asked to challenge the Warrant of Arrest that was read out to him or to rely on Congolese law, which gives him the right to request his release, even interim release". (Ibid., pp. 19-20.)

[374] This delay was explained by the fact that "[t]he Defence was persuaded to file this motion having been appraised of all the documents, views of the DRC on the nature and course of the national proceedings as well as those of the Prosecutor on his knowledge of documents and interactions with the DRC, but especially those observations expressed on the 1st of June 2009 [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 3.) The observations of 1 June 2009 can be found at ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation [in the] Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, Case against Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, Hearing – Open Session, ICC-01/04-01/07-T-65-ENG ET WT, 1 June 2009, available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/doc/doc694962.pdf.

[375] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 1.

deemed so serious that one can no longer speak of a fair trial, one can expect that the ICC would issue a male detentus verdict/a refusal of jurisdiction/a final stay of the proceedings.[376]

Focusing on the remedy for the alleged violations, the Defence first argued that these "have such an impact on the integrity of the process that the appropriate remedy is a stay or termination of the proceedings".[377] Alternatively, it was submitted that Katanga would be entitled to compensation and, in the case of conviction, a reduction of the sentence.[378]

Specifically, the Defence divided the alleged violations into three phases: 1) "the initial and subsequent detention of the accused while not yet envisaged as an accused before the ICC";[379] 2) "the detention of the accused from the time he became a principal suspect in the case but before the issuance of an international warrant of arrest"[380] and 3) "from the time of the issuance of an international warrant of arrest[[381]] on the 2nd July 2007 until the completion of his transfer to The Hague".[382] Returning to the concerted action/action "by his/her accusers"/constructive custody point mentioned above, the Defence explained that the second and third phases "involved the participation of organs of the ICC, thus giving continuity to the unlawfulness of the detention into the processes of the ICC".[383]

With respect to the first phase, the Defence noted that Katanga was initially arrested at the Grand Hotel in Kinshasa on 26 February 2005, in the aftermath of the killing of nine MONUC peacekeepers one day earlier.[384] He was confined by agents to the hotel premises and given no documents. Likewise, his lawyers were not, in fact never, given access to the case file.[385] Two days later, he was taken to another hotel and then – again – to a third. Around 9 March 2005, he was brought to a small [376] However, this is not entirely clear because the exact male detentus test of the ICC is not plain, see the problems related to the (possibly applicable) second formulation of that test, which speaks of a discretion rather than an obligation to refuse jurisdiction and which, more importantly, requires that jurisdiction does not have to be refused if the accused can still mount his defence.

[377] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 2.

[378] See ibid.

[379] Ibid., para. 5.

[380] Ibid. Note that in the context of the ICC, there does not exist a term like 'international warrant of arrest'/'international arrest warrant', see the final words of n. 55.

[381] See the previous footnote.

[382] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 5.

[383] Ibid.

[384] See ibid., paras. 8-12. See also n. 70 and accompanying text (the report of Human Rights Watch).

[385] See ibid., paras. 12-13.

local prison but only the day after, on 10 March 2005, did the official procedures begin, when a warrant was issued for his arrest according to the legal procedures.[386]

In the second phase, the Defence continued, Katanga became the principal suspect of the ICC case in Ituri, the case dealing with the attack on the village of Bogoro. Although the Defence was not sure when Katanga became a suspect in this case exactly – this was up to the Prosecution to clarify[387] – it was argued that this had to be at least by November 2005, when "the Prosecutor announced that he had a new investigation and this turned out to be that of Katanga's involvement in Bogoro".[388] On 18 January 2006, Katanga (and his co-accused) filed a written complaint, "noting that they had not been informed of the reasons for their arrest and requesting provisional release [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[389] Two days later, and 11 months after he was first deprived of his liberty, Katanga was interviewed by Colonel Tsinu Phukuta,[390] officer of the Public Ministry at the Military High Court.[391] The Defence claimed that at this interview, Katanga was unrepresented, was not given the opportunity to make a telephone call and was not informed of the charges – even when he specifically asked to be – nor of his rights.[392]

The Defence then went on to state that on 4 April 2006, 13 months and six days after his initial detention and 12 months and 25 days after his formal arrest, "[t]he illegality of continued detention beyond 12 months without court order was brought to the attention of the Auditor General".[393] As a result of this, court hearings were held on 5, 9 and 12 May 2006, 14 months after Katanga's initial detention.[394] Katanga was not present and his lawyers were deprived access to the case file.[395] In addition, because the bench was inadequately constituted, the hearing was adjourned, for no less than seven months.[396]

On 1 December 2006, Katanga appeared in court for the very first time, 21 months after his initial detention. "This hearing was a result of the request of the Auditor General to seek an extension of the detention of the accused."[397] According to the Defence, the decision of this hearing, also dated 1 December 2006 and allegedly not served on Katanga,[398] stated on the one hand that Katanga's detention

[386] See ibid., paras. 14-15.
[387] See ibid., para. 16.
[388] Ibid., para. 17.
[389] Ibid., para. 18.
[390] See also n. 373.
[391] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 19.
[392] See ibid.
[393] Ibid., para. 20.
[394] See ibid.
[395] See ibid.
[396] See ibid.
[397] Ibid., para. 21.
[398] See ibid., para. 25.

ran from 9 March 2005 (thus not mentioning the period between 26 February 2005 and 9 March 2005), but asserted on the other that he had been detained for only 12 months.[399] Although Katanga's lawyers were still denied access to the case file, they nevertheless "asked for release on the grounds that the detention was illegal [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[400] The Military High Court, however, opined > that the question of illegality could not be raised for the period running from the initial seizure of the court on 20th April 2005 to the 1st December 2005 because the Public Minister could not be held responsible and the court's jurisdiction was seized [original footnote omitted, ChP].[401]

The Court also "held that there were 'serious and grave' indications of guilt, being the fundamental condition for provisional detention",[402] a point which, according to the Defence, seemingly contradicted the statement of the DRC on 1 June 2009 (see footnote 374) "that no significant investigative steps were taken [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[403]

It can be argued that the quotation at footnote 401 and accompanying text is rather confusing as the two dates of 20 April 2005 and 1 December 2005 were not mentioned previously in the Defence's submission. This confusion increases in the remainder of the submission where reference is made to 20 April 2006 as the date "when the court was seized by motion",[404] which may mean that the Defence is actually referring here to the period between 20 April 2006 and 1 December 2006.

However, even in that case: if one agrees with the Military High Court that the point of illegality cannot be raised for the period between 20 April 2006 and 1 December 2006, one wonders what happened to the alleged violations in the period between 26 February 2005 and 20 April 2006. The fact that the Defence also addresses this period (between 26 February 2005 and 20 April 2006)[405] may indeed mean that the above-mentioned dates of 20 April 2005 and 1 December 2005 are simply erroneous.

Then, on 2 March 2007, the Auditor General again sought an extension of Katanga's detention.[406] A hearing was scheduled for 5 April 2007 but it only took

---

[399] See ibid., para. 21.
[400] Ibid., para. 22.
[401] Ibid.
[402] Ibid., para. 23.
[403] Ibid.
[404] Ibid., para. 24.
[405] See ibid.: "The period of detention is taken from the 9th March 2005. The period of detention from the 26th February 2005 to the 9th March 2005 was not considered. The discrepancy between the arrest on 9th March 2005 and the arrest warrant only being secured on the 10th March 2005 is not addressed. The court held that the extensions of detention between the 9th March 2005 and the 9th March 2006 were legitimate by law. However, it does not address the violations of the rights of the accused arising out of, for instance, the failure to be brought promptly before a judicial authority. The period from the 9th March 2006 to the 20th April 2006 when the court was seized by motion is not considered and appears to have been ignored [original footnote omitted, ChP]."
[406] See ibid., para. 26.

place on 10 April 2007.[407] At this hearing, the Military High Court once more decided to extend Katanga's detention, holding "that the reasons for keeping the accused in detention, given at the prior hearing, remained valid [original footnote omitted, ChP]",[408] one of them being that Katanga "was being pursued for crimes against humanity [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[409] It did not, however, answer the claim of Katanga "that the Public Minister demonstrated negligence in maintaining the detention through not exercising due diligence in bringing the case to trial [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[410] It is, of course, very interesting, the Defence continued, how all this must be see in light of the fact that the DRC had claimed on 1 June 2009, see again footnote 374, "that no investigations were ever conducted with respect to the accused for any crime, including that of the death of the nine blue helmets".[411]

Finally, on 25 June 2007, a second letter asking for provisional release was written by Katanga,[412] who noted "that he had been detained since 26 February 2005 and that the last prorogation [had] expired on 21 June 2007 [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[413]

With respect to the third and last phase, which began with the issuance of the ICC arrest warrant on 2 July 2007, the Defence explained, among other things, that Katanga was taken to the Auditorat Général on the morning of 17 October 2007 without his lawyer being informed about this.[414] In the afternoon, he was interviewed by Colonel Mutalizi (this must be: Colonel Muntazini Mukimapa),[415] about which interview the Defence asserts:

> The accused was not informed of the charges against him, nor read his rights. He was not informed of his right to silence, nor of his rights not to incriminate himself. His lawyer was not present and there is no indication in the documents that the accused consented to this situation.[416]

---

[407] See ibid., para. 27.
[408] Ibid., para. 28.
[409] Ibid. The Defence notes on this point that "[a]t the admissibility hearing on 1st June 2009 [see n. 374, ChP], it was stated that the accused was only pursued in respect of the murder of the nine MONUC soldiers, but at the same time accepted that the crime of "atteinte contre la sécurite de l'état" was transformed into genocide and crimes against humanity [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (Ibid.)
[410] Ibid., para. 29.
[411] Ibid. Note that these words are stronger than the ones mentioned at n. 403 and accompanying text.
[412] The first was written on 18 January 2006, see n. 389 and accompanying text.
[413] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 30.
[414] See ibid., para. 34.
[415] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga, 'Information to the Chamber on the execution of the Request for the arrest and surrender of Germain Katanga' (Confidential, Ex-parte only available to the Prosecution and the Defence), ICC-01/04-01/07, 22 October 2007, p. 3.
[416] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence

However, it was admitted that later that day, his lawyer, who was (merely) contacted by a colleague, arrived to assist him.[417] Although the Defence does not mention this point, it is possible that Katanga was informed of the charges after his lawyer had arrived. At least, that may be deduced from (the comments to) one of the photos of Katanga's surrender, see footnote 372, where one can see a person reading a document to Katanga and another person, and where one can read: "Le Colonel [Muntazini Mukimapa] lit les chefs d'accusation devant [G]ermain Katanga et son avocat". In that respect, one can also refer to the words of Katanga's duty counsel during the initial hearing on 22 October 2007, where he stated:

> From 10.00 in the morning till 7.00 in the evening he was detained in a cell. At 7.00 he was visited by his lawyer, Mr. (…) Bertin Boki, with whom he was able to talk for a few minutes. And when he came out of his cell, two cameramen were present and so were photographers, and the senior military officer, the general, read out in French the Warrant of Arrest that the Court has just caused to be read out. Mr. Katanga informs me that a copy of this Warrant of Arrest which was read out to him in French was not handed to him or to his counsel, and he was not asked to sign any report whatsoever.[418]

Be that as it may (this point will be returned to infra), the Defence continued to explain that when Muntazini Mukimapa, in his interview, and in the absence of Katanga's counsel, asked Katanga if he accepted being surrendered to the ICC, Katanga stated that he did.[419] The Defence also complained of the fact that "no steps were taken at the Auditorat Général to verify his medical condition or provide medical assistance"[420] when Katanga replied, when asked about his state of health, that "he had finished a course of treatment for malaria two days previously"[421] and that "he was coughing and had a cold".[422] Moreover, no food was provided, even though Katanga had not eaten breakfast (he only received food when his flight to The Hague left on 18 October 2007),[423] and Katanga was not allowed to use the toilet.[424] In addition, the Defence continued, "[t]he documents do not indicate whether the accused was asked if he needed to call anyone or if any arrangements motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 34.

---

[417] See ibid.

[418] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation [in the] Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, First Appearance Hearing – Open Session, Transcript ICC-01-04-01-07-T-5-ENG, 22 October 2007, available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/doc/doc357321.PDF, p. 19.

[419] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 35.

[420] Ibid., para. 36.

[421] Ibid.

[422] Ibid.

[423] See ibid., para. 38.

[424] See ibid., para. 36.

needed to be made for his family".[425] Finally, with respect to his arrival in The Hague, the Defence asserted:

> The accused was brought a doctor then taken through search procedures. It is not indicated that any specific medical attention was given to the accused. There is no indication that the ICC officials informed the accused of his rights or spoke of them, or that he was informed of his right to silence.[[426]] As far as the record shows, no arrangements were made with respect to his family. The lawyer for the accused was not present during these procedures.[427]

Now that the three phases had been discussed factually, the Defence turned to the legal merits of the case, claiming that "serious violations of his rights under international law run through all three phases in a continuing manner".[428]

After having explained international legal standards on arrest and detention (namely the right to personal liberty[429] (of which it correctly noted, by the way, that it is "[w]ithout any doubt (…) part of internationally recognised human rights, in the sense of Article 21 (3) of the ICC Statute"),[430] the right to be brought promptly before the competent judicial authority,[431] the right to be informed of the reasons for arrest/of the charges[432] and the right to have access to and assistance of counsel)[433] and the law of the DRC on these matters,[434] it claimed that the four above-mentioned rights had been violated.

---

[425] Ibid., para. 37.

[426] Note that at the initial hearing, duty counsel for Katanga stated the following: "He is sorry that both in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and at the time of his surrender he did not -- was not able to exercise any of the rights of which he has been informed by the employees of the court. These are the rights that the Office of Public Counsel for the Defence has explained to him at length because, of course, while he understands French, he is not a master of it, and considering the technical nature of our judicial language, there are things that can escape anyone." (ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation [in the] Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, First Appearance Hearing – Open Session, Transcript ICC-01-04-01-07-T-5-ENG, 22 October 2007, available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/iccdocs/doc/doc357321.PDF, pp. 20-21.) Although this does not prove that he was informed of his rights at his arrival in The Hague right away, it does show that he was at least informed of his rights by ICC officials between his surrender and the initial appearance, a period which lasted only four days (between 18 October and 22 October 2007).

[427] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 39.

[428] Ibid., para. 40.

[429] See ibid., paras. 41-42.

[430] Ibid., para. 41. See also Section 4 of the previous chapter.

[431] See ibid., paras. 43-44.

[432] See ibid., paras. 45-47.

[433] See ibid., para. 48.

[434] See ibid., para. 49-60. In this context, it may be interesting to note that the Defence explained: "A number of rights are absolute and cannot be departed from in any situation even where the State has invoked an emergency situation in accordance with Articles 85 and 86 of the Constitution. These non-violable rights include the prohibition of torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (…), the rights of the defence and the right of recourse (…) [original footnote omitted,

Specifically, with respect to the right to personal liberty, it was submitted "that the arrest and detention of the accused was unlawful under national as well as international law and, in the context of the length of unlawful detention, amounted to serious mistreatment".[435] More specifically, it was argued, among other things, "that the initial arrest [made in the aftermath of the killing of the nine MONUC peacekeepers, ChP] was unlawful as it was not supported by reasonable grounds or justification".[436] In addition, it was asserted that Katanga's subsequent provisional detention was irregular and in violation of the Constitution, the Military Legal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure.[437] Katanga stressed that these were not mere technical irregularities but serious human rights violations:[438]

> It is submitted that his fundamental right to liberty was violated in a very basic way because the authorities which detained him had no reasonable justification for his arrest on the basis of the murder of the MONUC soldiers nor for his continued detention for such offence. The DRC authorities stated to the Chamber that no steps were taken to investigate the matter. Even if the arrest had been on reasonable grounds, his continued detention for more than two and a half years could not be premised on reasonable grounds or constitute a reasonable duration in the absence of investigations.[439]

In that context, the Defence argued that the DRC's claim of 'preventive custody/detention' had to be rejected.[440] According to the Defence, it appeared "that the state authorities in the DRC have been keeping individuals in detention without charge merely for the benefit of the ICC",[441] a point which was allegedly confirmed by Human Rights Watch and the Minister of Human Rights.[442] Although these are, of course, only general allegations, the Defence also asserted that "[t]here is some evidence of this nature directly relating to the accused, in that the State had ChP]." (Ibid., para. 56.) However, the Defence did not explain if the DRC had invoked the emergency situation and had derogated from its (inter)national human rights obligations because of that.

---

[435] Ibid., para. 61.

[436] Ibid., para. 62.

[437] See ibid., para. 63.

[438] See ibid., para. 64.

[439] Ibid.

[440] See ibid., para. 66.

[441] Ibid., para. 67.

[442] See ibid.: "Human Rights Watch in its report D.R. Congo: ICC Arrest First Step to Justice, observed that "Congolese authorities state they have been waiting for the ICC to complete its investigations before taking further action", indicating that the DRC was in fact subjecting itself and giving priority to the Office of the Prosecutor. The Minister of Human Rights indicated in an informal conversation with members of the Defence team in relation to the remaining Iturian prisoners, arrested at the same time and in the same conditions as Germain Katanga, that the DRC authorities had been waiting to hear from the ICC whether they would seek their transfer. According to the Minister, the ICC had recently indicated that they would not seek the transfer of any of them, and they would now have to decide what to do with those prisoners held without a charge [emphasis in original and original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

indicated that it was awaiting elements from the ICC [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[443]

With respect to the second right, the right to be brought promptly before the competent judicial authority, it was maintained that Katanga was deprived of his liberty for the first time on 26 February 2005 and that he was only brought before a judge 21 months later, on 1 December 2006.[444] The Defence submitted that "this constituted a grossly excessive period of time without the opportunity to challenge the lawfulness of his detention, such that it amounted to a grave violation of the right to be brought promptly before a judicial authority",[445] both under DRC and international law.[446] The Defence also explained that even if the interview of 20 January 2006[447] were to be seen as the moment Katanga was brought before a judicial authority, there was still "a grotesquely unacceptable period of delay of 11 months – or, of over 10 months if detention ran from March 2005".[448]

Concerning the third right, the right to be informed of the reasons for arrest/of the charges, the Defence argued that "[t]here is no official record indicating the accused was informed of any charges against him at any stage before the reading of the international arrest warrant"[449] and hence concluded that this long period (more than two and a half years) "is by any standard a serious violation of this right under national and international law and a flagrant violation of human rights".[450]

With respect to the fourth and final right, the right to have access to and assistance of counsel, the Defence repeated the assertion that Katanga's counsel was not present at the interviews of 20 January 2006 and 17 October 2007 and concluded "that these violations in themselves amounted to serious mistreatment in the light of the significance of these two interviews to his general situation".[451] However, as explained supra, and only focusing here on the hearing of 17 October 2007, it must also be noted that there are certain indications that at some point that day, Katanga was informed of the charges, in the presence of his counsel. Again, this point will be dealt with infra.

---

[443] Ibid., para. 68.
[444] See ibid., paras. 69-70.
[445] Ibid., para. 70.
[446] The Defence explained that "under international practice and jurisprudence anything longer than 48 hours is generally considered unacceptable" (ibid., para. 70), whereas "[t]he law of the DRC is consistent with international practice in this respect, requiring that the accused be brought before the judicial authorities within 48 hours." (Ibid.)
[447] See ns. 391-392 and accompanying text.
[448] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 71. The Defence in addition noted that all acts of prorogation of Katanga's detention until 20 January 2006 were invalid for they violated the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Constitution, see ibid., para. 72.
[449] Ibid., para. 73. It must again be remarked – see also the final words of n. 55 – that in the context of the ICC, there does not exist a term like 'international arrest warrant'.
[450] Ibid., para. 76.
[451] Ibid., para. 77.

The Defence subsequently tried to demonstrate the ICC's involvement with respect to the violations from the last two phases, which allegedly started, it is recalled,[452] at least as from November 2005, when Katanga became a target for the Prosecutor.

Before continuing on this point, it is, however, first worth noting that the Defence argued that it would actually not be necessary to establish involvement/responsibility here for under the abuse of process doctrine of Barayagwiza, it is irrelevant who was responsible for the serious violations of Katanga.[453] Nevertheless, the Defence continued, "an analysis of the participation of the organs of the Court reinforces a connection to the ICC and the view that prior violations go directly to the integrity of the process before the ICC".[454] Although the Defence does not explain how the abuse of process doctrine falls within the ICC's system – which is, of course, especially relevant now that the ICC Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo had explicitly rejected this doctrine some two and a half years earlier – the Defence's remark on the abuse of process doctrine itself is arguably correct: even though serious violations as such can undermine the integrity of the ICC and lead to a refusal of jurisdiction, violations in which it can be proven that the ICC was involved, can, of course, even more strongly undermine the integrity of the Court,[455] cf. also the male detentus test in Lubanga Dyilo, which requires action "by his/her accusers".

Returning now to the exact point in time at which the ICC became involved in the Katanga's case: this could not be clearly established. However, the Defence felt that it was up to the Prosecutor to clarify this point.[456] In any case, the issuance of the arrest warrant would be "an artificial point to measure the beginning of participation by the ICC in the situation of the accused"[457] as already before that point, "there was the formulation of an intention on the part of his Office to treat the accused as a principal suspect in the case concerning Bogoro".[458] The Defence was of the opinion that as from the moment the Prosecutor was involved in the case, he had a duty of care towards Katanga.[459] This is reminiscent of the concept of due

[452] See n. 388 and accompanying text.
[453] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 79.
[454] Ibid.
[455] See also the text following n. 734 and accompanying text of Chapter VI, n. 740 and accompanying text of the same chapter and n. 130 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.
[456] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 80.
[457] Ibid.
[458] Ibid.
[459] See ibid.

diligence as was mentioned, for example, in the Lubanga Dyilo case,[460] and indeed, Katanga's Defence would also later turn to this latter concept, see infra.

However, first, it explained the legal foundation of the duty of care towards the accused, by presenting the ICC's unique cooperation regime. In doing so, it correctly pictured a context rather akin to Currie's lateral system/the "rugby pitch".[461] According to the Defence, in this interplay, the organs of the ICC cannot "work on the premise that whatever goes on before an accused is in The Hague is of no relevance".[462] Crucial in that respect was a provision such as Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute.[463] The Defence opined that, as a result of this provision and general principles, > each organ of the Court has an inherent duty to protect the values underlying the protection of human rights in the exercise of their discretion and refrain from knowingly participating in and/or facilitating the continued violations of the rights of an accused. This duty is expressly provided for with respect to the Prosecutor's functions in Article 54(1)(c).[464]

According to the Defence, this was not what the Prosecutor had done in this case, as he "ought to have been in possession of sufficient information (…) to be aware that the accused's detention in the DRC was inconsistent with international human rights standards".[465] What the Prosecutor should have done, the Defence continued, was > to act with speed and diligence in requesting the transfer of the accused once it was determined that there were reasonable grounds to suspect that the accused had committed crimes within the jurisdiction of the ICC and that his detention was tainted with illegality. This, it is suggested, necessarily flows from his duty of care to the [460] See n. 187 and accompanying text. However, the concept of due diligence can also be found in cases such as Barayagwiza (see, for example, ns. 840, 865, 869, 893, 914, 918 and accompanying text of Chapter VI) and Kajelijeli (see ns. 1053 and 1078 and accompanying text of Chapter VI).

[461] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public Redacted Version of the Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/07-01/04-1258-Conf-Exp)' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 2 July 2009, para. 81: "The principles of complementarity and cooperation ensure that the national and international processes are closely intertwined in ensuring that perpetrators are brought to justice. These two levels of the legal process, while separate are heavily inter-dependent in this respect, even more so than in other ad hoc tribunals. This is acknowledged by Article 59 of the Statute and Rule 117 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence [emphasis in original, ChP]." For Currie's "rugby pitch", see the final pages of Chapter VIII.

[462] Ibid., para. 82. (This point was actually formulated in the form of a rhetorical question.)

[463] See ibid.

[464] Ibid., para. 83. Note that Art. 54, para. 1 (c) of the ICC Statute was explicitly mentioned in Chapter IX, in the examination of a number of provisions from the proper instruments of the ICC which could be seen as being (indirectly) relevant for the male captus discussion, see the text preceding n. 44 and accompanying text of Chapter IX.

[465] Ibid., para. 84.

> accused and the right of the accused to be tried without undue delay encapsulated in Article 67(1)(c) of the Statute.[466]

Not surprisingly (see footnote 460), the Defence then referred to Barayagwiza[467] to show that the ICC Prosecutor had failed in his prosecutorial due diligence.[468] Instead of ending the violations of Katanga's rights once the Prosecutor became involved in the case pursuant to such provisions as Articles 21, paragraph 3, 54, paragraph 1 (c) and 67, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute,[469] he knowingly countenanced the illegal detention of Katanga in the DRC, "thereby facilitating and taking advantage of a situation of illegality".[470] It must be borne in mind that this situation is somewhat different from a court which exercises jurisdiction over a person who has been the victim of a male captus because that male captus was not very serious and indeed, not the fault of the prosecuting authorities. In principle, one could argue that in this case, the court also takes advantage of an illegality. However, in the case of Katanga, the Defence claims that the male captus is far more serious as the Prosecutor allegedly took advantage of a situation of which he was aware but upon which he nevertheless decided not to act. In fact, the Defence made an even more serious allegation when it stated that

> [t]here is circumstan[t]ial evidence to suggest that the DRC and the Prosecutor acted in tandem in this respect since the DRC was holding accused persons with the specific purpose of their transfer to the ICC before the issuance of warrants of arrest [original footnote omitted, ChP].[471]

What the Defence also reproached the Prosecutor for is that he did not keep the Pre-Trial Chamber properly informed of the (illegal) proceedings in the DRC, information which, according to the Defence, could be relevant for the Pre-Trial to decide on, for example, the issuance of an arrest warrant.[472] After all, pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, the Pre-Trial Chamber should "refuse to grant a warrant of arrest if to do so might implicate the ICC in the violation of the rights of a suspect".[473] By not informing the Pre-Trial Chamber, the Prosecutor had made the ICC a participant in the violations.[474] The Defence went even further, [466] Ibid., para. 86. Note again (see n. 464) that Art. 67, para. 1 (c) of the ICC Statute was also explicitly mentioned in Chapter IX, in the examination of a number of provisions from the proper instruments of the ICC which could be seen as being (indirectly) relevant for the male captus discussion, see n. 45 and accompanying text of Chapter IX. See also n. 261 of Chapter VIII.

---

[467] See ibid.: "[O]nce the Pr[o]secutor has set this process [namely the process of bringing a defendant to trial, ChP] in motion, she is under a duty to ensure that, within the scope of her authority, the case proceeds to trial in a way that respects the rights of the accused [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also n. 865 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. (See also n. 460 of the present chapter.)

[468] See ibid.

[469] See ibid., para. 90.

[470] Ibid., para. 92.

[471] Ibid., para. 93. See also ns. 441-443 and accompanying text.

[472] See ibid., para. 95.

[473] Ibid.

[474] See ibid., para. 100.

arguing that if the Prosecutor had informed the Pre-Trial Chamber, the judges themselves had to be blamed for being knowing participants in Katanga's violations.[475]

The Defence then turned to the third phase of Katanga's detention and argued that Katanga fell under the ICC's constructive custody between 2 July 2007 (the issuance of the arrest warrant) and 18 October 2007 (when Katanga was surrendered to the ICC). As from that moment, the Defence submitted, "it is no longer necessary (…) to inquire into issues of knowledge and duty of care. At this point any continuing illegality becomes the shared fruit and responsibility of the DRC and the ICC".[476] Although this last reasoning is definitely correct, one can imagine that some discussion is possible with respect to the actual moment Katanga falls under the constructive custody of the ICC. The Defence focuses on the arrest warrant and the idea behind this document,[477] but one could also view this point in a more practical way and argue that one should not look at the issuance of the arrest warrant (which, despite its title, focuses more on the accusations than on the arrest of the suspect), but at the moment the DRC authorities started to actually detain the suspect on behalf of the ICC, which can only be after 18 September 2007, the moment the more concrete request for arrest and surrender was sent to the DRC authorities.[478]

However, it can be argued that one should not focus too much on the definition and actual starting moments of concepts which can fragment a process which should not be fragmented in the first place. What the judges should do is ensure that all violations which occur more generally in the context of their case are ultimately remedied and that, in determining what kind of remedy be provided, attention is being paid, among other things, to the degree of involvement of the ICC in the violations. Such involvement is, of course, greater in the context of a provision such as Article 59 of the ICC Statute, which starts to apply as from the moment the national authorities have received a request for provisional arrest or for arrest and surrender, but already before these proceedings, which execute the official ICC arrest, the ICC can be said to be involved in the case and to have responsibilities in that respect. One could think here of a provision such as Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute which states that "[i]n respect of an investigation under this Statute, a person: (…) Shall not be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention, and

[475] See ibid., para. 99.
[476] Ibid., para. 101. See also ibid., para. 106.
[477] See ibid., para. 102: "[C]ustody may be said to be constructive once it serves the interests of, enables, and is in fact being taken advantage of by the ICC for the purpose of his eventual transfer to the ICC. Having issued a warrant of arrest against the accused, the ICC had taken a definite and official step with a view to his prosecution before the ICC. His continued detention served the direct interests of the ICC and the ICC was aware of that detention."
[478] It is possible (but, because of the omitted information, not clear) that this is the alternative argument of the Defence, see ibid., para. 108: "Alternatively, the accused must have come within the constructive custody of the Court between [REDACTED], and the 17th October when constructive custody became the actual custody of the ICC. During that period the rights of the accused continued to be violated and he was not even informed promptly of the new charges against him under the Statute, let alone those that formed the original basis of his detention in the DRC [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

shall not be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established in this Statute."[479] However, as previously clarified, the ICC should not restrict itself to such concepts as investigation, arrest/detention at the behest of/constructive custody and the like: irregularities may also occur in which the ICC (or a third party working at the behest of the ICC) is not involved, but which may nevertheless be seen as falling within the context of an ICC case and in need of a remedy (think of the abduction by private individuals just before the ICC has initiated its official investigation).

The Defence also complained about the Registry, namely in the context of allegations that Article 59 of the ICC Statute was violated by the DRC because Katanga was not brought promptly before the competent judicial authority who, in addition, had not inquired whether Katanga had been arrested in accordance with the proper process and whether his rights had been respected.[480] According to the Defence, "[t]he DRC failed to comply with the requirements of Article 59, nor is there any indication that the Prosecutor or Registry requested that they do so".[481] In this context, the Defence made the general allegation that the fact that the arrest warrant was not executed until three and a half months later showed "an intent not to put into effect the warrant of arrest".[482] Furthermore, it was also asserted that "[o]n the day of his transfer there was continued mistreatment, with the participation of the Registry".[483]

Now, what was to be done about all these alleged violations? The Defence argued, returning to the point mentioned above, that it is unclear how the Defence viewed the abuse of process doctrine to fit within the ICC's system, that "[w]hatever may be the precise status at the ICC of the common law doctrine of 'abuse of process' there is no doubt that the principles the doctrine is aimed at upholding and give effect to are principles equally valued by the ICC".[484] That is, of course, true, although neither must it be forgotten that the abuse of process doctrine/the doctrine which in the common law context is called abuse of process is broader and more suitable to tackle other pre-trial irregularities which are not necessarily related to the human rights dimension (the dimension on which the ICC focuses) but which may nevertheless be deemed to be so serious that it would undermine the integrity of the Court to continue with the case. One could hereby think of violations of State sovereignty and the rule of law. In addition, it is to be remembered that the ICC's male detentus test only concerns action by the "accusers" of the suspect/accused and that it possibly – see the discussions on the second formulation supra – requires an old-fashioned and outdated element, namely that the accused can no longer make his defence because of the male captus.

[479] See for the Defence's view on the interaction between those two provisions ibid., para. 104.
[480] See ibid., paras. 112-113.
[481] Ibid., para. 112.
[482] Ibid., para. 110.
[483] Ibid., para. 113.
[484] Ibid., para. 114.

The Defence, however, was not concerned with this. The fact that an abduction did not take place and that private individuals were not involved in the male captus of Katanga may also have helped to persuade the Defence that the ICC Appeals Chamber's reasoning in Lubanga Dyilo sufficed here.

The Defence noted that under this reasoning, the ICC, like the other international criminal tribunals "may review the actions of such separate entities [the Defence referred here to "state authorities and potentially other international organisations",[485] ChP] prior to the transfer of an accused to the tribunal".[486] In fact, it was alleged that it does not only have the power, but also the responsibility to do so.[487] In that context, Katanga also asked the Chamber, and this will remind one of the Todorović case, "to consider whether it would be appropriate to order an evidentiary hearing in the determination of this matter".[488]

Then, finally, the Defence turned to the last point of its submission, the appropriate remedy for these violations. It argued that first, the ICC had to make a declaration of illegality, as a result of which it could decide, pursuant to Katanga's right to a remedy, "on the appropriate remedy which may be awarded or left to a later decision following the appropriate procedure".[489] With respect to this appropriate remedy, the Defence argued, referring to Barayagwiza, Nikolić and Lubanga Dyilo, "that given the length and extent of the unlawful detention the accused has been subjected to serious mistreatment and the appropriate remedy is a stay or termination of the proceedings against him".[490] In this context, it also – interestingly – turned to the earlier discussed (male detentus?) formulation in Lubanga Dyilo that the violations must be "such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence within the framework of his[/her] rights".[491] However, the Defence does not go clearly into the arguably most interesting words of this statement, namely what it means for the violations to be "such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence within the framework of his[/her] rights [emphasis added, ChP]". It rather focused on the meaning of the idea of the violations being "such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence within the framework of his[/her] rights [emphasis added, ChP]". According to the Defence, it was clear that all the violations suffered by Katanga brought "these legal proceedings in such disrepute, that a fair trial within the framework of the rights of the accused is no longer possible".[492] Of course, one might be of the opinion that

[485] Ibid., para. 116.
[486] Ibid.
[487] See ibid., para. 119: "[I]t is submitted that the Trial Chamber has power and responsibility to review and supervise the persisting situation of unlawfulness of the detention of the accused. It has the inherent power, in the Defence submission, to ensure that its process is not undermined by serious human rights violations of a continuing nature which pierce to the heart the Court's integrity and standing in the international community as an instrument of justice."
[488] Ibid., para. 120.
[489] Ibid., para. 121.
[490] Ibid., para. 122.
[491] See ibid., para. 125.
[492] Ibid., para. 127. See also ibid., paras. 130-131: "In this case, there has been no clean break from the initial and continuing illegality of the detention. It will continue throughout the trial under conditions

Katanga's violations were such that one can no longer speak of a fair trial, even if the trial at the ICC (in the ICC courtroom) itself is fair, but that idea represents the other (namely the first and third) formulations of the male detentus test of the ICC Appeals Chamber in the Lubanga Dyilo case. However, the Defence does not clarify to what extent the violations of Katanga would also lead to a refusal of jurisdiction under a (possible) male detentus formulation which, in addition, demands that the violations must be "such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence [emphasis added, ChP]".[493]

Be that as it may, the Defence also argued that Katanga was entitled to compensation pursuant to Article 85, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute.

Finally, it was requested "that the matter of the accused['s] unlawful arrest and detention be taken into account at the relevant time, in the event that he is convicted of any offence within the jurisdiction of the court".[494] The Defence stated in that context that "Rule 146 [this must be Rule 145 of the ICC RPE ('Determination of sentence'), ChP] sets out a variety of factors to be tak[en] into account in the determination of sentence, but these are not exhaustive".[495]

On 23 July 2009, the legal representatives of the victims presented their (brief) observations. They argued that Katanga had been in detention in the DRC for his alleged involvement in the killing of the nine MONUC peacekeepers – not for the situation in Bogoro[496] – and that his "détention préventive"[497] was extended several times for the purpose of the investigation.[498] Moreover, they opined that the procedure by which Katanga was brought before the competent judicial authority was in accordance with Congolese law.[499] With respect to the allegations of where the total disregard for the basic rights of the accused in arresting and detaining him and the use of this to enable his transfer to the Court cloud the legitimacy of his presence in the courtroom every additional day the accused is kept in detention. It is therefore submitted that the trial will remain unfair as long as the continued detention formerly based on a total disregard for the rights of the accused persists, and the justice administered by the court has been brought into such serious disrepute that a fair trial has in fact become an impossibility, regardless of the impartiality of the judges in the assessment of the evidence."

---

[493] In the following paragraph, the Defence does mention the words "make his defence", but again does not explain to what extent the accused can no longer make his defence when brought to court after these violations, see ibid., para. 128: "It is important to note that when the Appeals Chamber speaks of a fair trial not being possible it takes the view that this occurs when an accused cannot make his defence within the framework of his rights. If an unlawful detention in flagrant violation of human rights not only continues but effectively enables his attendance at the trial, then the trial cannot take place within the framework of his rights and the whole trial is vitiated."

[494] Ibid., para. 138.

[495] Ibid., para. 137.

[496] See CPI, La Chambre de Première Instance I[I], Situation en République Démocratique du Congo, Affaire Le Procureur c. Germain Katanga et Mathieu [Ngudjolo] Chui, 'Observations des représentants légaux des victimes représentées par Me Jean-Louis GILLISEN et Me Joseph KETA sur « The Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful d[e]tention and stay of proceedings (ICC-01/04-01/07-125-conf-Exp) »' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 23 juillet 2009, para. 8.

[497] Ibid., para. 2. See also ibid., para. 8. See for the issue of "preventive detention" n. 440 and accompanying text.

[498] See ibid., para. 2. See also ibid., para. 8.

[499] See ibid., para. 4.

violations of Congolese law and international human rights law in the context of Katanga's detention in the DRC, in which the ICC organs allegedly participated, the legal representatives made a reservation as they were not in the possession of all the documents from the case file.[500] However, they submitted that if by any chance, the judges had to consider involvement of the Court in the violations committed in the DRC, the remedy could not be the refusal of jurisdiction in view of the seriousness of the alleged crimes of Katanga.[501] Such a remedy would violate the rights of the victims to the truth and to justice.[502]

This study does not agree with the legal representatives of the victims that refusal of jurisdiction cannot follow merely because of the seriousness of Katanga's alleged crimes. Obviously, if the violations are so serious that it would undermine the integrity of the ICC to continue, a male detentus should follow, whether one is dealing with suspects of international crimes or not.[503] The victims should not focus on their right to have the (alleged) perpetrators of their crimes tried.[504] They should focus on their right to have the (alleged) perpetrators of their crimes tried fairly. However, as concerns this specific case, one can indeed concur that a refusal of jurisdiction would be a disproportionate remedy, taking into account, among other things, the seriousness of the alleged crimes. Indeed, the fact that some of Katanga's charges were already confirmed may constitute an additional drive for the judges not to relinquish jurisdiction unless absolutely necessary.[505] However, in that case, perhaps other remedies would be justified, a point which the legal representatives of the victims, unfortunately, do not address.

Next, it was up to the Prosecution. In the introduction to its response, the Prosecution did not adopt the Defence's division of the case into three phases, but divided the relevant time frame in two periods, namely 1) 26 February 2005 (arrest of Katanga by the DRC authorities) – 18 September 2007 (transmission by the Registry to the DRC authorities of the ICC's request for arrest and surrender) and 2) [502] See ibid., para. 13. See also ibid., where it is stated that this entitlement leads to three consequences: 1) that perpetrators of crimes are prosecuted; 2) that perpetrators of crimes are judged and found guilty and 3) that victims have the right to reparation.

[500] See ibid., para. 9.
[501] See ibid., para. 12.
[503] One can argue that the ICC judges would (correctly) agree with that idea, see ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 39: "Unfairness in the treatment of the suspect or the accused may rupture the process to an extent making it impossible to piece together the constituent elements of a fair trial. In those circumstances, the interest of the world community to put persons accused of the most heinous crimes against humanity on trial, great as it is, is outweighed by the need to sustain the efficacy of the judicial process as the potent agent of justice."
[504] See n. 502.
[505] Cf. in that respect the argument at n. 163 and accompanying text of Chapter VII that the reasoning that one can take into account the element 'seriousness of the alleged crimes' is valid a fortiori with respect to persons who have already been convicted, taking into account, of course, that a confirmation of the charges is absolutely not the same as a conviction.

18 September 2007 – 18 October 2007 (surrender of Katanga).[506] The date of 18 September 2007 is an interesting one and has already been alluded to in the discussion of the Defence's submission, namely that some time after that date could mark the beginning of the ICC's constructive custody of Katanga, see footnote 478 and accompanying text.[507]

The Prosecution was of the opinion that Katanga's detention in the first period "could not be attributed to the Court and cannot affect the jurisdiction of this Court".[508] It hereby referred to the Lubanga Dyilo case and the previously mentioned (and criticised) reasoning of the Appeals Chamber in that case "that issues regarding his prior detention were relevant only where they were part of"[509] "the process of bringing the appellant to justice for the crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings before the Court".[510] And that was not the case here, as "[t]he DRC authorities expressly confirmed that the Accused had not been kept in detention for facts related to Bogoro [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[511] As argued earlier, the fact that a person may be in detention at the national level for other crimes during a time in which the ICC is not involved may very well not be considered to fall within the context of the ICC's case. However, if, during this period, a suspect is, for example, seriously mistreated and consequently surrendered to the ICC, judges may still be of the opinion that this male captus falls within the context of their case and that the violation must hence be remedied. If that male captus is so serious that they feel that it would undermine the integrity of the ICC to proceed, they will refuse jurisdiction, even – to come back to the assertion of the Prosecution mentioned at footnote 508 and accompanying text – if that male captus cannot be legally attributed to the ICC. With respect to this first period, the

[506] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 3.

[507] See also n. 370 and accompanying text.

[508] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 4.

[509] Ibid.

[510] See n. 292 and accompanying text. The Prosecution also referred here to para. 121 of the ICC Appeals Chamber's decision in Lubanga Dyilo of 13 February 2007. This paragraph was already mentioned (and criticised), see n. 265 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII. Remarkably, the Prosecutor did not refer to a decision from the Katanga case itself in which the reasoning from the 13 February 2007 decision was confirmed, see ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the powers of the Pre-Trial Chamber to review proprio motu the pre-trial detention of Germain Katanga' (Urgent, Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 18 March 2008, p. 11. Nevertheless, he did refer to this case later in his response, see ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 24, n. 38. See also n. 528.

[511] Ibid., para. 5.

Prosecutor moreover maintained that there was no concerted action between the Prosecutor and the authorities in the DRC to detain Katanga "in order to ensure that he would be in custody and available for surrender to the Court [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[512]

With respect to the second period, the Prosecutor admitted that the detention based on the ICC's request for arrest and surrender, which lasted about a month, was attributable to the ICC.[513] One could argue that, in making this statement, the Prosecutor follows the apparent view of the Deputy Prosecutor in Lubanga Dyilo (see n. 90 and accompanying text) that if a suspect is arrested/detained at the behest/request of the ICC, violations in that context can be attributed to the ICC. This broad responsibility for violations occurring in the suspect's constructive custody is surely to be welcomed. However, the Prosecutor continued, both Katanga's detention and the surrender "were legally and factually unblemished".[514]

A little earlier, it was explained that the Prosecutor argued that the detention in the first period "could not be attributed to the Court and cannot affect the jurisdiction of this Court". However, perhaps the Prosecutor retreats from this assertion when he made his final point, stating that > the Defence does not substantiate that the Accused suffered torture or any other serious form of mistreatment which could have the consequence that this Court cannot properly proceed against him. A stay of proceedings is the most exceptional of remedies, to be applied only in cases where it is impossible to secure a fair trial of the Accused [original footnote omitted, ChP].[515]

The word "perhaps" has been used here as the words of the Prosecutor are very generally formulated and could easily apply to situations in which the suspect is seriously mistreated as such, irrespective of the entity responsible. However, doubt is created by his reference to paragraph 39 of the Appeals Chamber's decision in the Lubanga Dyilo case, a paragraph used in the Appeals Chamber's discussion of its own male detentus test, a test which demands action "by his/her accusers". A test, moreover, created by an Appeals Chamber which rejected the abuse of process doctrine.

Now that the introduction of his response was presented, the Prosecutor turned to the relevant factual background. Here, he argued, among other things, that when Katanga was brought before the competent judicial authorities on 17 October 2007,

---

[512] Ibid. Although the Prosecutor refers here to the Lubanga Dyilo case, he nevertheless appears to have forgotten to replace the name of Lubanga Dyilo with the one of Katanga: "In addition, there is no evidence to support allegations of "concerted action" between the Prosecutor and the DRC authorities to detain Lubanga in order to ensure that he would be in custody and available for surrender to the Court [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[513] See ibid., para. 6: "The Second Period of detention of the Accused by the DRC authorities dates from the time the Court transmitted to the DRC authorities a formal request for the Accused's arrest and surrender. The detention based on the ICC's request for surrender lasted approximately one month. It is attributable to the Court."

[514] Ibid.

[515] Ibid., para. 7.

these authorities "determined that he was the person named in the warrant, notified the Accused of the warrant of arrest, and read out the charges against him [original footnotes omitted, ChP]".[516] In addition, when this happened, Katanga was assisted by his counsel.[517] Although the Prosecutor does not go into the other two points of Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute here (namely that the competent judicial authority must determine whether Katanga has been arrested in accordance with the proper process and whether his rights have been respected), the assertion that his lawyer was present when the charges were read to Katanga strengthens the already expressed doubt (see footnote 418 and accompanying text) with respect to Katanga's allegations on this point. The Prosecutor also contested other claims of Katanga concerning his surrender and arrival at the ICC, maintaining that on 17 October 2007, Katanga "was medically examined by a doctor designated by the Court, who certified that the Accused was fit to travel [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[518] and that, when Katanga arrived in The Hague, "he was subjected to a medical examination [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[519] and "visited by staff of the Court, who gave him a file containing the Court's basic legal documents, including a certified copy of the warrant of arrest, and read him his rights [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[520]

After these factual issues had been addressed, the Prosecutor turned to the legal arguments of the case, where he looked at 1) the relevant legal framework; 2) the point that Katanga's detention by the DRC authorities does not require a stay of the proceedings or in fact any other remedy and 3) the point that the Defence did not substantiate any allegation of torture or serious mistreatment.

In his discussion of first point, the relevant legal framework, the Prosecutor addressed three issues, namely a) the doctrine of abuse of process and stay of the proceedings; b) the relevance of detention by national authorities to the proceedings before the ICC and c) the point that the jurisprudence adduced by the Defence does not support the Defence motion.

With respect to the point under a), the Prosecutor first (correctly) explained that the abuse of process as such had been rejected by the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo but that the judges had nevertheless formulated a test of their own in the context of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute.[521] According to the Prosecutor, the remedy of a stay of the proceedings only applied:

---

[516] Ibid., para. 14.
[517] See ibid. Very strangely, the Prosecutor also referred to the "submissions of Mr. Keita during the initial appearance of the Accused that confirm that the Accused was able to consult with his lawyer already during the morning of 17 September 2007 (ICC-01-04-01-07-T-5-ENG, 22 October 2007, p. 19, lines 13-15)." (Ibid., para. 14, n. 19. See also ibid., para. 60, n. 121.) However, besides the fact that this date must, of course, be 17 October 2007 and not 17 September 2007, one can clearly read at these lines that Mr Keita maintained that Katanga did not see his lawyer in the morning: "From 10.00 in the morning till 7.00 in the evening he was detained in a cell. At 7.00 he was visited by his lawyer, Mr. (…) Bertin Boki, with whom he was able to talk for a few minutes." (See n. 418 and accompanying text.)
[518] Ibid., para. 14.
[519] Ibid., para. 15.
[520] Ibid. See also the remarks made at n. 426.
[521] See ibid., paras. 21-22.

> a) where "either the foundation of the prosecution or the bringing of the accused to justice is tainted with illegal action or gross violation of the rights of the individual making it unacceptable for justice to embark on its course;" b) "[w]here the breaches of the rights of the accused are such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence within the framework of his[/her] rights, no fair trial can take place and the proceedings can be stayed"; or c) "[i]f, at the outset, it is clear that the essential preconditions of a fair trial are missing and there is no sufficient indication that this will be resolved during the trial process" [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[522]

The last possibility does not stem from the decision of 14 December 2006, but from a very famous decision issued almost two years later in which the Appeals Chamber confirmed the Trial Chamber's stay of the proceedings because of other, evidence-related, problems, namely because the Prosecution had improperly/too extensively used Article 54, paragraph 3 (e) of the ICC Statute[523] when obtaining information from the UN and NGOs.[524] This had led to the non-disclosure of a considerable amount of exculpatory evidence and thus to the inability of Lubanga Dyilo to defend himself. Although this is indeed a stay of the proceedings possibility, it is, of course, better to focus here on the formulations used by the ICC in actual male captus decisions. After all, the case from 2008 did not involve a male captus issue, as it did not concern a problem related to the way the suspect was brought into the jurisdiction of the ICC. With respect to the evidence problems suffered by Lubanga Dyilo, one can indeed concur with the Appeals Chamber/Trial Chamber[525] in that case that the unfairness of the trial may be resolved during the proceedings in court, namely when the exculpatory evidence is nonetheless disclosed to the Defence.[526] However, this is different with respect to very serious male captus cases. If such serious situations occur, it is irrelevant whether the suspect can still enjoy a fair trial in court because it would be unfair to try the suspect in the first place; some [523] This provision states that "[t]he Prosecutor may (…) Agree not to disclose, at any stage of the proceedings, documents or information that the Prosecutor obtains on the condition of confidentiality and solely for the purpose of generating new evidence, unless the provider of the information consents".

---

[522] Ibid., para. 23.

[524] See (the already briefly mentioned, see n. 623 of Chapter III and n. 247 of this chapter) ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against the decision of Trial Chamber I entitled "Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Article 54(3)(e) agreements and the application to stay the prosecution of the accused, together with certain other issues raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008"' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 OA 13, 21 October 2008. The words to which the Prosecutor in Katanga refers can be found at para. 76 of this decision. In fact, they stem not from the Appeals Chamber itself, but from the Trial Chamber (whose decision was confirmed by the Appeals Chamber), see ICC, Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Urgent Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Article 54(3)(e) agreements and the application to stay the prosecution of the accused, together with certain other issues raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 13 June 2008, para. 91.

[525] See the previous footnote.

[526] See also n. 623 of Chapter III and accompanying text, explaining the difference between a conditional and a permanent stay of the proceedings.

situations are simply not reparable. In that respect, it is a pity that the Prosecutor only mentions the second formulation of the Appeals Chamber's (male detentus?, see supra and infra) test and not, for example, the first, where it was stated that "[w]here fair trial becomes impossible because of breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect or the accused by his/her accusers, it would be a contradiction in terms to put the person on trial". Although such a broader avenue can be found in the first possibility presented by the Prosecutor, one must not forget that these words stem from a case discussed in the context of the abuse of process doctrine, a doctrine which was explicitly rejected by the Appeals Chamber.[527]

A final interesting point to be made here is that the Prosecutor, in contrast to the Appeals Chamber in its decision of 14 December 2006, clearly presents different possibilities which can lead to the ending of the case. That may constitute additional evidence for the earlier mentioned idea that the second (male detentus?) formulation as used by the Appeals Chamber in its decision of 14 December 2006 may not be a more strict version of the first and third formulations in that decision, but may constitute an additional possibility to lead to the ending of the case, namely in case certain serious violations entail that the accused can no longer make his defence. If that were so, than a male captus victim does not need to turn to this seemingly stricter formulation as he can already rely on the broader formulations which better suit male captus problems, namely the first and third formulations. (Or the first formulation presented here by the Prosecutor.)

After having presented these three possibilities, the Prosecutor turned to the point under b), the relevance of detention by national authorities to the ICC's proceedings, repeating the (criticised) point mentioned in his introduction that the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo had stated that it would only look at irregularities in the detention if these were part of "the process of bringing the appellant to justice for the crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings before the Court".[528] The Prosecutor then explained, and this point has to do with

[527] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 31.

[528] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 24. In this context (see ibid., para. 24, n. 38), the Prosecutor also asserted that "[a]ccording to the established practice before this Court, detention by national authorities prior to the transfer of an Accused to the Court is also not relevant for the purposes of Article 60(4)", referring to ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the powers of the Pre-Trial Chamber to review proprio motu the pre-trial detention of Germain Katanga' (Urgent, Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 18 March 2008, p. 11 (see also n. 510) and ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the Conditions of the Pre-Trial Detention of Germain Katanga' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 21 April 2008. However, in this last decision, Art. 60, para. 4 of the ICC Statute was not discussed. In the word "perhaps" (see the text following footnote 515 and accompanying text), that besides the Appeals Chamber's male detentus test in which involvement of the ICC is required,[529] "torture or serious mistreatment of the suspect that is "in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person"[530] to the Court might – if sufficiently outrageous – justify the non-assumption of the jurisdiction in any given case".[531] One can, of course, agree with this view, which would arguably also lead to a refusal of jurisdiction, irrespective of the entity responsible (the words "in any given case" reinforce that idea) and irrespective of the question for which crimes the person was in detention at the national level, cf. the very general words "in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person" to the ICC.[532] However, as the Prosecutor concurred earlier with the Appeals Chamber's view in Lubanga Dyilo, demanding that the irregularities must be connected to "the process of bringing the appellant to justice for the crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings before the Court",[533] it is unclear whether the above-mentioned broader formulation does in fact represent the Prosecutor's stance. With respect to the words "in any given case", this test is surely better presented than that of the Pre-Trial Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo which spoke of "instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State [emphasis added ChP]". However, where the Pre-Trial Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo surpassed the Prosecutor in Katanga is that the former stated that the application of this reasoning, to date, has been restricted to these instances (which does not exclude other serious male captus situations which do not involve serious mistreatment/torture), whereas the Prosecutor in Katanga was only interested in serious mistreatment/torture if addition, besides the fact that the first decision, which referred to the 13 February 2007 decision in Lubanga Dyilo, was already criticised earlier, see n. 510 of the present chapter and n. 265 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII, it arguably did take detention prior to surrender into account, namely the detention at the behest of the ICC between the issuance of the arrest warrant/request for arrest and surrender and the actual surrender.

[529] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 25. The Prosecutor referred here (see ibid., para. 25, n. 41), among other things, to the decision of 21 October 2008 (see n. 524 and accompanying text), the decision which did not concern a male captus issue, but in which the Appeals Chamber nevertheless discussed the reasoning of its male captus decision of 14 December 2006 (including the "by his/her accusers" paragraph).

[530] This is very much reminiscent not only of the abuse of process formulation of the Pre-Trial Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo (see n. 159 and accompanying text), but also of the abuse of process formulation in the Duch case (see n. 1276 and accompanying text of Chapter VI), see also n. 295 of the present chapter.

[531] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 25.

[532] This would also comport with the Prosecutor's stance in Lubanga Dyilo, see ns. 195 and 295.

[533] See ns. 510 and 528 and accompanying text.

sufficiently outrageous. In fact, the Prosecutor confined this test even further when referring to the (criticised)[534] words of the ICTY Trial Chamber in Karadžić that > it could only be in exceptional circumstances that actions of a third party that is completely unconnected to the Tribunal or the proceedings could ever lead to those proceedings being stayed. Where an accused is seriously mistreated by such a third party, that mistreatment is unlikely to be a barrier to a fair trial which can be secured in various other ways, for example, by excluding any evidence obtained by torture at the hands of the third party [original footnote omitted, ChP].[535]

However, as already argued in Chapter VI and in this chapter, wondering whether a person can still enjoy a fair trial in the courtroom after being seriously mistreated/tortured is the wrong question, one which focuses on the restricted view of a fair trial, a fair trial in the courtroom. The judges confronted by such a case should not consider whether in such a case, the suspect/accused can still enjoy a fair trial in court. They should consider whether the serious mistreatment/torture as such is not already so serious that one can no longer speak of a fair trial/that it would be unfair to have a trial in the first place and thus that jurisdiction must be refused, whether or not the suspect/accused can still enjoy a fair trial in court.

Finally, it must be borne in mind that even though one may agree with (some aspects of) the above-mentioned view of the Prosecutor, it is not at all clear whether the Appeals Chamber also shares the serious mistreatment/torture male detentus avenue as the remarks related to that avenue were made in the context of the abuse of process doctrine,[536] a doctrine which the Appeals Chamber explicitly rejected. The fact that the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo factually agreed with the Pre-Trial Chamber that no serious mistreatment/torture occurred in the case[537] does not necessarily mean that it also shares the legal (and unclear) view of the Pre-Trial Chamber with respect to the serious mistreatment/torture male detentus avenue, see the text following footnote 283 and accompanying text.

The third legal point the Prosecutor wished to make, the point under c), had to do with the jurisprudence used by the Defence. According to the Prosecutor, this case law did not support the Defence motion.[538] In his view, [534] See ns. 727 and 733 and accompanying text of Chapter VI and n. 256 and accompanying text of the present chapter.

---

[535] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 25 or n. 733 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[536] See also ibid., para. 25, n. 42, referring, among other things, to the Pre-Trial Chamber's serious mistreatment/torture remarks in Lubanga Dyilo.

[537] See ibid., referring, among other things, to para. 43 of the Appeals Chamber's male captus decision in Lubanga Dyilo where the judges of the Appeals Chamber stated that "the findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber respecting the absence of torture or serious mistreatment have not been shown to be erroneous in any way."

[538] See ibid., para. 26.

> an analysis of the factual basis of the cases relied upon in the Defence Motion and the conclusions drawn by the respective courts in those cases corroborates that a stay of proceedings based on abuse of process is the most exceptional of remedies. It also shows that any abuse must be related to the process of bringing a person to justice for crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings for which a stay is sought.[539]

Although one can agree with the Prosecutor that it is unlikely that the male captus of Katanga is so serious that one must turn to the "most exceptional of remedies", namely the refusal of jurisdiction, the second part of the quotation repeats the earlier criticised requirement of the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo that the irregularities must be connected to "the process of bringing a person to justice for crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings" of the ICC. It also provides additional support for the view mentioned above, namely that it is unclear whether the broader formulation mentioned at footnote 531 and accompanying text does in fact constitute the Prosecutor's stance.

In Chapter VII of this book, the principle was distilled that at both the national level and the international level, courts use their discretion not to exercise jurisdiction if the male captus is so serious that to continue exercising jurisdiction would constitute an abuse of the court's process. However, what constitutes such a serious male captus is up to the judges to determine. At the national level, there is an additional condition, namely that the authorities of the now prosecuting forum must be involved in the male captus, but this requirement is absent (and rightly so) in the context of the tribunals which do not have an enforcement arm of their own. Otherwise, judges at both levels have the same task, namely to find out whether the alleged male captus exists and is so serious that they cannot, in good conscience, continue with the case. If the irregularities are connected to a national detention of a suspect who was held for the same charges in which the now prosecuting forum is interested, one can easily assert that this male captus takes place within the context of the prosecuting forum's case and should therefore be looked into. However, other irregularities may occur which do not have the above-mentioned feature but which are nevertheless to be seen as falling within the context of the prosecuting forum's case. For example, if a suspect was held at the national level for certain crimes but during his detention was seriously mistreated by the national authorities before being surrendered to the ICC for other crimes, judges may still believe that this male captus falls within the context of their case and that the violation must hence be remedied. In short, judges must look at the context of their case more generally.[540]

In the remainder of his response, the Prosecutor (correctly) explained that the case law of the tribunals – Nikolić,[541] Barayagwiza[542] and Duch[543] – shows that

[539] Ibid.
[540] See n. 295 for several cases arguably supporting that broader view.
[541] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 28.
[542] See ibid., para. 29.

refusal of jurisdiction under the abuse of process doctrine is an exceptional remedy, but not one of these cases can arguably be seen as support for that other idea, namely that the male captus must be connected to the process of bringing a person to justice for crimes that form the subject-matter of the now prosecuting forum.[544]

Having addressed the relevant legal framework, the Prosecutor turned to the second issue related to the legal arguments of his case, namely the point that Katanga's detention by the DRC authorities does not require a stay of the proceedings or, in fact, any other remedy.

In the discussion of this issue, the Prosecutor repeated the previously mentioned and criticised point that Katanga's first period of detention in the DRC was "unrelated to the process of bringing the Accused to justice for crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings before the Court".[545] In this context, he noted that the Defence had admitted that the killing of the nine MONUC peacekeepers had constituted the reason for Katanga's initial arrest[546] and that the DRC authorities had stated that the Bogoro case had not been the subject of proceedings in the DRC.[547] That may indeed be true, but one becomes very curious then to know for which crimes (if any at all) Katanga was actually being held at the DRC. See in that respect the allegations by the Defence that, during the interview of 20 January 2006, Katanga was asked about Bogoro by Colonel Tsinu,[548] that the Military High Court had held that Katanga was pursued for crimes against humanity[549] and finally that the DRC authorities had stated "that no investigations were ever conducted with respect to the accused for any crime, including that of the death of the nine blue helmets".[550]

The Prosecutor subsequently reiterated his argument that, until the ICC request for arrest and surrender was served on the DRC authorities, the starting moment of the second period of detention, there was no involvement/concerted action/collusion of the ICC in the DRC detention.[551] Involvement which could, of course, entail that violations be imputed to the ICC. With respect to another issue related to the starting point of the second period of detention, namely the Defence's point that the ICC

---

[543] See ibid., para. 30.
[544] In fact, in Nikolić, Duch and Barayagwiza, one will find broader formulations, see n. 295.
[545] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 31.
[546] See also n. 384 and accompanying text.
[547] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 34.
[548] See n. 373.
[549] See n. 409 and accompanying text.
[550] See n. 411 and accompanying text.
[551] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 35.

was obliged to speedily transmit the request for arrest and surrender,[552] the Prosecutor replied, and arguably correctly so, that the Court was under no duty to transmit this request without delay.[553] The Prosecutor also turned to Article 59 of the ICC Statute, again rightly noting that the obligations of this provision only start to run as from the request for arrest and surrender/request for provisional arrest.[554] Moreover, he stated that paragraph 2 of this provision "does not impose a further obligation on national authorities, or on the ICC, to review the legality of any previous detention of the person for national criminal proceedings that are unrelated to the process before the Court [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[555] This point was also made by the Pre-Trial Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo. In the discussion of that case, it was argued that this provision indeed does not contain a clear obligation in that respect, but that this does not mean that the competent judicial authority of the custodial State – or the ICC, as the ultimate supervisor – should not take into account irregularities which occurred prior to the official ICC arrest if these can be seen as taking place within the context of the ICC case. Furthermore, it can be argued that if the national detention was somehow related to the ICC proceedings, if the Prosecutor was involved in that detention, even if it concerned other crimes for which the ICC is in the end prosecuting the suspect, both the competent judicial authority in the custodial State and the ICC – marginally supervising that authority – must review that detention. A provision such as Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute would arguably demand this as well.

The Prosecutor then went on to reject the Defence's submission that it had a duty of care towards Katanga prior to the transmission of the request for arrest and surrender.[556] According to the Prosecutor, the Defence had misconstrued the Prosecutor's duty under Article 54, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute, in particular with respect to Article 67, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute (the right to be tried

[552] See n. 466 and accompanying text.
[553] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 41. The Prosecutor in this context correctly noted that "the Statute envisages a process of consultation with the requested State to facilitate successful implementation of a request for cooperation under Part IX. Article 87(4) provides that "[i]n relation to any request for assistance presented under this Part, the Court may take such measures, including measures related to the protection of information, as may be necessary to ensure the safety or physical or psychological well-being of any victims, potential witnesses and their families". In this sense, it may be legitimate for the Court to time the transmission of a request for arrest and surrender by taking into consideration the concerns of the DRC authority that transmission of the request could adversely affect safety and the success of the D[RC] operation." (Ibid.) Cf. also ibid., para. 48: "Contrary to the contention of the Defence, the Prosecution was not obliged to seek a warrant of arrest at the very earliest moment that the Accused became a princip[al] suspect. The Prosecution has multiple statutory duties [original footnote omitted, ChP]."
[554] See ibid., para. 44.
[555] Ibid.
[556] See ibid., para. 47.

without undue delay).[557] The Prosecutor held that the rights under Article 67 of the ICC Statute > apply to a person against whom charges have been confirmed, as well as to a "person subject to a warrant of arrest or a summons to appear". However, these rights do not extend to a person who is not subject to an enforceable warrant of arrest or a summons to appear (i.e. a warrant or a summons that has been issued by a Chamber and transmitted to national authorities and/or served on the person) [original footnote omitted, ChP].[558]

However, one can question whether the scope of this provision is not broader. One does not even need to refer to the comments of Schabas in that respect:[559] one can already refer to the Appeals Chamber's views in Lubanga Dyilo, which stated that whenever the ICC is involved in a case, whenever it exercises jurisdiction (this may, of course, be prior to the constructive custody, namely in the case of concerted action between the ICC and third parties) it must follow internationally recognised human rights, such as those stemming from Articles 55, 67 and 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute.[560]

The Prosecutor also rejected the allegation that he had not acted with due diligence:[561] he "did not "sit back until he was ready", as suggested by the Defence, but he also did not act prematurely [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[562] Finally, he argued that he did not have a duty to inform the judges "of issues pertaining to the fact and the conditions of detention by national authorities. Such information would be irrelevant for the Chamber's exercise of its functions [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."[563] However, if one is of the opinion – as is this study – that the judges have a supervisory role in ensuring that all violations occurring in the context of their case is, ultimately, remedied, information on alleged irregularities in the pre-trial phase would not be irrelevant, it would in fact be indispensable.

Next, the Prosecutor turned to the second phase of the DRC detention, after 18 September 2007 (the transmission of the request for arrest and surrender to the DRC authorities). Although he conceded that during this phase of constructive custody, possible violations could be attributed to the ICC, nothing irregular had happened during that phase.[564]

---

[557] See ibid.
[558] Ibid.
[559] See ns. 201 and 261 of Chapter VIII.
[560] See ns. 242 and 244.
[561] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 50. See also n. 468 and accompanying text.
[562] Ibid.
[563] Ibid., para. 52.
[564] See ibid., para. 53.

Specifically, he maintained that this second phase could not be seen as a continuation of the first phase because "the former detention was tied to a national investigation and ordered by national authorities, without participation or influence by this Court".[565] However, even if, theoretically, both phases could be linked, the Prosecutor continued, the facts nevertheless showed that the two phases constituted separate events.[566]

The Prosecutor was also of the opinion that the argument of the Defence "that the prior detention of the accused can or should be attributed to the Court because the Court benefitted from it [original footnote omitted, ChP]",[567] hence the idea "that but for the prior detention, the Accused would not have been surrendered",[568] was "factually incorrect and legally irrelevant".[569] Of course, one could agree with the Prosecutor that one can never assert that Katanga would not have been surrendered were it not for the fact that he was already in detention; it may very well have been possible, if Katanga were at liberty, for him to have been arrested, detained and surrendered to the ICC in a normal way.[570] However, because Katanga was not at liberty, because he was already in custody before being surrendered to the ICC, one can, of course, argue that the ICC profited from the fact that he was already in detention. However, that does not mean that this detention can be legally attributed to the ICC, although the ICC judges may, of course, be of the opinion that, notwithstanding this, the detention is nonetheless to be seen as falling within the context of their case.

According to the Prosecutor, nothing irregular occurred in the process of the execution of the request for arrest and surrender. In this context, he maintained that "[b]ecause the period of delay [of one month, ChP] is reasonable, there is no need to consider whether excessive delay could deprive the Court of jurisdiction over the Accused".[571] He also submitted, and this touches upon the point made in Chapter VIII (in the context of uncooperative States), "that a failure by a national authority to act promptly cannot deprive this Court of the ability to prosecute. Such an interpretation would enable a State to effectively shield a person from justice, by delaying their surrender [original footnote omitted, ChP]."[572] This is indeed an important point, one which justifies that judges take their role as supervisors over the entire proceedings seriously.[573] However, it appears that the abuse of process doctrine, incorrectly rejected by the Lubanga Dyilo Appeals Chamber, because it is so broad, and because the judges can take every element of the case into account, would be perfectly able to deal with such situations. If it becomes clear that State

[565] Ibid., para. 54.
[566] See ibid., para. 54.
[567] Ibid., para. 55.
[568] Ibid.
[569] Ibid.
[570] See ibid.
[571] Ibid., para. 59.
[572] Ibid.
[573] Note that this – justified – concern was also expressed by the Prosecutor in the Todorović and Nikolić cases, see ns. 344 and 476 of Chapter VI.

authorities have intentionally violated procedures and human rights – only to shield the ICC – the judges will not readily conclude that the male captus is so serious as to undermine the integrity of the ICC if it were to continue with the case. That might even be the case in the event of a prima facie case of serious mistreatment/torture. Experienced judges should be able in such cases to determine whether such mistreatment/torture was set up or whether it was genuine and to balance all the different elements at stake to reach a just verdict. Although judges should, of course, be very careful not to become the adjudicators of victims of authentic torture practices, much will depend on the circumstances. In any case, one cannot state beforehand that any case of serious mistreatment/torture must lead to the ending of the case for that would constitute the trigger for States which do not want to surrender their own nationals to inflict severe (physical or mental) pain or suffering upon them[574] before surrendering them to the ICC (if they had not refused to surrender those suspects already beforehand, in the context of the Article 59 of the ICC Statute proceedings). It would, of course, be a ridiculous situation if a State would sooner torture its own nationals (probably even persons high up the hierarchy of the State) than to surrender them to a court which, even though it is not perfect, is definitely fair in general. However, as there are – unfortunately – ridiculous regimes in the world, it is not impossible that judges may nevertheless be confronted by such a situation.

The Prosecutor then went on to reject a number of factual assertions on the part of the Defence, assertions (and rejections) which were mentioned earlier and which do not need to be repeated here.[575]

The third and final point of the Prosecutor's legal arguments of the case (after having discussed the relevant legal framework and the point that Katanga's detention by the DRC authorities does not require a stay of the proceedings or in fact any other remedy), was that the Defence had not substantiated any allegation of torture or serious mistreatment.

In the discussion of this point, the Prosecutor again repeated (a slightly different version of) the broader formulation mentioned at footnote 531 and accompanying text, namely that besides the Appeals Chamber's male detentus test in which involvement of the ICC is required, "torture or serious mistreatment of the suspect that is "in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person" to the Court may justify the non-assumption of the jurisdiction".[576] The differences between this formulation (at paragraph 62 of the Prosecutor's response) and the one mentioned at footnote 531 and accompanying text (at paragraph 25 of the [574] Cf. Art. 7, para. 2 (e) of the ICC Statute: "'Torture' means the intentional infliction of severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, upon a person in the custody or under the control of the accused; except that torture shall not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to, lawful sanctions".

[575] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 60.

[576] Ibid., para. 62.

Prosecutor's response) is that the former speaks of "may" and the latter of "might – if sufficiently outrageous –" and in addition, that the latter does not contain the words "in any given case". Although the words "in any given case" reinforce the idea that the ICC would refuse jurisdiction under this test, irrespective of the entity responsibility, without these words, the test can still be interpreted as such. The fact that the words "might – if sufficiently outrageous –" have been deleted is to be welcomed as one could argue that serious mistreatment/torture is already sufficiently outrageous to possibly lead to a refusal of jurisdiction (note that there is still a discretion here). The more important point is that the problem remains as to whether the Prosecutor is of the opinion that serious mistreatment/torture as such can lead to the ending of the case, or whether it must be related to a detention which can be seen as being part of a process of bringing a suspect to justice for the crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings before the ICC. Although there are a number of indications that the Prosecutor follows this last idea, the fact that this broader formulation is repeated here (even if a slightly different version has been used) again engenders doubt. This doubt is augmented by the remainder of the Prosecutor's response, where he examines whether the detention by the DRC authorities (which he had stated concerned crimes other than those in which the ICC is interested) can be seen as serious mistreatment/torture.

Be that as it may, it is in any case clear that the Prosecutor did not factually agree with the Defence:

> Not every violation of a right amounts to mistreatment, and not every serious violation of a right amounts to serious mistreatment. The Prosecution submits that serious mistreatment requires proof of acts causing grave physical or mental suffering or injury or constituting a serious attack on human dignity. The claims made by the Defence are inadequate to establish that the Accused has been subject to serious mistreatment [original footnote omitted, ChP].[577]

Again, one can assert that it may very well be that Katanga's male captus is not so serious as to refuse jurisdiction, but that neither must one forget that serious mistreatment/torture are only the more 'physically' coloured examples which could lead to a refusal of jurisdiction. Hence, it may indeed be the case that "not every serious violation of a right amounts to serious mistreatment", but that is not particularly important, because a serious violation of a right as such may already be deemed to constitute such a serious male captus that a male detentus must follow.

After having repeated the previously criticised additional requirement that "a stay of the proceedings may be ordered only if the breaches of the rights of the accused are such as to make it impossible to conduct a fair trial"[578] (in the strict sense of the word),[579] the Prosecutor turned to the fourth and final issue of his response, the remedy.

[577] Ibid., para. 64.
[578] Ibid., para. 65.

Importantly, he submitted > that the Chamber should refrain from entering a finding on the legality of the detention of the Accused by the DRC authorities and on whether the Accused's rights have been violated during that period. To do so at all, and in particular based on incomplete facts, would overstep this Court's mandate and the statutory limits to its jurisdiction.[580]

He hereby asserted that the ICC's supervisory role under Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute is restricted "to the process of arrest and surrender by national authorities subsequent to the notification of a request for arrest and surrender by the Court".[581] According to him, this provision "does not impose an obligation on national authorities, or a power to the Court, to review the legality of any previous detention of the Appellant for national criminal proceedings unrelated to Court proceedings [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[582]

As argued before, this point is reminiscent of the words of the Pre-Trial Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo, where it was stated that the competent judicial authority was not obliged to look into irregularities in the context of an arrest/detention prior to the official ICC arrest insofar as that arrest/detention was related solely to national proceedings. Although the Pre-Trial Chamber did not clearly explain the role of the ICC judges themselves on this particular matter, it was assumed that these words meant that if the arrest/detention were somehow related to the ICC proceedings, there was an obligation, both for the national competent judicial authority and the ICC judges themselves to examine irregularities stemming therefrom, an assumption which was arguably confirmed when the Pre-Trial Chamber later explained that it would look at irregularities prior to the official ICC arrest if those irregularities were the result of concerted action between the ICC and third parties. (Note that the Appeals Chamber adopted a stricter approach here, demanding that the suspect had to be in detention for the same crimes as those for which the ICC was now prosecuting that person, an approach which is hard to reconcile with the Appeals Chamber's confirmation of the concerted action point of the Pre-Trial Chamber.)

It can be asserted that a provision such as Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute (applicable as from the moment the ICC gets involved in the case, in the case of concerted action) also demands such a supervisory role.

This also means that if the detention were not somehow related to the ICC, if the ICC were not involved in that detention, there is no strict obligation to look into irregularities arising therefrom. However, as also argued in the context of the [579] See ibid.: "The Prosecution submits that the Defence has failed to establish that the treatment of the Accused was of such a nature so as to preclude a fair trial which could be secured in various other ways, for example, by excluding any evidence obtained by such mistreatment."

---

[580] Ibid., para. 70.
[581] Ibid., para. 71.
[582] Ibid.

Lubanga Dyilo case, the judges should nevertheless go one step further and should supervise any irregularity which can be seen as falling within the context of an ICC case more generally.

Returning to the Prosecutor's response, his argument that the ICC, for the same reasons, "may also not review the detention of the Accused by national authorities for the purposes of any claim for compensation pursuant to Article 85 and Rules 173-175 [original footnote omitted, ChP]"[583] is not very convincing.[584] Article 85, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute is formulated very generally ("Anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention shall have an enforceable right to compensation") and if judges are of the opinion that irregularities mentioned in the above-mentioned scenario lead to an unlawful arrest or detention in the context of their case, suspects are entitled to compensation.[585]

The Prosecutor also submitted that the judges should dismiss the Defence's request to impose a stay or termination of the proceedings. At this juncture, he repeated the fact that the abuse must be connected to "the process of bringing the Accused to justice for the crimes charged before the Court",[586] again adding confusion to the point as to whether or not he is of the opinion that the ICC can also refuse jurisdiction if the abuse can more generally be seen to be "in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person" to the ICC. In addition, the more general formulation presented by the Prosecutor at footnote 531 and accompanying text, arguably mentioned separately from the normal male detentus test of the ICC (requiring involvement of the ICC), could also cover abuse irrespective of the entity responsible. The fact that the formulation talks about the "non-assumption of the jurisdiction in any given case [emphasis added, ChP]" reinforces that idea, an idea which can also find support in the Prosecutor's efforts

[583] Ibid., para. 73.

[584] However, the Prosecutor had a point in arguing that this specific Chamber could not rule on the matter of compensation because of Rules 173-175 of the ICC RPE. See ibid., para. 75: "The Chamber has not been properly seized with any requests in relation to compensation. Rule 173(1) provides that "[a]nyone seeking compensation on any of the grounds indicated in article 85 shall submit a request, in writing, to the Presidency, which shall designate a Chamber composed of three judges to consider the requests". Contrary to the contention of the Defence, this Chamber thus does not have the authority to grant the remedy. Rule 173 expressly states that the judges who decide on any request for compensation "shall not have participated in any earlier judgement of the Court regarding the person making the request". This implies that the Chamber shall refrain from making any finding or declaration in relation to compensation of the Accused [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[585] Cf. the discussion at n. 216 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII. Note that the second, and broader formulated, requirement under the Prosecutor's test ("in connection with proceedings before the Court", see infra) can in fact be seen as support for this view, but the remainder of his words again refer to the more strict requirement that this means that the suspect must be in detention at the national level for the same crimes as those for which the ICC is now prosecuting him: "A right to compensation under Article 85 is limited to instances where a person has been unlawfully arrested or detained (1) in violation of specific provisions of the Statute, the Rules or international law, but only (2) in connection with proceedings before the Court. The Court has no duty, or authority, to pay compensation to a person who has been detained by national authorities for conduct that is unrelated to the process of bringing the person to justice for the crimes charged before the Court [emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (Ibid., para. 73.)

[586] Ibid., para. 74.

to show that the actions of the national authorities in the first phase of detention did not amount to serious mistreatment/torture.[587] However, at this point in his response, the Prosecutor confusingly requires the attribution of the abuse to the ICC.[588]

Finally, the Prosecutor also rejected Katanga's request for a reduction of the sentence (as being "premature")[589] and his request for an evidentiary hearing[590] (as being unnecessary).[591]

After that, it was time for the judges to pronounce on the case. In their decision of 3 December 2009, the judges of Trial Chamber II first of all noted that they had invited the Registry and the authorities in the DRC to file their observations on the matter.[592] The Registry reacted, but its observations are confidential and cannot – directly (but see infra) – be discussed here.[593] The authorities of the DRC, on the other hand, did not find it necessary to respond.[594] The judges also remarked that the Prosecutor has requested to add a case law reference, a request which was

[587] See n. 577 and accompanying text.

[588] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 74: "Without abuse attributable to the Court, there is no reason to consider staying or discontinuing the proceedings."

[589] See ibid., para. 76. In this context, the Prosecutor rejected the analogy to Duch and Barayagwiza, holding that "a) they were decided against a different procedural framework; b) the detention in both cases was based on the same conduct for which the persons were then tried before the international forum; and c) in the Barayagwiza case, the accused was held in detention by national authorities subject to a request by the ICTR for provisional arrest pursuant to Rule 40 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICTR." (Ibid., para. 75, n. 149.) However, the Prosecutor seemingly forgets here that the judges in Duch stated: "Should the Accused be convicted, the Chamber finds him to be entitled to a remedy, to be decided by the Chamber at the sentencing stage, for the time spent unlawfully in detention before the Cambodian Military Court between 10 May 1999 and 30 July 2007." (See n. 1282 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.) Now, during that period, Duch was also in detention for crimes other than those for which he is now being prosecuted at the ECCC, see n. 1182 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. In addition, it must be noted that in the Barayagwiza case, the ICTR took responsibility for violations even occurring beyond the constructive custody of the ICTR. Finally, it must be stated that a reduction of the sentence could be granted, also pursuant to the ICC's own procedural framework, see Rule 145 of the ICC RPE.

[590] See n. 488 and accompanying text.

[591] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 77.

[592] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 13.

[593] See ibid.

[594] See ibid.

granted.[595] In (the annex to) this submission, the Prosecutor filed a copy of the 31 August 2009 decision in Karadžić,[596] discussed earlier in this study.[597]

The judges first summarised the visions of the Defence, the legal representatives of the victims and the Prosecutor, all of which have been discussed at length in the previous pages (and which therefore do not need to be repeated here). The only issue which should be mentioned here is the view of the Registry, whose observations were, after all, filed confidentially. The judges noted that the Registry had submitted that "from the time it took Germain Katanga into custody, it ensured that all necessary procedures were followed and that his rights were not prejudiced".[598] According to the Registry, "all required procedures were carried out and hence Germain Katanga's rights were respected [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[599]

The judges then turned to their own analysis. Not very surprisingly, they noted that the Defence had relied on the abuse of process doctrine, a doctrine which was rejected by the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo.[600] Nevertheless, they also explained that the Appeals Chamber, in the context of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, had stated that "[u]nfairness in the treatment of the suspect or the accused may rupture the process to an extent making it impossible to piece together the constituent elements of a fair trial".[601] (This was the third formulation of the Appeals Chamber's male detentus test.)

However, before they turned to the real merits of this case, the judges first wanted to determine whether Katanga's submission was in fact admissible; whether the ICC law authorised a participant in the proceedings to file a male captus submission after the confirmation of the charges and at this stage of the proceedings (read: so late).[602]

In fact, the judges opined that a male captus challenge, especially when it is accompanied by an application to stay or terminate the proceedings "must be submitted in the initial phase of the proceedings".[603] This was in the interest of all parties, especially the victim of the alleged male captus.[604]

---

[595] See ibid., para. 14.
[596] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution's submission of additional authority regarding "Defence motion for a declaration of unlawful detention and stay of proceedings"' (Public with public Annex A), ICC-01/04-01/07, 6 October 2009.
[597] See ns. 795 et seq. and accompanying text of Chapter VI.
[598] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 32.
[599] Ibid.
[600] See ibid., para. 36.
[601] See ibid., para. 39. See also n. 259 and accompanying text.
[602] See ibid., para. 38.
[603] Ibid., para. 39.
[604] See ibid., para. 40.

For example, the judges noted that pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, "challenges to admissibility or jurisdiction must be made at the earliest opportunity, so as to avoid obstructing or delaying the proceedings [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[605] They also pointed to Rule 122, paragraph 2 of the ICC RPE,[606] which specifies that if the Pre-Trial Chamber is requested to rule on such a challenge in the course of the confirmation of the charges hearing, "it must ensure compliance with the provisions on expeditiousness expressly prescribed by rule 58 of the Rules".[607] In addition, they continued, the same Rule 122, in paragraphs 3 and 4,[608] provides "that any objection or observation concerning an issue related to the proper conduct of the proceedings prior to the confirmation hearing must be raised at the start of the hearing, failing which it will no longer be possible to do so subsequently [emphasis in original, ChP]."[609] The judges also stressed that pursuant to Article 64, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute, the Trial Chamber must ensure that a trial is fair and expeditious and that it is conducted with full respect for the rights of the accused, which, in this case, involves the right of Katanga's co-accused, Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, to be tried without undue delay as well.[610]

That Katanga had raised his male captus from the very start of the trial is clear: on 22 October 2007, during the initial hearing, the alleged illegal arrest and

---

[605] Ibid., para. 41.

[606] This provision reads: "If a question or challenge concerning jurisdiction or admissibility arises, rule 58 applies." See for the contents of this latter rule the next footnote.

[607] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 41. Rule 58 of the ICC RPE reads: "1. A request or application made under article 19 shall be in writing and contain the basis for it. 2. When a Chamber receives a request or application raising a challenge or question concerning its jurisdiction or the admissibility of a case in accordance with article 19, paragraph 2 or 3, or is acting on its own motion as provided for in article 19, paragraph 1, it shall decide on the procedure to be followed and may take appropriate measures for the proper conduct of the proceedings. It may hold a hearing. It may join the challenge or question to a confirmation or a trial proceeding as long as this does not cause undue delay, and in this circumstance shall hear and decide on the challenge or question first. 3. The Court shall transmit a request or application received under sub-rule 2 to the Prosecutor and to the person referred to in article 19, paragraph 2, who has been surrendered to the Court or who has appeared voluntarily or pursuant to a summons, and shall allow them to submit written observations to the request or application within a period of time determined by the Chamber. 4. The Court shall rule on any challenge or question of jurisdiction first and then on any challenge or question of admissibility."

[608] These paragraphs read: "3. Before hearing the matter on the merits, the Presiding Judge of the Pre-Trial Chamber shall ask the Prosecutor and the person whether they intend to raise objections or make observations concerning an issue related to the proper conduct of the proceedings prior to the confirmation hearing. 4. At no subsequent point may the objections and observations made under sub-rule 3 be raised or made again in the confirmation or trial proceedings."

[609] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 41.

[610] See ibid., para. 42.

detention of Katanga in the DRC (between February 2005 until his surrender) was emphasised by his duty counsel, as a result of which the Pre-Trial Chamber had invited the Defence to submit this issue in writing.[611] In this context, the Defence had submitted, on 7 April 2008, an application to the Pre-Trial Chamber based on Article 57, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute[612] to obtain the cooperation of the DRC on these matters.[613] In this application, the Defence specified "that the requested documents were necessary in order to substantiate certain of its submissions concerning the lawfulness of prior proceedings"[614] and stressed the urgency of this cooperation in view of the time limits imposed by Rule 122, paragraphs 3 and 4 of the ICC RPE.[615]

During an ex parte hearing ten days later, the Defence repeated its request, "expressing the concern that it risked finding "the door closed" before the Trial Chamber if it did not raise such matters"[616] within the time limits of Rule 122, paragraphs 3 and 4 of the ICC RPE.[617] However, during the same hearing, the judges continued, the Defence was informed that even if the DRC authorities were not to respond to the request for cooperation before the confirmation of the charges hearing (which indeed occurred as the information was only provided on 28 August 2008, after the confirmation of the charges hearing, which took place from 27 June 2008 to 18 July 2008),[618] "no prejudice would be caused to the right of the Accused to make such challenges (to the lawfulness of prior proceedings or the admissibility of the case) under article 19 of the Statute [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[619] This is, of course, an interesting remark, for it shows that the Pre-Trial Chamber in Katanga, about a year and a half after the decisions in Lubanga Dyilo, concurred with the Pre-Trial Chamber (but not with the Appeals Chamber) in that case that the male captus claims could be seen as a challenge pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute, something which was previously submitted by this study in the discussion of the Lubanga Dyilo decisions.

This reasoning was confirmed in a decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber issued ex parte on 25 April 2008, in which the judges had stated that Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute only applies to the proceedings following the transmission, by the

---

[611] See ibid., para. 43.
[612] Part (b) of this provision states: "[T]he Pre-Trial Chamber may: (…) (b) Upon the request of a person who has been arrested or has appeared pursuant to a summons under article 58, issue such orders, including measures such as those described in article 56, or seek such cooperation pursuant to Part 9 as may be necessary to assist the person in the preparation of his or her defence".
[613] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 43.
[614] Ibid.
[615] See ibid.
[616] Ibid.
[617] See ibid.
[618] See ibid., para. 61.
[619] Ibid., para. 43.

Registry, of the request for arrest and surrender and that as a result, any alleged prior international human rights violations of the suspect, which, according to the Defence, could prevent the ICC from exercising jurisdiction over him, were to be raised in the context of a challenge to the ICC's jurisdiction pursuant to Article 19 of the ICC Statute – a challenge which is not subjected to the time limits of Rule 122, paragraphs 3 and 4 of the ICC RPE.[620]

Although it is true that Article 59 of the ICC Statute only applies as from the request for provisional arrest/for arrest and surrender, the competent judicial authority (and the ICC should perform a supervisory role here as well), when determining the points of paragraph 2 of that article, can also look into alleged irregularities prior to the ICC requests. It appears that the Pre-Trial Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo held that the competent judicial authority and the ICC as its supervisor could look into irregularities prior to the official ICC arrest if those irregularities stemmed from a detention which was somehow related to the ICC proceedings.

The judges of the Trial Chamber in Katanga consequently noted that the decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber of 25 April 2008 was also confirmed by the Pre-Trial Chamber during a hearing on 14 May 2008:[621] when the Defence again expressed its concerns and doubts whether this was indeed the correct procedure to follow to raise this question, the Pre-Trial Chamber likewise indicated that a similar motion had been filed in Lubanga Dyilo.[622] This is, of course, true, but has the Pre-Trial Chamber in Katanga forgotten that the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo had stated that Article 19 of the ICC Statute could not be used? Even if the Defence is of the opinion, as is this study, that Article 19 of the ICC Statute can be used for these kinds of claims, it is quite understandable that the Defence in Katanga was concerned about using it here, the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo having rejected it.

The judges of the Trial Chamber in Katanga then went on to note that the issue of the arrest and detention of Katanga was raised neither in the course of the confirmation of the charges hearing nor in the Defence's written observations preceding that hearing.[623] In a decision of 29 April 2008, the Pre-Trial Chamber had given the parties until 23 June 2008 – this is four days before the start of the confirmation of the charges hearing – "to file a list concisely setting out those issues pertaining to jurisdiction and admissibility and any other issue concerning the proper conduct of the prior proceedings that they intended to raise under rule 122(2) and (3) [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[624] In addition, a decision issued on 13 June 2008 "gave the parties the possibility of presenting observations on jurisdiction, admissibility, and any other procedural issue [original footnote omitted,

[620] See ibid., para. 44.
[621] See ibid., para. 45.
[622] See ibid., para. 45.
[623] See ibid., para. 46.
[624] Ibid.

ChP]".[625] On 24 June 2008, the judges explained, the Defence filed its written observations (which were presented orally before the Pre-Trial Chamber on 2 July 2008) and on 28 July 2008, the Defence presented its written observations on the issues addressed during the confirmation of the charges hearing.[626] The issues regarding jurisdiction, admissibility and other procedural matters were addressed both on 2 July 2008 and in the written observations, although it appears, the judges noted, "that the Defence was then seeking primarily to challenge the admissibility of certain evidentiary material tendered for the purpose of the confirmation hearing [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[627] In that context, it contested, among other things, "the admissibility of a record of an interview before the military court dated 20 January 2006".[628] It was only in that context, the judges remarked, that the Defence had stressed that at that time, Katanga did not yet have a legal counsel and had not yet been informed of the charges and reasons justifying his detention.[629]

In fact, the judges held, it was not until a hearing held ex parte on 11 July 2008 that Katanga's Defence again raised the necessity of obtaining the requested information and documents from the DRC authorities in order to be able to formulate and submit the challenges to jurisdiction and admissibility of the case.[630] However, in its final observations on 28 July 2008, the Defence did not return to the alleged male captus.[631]

As a result, the Trial Chamber concluded that, even though the Defence had raised the issue of the male captus several times during the pre-trial phase of the proceedings (including during Katanga's initial appearance),[632] it had not submitted, finally, "a motion in that regard to the Pre-Trial Chamber, whether by claiming that the proceedings were unlawful or by raising a challenge to jurisdiction".[633] However, according to the Chamber, "such a motion should have been introduced during the pre-trial phase and addressed at that stage".[634]

Nevertheless, the Chamber recognised that this may also have been caused by the position adopted by the Pre-Trial Chamber.[635] Hence, what had to be determined now was whether the Trial Chamber itself had been timely and officially seized of such a motion.[636]

---

[625] Ibid.
[626] See ibid.
[627] Ibid.
[628] Ibid. See also ns. 391-392 and accompanying text.
[629] See ibid.
[630] See ibid., para. 47.
[631] See ibid.
[632] See ibid., para. 48.
[633] Ibid.
[634] Ibid.
[635] See ibid.: "The Chamber is nevertheless mindful that the position adopted by the Pre-Trial Chamber may have led the Defence for the Accused to believe that it was authorised to defer the filing of its motion and postpone it until after the decision on the confirmation of the charges."
[636] See ibid., para. 50.

The Chamber stated that between its constitution, on 24 October 2008, and the hearing of 1 June 2009,[637] the Defence had never raised the question of Katanga's illegal detention with the Chamber, even though it had the opportunity to do so several times: it had not done so during the status conferences[638] held on 27-28 November 2008 and 3 February 2009, in its written submissions and during the hearings on Katanga's continued detention.[639]

Although it may be true, especially given that the Defence had received the required information from the DRC authorities on 28 August 2008,[640] that the Defence did not timely mention the allegations concerning Katanga's male captus,[641] it is not that strange that it did not do so during the hearings on Katanga's continued detention, the hearing reviewing his pre-trial detention. These reviews are based on Article 60, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute[642] and Rule 118, paragraph 2 of the ICC RPE[643] and although they are rather generally formulated, they are preceded by provisions dealing with interim releases.[644] If the Defence is of the opinion that it

[637] See n. 374.

[638] See for this concept Rule 132 of the ICC RPE: "1. Promptly after it is constituted, the Trial Chamber shall hold a status conference in order to set the date of the trial. The Trial Chamber, on its own motion, or at the request of the Prosecutor or the defence, may postpone the date of the trial. The Trial Chamber shall notify the trial date to all those participating in the proceedings. The Trial Chamber shall ensure that this date and any postponements are made public. 2. In order to facilitate the fair and expeditious conduct of the proceedings, the Trial Chamber may confer with the parties by holding status conferences as necessary."

[639] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 51.

[640] See ibid., para. 61.

[641] A good example can be found in the context of the first status conference. In preparation of that conference, the Trial Chamber sent a list of questions to the participants "inviting them (…) to inform it of "issues and observations which they would deem relevant and on which they would like the Chamber to rule" [original footnote omitted, ChP]". (Ibid., para. 52.) One can indeed argue that such an open invitation should make the Defence raise the male captus issue, even if it would only have stated that it will soon submit its official motion on these matters.

[642] "The Pre-Trial Chamber shall periodically review its ruling on the release or detention of the person, and may do so at any time on the request of the Prosecutor or the person. Upon such review, it may modify its ruling as to detention, release or conditions of release, if it is satisfied that changed circumstances so require."

[643] "The Pre-Trial Chamber shall review its ruling on the release or detention of a person in accordance with article 60, paragraph 3, at least every 120 days and may do so at any time on the request of the person or the Prosecutor."

[644] See Art. 60, paras. 1-2 of the ICC Statute: "1. Upon the surrender of the person to the Court, or the person's appearance before the Court voluntarily or pursuant to a summons, the Pre-Trial Chamber shall satisfy itself that the person has been informed of the crimes which he or she is alleged to have committed, and of his or her rights under this Statute, including the right to apply for interim release pending trial. 2. A person subject to a warrant of arrest may apply for interim release pending trial. If the Pre-Trial Chamber is satisfied that the conditions set forth in article 58, paragraph 1, are met, the person shall continue to be detained. If it is not so satisfied, the Pre-Trial Chamber shall release the person, with or without conditions." See also Rule 118, para. 1 of the ICC RPE: "If the person surrendered to the Court makes an initial request for interim release pending trial, either upon first appearance in can only use such hearings to obtain a remedy in which it is not interested, namely a 'mere' interim release – and it appears that the Defence was indeed of this opinion[645] – it is not so odd for it not to use them to submit male captus claims, which, after all, have nothing to do with interim releases but with actual, final releases. Nevertheless, as already explained, in those hearings, judges must also pay attention to the distinct Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute. This provision is, of course, also surrounded by provisions dealing with interim releases, but it was nevertheless argued earlier in this study that this provision could perhaps be used for male captus allegations.[646] However, if so, the suspect needs to argue that his rights have been so seriously violated by the unreasonable pre-trial detention[647] due to inexcusable delay by the Prosecutor that his right to a fair trial can no longer be guaranteed/that it would undermine the integrity of the Court to proceed[648] and thus that the Prosecutor has forfeited his right to prosecute. Because Katanga alleged that the Prosecutor was involved in his illegal DRC detention, he could perhaps have persuaded the Trial Chamber to take that provision into account here. However, according to the Trial Chamber, he did not do so.[649] accordance with rule 121 or subsequently, the Pre-Trial Chamber shall decide upon the request without delay, after seeking the views of the Prosecutor." Cf. also n. 259 of Chapter VIII.

---

[645] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 54: "The Chamber is bound to observe once again that, in its written submissions, the Defence did not request the Accused's interim release and that it confined itself to stating that, at that stage, it had no particular observations to make and that it was reiterating its previous observations [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ibid., para. 55: "At that hearing [a public hearing on 23 March 2009, in the context of the third review of Katanga's pre-trial detention, ChP], the Defence for Germain Katanga stated, as it had in its written submissions, that it was taking a realistic and pragmatic position. In this respect, the Defence essentially stressed that, in the absence of any facility enabling release under judicial supervision in the Netherlands or a neighbouring State, it "[saw] no practical purpose served in applying for the provisional release of Mr. Katanga at th[at] time". Moreover, it made it clear that it was not making an application for interim release, that it had "come relatively empty-handed before the Court", and that it was confining itself to seeking a pragmatic solution to a problem which went beyond Germain Katanga's case alone [emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[646] See n. 269 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.

[647] Which arguably includes any pre-trial detention, whether or not the suspect was in detention for the same crimes which the ICC is now prosecuting, see the text following n. 265 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.

[648] See House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161: "[A] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case."

[649] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Fifth review of the Pre-Trial Chamber's Decision Concerning the Pre-Trial Detention of Germain Katanga pursuant to rule 118(2) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/07, 19 November 2009, para. 30: "The Defence for Germain Katanga has not specifically addressed the issue of an unreasonable delay attributable to the

In any case, this decision now under discussion indicates that even though the hearings on the review of the pre-trial detention seem to be confined to the arrest/detention in The Hague/interim releases only (with the possible exception of Article 60, paragraph 4 of the ICC Statute), a suspect/accused can apparently use them for any question related to his detention.[650] This would be especially relevant for a person such as Katanga who claims that the involvement of the ICC in his male captus contributed to the illegality of his detention, which continued in the context of the ICC procedures:

> The Defence for Germain Katanga doubtless considered that the detention then under review covered only the period starting with his arrival at the Court's Detention Centre on 18 October 2007. It remains the case that the Defence contends that the participation of the organs of the Court during the period of detention prior to the accused's transfer contributed to "giving continuity to the unlawfulness of the detention into the processes of the ICC". In view of such a contention, it follows that the failure to act on the part of the Defence for Germain Katanga cannot be justified [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP].[651]

The judges then turned to the final part of their decision, the conclusions. They stated that it was only during the meeting of 1 June 2009[652] that the Defence had stated that it was intending to file its male captus motion, which, in turn, only occurred 30 days later, seven months after the first status conference.[653] The judges noted that the Defence had maintained, among other things, that it "was persuaded to file this motion having been appraised of all the documents, views of the DRC on the nature and course of the national proceedings as well as those of the Prosecutor on his knowledge of documents and interactions with the DRC, but especially those observations expressed on the 1st of June 2009 [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[654]

Prosecution within the meaning of article 60(4) of the Statute in either its current or previous observations on the accused's detention review." However, note that in the context of the proceedings before the Pre-Trial Chamber, reference was made to this provision, see n. 264 of Chapter VIII.

[650] See in that respect the following words of the Trial Chamber, made in the context of the third review of Katanga's pre-trial detention: "On that occasion, once again, the Defence made no reference whatever to the unlawfulness of its client's prior detention, despite the fact that the hearing had been convened with the specific aim of raising and addressing any issue concerning the Accused's detention [emphasis added, ChP]." (ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 55.)

[651] Ibid., para. 58. See also n. 383 and accompanying text.

[652] See n. 374.

[653] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 59.

[654] See n. 374.

However, the judges were not convinced: according to them, the Defence "ha[d] not advanced any convincing reasons to justify the filing of the Motion at such an advanced stage of the proceedings".[655] Although the Defence had argued that "the information provided by the DRC representatives at the meeting of 1 June 2009 was decisive in the filing of the Motion",[656] the judges were of the opinion that it appeared that the arguments in the motion relied, "for the most part on information which was already available to the Defence at the pre-trial phase".[657] In that context, they also noted that the requested information from the DRC authorities[658] had already been provided on 28 August 2008.[659] The judges felt that if the filing of the motion depended on obtaining certain information, the Defence should have notified the judges of this need.[660]

However, the misery for the Defence did not stop there. The judges also referred to Article 24, paragraph 5 of the Code of Professional Conduct for counsel, which states: "Counsel shall represent the client expeditiously with the purpose of avoiding unnecessary expense or delay in the conduct of the proceedings".[661] This provision, the judges continued, had to be seen as "a reminder to the Defence of the Chamber's general and ongoing obligation under article 64(2) of the Statute[662] to ensure that the trial is expeditious."[663] According to the judges, the Defence, by filing its motion only seven months after the Chamber had invited the Defence "to submit to the Chamber the relevant issues on which it wished the latter to rule",[664] had not followed the above-mentioned provision.[665]

---

[655] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 61.
[656] Ibid.
[657] Ibid.
[658] See n. 613 and accompanying text.
[659] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 61.
[660] See ibid., para. 62.
[661] See ibid., para. 63.
[662] "The Trial Chamber shall ensure that a trial is fair and expeditious and is conducted with full respect for the rights of the accused and due regard for the protection of victims and witnesses."
[663] ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, para. 63.
[664] Ibid., para. 65. See also n. 641.
[665] See ibid.

Consequently, the judges concluded that the motion was filed too late and hence inadmissible,[666] as a result of which the substantive arguments of the parties and participants were not to be examined in this decision.[667]

What can be said about this utter anticlimax? One can agree with the judges that the seven-month period between the first status conference (27 November 2008) and the submission of the request (30 June 2009) is rather long. Indeed, one could argue that the delay is not seven but ten months, between 28 August 2008 (when the Defence received the requested DRC information) and 30 June 2009. In that context, it must also be borne in mind that in this decision one can read that the "requested documents were necessary in order to substantiate certain of its submissions concerning the lawfulness of prior proceedings".[668] That seems to imply that the Defence had already drafted a concept submission (which would not be unusual given the fact that the Defence had already briefly mentioned a number of male captus allegations during the initial appearance on 22 October 2007), of which parts had to be checked/confirmed with help of the DRC information. That would, of course, need some time, but ten months is indeed quite long. However, suppose that the Defence had handed in the request just before the winter recess, some three and a half months after 28 August 2008. Although one can only guess how the judges would have reacted in that case, it is likely that such a period of time would be deemed reasonable. However, that would mean that the judges, invoking Article 64, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute, would be prepared to attach the most extreme consequence, namely that the issue would not be addressed substantively at all, to a delay of a little more than six months. Again, it appears that the Defence can indeed be reproached for the delay but is the sanction not far too severe? The ICC judges should not forget that these matters go to the foundations of their case, namely to the question of how the suspect was brought into their jurisdiction. It is submitted that they should want to know what happened to the suspects they are now trying prior to their arrival in The Hague. This is especially so since an NGO report has partly confirmed the male captus allegations of Katanga and when it can be argued that the ICC profited from the fact that he was already in detention in the DRC. One can question how any judge can continue a case without being able to state that he is sure that the alleged pre-trial irregularities are absent, or are present but not so serious that jurisdiction must be refused. The ICC judges in the Katanga case run the risk of continuing a case which has an unstable foundation and whose unstableness is not repaired, hence jeopardising the fairness/integrity of the ICC proceedings.[669] As previously argued in the context of the Lubanga Dyilo case, the

[666] See ibid., para. 66.
[667] See ibid., para. 67.
[668] See n. 614 and accompanying text.
[669] Cf. also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, para. 11: "The principles of a fair trial are not confined to trial proceedings but extend to pre-trial proceedings as well as the investigation of crime; a fact directly borne out by the provisions of article 55 and 54 (1) (c) of the Statute. Breach of or deviation from the rules of a fair trial at the pre-trial stage of the proceedings may

ICC should be careful not to return to the old-fashioned concept of a fair trial, namely a fair trial in the courtroom. This decision can easily be interpreted as a confirmation of Sluiter's words (written at a time when this decision was not yet issued) that "the initial case law of the ICC reveals a tendency to retreat within the safe limits of The Hague and a strong desire to keep hands clean by refusing to supervise activities within domestic jurisdictions".[670] It may even be seen as a violation of a suspect's right to effectively challenge the lawfulness of his arrest and detention, a crucial right covered by Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute.[671] This is especially unfortunate since in an earlier decision from the Katanga case, it was held – and rightly so – that > according to articles 55, 57 and 67, one of the functions of the Chamber is to be the ultimate guarantor of the rights of the Defence, including the right "not to be deprived of his or her liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established in the Statute"[.][672]

According to Sluiter, who refers to comparable words from another decision (also from the Katanga case),[673] such words reinforce the idea that because of the fact that "the ICC system is more inquisitorial in nature than the ad hoc tribunals",[674] judges must "explore issues ultra petitum and address violations proprio motu".[675] have implications on the proceedings and may affect the outcome of the trial. Purging the pre-trial process of errors consequential in the above sense is designed as a safeguard for the integrity of the proceedings."

---

[670] See n. 276.

[671] Cf. also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, Dissenting opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 31: "[A]rticle 21 (3) assures to every individual the right to effectively contest the deprivation of liberty."

[672] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the powers of the Pre-Trial Chamber to review proprio motu the pre-trial detention of Germain Katanga' (Urgent, Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 18 March 2008, p. 8. See also n. 201 of Chapter VIII.

[673] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga, 'Decision Concerning Pre-Trial Detention of Germain Katanga' (Urgent, Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 21 February 2008, p. 6, where the judge is referred to "as the ultimate guarantor of the rights of the Defence".

[674] Sluiter 2009, p. 471. This point was already earlier clarified in n. 9 of Chapter IV, see Swart 2002 B, p. 1601: "A comparison of the Rome Statute with the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals reveals that in the Statute, too, there is a mixture of adversarial and inquisitorial elements. Again, the adversarial elements largely prevail, although there is stronger contribution of the inquisitorial tradition, especially where the structure of pre-trial investigations is concerned."

[675] Sluiter 2009, pp. 471-472.

Indeed, it can be argued that the judges of the Trial Chamber should have been more concerned with what actually happened to Katanga than to – rather too readily – dismiss the entire motion for being submitted too late.[676]

[676] Note that in the Kajelijeli case before the ICTR, the Appeals Chamber decided in 2005 that Kajelijeli could not re-litigate the issue of the ICTR's personal jurisdiction as "[t]he Appeals Chamber squarely held, in its 16 November 2001 decision, that the Appellant procedurally lost his entitlement to raise his personal jurisdiction objection by failing to file a sufficiently specific notice of appeal, even after the Appeals Chamber had allowed him extra time to do so after his initial failure. This holding disposed of the personal jurisdiction objection. The Appellant has not demonstrated any cause to reconsider this determination on a discretionary basis: there is no clear error in the Appeals Chamber's reasoning, nor is reconsideration necessary to prevent an injustice." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 205.) However, in that case, the issue was already examined by the Trial Chamber. (Cf. also the ICTY case of Tolimir or the ICTR case of Rwamakuba where the Trial Chamber examined the male captus allegations and the Appeals Chamber dismissed the appeal for procedural reasons.) In addition, in 2005, the judges in Kajelijeli did (marginally) review the issue themselves, when they stated (see ibid., para. 206): "[E]ven if it were to reconsider the issue of its personal jurisdiction, the Appeals Chamber does not find that these newly and more detailed submitted breaches rise to the requisite level of egregiousness amounting to the Tribunal's loss of personal jurisdiction. The Appeals Chamber is mindful that it must maintain the correct balance between "the fundamental rights of the accused and the essential interests of the international community in the prosecution of persons charged with serious violations of international humanitarian law." While a Chamber may use its discretion under the circumstances of a case to decline to exercise jurisdiction, it should only do so "where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity." For example, "in circumstances where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subject to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment." However, those cases are exceptional and, in most circumstances, the "remedy of setting aside jurisdiction, will . . . be disproportionate." The Appeals Chamber gives due weight to the violations alleged by the Appellant; however, it does not consider that this case falls within the exceptional category of cases highlighted above [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Finally, the judges in 2005 also examined whether the violations, even if they did not lead to the ending of the case, should nevertheless lead to other, less far-reaching, remedies.

PART 5

CONCLUSION

CHAPTER XI
ANSWERING THE CENTRAL QUESTION, RECOMMENDATIONS AND EPILOGUE

1 INTRODUCTION

This study must now come to an end. The only thing that remains is to answer the central question with which this book began (Section 2), to provide recommendations which may hopefully be helpful to anyone interested in this topic, in particular the ICC judge confronted by a male captus situation (Section 3), and to conclude this book with a brief epilogue (Section 4).

2 ANSWERING THE CENTRAL QUESTION

In the very first pages of this book, the following central question was presented:

How does the ICC currently cope with the dilemmas that a male captus case can give rise to and how should this approach be assessed?

This question encompasses two elements, namely 1) the ICC's current position on the male captus issue and 2) an assessment of that position. With respect to the second element, it was explained that this study would create two evaluative frameworks with which the ICC position on the male captus issue would be assessed, namely an external one (vis-à-vis the position of other courts that have dealt with this problem before, namely to find out how similar or different the ICC position is in comparison with the position of these other courts) and an internal one (vis-à-vis the law of the ICC itself, namely to find out how the ICC position is to be seen in view of what the law of the ICC – to be found in Article 21 of the ICC Statute – itself prescribes the judges to do).

In short, three elements have to be sorted out here before turning to the recommendations in Section 3, namely: 1) the ICC's current position on the male captus issue (Subsection 2.1), 2) the ICC's current position on the male captus issue assessed in the context of this book's external evaluative framework (Subsection 2.2) and 3) the ICC's current position on the male captus issue assessed in the context of this book's internal evaluative framework (Subsection 2.3).

2.1 The ICC's current position on the male captus issue

Before being able to assess a certain position, the position itself must, of course, be identified. And here, the first problem arises; it does not seem to be very clear what the ICC's current position on the male captus issue is.

In the Appeals Chamber's decision in Lubanga Dyilo, arguably the most authoritative decision on this matter, the Appeals Chamber presented the following male detentus test:

> Where fair trial becomes impossible because of breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect or the accused by his/her accusers, it would be a contradiction in terms to put the person on trial. Justice could not be done. A fair trial is the only means to do justice. If no fair trial can be held, the object of the judicial process is frustrated and the process must be stopped [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[1]

However, this formulation of the Appeals Chamber's test was followed by another, one which arguably differs from the above-mentioned words in a number of important aspects: "Where the breaches of the rights of the accused are such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence within the framework of his[/her] rights, no fair trial can take place and the proceedings can be stayed."[2]

Besides the fact that the second formulation has a discretionary ("the proceedings can be stayed") and the first one an automatic sanction ("the process must be stopped") when it is determined that no fair trial can be held, the second formulation is arguably much more restrictive than the first one when it demands that the violations must be "such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence within the framework of his[/her] rights". Hence, whereas the first formulation states that certain violations as such can already ensure that no fair trial is possible, thus accepting a broad concept of fair trial,[3] the second formulation

---

[1] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 37.

[2] Ibid., para. 39.

[3] See also ibid., para. 37: "Human rights underpin the Statute; every aspect of it, including the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court. Its provisions must be interpreted and more importantly applied in accordance with internationally recognized human rights; first and foremost, in the context of the Statute, the right of a fair trial, a concept broadly perceived and applied, embracing the judicial process in its entirety [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, para. 11: "The principles of a fair trial are not confined to trial proceedings but extend to pre-trial proceedings as well as the investigation of crime; a fact directly borne out by the provisions of article 55 and 54 (1) (c) of the Statute. Breach of or deviation from the rules of a fair trial at the pre-trial stage of the proceedings may have implications on the proceedings and may affect the outcome of the trial. Purging the pre-trial process of errors consequential in the above sense is designed as a safeguard for the integrity of the proceedings."

appears to be in favour of the old-fashioned concept of a fair trial, namely a fair trial in the courtroom, when it argues that the violations must be such that the person can no longer make his defence.

After this second formulation, a third one was presented. This formulation, which also stressed the concept of a fair trial, even for persons charged with very serious crimes, seemingly supports the first formulation, which could constitute evidence for the argument that the ICC's position on the male captus issue can be found in the first formulation and not in the second, which demands that the accused must prove that the male captus was so serious that as a result, he could no longer make his defence before the ICC.

> Unfairness in the treatment of the suspect or the accused may rupture the process to an extent making it impossible to piece together the constituent elements of a fair trial. In those circumstances, the interest of the world community to put persons accused of the most heinous crimes against humanity on trial, great as it is, is outweighed by the need to sustain the efficacy of the judicial process as the potent agent of justice.[4]

It was also this formulation to which the ICC Trial Chamber in Katanga referred, although it did not express its own views on the male detentus test.[5]

Additional evidence for the argument that one should focus on the first formulation can be found in the following words of the Appeals Chamber, when it censured the Pre-Trial Chamber for using the wrong test:

> As may be discerned from the principles identified in the decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber as relevant to stay of proceedings, a broader standard was adopted than the one warranted in law in that it failed to require the specific consideration of whether a fair trial remained possible in the particular circumstances of the case. The findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber to the effect that the appellant was not subjected to any ill-treatment in the process of his arrest and conveyance before the Court sidelines the importance of the precise ambit of the test applied as a guide to the resolution of this appeal.[6]

These words mean that it would not be necessary for the person to show that he can no longer make his defence because of the violations (a strict version of the concept of fair trial), but he would have to show that because of these violations, one can no longer speak of a fair trial (in the broad sense of the word). This can be seen as a repetition of the first and third formulation of the male detentus test mentioned above.

[4] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 39.

[5] See n. 601 and accompanying text of Chapter X.

[6] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 40.

A final indication that one may rely on the first (and third) formulation is that it could be argued that the second formulation, even if it was presented in a case dealing with an alleged male captus situation, is not to be used as a male detentus test, a test which deals with problems related to the way a person was brought into the jurisdiction of the Court (and hence can neither be seen as a stricter and more demanding version of the first or the third formulation, which could very well be applied to male captus situations). It could be asserted that this formulation must be seen as an additional avenue leading to the ending of the case, namely when the accused (note also that in contrast to the first and third formulations, the second one only refers to an accused), during the trial proceedings themselves, is confronted by such serious violations that he can no longer make his defence. It appears that this position would also be shared by the Prosecution in the Katanga case, see the text following footnote 527 and accompanying text of Chapter X. Nevertheless, even though this would explain the difference between the strict second formulation and the broader first and third formulations, doubts remains. For example, the fact that the word "accused" is used in the second formulation does not necessarily mean that the test cannot be applied to male captus situations, as an accused can also make male captus claims. In that case, the problem remains whether a victim of a male captus situation may refer to the broader first (and third) formulation or whether he also needs to show that the violations were such that he can no longer make his defence.

Hence, even though it appears that the first formulation of the ICC Appeals Chamber should be used here, the second formulation still casts some doubt as to the identification of the definitive ICC male detentus test.

Moreover, another problem with respect to the ICC's male captus position can be identified. In the Duch case before the ECCC, it was held that the ICC Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo would also refuse jurisdiction, under the abuse of process doctrine, in the case of grave violations of the suspect's rights (thereby focusing on the more 'physical' words serious mistreatment/torture) as such, hence irrespective of the entity responsible:[7]

> The Co-Investigating Judges are (…) compelled to follow the solution adopted in Nikolic and Lubanga which requires, for the application of the abuse of [process] doctrine, the existence of grave violations of the rights of the Accused. Where it has not been established or even alleged that DUCH suffered incidents of torture or serious mistreatment prior to his transfer before the Extraordinary Chambers, the

[7] See also n. 1213 of Chapter VI where the co-investigating judges of the ECCC referred to the following statement of the Trial Chamber in Nikolić: "Here, the Chamber observes that the assumed facts, although they do raise some concerns, do not at all show that the treatment of the Accused by the unknown individuals (…) was of such an egregious nature."" (ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 18.)

> prolonged detention under the jurisdiction of the Military Court, in comparison with the crimes against humanity alleged against the Accused, cannot be considered a sufficiently grave violation of the rights of the Accused.[8]

However, whether the ICC Appeals Chamber, besides its above-mentioned male detentus test – which requires the involvement of the ICC (or third parties working at the behest/request of the ICC), see the words "by his/her accusers"[9] – would also refuse jurisdiction in the case of grave violations/serious mistreatment/torture as such, irrespective of the entity responsible (such as private individuals), is not at all clear.

The co-investigating judges in Duch referred in this context to the following words of the Appeals Chamber: "[T]he findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber respecting the absence of torture or serious mistreatment have not been shown to be erroneous in any way".[10] What is clear about these words is that the Appeals Chamber factually agrees with the Pre-Trial Chamber that there was no serious mistreatment/torture in this case. However, that does not mean that it would go beyond its own male detentus test (requiring the involvement of the ICC: "by his/her accusers") and would refuse jurisdiction in cases of serious mistreatment/torture, irrespective of the entity responsible, for example if the male captus was committed by private individuals.

This lack of clarity can be explained in two ways. First, one must not forget that the remarks made by the Pre-Trial Chamber on serious mistreatment/torture were made in the context of the abuse of process doctrine, a doctrine which the Appeals Chamber has explicitly rejected. Secondly, the position of the Pre-Trial Chamber itself on the abuse of process doctrine is not clear, since it writes that its application, to date, "has been confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal

---

[8] Ibid., para. 21. See also ibid., para. 19 where the judges explain that the ICC had "held that the violation of the rights of the defendant at the time of his prior arrest and detention could only be taken into account in two cases: if the court acted in concert with the external authorities, or if the defendant was the victim of torture or serious mistreatment." See (arguably equally incorrect) ECCC, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 16 (or n. 1254 of Chapter VI). See also n. 1275 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[9] Note that the involvement of the ICC (or third parties working at the behest/request of the ICC) can arguably be seen as a requirement for all three formulations mentioned supra. Although it is best illustrated by the words "by his/her accusers" in the first formulation, one can find other references to this requirement in the section of the Appeals Chamber's decision in which the three formulations can be found. See n. 249 of Chapter X.

[10] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 43. See also ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 19, n. 19.

[emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP]".[11] This is incorrect, but it is uncertain whether the Pre-Trial Chamber would nevertheless follow its words (requiring that the male captus be committed by national authorities) or whether it is of the opinion that these words are indeed erroneous, entailing that it would also refuse jurisdiction in the case of serious mistreatment/torture, irrespective of the entity responsible, hence also including, for example, the actions of private individuals.

In short, even though others have read the decision to mean that the ICC Appeals Chamber would refuse jurisdiction in the case of serious mistreatment/torture, irrespective of the entity responsible, the fact that the Appeals Chamber explicitly rejected the (abuse of process) doctrine in which context that male detentus avenue was created and the lack of clarity with respect to the Pre-Trial Chamber's view of the abuse of process doctrine means that it is possible that the serious mistreatment/torture example only applies to the Appeals Chamber's own male detentus test, which demands that there are violations by the ICC/violations in which the ICC is involved/violations by third parties working at the behest of the ICC ("by his/her accusers").

Another unclear issue is related to the fact that the Appeals Chamber seemingly agreed with the Pre-Trial Chamber's view that it would look into irregularities when these were committed in the context of concerted action between the ICC and third parties, even before the sending of the ICC request for arrest and surrender (hence before the constructive custody). This term, "concerted action", is very general and could encompass any involvement of the ICC in irregularities. It was also this term which arguably confirmed the assumption made in the context of the Lubanga Dyilo Pre-Trial Chamber's views on Article 59 of the ICC Statute that the judges of the Pre-Trial Chamber were probably of the opinion that they would have to examine irregularities in the context of a national arrest/detention prior to the official ICC arrest if that arrest/detention were somehow related to the ICC proceedings.

However, even though the Appeals Chamber thus accepted the concerted action term, a term which could encompass a national arrest/detention if that arrest/detention were somehow related to the ICC proceedings, the Appeals Chamber also presented an additional requirement, namely that only violations of the suspect's rights which are related to the "process of bringing the appellant to justice for the crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings before the Court (…) may provide ground for halting the process".[12] However, that is a stricter

[11] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, p. 10.

[12] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 44. See also ibid., para. 42: "It is worth reminding that the crimes for which Mr. Lubanga Dyilo was detained by the Congolese authority were separate and distinct from those which led to the issuance of condition as one can imagine that there are situations in which the ICC was involved in a national arrest/detention, in which there was concerted action between the ICC and third parties, in which the national arrest/detention was somehow related to the ICC proceedings, even if the suspect was not in detention for the same crimes as those for which the ICC is now prosecuting him. For example, it is not impossible for the Prosecutor to informally request national authorities to keep a suspect, who is in detention for crimes other than those in which the ICC is interested, in custody so that the Prosecutor has more time to prepare a request for arrest and surrender. In such a case, it can be argued that the ICC is involved in the case, that there is concerted action between the ICC and third parties, that the national arrest/detention is somehow related to the ICC proceedings (which would entail the examination of irregularities stemming therefrom), whether that suspect was in detention at the national level for the same crimes as those for which the ICC is now prosecuting him or not.

A final unclear issue is that the ICC Appeals Chamber does not view a motion of a suspect who has allegedly been the victim of a male captus and who argues that the ICC should refuse jurisdiction because of that male captus as a challenge to its jurisdiction under Article 19 of the ICC Statute. It considers such a challenge to be a sui generis/atypical motion, seeking the stay of the proceedings.[13] This view, with which the Appeals Chamber corrected the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision in this case, was, however, seemingly rejected by Pre-Trial Chamber in Katanga, decided after the Appeals Chamber's decision in Lubanga Dyilo.[14] Although the Trial Chamber in Katanga referred to the Appeals Chamber's view in Lubanga Dyilo, it did not further comment on it.[15]

Now that these obscurities with respect to the ICC position on the male captus issue have been addressed, a few less ambiguous features which can be identified in the warrant for his arrest." The same argument was used in the context of Art. 60, para. 4 of the ICC Statute, where the ICC judges referred to this decision of 14 December 2006, cf. ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"' (Public Document), [ICC-]01/04-01/06 (OA 7), 13 February 2007, para. 121 and ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the powers of the Pre-Trial Chamber to review proprio motu the pre-trial detention of Germain Katanga' (Urgent, Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 18 March 2008, p. 11.

---

[13] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 24.

[14] See ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, paras. 43-45.

[15] See n. 619 and accompanying text of Chapter X.

the ICC's handling of an alleged male captus case should be mentioned. It must be clarified that the following points may also reveal inconsistencies between, for example, the decisions of the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo. However, as the Appeals Chamber specifically reviewed the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision in that case, this study does not view a correction of the Appeals Chamber in that respect as a lack of clarity but as a more authoritative view of the ICC. The obscurities discussed above were different: they either included unclear issues with respect to the Appeals Chamber's decision itself or lack of clarity engendered by a Chamber taking another view after the Appeals Chamber had issued its decision.

First, the ICC does not accept the doctrine which is so often contrasted with the male captus bene detentus rule, the abuse of process doctrine, because it is not covered by Article 21 of the ICC Statute. However, what is covered by this provision, namely by its paragraph 3, is the human rights dimension of the abuse of process doctrine. It is that human rights dimension which the ICC uses to solve male captus claims. It is clear that the ICC theoretically attaches great importance to human rights – and the human rights to a fair trial[16] and to liberty and security (including the right to challenge the lawfulness of one's detention, a right which is not explicitly mentioned in the ICC's proper instruments) in particular.[17] In this

[16] See, for example, ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 37: "Human rights underpin the Statute; every aspect of it, including the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court. Its provisions must be interpreted and more importantly applied in accordance with internationally recognized human rights; first and foremost, in the context of the Statute, the right of a fair trial, a concept broadly perceived and applied, embracing the judicial process in its entirety [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Prosecutor's "Application for Leave to Reply to 'Conclusions de la défense en réponse au mémoire d'appel du Procureur'" (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 12 September 2006, Separate opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 3: "Internationally recognized may be regarded those human rights acknowledged by customary international law and international treaties and conventions. The right to a fair trial belongs to this class of rights."

[17] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"' (Public Document), [ICC-]01/04-01/06 (OA 7), 13 February 2007, Separate Opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 16 ("Article 21 (3) of the Statute ordains the application and interpretation of every provision of the Statute in a manner consistent with internationally recognized human rights. Internationally recognized human rights in this area, as may be distilled from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and international and regional treaties and conventions on human rights, acknowledge a right to an arrested person to have access to a court of law vested with jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the lawfulness and justification of his/her detention. Such a right is afforded to the arrestee from the outset [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."), ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the admissibility of the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la confirmation des charges" of 29 January 2007 (…)' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 OA8, 13 June 2007, para. 13 ("The human right [and then the ICC context, it was also remarked that "the defence must, to the largest extent possible, be granted access to documents that are essential in order effectively to challenge the lawfulness of detention, bearing in mind the circumstances of the case".[18] The judges refer to Artt. 21, para. 3 of the ICC Statute, 9, para. 4 of the ICCPR, 5, para. 4 of the ECHR and 7, para. 6 of the ACHR, ChP] of a person to have recourse to judicial review of a decision affecting his liberty is entrenched in article 60 of the Statute [original footnote omitted, ChP]."), ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the powers of the Pre-Trial Chamber to review proprio motu the pre-trial detention of Germain Katanga' (Urgent, Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 18 March 2008, p. 8 ("[A]ccording to articles 55, 57 and 67, one of the functions of the Chamber is to be the ultimate guarantor of the rights of the Defence, including the right "not to be deprived of his or her liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedures as are established in the Statute"".), ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision on application for interim release' (Confidential), ICC-01/05-01/08, 20 August 2008 (available as the annex to the decision ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision concerning the public version of the "Decision on application for interim release" of 20 August 2008' (Public Document), ICC-01/05-01/08, 26 August 2008), para. 37 ("The Single Judge observes at the outset that the right to liberty is of fundamental importance for everyone and that for any deprivation of liberty to be acceptable, it must be on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as are established by the applicable legal regime. Furthermore, it must not be arbitrary [original footnote omitted, ChP].") and ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa' (Public Document), ICC-01/05-01/08, 14 August 2009, para. 35, writing about the scope of Art. 21, para. 3 of the ICC Statute: "The right of an arrested person to have access to a judicial authority vested with the power to adjudicate upon the lawfulness and justification of his or her detention is enshrined in many international human rights instruments, such as article 9 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, article 9 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, article 5 of the (European) Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, article 6 of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights and article 7 of the American Convention on Human Rights [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." Cf. also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, Dissenting opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 20: "If there were no provision in the Statute affording the arrested person the opportunity to contest the deprivation of his/her liberty, we would be confronted with a dire denial of his/her human rights. Every person is assured the right to contest the lawfulness of his/her detention. Lawfulness in this context signifies the soundness in law of the factual basis of the decision, as well as the correctness of the legal provisions by reference to which the case is decided. The right of a person to contest the lawfulness of his detention, ordered in his absence and without hearing him, is safeguarded by the provisions of article 60 (2) of the Statute, requiring the Pre-Trial Chamber to evaluate, in proceedings held in the presence and with the participation of the person affected, the lawfulness and sequentially the justification of the deprivation of liberty. The provisions of article 60 (2), like every other provision of the Statute, must (…) be construed and applied in accordance with internationally recognized human rights." See finally also ibid., para. 31: "[A]rticle 21 (3) assures to every individual the right to effectively contest the deprivation of liberty."

[18] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, para. 32. See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central

Katanga case has shown that even provisions which do not seem relevant for the male captus topic (such as provisions on interim releases) can apparently be used in that respect if the suspect is of the opinion that his male captus has tainted the lawfulness of his detention in The Hague.[19]

The ICC furthermore appears to concentrate on the violations themselves and not so much on the question of whether the ICC (or third parties working at the behest of the ICC) – see again the words "by his/her accusers" – intentionally violated certain norms.[20] However, what seems to be required, see the Bemba Gombo case, is that violations must result into actual prejudice to the suspect.[21]

Another important aspect of the male captus issue is the role of the competent judicial authority of the custodial State in the whole procedure, a point which was already briefly mentioned supra. In contrast to the Pre-Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo did not explain to what extent that authority, under Article 59 of the ICC Statute, can look into irregularities prior to the official arrest/detention. In addition, and this time just like the Pre-Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber did not clarify the role of the ICC judges, who marginally supervise the points of Article 59, paragraph 2 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute,[22] in this context of the prior arrest/detention. Finally, again following the Pre-Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber does not elucidate to what extent provisions such as Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute and Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute should be considered here. The focus appears to be on national law only.

Finally, the Appeals Chamber seems only interested in the ultimate remedy, the refusal of jurisdiction/a halt of the procedures.

African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, Dissenting opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 29.

[19] See ns. 650-651 and accompanying text of Chapter X.

[20] See also ICC, Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Urgent Decision on the consequences of non-disclosure of exculpatory materials covered by Article 54(3)(e) agreements and the application to stay the prosecution of the accused, together with certain other issues raised at the Status Conference on 10 June 2008' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 13 June 2008, para. 90.

[21] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision on application for interim release' (Confidential), ICC-01/05-01/08, 20 August 2008 (available as the annex to the decision ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision concerning the public version of the "Decision on application for interim release" of 20 August 2008' (Public Document), ICC-01/05-01/08, 26 August 2008), para. 46.

[22] This marginal role was also confirmed in the Bemba Gombo case, see n. 337 and accompanying text of Chapter X.

2.2 The ICC's current position on the male captus issue assessed in the context of this book's external evaluative framework

Now, how can the above-mentioned position – taking into account that some of its aspects are not very clear – be viewed vis-à-vis the male captus position of other courts? How similar or different is the ICC's handling of the male captus issue in comparison with that of these other courts?

First of all, it appears that the ICC, like almost every modern court or tribunal, does not accept the old-fashioned version of male captus bene detentus that jurisdiction will be exercised, regardless of the way that person came into the power of the Court.

Human rights are considered to be of paramount importance and extend to the entire proceedings, including the pre-trial phase. This includes the (for this study) so important human right to liberty and security, including its sub-right to challenge the lawfulness of one's detention, even if that sub-right is not explicitly mentioned in the proper instruments of the ICC.[23] This resembles the position of other tribunals.[24] It will also be very interesting to see how the ICC will interpret its remark that "the defence must, to the largest extent possible, be granted access to documents that are essential in order effectively to challenge the lawfulness of detention, bearing in mind the circumstances of the case"[25] when it is confronted by a Todorović-like male captus situation in which peacekeeping forces do not wish to share the exact information on the way a person was brought into their hands with third parties.

As a result, the pre-trial phase will be examined to see what kind of effect violations of these rights may have on the jurisdiction of the Court. The Trial Chamber in Katanga did not do so on procedural grounds – and can be criticised for that – but it is uncertain, and in fact improbable, for this decision to be viewed as support for the old-fashioned version of male captus bene detentus mentioned above. It is simply unimaginable that the Trial Chamber would also refuse to look at a male captus claim because the motion was submitted too late if there were reasonable grounds to believe that the male captus was extremely serious, for example, because it involved an abduction operation orchestrated by the ICC OTP itself.

---

[23] See n. 17 and accompanying text.

[24] See n. 148 of Chapter VII.

[25] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, para. 32. See also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008, Dissenting opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis, para. 29, where Judge Pikis states that "everything that would enable the person to effectively challenge the lawfulness of his detention must be disclosed." As explained in Chapter X: although Judge Pikis makes this remark in the context of the substantive grounds and reasons of the detention, his words may nevertheless be interesting for a possible Todorović-like situation.

If one is of the opinion that the ICC Appeals Chamber's one and only male detentus test can be found in the words at footnote 1 and accompanying text (and this is most probably the case), then the ICC shares the view of, for example, the Trial Chamber in Nikolić and the Ebrahim case in that the Prosecution (including third parties working at its behest) must come to court with clean hands.[26] If that is not the case, for example, if the fundamental rights of the suspect have been violated in the process of bringing that suspect before the ICC, judges can conclude that one can no longer speak of a fair trial in the broad sense of the word, a conclusion which must lead to the ending of the case. Because the words "breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect" are very generally formulated, these could include all kinds of male captus situations, such as abductions, luring situations and other techniques which could (possibly) be seen as violations of the person's right to liberty and security.[27]

Before continuing on this topic, it is interesting to note that the ICC seems to concentrate here on the violations themselves and not so much on the question of whether the ICC (or third parties working at the behest of the ICC) intentionally violated certain norms. This can be considered a rather liberal stance as other courts have often demanded, in their male detentus tests, an intention on the part of the prosecuting authorities to commit the male captus.[28] Nevertheless, as also explained in the previous chapter, even though the ICC does not explicitly demand an intent, it seems clear that it requires serious violations – cf. the words "[w]here fair trial becomes impossible because of breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect or the accused by his/her accusers" – and that it is very well possible that the ICC may only view those violations which are committed intentionally (note, by the way, that some male captus situations, such as an abduction, can arguably not be committed unintentionally)[29] as serious violations which can lead to the ending of the case.[30] In any case, one can assume that the ICC will more readily refuse jurisdiction if the violations are committed intentionally, even if its test does not require the violations to be intentional.

[26] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111: "Due process of law also includes questions such as how the Parties have been conducting themselves in the context of a particular case and how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The finding in the Ebrahim case that the State must come to court with clean hands applies equally to the Prosecution coming to a Trial Chamber of this Tribunal."

[27] See the authorities mentioned in n. 17 and Hall 2008 A, p. 1093, writing on "the fundamental rights recognized in article 55, para. 1" (of which the section under (d) contains the ICC's right to liberty and security). In fact, Hall notes that the absence of this section under (d) "has led to inconclusive and unsatisfactory jurisprudence concerning challenges to the lawfulness of arrests by UN peace-keeping forces in the former Yugoslavia in the Dokmanovic, Todorovic, Nikolic and Krajisnik [see for this latter case n. 659 of Chapter VI, ChP] cases (…) [with reference to Lamb 2001, ChP] and to the lawfulness of prolonged pre-trial detention by national authorities pursuant to ICTR arrest warrants (…) [with (probably) reference to the two decisions of Barayagwiza and the one of Semanza of 31 May 2000, ChP]." (Ibid., n. 26.) Hall refers to "see decisions cited in supra note 44 below", but it is in n. 53 of his contribution that one will find, among other things, the three above-mentioned ICTR decisions. See finally Knoops 2002, p. 260, writing that the ICC "cannot act arbitrarily, such as by assuming eo ipso the prevalence of its surrender provisions over treaty provisions which indirectly prohibit forcible abduction and luring such as Article 9 (1) of the ICCPR." At the same page, Knoops even writes that "[t]he protection against forcible abduction and luring may figure as jus cogens arising from these international fundamental human rights norms." (See also n. 433 of Chapter III.)

[28] See n. 20 of Chapter VII (for the inter-State context). In the male captus decisions of the tribunals, the intent is not explicitly mentioned, but some reasonings could definitely contain this element, see ns. 120-122 of Chapter VII. Note finally that the first male detentus possibility proposed by the OTP itself in the Nikolić case also contains this element, see ns. 114 and 116 and accompanying text of Chapter VII and n. 263 and accompanying text of the previous chapter.

However, what appears to be required, see the Bemba Gombo case, is that violations must result into actual prejudice to the suspect.[31] Nevertheless, other tribunal cases can be seen as supporting the view that the level of prejudice is only relevant for determining how serious the violations were (and, consequently, what kind of remedy must be provided) and not for determining whether there were violations in the first place/whether the suspect would be entitled to a remedy. In that view, every violation causes some level of injustice/prejudice to the suspect, whether or not the suspect suffered actual/material prejudice.[32]

Returning to the ICC's words "breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect" being so generally formulated that these could include all kinds of male captus situations, including abductions and luring situations: if the ICC were to refuse jurisdiction if the suspect's accusers were responsible for an abduction as such, the ICC would side with the decisions in Levinge,[33] Bennett,[34] Ebrahim[35] and Beahan.[36]

---

[29] See n. 20 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.

[30] Cf. in that respect also the Prosecution in Nikolić which clarified, after having mentioned its first male detentus possibility, which contains the element of intent ("[u]nambiguous, advertent violations of international law which can be attributed to the Office of the Prosecutor [emphasis added, ChP]"): "(i.e. the Prosecution's own conduct would have to be in some way egregious [emphasis in original, ChP])". See ns. 114 and 116 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.

[31] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision on application for interim release' (Confidential), ICC-01/05-01/08, 20 August 2008 (available as the annex to the decision ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber III, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Decision concerning the public version of the "Decision on application for interim release" of 20 August 2008' (Public Document), ICC-01/05-01/08, 26 August 2008), para. 46.

[32] See, for example, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, para. 125 (see also n. 997 and accompanying text of Chapter VI): "[A]ny violation, even if it entails only a relative degree of prejudice, requires a proportionate remedy." See also n. 1164 and accompanying text of Chapter VI (with respect to the Rwamakuba case).

[33] See, for example, the following general reasoning in that case (not focusing now on the specifics of the case, which did not involve a traditional kidnapping): "Where a person, however unlawfully, is brought into the jurisdiction and is before a court in this State, that court has undoubted jurisdiction to deal with him or her. But it also has a discretion not to do so, where to exercise its discretion would involve an abuse of the court's process. Such an abuse may arise by reason of delay on the part of prosecuting authorities. But delay is only one variety of unfair or wrongful conduct on the part of those authorities. Other such conduct may exist, including wrongful and even unlawful involvement in bypassing the regular machinery for extradition and participating in unauthorised and unlawful removal of criminal suspects from one jurisdiction to another." (Levinge v Director of Custodial Services, Department of Corrective Services, 23 July 1987, 89 FLR 142.)

[34] See, for example, the following general reasonings in that case (not focusing now on the specifics of the case, which did not involve a traditional kidnapping): "If British officialdom at any level has participated in or encouraged the kidnapping, it seems to represent a grave contravention of international

(Taking into account that Levinge, Bennett and Beahan explicitly, and Ebrahim implicitly, made these remarks in the context of the abuse of process doctrine, a doctrine rejected by the ICC Appeals Chamber, which, in turn, focuses on the human rights dimension.) These are reasonings which fall short of the test about which, according to the German Federal Constitutional Court in Al-Moayad, more recent State practice agrees that it must, in any event, lead to rejection of the male captus bene detentus rule, namely in the case of an abduction 1) accompanied by serious human rights violations/serious mistreatment or 2) followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from the injured State.[37] With respect to the context of the tribunals, if the ICC were to refuse jurisdiction because the suspect's accusers were responsible for an abduction as such, the ICC would probably also side with the tribunal cases. Although none of these cases involved abductions perpetrated by the tribunal itself, one could refer here to general statements which

---

law, the comity of nations and the rule of law generally if our courts allow themselves to be used by the executive to try an offence which the courts would not be dealing with if the rule of law had prevailed. It may be said that a guilty accused finding himself in the circumstances predicated is not deserving of much sympathy, but the principle involved goes beyond the scope of such a pragmatic observation and even beyond the rights of those victims who are or may be innocent. It affects the proper administration of justice according to the rule of law and with respect to international law." (House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 163.) See also House of Lords, Lord Griffiths, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 151: "In my view your Lordships should now declare that where process of law is available to return an accused to this country through extradition procedures our courts will refuse to try him if he has been forcibly brought within our jurisdiction in disregard of those procedures by a process to which our own police, prosecuting or other executive authorities have been a knowing party."

[35] See Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), p. 896: "When the state is a party to a dispute, as for example in criminal cases, it must come to court with "clean hands". When the state itself is involved in an abduction across international borders, as in the present case, its hands are not clean."

[36] See, for example, the following general reasoning in that case (not focusing now on the specifics of the case, which did not involve a traditional kidnapping): "In my opinion it is essential that in order to promote confidence in and respect for the administration of justice and preserve the judicial process from contamination, a court should decline to compel an accused person to undergo a trial in circumstances where his appearance before it has been facilitated by an act of abduction undertaken by the prosecuting state. There is an inherent objection to such a course both on grounds of public policy pertaining to international ethical norms and because it imperils and corrodes the peaceful co-existence and mutual respect of sovereign nations. For abduction is illegal under international law, provided the abductor was not acting on his own initiative and without the authority or connivance of his government. A contrary view would amount to a declaration that the end justifies the means, thereby encouraging states to become law-breakers in order to secure the conviction of a private individual." (Supreme Court, Beahan v. State, 4 September 1991, International Law Reports, Vol. 103 (1996), p. 214.)

[37] Although this point is not very clear, it is possible that the German Federal Constitutional Court in Al-Moayad would follow the 1986 case from Germany, meaning that it would not refuse jurisdiction if the abduction was not accompanied by serious human rights violations/serious mistreatment and followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from the injured State, see the text between ns. 587-588 and accompanying text of Chapter V. See also n. 47 of Chapter VII.

can be found in Nikolić[38] and Barayagwiza.[39] (Taking – again – into account the fact that the remark in the Barayagwiza case was made in the context of the abuse of process doctrine.) One could also refer to the Dokmanović case, about which Scharf noted that "the Trial Chamber focused on the distinction between "luring" (the means used to arrest Dokmanović) and "forcible abduction", reckoning that the former was acceptable while the latter might constitute grounds for dismissal in future cases [original footnote omitted, ChP]".[40]

Turning to this concept of luring, the ICC's phrase "breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect" is so generally formulated that it could also cover a situation of luring, as long as the judges are of the opinion that that would constitute a violation of a suspect's fundamental rights (namely his right to liberty and security).[41]

In that case, the ICC would follow – taking into account for the third time the fact that the ICC uses the human rights dimension here and not the more general tool of the abuse of process doctrine – the more progressive inter-State cases of Levinge[42] and Bennett,[43] cases which (are considered to) contain very general male [38] See n. 26. As explained earlier in this book, there is some lack of clarity here with respect to the vision of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Nikolić, which stated that "certain human rights violations are of such a serious nature that they require that the exercise of jurisdiction be declined." Although these words are very broad, it could be argued, because it was assumed that Nikolić was the victim of an abduction, because the Appeals Chamber was apparently not very impressed by the value of State sovereignty and because the Appeals Chamber, in justifying its approach, refers to passages from cases which particularly focus on serious mistreatment when writing about their male detentus threshold, that the Appeals Chamber's male detentus test appears to be mainly interested in the seriousness of the mistreatment inflicted on the suspect. This could mean that the Appeals Chamber would not be concerned about an abduction, as long as that abduction was not accompanied by serious mistreatment. It is not very clear from the decision, however, whether this is the general male detentus test or whether it is only the test applicable to the case at hand, which involved the actions of private individuals.

[39] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74: "Under the doctrine of "abuse of process", proceedings that have been lawfully initiated may be terminated after an indictment has been issued if improper or illegal procedures are employed in pursuing an otherwise lawful process. (…) It is a process by which Judges may decline to exercise the court's jurisdiction in cases where to exercise that jurisdiction in light of serious and egregious violations of the accused's rights would prove detrimental to the court's integrity."

[40] Scharf 1998, p. 371.

[41] See Subsections 2.2.1 and 2.2.4 of Chapter III.

[42] Where the Court formulated the following, rather general, male captus male detentus test: "Where a person, however unlawfully, is brought into the jurisdiction and is before a court in this State, that court has undoubted jurisdiction to deal with him or her. But it also has a discretion not to do so, where to exercise its discretion would involve an abuse of the court's process. Such an abuse may arise by reason of delay on the part of prosecuting authorities. But delay is only one variety of unfair or wrongful conduct on the part of those authorities. Other such conduct may exist, including wrongful and even unlawful involvement in bypassing the regular machinery for extradition and participating in unauthorised and unlawful removal of criminal suspects from one jurisdiction to another."

[43] Where (as summarised by the Court in Westfallen) it had to be sorted out "whether it appears that the police or the prosecuting authorities have acted illegally or procured or connived at unlawful procedures or violated international law or the domestic law of foreign States or abused their powers in a way that should lead this court to stay the proceedings against the applicants [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

detentus reasonings and which could cover luring operations (even though these cases did not concern such operations), but would distance itself from the inter-State luring cases such as Yunis[44] and Stocké[45] where the judges would probably only refuse jurisdiction if the luring were accompanied by serious mistreatment.[46]

The tribunal context is less straightforward. Although it is clear that if the ICC were to refuse jurisdiction in a case of luring as such, it would take a more liberal stance than the ICTY judges in Dokmanović had done (who had condoned this legal technique,[47] except where accompanied by serious mistreatment, cf. the cases of Yunis and Stocké),[48] such a position could perhaps also fall under the more general words of the ICTR as mentioned in footnote 39. In addition, neither must it be forgotten that the general words of Nikolić as mentioned in footnote 26 could also cover a luring operation and that the decision in which these words can be found was issued after the Dokmanović case.

Returning to 'the' position of the ICC: if one is, however, of the opinion that the Appeals Chamber's requirement that one can no longer speak of a fair trial must be seen in the strict sense of the word, namely a fair trial in the courtroom (see the words at footnote 2 and accompanying text but recall the discussion related to the second formulation whether it must be seen as a (more strict) male detentus test at all), the ICC's position is arguably different from most of the more recent national and international courts. Most of these courts seemingly also refuse jurisdiction, not only if one can no longer speak of a fair trial (in the strict sense of the word), but

---

[44] See US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909), p. 920: "In cases where defendants have urged the court to dismiss the indictment solely on the grounds that they were fraudulently lured to the United States, courts have uniformly upheld jurisdiction."

[45] In Stocké, the Court held that the prosecuting State's authorities were not involved in the luring operation (or, if they were, were not acting on the State's authority), but that, even if they were, the male captus was not serious enough to divest jurisdiction.

[46] See US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909), p. 920: "In this action, there is no dispute that United States law enforcement officers were fully involved in the planning and execution of defendant's arrest. However, defendant has failed either to allege or to show any actions committed by these officers that meet the standard of outrageousness established by Toscanino and its progeny requiring this Court to divest itself of jurisdiction. The record in this proceeding has been reviewed with care and the Court fails to find the type of cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino." In Stocké, the German Federal Constitutional Court stated that jurisdiction could be refused on the basis of national law if a certain male captus situation could be seen as an "extremely exceptional case". Although it is not clear what the exact meaning is of this concept (although the more serious male captus situation of an abduction (as such) will not fall under the term, see the abduction case which was decided by the Constitutional Court one year later), it may be that the Court was thinking of Toscanino-like circumstances, see Wilske 2000, p. 334, n. 413 (commenting on this concept): "[D]as Gericht hatte hier möglicherweise die schweren Folterungen im Toscanino-Fall im Auge." See also Grams 1994, pp. 70-71. It is also possible that the German Federal Constitutional Court in Al-Moayad would follow the Stocké case, namely that it would not refuse jurisdiction in the case of a normal luring operation, but only if that luring was accompanied by serious violations/mistreatment, see the text between ns. 587-588 and accompanying text of Chapter V.

[47] See n. 197 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[48] See n. 255 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

also in the broad sense of the word, namely if it were to be unfair in general/if it were to undermine the integrity of the court to have a trial in the first place (hereby often using the abuse of process doctrine). To provide two examples, in Bennett, it was held that > a court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case.[49]

And in Nikolić, the Trial Chamber explained:

> There exists a close relationship between the obligation of the Tribunal to respect the human rights of the Accused and the obligation to ensure due process of law. Ensuring that the Accused's rights are respected and that he receives a fair trial forms, in actual fact, an important aspect of the general concept of due process of law. In that context, this Chamber concurs with the view expressed in several national judicial decisions, according to which the issue of respect for due process of law encompasses more than merely the duty to ensure a fair trial for the Accused. Due process of law also includes questions such as how the Parties have been conducting themselves in the context of a particular case and how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal.[50]

An exception to this, however, can be found in the ICTY case of Karadžić, a case to which the Prosecutor in Katanga also referred.[51] In that case, the Trial Chamber

---

[49] House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161. Note that these words were also referred to in the ICTY Milošević case (see n. 411 of Chapter VI) and the ICTR Barayagwiza case (see n. 842 of Chapter VI). This point is also very clearly described by Lord Steyn in Latif (see n. 346 and accompanying text of Chapter V): "[P]roceedings may be stayed in the exercise of the judge's discretion not only where a fair trial is impossible but also where it would be contrary to the public interest in the integrity of the criminal justice system that a trial should take place." (House of Lords, Lord Steyn, Regina v. Latif; Regina v. Shazad, 18 January 1996, 1 W.L.R. 112-113 [1996].)

[50] ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111. For a focus on the broad concept of a fair trial, see also SCSL, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor Against Morris Kallon (Case No. SCSL-2004-15-AR72(E)) and Brima Bazzy Kamara (Case No. SCSL-2004-16-AR72(E)), 'Decision on Challenge to Jurisdiction: Lomé Accord Amnesty', 13 March 2004, para. 79. (See n. 1289 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.)

[51] See n. 535 and accompanying text of Chapter X. For another more recent case, one could perhaps also refer here to the French case of Carlos the Jackal (Ramirez Sánchez), where the French Supreme Court agreed with the following statement of the Court of Appeal: "Moreover, case-law also provides that the circumstances in which someone, against whom proceedings are lawfully being taken and against whom a valid arrest warrant has been issued, has been apprehended and handed over to the French legal authorities are not in themselves sufficient to render the proceedings void, provided that they have not vitiated the search for and process of establishing the truth, nor made it impossible for the defence to exercise its rights before the investigating authorities and the trial courts." See ns. 535 and 537 and judges held that proceeding with the case, even if the so-called Holbrooke Agreement existed, "would not affect any of the Accused's fair trial rights"[52] and that > it could only be in exceptional circumstances that actions of a third party that is completely unconnected to the Tribunal or the proceedings could ever lead to those proceedings being stayed. Where an accused is seriously mistreated by such a third party, that mistreatment is unlikely to be a barrier to a fair trial which can be secured in various other ways, for example, by excluding any evidence obtained by torture at the hands of the third party.[53]

This quotation also provides a nice stepping-stone to the next point which should be discussed here.

It must be stressed that the above-mentioned position of the ICC, whether one follows that supporting the broad concept of a fair trial or that advocating the restricted concept, assumes the involvement of the ICC in the violations. This can not only be inferred from the words "by his/her accusers" (which arguably includes concerted action between the ICC and third parties[54] and action of third parties working at the behest of the ICC),[55] but also from other references in the section in which the different male detentus formulations are presented, to the prosecuting forum's own authorities.[56]

As explained supra, it is not clear whether the Appeals Chamber only follows this male detentus test, demanding involvement of the ICC, or whether it would also refuse jurisdiction in the case of, for example, serious mistreatment/torture, irrespective of the entity responsible, for instance, if that mistreatment/torture were committed by private individuals.

---

accompanying text of Chapter V. See also, but arguably to a lesser extent, the Barbie case, see n. 496 and accompanying text of the same chapter.

[52] See n. 727 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[53] ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on the Accused's Holbrooke Agreement Motion' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 8 July 2009, para. 85. Note, however, that the Appeals Chamber judges did not agree with this restricted test, see ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on Karadžić's Appeal of Trial Chamber's Decision on Alleged Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-AR73.4, 12 October 2009, para. 51: "The Appeals Chamber observes at the outset that none of the Appellant's allegations qualify as a situation making a fair trial impossible, pursuant to the first prong of the test set out in the Barayagwiza Decision. The Appellant's allegations point instead to the second prong of the test set out in the Barayagwiza Decision. In other words, the question before the Appeals Chamber is whether, assuming that the Appellant's factual submission are accepted, proceeding with the trial of the Appellant would contravene to the Tribunal's sense of justice or would be detrimental to the Tribunal's integrity, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct amounting to serious and egregious violations of the Appellant's rights [original footnotes omitted, ChP]."

[54] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, pp. 9-10 and its references to Semanza and Rwamakuba.

[55] See ibid., p. 9 and its references to Stocké en Altmann (Barbie).

[56] See n. 9.

If one assumes that the ICC only follows its male detentus test demanding ICC involvement, the ICC would follow most of the national cases (but see the 1982 Swiss (male captus male deditus) case of X) which require the involvement of one's own people.[57] However, in that case, it would also clearly deviate from the tribunal cases which recognise that, under the abuse of process doctrine, a doctrine which the ICC Appeals Chamber rejects, very serious male captus cases can lead to the ending of the case, irrespective of the entity responsible.[58]

If the ICC (Appeals Chamber) were nevertheless to refuse jurisdiction in very serious male captus cases, irrespective of the entity responsible – this is how the co-investigating judges in Duch read the Appeals Chamber's decision – and if it were to follow the Pre-Trial Chamber's statement in that case (assuming that the reference to "torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State [emphasis added, ChP]" is erroneous), the Appeals Chamber would also recognise that this male detentus avenue is not restricted to torture or serious mistreatment. After all, the Pre-Trial Chamber stated that > to date, the application of this doctrine [of abuse of process, ChP], which would require that the Court decline to exercise its jurisdiction in a particular case, has been confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person

[57] See n. 51 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.

[58] See, for example, the Trial Chamber's decision in Nikolić (with reference to the 1999 Barayagwiza decision): "[I]n a situation where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subjected to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment to the exercise of jurisdiction over such an accused. This would certainly be the case where persons acting for SFOR or the Prosecution were involved in such very serious mistreatment. But even without such involvement this Chamber finds it extremely difficult to justify the exercise of jurisdiction over a person if that person was brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal after having been seriously mistreated. This, the Chamber observes, is in keeping with the approach of the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza case, according to which in cases of egregious violations of the rights of the Accused, it is "irrelevant which entity or entities were responsible for the alleged violations of the Appellant's rights" [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 114.) See further ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Slobodan Milošević, 'Decision on Preliminary Motions', Case No. IT-99-37-PT, 8 November 2001, para. 51, ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 30, SCSL, Trial Chamber, Prosecutor Against Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara and Santigie Borbor Kanu, 'Written Reasons for the Trial Chamber's Oral Decision on the Defence Motion on Abuse of Process Due to Infringement of Principles of Nullum Crimen Sine Lege and Non-Retroactivity as to Several Counts', Case No. SCSL-04-16-PT, 31 March 2004, para. 26, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 206, ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 21, ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 33, ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on the Accused's Holbrooke Agreement Motion' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 8 July 2009, para. 85 and ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on Karadžić's Appeal of Trial Chamber's Decision on Alleged Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-AR73.4, 12 October 2009, para. 47.

> to the relevant international criminal tribunal [emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP][.][59]

This means that the ICC may also refuse jurisdiction in serious male captus cases other than serious mistreatment/torture. This appears to be similar to the position of the tribunals. Although several cases, perhaps inspired by the Trial Chamber's words in Dokmanović,[60] a case issued prior to (the abuse of process test from) the Barayagwiza case,[61] have focused on the more 'physically' coloured words "serious mistreatment" and "torture" (which is not without problems as this can gradually turn the abuse of process test into a 'torture test'),[62] the more recent Karadžić case has clarified that serious mistreatment/torture are only to be seen as examples of such serious cases that a court may refuse jurisdiction.[63]

---

[59] ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, p. 10.

[60] See ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Mile Mrksić, Miroslav Radić, Veselin Šlijvančanin and Slavko Dokmanović, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović', Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, 22 October 1997, para. 75: "[T]here was no "cruel, inhumane and outrageous conduct that would warrant dismissal under Toscanino" in the arrest of Mr. Dokmanović. The accused was not mistreated in any way on his journey to the Erdut base. There was nothing about the arrest to shock the conscience [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." It is reminded that Toscanino was tortured for almost three weeks.

[61] See ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 77: "[T]he abuse of process doctrine may be relied on in two distinct situations: (1) where delay [or other circumstances, see the test from Bennett (see n. 49 and accompanying text) to which the judges in the Barayagwiza case referred, see ibid., para. 75, ChP] has made a fair trial for the accused impossible; and (2) where in the circumstances of a particular case, proceeding with the trial of the accused would contravene the court's sense of justice, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct."

[62] See, for example, ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 33: "Where the violations in question are not attributable to an international tribunal, this doctrine appears to be confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by the external authorities and has most usually been applied in relation to the process of arrest and transfer [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See also ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 21: "It is obvious that in a case of crimes against humanity, the proceedings should be stayed only where the rights of the accused have been seriously affected, at least, for example, to the degree in Toscanino." (It is again to be recalled that Toscanino was tortured for nearly three weeks.) The co-investigating judges of the ECCC also used more generally words when they stated that they "are (...) compelled to follow the solution adopted in Nikolic and Lubanga which requires, for the application of the abuse of [process] doctrine, the existence of grave violations of the rights of the Accused" (ibid.), but the words following that quotation again show that the co-investigating judges apparently require serious mistreatment/torture-like circumstances: "Where it has not been established or even alleged that DUCH suffered incidents of torture or serious mistreatment prior to his transfer before the Extraordinary Chambers, the prolonged detention under the jurisdiction of the Military Court, in comparison with the crimes against humanity alleged against the Accused, cannot be considered a sufficiently grave violation of the rights of the Accused." (Ibid.)

[63] See ICTY, Trial Chamber III, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on the Accused's Holbrooke Agreement Motion' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-PT, 8 July 2009, para. 85: "As for the example of "serious mistreatment" of the accused by a third party, such as torture or cruel and/or Another point which should be discussed here is the scope of review. As explained supra, there is lack of clarity as to whether the Appeals Chamber, prior to the constructive custody of the ICC, would examine irregularities during a national detention which result from concerted action between the ICC and third parties more generally or whether it would only consider irregularities if the suspect were in detention for the same crimes as he is now being prosecuted at the ICC.

However, first looking at the context of constructive custody itself, it appears that the ICC accepts that it will review and in fact take responsibility for any violations which occur in this context, in the context of an arrest/detention executed at the behest of the ICC.[64] Several tribunal cases can be interpreted as support for degrading treatment, there is no indication that the Accused suffered such serious mistreatment or that there was any other egregious violation of his rights, including his right to political activity [emphasis added and emphasis (of the word "egregious") in original, ChP]." See also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, 'Decision on Karadžić's Appeal of Trial Chamber's Decision on Alleged Holbrooke Agreement' (Public), Case No. IT-95-5/18-AR73.4, 12 October 2009, para. 47: "[T]he Trial Chamber adopted the common standard established by the Appeals Chamber in the Barayagwiza Decision and in the Nikolić Appeal Decision, and not a higher one, by considering whether the Appellant suffered a serious mistreatment or if there was any other egregious violation of his rights [emphasis added, ChP]." See also ibid., para. 51: "[T]he question before the Appeals Chamber is whether, assuming that the Appellant's factual submission are accepted, proceeding with the trial of the Appellant would contravene to the Tribunal's sense of justice or would be detrimental to the Tribunal's integrity, due to pre-trial impropriety or misconduct amounting to serious and egregious violations of the Appellant's rights."

---

[64] For example, when the Pre-Trial Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo explained that "any violations of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo's rights in relation to his arrest and detention prior to 14 March 2006 [when the request for arrest and surrender was transmitted to the DRC, ChP] will be examined by the Court only once it has been established that there has been concerted action between the Court and the DRC authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP]" (ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 3 October 2006, p. 9), it referred to the ECtHR's cases of Stocké and Barbie (with respect to the concerted action point) and the ICTR cases of Semanza and Rwamakuba, these last two as authorities for the idea that the ICTR "has repeatedly stated that the Tribunal is not responsible for the illegal arrest and detention of the accused in the custodial State if the arrest and detention was not carried out at the behest of the Tribunal." (Ibid., pp. 9-10, n. 30.) Hence, it appears that the Pre-Trial Chamber followed the vision of the Deputy Prosecutor in Lubanga Dyilo (see n. 90 and accompanying text of Chapter X), namely that the ICC will take its responsibility, first, for violations which occur after the official request has been sent (violations taking place in the constructive custody of the ICC/violations in the arrest/detention at the behest/request of the ICC: Semanza and Rwamakuba) and secondly, for violations which occurred prior to these official requests if these violations stem from concerted action between the ICC and the external authorities (in the case of Lubanga Dyilo: the DRC authorities): Stocké and Barbie. See also the following view of the Prosecutor in Katanga: "The Second Period of detention of the Accused by the DRC authorities dates from the time the Court transmitted to the DRC authorities a formal request for the Accused's arrest and surrender. The detention based on the ICC's request for surrender lasted approximately one month. It is attributable to the Court." (ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Prosecution Response to Defence motion for a declaration on unlawful detention and stay of proceedings' (Public, Public Redacted Version of ICC-01/04-01/07-1335-Conf-Exp), ICC-01/04-01/07, 17 August 2009, para. 6.) The Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo did not really delve into this issue, as it was especially focusing on the main allegation of Lubanga Dyilo: "The gravamen of the appellant's complaint, where the essence of the that view,[65] although there are also cases in which the judges refused to review the legality of the national arrest/detention proceedings.[66] appellant's case lies, is that the Pre-Trial Chamber ignored breaches of his human rights prior to his appearance before the Court and the directions for the enforcement of the warrant of arrest [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 42.) One can assume that the Appeals Chamber does not reject the Pre-Trial Chamber's stance on taking responsibility for violations which occur after the requests have been sent. Additional evidence for this assertion may be found in the fact that the Appeals Chamber connects the ICC's exercise of jurisdiction in general, whenever the ICC is involved in a case (which arguably also includes making an arrest/detention via third parties), to Art. 21, para. 3 of the ICC Statute, see the concept of "by his/her accusers".

---

[65] See, for example, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 85, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v the Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000, para. 74, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000, paras. 78, 87 and 125, ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, paras. 226-227, 232, 255 and 322, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba et alia, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Illegal Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused', Case No. ICTR-98-44-T, 12 December 2000, para. 23, ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 20 September 2006, para. 218 and ICTR, Appeals Chamber, André Rwamakuba v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision on Appeal against Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-A, 13 September 2007, para. 24 (although it must also be admitted that the Rwamakuba case is arguably less far-going than the other above-mentioned cases). See finally also ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 16 (see n. 165 of Chapter VII). Note that the Pre-Trial Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo referred to both Semanza and Rwamakuba as support for the idea that the ICTR "has repeatedly stated that the Tribunal is not responsible for the illegal arrest and detention of the accused in the custodial State if the arrest and detention was not carried out at the behest of the Tribunal." (See n. 64.) However, even though Semanza can indeed be seen as support for the idea that it will look at any violation in the context of an arrest/detention at the behest of the ICTR, Rwamakuba is arguably less far-going as in that case, the judges also stated that they would only review some aspects of an arrest/detention at the behest of the ICTR. Note finally that the above-mentioned cases can in fact be interpreted as support for the reasoning that any violation occurring in the context of the tribunal case more generally, a context which is often triggered by the tribunal request, but not necessarily limited to the constructive custody, see the cases of Barayagwiza and Duch, must be remedied.

[66] See, for example, ICTY, Trial Chamber I, Motion on Behalf of General Djorde Djukić, 'Decision', Case No. IT-96-19-Misc. 1, 28 February 1996, D211, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus Edouard Karemera, 'Decision on the Defence Motion for the Release of the Accused', Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, 10 December 1999, para. 4.3, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Matthieu Ngirumpatse, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Challenging the Lawfulness of the Arrest and Detention and Seeking Return or Inspection of Seized Items', Case No. ICTR-97-44-I, 10 December 1999, para. 56, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor versus J[u]v[é]nal Kajelijeli, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Arbitrary Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused and on the Defence Notice of Urgent Motion to Expand and Supplement the Record of 8 December 1999 Hearing', Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, 8 May 2000, paras. 34-35, ICTR, Trial Chamber I, The Prosecutor v. Siméon Nshamihigo, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Seeking Release of the Accused Person and/or Any Other Remedy on the Basis of Abuse of Process by the Prosecutor', Case No. ICTR-2001-63-DP, 8 May 2002, n. 2, ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Joseph Nzirorera, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Challenging the Legality of the Arrest and Detention of the Accused and Requesting the Return

With respect to examining irregularities beyond the constructive custody: if the ICC were more generally to review irregularities which resulted from concerted action between the ICC and third parties, it would follow several (inter)national courts in which it is recognised that responsibility must be taken for action in which the prosecuting forum's own authorities participated, in which those authorities were involved. Two inter-State cases (discussed by the ECtHR and ECmHR) were already mentioned in the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision in Lubanga Dyilo: Stocké[67] and Altmann (Barbie).[68] As regards the tribunal context, one could refer to the views of the co-investigating judges, the judges of the Pre-Trial Chamber and the judges of the Trial Chamber in the Duch case before the ECCC (who, in turn, relied on the Lubanga Dyilo case).[69] However, there are also judges who look more broadly at the issue of responsibility and do not confine themselves to concerted action. One may here refer to the Nikolić case, where the judges of the Trial Chamber considered whether the male captus of the private individuals could be attributed to SFOR and whether, in turn, the conduct of SFOR could be attributed to the OTP. Here, the

---

of Personal Items Seized', Case No. ICTR-98-44-T, 7 September 2000, para. 27 and ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Pauline Nyiramasuhuko, 'Decision on the Defence Motion for Exclusion of Evidence and Restitution of Property Seized', Case No. ICTR-97-21-T, 12 October 2000, para. 28.

[67] In the Stocké case, the ECtHR held that "[n]either the facts found by the Commission nor the circumstances of the case as a whole established that the cooperation that there had unquestionably been between the German prosecuting authorities and Mr Köster had extended to "unlawful activities abroad such as [returning] the applicant against his will from France to the Federal Republic of Germany"." (ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Stocké v. Germany, Application No. 11755/85, 'Judgment', 19 March 1991, para. 51.) See also ibid., para. 54: "Like the Commission, the Court considers that it has not been established that the cooperation between the German authorities and Mr Köster extended to unlawful activities abroad." (See also n. 384 and accompanying text of Chapter III.)

[68] In the Altmann (Barbie) case, the ECmHR stated: "The question nevertheless arises of whether any concerted action between the two Governments, or the fact that he was expelled rather than extradited, would constitute grounds for considering the applicant's imprisonment after he was handed over to the French authorities as illegal." (ECmHR (Plenary), Klaus Altmann (Barbie) v/France, Application No. 10689/83, 'Decision of 4 July 1984 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 37, p. 234.) (See also n. 334 and accompanying text of Chapter III.)

[69] See ECCC, Office of the Co-Investigating Judges, 'Order of Provisional Detention', Criminal Case File 002/14-08-2006, Investigation No. 001/18-07-2007, 31 July 2007, para. 20 where the co-investigating judges explained that "[t]he fact that the Extraordinary Chambers is part of the judicial system of the Kingdom of Cambodia does not lead to the conclusion that this special internationalised Tribunal acted in concert with the military court: the Extraordinary Chambers only became operational on June 22, 2007 (...). Prior to the initiation of this judicial investigation, the Co-Investigating Judges (who together form the sole authority empowered to decide upon matters of provisional detention) had no means of intervening. Once they were in a position to do so, they dealt with the issue." See also ECCC, Pre-Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Appeal Against Provisional Detention Order of Kaing Guek Eav Alias "Duch"', Criminal Case File No. 001/18-07-2007-ECCC-OCIJ (PTC01), 3 December 2007, para. 15, where the judges stated that they could only take into account a violation of Art. 9 of the ICCPR "when the organ responsible for the violation was connected to an organ of the ECCC, or had been acting on behalf of any organ of the ECCC or in concert with organs of the ECCC." (See also ibid., para. 21.) See finally ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 33: "The abuse of process doctrine constitutes an additional guarantee of the rights of the accused and may apply even in circumstances where there is no concerted action between the international criminal tribunal and the external authorities [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

judges, cautiously making use of the ILC's DARS, also examined whether SFOR acknowledged and adopted the conduct of the private individuals as its own (Article 11 of the DARS).[70]

Finally, if the ICC('s Appeals Chamber) were not to look at concerted action more generally but only at irregularities, prior to the constructive custody of the ICC, if the suspect were in detention for the same crimes as those for which he was now being prosecuted at the ICC, that stance would constitute a deviation from other (inter)national courts which simply appear to be interested in the seriousness of the pre-trial irregularities in general, whether or not a suspect was in detention for the same crimes as those for which the court is now prosecuting him.[71] It is very well possible that the prosecuting forum is somehow involved in a national detention, even if the suspect was detained for other crimes. In that case, judges may be of the opinion that there was concerted action, entailing legal responsibility. Note in that respect that Duch, in whose case the judges made the above-mentioned remarks on concerted action, was also initially detained for crimes other than those for which the ECCC was now prosecuting him. In addition, it must also be repeated[72] that the cases mentioned in footnote 65 can be interpreted as supporting the idea that the [70] See n. 488 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[71] For example, Lord Devlin stated in the Connelly case that courts must accept their "inescapable duty to secure fair treatment for those who come or are brought before them [emphasis added, ChP]." (ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 29). One could also refer here to the vision of the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo, which merely demands "instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]". (This broad stance was arguably also accepted by the Defence and the Prosecution in that case, see n. 195 of Chapter X.) See also the abuse of process doctrine under Duch: "Where the violations in question are not attributable to an international tribunal, this doctrine appears to be confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by the external authorities and has most usually been applied in relation to the process of arrest and transfer [emphasis added and original footnote omitted, ChP]." (ECCC, Trial Chamber, 'Decision on Request for Release' (Public), Case File 001/18-07-2007/ECCC/TC, 15 June 2009, para. 33.) See further the following formulation from Bennett (a formulation which was also used in the ICTY Milošević case and the ICTR Barayagwiza case (see n. 49)): "[A] court has a discretion to stay any criminal proceedings on the ground that to try those proceedings will amount to an abuse of its own process either (1) because it will be impossible (usually by reason of delay) to give the accused a fair trial or (2) because it offends the court's sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the circumstances of a particular case [emphasis added ChP]." (House of Lords, Lord Lowry, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 161.) See finally the ICTY Trial Chamber's view in Nikolić, arguing that "[d]ue process of law also includes questions such as (…) how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal [emphasis added, ChP]." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111.) See also ibid., para. 114: "[I]n a situation where an accused is very seriously mistreated, maybe even subjected to inhuman, cruel or degrading treatment, or torture, before being handed over to the Tribunal, this may constitute a legal impediment to the exercise of jurisdiction over such an accused [emphasis added, ChP]."

[72] See the final words of n. 65.

tribunal will take responsibility for any violations which occur in the context of its case more generally, whether that concept of "in the context of its case" is triggered by an arrest/detention at the behest of the tribunal (which was often the case) or not (see Barayagwiza and Duch). In that case, it would not matter if the suspect were in detention for crimes other than those for which the prosecuting forum was now trying him.

A few remaining elements can be briefly addressed here.

First, it is clear that the competent judicial authority in the custodial State, because of Article 59 of the ICC Statute, has become a much more serious and powerful link in the surrender proceedings than the national authorities in the context of the UN ad hoc Tribunals.

Secondly, the (possible)[73] idea of the ICC that a male captus motion cannot be seen as a challenge to the ICC's jurisdiction (ratione personae) does not seem to be shared by other (inter)national courts, even if, strictly speaking, the motion challenges the exercise of personal jurisdiction and not the personal jurisdiction itself.[74]

Thirdly, with respect to the ICC's sole focus on the ultimate remedy (male detentus): the cases examined at the inter-State level did not clearly identify the reasoning that the suspect, if his claim for a male detentus was rejected, might be entitled to other remedies from the prosecuting forum such as a reduction of the sentence or financial compensation, although it was, of course, possible for the male captus victim to sue the kidnappers in a civil case, see that of Alvarez-Machain, discussed after his criminal case. In addition, it is possible that the prosecuting forum was of the opinion that during the male captus, other legal rules were violated; violations for which it could grant remedies, such as the exclusion of [73] But see ICC, Trial Chamber II, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Public redacted version of the "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Germain Katanga for a Declaration on Unlawful Detention and Stay of Proceedings" of 20 November 2009 (ICC-01/04-01/07-1666-Conf-Exp)' (Public document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 3 December 2009, paras. 43-45.

[74] See, for example, US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 22 July 1991, No. 88-5462 (939 F.2d 1341), p. 1343: [I]f the Mexican government formally objects to the treaty breach and a defendant timely raises that breach in a pending criminal proceeding the courts of the United States may not exercise personal jurisdiction over that defendant, provided the Mexican government is willing to accept repatriation." (See n. 104 of Chapter V.) See also ICTY, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest', Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, 5 June 2003, para. 19: "[T]he Appeals Chamber wishes to clarify that what is at issue here, is not jurisdiction ratione materiae but jurisdiction ratione personae. Jurisdiction ratione materiae depends on the nature of the crimes charges. The Accused is charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity. As such, there is no question that under the Statute, the International Tribunal does have jurisdiction ratione materiae. In this case, jurisdiction ratione personae depends instead on whether the Appeals Chamber determines that there are any circumstances relating to the Accused which would warrant setting aside jurisdiction and releasing the Accused. It is to this determination that the Chamber now turns." (See also n. 591 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.) Cf. finally ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005, para. 206: "[T]he Appeals Chamber does not find that these newly and more detailed submitted breaches rise to the requisite level of egregiousness amounting to the Tribunal's loss of personal jurisdiction." (See also n. 1047 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.)

unlawfully obtained evidence.[75] As regards the context of the tribunals, the focus on the ultimate remedy alone, refusal of jurisdiction, can certainly be found here.[76] Nevertheless, there are also cases where the judges, after having rejected the male detentus claim, have examined whether the suspect would be entitled to other, less far-reaching, remedies instead.[77]

Fourthly, the ICC has not yet explicitly mentioned the element 'seriousness of the crimes' when considering male captus claims, an element which can be found in the context of both inter-State and tribunal cases.[78] However, this is not that strange as the ICC has rejected the abuse of process doctrine, a doctrine in which this element played a major role. Nevertheless, if the ICC were to follow the Pre-Trial Chamber and consider refusing jurisdiction in the case of serious violations, irrespective of the entity responsible (assuming for now that that is the position of the Pre-Trial Chamber), one can expect that the ICC would not refuse jurisdiction too readily and in doing so, would refer to both the absence of responsibility on the part of the suspect's accusers and the importance of prosecution (read: the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes).

A last point which should be mentioned here before turning to the assessment of the ICC position in the context of this book's internal evaluative framework is that the ICC does not explicitly support the male captus bene/male detentus maxim. This is similar to other courts and tribunals. Although the Appeals Chamber does contrast the male captus bene detentus rule with the abuse of process doctrine and although that latter doctrine is rejected by the Appeals Chamber (which could be interpreted as meaning that the Appeals Chamber follows the male captus bene detentus rule), this is certainly not the case, as the Appeals Chamber clearly supports a large part, namely the human rights dimension, of the abuse of process doctrine. Looking now at the first (and third) formulation of the ICC's male detentus test: if the ICC is of the opinion that no fair trial (in the broad sense of the word) can be held because of a serious male captus committed by the suspect's accusers, a male detentus verdict must follow. That is even the case – to return to the above-mentioned point of the [75] For example, it was explained in Chapter V, in the context of the Yunis luring case, that Yunis' male detentus claim was rejected, but that his confession made after his arrest had to be suppressed because "the FBI failed to comply fully with constitutional restraints and precedential Supreme Court decisions." (US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909), p. 929.) See also ns. 179-180 and accompanying text of Chapter V.

[76] See, for example, the Trial and Appeals Chamber's decisions in Nikolić and the Trial Chamber's decision in Tolimir, see n. 155 of Chapter VII.

[77] See, for example, the second decision in Barayagwiza, Semanza, Kajelijeli, Rwamakuba (although that case concerned compensation after an acquittal) and Duch. (See also n. 152 of Chapter VII.)

[78] Cf. also the more general importance the European institutions attach to prosecution (of serious crimes), see, for example, ECmHR (Plenary), Illich Sánchez Ramirez v/France, Application No. 28780/95, 'Decision of 24 June 1996 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 86-B, p. 162 (see n. 316 of Chapter III) and ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005, para. 88 (see n. 341 of Chapter III).

seriousness of the alleged crimes – if a suspect is charged with very serious crimes.[79]

2.3 The ICC's current position on the male captus issue assessed in the context of this book's internal evaluative framework

Before turning to the merits of this subsection, it is interesting to note that, in the course of writing this study, it became clear that the two evaluative frameworks can merge: even though the external evaluative framework was created 'merely' to see how similar or different the ICC's position on the male captus issue is to the point of view of other courts which have dealt with the problem before, the examination of Article 21 of the ICC Statute in Chapter IX elucidated that within this provision, within this book's internal evaluative framework, there might be room for the results of the external evaluative framework. This was made possible by a number of concepts – such as "principles and rules of international law" and "general principles of law of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world" – whose exact scope is not clear, but of which it can be argued that they can house the practice of (inter)national courts. In other words, all the critically reviewed practices of national courts and international(ised) criminal tribunals may not only be used to see how similar or different the ICC position on the male captus issue is in comparison with other courts; they may also be used, in a less non-committal way: to assess the ICC position vis-à-vis its own law.

Having said that, how is the ICC's current position on the male captus issue to be assessed vis-à-vis its own law?

First of all, one can question whether a number of aspects of what could be the ICC position on the male captus issue (as explained: this is not entirely clear) are in conformity with Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute. This provision, among other things, demands that the application and interpretation of the ICC law must be consistent with internationally recognised human rights.

For example, one can question whether the (male detentus?) requirement that certain violations must be such that a person can no longer make his defence before one can speak of the impossibility of a fair trial is in fact in accordance with Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute. This latter provision definitely contains the human right to a fair trial and arguably a human right to a fair trial which is not limited to the fair trial in court but which extends to the entire proceedings. It may be worth in that respect recalling the words of Nowak, commenting on Article 14 of the ICCPR:

[79] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 39: "Unfairness in the treatment of the suspect or the accused may rupture the process to an extent making it impossible to piece together the constituent elements of a fair trial. In those circumstances, the interest of the world community to put persons accused of the most heinous crimes against humanity on trial, great as it is, is outweighed by the need to sustain the efficacy of the judicial process as the potent agent of justice."

> The claim to a fair trial in court on a criminal "charge" ("accusation") does not arise only upon the formal lodging of a charge but rather on the date on which State activities substantially affect the situation of the person concerned. This is usually the first official notification of a specific accusation, but in certain cases, this may also be as early as arrest [original footnotes omitted, ChP].[80]

However, if the ICC were to adhere to its words which focus on a broad concept of fair trial (and this is probably more likely),[81] there would be no violation of the ICC's law. In this context, it must also be remarked that the ICC's view that a broad concept of a fair trial must be cherished, even for persons charged with very serious crimes, is definitely in conformity with internationally recognised human rights, which are, of course, applicable to anyone, whether that anyone is charged with fraud or genocide.

Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute also contains the human right to liberty and security, including a person's right to challenge the lawfulness of his detention, even if that right is not explicitly mentioned by the ICC Statute. This has also been confirmed by the ICC itself.[82] However, the refusal of the judges in the Katanga case to look into the motion of the suspect challenging the lawfulness of his pre-trial arrest and detention, for the only reason that the motion was filed too late, might perhaps be interpreted as a violation of this right and thus of the ICC law. In this context, it must be noted that this right is so crucial – it is to be recalled[83] that it has customary international law/general international law status and cannot even be derogated from in times of emergency and war – that the ICC, according to Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, must always accept and review such a challenge, especially if the motion argues that the unlawfulness of the arrest/detention is so serious that it should lead to the ending of the case. This is so, whether the challenge, strictly speaking, can be seen as a challenge to the ICC's jurisdiction or not.[84]

That the ICC concentrates on the violations themselves (and not so much on the question of whether they were violated intentionally) can be seen as being in accordance with the right to an effective remedy in the case of violations, a right of which Section 3 of Chapter IX concluded that it can also be qualified as an internationally recognised human right. Conversely, the additional requirement as [80] Nowak 1993, p. 244. Another interesting quotation can be found in ECtHR (Chamber), Case of Miailhe v. France (No. 2), Application No. 18978/91, 'Judgment', 26 September 1996, where the ECtHR stated in para. 43 that it must "satisfy itself that the proceedings as a whole were fair, having regard to any possible irregularities before the case was brought before the courts of trial and appeal and checking that those courts had been able to remedy them if there were any". (Note, however, that this case dealt with the admissibility of evidence.) See also n. 194 and accompanying text of Chapter III.

---

[81] See n. 16.

[82] See n. 17.

[83] See Subsection 2.2.5 of Chapter III.

[84] See ns. 13-15 and accompanying text.

can be found in the Bemba Gombo case that the violation must have caused actual prejudice to the suspect before remedies can be granted would not be in accordance with this right.

The ICC has acknowledged that whenever it exercises jurisdiction, whenever the ICC is involved in a case, that involvement must be in accordance with internationally recognised human rights.[85] This appears to be a correct interpretation of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute. If the ICC('s) Appeals Chamber were to agree with the Pre-Trial Chamber that it would look, beyond the constructive custody of the suspect, to irregularities which result from concerted action between the ICC and third parties, that stance would be in accordance with the scope of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute. However, if the Appeals Chamber followed its additional requirement that it would only look at irregularities suffered by the suspect if that suspect was in detention for the same crimes as those for which he is now being prosecuted at the ICC, this can be seen as a violation of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute. After all, that provision applies to any situation in which the ICC is involved. It is very well possible that the Prosecution would informally request national authorities to keep a suspect in national detention (for other crimes) until it has finished preparing its case. If irregularities occur during that national detention, it can certainly be said that they take place in a context in which the ICC was involved, whether or not the suspect was in detention for the same crimes as those for which he is now being prosecuted at the ICC.

One of the most interesting points to be discussed here is, of course, that the ICC's male detentus test assumes the involvement of the ICC (or third parties working at its behest). It appears – although this is not entirely clear – that the ICC would not refuse jurisdiction, for example, if private individuals were responsible for a very serious male captus. This would be unproblematic if the ICC had accepted the abuse of process doctrine, which is very general and which merely demands that judges must refuse jurisdiction if they feel that the male captus is so serious that it would undermine the integrity of the court/their sense of justice/the idea of a fair trial in general to continue the case. However, the ICC rejected this doctrine. How is this rejection of the abuse of process doctrine to be assessed vis-à-vis the ICC's law?

The ICC judges are right when they argue that this doctrine cannot be found in the ICC's proper instruments pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (a) of the ICC Statute. However, after having clarified that a certain provision of the ICC Statute – Article 4, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute – "cannot be construed as providing power to stay proceedings for abuse of process",[86] they concluded that Article 21, paragraph 1 (a) of the ICC Statute was exhaustive on the matter and hence that one did not have to look to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute.

[85] See n. 16.

[86] ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 35.

One can have serious doubts whether this conclusion is in accordance with the ICC's law, however. As explained in Chapter X, it seems far too easy to conclude that the ICC Statute is exhaustive on the matter simply because the abuse of process doctrine is not explicitly mentioned or implicitly covered (via – the seemingly irrelevant[87] – Article 4, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute) by the ICC instruments.[88] The judges, who arguably focus too much on the common law label 'abuse of process' here, do not seriously review other relevant provisions which might shed light on the question of whether the ICC has power to issue a male detentus verdict in the case of a serious male captus, taking into account the rules of interpretation of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (as was done in Chapter IX of this book). The much more extensive review in Chapter IX has arguably shown that Article 21, paragraph 1 (a) of the ICC Statute, taking into account Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, is not exhaustive on the matter and thus that one can turn to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute to fill this legal lacuna. And, as argued in that chapter, the power of a court to refuse jurisdiction in the case of a serious male captus might be seen as a principle/rule of international law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) of the ICC Statute (namely as practice of international courts) or as a general principle of law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute. In addition, because the power of a court to refuse jurisdiction in very serious male captus cases, without looking at the exact label of this power (such as abuse of process/supervisory powers) now, is used by so many (inter)national courts, it could be seen as an inherent power of any court,[89] including of the ICC (even if it cannot be construed via Article 4, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute).

Another important aspect which should be mentioned here concerns the ICC's views on Article 59 of the ICC Statute. Although the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo did not go into this matter, the Pre-Trial Chamber in that case clarified the fact that the competent judicial authority in the custodial State was not obliged to look into the pre-trial phase if that phase concerned national proceedings only. However, that appears to mean that the competent judicial authority is, nevertheless, allowed to do so and in fact, must do so if those national proceedings were somehow related to the ICC, for example, because the ICC was involved in them. That would constitute a role in accordance with Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, which demands compliance with internationally recognised human rights as from the moment the ICC is involved in a case, which may, of course, be the case before the official requests were sent to the national authorities. However, regarding the [87] This provision appears to focus on very different issues, see Rückert 2008, p. 124. (See n. 239 of Chapter X for more information.) However, the fact that the abuse of process power cannot be seen as an inherent power under this (seemingly irrelevant) provision does not mean that the ICC does not have such an inherent power nonetheless.

[88] Cf. also the comparable criticism of Manning 2007, p. 837 (see n. 240 of Chapter X for more information).

[89] See n. 878 and accompanying text of Chapter VI and n. 19 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.

role of the ICC judges, as the supervisors marginally reviewing this provision, both the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Appeals Chamber do not discuss to what extent these judges could look into the phase before the official ICC requests were sent. In addition, both Chambers, and the same goes for the judges in Bemba Gombo, do not clearly review the execution of the ICC's official arrest in terms of provisions such as Articles 21, paragraph 3 and 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute. (They merely stress the importance of such rights in their decisions more generally.) They seem interested in national law alone. This restrictive interpretation is arguably in violation of the ICC's own law, since both provisions certainly apply to the Article 59 of the ICC Statute proceedings. (Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute applies already as from the moment the ICC becomes involved in the case and Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute applies already as from the moment the ICC initiates an investigation.)

The final point which should be addressed here, before turning to the recommendations, is that the Appeals Chamber is only interested in the ultimate remedy, the refusal of jurisdiction/a halt of the procedures, even though Lubanga Dyilo raised the point of other, less far-reaching, remedies in his appeal. However, Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute contains the internationally recognised human right to an effective remedy in the case of a violation. This means that every violation as from the moment the ICC becomes involved in the case must be repaired, whether this leads to the ending of the case or not. Although it is possible that no violations occurred in this case as from the moment the ICC became involved in it (and hence that no violation of the ICC's law occurred here), the ICC must not forget in general that suspects would, however, be entitled, pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, to appropriate remedies in the case of violations as from the moment the ICC becomes involved in the case.

3 RECOMMENDATIONS

This study has tried to examine case law, literature and regulatory documents as objectively (but certainly not uncritically!) as possible because it was – and still is – held that only such an approach can lead to useful internal and external evaluative frameworks. However, it has also become clear that the material could sometimes be interpreted in several ways and that in such instances, this study has not hesitated to take a position. One could hereby think of the role and scope of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute.[90]

[90] See also Sluiter 2009 p. 475: "Initial case law, especially Pre-Trial Chamber and Appeals Chamber decisions in the Lubanga case, reveals flawed interpretation and application of two vital provisions for the protection of individual rights in the pre-trial phase, Article 21 (3) and Article 59. Article 21 (3) has not yet occupied its prominent place as a systematic and obligatory human rights review standard for each and every activity of the Court and activity that is of benefit to the proceedings before the Court. Furthermore, many questions in respect of the precise scope and content of Article 21 (3) remain – yet – unaddressed. The same applies to Article 59, where the Appeals Chamber has in the Lubanga case wrongly reduced the ICC's supervisory role."

This has also to do with the third goal of this study – besides more generally combining two fascinating subjects which have not previously been put together in a book and more specifically answering the book's central question – namely to make a contribution to the male captus discussion itself, to the discussion as to how ICC judges and judges in general can best deal with alleged irregularities in the pre-trial phase of their case, to the discussion as to how proceedings can be achieved which are considered both effective and fair. The most important recommendations will now be presented.

First of all, this study is obviously of the opinion that the ICC should at least follow its own law. This means that it should reject all the above-mentioned reasonings which could be seen as being in violation of Article 21 of the ICC Statute, and in particular its paragraph 3.[91]

Hence, it ought to abandon the old-fashioned and restrictive concept of a fair trial that certain violations must be such that a person can no longer make his defence before one can speak of the impossibility of a fair trial (if that concept is indeed supported by the ICC in the male captus discussion). Some violations are simply so serious that it would undermine the judges' sense of justice/the integrity of the Court/the concept of a fair trial broadly perceived to proceed with the case, whether or not that suspect can still make his defence in court.[92]

Furthermore, it is to be welcomed that in theory, the ICC so often stresses the importance of human rights, even for suspects of the most serious crimes[93] and even regarding rights which are not explicitly mentioned in the ICC Statute (such as the right to challenge the lawfulness of one's detention), but that also means that suspects should be able to exercise those rights in practice. However, it can be argued that the Katanga case, for example, did not crystallise that thought. It is submitted that judges should always want to find out what happened to their suspects, what the foundation of their case is. Consequently, they should not focus too much on the exact title of the male captus motion or dismiss too readily the entire motion for being submitted too late. The judges can also censure the Defence for its tardiness and still proprio motu review the allegations. Although it is recognised that the ICC's system is in many respects unique and should be preserved as much as possible,[94] the judges cannot hide behind this uniqueness to disregard what is arguably their main task, namely to try suspects of international crimes in a fair way.[95] With that comes a serious examination of the way in which those suspects were brought into the jurisdiction of the ICC, of the foundation of their case.

[91] In doing so, it could rely on Art. 21, para. 2 of the ICC Statute, which clarifies that the ICC is not obliged to "apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions."

[92] In the words of Choo 1994 B, p. 629, commenting on the Bennett case: "Central to the decision of the House of Lords was the notion that a criminal court should not be concerned solely with accurate fact-finding or, to put it another way, the determination of the 'truth.' A court also has a duty to protect the moral integrity of the criminal process." (See also n. 258 of Chapter X.) Cf. also the formulation used by the ICC in the case of illegally obtained evidence, see Art. 69, para. 7 of the ICC Statute: "Evidence obtained by means of a violation of this Statute or internationally recognized human rights shall not be admissible if: (a) The violation casts substantial doubt on the reliability of the evidence; or (b) The admission of the evidence would be antithetical to and would seriously damage the integrity of the proceedings." (See also n. 265 of Chapter IX and n. 246 and accompanying text of Chapter X.) See also Knoops 2002, pp. 252-253 and 263 and Currie 2007, p. 390.

[93] Cf. Swart 2001, p. 201.

The feeling one gets from the Katanga case, that the judges do not seem to be really interested in a full examination of the legality of the pre-trial phase, can also be found in the Lubanga Dyilo and Bemba Gombo cases, where the judges did not seriously examine the relevance of provisions such as Articles 21, paragraph 3 and 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute in the context of Article 59 of the ICC Statute. In addition, one can also refer to the focus on the ultimate remedy in Lubanga Dyilo here.[96] The ICC must be very careful not to, in the words of Sluiter, "retreat within the safe limits of The Hague".[97] Put another way, "the ICC must strengthen its grip on national activities which are an indispensable and inextricable part of ICC proceedings, whether we like it or not".[98]

The ICC has stated that whenever it exercises jurisdiction, whenever it is involved in a case, that exercise of jurisdiction, that involvement (which includes the actions of third parties working at the behest of the ICC) must be in accordance with Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute. This is a correct statement of the law, meaning, in turn, that the ICC Appeals Chamber's additional requirement that it will only look into irregularities if the suspect was in detention at the national level for the same crimes as those for which he is now being prosecuted at the ICC should be

[94] See, for example, ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Final System of Disclosure and the Establishment of a Timetable' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 15 May 2006, Annex I ('Discussion of the Decision on the Final System of Disclosure'), para. 4: "[T]he single judge considers that the need to safeguard the uniqueness of the criminal procedure of the International Criminal Court (…) is one of the primary considerations in contextual interpretation of the relevant provisions."

[95] See n. 53 of Chapter IX. See in that respect also the Tadić case where the 'uniqueness' was also used to grant the suspect less than a fair trial (in that case even a fair trial in the strict sense of the word: in the courtroom). See also ns. 132-133 and accompanying text of Chapter VI. Cf. also Stapleton 1999, p. 570: "The Tadić case, and, in particular, the judgment allowing testimony by anonymous witnesses, is relevant insofar as it relates to the issue of procedural rights of the accused and impacts interpretation of the Rome Statute. It is important to note that the reasoning behind the decision rested on the characterization of the ICTY as a "unique" body – a characterization that enabled the majority to interpret the right to a fair trial within the limited context of the ICTY rather than the broader context of human rights."

[96] Cf. Sluiter 2009, pp. 465 and 471-474. In this context, one can also share Sluiter's concern (see ibid., p. 475) that the fact that the ICC judges do not sufficiently supervise the proceedings of Art. 59 of the ICC Statute may also backfire, may lead to serious problems in the context of uncooperative States, in which case that provision can become a Trojan horse. It is submitted that the ICC should indeed consider to what extent this provision can still be used for these kinds of States. See also ns. 198-199 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII. In any case, it can be seen as yet another justification for the judges to closely supervise the pre-trial phase of their case. See n. 573 and accompanying text of Chapter X.

[97] Ibid., p. 465.

[98] Ibid., p. 475.

abandoned.[99] However, even though the first statement is in accordance with the ICC's law, it is submitted that the judges should go one step further: they should examine any violation which occurs in the context of their case more generally, whether or not there is involvement on the part of the ICC.[100] Normally, violations which occur during a period before the ICC was involved in a case will not readily be viewed as falling within the context of the ICC's case. Hence, this broader test should not be feared too much from a practical point of view.[101] Conversely, it should be cherished from a legal point of view, because it is the only test which can enable judges to remedy violations which they deem to fall within the context of their case, even if the ICC was not yet involved in it.

Another important aspect is that if the ICC is confronted by a new male captus case, it should more extensively examine whether or not the ICC has the power to refuse (the exercise of) jurisdiction in serious male captus cases, comparable with the abuse of process doctrine. The examination in Chapter IX of this study has arguably shown that Article 21, paragraph 1 (a) of the ICC Statute is not exhaustive on the matter and hence that the judges can turn to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute. If they agree with this study that these provisions, via concepts such as "principles and rules of international law" and "general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world" can cover established practices of (inter)national courts, they can use these practices to solve their male captus problem.

As concerns "principles and rules of international law", one could think of the acceptance of a broad concept of abuse of process (in that jurisdiction may be refused in very serious male captus cases, irrespective of the entity responsible) and the fact that the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged can be taken into account when applying the abuse of process doctrine.

If these principles bring no relief, the ICC may turn to the "general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world". These stipulate that most courts confronted by a male captus will use their discretion, for instance (in the common law system) under the abuse of process doctrine, to balance all the different elements of the case to decide whether or not the male captus is so serious that jurisdiction must be refused. In addition, most courts seem to refuse jurisdiction only if their own authorities were involved in the male captus. Finally, it appears that quite a number of courts – although it is unclear whether "quite a number" would be enough to lead to a general principle of law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute – would also take into account the seriousness of the crimes with which the victim of the male captus is charged in deciding whether or not jurisdiction must be refused.

Finally, because both the "principles and rules of international law" and the "general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world" seem to accept an abuse of process-like power, one could argue that any court, including the ICC, is invested with such an inherent power.[102]

[99] Hence, the ICC should follow the general formulas as can be found in n. 295 of Chapter X (or in n. 71 of the present chapter).
[100] See n. 72 and accompanying text.
[101] See also n. 176 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.

Hence, even if the judges do not accept that the reasoning behind the abuse of process doctrine can be seen as a principle/rule of international law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) of the ICC Statute or otherwise as general principle of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute, they should embrace the abuse of process-like power they arguably already possess ("inherent")[103] – in the same way as they seem to embrace the right of a suspect to challenge the lawfulness of his detention (probably including, in principle, the remedy to be released in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention), even if that right is not explicitly mentioned in the ICC instruments.[104] In exercising that power, they should balance all the different elements of the case in finding the most appropriate remedies for the violations, such as the seriousness of the alleged crimes/the importance of having the case continued and the seriousness of the male captus, which increases when the involvement of the ICC[105] is greater (thereby looking at all the different possibilities of attributing conduct to the ICC, including, for example, acknowledgment and adoption of the conduct as its own), when the violations have been committed intentionally,[106] when the male captus has caused great prejudice to the suspect, when the male captus was accompanied by serious mistreatment, etc.[107]

If the ICC is not convinced that such a broad balancing exercise can be found in the ICC's law or cannot be seen as an inherent power of the Court, it may, perhaps, be more susceptible to practical arguments. It is to be recalled that the male detentus test of the ICC 'only' takes into account the human rights dimension of the abuse of process doctrine. In addition, it assumes the involvement of the ICC (or third parties working at its behest).

However, what happens – to repeat the example given in Chapter X – if the President of State A (a State Party to the ICC), who has called upon the international [102] See Currie 2007, p. 375 (see n. 167 and accompanying text of Chapter X).

---

[103] Although they do not explain how the doctrine enters the ICC's framework, it should neither be forgotten that, in contrast to the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo, the Defence (see ns. 54 and 102 and accompanying text of Chapter X), the Prosecution (see n. 203 and accompanying text of Chapter X), the DRC (see n. 206 of Chapter X) and the Pre-Trial Chamber (see n. 159 and accompanying text of Chapter X) in that case did all embrace the abuse of process doctrine. (Cf. Manning 2007, pp. 837-838.) This may mean that these actors are also of the opinion that the doctrine is an inherent power of the ICC.

[104] See n. 17 and accompanying text of this chapter and n. 140 and accompanying text of Chapter IX.

[105] One can argue that the ICC, like the other tribunals, should follow the broad abuse of process doctrine here, which accepts that jurisdiction can be refused, irrespective of the entity responsible. However, it is, of course, clear that involvement of the prosecuting forum's own authorities is an important element in deciding whether or not a male detentus outcome must follow, cf. the national level.

[106] As explained supra, although the ICC seemingly presents a test which does not contain the element of intent, one can assume that also the ICC will view violations which are committed intentionally as more serious and more susceptible to a male detentus verdict. In addition, it must again be noted that some male captus situations, such as an abduction, can arguably not be committed unintentionally.

[107] Cf. the factors as noted by Baaijens-van Geloven/Groenhuijsen and Knigge as presented in n. 617 of Chapter III.

community for months to arrest a certain suspect from State B (a non-State Party to the ICC) who keeps committing serious international crimes in State A, is frustrated by the inaction of the international community and orders the kidnapping of the suspect (at a moment when that suspect was back in State B) – a kidnapping which was accompanied by mistreatment and followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from State B. State A ignores these protests and subsequently places the suspect in detention. The ICC, which was already making initial inquiries to find out whether a proper investigation could be initiated, now requests the arrest and surrender of the suspect from State A, which subsequently surrenders the suspect to The Hague.

Under the abuse of process doctrine, which merely demands a male captus in the context of an ICC case that is so serious that judges, in good conscience, can no longer continue with the case, judges could refuse jurisdiction in this case if they are of the opinion that such a serious situation is present here. (It is to be noted that it is probable, or at least to be hoped, that the ICC judges would not follow the 'carte blanche' decision of the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić and would attach more importance to the value of State sovereignty, a concept which the judges of the "lateral" ICC cannot ignore in the same way as the judges of the truly "vertical" ICTY did.)[108]

However, under the ICC test, this would not be possible. After all, the violations did not occur at a time when the ICC was involved in the case, cannot be seen as being executed "by his/her accusers" (the abduction was not executed by State A on behalf of the ICC). In addition, under the abuse of process doctrine, violations of State sovereignty (and of other values such as the rule of law more generally) can easily be taken into account, whereas one can question whether this would also be possible under the ICC test, which only focuses on human rights violations.[109]

In another scenario, one could replace the kidnappers of State A with private individuals. Here, an additional problem could arise. Even if the judges, using the above-mentioned test, were to accept that those private individuals can be seen as "his/her accusers", one or more of them may be of the opinion that private individuals simply cannot violate internationally recognised human rights (or the sovereignty of another State), see the discussions in Chapter III on this topic. In that case, jurisdiction cannot be refused, whereas this would, in principle, be unproblematic under the broad abuse of process doctrine, which merely demands that judges have to assess whether the male captus is so serious that jurisdiction must be refused. This may include the acts of private individuals, even if their acts cannot be seen as proper human rights violations/violations of a State's sovereignty.[110]

This study does not argue that in the above-mentioned scenarios, judges should refuse jurisdiction; this will depend on the exact circumstances, including, of course, the level of involvement on the part of the ICC. However, this study asserts that the [108] See the remarks made by, for example, Currie, at ns. 171-173 and accompanying text of Chapter X.

[109] See the words of Currie at n. 252 and accompanying text of Chapter X.
[110] See also n. 254 of the previous chapter.

judges should in any case have the tools, the possibility, to refuse jurisdiction in such scenarios. That does not seem to be possible under the present male detentus test.

Another important suggestion is connected to the previously mentioned right of a suspect to challenge the lawfulness of his arrest/detention. If the judge is of the opinion that his arrest/detention is indeed unlawful (but not so serious that jurisdiction must be refused), he may wonder what the consequences of that determination must be, now that the ICC Statute does not mention the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention and now that this right, including its remedy of release, can be seen as having customary international law status and thus, in principle, is applicable to the ICC as well. Here, the judges may turn to the examination of this remedy in Chapter IX, where it was concluded that pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, this remedy is in principle to be accorded. However, it was also explained in that context (and also elsewhere in this book) that the remedy is problematic because it is over-simplified, because it can be used as a pro forma remedy and finally because there is a risk that a suspect of international crimes will escape prosecution because he is released for a minor violation, for example, because he was not promptly informed of the reasons for his arrest. This study argues that not only in the context of the abuse of process doctrine (or a comparable doctrine which can be used in determining whether the male captus is so serious that jurisdiction must be refused) but also in the context of this problematic remedy of release, a judge should be able to consider all the relevant elements of the case, including the seriousness of the alleged crimes.[111] That means that a suspect of international crimes should not be released because of the determination 'unlawful arrest/detention' but should remain in custody and should be granted other appropriate remedies, such as a reduction of the sentence (on the basis of Rule 145 of the ICC RPE), compensation (which in any case appears to be mandatory pursuant to Article 85 of the ICC Statute) or perhaps merely a statement that a violation has occurred and that this is to be regretted, taking into account the seriousness of the male captus. However, if the unlawful arrest/detention is very serious, for example, because the ICC orchestrated an abduction, jurisdiction should be refused and the person permanently released. That is a far-reaching consequence, but some male captus situations are so serious that the ICC, in good conscience, can [111] It must be stressed that this study is of the opinion that in these two specific situations, the abuse of process doctrine and the problematic remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, such a balancing exercise can be used. However, one should be very careful not to extend the balancing exercise much further. For example, the ICTY Appeals Chamber's statement in Nikolić that there is a legitimate expectation that persons accused of 'Universally Condemned Offences' are quickly brought to justice and that this expectation "needs to be weighed against the principle of State sovereignty and the fundamental rights of the accused" (see n. 600 and accompanying text of Chapter VI) can easily be abused, namely as an argument that fundamental human rights of suspects of international crimes can be given less weight than fundamental human rights of suspects of ordinary crimes. That, of course, cannot be the case. Fundamental human rights are applicable to anyone. However, in the event of a discretionary remedy (the abuse of process doctrine) or a fundamental human right which is arguably problematic in many aspects, such as the release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention determination, such a balancing exercise should be possible.

no longer proceed with the case without undermining its integrity as an institution based on law. Furthermore, it must also be stressed that the fact that the ICC can no longer try this suspect does not mean that it should not do everything in its power to ensure that the suspect is tried before another court.[112] It still has a general duty to fight impunity, whether that fight takes place before the ICC or not.

However, the most important thing is that tribunal judges – and this goes especially for the ICC judges[113] – as the final adjudicators, as the ultimate guarantors of the suspect's rights,[114] remedy every violation occurring in the context of their case, whether or not that leads to a refusal of jurisdiction and irrespective of the entity responsible.[115] Such an approach, in which context the ICC judges may use the determinations of the competent judicial authority in the custodial State as a first indication of how certain irregularities at the national level must be assessed,[116] will deter parties in the arrest and surrender proceedings from committing irregularities, will best protect the integrity of the ICC and will provide fairness to the suspect, who will not become the victim of a legal vacuum due to the fact that his case has been fragmented over two or more jurisdictions.[117] In addition, because

---

[112] As a suspect will normally raise his male captus claims before the actual trial starts, the 'new' court's jurisdiction cannot be challenged through a ne bis in idem claim, see n. 202 and accompanying text of Chapter X.

[113] This is not only because of a provision such as Art. 85 of the ICC Statute (see the words of Zappalà in n. 86 and accompanying text of Chapter IX), but also because "the ICC system is more inquisitorial in nature than the ad hoc tribunals, requiring Judges to explore issues ultra petitum and address violations proprio motu". (Sluiter 2009, pp. 471-472. See also ns. 674-675 and accompanying text of Chapter X.) Note that Sluiter also recognises the relevance of Art. 85 of the ICC Statute here, see ibid., p. 472.

[114] See ICC, Pre-Trial Chamber I, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, 'Decision on the powers of the Pre-Trial Chamber to review proprio motu the pre-trial detention of Germain Katanga' (Urgent, Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/07, 18 March 2008, p. 8. See also n. 201 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII and n. 672 and accompanying text of Chapter X.

[115] See also n. 100 and accompanying text. Note in that respect the remark of Sluiter that not reviewing may in fact be seen as acceptance of the male captus, thus triggering the concept of strict legal responsibility through attribution (acknowledgement and acceptance of the conduct as its own), see Sluiter 2009, p. 465: "[A] refusal to review the national activities that have benefited the Court can with good reason be seen as acceptance of them, and implicates the integrity of international proceedings."

[116] Those national authorities should then broadly review, on the basis of Art. 59 of the ICC Statute, how the suspect was brought before them, cf. the words of El Zeidy at n. 153 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.

[117] See n. 849 and accompanying text of Chapter VI, n. 171 and accompanying text of Chapter VII, n. 286 of Chapter IX and n. 92 and accompanying text of the previous chapter. Cf. also ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006, para. 11: "The principles of a fair trial are not confined to trial proceedings but extend to pre-trial proceedings as well as the investigation of crime; a fact directly borne out by the provisions of article 55 and 54 (1) (c) of the Statute. Breach of or deviation from the rules of a fair trial at the pre-trial stage of the proceedings may have implications on the proceedings and may affect the outcome of the trial. Purging the pre-trial process of errors consequential in the above sense is designed as a safeguard for the integrity of the proceedings." Note that if the ICC properly remedies violations committed in the context of its case, criticism towards the ICC's non-supervision by external authorities may also be reduced, see ns. 235-236 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII. See also M. Federova, S. Verhoeven and J. Wouters, 'Safeguarding the Rights of not many male captus cases are so serious that jurisdiction must be refused, neither will it easily jeopardise the victims' idea of fairness (in that a trial must be held). Moreover, it will lead to greater differentiation in a context which is sometimes overly focused on the ultimate remedy (refusal of jurisdiction).[118] This will also 'soften' the old-fashioned male captus bene detentus image that international courts have. Even though it appears that the ICC follows the male captus male detentus reasoning as concerns serious irregularities by the suspect's "accusers" (which includes the actions of third parties working at the ICC's behest),[119] something which is to be welcomed, the male captus cases by which the ICC will be confronted will very often not concern such irregularities. This means that in practice, the ICC will probably almost always continue a male captus case, which could, in a way, be seen as acceptance of the male captus bene detentus rule. (Note in that respect that it is to be applauded that the ICC explicitly supports neither the male captus bene detentus nor the male captus male detentus rule, as these maxims are the height of simplicity, leaving no room for differentiation at all.)[120]

Regarding the above-mentioned point that it appears that the ICC follows the male captus male detentus reasoning as concerns serious irregularities by the suspects "accusers"; this study is very much in favour of granting discretion, in the context of the abuse of process doctrine (or a comparable doctrine) and in the context of determining the consequences of an unlawful arrest/detention, to judges so that they balance all the relevant elements of the case. However, it is also aware of the fact that too much discretion can lead to problems, for example, in terms of equality, transparency and predictability.[121] Hence, there must be some beacons to guide this discretion.[122]

Suspects and Accused Persons in International Criminal Proceedings', Working Paper No. 27 – June 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: http://www.ggs.kuleuven.be/nieuw/publications/working%20papers/new_series/wp27.pdf), p. 20. Cf. finally Sloan (2003 B, pp. 546-547) for comparable values at the inter-State level: "By one approach, which may be summarized by the maxim male captus, male detentus, the national court would refuse jurisdiction where the circumstances of the accused's capture were sufficiently irregular. Among the reasons given by these national courts for refusing jurisdiction in such circumstances have been the following: (i) the rule of law; (ii) the integrity of the executive branch (it must not be rewarded for illegal behaviour); (iii) the integrity of the judicial branch; (iv) the fairness of the legal process; and (v) respect for state sovereignty [original footnotes omitted, ChP]." (See also n. 17 of Chapter VII.)

[118] See n. 76 and accompanying text.

[119] See n. 1 and accompanying text.

[120] See again (see also n. 76 and accompanying text of Chapter VII) Garner 2004, p. 1703, citing James Fitzjames Stephen in his 1883 History of the Criminal Law of England (Vol. 2, p. 94, n. 1): "It seems to me that legal maxims in general are little more than pert headings of chapters. They are rather minims than maxims, for they give not a particularly great but a particularly small amount of information. As often as not, the exceptions and disqualifications to them are more important than the so-called rules."

[121] See also the following concerns expressed by the Defence of Nikolić: "If the matter is simply left to a court's discretion then that may be an invitation to the continued exercise of that discretion in favour of continuing a trial; the individual's safeguard then rests solely upon the integrity of any given court and not upon the fundamental principle. If that were deemed sufficient by the international community there would be no need for the rights to be enshrined as they are in international law as well as certain regional and national jurisprudence". (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9

First of all, it is submitted that in some cases, it must be understood that there is normally only one possible outcome. For example, if it becomes clear that the OTP was involved in an abduction operation flouting all the relevant legal rules, the judges cannot but refuse jurisdiction if they want to be taken seriously as custodians of the law, whether or not that suspect was charged with serious crimes.[123] This

October 2002, para. 6. See for this motion: ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikoli[ć], 'Motion for Relief Based Inter Alia Upon Illegality of Arrest Following Upon the Prior Unlawful Kidnapping and Imprisonment of the Accused and Co-Related Abuse of Process Within the Contemplation of Discretionary Jurisdictional Relief Under Rule 72', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 17 May 2001, para. 13.) See further the final words of Zappalà's book (see Zappalà 2003, p. 258): "One of the distinctive traits of international criminal trials, at least so far, has been the flexibility of procedural rules. This feature may be explained by the relatively short life of this branch of law, and by a tradition of procedural flexibility in international courts. Today, however, with the establishment of the ICC, international criminal justice aims to become an 'ordinary' system of judicial accountability for very serious criminal offences. Therefore, increasingly flexibility in international criminal trials should be reduced: procedural rules should be drafted in more rigorous terms, and strict compliance with these rules should be ensured. Borrowing Montesquieu's words one should recall that 'les formalités de la justice sont nécessaires à la liberté'. Only by strengthening respect for procedural rules will international criminal justice be truly just and fair. It will also be perceived as such by defendants, victims, and public opinion, both in the States concerned and in the rest of the world [original footnote omitted, ChP]."

[122] Cf. Groenhuijsen and Knigge 2004, p. 154 (see n. 617 of Chapter III). See also Choo 1994 A, p. 177, writing on the inter-State context: "In my view, a mandatory stay should not be ordered in every case where a prosecution has been commenced in consequence of an illegally executed extradition. What is required, rather, is a discretionary approach based upon a weighing up of all relevant considerations. Inherent in judicial discretion is, of course, the danger of uncertainty, but this danger is likely to be minimized by the courts' gradual development of a coherent set of guidelines for particular cases. As noted earlier, considerations that a court might take into account in deciding whether to order a stay include whether physical violence was involved; whether the police were acting in circumstances of urgency, emergency, or necessity; and whether the offense charged was serious." See also ibid., p. 179: "[A] discretionary approach, based upon a weighing of all relevant considerations, is preferable because it safeguards important constitutional rights while at the same time preserving flexibility."

[123] See also (the on the inter-State context writing) Rayfuse 1993, p. 895, with the comment that Rayfuse, even though it seems that she is focusing on abductions here, sometimes uses rather broad formulations ("violation of his human rights") and the comment that human rights, which are, of course, applicable to anyone, as such do not contain a male detentus sanction, although serious violations of human rights can, of course, constitute a reason for the judge to refuse jurisdiction: "[W]here the defendant (…) is not admissible, because his presence has been secured by a violation of his human rights, the better position must be that the court lacks all jurisdiction to try him. To give the court a discretion in this matter is to invite the continued exercise of that discretion in favour of the abducting authority and to invite the court to participate in and compound the pre-existing violation of the defendant's human rights. While the UK practice may now be different as a result of the decision in Bennett, as we have seen in the US context, the courts have not exercised their discretion in favour of the abducted individual. This is perhaps not surprising given the sometimes manifestly hideous nature of the crimes with which these individuals stand charged or the policy decisions which have been made with respect to stemming certain criminal activities. However, no matter how hideous the crime, these individuals are entitled to equal protection of the law, and that includes their customary international legal rights. It is not up to the courts to decide to whom they will accord these rights. They belong to everyone. The existence and uncertainty of exercise of a discretion in this matter cannot help but bring the administration of justice into disrepute. The separation of executive and judicial powers, the requirements of an independent and impartial judiciary and of a fair trial, including the presumption of innocence, and the need to preserve the integrity of the judicial process and the rule of law all militate in view, which falls short of the test about which, according to the German Federal Constitutional Court in Al-Moayad, more recent State practice agrees that it must, in any event, lead to rejection of the male captus bene detentus rule, probably also constitutes the view of the ICC[124] and that is to be welcomed.[125] In other less obvious cases, all the above-mentioned elements, see footnote 107 and accompanying text, should play a guiding role in determining whether or not jurisdiction should be refused. For instance, if the violation was committed intentionally or was accompanied by mistreatment, the chances increase that jurisdiction is refused. In that respect, (the information provided in Chapter III on) human rights law, even if it does not contain a right to a male detentus outcome as favour of the position that there can be no jurisdiction over an individual who has been brought before the court by virtue of a State-sponsored violation of his human rights." See also Knoops 2002, pp. 263-264, referring to Rayfuse. See further International Law Association 1994, p. 163: "The objection to such a discretionary power is that abduction does not constitute an absolute bar to the exercise of jurisdiction. The most desirable approach is for a municipal court in the abducting state to be absolutely barred from exercising jurisdiction on the ground that the presence of the abductee has been secured in violation of basic human rights. The abductee should then be released and allowed to return to the state from which he has been abducted [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Cf. finally also ns. 225, 411, 414 and accompanying text of Chapter III, n. 523 and accompanying text of Chapter V, ns. 258 and 656 and accompanying text of Chapter VI and ns. 46 and 64 of Chapter VII.

---

[124] See n. 119 and accompanying text. Note that under the very broad words of the ICC judges (see n. 41 and accompanying text), a luring operation executed by the suspect's accusers could possibly also lead to the ending of the case, although much will depend here on the circumstances of the case. One can assume that many will argue that the ICC can legally approve a luring operation executed by the ICC OTP, with reference to the ICTY Dokmanović case. Cf. also Scharf 2000, p. 971: "This precedent will be useful to a permanent international criminal court, which may directly or through third parties resort to luring as a method of obtaining custody over offenders present in non-cooperating states." (See also Knoops 2002, p. 260, referring to Scharf.) However, the ICC judges must not forget either that this decision was not without criticism, see Chapter VI of this book, and furthermore (see also the text following n. 48 and accompanying text), that after the Dokmanović case was decided, the ICTY also held, in the Nikolić case: "Due process of law also includes questions such as how the Parties have been conducting themselves in the context of a particular case and how an Accused has been brought into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The finding in the Ebrahim case that the State must come to court with clean hands applies equally to the Prosecution coming to a Trial Chamber of this Tribunal." (ICTY, Trial Chamber II, Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal', Case No. IT-94-2-PT, 9 October 2002, para. 111.) Even if a luring operation cannot be compared with an abduction operation (as the one in Ebrahim), the words "come to court with clean hands" are, of course, very general and may also encompass a luring operation, although much will depend here on the exact circumstances of the case: was there a circumvention of regular procedures, was there a violation of State sovereignty, was there a violation of human rights, etc. Cf. also the following general words of the Barayagwiza case, issued after the Dokmanović case as well: "Under the doctrine of "abuse of process", proceedings that have been lawfully initiated may be terminated after an indictment has been issued if improper or illegal procedures are employed in pursuing an otherwise lawful process [emphasis added, ChP]." (ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999, para. 74.) See also ns. 50, 121 and 122 of Chapter VII and ns. 26 and 39 of the present chapter. Cf. finally the suggestion of this study, made in the Nikolić case, that the tribunal should refuse jurisdiction if employees of the tribunal itself intentionally committed serious (procedural) irregularities in the process of bringing a suspect to trial, such as an abduction. (See n. 633 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.)

[125] Cf. n. 46 and accompanying text of Chapter VII.

such, can certainly be used to channel the discretion in the balancing exercise,[126] although it must also be borne in mind, see this study's criticism regarding the over-simplified remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, that certain human rights provisions, because of their rigid language and their potential for abuse, may also be problematic.[127] Thus, even though certain indicators should be followed in the balancing exercise to ensure that the discretion is not unlimited, the ultimate responsibility should still lie with the judges because it was shown that too harsh rules may also lead to abuse[128] and because judges may always be confronted by situations not envisaged.[129]

Another observation which should be made is that this book was premised on two features of the ICC's system, namely that the ICC cannot try suspects in absentia[130] and does not have its own police force.[131] However, one can obviously imagine that if the ICC were to be endowed with such features, this could decrease the chances of the ICC judges being confronted by a male captus case in the first place. After all, in the first case, suspects could be tried even without them being present in the courtroom (meaning that there would not be a need to resort to a (male) captus). In the second case, the ICC would still have to capture the suspect, but would then be less dependant on third parties which may have an idea of what constitutes a regular arrest and detention which differs from that of the ICC.

Although this study has shown that the idea of an own international arrest team is not yet politically feasible,[132] the ICC might consider following the example of the ICTY in creating tracking teams,[133] a term which has already been presented in

---

[126] See n. 121.

[127] Cf. also Warbrick 2000, p. 495, writing on the inter-State context: "On the face of it, there are advantages to considering the treatment of the fugitive/defendant in terms of his human rights – there is here the potential capacity to bring objective standards to bear and thus, to some degree, structure the exercise of the discretionary power of the court to order a stay. (…) There are, however, obstacles to realising this potential. First, what human rights are at stake and what the consequences are of their violation in situations of this kind is far from resolved – to the extent it is, a wide power is left to national States. Second, if violations of human rights are involved, the discretionary power which characterises the abuse of process determination may be overridden by a mandatory obligation to give relief to a defendant."

[128] See n. 573 and accompanying text of Chapter X where it was explained that one cannot state beforehand that any case of serious mistreatment/torture must lead to the ending of the case for that would constitute the trigger for States which do not want to surrender their own nationals to inflict severe (physical or mental) pain or suffering upon them before surrendering them to the ICC.

[129] See also House of Lords, Lord Steyn, Regina v. Latif; Regina v. Shazad, 18 January 1996, 1 W.L.R. 112-113 [1996]: "The speeches in Ex parte Bennett conclusively establish that proceedings may be stayed in the exercise of the judge's discretion not only where a fair trial is impossible but also where it would be contrary to the public interest in the integrity of the criminal justice system that a trial should take place. An infinite variety of cases could arise. General guidance as to how the discretion should be exercised in particular circumstances will not be useful." (See n. 346 and accompanying text of Chapter V and n. 49 of the present chapter.)

[130] See n. 32 and accompanying text of Chapter I.

[131] See ns. 35-36 and accompanying text of Chapter I.

[132] See n. 107 of Chapter VI and n. 36 of Chapter VIII.

[133] See n. 106 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

the context of the ICC.[134] By this term, this study does not mean a team of investigators on the ICC premises assembling and analysing information from third parties about the whereabouts of the suspect. Such teams, of course, already exist.[135]

[134] See the presentation of David Tolbert of the ICTY during the 'Second public hearing of the Office of the Prosecutor, Session 2: NGOs and Other Experts', The Hague, 26 September 2006 (available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/Menus/ICC/Structure+of+the+Court/Office+of+the+Prosecutor/Network+with+Partners/Public+Hearings/Second+Public+Hearing/Session+2), commenting on the ICC OTP's Report on Prosecutorial Strategy, The Hague, 14 September 2006 (available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/D673DD8C-D427-4547-BC69-2D363E07274B/143708/ProsecutorialStrategy20060914_English.pdf): "Our experience in obtaining arrests is directly relevant to the 3 rd Objective of the strategic plan. [Which is "to gain the forms of cooperation necessary to mobilize and facilitate successful arrest operations", see the Report on Prosecutorial Strategy at p. 8, ChP.] In this regard, paragraph 5(a) of this Objective, which provides that while the Court itself does not have the power to effect arrests, it "should deploy substantial efforts to gathering information on the whereabouts of suspects", is particularly important. Moreover, it is important to note that this point is then linked or should be linked to "galvanizing support and cooperation for arrests and surrender" and this in turn is linked to a 3 rd point of the objective, that is to promoting cooperation among "national and international parties"[.] If we analyze these elements in the context of our experiences at the ICTY, we see that there are two elements in which (…) the Tribunal or the Court must develop expertise. We are all familiar with one aspect, which might be referred to as political or diplomatic efforts to obtain arrests. These include using diplomatic means to persuade States to fulfil their legal obligations. In this regard, various diplomatic carrots and sticks, such as in the ICTY's case conditionality concerning potential membership in the European Union (EU), have been particularly effective. Others include conditionality of foreign aid and other diplomatic and political measures. A second element is the gathering [of] information itself regarding the fugitives and their networks. This element is often overlooked in discussions related to effecting arrests, but the diplomatic and political efforts are made much more effective by having in-house expertise. At the ICTY, we call this unit the "Tracking Team", and it deploys in the region as needed and analyses information to determine where fugitives might be as well as the networks supporting them. It is very important technical expertise to have in the Office and complements diplomatic efforts. I would liken it to two hands working together, one without the other is a bit like one hand clapping." (…) [T]he Office needs "eyes and ears" of its own. (…) The principal lesson from the ICTY is that there must be carrots and sticks plus internal information-gathering by the OTP itself for diplomatic and political strategies to work. It is indeed the Prosecutor's own intelligence gathering that shows whether a State is, in fact, cooperating, thus making these carrots and sticks much more effective." Note that in the new strategic plan, the item of the tracking team will not be found, see ICC OTP's 'Prosecutorial Strategy 2009 - 2012', The Hague, 1 February 2010 (available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/66A8DCDC-3650-4514-AA62-D229D1128F65/281506/OTPProsecutorialStrategy20092013.pdf).

[135] See CPI, La Chambre Préliminaire III, Situation en R[é]publique Centrafricaine, Affaire Le Procureur c. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Demande d'arrestation provisoire de M. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo adressée au Royaume de Belgique' (Sous scellés), ICC-01/05-01/08, 23 mai 2008, para. 3: "Le Procureur a souligné l'urgence qu'il y avait pour la Chambre de traiter sa requête au regard des risques de fuite de M. Jean-Pierre Bemba. Lors de l'audience, le Procureur a soutenu que M. Jean-Pierre Bemba aurait quitté la République portugaise pour se rendre au Royaume de Belgique, dans une demeure à l'extérieur de Bruxelles qu'il compte apparemment quitter le 25 [m]ai 2008, pour une destination non connue à ce jour." (See also n. 302 of Chapter X.) See further 'Bemba in Hands of International Justice', Hirondelle News Agency, 7 July 2008 (available at: http://www.hirondellenews.com/content/view/6242/517/): "For the first time, the prosecutor set up a "tracking team", a team charged with following the actions of the leader of the Congolese opposition." See finally C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 35.

It would be a team that can also operate in the State where the suspect is thought to be residing. However, because the work of such teams consists of traditional police work (such as shadowing and observing the suspect), they must have the consent of that State, which will obviously be very difficult, if not impossible, to obtain from uncooperative States.

Allowing – under certain circumstances – trials in absentia would solve that problem.[136] This topic was already "[o]ne of the most controversial legal issues during the negotiation process"[137] of the ICC Statute, but one can expect that the debate will return with a vengeance if arrest warrants are not executed for long periods of time. The introduction of an in absentia provision into the system of the STL[138] may also constitute a catalyst in that respect.

However, the ICC is simply not (yet)[139] equipped with these features. This means that it must make (perhaps more)[140] use of the tools it already has.

In this context, it is submitted that the ICC must stay far away from dubious methods of bringing a suspect into its jurisdiction. Of course, resorting to such methods may sometimes be tempting, for instance, when arrest warrants are not executed for a long time and public criticism grows against an "ineffective ICC". However, individual ICC staff members – who do not have a "permanent" life and would like to be successful during their stay at the ICC – must always be aware of the fact that the Court they (temporarily) work for is permanent. And resorting to dubious methods to reach a short-term goal, besides the fact that it undermines, at that particular moment, the values for which the ICC stands,[141] and that it may not [136] Although it will also raise new problems, one of them being "that trials in absentia may deflate public pressure to ensure the arrest of the accused war criminal [original footnote, ChP]." (Sharp, Sr. 1997, p. 459, commenting on a recommendation from the Carnegie International Commission on the Balkans to have trials in absentia in the context of the ICTY.) Cf. also the remarks of Quintal (1998, p. 723) in n. 89 of Chapter VI (in the context of the Rule 61 proceedings).

[137] Friman 1999, p. 255.

[138] See n. 1169 and accompanying text of Chapter VI.

[139] The ICC Review Conference, which will take place in Kampala, Uganda, between 31 May and 11 June 2010, does not have these items on the agenda either.

[140] One could hereby think, for example, of the freezing of assets, see ICC, ASP, Sixth session, New York, 30 November to 14 December 2007, Report of the Bureau on cooperation, ICC-ASP/6/21, 19 October 2007, paras. 41, 68 and 71. See n. 300 of Chapter VIII with respect to the ICC's possibilities as concerns this tool.

[141] See ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006, para. 37: "A fair trial is the only means to do justice." Or in the more dramatic words of Chief Prosecutor Jackson during his opening statement before the IMT of Nuremberg on 21 November 1945: "We must never forget that the record on which we judge these defendants today is the record on which history will judge us tomorrow. To pass these defendants a poisoned chalice is to put it to our own lips as well." See Nuremberg Trial Proceedings, Vol. 2, Second Day, Wednesday, 21 November 1945, Morning Session, available at: http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/11-21-45.asp. Cf. finally the following words of Judge Mansfield from the inter-State context: "Society is the ultimate loser when, in order to convict the guilty, it uses methods that lead to decreased respect for the law." (US Court of Appeals, Second be that 'successful' at all given that such tactics can lead to the ending of the case (see supra),[142] can seriously damage the ICC's mission in the long run.

This is because the ICC needs the practical support of the international community, especially because it does not have its own enforcement arm.[143] Hence, to ensure that it has the constant goodwill of States, the ICC's enforcers, it must always prosecute a suspect in a fair, law-abiding way.[144] Consequently, ICC officials should not focus too strongly on the specific suspects with whom they are dealing at the time: they should focus on the fairness of the system in general, on the system which will apply to any suspect who will appear before the ICC. If sceptical, but mighty States (such as the US) see that the ICC is a fair court, they may more readily become a party to the ICC Statute, which will in turn lead to greater support and a more powerful enforcement arm of the ICC.[145]

Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267), p. 274. See also n. 58 and accompanying text of Chapter V.)

[142] See also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 59.

[143] This is, by the way, also valid for the inter-State context, where States are sometimes also dependent on other States, for example, in extradition cases, see Schultz 1984, pp. 110-111 (commenting on the 1982 decision of the Swiss Federal Court in the case of X): "Vorkommnisse, wie sie sich in dem hier geschilderten Auslieferungsfall abspielten, sind nicht nur eines Staates, der sich als Rechtsstaat ausgibt, unwürdig. Sie sind außerdem überaus bedauerlich, weil sie allen denen Auftrieb geben, die der zwischenstaatlichen Rechtshilfe jeder Art mit Mißtrauen begegnen und überall Mißbrauch wittern. Der kurzfristige Vorteil, einmal einen ins Ausland entwischten Angeschuldigten, der schwerer Delikte bezichtigt wird, auf eine solche Weise zur Strecke zu bringen, wiegt die dadurch hervorgerufene, lange nachwirkende Erschütterung des Vertrauens in dieses wichtige Mittel zwischenstaatlicher Zusammenarbeit nie auf [original footnote omitted, ChP]." (See n. 428 of Chapter V.)

[144] See also Stapleton 1999, p. 536: "For the ICC to succeed as a viable permanent tribunal, it must guarantee the accused a fair trial. (…) [U]nfair trials could seriously undermine the legitimacy of the ICC and limit its chances for success." This is so, even if this means that sometimes, the ICC may have to issue decisions which a particular State or organisation will not like, cf. the Barayagwiza and Todorović cases. However, with respect to the Barayagwiza case, it must be repeated that the criticism in that decision was perhaps not so much directed towards the fact that the ICTR can issue a male captus male detentus decision, but more that it did so in this specific case (where the violations were probably indeed not so serious as to refuse jurisdiction) and that it did not properly take care of the aftermath of its decision, forgetting that it has a more general responsibility to fight impunity, whether before the ICTR or not.

[145] See also ibid., p. 546: "A fair trial is important at both the national and international level, but at the international level the importance is heightened for both practical and ideological reasons. Practically, the ICC depends on the acceptance as well as financial and administrative support of the international community. Additionally, the ICC depends on this community to turn over individuals for prosecution." (The ideological reason will come back in a moment.) See also ibid., pp. 577-578, where Stapleton makes a comparison between the ad hoc ICTY and the permanent ICC: "Thus, the ICC cannot make rules to fit a specific situation and cannot justify deviating from international standards of fairness; doing so would endanger the Tribunal's existence as it would deter states from cooperating and would invalidate the justification for removing trials from national forums." See finally ibid., p. 609: "If the ICC is to be successful it needs respect, it needs state cooperation, and it needs to be created by a statute that is structurally sound and presided over by a judiciary willing to interpret this statute in such a way that the court is able to fulfill its mandate – to provide effective and fair trials in situations where national courts are unable."

Furthermore, and in the more distant future, showing respect for fairness and human rights may also lead to fewer human rights violations at the national level, which, in turn, will ensure that the ICC's goal to put an end to impunity and to contribute to the prevention of international crimes[146] can be realised and thus that the ICC can be seen as an effective court.[147]

As a result, this study argues that if judges are confronted by the dilemma presented in the very first chapter of this book, namely effectiveness (in the sense of achieving prosecutions and convictions) versus fairness, they should always opt for [146] See the ICC's Preamble.

[147] See the following words of Edwards (2001, p. 334), reminding of the already-mentioned (see n. 173 of Chapter X) model function of the ICC towards the national level: "[A]ffording suspects and accused persons full rights is consistent with eradicating impunity and with full human rights for all, and will ultimately impact society positively. Respecting rights of suspects and the accused will educate officials and the public about the sanctity of human rights, and will encourage human rights compliance. Human rights education at the international level will likely trickle down to the grassroots. As governments and citizens become more aware of the need to enforce these rights, fewer human rights violations will occur." See also the remainder of the words of Stapleton from n. 145 (words which were also mentioned earlier in n. 173 of Chapter X): "Ideologically, one of the purposes of an international tribunal like the ICC is to extend "the rule of law and … [to bring] … national courts up to the standards of international law." International human rights and humanitarian conventions are committed to providing an expansive view of rights and to extending the rights of individuals so that national governments will follow their example. Allowing the ICC, an aggressive enforcer of human rights, to deviate from the minimum international standards for a fair trial would undermine the credibility of existing human rights norms. How can a national government be expected to follow "minimum" standards for a fair trial if an international tribunal does not [original footnote omitted, ChP]?" One could also refer here to international law violations more generally (such as violations of another State's sovereignty). If the ICC judges do not refuse jurisdiction in case ICC staff have orchestrated an abduction violating a State's sovereignty, this can have an effect on the inter-State context, where respect for another State's sovereignty is even more crucial. See also ns. 638-640 and accompanying text of Chapter VI (in the context of the Nikolić case and the ICTY). Hence, the effect of an ICC decision, even if decided in a sui generis context, may not be limited to that own context. That is arguably also the case for a decision like the one of 14 December 2006, even if it focused heavily on its own provisions. Manning (2007, p. 839), however, does not agree, writing that "the Jurisdictional Appeal Decision will have no impact on the international law debate between the old male captus, bene detentus principle and the increasingly-recognized abuse of process doctrine. Because the decision is grounded entirely in the ICC provisions, its relevance beyond the Court is curtailed." However, it is very well possible that a national court focusing on a restricted fair trial notion refers to the ICC's second (male detentus?) formulation – "[w]here the breaches of the rights of the accused are such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence within the framework of his[/her] rights, no fair trial can take place and the proceedings can be stayed" – to support its own stance on the male captus issue. Conversely, more progressive courts may refer to the Court's first formulation – "[w]here fair trial becomes impossible because of breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect or the accused by his/her accusers, it would be a contradiction in terms to put the person on trial" – to back their own vision that jurisdiction must be refused in any male captus situation (including, for example, luring) which can be seen as a breach of a fundamental right (the right to liberty and security) if that breach would undermine the notion of a fair trial broadly perceived, whether or not one is dealing with a suspect of international crimes: "Unfairness in the treatment of the suspect or the accused may rupture the process to an extent making it impossible to piece together the constituent elements of a fair trial. In those circumstances, the interest of the world community to put persons accused of the most heinous crimes against humanity on trial, great as it is, is outweighed by the need to sustain the efficacy of the judicial process as the potent agent of justice." (The third formulation.)

the latter concept. Only fairness can engender real effectiveness, meaning effectiveness in the long term. If the ICC conducts unfair trials to attain short-term effectiveness, it will never be truly effective.[148]

In this respect, the words of Judge Woodhouse from the New Zealand Hartley case that "this must never become an area where it will be sufficient to consider that the end has justified the means"[149] are also definitely applicable to the ICC context. The fight against impunity must be fought, but must be fought fairly. It must never become a true 'war on impunity', a term which hints at diminished respect for the law,[150] cf. also the abductions of Alvarez-Machain (in the context of the 'war on drugs')[151] and Abu Omar (in the context of the 'war on terror').[152]

Another point which cannot be made strongly enough in this discussion is that introducing new tools for the ICC to increase its capabilities to start a trial, such as a provision on allowing trials in absentia (if that possibility were to be introduced in the future), runs the risk of masking the real problem, namely why the enforcement arm of the ICC, formed by States party to the ICC Statute (and States ordered by the UNSC to cooperate with the ICC), is not functioning as it should. It must be borne in mind that States have the prime obligation to arrest and surrender suspects and that this obligation must be taken very seriously.

This means, for example, that if suspects cannot be apprehended by the custodial State, other States (or States working together in an international peacekeeping force) should assist that State in its efforts. Not only logistically or financially,[153] but perhaps also with an actual arrest team. As long as the custodial State provides its consent to such an operation on its territory, the arrest itself is executed lawfully[154]

---

[148] See again Stapleton 1999, p. 544: "[I]f the ICC is unable to guarantee minimum procedural rights necessary to fair trial or uphold international standards of behavior, it is ineffective; (…) [I]neffective prosecutions undermine the purpose and jurisdiction of the ICC, thus undermining the Court's chance for success."

[149] See n. 129 and accompanying text of Chapter V.

[150] See the famous phrase of Cicero from Pro Milone: silent [enim] leges inter arma, "[l]aws are silent amid arms" (Garner 2004, p. 1758). See also n. 18 of Chapter I.

[151] See Baker 2004, p. 1376.

[152] See ns. 18-22 and accompanying text of Chapter I.

[153] In this context, one could also think of financial rewards for citizens of that State for information or assistance which will lead, in the end, to the arrest of suspects of international crimes, comparable with the 'US Rewards for Justice Program', discussed in n. 115 of Chapter VI (which is, of course, not (yet) focusing on the ICC). See also Scharf 2000, p. 951 who notes, after having discussed the ICTY context (where this program offered a reward of $ 5 million for such information and assistance): "The ICC could similarly benefit from the institution of a rewards program. The amount required for reward offers is a relatively small price compared to the costs of running the ICC". A comparable tool could indeed be used by the ICC, with the comment that it should be clearly understood by all that awards will only be granted for information and assistance in the arrest efforts of the competent authorities and not for actually turning in the suspect in question, which may lead to chaotic wild-west scenarios executed by private bounty hunters. Scenarios which, in serious cases, may even lead to the dismissal of the case, cf. the case of Nikolić and ns. 115, 281 and 444 of Chapter VI.

[154] In the case of an international peacekeeping force, this would, among other things, require a clear legal mandate to arrest suspects for the ICC. See also n. 40 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.

and non-arbitrarily and all the (human) rights of the suspect are respected during the operation, there would be nothing wrong with such support.[155]

As regards uncooperative States, third States should turn to the carrot-and-stick method which has worked so well for the ICTY, meaning that they must stress that cooperation with the ICC will lead to financial/political support and that non-cooperation will lead to embargoes/sanctions/political isolation.[156] Such a method would have more legitimacy if it were executed within the context of a collectivity of States, such as international organisations. In this context, reference should also be made to the role of the UNSC. While acknowledging that this organ's relationship with the ICC is a difficult one (it should be remembered that three of its [155] Cf. the concept of "assisted arrest", introduced by Gillett (see also n. 56 of Chapter VIII), who suggests agreements "between peacekeeping forces and the territorial State in which they were located, granting the former the authority to carry out arrests in the host state's territory. Ideally, such agreements would contain "assisted arrest" clauses allowing peace-keepers to execute arrest warrants and to hand the accused directly to the ICC in cases of substantial or total collapse of the State's judicial or governmental infrastructure." (Gillett 2008, p. 21.) Gillett even proposes in this context the creation, by the ICC's ASP, of a multilateral reciprocal treaty, see ibid., p. 27: "The acceptance of ad hoc assisted arrest operations, while a positive development in the struggle to try those accused of the most serious crimes known to mankind, would not be an ideal long-term solution to the problem of impunity. To provide an ongoing, regulated basis for assisted arrests to be conducted in States unable to execute warrants through their own agents, the Assembly of State Parties of the ICC would need to conclude an assisted arrest agreement as a subsidiary instrument to the Rome Statute. Within this agreement, State Parties would provide a prior and continuing consent to assistance in executing ICC arrest warrants in situations where they are unable to do so through their own agents, and also would reciprocally agree to aide in the execution of ICC arrest warrants within other State Parties' territories, when those States are unable to do so [original footnote omitted, ChP]." Cf. also Rastan 2008, p. 454: "The 'unable' state could invite capable states or an international peacekeeping presence on its territory to assist it in fulfilling its duties towards the Court. Moreover, although the Court's non-compliance procedure is normally discussed with reference to a state's 'unwillingness' to co-operate, the Court could possibly treat 'inability' also as a failure to comply with a co-operation request. Rather than indicating the international wrongfulness of non-co-operation, the purpose of such a finding would be to invite the ASP or the Security Council, as appropriate, to consider the matter with a view to promoting co-operation. Such considerations may, for example, take the form of the Security Council modifying the mandate of relevant peacekeeping operations to enable regional co-operation and co-ordination with a territorial state that is willing but otherwise unable to perform arrest and surrender operations, or may lead to the exertion of political pressure through issue-linkage to secure co-operation from a hitherto 'unwilling' state [original footnote omitted, ChP]." See finally the more general words of Hall at ns. 54-55 and accompanying text of Chapter VIII.

[156] See also Ciampi 2006, p. 736: "[T]he main incentive available to the international community to compel a State to cooperate with the ICC (and, more generally, with international criminal tribunals) is through political pressure, eventually accompanied by the imposition (or threat) of sanctions or other enforcement measures against the non-cooperating State." Roper and Barria (2008, pp. 466-467) see especially a role for economic pressure here: "We regard political pressure by third parties, whether by states or non-state actors, as generally having a limited ability to enhance the bargaining effectiveness of the ICC with regard to the capture of indictees. Instead, military or peacekeeping pressure and especially economic pressure are more successful tools available to third parties to enhance the leverage of the ICC. (…) [W]e argue more generally that significant economic pressure may be one of the most effective tools available to third parties in order to support the activity of the ICC. (…) Especially for states which are highly export-dependent, third-party economic pressure may be one of the most important means by which the international community can assist the ICC in securing the apprehension of suspects." See also n. 116 of Chapter VI and 21 of Chapter VIII.

five permanent members (China, the US and Russia) are not States Parties to the ICC): if that organ decides that certain States must cooperate with the ICC and those States refuse to do so, the UNSC should act, much more than it has done until now. The Council should understand that its soft responses to non-cooperation from States such as Sudan – and one could also refer here to the Council's role in the context of the ICTY – seriously undermines not only the fight against impunity but also – and this may be considered to be more relevant for the Council itself – its own credibility. It is, of course, recognised that demanding cooperation is very difficult if the ultimate leader of that State is himself charged with international crimes (as in the case of Sudan) as one can assume that such a leader would never turn himself in to the ICC.[157] However, in such a case, the UNSC must, to borrow the words of the former Chief Prosecutor of the ICTY and ICTR Carla Del Ponte, [157] In the case of Sudan, there is the additional problem that the leader is also involved in important peace talks, which brings in the ever-returning question of peace versus justice (see also the situation in Uganda). However, and without wanting or being able to properly address this interesting question here, a question about which entire books can be written, it can be briefly argued that the two terms are not mutually exclusive; there cannot be any peace without justice. One does always wonder why those arguing in favour of the peace process and against arrest warrants of the main negotiator(s) do not see this either. (In the context of Sudan, one could refer here to the role of the AU Member States which, with a reservation of Chad, decided not to cooperate with the ICC in the arrest and surrender of Al Bashir, see AU, Assembly of the African Union, Thirteenth Ordinary Session, 1 – 3 July 2009, Sirte, Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (Assembly/AU/Dec. 243-267 (XIII) Rev. 1, Assembly/AU/Decl.1-6(XIII), Decisions and Declarations, adopted on 3 July 2009 (available at: http://www.africa-union.org/root/AU/Conferences/2009/july/summit/docs/DECISIONS/ASSEMBLY%20AU%20DEC%20243%20-%20267%20(XIII)%20_E.pdf), 'Decision on the Meeting of African States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC)', Doc. Assembly/AU/13(XIII), Assembly/AU/Dec.245(XIII) Rev. 1, para. 10.) It is difficult to understand why a peace process would be so much dependable on one or a few persons. If those arguing in favour of peace are really committed to the peace process – note, however, that some persons asserting that justice should yield to peace are arguably not genuinely interested in peace but only use this argument in an effort to save their own skin and that serious peace talks may only begin because of the political pressure caused by the arrest warrants – they will ensure that peace is achieved, whatever it takes and whoever is main responsible for the talks. In fact, a peace agreement may even be more easily reached without the persons most loudly claiming that arrest warrants are obstructing the peace talks. See in that respect Goldstone, who notes that "specific evidence suggests that without the work of the ICTY – without the indictment of Radovan Karadzic and Radko Mladic by the ICTY and their consequent isolation by the world community – there would have been no Dayton Peace Agreement." (Goldstone 1998, p. 205.) While taking into account that Karadžić and Mladić did not have the same position as Al Bashir has know, even a President's position is not sacred and can be effectively undermined. See again Goldstone: "I hear the refrain, "But if these are the leaders of an important constituency, how can we avoid negotiating with them?" As you cannot choose your family, so you cannot choose the leaders you have to negotiate with. But history teaches us that leaders come and leaders go. There is nothing immutable about the political process. Indeed, we all know that the political process is a fickle one. Political support is based on (assumed) legitimacy and capacity. Few people would, if they knew the truth of the ambitions and associated misconduct of leaders responsible for genocide and crimes against humanity, long continue to support such a leader. If this is crediting humanity too much, then I rely on the alternative that few would long continue to support a leader who, because of his or her international political condemnation and isolation, is unable to represent her or his constituency meaningfully in the international community or who, even worse, has brought on his or her constituency military, diplomatic, economic, and cultural sanctions and embargos." (Ibid., p. 206.)

"be creative in finding ways to bring to bear the sort of pressures that will produce results".[158] It should connect such political and economic sanctions to the non-cooperation that the leader's role domestically is challenged, in addition to publicly demand from States to arrest that person if he enters their territory. Hopefully, such measures would not only lead to the suspect being branded as an international pariah[159] (an effect which would also be reached after a trial in absentia) but one day also to that suspect's surrender. In the ultimate case, after years of non-compliance – and possibly after the extension of the mandate of the peacekeeping force already on the ground has brought no relief[160] – the Council may even allow, as an ultimum remedium, an arrest operation by foreign States on the territory of the uncooperative State,[161] even though one can assume that it is very unlikely that such a politically risky undertaking – not only for the States in the Council approving such an operation but also for the States executing the actual operation – will occur very soon.[162]

In short, the international community must (better) understand that it has major responsibilities in the functioning, effectiveness[163] and thus success and credibility of the ICC.[164] In the same vein, critics should recognise that if arrest warrants are not executed, they should criticise not the ICC for being ineffective, but the States

---

[158] UNSC, Fifty-fourth year, 4063rd meeting, 10 November 1999, S/PV.4063, p. 4 (see also n. 120 of Chapter VI). Cf. also n. 121 of the same chapter and its reference to the Taylor and Lockerbie cases.

[159] See again (see n. 157) Goldstone, but now ten years later: "The arrest warrants for President Bashir reveal to the world what type of regime holds power in Khartoum. They should also push the Security Council to apply real pressure on the Sudanese government. The council and its member states should make President Bashir's government an international pariah, imposing sanctions against its leaders and, most important, Sudan's oil exports, which have so effectively insulated the regime." (R. Goldstone, 'Catching a War Criminal in the Act', The New York Times, 15 July 2008.) See also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 25, n. 78.

[160] See n. 56 of Chapter VIII and the ideas of Ryngaert as concerns arrests of peacekeeping forces in unwilling States. See also the more general words of Hall at ns. 54-55 and accompanying text of the same chapter.

[161] See n. 157 of Chapter III.

[162] In fact, in the context of the Harun case (and before he filed his application requesting the issuance of a warrant for the arrest of Al Bashir on 14 July 2008), even ICC Chief Prosecutor Moreno Ocampo himself stated that he would not be in favour of such an operation, see P. Eichstaedt, 'ICC Chief Prosecutor Talks Tough', Institute for war & peace reporting, 28 April 2008 (available at: http://www.iwpr.net/?p=acr&s=f&o=344364&apc_state=henh): "Moreno-Ocampo said the international community also had to get tougher with Sudan, and push for the arrest of two individuals wanted by the court for crimes in connection with the ongoing war in the western region of Darfur. (…) "Arresting Haroun today will break the criminal system in Darfur," Moreno-Ocampo said. However, he would not support military intervention to accomplish this. "Arresting a minister is not a military operation," he said, "but a political one."" See also C. Ryngaert, 'The International Prosecutor: Arrest and Detention', Working Paper No. 24 – April 2009, Leuven Centre for Global Governance Studies (available at: https://www.law.kuleuven.be/iir/nl/onderzoek/wp/wp133e.pdf), p. 22, n. 62.

[163] See also Kaul and Kreß 2000, p. 157: "[T]he issue of cooperation goes to the heart of an effective Court". See also Fernández de Gurmendi and Friman 2002, p. 328.

[164] See also Scharf 2000, p. 979: "In the end, the ICC will succeed only where international justice and power can be brought together."

which refuse to cooperate.[165] If the international community does not adequately react in the event of non-compliance, States undermine the system of the ICC – of which they constitute the enforcement pillar[166] – and hence the fight against impunity themselves.[167] The international community has, in the words of Rastan, a responsibility to enforce here:

> The successful enforcement of the Court's decisions will (…) require the assumption of responsibilities by the international community should an individual State fail in its duties to cooperate with the Court. Much like the preventative principle expressed under the responsibility to protect to which it was a precursor,[[168]] or the threat of united reprisal action under collective security arrangements, the system is predicated on the successful operation of a covenant of undertakings between the individual State and the collective. In the context of the ICC, such a covenant is formed between the States that are party to the Rome Statute, and may, in the case of a Security Council referral, be extended to embrace all UN Member States as a result of their duties under the Organisation's Charter. (…) [S]uch enforcement will only be effective, however, if the ICC can rely on unity of thought and action from the collective community of States. If the non-compliance procedure is to genuinely influence State behaviour, therefore, the support for justice must be matched by concerted, consistent and unified action by the international community under a notional responsibility to enforce [original footnotes omitted ChP].[169] [165] See also the following words of ICC Chief Prosecutor Moreno Ocampo: "[N]ations around the world need to understand that without their co-operation, investigations cannot take place, arrests cannot be made, and indicted criminals cannot be prosecuted. If none of this happens, it will not be a failure of the courts but instead of the global community that has not understood its own obligation to act inter-dependently." (Colloquium of Prosecutors of International Criminal Tribunals on "the Challenges of International Criminal Justice", held in Arusha, Tanzania, from 25 November to 27 November 2004, Report of Proceedings (available at: http://www.ictr.org/ENGLISH/colloquium04/reports/final_report.pdf), p. 6.) See also n. 219 of Chapter VI.

---

[166] See also the opening remarks of ICC President Kirsch at the fifth session of the ASP in The Hague on 23 November 2006 (available at: http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/A0F5C933-65AC-4621-B607-C3F25D0C22B7/278555/PK_20061123_en.pdf): "In establishing the ICC, States set up a system designed on two pillars. The Court itself is the judicial pillar. The enforcement pillar belongs to States." See also ICC, ASP, Sixth session, New York, 30 November to 14 December 2007, Report of the Bureau on cooperation, ICC-ASP/6/21, 19 October 2007, para. 39 and Rastan 2009, pp. 164-165.

[167] To again quote ICC Chief Prosecutor Moreno Ocampo: "[M]ore State cooperation in terms of securing arrests is needed. For the ultimate efficiency and credibility of the Court you created, arrests are required. The Court can contribute to galvanize international efforts, and support coalitions of those willing to proceed with such arrest. But ultimately, the decision to uphold the law will be the decision of States Parties. If States Parties do not actively support the Court, in this area as in others, then they are actively undermining it." (Moreno Ocampo 2009, p. 12.) See also Rastan 2008, p. 454, referring to Moreno Ocampo. (Note that the 2009 contribution of Moreno Ocampo stems from a speech from 25 June 2007.) See finally ibid., p. 456: "Unless the duty of states to co-operate in the fight against impunity is matched by the necessary degree of unity and support from the international community, the enforcement pillar simply will not hold. For, ultimately, the treaty signed in Rome should be viewed not merely as the creation of a court, but rather as the establishment of a system, a global system comprising a network of powers and duties between the ICC and nation-states."

[168] See for this concept Subsection 2.1.1.3 of Chapter III.

[169] Rastan 2009, p. 182. See also Rastan 2008, pp. 453-454.

4 EPILOGUE

It must be stressed that this study has focused on the ICC's current position on the male captus issue. That necessarily means that Section 2 of this chapter 'merely' constitutes a picture of a situation at a given moment in time. In addition, it must be admitted that this picture is somewhat blurred since the definitive current position of the ICC is not very clear – something to which the ICC judges should pay more attention in the future. As a result, the answer to the central question of this study is, necessarily, restricted as well. However, it is to be hoped that the reader will recognise that the real value of his study will be found not so much in its, unavoidably, limited conclusions but rather in its elaborate and more timeless corpus, in its effort to position the complex male captus topic into the equally intricate ICC context.

The ICC is a permanent institution and will undoubtedly be confronted by new male captus situations in the future, situations which may include those which have not yet occurred in the ICC context, such as luring situations and abductions. Hopefully, this study (including its critical observations as can be found in Subsection 2.3 and Section 3 of this chapter), or the discussions which it may engender, will inspire and help the ICC when it is confronted by a new male captus situation to issue a decision which does (more) justice to its difficult but commendable objective, namely to fight impunity in a fair way. A fight, as was argued in Section 3 of this chapter, that can only be won if the international community takes its responsibility as the ICC's enforcer seriously.

SUMMARY

In Part 1 (and Chapter I) of this book, the reader was introduced to the subject of this study. The infamous abduction of Adolf Eichmann in Argentina on 11 May 1960 and the recent kidnapping of suspected terrorist Abu Omar in Italy on 17 June 2003 showed that the use of irregular means was and is still considered an option in apprehending suspects, especially when the interests are (considered to be) strong.

Since the International Criminal Court (ICC) also has to deal with suspects of serious crimes, it was considered what the position of this Court, arguably the most important institution in the field of international criminal justice, is towards suspects who claim that the way they were brought into the Court's jurisdiction was irregular (male captus). Basically, would it opt – taking into account, of course, that much would depend on the exact circumstances of the case – for effectiveness (in the sense of achieving prosecutions and convictions) and would it continue to exercise its jurisdiction notwithstanding the male captus (male captus bene detentus) or would it be of the opinion that values such as fairness, human rights and the integrity of its proceedings demand that in the case of a male captus, the exercise of jurisdiction must be refused (male captus male detentus/ex iniuria ius non oritur)?

This led to the following central question:

How does the ICC currently cope with the dilemmas that a male captus case can give rise to and how should this approach be assessed?

For this purpose, it was explained that two evaluative frameworks would be created; an external one (to find out how similar or different the ICC male captus position was to the position of other courts that have dealt with this problem before) and an internal one (to find out how the ICC position is to be assessed in relation to its own law pursuant to Article 21 of the ICC Statute).

Besides answering this specific central question, it was made clear that this study also had two other objectives, namely 1) to more generally combine two fascinating subjects which have not previously been put together in one book (the ICC and the male captus bene detentus maxim) and 2) to make a contribution to the male captus discussion itself, to the discussion as to how ICC judges and judges in general can best deal with alleged irregularities in the pre-trial phase of their case, to the discussion on how proceedings can be achieved which are considered both effective and fair.

In Part 2 of this study, the male captus bene detentus maxim itself was scrutinised.

Chapter II looked at the origin of the maxim and noted, among other things, that even though male captus bene detentus has often been labelled in literature as a(n "ancient" or "old") Roman maxim, a modest inquiry into Roman criminal law showed that the maxim did not seem to have its roots in antiquity at all and that the four-word Latin phrase may in fact be relatively modern.

In any case, the oldest text in which this study could find the maxim is M.H. Cardozo's article 'When Extradition Fails, Is Abduction the Solution?', which was published in the American Journal of International Law of January 1961.

Chapter II also looked into the origin of the reasoning behind the maxim and concluded that the legal reasoning of the English Ex Parte Susannah Scott case, decided by Lord Chief Justice Tenterden of the Court of King's Bench on Tuesday, 19 May 1829, is probably the oldest male captus bene detentus reasoning with a truly multi-jurisdictional, international dimension – the 'target dimension' of this study.

In Chapter III, the different elements of the maxim were thoroughly analysed with help of four main questions: 1) "Which male captus situations exist?", 2) "What is violated by these male captus situations?", 3) "Who violates?" and 4) "What are the consequences of such violations?"

In the discussion of the first main question, it was first of all explained that even though male captus situations can encompass every pre-trial irregularity which can be seen to have occurred within the context of a certain case (including, for example, an irregular pre-trial detention), Chapter III would focus on three basic male captus situations which looked at the irregularity of the apprehension: disguised extradition, luring and kidnapping/abduction. As these situations originated from the horizontal, inter-State context, it was made clear that that context would be the principal background against which Chapter III would be discussed.

After a discussion of these three basic male captus situations, it was explained which values those situations could violate (State sovereignty, human rights – the two most important being the right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily, rights which arguably have customary international law/general international law status – and the more general rule of law concept) and which kinds of exceptions could apply so that a violation does not occur: consent, self-defence and humanitarian grounds (as concerns a violation of State sovereignty) and war or other public emergency (as regards a violation of human rights).

As regards the human rights context, two important provisions were discussed, namely Article 9, paragraph 1 of the ICCPR and Article 5, paragraph 1 of the ECHR. Alongside a more theoretical examination of both provisions, it was examined how the human rights bodies supervising the ICCPR (namely the HRC) and the ECHR (namely the (now defunct) ECmHR and the ECtHR) had interpreted these provisions in the context of alleged male captus cases.

An interesting observation stemming from this context was that there is a difference discernible between, on the one hand, the ECtHR and ECmHR, which still find the attitude of the 'injured' State important in determining whether a kidnapping/abduction violates human rights, and, on the other, the HRC, which only appears to focus on the interests of the individual and thus may conclude that a human rights violation has occurred, even when the 'injured' State has colluded in the operation and thus even when there is no problem from a classical (inter-State) international law point of view.

More generally, it appeared that whereas the HRC only looks at the interests of the individual, the European institutions also take the other side of the coin into account, namely the importance of cooperation between States in prosecuting alleged criminals – a reasoning which was very well articulated in the famous Öcalan case. A reasoning which can also be abused in order to condone rather questionable pre-trial proceedings. In that respect, it is not strange that literature has criticised several cases decided by the European institutions, including the Öcalan case, for (implicitly) supporting the male captus bene detentus maxim.

The discussion of the third main question of Chapter III – "Who violates?" – made clear that not only States/State officials, but also private individuals may be involved in the different male captus situations. It addressed the controversial issue of whether private individuals as such can violate values like State sovereignty and human rights and concluded that there is no clear-cut answer to this question. As a result, it was suggested, using the example of a kidnapping of a person by private individuals in the context of the tribunals, that one could argue more generally that even if one is of the opinion that private individuals, in principle, cannot have violated that person's right to liberty and security or the injured State's sovereignty, it seems hard to view that abduction as a purely private violation of domestic law either. Because the abduction is the reason why the suspect is now standing before his judges, it has gained a certain public dimension. Thus, and without maintaining that the tribunal in such a case has violated the person's right to liberty and security or the injured State's sovereignty, one could argue that a (wrong akin to a) violation of that person's right to liberty and security or the injured State's sovereignty has nonetheless occurred in the context of the tribunal case and that the tribunal ought to repair this violation. Obviously, the fact that such a violation/wrong has been perpetrated by private individuals may/should then also be taken into account when determining its consequences.

After this discussion, the less controversial point of how conduct of private individuals can be attributed to a State was explored with help of the ILC's Draft articles on responsibility of States for internationally wrongful acts (such as Article 11 on conduct acknowledged and adopted by a State as its own), the Eichmann case and the concept of due diligence.

The fourth and final main question of this chapter dealt with the consequences of the different violations. In this context, topics such as reparation (such as a return of the suspect in the case of a violation of State sovereignty), remedies (such as a release of the suspect in the case of a violation of the right to liberty and security) and abuse of process (such as a stay of the proceedings in the case of a violation of the rule of law) were addressed. In addition, it was examined how those different consequences were to be viewed when compared with the male detentus outcome, that is, the refusal to exercise jurisdiction.

An important point made in the final pages of this chapter was that the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful (arrest and) detention (see Article 9, paragraph 4 of the ICCPR and Article 5, paragraph 4 of the ECHR) is arguably problematic; if a person has been the victim of an unlawful arrest/detention (but not one which is so serious that it leads to the ending of the case), he must, strictly speaking, be released. However, a release does not preclude a new arrest on the spot and a new exercise of jurisdiction by the court. This is because the above-mentioned provisions simply speak of a release (as such) and not of, for example, a release/dismissal of the case with prejudice to the Prosecutor, meaning that the Prosecutor is barred from starting a new trial against the suspect after the latter's release. Hence, a new arrest is not precluded, especially if the suspect is charged with serious crimes and prosecution is considered to be of utmost importance. In such a case, the prosecuting authorities could assert that this 'remedy' (the 'release') has repaired the initial iniuria of the irregularity and that the trial can continue as normal. However, in that case, the suspect would only be granted a pro forma remedy which does not comport with the idea that a remedy must be real and effective, see Article 2, paragraph 3 (a) of the ICCPR and Article 13 of the ECHR. In addition, the pro forma release does not take account of the exact seriousness of the irregularity. In other words: it is not only a pro forma remedy but also an over-simplified remedy.

As a result, it was suggested that it would be better if a judge were to avoid this problematic remedy of release and would, if he determines that a person's arrest/detention is unlawful, simply grant the most appropriate remedy which takes into account all the specifics of the case, not only the seriousness of the male captus, but also the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes and the importance of having the case continued. If one follows that route, then one can still satisfy the common sense idea behind the immediate re-arrest mentioned above, namely that suspects of serious crimes must be prosecuted if possible – although a male detentus outcome must, of course, also not be excluded for these suspects – but one will also avoid the strange pro forma release and immediate re-arrest and replace it with real remedies, such as a reduction of the sentence and/or compensation. The judge can then take the exact seriousness of the irregularity into account in determining how much the sentence should be reduced or how much compensation one should accord the suspect. Such a solution would arguably be fairer to the suspect and more capable of putting flexibility into the system. Furthermore, this solution also avoids the (justified) criticism one may expect from various actors if a suspect of serious crimes is released for an irregularity which is not so serious as to lead to the ending of the case (in such serious cases, the public must understand that the court has no option but to refuse jurisdiction and to release (but now in a 'real' way) the suspect), but which nevertheless ensures that the detention must be qualified as unlawful and that, strictly speaking, the suspect must be released. Even if that suspect, given his alleged serious crimes, would probably be re-arrested on the spot, one can assume that the public/the international community/the victims will not grasp how, for example, a suspect of genocide can be released because he has not been promptly informed of the reasons for his arrest, especially if that person is not re-arrested and subsequently flees.

After these rather theoretical chapters on the male captus bene detentus maxim, Part 3 of this study delved into practice, with the purpose of creating the external evaluative framework with which the current ICC male captus position could be compared.

Chapter IV contained a brief introduction, explaining how the biggest part of this book was going to be tackled methodologically.

In Chapter V, male captus case law stemming from the context between States was critically described and analysed. The chapter was divided in three categories, addressing dozens of inter-State cases stemming from arguably the two most important legal systems (common and civil law) and a third category of interesting cases which did not (clearly) fall under either category. All three categories looked at both older cases and more recent cases (the more recent cases starting with the 1974 case of Toscanino) in the hope of seeing more clearly whether the maxim was developing in a certain direction or not.

Before turning to the main conclusions of this chapter, which were summarised in Chapter VII, the general features of the intervening Chapter VI should be discussed here.

In Chapter VI, male captus case law stemming from the context between States and international(ised) criminal tribunals was – again critically – described and analysed. The focus was on arguably the two most important international criminal tribunals, the ICTY and ICTR. As a result, not were only ten male captus cases decided by these UN ad hoc Tribunals extensively discussed (Dokmanović, Todorović, Milošević, Nikolić, Tolimir and Karadžić (ICTY) and Barayagwiza, Semanza, Kajelijeli and Rwamakuba (ICTR)), but the main characteristics of the vertical cooperation and transfer regime of these Tribunals were also reviewed. It was explained that this regime was seemingly primarily focused on efficiency, on the obligation of States to transfer suspects, and, to a lesser extent, on the rights of those (to be) transferred. Nevertheless, it was also noted that case law had repaired some of the deficiencies on paper, such as the absence of a right to habeas corpus, a right to challenge the lawfulness of one's detention and to be released in the case of an unlawful (arrest or) detention. Finally, a number of interesting strategies to obtain custody of the suspect were addressed, such as the use of sealed indictments, peacekeeping forces, tracking teams and political pressure from third States and organisations (think of the carrot-and-stick method with respect to finances and membership of organisations).

In contrast, only a few general remarks were devoted to the system of legal assistance in the context of the internationalised criminal tribunals – tribunals which are half international, half national – as it was unnecessary for the purpose of this study to explain in detail all the different cooperation regimes of these tribunals, which are very much akin to the horizontal inter-State cooperation regimes. The fact that it was discovered afterwards that the context of the internationalised criminal tribunals only seemed to contain one case in which the male captus problem played an important part in the proceedings (the Duch case before the ECCC, involving an alleged irregular pre-trial detention) could now, with hindsight, be seen as another justification for a less far-reaching discussion of the system of legal assistance in the context of the internationalised criminal tribunals. Finally, Chapter VI ended with a few interesting observations from cases stemming from internationalised criminal tribunals which could not be seen as real male captus cases but which nevertheless touched upon topics which, more generally, could be connected to this book's central topic and which were mentioned earlier in Chapter VI, such as habeas corpus and abuse of process.

The final chapter of this part of the book was Chapter VII, which summarised the principles distilled from Chapters V and VI and so created the external evaluative framework of this study.

As regards the inter-State context (Chapter V), it was observed in Chapter VII that most judges in the older male captus cases continued exercising jurisdiction, stating that they could not or did not want to (because it would make no difference anyway) look at the way a person was brought into the jurisdiction of the State of the now prosecuting court, even if irregularities might have been committed (by authorities from that State) in the pre-trial phase abroad (male captus bene detentus). As such, they adhered to the non-inquiry rule and a restricted notion of a fair trial, excluding that phase which had in fact ensured that the person was brought to the courtroom in the first place.

With the arrival of human rights treaties such as the ICCPR and the rising status of the individual in the international context, judges appeared to pay more attention to concepts such as fair trial and were more willing to look at the pre-trial phase abroad, independently of the question of whether or not there had been a protest from the injured State.

Nevertheless, this did not mean that the era of male captus bene detentus was over and that male captus male detentus or ex iniuria ius non oritur was now the new preferred guideline for judges.

Even though the old(-fashioned) version of the male captus bene detentus rule (in that judges cannot or will not look at how the suspect came into the jurisdiction of the State of the now prosecuting court) indeed seemed to have been (rightly) abandoned, it was also concluded that many judges still issue decisions which could be qualified as male captus bene detentus decisions; not because they state that they cannot or will not look at alleged pre-trial irregularities abroad (and hence that they are going to exercise jurisdiction, regardless of the circumstances in which the suspect came into the jurisdiction of the State of the now prosecuting court), but because they are of the opinion that, having investigated the pre-trial phase abroad, the alleged male captus in question is not serious enough to divest jurisdiction: (a not so serious) male captus bene detentus. It was observed that much depended here on the exact circumstances and the question of how those circumstances were to be weighed in the balancing exercise which judges clearly prefer.

In some instances, the male captus was deemed to be so serious that judges were of the opinion that refusing jurisdiction was the only way to protect such values as respect for another State's sovereignty, due process of law/human rights of the suspect and the rule of law/the integrity of the (executive/judicial) proceedings. Much used in that respect was the abuse of process doctrine, which stems from the common law context but whose rationale can arguably also be found in the reasonings of judges from other legal contexts: courts in principle have jurisdiction (bene detentus) but will use their discretion not to exercise that jurisdiction (male detentus) if the male captus is so serious that to continue exercising jurisdiction would constitute an abuse of the court's process.

Applying these general remarks to the different basic male captus situations presented in Chapter III of this book (disguised extradition, luring and abduction – male captus situations whose definitions imply, incidentally, that they are executed intentionally), and starting with abduction, Chapter VII concluded that it appeared that the more recent cases showed that courts would refuse jurisdiction in the case of an abduction (performed by the prosecuting State's own agents on another State's territory without the latter's consent) which 1) was accompanied by serious human rights violations/serious mistreatment or 2) was followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from the injured State. In fact, it seemed that State practice more generally indicated that in those two circumstances (the two so-called Toscanino possibilities/exceptions), jurisdiction had to be refused. As concerns the second situation, an even more far-reaching conclusion was reached, namely that customary international law seemingly indicated that a male detentus had to follow. It was also stressed that the above-mentioned situations were situations in which male captus bene detentus was rejected at any rate. However, that did not mean that courts have not utilised lower male captus male detentus thresholds in the case of abductions. There were also male captus cases where courts have suggested a male detentus test which does not require a protest from the injured State or serious mistreatment. Nevertheless, it appeared that these lower thresholds, even if they can be applauded, and even if these cases may be seen as evidence of a certain trend in State practice, did not have the same degree of support in the rest of the world as the two Toscanino possibilities. Hence, it was arguably difficult to maintain that in any case involving an abduction (even one without serious mistreatment or without a protest and request for the return of the suspect), State practice (let alone customary international law) indicated that a court will issue a male detentus decision.

As regards the two other male captus techniques, luring and disguised extradition (and other less serious irregular methods not clearly falling within these three basic male captus situations, such as an informal transfer between two States without any procedural guarantees), quite a few of the more recent cases showed that such techniques, even if they can be considered less serious than abduction, can still lead to a refusal to continue the case – a point which can again be applauded – on the condition that the now prosecuting State's own authorities were involved in the male captus. That also meant that courts would generally continue with the case if the prosecuting State's own authorities were not involved in the male captus. Nevertheless, there were also quite a few recent cases in which such techniques had been used and where it was established that the prosecuting State's own authorities had been involved in the male captus but where the court nevertheless did not refuse jurisdiction. Those cases showed that a luring operation or a disguised extradition as such are not seen as such a serious male captus as to lead to the ending of the case.

An important observation from Chapter VII was that the element of 'seriousness of the alleged crimes with which a suspect is charged' sometimes seemed to play a role in the judge's balancing exercise; perhaps a male captus had indeed occurred, but given the fact that the suspect's alleged crimes were more serious and the continuation of the proceedings was hence of more importance, such a male captus did not lead to the ending of the case.

In short, a lot depended on the exact circumstances, on questions such as: what kind of male captus was involved, was the male captus committed intentionally, who committed the male captus, did the male captus lead to a violation of another State's sovereignty (including a protest and request for the return of the suspect), was the person seriously mistreated during the male captus and was the victim of the male captus charged with serious crimes? Finally, it was noted that judges sometimes also avoided the entire male captus discussion by simply arguing that no male captus occurred in the first place, even if there were indications that something irregular had happened.

As regards the principles distilled from the cases between States and international(ised) criminal tribunals (Chapter VI), it was concluded that Chapter VI had arguably shown that tribunals nowadays reject the old-fashioned version of the male captus bene detentus maxim in that they do not support the idea that the tribunals have jurisdiction, regardless of the circumstances in which the suspect was brought before them. This was explained by the fact that these tribunals, after a perhaps somewhat dubious start, have often stressed the importance of human rights, due process and fair proceedings and have generally not limited these concepts to the proceedings in the courtroom. This (welcome) position could be explained by the fact that when the tribunals discussed in Chapter VI came into being – as from the 1990s – concepts such as human rights and fair proceedings were already firmly established in the mindset of judges. The much older idea that a trial had to continue, irrespective of what happened in the course of bringing a suspect to justice had simply become out of step with these ideas.

However, also in this context of the international(ised) criminal tribunals, it was shown that this did not mean that this could be qualified as a male captus male detentus context. In fact, although in the inter-State context, several male captus cases still resulted in a male detentus outcome, there was only one case in the context of the international(ised) criminal tribunals where a male captus led to a male detentus outcome: the Barayagwiza case before the ICTR. However, even that outcome was altered (into a bene detentus outcome, 'softened' with a reduction of the sentence) after the Government of Rwanda, which would not allow such a 'big fish' as Barayagwiza to escape justice, had suspended its cooperation with the Tribunal and after the Appeals Chamber had reviewed its decision. In that respect, it was maintained that the tribunals, even if they do not support the old-fashioned version of the maxim and even if they do not explicitly champion the male captus bene detentus maxim, were more easily affiliated with the latter maxim than with its counterpart male captus male detentus. How could this be explained?

Chapter VII made clear that the tribunals argue, as do most national courts, that they have, in principle, jurisdiction (bene detentus), but that a serious male captus situation can lead, under the discretionary abuse of process doctrine, to a male detentus outcome. In doing so, the tribunals have adopted a broad version of the abuse of process doctrine in that, in determining whether a male captus is so serious that jurisdiction should be refused, it may not matter if the entity committing the male captus cannot be linked to the tribunal. This stance, Chapter VII explained, clearly goes further than the national abuse of process doctrine where the involvement of the authorities of the prosecuting forum appears to be required.

However, even if the tribunals had adopted a broader version of the abuse of process doctrine than the one at the national level, and even if the tribunals appeared to accept – this was not clear due to the imprecise decision of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Nikolić, arguably the most important male captus decision from the context of the tribunals – that they would refuse jurisdiction in the case of a 'normal' abduction performed by their own people – hence falling below the male detentus test at the inter-State level – they were still more readily affiliated with the male captus bene detentus rule because no male captus situation had, ultimately, led to a male detentus result. This, Chapter VII continued, might be explained by the following two factors. (Note that the following two factors assume the existence of a male captus. However, like courts at the inter-State level, tribunals may also be of the opinion that no male captus occurred in the first place, even if one can doubt whether that is accurate.)

First, as the tribunals do not have their own police force, the male captus will often be performed by third parties. This, of course, diminishes the seriousness of the male captus.

The second factor which may explain why the tribunals are still more readily affiliated with the male captus bene detentus rule is that the judges, even if they establish that a serious male captus has occurred, also look at the other side of the coin, namely the fact that the suspect is charged with serious crimes and that the international community demands that such a suspect should, if possible, be prosecuted. Hence, the judges basically have to determine, taking every aspect of their case into account, what is more serious: the male captus or that the suspect is prosecuted.

In other words, although a serious male captus may lead to a male detentus outcome, even with respect to suspects of serious crimes (think of the above-mentioned point that tribunals will probably refuse jurisdiction when their own people are involved in an abduction), the male captus is often not that serious. Not only with respect to the male captus technique used, but also with respect to the actors responsible for the male captus.

Hence, it was explained that an abduction orchestrated by the OTP may lead to the ending of the case, whereas an abduction performed by third parties may not (see also the decision of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Nikolić). However, this will probably be different when that abduction is accompanied by other serious violations/irregularities, such as serious mistreatment. (Note that even though tribunals have often focused on serious mistreatment here, the test 'only' requires such serious violations/irregularities that the judge cannot proceed with the case, not necessarily serious mistreatment/torture-like circumstances.) In such a case, the male captus may also lead to a male detentus outcome, even if the OTP is not responsible for the male captus.

As regards less serious male captus situations such as luring, Chapter VII explained that a luring operation executed by the OTP was condoned by the ICTY Trial Chamber in Dokmanović, but that bene detentus outcome could have been different if that luring was accompanied by, for example, serious mistreatment. In addition, it was also noted that the general reasonings of, for example, the Nikolić and Barayagwiza cases, cases which were decided after the Dokmanović case, may entail that tribunal judges confronted by luring-like situations are of the opinion that the OTP has not come to court with clean hands, has resorted to illegal procedures, and thus that jurisdiction must be refused.

This study has accepted the above-mentioned element of 'seriousness of the alleged crimes' in the context of the discretionary abuse of process doctrine, but has also warned that it must not become a carte blanche with respect to transferring suspects of serious crimes to the tribunals (and the same goes for the inter-State context); the view that one may take the seriousness of the crimes into account to a certain extent in deciding the consequences of a certain male captus cannot in any way be seen as a green light for using male captus techniques in the context of international crimes. Some male captus situations are so serious – for example, because the OTP intentionally committed serious (procedural) irregularities in the process of bringing a suspect to trial, such as an abduction – that jurisdiction should be refused if the tribunal wants to be taken seriously as a court of law, whether it is dealing with a suspect of serious crimes or not. One could also mention practical considerations here; proceeding with the case under such circumstances would arguably also be damaging for the entire mission of the tribunal. In addition, neither should one forget that the negative consequences of proceeding with a case involving an abduction might not be limited to the context of the tribunals. For national States/courts, these international institutions may be seen as examples to follow. If employees of a tribunal are involved in an abduction and in a way get away with it (because the judges do not decline jurisdiction), then national States/courts can refer to the tribunal's approach to defend their own (potentially) dubious methods of bringing suspects to trial or to defend the 'approval' of such methods by proceeding with the case. That in turn would harm the integrity of these States/courts, the human rights of their suspects and – what is far more important for the horizontal context than for the context of the tribunals – the very foundation of the inter-State level itself, namely respect for another State's sovereignty.

Chapter VII clarified the fact that the element of 'seriousness of the alleged crimes' was also accepted in the more controversial context of the consequences of the determination that a person's arrest or detention was deemed unlawful. Noting the problems of the remedy of release as already identified in Chapter III of this book and emphasising that a release, in the context of the tribunals, may even more easily lead to a suspect of international crimes evading justice because of relatively minor irregularities, it was stated that although the law should obviously be obeyed, one must also be careful not to apply the law in such a strict way that it leads to great injustice: summum ius, summa iniuria.

In other words, Chapter VII maintained, the human rights of all suspects must be respected. The fact that one is dealing with suspects of international crimes cannot in any way be used as an excuse to violate human rights or to argue that no violation occurred in the first place where such a violation was clearly present. Furthermore, when violations occur, appropriate remedies must be granted. However, in granting these remedies, one must be careful that one does not potentially pave the way for absurd consequences which are counter to the concept of justice, for example, through a strict application of the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention. In such a case, it would arguably be better to keep a suspect of international crimes in custody and to grant appropriate and real remedies instead, taking into account the seriousness of the male captus.

A final important issue from Chapter VII which should be mentioned in this summary is that it was suggested that all violations which occur in the context of a tribunal case must be remedied and not only if those violations can be attributed to the tribunal (although it is clear that the involvement of the tribunal may lead to more far-reaching remedies).

This suggestion was uncontroversial in the context of the abuse of process doctrine; in the context of the question of whether the male captus is so serious that the judges, in good conscience, can no longer proceed with the case, the tribunals have confirmed that they will look at the violations, irrespective of the entity responsible for those violations.

However, this was far less certain regarding less serious violations which do not come within the domain of the abuse of process doctrine. Nevertheless, it was argued that it would be quite odd for the tribunals to only look at the actions of third parties if those actions reach a certain seriousness. If the tribunal is willing, under the abuse of process, to take the ultimate responsibility for actions of third parties (namely by refusing jurisdiction), it should also be perfectly able to take responsibility for less serious violations. To ensure that the suspect does not become the victim of the fact that his proceedings have been fragmented over two or more systems, it is fair that the final adjudicator, the tribunal, in the context of whose case these violations occurred, takes responsibility for every violation. This in turn also implies, of course, that a judge must be able to examine how the arrest/detention/transfer was made 'on the ground', for example, whether the entities making the arrest at the behest/request of the tribunal respected all the (national) arrest procedures. After all, if an arrest was clearly made in contravention of such procedures, it is difficult to maintain that a person's right to liberty and security was not violated, even if all the rules of the tribunal (such as the issuance of a valid indictment and an arrest warrant) have been adhered to.

It was explained that in this specific context, tribunal decisions have been issued which follow a rather non-inquiry/male captus bene detentus-like view and which support the idea that the legality of the national arrest/detention proceedings cannot be examined. However, there were also cases which could be interpreted as meaning that the tribunal would look into what happened at the national level and would in fact repair any violation which occurred in that context, even if the tribunal were, strictly speaking, not responsible for it.

Nevertheless, if it were indeed true that the case law contained both interpretations, it was submitted that the judge should opt for the second interpretation, the one which does investigate any pre-trial irregularities and which does not demand the attribution of the violations to the tribunal/the tribunal's strict legal responsibility for the violations. Deterrence, the integrity of the proceedings and simple fairness towards the suspect (in that a suspect does not end up in a legal vacuum) demand that the now prosecuting forum remedies all the violations which have been committed in the context of its case. This position could also 'soften' the (unpopular) male captus bene detentus image that the tribunals have; providing remedies for all violations which occurred in the context of their cases shows that the tribunals are not only concerned with prosecuting suspects of international crimes but also with ensuring fair proceedings for these suspects. In that context, one could also reassure those who object to this position that granting remedies may not have drastic consequences. One can assume that very often, a judge will only be confronted by minor violations. For those kinds of violations, small remedies will be appropriate, for example, a (minor) reduction of the sentence in the case of conviction. This ensures that both the sense of justice of the person in question (in that his violations are remedied) and of the victims/the international community as a whole (in that a suspect of international crimes, if found guilty, receives an appropriate (which very often means stern) penalty for his deeds) are met.

After this important chapter, to which – accordingly – considerable attention has been paid in this summary, it was time to look at Part 4 of this book, which addressed the context of the ICC. In the first chapter of this part, Chapter VIII, the ICC's more general cooperation regime, including the specific arrest and surrender provisions, were examined. In this context, the role of international forces in surrendering suspects to the ICC was addressed as well. A crucial subject, among other things because States which wish to cooperate with the ICC are often unable to do so because the war which may have triggered the attention of the ICC may also have ruined the legal systems of these States.

In Chapter VIII, special attention was paid to Article 59, paragraph 2 of the ICC Statute, a habeas corpus-like provision which can be seen as one of the most important in the ICC's arrest and surrender system, where the national and international levels meet. It was observed that quite a few questions remain with respect to this provision, the main one being what the consequences are when the competent judicial authority in the custodial State determines that a person has not been arrested in accordance with the proper process and that the person's rights have not been respected. It was concluded that the answer to this question may depend from State to State but that because of several reasons, including the important fact that uncooperative States could abuse this provision, one could agree with most authors that national authorities should be very reluctant to refuse the surrender of a suspect if it is determined at the national level that a person has not been arrested in accordance with the proper process or that the person's rights have not been respected. Nevertheless, a State may very well be justified in arguing that a release may constitute the correct legal remedy in the case of violations. However, in that case, the national authorities were reminded of the previously identified problems of this remedy. In fact, in the ICC context, a release of a suspect could even more easily lead to an escape as the released suspect could flee to many non-State Parties which are, in principle, not obliged to cooperate with the ICC, a feature missing in the ICTY/ICTR context.

Furthermore, it was also remembered that Article 59 of the ICC Statute – which generally accords much more importance to national law (interpreted in light of human rights law) and national authorities than the vertical regime of the ICTY/ICTR does – 'only' regulates the arrest proceedings for States and that the arrest procedures for, for example, peacekeeping forces – if these forces have a mandate to make arrests for the ICC – remain unclear. Nevertheless, several suggestions from legal scholars were addressed which could solve these problems, such as a direct surrender by peacekeeping forces of the suspect to the ICC, provided that certain safeguards are respected.

An important point observed in Chapter VIII was that many aspects of the human rights habeas corpus provisions, thanks to Articles 55, 59 and 60 of the ICC Statute, were present in the arrest and surrender regime of the ICC, and that this constituted an improvement when compared to the legal context of the ICTY/ICTR, but that an unequivocal and explicit right for a suspect to challenge the lawfulness of his arrest and detention and to be released in the case of an unlawful arrest and detention was missing. This rather strange point would be returned to in Chapter IX.

Finally, it was concluded that Chapter VIII had revealed that the ICC's regime contains both vertical and horizontal elements and that the term "lateral", introduced by Currie, may be a fitting (and in any case original) term for this regime.

In the next chapter, Chapter IX, the internal evaluative framework of this study was created through an examination of Article 21 of the ICC Statute. Not only the content of the three different paragraphs of this article, but also the correlation between the three parts of the first paragraph were addressed with help of both doctrine and case law.

As part (a) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute was silent on the male captus issue, use was made of the general rule of interpretation and the supplementary means of interpretation as can be found in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. As textual/contextual/teleological interpretation of a number of provisions from the proper instruments of the ICC which could be seen as being (indirectly) relevant for the male captus discussion did not clarify whether the ICC Statute could be seen as clearly in favour of either male captus bene detentus or male captus male detentus (Article 31, paragraph 1 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties), recourse was made to the travaux préparatoires of the ICC Statute (Article 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties). Although a number of interesting remarks were found in these documents regarding the correlation between the ICC and the issue of irregular arrests, including one explicit comment by the Jamaican delegate Patrick Robinson that male captus bene detentus should have no application to the ICC's jurisdiction, it was concluded that an examination of the travaux préparatoires had not elucidated the general opinion of the 120 States which voted in favour of the ICC Statute with respect to the male captus issue. As a result, it was found that an examination of several provisions from the ICC Statute and the latter's travaux préparatoires had brought no clarity with respect to the male captus issue, which meant that on this issue, there was a legal lacuna which had to be filled by looking at parts (b) and (c) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute.

However, before that was done, Chapter IX also looked at a related issue, namely what the ICC instruments said on the consequences of an unlawful arrest. It was already earlier established – also in this summary – that many aspects of the human rights habeas corpus provisions, thanks to Articles 55, 59 and 60 of the ICC Statute, were present in the arrest and surrender regime of the ICC, but that an unequivocal and explicit right for a suspect to challenge the lawfulness of his arrest and detention and to be released in the case of an unlawful arrest and detention was missing. It was questioned how the deletion of the remedy of release from the right to liberty and security, as can be found in Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute, had to be viewed. Had it to be seen as a deliberate choice of the drafters that this remedy is not applicable to suspects or was it simply forgotten or not deemed essential enough to mention in the ICC Statute?

Again, recourse was made to the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. Also in the context of the remedy of release, textual/contextual/teleological interpretation of Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute (Article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties) brought no relief, hence necessitating an examination pursuant to Article 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (the travaux préparatoires).

After a detailed examination, it was concluded that it is hard to maintain that it is clear that the drafters of the ICC Statute intentionally deleted the remedy of release because they did not want this remedy to be available for a suspect unlawfully arrested or detained. Since the ICC legislation was arguably unclear on this point, and thus left a legal lacuna, there was justification for looking to part (b) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute.

Part (b) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute thus had to be considered, not only in the case of the real male captus bene/male detentus question, but also in the case of the issue related to the male captus discussion, namely the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention.

An examination of part (b) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute showed that the term "applicable treaties" did not shed light on the male captus issue, but that this term did cover the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention and that this remedy could by applied by the ICC judges "where appropriate".

As concerns the meaning of the term "the principles and rules of international law", it was concluded that this term, in any case, included customary international law and that one could turn to the conclusion of Section 2 of Chapter VII of this book to determine what customary international law had to say on the male captus issue. This was something special, as the external evaluative framework of this study, which was (merely) created to see how similar or different the current ICC position on the male captus problem was in comparison with the position of other courts, had now entered, via the concept of customary international law, the less non-committal internal evaluative framework, a framework established to see how the actual ICC position had to be assessed in view of the Court's own law.

It was noted that Section 2 of Chapter VII of this book had clarified that one cannot generally state that either male captus bene detentus or male captus male detentus had reached customary international law status, because such general assertions did not do justice to the enormous variety of possible male captus situations and the different ways those varying situations were received by courts. In fact, Chapter VII had concluded that only one male captus situation could probably be seen as having customary international law status, namely the situation that judges will refuse jurisdiction in the case of an abduction performed by the authorities of the prosecuting forum followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect by the injured State. However, it was also noted that because of the probable rationale of this rule and the different role of State sovereignty in the context of the ICC, one can question whether the judges would find it "appropriate" to transplant this rule into the specific system of the ICC. Notwithstanding this, it was also submitted that the ICC, even if it was indeed found that it would not be appropriate to transplant this rule into the context of the ICC, and thus that the Court would not have to follow it, should resolutely refuse jurisdiction if it were implicated in an abduction, whether or not that abduction was followed by a protest and request for the return of the suspect from the injured State.

After that, it was considered, now that Section 2 of Chapter VII had entered the internal evaluative framework of this study, whether Section 3 of Chapter VII (the principles distilled from the international(ised) criminal tribunals' male captus case law) might also enter this internal evaluative framework. Could these principles perhaps also fall under the notion of customary international law?

Using the traditional definition of customary international law, which focuses on State practice (but acknowledging that one can ask whether the formation of customary international law can still be seen as the privilege of States), it was concluded that the decisions of the ICTY/ICTR as such (hence not those decisions presenting overviews of State practice) cannot be used to find customary international law. This could, however, be different with respect to internationalised criminal tribunals, some of which could be seen as forming part of a State's legal system.

Finally, the related topic of the remedy of release was addressed. It was concluded that this remedy could be seen as having customary international law status. Hence, if this remedy were not already to fall under the notion "applicable treaties", it would in any case be covered by the term "principles and rules of international law".

After this examination of customary international law, it was questioned whether the term "principles and rules of international law" could also cover more than just customary international law. It was concluded that it could and that the practice of the ICTY/ICTR (and this might perhaps also be valid for other international (judicial) institutions such as the HRC, the ECtHR and certain internationalised criminal tribunals) could be applied by the ICC judges if those judges, after a detailed analysis, are of the opinion that certain practices can be transplanted into the specific system of the ICC as a principle/rule of international law. In that case, the conclusions from Section 3 of Chapter VII might also enter the internal evaluative framework of this study. As regards these practices of international criminal tribunals, one could think of the acceptance of a broad concept of abuse of process (in that jurisdiction may be refused in very serious male captus cases, irrespective of the entity responsible) and the fact that the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged can be taken into account when applying the abuse of process doctrine. With respect to the related issue of the remedy of release, one could think of the fact that all these tribunals have stressed the importance of habeas corpus, even if the regulatory instruments of the tribunal in question did not explicitly contain such a provision.

However, it was also noted that if the ICC judges are of the opinion that it would not be appropriate to transplant the established practices of the international criminal tribunals with respect to the male captus issue, as principles and rules of international law, into the specific system of the ICC, or if they are of the opinion that one should not look at the jurisprudence of these tribunals in the context of this provision at all, then part (c) of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute had to be looked at.

As a result, this last part of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute was also examined. It was concluded that in determining whether there exist general principles related to the male captus problem, one could again turn to the overviews of Chapter V and the principles distilled in Section 2 of Chapter VII. Hence, here also, the results from the external evaluative framework could be used for the internal evaluative framework.

With respect to the male captus bene/male detentus maxim itself, it was found that the overviews of Chapter V clearly showed that one cannot make the general assertion that one of these maxims can be seen as a general principle of law nowadays. However, it was also remarked that there are certainly elements from the male captus case law which were shared by most systems of law, elements which may perhaps – taking into account the overviews of this study being extensive but not exhaustive – be seen as general principles of law falling under the terminology used in Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute. For example, one could think of the fact that most courts confronted by a male captus will use their discretion, for instance (in the common law system) under the abuse of process doctrine, to balance all the different elements of the case to decide whether or not the male captus is so serious that jurisdiction must be refused. In addition, most courts seemed to refuse jurisdiction only if their own authorities are involved in the male captus. Finally, it appeared that quite a number of courts – although it was unclear whether "quite a number" was enough to lead to a general principle of law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute – would also take into account the seriousness of the crimes with which the victim of the male captus is charged in deciding whether or not jurisdiction must be refused.

With respect to the related issue of the remedy of release, it was concluded that not only the general right to liberty and security/the right not to be arrested or detained arbitrarily, but also its more specific habeas corpus provision (including the release in the case of an unlawful (arrest or) detention) could be seen as a general principle of law.

Finally, it was noted that also with respect to part (c) (cf. the words "where appropriate" in the context of part (b)), the ICC judges will probably only use these solutions from the national level if they believe that they can transpose these solutions in the specific context of the ICC. That could mean that the ICC judges may follow the principles which can be related to the proper male captus issue mentioned above but may be more reluctant with respect to the problematic remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention.

After a short rejection of paragraph 2 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute for the purpose of this study's internal evaluative framework, attention was paid to the final paragraph of this crucial article.

In the examination of paragraph 3 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute, it was argued that whenever the ICC exercises its jurisdiction, whenever it is involved in a case, that involvement, that exercise of jurisdiction, had to be applied and interpreted in conformity with those internationally recognised human rights which are relevant to the ICC's functioning. That exercise of jurisdiction/involvement, of course, included the proceedings in the courtroom, when the ICC is actually trying the case, but it would also include the exercise of jurisdiction/involvement in the pre-trial phase and hence also, for example, the actions of third parties when these parties make arrests/detentions/surrenders at the request of the ICC. Furthermore, it was remarked that this is the path the ICC should follow in any case: ensuring that whenever the ICC is involved in a case (including the actions of third parties working at the behest of the ICC), that involvement is consistent with internationally recognised human rights. However, it was argued that it would even be fairer for the ICC to take its responsibility for violations in the context of its case more generally. Although arrests/detentions made at the behest of the ICC will cover a large part of the ICC's arrest/detention 'stock', the ICC may always be confronted by male captus claims which go beyond such situations (cf. abduction by private individuals). It would be highly just if the ICC, as the ultimate prosecuting forum, would also repair those violations, even if it were not involved in the male captus.

As regards the internationally recognised human rights which are relevant to the ICC's functioning in the context of the pre-trial phase, one could think, for example, of a broad concept of the right to a fair trial and the right to liberty and security, including the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention.

During the examination of paragraph 3, the earlier correlation between the different parts of paragraph 1 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute was re-assessed. This had consequences for the issue of the remedy of release. It was explained that in interpreting part (a) of paragraph 1 (the right to liberty and security without the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention), the ICC judges had to take into account paragraph 3. Since this latter paragraph includes the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, the judges no longer had discretion to consider whether it would be "appropriate" to transplant (see part (b) of paragraph 1) or whether they can transpose (see part (c) of paragraph 1) the remedy of release into the context of the ICC. In other words, the remedy of release, in principle, would have to be applied. It was further explained that this outcome was perhaps not so problematic because this study had argued that it was not clearly established that the drafters of the ICC Statute intentionally wanted to delete this remedy. However, matters would turn out to be more complicated if one were of the opinion, on the basis of the information presented in Chapter IX, that it was in fact clearly the intention of the drafters to delete this remedy. In that case, it had to be ascertained which solution would take precedence here: the intention of the drafters (no remedy of release) or the remedy of release pursuant to paragraph 3. In this context, two different doctrinal choices were presented, that of Pellet (whose approach would lead to the remedy of release) and that of Hafner and Binder (whose approach would not lead to the remedy of release). This study was more in favour of Pellet's view.

Nevertheless, it was also acknowledged that the fact that the ICC judges, if they were to follow the view of Pellet, must apply the remedy of release, even if it was clearly the intention of the drafters not to grant this remedy, does not make the problems which can be related to this remedy suddenly disappear. Because of this, judges, it was submitted, could opt for the solution presented in this research; they could, while realising that this remedy, in principle, has to be respected and thus that remedies must be granted in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention, keep the suspect in custody and grant proper remedies, depending on the exact circumstances of the case. They could thereby also rely on the right to an effective remedy, another right which can certainly be seen as an internationally recognised human right pursuant to paragraph 3 of Article 21 of the ICC Statute.

In the last chapter of Part 4, Chapter X, this study tried to find the current ICC position on the male captus issue through an examination of the three ICC cases in which the male captus topic had played a (major) role in the proceedings: Lubanga

Dyilo, Bemba Gombo and Katanga. Since the final chapter of this book, Chapter XI, summarised the conclusions of Chapter X, it is appropriate to immediately go to the summary of Chapter XI now.

In the final part of this book, Part 5, consisting of one chapter only (Chapter XI), this study was concluded. Because this last chapter is so important as regards the findings of this study, this summary will pay most attention to this chapter. That one cannot briefly summarise this chapter was also a result of the first problem encountered in Chapter XI: after repeating the central question of this study as presented in Chapter I, it was remarked that it is difficult to give a plain answer to this question as it did not seem to be very clear what the ICC's current position on the male captus issue – a crucial part of the central question – is. This was for a number of reasons.

First of all, the Appeals Chamber's decision in Lubanga Dyilo, arguably the most authoritative decision on this matter, contained different formulations of what the male detentus threshold of the ICC could be. However, it was also noted that the broad first formulation (confirmed by the third formulation) – and not the restricted second formulation, which stipulated that "[w]here the breaches of the rights of the accused are such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence within the framework of his[/her] rights, no fair trial can take place and the proceedings can be stayed" – probably constituted the correct test:

> Where fair trial becomes impossible because of breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect or the accused by his/her accusers, it would be a contradiction in terms to put the person on trial. Justice could not be done. A fair trial is the only means to do justice. If no fair trial can be held, the object of the judicial process is frustrated and the process must be stopped [original footnotes omitted, ChP].

Nevertheless, another problem with respect to the ICC's male captus position was identified. In the Duch case before the ECCC, it was held that the ICC Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo would also refuse jurisdiction, under the abuse of process doctrine, in the case of grave violations of the suspect's rights (thereby focusing on the more 'physical' words serious mistreatment/torture) as such, hence irrespective of the entity responsible. Reference was hereby made to the following words of the Appeals Chamber: "[T]he findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber respecting the absence of torture or serious mistreatment have not been shown to be erroneous in any way." However, it was explained that whether the ICC Appeals Chamber, besides its above-mentioned male detentus test – which requires the involvement of the ICC (or third parties working at the behest/request of the ICC), see the words "by his/her accusers" – would also refuse jurisdiction in the case of grave violations/serious mistreatment/torture as such, irrespective of the entity responsible (and thus also in the case of private individuals), was not at all clear. First, it was pointed out that the remarks made by the Pre-Trial Chamber on serious mistreatment/torture were made in the context of the abuse of process doctrine, a doctrine which the Appeals Chamber has explicitly rejected. Secondly, there was uncertainty as regards the position of the Pre-Trial Chamber itself on the abuse of process doctrine as it stated that its application, to date, "ha[d] been confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal [emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP]". The italicised words are incorrect, but it was uncertain whether the Pre-Trial Chamber would nevertheless follow its words (requiring that the male captus be committed by national authorities) or whether it was of the opinion that these words were indeed erroneous, entailing it to also refuse jurisdiction in the case of serious mistreatment/torture, irrespective of the entity responsible, hence also including, for example, the actions of private individuals.

Another unclear issue was related to the fact that the Appeals Chamber seemingly agreed with the Pre-Trial Chamber's view that it would look at irregularities when these were committed in the context of concerted action between the ICC and third parties, even before the sending of the ICC request for arrest and surrender (hence before the constructive custody). This term, "concerted action", is very general and could encompass any involvement of the ICC in irregularities. However, even though the Appeals Chamber thus accepted the concerted action term, a term which could encompass a national arrest/detention if that arrest/detention were somehow related to the ICC proceedings, the Appeals Chamber also presented an additional requirement, namely that only violations of the suspect's rights which are related to the "process of bringing the appellant to justice for the crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings before the Court (…) may provide ground for halting the process". However, it was argued that that is a stricter condition.

A final unclear issue was that the ICC Appeals Chamber did not view a motion of a suspect who had allegedly been the victim of a male captus, and who argued that the ICC should refuse jurisdiction because of that male captus, as a challenge to its jurisdiction under Article 19 of the ICC Statute. It considered such a challenge to be a sui generis/atypical motion, seeking a stay of the proceedings. This view, with which the Appeals Chamber corrected the Pre-Trial Chamber's decision in this case, was, however, seemingly rejected by the decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber in Katanga, decided after the Appeals Chamber's decision in Lubanga Dyilo. Although the Trial Chamber in Katanga referred to the Appeals Chamber's view in Lubanga Dyilo, it did not comment further on it.

Although this study thus found several obscurities with respect to the ICC's position on the male captus issue, it could also present a few less ambiguous features which could be identified in the ICC's handling of an alleged male captus case.

First, the ICC did not accept the doctrine which is so often contrasted with the male captus bene detentus rule, the abuse of process doctrine, because it was not covered by Article 21 of the ICC Statute. However, what was covered by this provision, namely by its paragraph 3, was the human rights dimension of the abuse of process doctrine. It was that human rights dimension which the ICC used to solve male captus claims. It was clear that the ICC theoretically attached great importance to human rights – and the human rights to a fair trial and to liberty and security (including the right to challenge the lawfulness of one's detention, a right which is not explicitly mentioned in the ICC's proper instruments) in particular.

The ICC furthermore appeared to concentrate on the violations themselves and not so much on the question of whether the ICC (or third parties working at the behest of the ICC) intentionally violated certain norms. However, what seemed to be required, see the Bemba Gombo case, was that violations had to result into actual prejudice to the suspect.

Another important aspect of the male captus issue was the role of the competent judicial authority of the custodial State in the whole procedure. Chapter XI showed that, in contrast to the Pre-Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo did not explain to what extent that authority, under Article 59 of the ICC Statute, could look into irregularities prior to the official arrest/detention. In addition, and this time just like the Pre-Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber did not clarify the role of the ICC judges, who marginally supervise the points of Article 59, paragraph 2 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute, in this context of the prior arrest/detention. Finally, again following the Pre-Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber did not elucidate to what extent provisions such as Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute and Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute had to be considered here. The focus appeared to be on national law only.

A final point was that the Appeals Chamber seemed only interested in the ultimate remedy, the refusal of jurisdiction/a halt to the procedures.

Now that the ICC's current position on the male captus issue had been presented – taking into account the fact that some of its aspects were not very clear – that position was assessed in the context of this book's external evaluative framework, vis-à-vis the position of other courts.

First of all, it was explained that it appeared that the ICC, like almost every modern court or tribunal, did not accept the old-fashioned version of male captus bene detentus that jurisdiction will be exercised, regardless of the way that person came into the power of the Court. Human rights were considered to be of paramount importance and extended to the entire proceedings, including the pre-trial phase. This included the (for this study) so important human right to liberty and security, including its sub-right to challenge the lawfulness of one's detention, even if that sub-right was not explicitly mentioned in the proper instruments of the ICC. This position, it was asserted, resembled the position of other tribunals. As a result of this, the ICC judges will examine the pre-trial phase to see what kind of effect violations of these rights may have on the jurisdiction of the Court. It was noted that the Trial Chamber in Katanga did not do so on procedural grounds – and could be criticised for that – but that it was uncertain, and in fact improbable, for this decision to be viewed as support for the old-fashioned version of male captus bene detentus mentioned above.

Chapter XI continued by explaining that if one were of the opinion that the ICC Appeals Chamber's one and only male detentus test could be found in the first formulation from Lubanga Dyilo (see the block quotation mentioned above in this summary), then the ICC shared the view of, for example, the ICTY Trial Chamber in Nikolić and the Ebrahim case in that the Prosecution (including third parties working at its behest) must come to court with clean hands. If that were not the case, for example, if the fundamental rights of the suspect had been violated in the process of bringing that suspect before the ICC, judges could conclude that one can no longer speak of a fair trial in the broad sense of the word, a conclusion which must lead to the ending of the case. It was noted that because the words "breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect" were very generally formulated, these could include all kinds of male captus situations, such as abductions, luring situations and other techniques which could (possibly) be seen as violations of someone's right to liberty and security.

Before Chapter XI continued on this topic, it was pointed out that the ICC seemed to concentrate on the violations themselves and not so much on the question of whether the ICC (or third parties working at the behest of the ICC) intentionally violated certain norms. This could be considered a rather liberal stance as other courts had often demanded, in their male detentus tests, an intention on the part of the prosecuting authorities to commit the male captus. However, what appeared to be required, see the Bemba Gombo case, was that violations had to result into actual prejudice to the suspect. Nevertheless, other tribunal cases could be seen as supporting the view that the level of prejudice was only relevant for determining how serious the violations were (and, consequently, what kind of remedy had to be provided) and not for determining whether there were violations in the first place/whether the suspect would be entitled to a remedy.

Chapter XI then returned to the proposition that the ICC's words "breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect" were so generally formulated that these could include all kinds of male captus situations, including abductions and luring situations.

It was explained that if the ICC were to refuse jurisdiction if the suspect's accusers were responsible for an abduction as such, it would side with the decisions in Levinge, Bennett, Ebrahim and Beahan. These were reasonings which fell short of the test about which more recent State practice seemingly agreed that it must, in any event, lead to rejection of the male captus bene detentus rule (see the Toscanino exceptions mentioned supra). With respect to the context of the tribunals, it was clarified that if the ICC were to refuse jurisdiction because the suspect's accusers were responsible for an abduction as such, the ICC would probably also side with the tribunal cases. Although none of these cases involved abductions perpetrated by the tribunal itself, one could refer here to general statements from, for example, Nikolić and Barayagwiza.

Turning to the concept of luring, this study explained that the ICC's phrase "breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect" was so generally formulated that it could also cover a situation of luring, as long as the judges were of the opinion that that would constitute a violation of a suspect's fundamental rights (namely his right to liberty and security). In that case, the ICC would follow the more progressive inter-State cases of Levinge and Bennett, cases which (were considered to) contain very general male detentus reasonings and which could cover luring operations (even though these cases themselves did not concern such operations), but would distance itself from the inter-State luring cases such as Yunis and Stocké where the judges would probably only refuse jurisdiction if the luring were accompanied by serious mistreatment. The tribunal context, Chapter XI continued, was, however, less straightforward. Although it was clear that if the ICC were to refuse jurisdiction in a case of luring as such, it would take a more liberal stance than the ICTY judges in Dokmanović had done, more general words from the tribunals had been issued after Dokmanović, which could also cover a luring operation.

Returning to 'the' position of the ICC: Chapter XI then remarked that if one were, however, of the opinion that the Appeals Chamber's requirement that one can no longer speak of a fair trial had to be seen in the strict sense of the word, namely a fair trial in the courtroom (see the second formulation of the ICC test mentioned supra, that which demands that the violations must be such that the accused can no longer make his defence, also about which this study concluded that it was uncertain that this is the ICC's male detentus position), the ICC's position was arguably different from most of the more recent national and international courts. Most of these courts – although there were some exceptions – seemingly also refused jurisdiction, not only if one can no longer speak of a fair trial in the strict sense of the word, but also in the broad sense of the word, namely if it were unfair in general/if it were to undermine the integrity of the court to have a trial in the first place (hereby often using the abuse of process doctrine).

Another point that needed to be assessed concerned the lack of clarity as to whether the Appeals Chamber's male detentus test demanded involvement of the ICC, or whether the ICC would also refuse jurisdiction in the case of, for example, serious mistreatment/torture, irrespective of the entity responsible, for instance, if that mistreatment/torture were committed by private individuals.

It was explained that if one assumed that the ICC only followed the male detentus test demanding ICC involvement, the ICC would follow most of the national cases which require the involvement of one's own people. However, in that case, it would also clearly deviate from the tribunal cases which recognise that, under the abuse of process doctrine, a doctrine which the ICC Appeals Chamber rejected, very serious male captus cases can lead to the ending of the case, irrespective of the entity responsible.

If the ICC (Appeals Chamber) were nevertheless to refuse jurisdiction in very serious male captus cases, irrespective of the entity responsible – this is how the co-investigating judges in Duch read the Appeals Chamber's decision – and if it were to follow the Pre-Trial Chamber's statement in that case (assuming that the reference to "torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State [emphasis added, ChP]" was erroneous), the ICC (Appeals Chamber) would also recognise that this male detentus avenue is not restricted to torture or serious mistreatment, see the Pre-Trial Chamber's words that the application of the abuse of process doctrine, "to date (…) ha[d] been confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal [emphasis added and original footnotes omitted, ChP]". This meant, Chapter XI clarified, that the ICC might also refuse jurisdiction in serious male captus cases other than serious mistreatment/torture. It was noted that this stance appeared to be similar to the position of the tribunals. Although several cases, perhaps inspired by the Trial Chamber's words in Dokmanović, a case issued prior to (the abuse of process test from) the Barayagwiza case, had focused on the more 'physically' coloured words "serious mistreatment" and "torture", the more recent Karadžić case had clarified that serious mistreatment/torture are only to be seen as examples of such serious cases that a court may refuse jurisdiction.

Another point that Chapter XI had to discuss was the scope of review. As explained supra, there was lack of clarity as to whether the Appeals Chamber, prior to the constructive custody of the ICC, would examine irregularities during a national detention which result from concerted action between the ICC and third parties more generally or whether it would only consider irregularities if the suspect were in detention for the same crimes as he is now being prosecuted at the ICC.

First, the context of constructive custody itself was addressed. It appeared that the ICC accepted that it would review and in fact take responsibility for any violations which occur in this context, in the context of an arrest/detention executed at the behest of the ICC. It was noted that several tribunal cases could be interpreted as support for that view, although there were also cases in which the judges refused to review the legality of the national arrest/detention proceedings.

With respect to examining irregularities beyond the constructive custody it was explained that if the ICC were more generally to review irregularities which resulted from concerted action between the ICC and third parties, it would follow several (inter)national courts in which it was recognised that responsibility must be taken for action in which the prosecuting forum's own authorities participated, in which those authorities were involved. However, Chapter XI continued, there were also judges who looked more broadly at the issue of responsibility and did not confine themselves to concerted action. Finally, it was noted that if the ICC('s Appeals Chamber) were not to look at concerted action more generally but only at irregularities, prior to the constructive custody of the ICC, if the suspect were in detention for the same crimes as those for which he is now being prosecuted at the ICC, that stance would constitute a deviation from other (inter)national courts which simply appear to be interested in the seriousness of the pre-trial irregularities in general, whether or not a suspect was in detention for the same crimes as those for which the court is now prosecuting him.

After this, a few remaining points from the external assessment were briefly addressed.

First, it was noted that the competent judicial authority in the custodial State, because of Article 59 of the ICC Statute, had become a much more serious and powerful link in the surrender proceedings than the national authorities in the context of the UN ad hoc Tribunals.

Secondly, it was explained that the (possible) idea of the ICC that a male captus motion cannot be seen as a challenge to the ICC's jurisdiction (ratione personae) does not seem to be shared by other (inter)national courts, even if, strictly speaking, the motion challenges the exercise of personal jurisdiction and not the personal jurisdiction itself.

Thirdly, with respect to the ICC's sole focus on the ultimate remedy (male detentus): it was noted that the cases examined at the inter-State level did not clearly identify the reasoning that the suspect, if his claim for a male detentus was rejected, might be entitled to other remedies from the prosecuting forum such as a reduction of the sentence or financial compensation, although it was, of course, possible for the male captus victim to sue the kidnappers in a civil case. As regards the context of the tribunals, it was explained that the focus on the ultimate remedy alone, refusal of jurisdiction, could certainly be found here. Nevertheless, Chapter XI continued, there were also cases where the judges, after having rejected the male detentus claim, have examined whether the suspect would be entitled to other, less far-reaching, remedies instead.

Fourthly, it was remarked that the ICC had not yet explicitly mentioned the element 'seriousness of the crimes' when considering male captus claims, an element which could be found in the context of both inter-State and tribunal cases. However, this was not that strange as the ICC had rejected the abuse of process doctrine, a doctrine in which this element played a major role. Nevertheless, it was explained that if the ICC were to follow the Pre-Trial Chamber and consider refusing jurisdiction in the case of serious violations, irrespective of the entity responsible (assuming for now that that is the position of the Pre-Trial Chamber), one could expect that the ICC would not refuse jurisdiction too readily and in doing so, would refer to both the absence of responsibility on the part of the suspect's accusers and the importance of prosecution (read: the seriousness of the suspect's alleged crimes).

A last point was that the ICC did not explicitly support the male captus bene/male detentus maxim. This was similar to other courts and tribunals. Although the Appeals Chamber did contrast the male captus bene detentus rule with the abuse of process doctrine and although that latter doctrine was rejected by the Appeals Chamber, which could be interpreted as meaning that the Appeals Chamber followed the male captus bene detentus rule, this was certainly not the case, as the Appeals Chamber clearly supported a large part, namely the human rights dimension, of the abuse of process doctrine.

Then, Chapter XI assessed the ICC position on the male captus issue in the context of this study's internal framework, vis-à-vis the law of the ICC itself.

After having repeated the point also mentioned in this summary that this study has shown that the two evaluative frameworks could merge, that a number of unclear concepts from Article 21 of the ICC Statute – the central article of the internal evaluative framework – could encompass the results of the external evaluative framework, it was questioned whether a number of aspects of what the ICC position on the male captus issue could be (as explained: this was not entirely clear) were in conformity with Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute.

For example, it was explained that one can question whether the test which requires that certain violations must be such that a person can no longer make his defence before one can speak of the impossibility of a fair trial – which could be the ICC's male detentus test, although this was doubted by this study – was in fact in accordance with Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute. It was noted that this provision definitely contained the human right to a fair trial and arguably a human right to a fair trial which was not limited to the fair trial in court but which extended to the entire proceedings. However, it was also remarked that if the ICC were to adhere to its words which focused on a broad concept of fair trial (and this was probably more likely), there would be no violation of the ICC's law. In this context, it was also explained that the ICC's view that a broad concept of a fair trial had to be cherished, even for persons charged with very serious crimes, was definitely in conformity with internationally recognised human rights.

It was then noted that Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute also contained the human right to liberty and security, including a person's right to challenge the lawfulness of his detention, even if that right was not explicitly mentioned by the ICC Statute, and that the refusal of the judges in the Katanga case to look into the motion of the suspect challenging the lawfulness of his pre-trial arrest and detention, for the only reason that the motion was filed too late, might perhaps be interpreted as a violation of this right and thus of the ICC law. In this context, it was explained that this right was so crucial that the ICC, according to Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, must always accept and review such a challenge, especially if the motion argues that the unlawfulness of the arrest/detention was so serious that it had to lead to the ending of the case. This was the case, whether the challenge, strictly speaking, could be seen as a challenge to the ICC's jurisdiction or not.

Chapter XI then went on to explain that the fact that the ICC concentrated on the violations themselves (and not so much on the question of whether rights were violated intentionally) could be seen as being in accordance with the right to an effective remedy in the case of violations, a right of which Section 3 of Chapter IX had concluded that it could also be qualified as an internationally recognised human right. However, it was also remarked that the additional requirement as could be found in the Bemba Gombo case – that the violation must have caused actual prejudice to the suspect before remedies can be granted – would not be in accordance with this right.

Chapter XI then turned to the point that the ICC had acknowledged that whenever it exercised jurisdiction, whenever the ICC was involved in a case, that involvement had to be in accordance with internationally recognised human rights. This appeared to be a correct interpretation of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute. It was then explained that if the ICC('s Appeals Chamber) were to agree with the Pre-Trial Chamber that it would look, beyond the constructive custody of the suspect, to irregularities which result from concerted action between the ICC and third parties, that stance would be in accordance with the scope of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute. However, it was also noted that if the Appeals Chamber followed its additional requirement that it would only look at irregularities suffered by the suspect if that suspect was in detention for the same crimes as those for which he is now being prosecuted at the ICC, this could be seen as a violation of Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute because that provision applied to any situation in which the ICC is involved.

One of the most interesting points of the internal assessment was that the ICC's male detentus test assumed the involvement of the ICC (or third parties working at its behest). It appeared that the ICC would not refuse jurisdiction, for example, if private individuals were responsible for a very serious male captus. This would be unproblematic if the ICC had accepted the abuse of process doctrine, which is very general and which merely demands that judges must refuse jurisdiction if they feel that the male captus is so serious that it would undermine the integrity of the court/their sense of justice/the idea of a fair trial in general to continue the case. However, the ICC had rejected this doctrine. How was this rejection of the abuse of process doctrine to be assessed vis-à-vis the ICC's law?

It was noted that the ICC judges were right when they argued that this doctrine could not be found in the ICC's proper instruments pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (a) of the ICC Statute. However, after having clarified that a certain provision of the ICC Statute – Article 4, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute – "cannot be construed as providing power to stay proceedings for abuse of process", they concluded that Article 21, paragraph 1 (a) of the ICC Statute was exhaustive on the matter and hence that one did not have to look to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute.

Serious doubts were raised, however, as to whether this conclusion was in accordance with the ICC's law. It was noted that it seemed far too easy to conclude that the ICC Statute was exhaustive on the matter simply because the abuse of process doctrine was not explicitly mentioned or implicitly covered (via – the seemingly irrelevant – Article 4, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute) by the ICC instruments. It was explained that the judges, who arguably focused too much on the common law label 'abuse of process' here, had not seriously reviewed other relevant provisions which might shed light on the question of whether the ICC had power to issue a male detentus verdict in the case of a serious male captus, taking into account the rules of interpretation of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (as was done in Chapter IX of this book). Chapter XI maintained that the much more extensive review in Chapter IX had arguably shown that Article 21, paragraph 1 (a) of the ICC Statute, taking into account Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, was not exhaustive on the matter and thus that one could turn to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute to fill this legal lacuna. And, as argued in that chapter, the power of a court to refuse jurisdiction in the case of a serious male captus might be seen as a principle/rule of international law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) of the ICC Statute (namely as practice of international courts) or as a general principle of law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute. In addition, it was explained that because the power of a court to refuse jurisdiction in very serious male captus cases, without looking at the exact label of this power (such as abuse of process/supervisory powers) now, was used by so many (inter)national courts, it could be seen as an inherent power of any court, including of the ICC (even if it could not be construed via Article 4, paragraph 1 of the ICC Statute).

Another important aspect from the internal assessment concerned the ICC's views on Article 59 of the ICC Statute. Although the Appeals Chamber in Lubanga Dyilo did not go into this matter, the Pre-Trial Chamber in that case clarified the fact that the competent judicial authority in the custodial State was not obliged to look into the pre-trial phase if that phase concerned national proceedings only. However, Chapter XI continued, that appeared to mean that the competent judicial authority was, nevertheless, allowed to do so and in fact, was obliged to do so if those national proceedings were somehow related to the ICC, for example, because the ICC was involved in them. It was noted that that would constitute a role in accordance with Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, which demanded compliance with internationally recognised human rights as from the moment the ICC was involved in a case, which may, of course, be the case before the official requests were sent to the national authorities. However, regarding the role of the ICC judges, as the supervisors marginally reviewing this provision, Chapter XI remarked that both the Pre-Trial Chamber and the Appeals Chamber did not discuss to what extent these judges could look into the phase before the official ICC requests were sent. In addition, both Chambers, and the same goes for the judges in Bemba Gombo, did not clearly review the execution of the ICC's official arrest in terms of provisions such as Articles 21, paragraph 3 and 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute. (They merely stressed the importance of such rights in their decisions more generally.) They seemed interested in national law alone. It was argued that this restrictive interpretation was in violation of the ICC's own law, since both provisions certainly apply to the Article 59 of the ICC Statute proceedings. (Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute applies already as from the moment the ICC becomes involved in the case and Article 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute applies already as from the moment the ICC initiates an investigation.)

The final point which had to be addressed was that the Appeals Chamber was only interested in the ultimate remedy, the refusal of jurisdiction/a halt of the procedures. However, it was explained that Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute contained the internationally recognised human right to an effective remedy in the case of a violation. This meant that every violation as from the moment the ICC becomes involved in the case had to be repaired, whether this leads to the ending of the case or not. Although it was possible that no violations occurred in Lubanga Dyilo as from the moment the ICC became involved in it (and hence that no violation of the ICC's law occurred in this case), the ICC was reminded not to forget in general that suspects would, however, be entitled, pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, to appropriate remedies in the case of violations as from the moment the ICC becomes involved in the case.

Now that the central question of this study was answered, Chapter XI turned to the most important recommendations.

First of all, it was argued that the ICC should at least follow its own law. This meant that the ICC should reject all the above-mentioned reasonings which could be seen as being in violation of Article 21 of the ICC Statute, and in particular its paragraph 3.

Hence, it was argued that the ICC ought to abandon the old-fashioned and restrictive concept of a fair trial that certain violations must be such that a person can no longer make his defence before one can speak of the impossibility of a fair trial (if that concept was indeed supported by the ICC in the male captus discussion).

Furthermore, it was noted that it is to be welcomed that in theory, the ICC so often stressed the importance of human rights, even for suspects of the most serious crimes and even regarding rights which are not explicitly mentioned in the ICC Statute (such as the right to challenge the lawfulness of one's detention), but that also meant that suspects had to be able to exercise those rights in practice. However, it could be argued, Chapter XI continued, that the Katanga case, for example, did not crystallise that thought. It was submitted that judges should always want to find out what happened to their suspects, what the foundation of their case was. Consequently, they were not to focus too much on the exact title of the male captus motion or dismiss too readily the entire motion for being submitted too late. Judges could also censure the Defence for its tardiness and still proprio motu review the allegations. Although it was recognised that the ICC's system is in many respects unique and should be preserved as much as possible, it was also claimed that the judges could not hide behind this uniqueness to disregard what is arguably their main task, namely to try suspects of international crimes in a fair way. With that came a serious examination of the way in which those suspects were brought into the jurisdiction of the ICC, of the foundation of their case.

It was noted that the feeling one got from the Katanga case, that the judges did not seem to be really interested in a full examination of the legality of the pre-trial phase, could also be found in the Lubanga Dyilo and Bemba Gombo cases, where the judges did not seriously examine the relevance of provisions such as Articles 21, paragraph 3 and 55, paragraph 1 (d) of the ICC Statute in the context of Article 59 of the ICC Statute. In addition, one could also refer to the focus on the ultimate remedy in Lubanga Dyilo here. It was argued that the ICC must be very careful not to, in the words of Sluiter, "retreat within the safe limits of The Hague".

The ICC had stated that whenever it exercised jurisdiction, whenever it was involved in a case, that exercise of jurisdiction, that involvement (which included the actions of third parties working at the behest of the ICC) had to be in accordance with Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute. This was a correct statement of the law, meaning, in turn, that the ICC Appeals Chamber's additional requirement that it would only look into irregularities if the suspect was in detention at the national level for the same crimes as those for which he is now being prosecuted at the ICC had to be abandoned. However, Chapter XI submitted that even though the first statement was in accordance with the ICC's law, the judges should go one step further: they should examine any violation which occurs in the context of their case more generally, whether or not there is involvement on the part of the ICC. It was explained that normally, violations which occur during a period before the ICC was involved in a case will not readily be viewed as falling within the context of the ICC's case. Hence, this broader test was not to be feared too much from a practical point of view. Conversely, it had to be cherished from a legal point of view, because it was the only test which could enable judges to remedy violations which they deemed to fall within the context of their case, even if the ICC was not yet involved in it.

Another important recommendation was that if the ICC is confronted by a new male captus case, it should more extensively examine whether or not it has the power to refuse (the exercise of) jurisdiction in serious male captus cases, comparable with the abuse of process doctrine. Chapter XI asserted that the examination in Chapter IX had arguably shown that Article 21, paragraph 1 (a) of the ICC Statute was not exhaustive on the matter and hence that the judges could turn to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) and (c) of the ICC Statute. If they agreed with this study that these provisions, via concepts such as "principles and rules of international law" and "general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world" could cover established practices of (inter)national courts, they could use these practices to solve their male captus problem.

As concerns "principles and rules of international law", Chapter XI pointed to the acceptance of a broad concept of abuse of process (in that jurisdiction might be refused in very serious male captus cases, irrespective of the entity responsible) and the fact that the seriousness of the crimes with which the suspect is charged could be taken into account when applying the abuse of process doctrine.

If these principles brought no relief, Chapter XI continued, the ICC might turn to the "general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world". These stipulated that most courts confronted by a male captus will use their discretion, for instance (in the common law system) under the abuse of process doctrine, to balance all the different elements of the case to decide whether or not the male captus is so serious that jurisdiction must be refused. In addition, most courts seemed to refuse jurisdiction only if their own authorities were involved in the male captus. Finally, it appeared that quite a number of courts – although it was unclear whether "quite a number" would be enough to lead to a general principle of law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute – would also take into account the seriousness of the crimes with which the victim of the male captus was charged in deciding whether or not jurisdiction had to be refused.

Finally, Chapter XI explained that because both the "principles and rules of international law" and the "general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world" seemed to accept an abuse of process-like power, one could argue that any court, including the ICC, was invested with such an inherent power.

Hence, Chapter XI argued that even if the judges did not accept that the reasoning behind the abuse of process doctrine could be seen as a principle/rule of international law pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (b) of the ICC Statute or otherwise as general principle of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 1 (c) of the ICC Statute, they had to embrace the abuse of process-like power they arguably already possessed ("inherent") – in the same way as they seemed to embrace the right of a suspect to challenge the lawfulness of his detention (probably including, in principle, the remedy to be released in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention), even if that right was not explicitly mentioned in the ICC instruments. In exercising that power, Chapter XI continued, they should balance all the different elements of the case in finding the most appropriate remedies for the violations, such as the seriousness of the alleged crimes/the importance of having the case continued and the seriousness of the male captus, which increased when the involvement of the ICC was greater (thereby looking at all the different possibilities of attributing conduct to the ICC, including, for example, acknowledgment and adoption of the conduct as its own), when the violations had been committed intentionally, when the male captus had caused great prejudice to the suspect, when the male captus was accompanied by serious mistreatment, etc.

Chapter XI then noted that if the ICC were not convinced that such a broad balancing exercise could be found in the ICC's law or could not be seen as an inherent power of the Court, it might, perhaps, be more susceptible to practical arguments. Chapter XI recalled that the male detentus test of the ICC 'only' took into account the human rights dimension of the abuse of process doctrine. In addition, it assumed the involvement of the ICC (or third parties working at its behest).

According to this study, this could lead to serious problems engendered by male captus situations, which, for example, involved violations of State sovereignty and/or violations committed by States/private individuals in which the ICC was not involved.

Chapter XI explained that under the abuse of process doctrine, judges could refuse jurisdiction if they are of the opinion that such a serious male captus in the context of an ICC case occurred that they can no longer, in good conscience, continue with the case. This is a very general test which could cover, for example, violations of State sovereignty and violations committed by States/private individuals in which the ICC was not involved. (It was noted in this context that it was probable, or at least to be hoped, that the ICC judges would not follow the 'carte blanche' decision of the ICTY Appeals Chamber's decision in Nikolić and would attach more importance to the value of State sovereignty, a concept which the judges of the "lateral" ICC could not ignore in the same way as the judges of the truly "vertical" ICTY had done.) However, Chapter XI continued, under the present

ICC test, this would not seem to be possible, whereas the ICC should definitively have the tools, the possibility to refuse jurisdiction in such situations.

Another important suggestion was connected to the previously mentioned right of a suspect to challenge the lawfulness of his arrest/detention. Chapter XI explained that if the judge is of the opinion that his arrest/detention is indeed unlawful (but not so serious that jurisdiction must be refused), he may wonder what the consequences of that determination must be, now that the ICC Statute does not mention the remedy of release in the case of an unlawful arrest/detention and now that this right, including its remedy of release, can be seen as having customary international law status and thus, in principle, is applicable to the ICC as well. Here, Chapter XI made it clear that the judges might turn to the examination of this remedy in Chapter IX, where it was concluded that pursuant to Article 21, paragraph 3 of the ICC Statute, this remedy is in principle to be accorded. However, it was also explained in that context (and also elsewhere in this book and in this summary) that the remedy is problematic because it is over-simplified, because it can be used as a pro forma remedy and finally because there is a risk that a suspect of international crimes will escape prosecution because he is released for a minor violation, for example, because he was not promptly informed of the reasons for his arrest. This study argued that not only in the context of the abuse of process doctrine (or a comparable doctrine which can be used in determining whether the male captus is so serious that jurisdiction must be refused) but also in the context of this problematic remedy of release, a judge should be able to consider all the relevant elements of the case, including the seriousness of the alleged crimes. That meant, Chapter XI continued, that a suspect of international crimes should not be released because of the determination of 'unlawful arrest/detention' but should remain in custody and should be granted other appropriate remedies, such as a reduction of the sentence (on the basis of Rule 145 of the ICC RPE), compensation (which in any case appeared to be mandatory pursuant to Article 85 of the ICC Statute) or perhaps merely a statement that a violation had occurred and that this had to be regretted, taking into account the seriousness of the male captus. However, Chapter XI also noted that if the unlawful arrest/detention was very serious, for example, because the ICC orchestrated an abduction, jurisdiction had to be refused and the person permanently released. This is a far-reaching consequence, but some male captus situations are so serious that the ICC, in good conscience, can no longer proceed with the case without undermining its integrity as an institution based on law. Furthermore, it was also stressed that the fact that the ICC could no longer try this suspect did not mean that it should not do everything in its power to ensure that the suspect was tried before another court. It still had a general duty to fight impunity, whether that fight takes place before the ICC or not.

However, Chapter XI asserted that the most important thing was that tribunals/ICC judges, as the final adjudicators, as the ultimate guarantors of the suspect's rights, remedy every violation occurring in the context of their case, whether or not that leads to a refusal of jurisdiction and irrespective of the entity responsible. It was argued that such an approach, in which context the ICC judges might use the determinations of the competent judicial authority in the custodial State as a first indication of how certain irregularities at the national level had to be assessed, would deter parties in the arrest and surrender proceedings from committing irregularities, would best protect the integrity of the ICC and would provide fairness to the suspect, who would not become the victim of a legal vacuum due to the fact that his case had been fragmented over two or more jurisdictions. In addition, because not many male captus cases are so serious that jurisdiction must be refused, it was argued that neither would it easily jeopardise the victims' idea of fairness (in that a trial must be held). Moreover, it would lead to greater differentiation in a context which is sometimes overly focused on the ultimate remedy (refusal of jurisdiction). This, Chapter XI continued, would also 'soften' the old-fashioned male captus bene detentus image that international courts have. Even though it appeared that the ICC followed the male captus male detentus reasoning as concerns serious irregularities by the suspect's "accusers" (which included the actions of third parties working at the ICC's behest), something which was to be welcomed, it was explained that the male captus cases by which the ICC would be confronted would very often not concern such irregularities. This meant that in practice, the ICC would probably almost always continue a male captus case, which could, in a way, be seen as acceptance of the male captus bene detentus rule. (It was applauded in that respect that the ICC explicitly supported neither the male captus bene detentus nor the male captus male detentus rule, as these maxims were arguably the height of simplicity, leaving no room for differentiation at all.)

Regarding the above-mentioned point that it appeared that the ICC followed the male captus male detentus reasoning as concerns serious irregularities by the suspects "accusers"; this study was very much in favour of granting discretion, in the context of the abuse of process doctrine (or a comparable doctrine) and in the context of determining the consequences of an unlawful arrest/detention, to judges so that they balance all the relevant elements of the case. However, it was also aware of the fact that too much discretion can lead to problems, for example, in terms of equality, transparency and predictability. Hence, there had to be some beacons to guide this discretion.

First of all, Chapter XI submitted that in some cases, it had to be understood that there is normally only one possible outcome. For example, if it became clear that the OTP was involved in an abduction operation flouting all the relevant legal rules, the judges could not but refuse jurisdiction if they still wanted to be taken seriously as custodians of the law, whether or not that suspect was charged with serious crimes. This view, Chapter XI noted, which fell short of the test about which more recent State practice seemingly agreed that it must, in any event, lead to rejection of the male captus bene detentus rule, probably also constituted the view of the ICC and that was to be welcomed. In other less obvious cases, all the above-mentioned elements had to play a guiding role in determining whether or not jurisdiction ought to be refused. Thus, even though certain indicators had to be followed in the balancing exercise to ensure that the discretion is not unlimited, the ultimate responsibility, Chapter XI asserted, still had to lie with the judges because it was shown that too harsh rules might also lead to abuse and because judges might always be confronted by situations not envisaged.

Finally, Chapter XI noted that this book was premised on two features of the ICC's system, namely that the ICC cannot try suspects in absentia and does not have its own police force. However, it was explained that one could obviously imagine that if the ICC were to be endowed with these features, this could decrease the chances of the ICC judges being confronted by a male captus case in the first place.

In this context, it was argued that although this study had shown that the idea of an own international arrest team was not yet politically feasible, the ICC might consider following the example of the ICTY in creating tracking teams. However, because the work of such teams consisted of traditional police work in the State in question, they had to have the consent of that State, which would obviously be very difficult, if not impossible, to obtain from uncooperative States.

Chapter XI then noted that allowing – under certain circumstances – trials in absentia would solve that problem.

However, as the ICC was simply not (yet) equipped with these features, it was explained that this meant that it must make (perhaps more) use of the tools it already has.

In this context, it was submitted more generally that the ICC must stay far away from dubious methods of bringing a suspect into its jurisdiction because resorting to such methods to reach a short-term goal, besides the fact that it undermines, at that particular moment, the values for which the ICC stands, and that it may not be that 'successful' at all given that such tactics can lead to the ending of the case (see supra), can seriously damage the ICC's mission in the long run.

This was, Chapter XI explained, because, among other things, the ICC needs the practical support of the international community, especially because it does not have its own enforcement arm. Hence, to ensure that it has the constant goodwill of States, the ICC's enforcers, it must always prosecute a suspect in a fair, law-abiding way. If sceptical, but mighty States (such as the US) see that the ICC is a fair court, Chapter XI continued, they may more readily become a party to the ICC Statute, which will in turn lead to greater support and a more powerful enforcement arm of the ICC.

As a result, this study argued that if judges are confronted by the dilemma presented in the very first chapter of this book, namely effectiveness (in the sense of achieving prosecutions and convictions) versus fairness, they should always opt for the latter concept. Only fairness can engender real effectiveness, meaning effectiveness in the long term.

Another important point expressed in Chapter XI was that introducing new tools for the ICC to increase its capabilities to start a trial, such as a provision on allowing trials in absentia (if that possibility were to be introduced in the future), runs the risk of masking the real problem, namely why the enforcement arm of the ICC, formed by States party to the ICC Statute (and States ordered by the UNSC to cooperate with the ICC), is not functioning as it should. It was remembered that States have the prime obligation to arrest and surrender suspects and that this obligation must be taken very seriously.

According to Chapter XI, this meant, for example, that if suspects could not be apprehended by the custodial State, other States (or States working together in an international peacekeeping force) had to assist that State in its efforts. Not only logistically or financially, but perhaps also with an actual arrest team.

As regards uncooperative States, it was explained that third States had to turn to the carrot-and-stick method which had worked so well for the ICTY, meaning that they had to stress that cooperation with the ICC would lead to financial/political support and that non-cooperation would lead to embargoes/sanctions/political isolation. Such a method, Chapter XI continued, would have more legitimacy if it were executed within the context of a collectivity of States, such as international organisations. In this context, reference was also made to the role of the UNSC. Although Chapter XI acknowledged that this organ's relationship with the ICC is a difficult one, it was argued that if that organ decides that certain States must cooperate with the ICC and those States refuse to do so, the UNSC should act, much more than it has done until now. In this context, a number of strategies were presented which could help the UNSC in its efforts to fight impunity and to save its own credibility.

In short, Chapter XI argued that the international community, the enforcement pillar of the ICC, must (better) understand that it has major responsibilities in the functioning, effectiveness and thus success and credibility of the ICC. The international community has, in the words of Rastan, a responsibility to enforce here.

Chapter XI, Part 5 and this study ended with a brief epilogue in which it was hoped, among other things, that this study (including its critical observations as can be found in Subsection 2.3 and Section 3 of Chapter XI), or the discussions which it may engender, will inspire and help the ICC when it is confronted by a new male captus situation to issue a decision which does (more) justice to its difficult but commendable objective, namely to fight impunity in a fair way. A fight, as was argued in Section 3 of Chapter XI, that can only be won if the international community takes its responsibility as the ICC's enforcer seriously.

SAMENVATTING (DUTCH SUMMARY)

In Deel 1 (en Hoofdstuk I) van dit boek maakte de lezer kennis met het onderwerp van deze studie. De geruchtmakende ontvoering van Adolf Eichmann in Argentinië op 11 mei 1960 en de recente kidnapping van de van terrorisme verdachte Abu Omar in Italië op 17 juni 2003 lieten zien dat het gebruik van onregelmatige methoden destijds een optie was, en nu nog steeds een optie is, bij het in hechtenis nemen van verdachten, vooral als de belangen groot zijn dan wel als zodanig worden beschouwd.

Omdat het Internationaal Strafhof (IS) eveneens met verdachten van ernstige misdrijven moet omgaan, rees de vraag hoe dit Hof, het – volgens deze studie – meest belangrijke instituut op het gebied van internationaal strafrecht, zich opstelt ten aanzien van verdachten die beweren dat de manier waarop zij onder de jurisdictie van het Hof zijn gebracht onregelmatig was (male captus). Zou het ten gronde kiezen – natuurlijk rekening houdend met het feit dat veel zou/zal afhangen van de precieze omstandigheden van het geval – voor effectiviteit (in de zin van het tot stand komen van vervolgingen en veroordelingen) en zijn jurisdictie blijven uitoefenen ondanks de male captus (male captus bene detentus) of zou het van oordeel zijn dat waarden als fairness, mensenrechten en de integriteit van het proces eisen dat in het geval van een male captus, de uitoefening van jurisdictie moet worden geweigerd (male captus male detentus/ex iniuria ius non oritur)?

Dit leidde tot de volgende centrale vraag:

Hoe gaat het IS momenteel om met de dilemma's die een male captus zaak met zich meebrengt en hoe dient deze aanpak beoordeeld te worden?

Om deze vraag te kunnen beantwoorden werd uiteengezet dat er twee toetsingskaders zouden worden gecreëerd; een extern kader (om na te gaan hoe vergelijkbaar of verschillend de male captus opstelling van het IS was ten opzichte van de opstelling van andere hoven die eerder met dit probleem te maken hebben gehad) en een intern kader (om na te gaan hoe de opstelling van het IS moet worden beoordeeld ten opzichte van zijn eigen recht op basis van Artikel 21 van het IS Statuut).

Naast het beantwoorden van deze centrale vraag werd duidelijk gemaakt dat deze studie nog twee andere doelen had, namelijk 1) het meer in het algemeen samenvoegen van twee fascinerende onderwerpen die nog niet eerder in één boek zijn verschenen (het IS en het male captus bene detentus maxime) en 2) het bijdragen aan de male captus discussie zelf, aan de discussie hoe IS rechters en rechters in het algemeen het best kunnen omgaan met vermeende onregelmatigheden in de voorfase van de aan hen voorgelegde zaak, aan de discussie op welke wijze een zowel effectief als eerlijk proces kan worden bereikt.

In Deel 2 van deze studie werd het maxime male captus bene detentus zelf onder de loep genomen.

Hoofdstuk II onderzocht de herkomst van het maxime en merkte onder andere op dat hoewel male captus bene detentus in de literatuur vaak is bestempeld als een "ancient" of "old" Romeins maxime, een bescheiden Romeins strafrechtelijk onderzoek liet zien dat het maxime helemaal geen antieke wortels leek te hebben en dat de uit vier woorden bestaande Latijnse spreuk in feite relatief modern zou kunnen zijn.

In elk geval was de oudste tekst waarin deze studie het maxime tegenkwam M.H. Cardozo's artikel 'When Extradition Fails, Is Abduction the Solution?', dat werd gepubliceerd in de American Journal of International Law van januari 1961.

Hoofdstuk II onderzocht ook de herkomst van de gedachte achter het maxime en concludeerde dat de juridische redenering in de Engelse Ex Parte Susannah Scott zaak, van de hand van Lord Chief Justice Tenterden van de Court of King's Bench, van dinsdag 19 mei 1829, waarschijnlijk de oudste male captus bene detentus gedachte is met een werkelijk méér jurisdicties omvattende, internationale, dimensie – de dimensie waar deze studie zich op richtte.

In Hoofdstuk III werden de verschillende elementen van het maxime diepgaand onderzocht aan de hand van vier hoofdvragen: 1) "Welke male captus situaties bestaan er?" 2) "Wat wordt er geschonden door deze male captus situaties?" 3) "Wie schendt?" en 4) "Wat zijn de gevolgen van zulke schendingen?"

In het kader van de eerste hoofdvraag werd allereerst toegelicht dat, ook al kunnen male captus situaties elke onregelmatigheid in de juridische voorfase omvatten die gezien kan worden als een onregelmatigheid welke valt binnen de context van een bepaalde zaak (inclusief, bijvoorbeeld, een onregelmatige voorlopige hechtenis), Hoofdstuk III zich zou concentreren op drie basis male captus situaties die keken naar de onregelmatigheid van de aanhouding: verkapte uitlevering, luring en kidnapping/ontvoering. Omdat deze situaties uit de horizontale, interstatelijke context voortkomen, werd toegelicht dat deze context de voornaamste achtergrond zou zijn waartegen Hoofdstuk III zou worden besproken.

Na deze drie basis male captus situaties te hebben besproken werd uiteengezet welke waarden zij zouden kunnen schenden (staatssoevereiniteit, mensenrechten – waaronder de belangrijkste twee: het recht op vrijheid en veiligheid/het recht niet te worden onderworpen aan willekeurige arrestatie of gevangenhouding, rechten met een volgens deze studie internationaal gewoonterechtelijke/algemeen internationaalrechtelijke status – en het meer algemene concept rule of law) en welke uitzonderingen van toepassing zouden kunnen zijn om te bewerkstelligen dat geen schendingen plaatsvinden: toestemming, zelfverdediging en humanitaire gronden (ten aanzien van een schending van staatssoevereiniteit) alsmede oorlog of een andere algemene noodtoestand (ten aanzien van een mensenrechtschending).

In het kader van de mensenrechtelijke context werden twee belangrijke bepalingen besproken, namelijk artikel 9, lid 1 van het Internationaal Verdrag inzake Burgerrechten en Politieke Rechten (IVBPR) en artikel 5, lid 1 van het Europees Verdrag tot Bescherming van de Rechten van de Mens en de Fundamentele Vrijheden (EVRM). Naast een meer theoretische analyse van beide bepalingen werd onderzocht hoe de mensenrechtelijke organen die toezicht houden op het IVBPR (namelijk het Mensenrechtencomité) en het EVRM (namelijk de (nu niet meer bestaande) Europese Commissie voor de Rechten van de Mens en het Europees Hof voor de Rechten van de Mens) deze bepalingen hadden geïnterpreteerd in de context van vermeende male captus zaken.

Een interessante observatie uit deze context was dat er een verschil waarneembaar is tussen enerzijds de Europese Commissie voor de Rechten van de Mens en het Europees Hof voor de Rechten van de Mens, die de houding van de gelaedeerde staat nog steeds belangrijk achten bij het bepalen of een kidnapping/ontvoering mensenrechten schendt, en anderzijds het Mensenrechtencomité, dat enkel en alleen oog lijkt te hebben voor de belangen van het individu en dus kan concluderen dat een mensenrechtschending heeft plaatsgevonden, zelfs indien de 'gelaedeerde' staat heeft samengespannen in de operatie en dus zelfs indien er geen probleem is vanuit een klassiek (interstatelijk) internationaalrechtelijk oogpunt.

Meer in het algemeen leek het erop dat terwijl het Mensenrechtencomité alleen de belangen van het individu op het oog heeft, de Europese instituten ook de andere kant van de medaille meenemen, namelijk het belang van samenwerking tussen staten bij het vervolgen van vermeende criminelen – een opvatting die zeer goed werd verwoord in de beroemde Öcalan zaak. Een opvatting die ook misbruikt kan worden om enigszins dubieuze procedures in de voorfase van het strafproces door de vingers te zien. In dat opzicht is het niet vreemd dat de literatuur verscheidene zaken van de Europese instituten, inclusief de Öcalan zaak, heeft bekritiseerd wegens het (impliciet) steunen van het male captus bene detentus maxime.

De bespreking van de derde hoofdvraag van Hoofdstuk III – "Wie schendt?" – maakte duidelijk dat niet alleen staten/staatsambtenaren, maar ook particulieren betrokken kunnen zijn bij de verschillende male captus situaties. Het behandelde de controversiële kwestie of particulieren als zodanig waarden als staatssoevereiniteit en mensenrechten kunnen schenden en concludeerde dat er geen pasklaar antwoord is op deze vraag. Daarom werd geopperd, hierbij gebruik makende van het voorbeeld van een kidnapping van een persoon door particulieren in de context van de tribunalen, dat men meer in het algemeen kon stellen dat, zelfs wanneer men van oordeel is dat particulieren, in principe, niet het recht op vrijheid en veiligheid van die persoon of de soevereiniteit van de gelaedeerde staat hebben kunnen schenden, het eveneens moeilijk is om de ontvoering als een puur private schending van nationaal recht te zien. Omdat de kidnapping de reden is waarom de verdachte nu voor zijn rechters staat, heeft deze een zekere publieke dimensie gekregen. Men zou dus kunnen beargumenteren, overigens zonder te beweren dat het tribunaal in zo'n geval het recht op vrijheid en veiligheid van deze persoon of de soevereiniteit van de gelaedeerde staat heeft geschonden, dat een (inbreuk gelijkend op een) schending van het recht van vrijheid en veiligheid van die persoon of van de soevereiniteit van de gelaedeerde staat desondanks heeft plaatsgevonden in de context van de tribunaalzaak en dat het tribunaal deze schending zou moeten herstellen. Natuurlijk mag/moet dan, bij het bepalen van de gevolgen van deze schending/inbreuk, rekening gehouden worden met het feit dat deze is begaan door particulieren.

Na deze discussie werd de minder controversiële kwestie onderzocht hoe gedrag van particulieren kan worden toegerekend aan de staat met behulp van de Draft articles on the responsibility of States for internationally wrongful acts van de International Law Commission (zoals artikel 11 over gedrag dat de staat erkent en tot het zijne maakt), de Eichmann zaak en het concept due diligence.

De vierde en laatste hoofdvraag van dit hoofdstuk behandelde de gevolgen van de verschillende schendingen. In deze context werden onderwerpen behandeld als reparation (zoals teruggave van de verdachte in het geval van schending van staatssoevereiniteit), remedies (zoals vrijlating van de verdachte in het geval van schending van het recht op vrijheid en veiligheid) en abuse of process (zoals het aanhouden van de zaak in het geval van schending van de rule of law). Bovendien werd nagegaan hoe deze verschillende gevolgen gezien moesten worden indien deze werden vergeleken met de male detentus uitkomst, dat wil zeggen de weigering om jurisdictie uit te oefenen.

Een belangrijk punt, aangestipt in de laatste pagina's van dit hoofdstuk, was dat de remedie vrijlating in het geval van een onrechtmatige (arrestatie en) detentie (zie artikel 9, lid 4 van het IVBPR en artikel 5, lid 4 van het EVRM) naar het oordeel van deze studie problematisch is. Indien een persoon slachtoffer is geworden van een onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie (maar niet van een die zo ernstig is dat het leidt tot het einde van de zaak) moet hij, strikt genomen, worden vrijgelaten. Echter, vrijlating sluit een nieuwe arrestatie ter plekke en een hernieuwde uitoefening van jurisdictie niet uit. Dit komt omdat bovengenoemde bepalingen eenvoudigweg spreken over vrijlating (als zodanig) en niet over bijvoorbeeld vrijlating/afwijzing van de zaak with prejudice to de Aanklager, hetgeen betekent dat de Aanklager geen nieuw proces meer tegen deze verdachte kan starten na diens vrijlating. Een nieuwe arrestatie is dus niet uitgesloten, zeker als de verdachte is aangeklaagd voor ernstige misdrijven en vervolging zeer belangrijk wordt geacht. In zo'n geval zouden de vervolgende autoriteiten kunnen beweren dat deze 'remedie' (de 'vrijlating') de initiële iniuria van de onregelmatigheid heeft hersteld en dat het proces vervolgens gewoon doorgang kan vinden. Echter, in dat geval zou de verdachte alleen maar een pro forma remedie verkrijgen, hetgeen niet overeenkomt met het idee dat een remedie daadwerkelijk en effectief moet zijn, zie artikel 2, lid 3 onder (a) van het IVBPR en artikel 13 van het EVRM. Bovendien houdt de pro forma vrijlating geen rekening met de exacte mate van ernst van de onregelmatigheid. Met andere woorden, het is niet alleen een pro forma, maar ook een ongenuanceerde remedie.

Daarom werd gesteld dat het beter zou zijn wanneer de rechter deze problematische remedie van de vrijlating zou vermijden en dat hij, wanneer hij vaststelt dat de arrestatie/detentie van een persoon onrechtmatig is, eenvoudigweg de meest geëigende remedie zou verlenen die rekening houdt met alle omstandigheden van het geval, niet alleen de ernst van de male captus, maar ook de ernst van de vermeende misdrijven van de verdachte en het belang om de zaak voort te zetten. Als men deze route volgt, kan men nog steeds recht doen aan het hierboven genoemde 'gezond verstand' idee dat schuilgaat achter de onmiddellijke nieuwe arrestatie, namelijk dat verdachten van ernstige misdrijven indien mogelijk vervolgd moeten worden – hoewel een male detentus uitkomst natuurlijk ook voor zulke verdachten niet kan worden uitgesloten – maar zal men ook de vreemde, pro forma release en onmiddellijke nieuwe arrestatie vermijden en deze vervangen door werkelijke remedies, zoals strafvermindering en/of compensatie. De rechter kan dan rekening houden met de exacte ernst van de onregelmatigheid bij het bepalen in welke mate strafvermindering of compensatie aan de verdachte zou moeten worden verleend. Zo'n oplossing zou naar het oordeel van deze studie fairder zijn ten opzichte van de verdachte en bovendien beter in staat zijn om nuance in het systeem aan te brengen. Ook ontloopt deze oplossing de (terechte) kritiek die men van verschillende actoren kan verwachten wanneer een verdachte wordt vrijgelaten wegens een onregelmatigheid die niet zo ernstig is dat deze tot het einde van de zaak leidt (in zulke ernstige gevallen dient het publiek te begrijpen dat het hof geen andere keuze heeft dan jurisdictie te weigeren en de verdachte vrij te laten (maar nu daadwerkelijk)), maar die desondanks met zich meebrengt dat de detentie als onrechtmatig moet worden beschouwd en dat, strikt genomen, de verdachte moet worden vrijgelaten. Zelfs indien deze verdachte, gezien zijn vermeende ernstige misdrijven, waarschijnlijk ter plekke opnieuw zou worden gearresteerd, kan men aannemen dat het publiek/de internationale gemeenschap/de slachtoffers niet zullen begrijpen hoe, bijvoorbeeld, een verdachte van genocide kan worden vrijgelaten omdat hij niet onverwijld op de hoogte is gebracht van de redenen van zijn arrestatie, zeker indien deze persoon niet opnieuw gearresteerd wordt en vervolgens de vlucht neemt.

Na deze tamelijk theoretische hoofdstukken over het male captus bene detentus maxime dook Deel 3 van deze studie in de praktijk, met het doel een extern toetsingskader te creëren aan de hand waarvan de huidige male captus opstelling van het IS kon worden vergeleken.

Hoofdstuk IV bevatte een korte introductie die uiteenzette hoe het grootste deel van het boek methodologisch aangepakt ging worden.

In Hoofdstuk V werd male captus rechtspraak uit de context tussen staten kritisch beschreven en geanalyseerd. Het hoofdstuk was verdeeld in drie categorieën en behandelde tientallen interstatelijke zaken uit de volgens deze studie twee belangrijkste rechtssystemen (common en civil law) en een derde categorie interessante zaken die niet (duidelijk) waren onder te brengen in één van deze categorieën. Alle drie de categorieën behandelden zowel oudere als meer recente zaken (de meer recente zaken beginnende bij de Toscanino zaak uit 1974) in de hoop om duidelijker te zien of het maxime zich in een bepaalde richting ontwikkelde of niet.

Alvorens naar de hoofdconclusies van dit hoofdstuk te gaan, die werden samengevat in Hoofdstuk VII, moeten hier eerst de algemene kenmerken van het tussenliggende Hoofdstuk VI worden besproken.

In Hoofdstuk VI werd male captus rechtspraak uit de context tussen staten en internationale/geïnternationaliseerde straftribunalen – opnieuw kritisch – beschreven en geanalyseerd. De 'focus' lag op de volgens deze studie twee belangrijkste internationale straftribunalen, het Joegoslavië Tribunaal (ICTY) en het Rwanda Tribunaal (ICTR). Daarom werden niet alleen tien male captus zaken berecht door deze VN ad hoc Tribunalen uitgebreid bediscussieerd (Dokmanović, Todorović, Milošević, Nikolić, Tolimir en Karadžić (ICTY) en Barayagwiza, Semanza, Kajelijeli en Rwamakuba (ICTR)), maar ook de belangrijkste kenmerken van het verticale samenwerkings- en overleveringsregime van deze Tribunalen behandeld. Verklaard werd dat dit regime zich schijnbaar voornamelijk richtte op effectiviteit, op de verplichting van staten om verdachten over te leveren, en in mindere mate op de rechten van de over te leveren/overgeleverde personen. Desalniettemin werd ook opgemerkt dat de rechtspraak enkele gebreken op papier had hersteld, zoals de afwezigheid van een recht op habeas corpus, een recht de rechtmatigheid van de detentie aan te vechten en vrijgelaten te worden in het geval van een onrechtmatige (arrestatie of) detentie. Tenslotte passeerden ook enige interessante strategieën om een verdachte in hechtenis te nemen de revue, zoals het gebruik van verzegelde aanklachten, vredestroepen, tracking teams en politieke druk van derde staten en organisaties (denk aan de carrot-and-stick methode ten aanzien van geldmiddelen en lidmaatschappen van organisaties).

Daarentegen werden er slechts een paar algemene opmerkingen gewijd aan het juridisch samenwerkingssysteem in de context van de geïnternationaliseerde straftribunalen – tribunalen die half internationaal, half nationaal zijn – omdat het voor het doel van deze studie niet nodig was alle verschillende samenwerkingsregimes van deze tribunalen, die zeer lijken op de horizontale interstatelijke samenwerkingsregimes, in detail uiteen te zetten. Dat achteraf ontdekt werd dat de context van de geïnternationaliseerde straftribunalen slechts één zaak leek te bevatten waarin het male captus probleem een belangrijk facet van de procedure uitmaakte (de Duch zaak voor de Buitengewone Kamers in de Hoven van Cambodja (ECCC), die ging over een vermeende onregelmatige voorlopige hechtenis) zou thans, met de wijsheid van nu, gezien kunnen worden als een andere rechtvaardiging voor een minder vergaande bespreking van het juridisch samenwerkingssysteem in de context van de geïnternationaliseerde straftribunalen. Hoofdstuk VI eindigde tenslotte met enkele interessante observaties afkomstig uit zaken van geïnternationaliseerde straftribunalen die niet gezien konden worden als echte male captus zaken, maar die desondanks onderwerpen aanstipten die meer in het algemeen aan het centrale onderwerp van dit boek konden worden verbonden en die eerder in Hoofdstuk VI de revue waren gepasseerd, zoals habeas corpus en abuse of process.

Het laatste hoofdstuk van dit deel was Hoofdstuk VII, dat beginselen afgeleid uit Hoofdstukken V en VI samenvatte en aldus het externe toetsingskader van deze studie creëerde.

Ten aanzien van de interstatelijke context (Hoofdstuk V) werd opgemerkt dat de meeste rechters uit de oudere male captus zaken de uitoefening van jurisdictie zouden doorzetten, hierbij aangevende dat zij de manier waarop een persoon onder de jurisdictie van de staat van het nu berechtende gerecht was gebracht niet konden of niet wilden (omdat het toch geen verschil zou uitmaken) bezien, zelfs wanneer er onregelmatigheden konden zijn gepleegd (door de autoriteiten van die staat) in de buitenlandse voorfase van het strafproces (male captus bene detentus). Aldus hingen zij de non-inquiry regel en een beperkte notie van een eerlijk proces aan, namelijk door dat deel uit te sluiten dat er toe geleid had dat de persoon überhaupt naar de rechtszaal was gebracht.

Met de komst van mensenrechtenverdragen als het IVBPR en de rijzende status van het individu in de internationale context, leken rechters meer aandacht te besteden aan concepten als een eerlijk proces en waren zij eerder geneigd om de buitenlandse voorfase van het strafproces te bezien, ongeacht de vraag of er wel of niet een protest was gekomen van de gelaedeerde staat.

Dit betekende echter niet dat het male captus bene detentus tijdperk ten einde gekomen was en dat male captus male detentus of ex iniuria ius non oritur nu het door rechters geprefereerde richtsnoer was.

Ook al leek het erop dat de oude(rwetse) versie van de male captus bene detentus regel (dat rechters de manier waarop de verdachte onder de jurisdictie van de staat van het nu berechtende gerecht was gekomen niet kunnen of niet willen bezien) (terecht) was opgegeven, werd ook geconcludeerd dat veel rechters nog steeds beslissingen nemen die gekwalificeerd zouden kunnen worden als male captus bene detentus beslissingen; niet omdat zij zeggen de vermeende onregelmatigheden in de buitenlandse voorfase van het strafproces niet te kunnen of niet te willen bezien (en dus dat zij jurisdictie gaan uitoefenen, ongeacht de omstandigheden waaronder de verdachte onder de jurisdictie van de staat van het nu berechtende gerecht is gekomen), maar omdat zij van oordeel zijn, na de buitenlandse voorfase van het strafproces te hebben onderzocht, dat de vermeende male captus in kwestie niet ernstig genoeg is om afstand te doen van jurisdictie; een (niet zo ernstige) male captus bene detentus. Opgemerkt werd dat veel afhing van de precieze omstandigheden en de vraag hoe deze omstandigheden gewogen dienden te worden in de balancing exercise waarvoor rechters een duidelijke voorkeur hebben.

In sommige gevallen werd de male captus zo ernstig geacht dat rechters van oordeel waren dat het weigeren van jurisdictie de enige manier was om waarden als respect voor staatssoevereiniteit, due process of law/de mensenrechten van de verdachte en de rule of law/de integriteit van de (executieve/gerechtelijke) procedures te beschermen. Veel gehanteerd in dat opzicht was de abuse of process doctrine, die uit de common law context stamt, maar wiens grondgedachte naar het oordeel van deze studie ook gevonden kan worden in de overwegingen van rechters uit andere juridische contexten: gerechten hebben in principe jurisdictie (bene detentus), maar zullen hun discretie gebruiken om geen jurisdictie uit te oefenen (male detentus) wanneer de male captus zo ernstig is dat het een abuse of proces van het gerecht zou zijn om jurisdictie te blijven uitoefenen.

Deze algemene opmerkingen toepassende op de verschillende basis male captus situaties zoals gepresenteerd in Hoofdstuk III van dit boek (verkapte uitlevering, luring en ontvoering – male captus situaties wier definities overigens impliceren dat zij opzettelijk zijn uitgevoerd) en beginnende met ontvoering, concludeerde Hoofdstuk VII dat het erop leek dat de meer recente zaken aantoonden dat gerechten jurisdictie zouden weigeren in het geval van een ontvoering (uitgevoerd door de eigen agenten van de vervolgende staat op het grondgebied van een andere staat, zonder diens toestemming) die 1) gepaard ging met ernstige mensenrechtschendingen/ernstige mishandeling of 2) werd gevolgd door een protest en verzoek tot teruggave van de verdachte door de gelaedeerde staat. Het leek zelfs dat de statenpraktijk in het algemeen aangaf dat in deze twee omstandigheden (de twee zogenaamde Toscanino mogelijkheden/uitzonderingen) jurisdictie moest worden geweigerd. Ten aanzien van de tweede situatie werd zelfs een verdergaande conclusie getrokken, namelijk dat internationaal gewoonterecht schijnbaar aangaf dat een male detentus moest volgen. Ook werd onderstreept dat bovengenoemde situaties gevallen zijn waarin male captus bene detentus in elk geval verworpen werd. Echter, dat betekende niet dat gerechten geen gebruik hebben gebruikt van lagere male captus male detentus drempels bij ontvoeringen. Er zijn ook male captus zaken geweest waar gerechten een male detentus standaard hebben voorgesteld waarin een protest van de gelaedeerde staat of ernstige mishandeling niet vereist is. Het leek er echter op dat deze lagere drempels, ook al vallen deze toe te juichen, en zelfs indien deze zaken gezien kunnen worden als bewijs van een zekere trend in de statenpraktijk, niet evenveel steun kregen in de rest van de wereld als de twee Toscanino mogelijkheden. Het was naar het oordeel van deze studie dan ook niet goed vol te houden dat in elke zaak waarin een ontvoering plaatsvond (zelfs een zonder ernstige mishandeling of zonder een protest en een verzoek tot teruggave van de verdachte) de statenpraktijk (laat staan: internationaal gewoonterecht) aangaf dat een gerecht een male detentus beslissing zal uitvaardigen.

Ten aanzien van de andere twee male captus technieken, luring en verkapte uitlevering (en andere minder ernstige onregelmatige methoden die niet duidelijk in deze drie basis male captus situaties zijn onder te brengen, zoals een informele overdracht tussen twee staten zonder enige procedurele waarborg), lieten nogal wat van de meer recente zaken lieten zien dat zulke technieken, zelfs als zij niet even ernstig worden geacht als ontvoering, nog steeds kunnen leiden tot een weigering om de zaak voort te zetten – iets wat wederom kan worden toegejuicht – mits de eigen autoriteiten van de nu berechtende staat betrokken waren bij de male captus. Dat betekende ook dat gerechten in het algemeen de zaak zouden voortzetten wanneer de eigen autoriteiten van de vervolgende staat niet betrokken waren bij de male captus. Echter, er waren ook nogal wat recente zaken waarin zulke technieken waren gebruikt en waar werd vastgesteld dat de eigen autoriteiten van de vervolgende staat betrokken waren geweest bij de male captus, maar waar het gerecht toch niet jurisdictie weigerde. Deze zaken toonden aan dat een luring operatie of een verkapte uitlevering als zodanig niet beschouwd worden als een dermate ernstige male captus dat dit moet leiden tot het einde van de zaak.

Een belangrijke observatie uit Hoofdstuk VII was dat het element 'ernst van de vermeende misdrijven waarvoor de verdachte is aangeklaagd' soms een rol leek te spelen in de balancing exercise van de rechter; misschien had er dan inderdaad een male captus plaatsgevonden, maar gezien het feit dat de vermeende misdrijven van de verdachte ernstiger waren en de voortzetting van het proces dus van groter belang was, leidde een dergelijke male captus niet tot het einde van de zaak.

Kortom, veel hing af van de precieze omstandigheden, van vragen als: wat voor male captus vond plaats, was de male captus opzettelijk gepleegd, wie pleegde de male captus, leidde de male captus tot een schending van de soevereiniteit van een andere staat (inclusief een protest en een verzoek tot teruggave van de verdachte), was de verdachte ernstig mishandeld tijdens de male captus en was het slachtoffer van de male captus aangeklaagd voor ernstige misdrijven? Tenslotte werd opgemerkt dat rechters soms ook aan de hele male captus discussie voorbijgingen door eenvoudigweg te stellen dat er überhaupt geen male captus had plaatsgevonden, zelfs indien er aanwijzingen waren dat iets onregelmatigs was gebeurd.

Ten aanzien van de beginselen afgeleid uit de zaken tussen staten en internationale/geïnternationaliseerde straftribunalen (Hoofdstuk VI) werd geconcludeerd dat volgens deze studie de tribunalen tegenwoordig de ouderwetse versie van het male captus bene detentus maxime verwerpen, in die zin dat zij niet het idee aanhangen dat de tribunalen jurisdictie hebben, ongeacht de omstandigheden waarin de verdachte voor hen was gebracht. Dit kon worden verklaard uit het feit dat deze tribunalen, na een wellicht wat dubieuze start, vaak het belang van mensenrechten, due process en een eerlijk proces hebben benadrukt en deze concepten in het algemeen niet hebben beperkt tot het proces in de rechtszaal. Deze (toe te juichen) opstelling kon worden verklaard door de omstandigheid dat toen de in dit hoofdstuk besproken tribunalen opkwamen – vanaf de jaren 90 van de vorige eeuw – concepten als mensenrechten en een eerlijk proces al stevig wortel hadden geschoten in de denkrichting van rechters. Het veel oudere idee dat een proces moest worden voortgezet, wat er ook was gebeurd tijdens de procedures die een verdachte voor het gerecht hadden gebracht, was eenvoudigweg niet meer in overeenstemming met deze ideeën.

Echter, ook in deze context van de internationale/geïnternationaliseerde straftribunalen werd aangetoond dat dit niet betekende dat deze als een male captus male detentus context kon worden beschouwd. Integendeel, hoewel in de interstatelijke context nog verschillende male captus zaken resulteerden in een male detentus uitkomst, was er maar één zaak in de context van de internationale/geïnternationaliseerde straftribunalen waar een male captus leidde tot een male detentus uitkomst: de Barayagwiza zaak voor het ICTR. Echter, zelfs die uitkomst werd aangepast (in een bene detentus uitkomst, 'verzacht' met strafvermindering) nadat de regering van Rwanda, die niet toestond dat zo'n 'grote vis' als Barayagwiza aan justitie zou ontsnappen, haar samenwerking met het Tribunaal had opgezegd en nadat de Kamer van Beroep haar beslissing had herzien. Daarom werd beweerd dat de tribunalen, zelfs als zij de ouderwetse versie van het maxime niet steunen en zelfs als zij niet expliciet voorstander zijn van het male captus bene detentus maxime, toch gemakkelijker geassocieerd werden met het laatste maxime dan met zijn tegenpool male captus male detentus. Hoe kon dit worden verklaard?

Hoofdstuk VII maakte duidelijk dat de tribunalen, net als de meeste nationale gerechten, stellen dat zij in principe jurisdictie hebben (bene detentus), maar dat een ernstige male captus situatie, op grond van de discretionaire abuse of process doctrine, tot een male detentus uitkomst kan leiden. Hierbij hebben de tribunalen een brede versie van de abuse of process doctrine omarmd, in die zin dat het bij het bepalen of de male captus zo ernstig is dat jurisdictie zou moeten worden geweigerd, niet zou uitmaken of de entiteit die de male captus heeft gepleegd al dan niet aan het tribunaal gerelateerd kan worden. Deze opvatting, zo zette Hoofdstuk VII uiteen, gaat duidelijk verder dan de nationale abuse of process doctrine waar de betrokkenheid van de autoriteiten van het vervolgende forum vereist lijkt te zijn.

Echter, zelfs als de tribunalen een bredere versie van de abuse of process doctrine hadden omarmd, en zelfs als de tribunalen leken te aanvaarden – dit was niet helder vanwege de onduidelijke beslissing van de Kamer van Beroep van het ICTY in Nikolić, naar het oordeel van deze studie de belangrijkste male captus beslissing van de tribunalencontext – dat zij jurisdictie zouden weigeren in het geval van een 'normale' ontvoering gepleegd door hun eigen mensen – en aldus zouden 'duiken' onder de male detentus standaard van het interstatelijke niveau – werden zij nog steeds gemakkelijker geassocieerd met de male captus bene detentus regel omdat geen enkele male captus situatie uiteindelijk had geleid tot een male detentus uitkomst. Dit, zo vervolgde Hoofdstuk VII, kon verklaard worden door de volgende twee factoren. (Opgemerkt zij dat de volgende twee factoren uitgaan van het bestaan van een male captus. Echter, net als de gerechten op het interstatelijke niveau kunnen ook tribunalen van oordeel zijn dat er überhaupt geen make captus had plaatsgevonden, zelfs als men kan betwijfelen of dat wel juist is.)

Allereerst zal de male captus, omdat de tribunalen geen eigen politiemacht hebben, vaak gepleegd worden door derde partijen. Dit vermindert natuurlijk de ernst van de male captus.

De tweede factor die kan verklaren dat de tribunalen nog steeds gemakkelijker worden geassocieerd met de male captus bene detentus regel is dat de rechters, zelfs wanneer zij vaststellen dat er zich een ernstige male captus heeft voorgedaan, ook oog hebben voor de andere kant van de medaille, namelijk de omstandigheid dat de verdachte is aangeklaagd voor ernstige misdrijven en dat de internationale gemeenschap eist dat de verdachte, indien mogelijk, vervolgd zou moeten worden. Ten gronde hebben de rechters dus te bepalen, hierbij rekening houdend met elk aspect van de aan hen voorgelegde zaak, wat belangrijker is: de male captus of het feit dat de verdachte wordt vervolgd.

Met andere woorden, hoewel een ernstige male captus tot een male detentus uitkomst kan leiden, zelfs ten aanzien van verdachten van ernstige misdrijven (denk aan het bovengenoemde punt dat de tribunalen waarschijnlijk jurisdictie zullen weigeren wanneer hun eigen mensen betrokken zijn bij een ontvoering) is de male captus vaak niet zo ernstig. Niet alleen ten aanzien van de gebruikte male captus techniek, maar ook ten aanzien van de actoren die verantwoordelijk zijn voor de male captus.

Uiteengezet werd dat een door het Bureau van de Aanklager (OTP) georganiseerde ontvoering dus tot het einde van de zaak kan leiden terwijl dat niet het geval hoeft te zijn bij een ontvoering uitgevoerd door derde partijen (zie ook de beslissing van de Kamer van Beroep van het ICTY in Nikolić). Dit zal waarschijnlijk echter anders zijn wanneer deze ontvoering gepaard gaat met andere ernstige schendingen/onregelmatigheden, zoals ernstige mishandeling. (Opgemerkt zij dat zelfs wanneer de tribunalen zich hier vaak concentreerden op ernstige mishandeling, de standaard 'slechts' zulke ernstige schendingen/onregelmatigheden vereist dat de rechter de zaak niet kan voortzetten, maar niet noodzakelijkerwijs ernstige mishandeling/op marteling gelijkende omstandigheden.) In zo'n geval kan de male captus ook tot een male detentus uitkomst leiden, zelfs wanneer de OTP niet verantwoordelijk is voor de male captus.

Wat betreft de minder ernstige male captus situaties zoals luring zette Hoofdstuk VII uiteen dat een luring operatie uitgevoerd door de OTP door de vingers werd gezien door de Kamer van Berechting van het ICTY in Dokmanović, maar dat die bene detentus uitkomst anders kon zijn geweest wanneer de luring gepaard was gegaan met, bijvoorbeeld, ernstige mishandeling. Bovendien werd ook opgemerkt dat de algemene redeneringen uit, bijvoorbeeld, de Nikolić en Barayagwiza zaken, zaken die werden berecht ná de Dokmanović zaak, met zich mee kunnen brengen dat tribunaalrechters, geconfronteerd met op luring gelijkende situaties, van oordeel zijn dat de OTP niet met clean hands naar het hof is gekomen, dat deze zijn toevlucht heeft genomen tot illegale handelingen en dus dat jurisdictie moet worden geweigerd.

Deze studie heeft het bovengenoemde element 'ernst van de vermeende misdrijven' erkend in de context van de discretionaire abuse of process doctrine, maar heeft er ook voor gewaarschuwd dat dit geen carte blanche mag worden ten aanzien van het overleveren van verdachten van ernstige misdrijven aan de tribunalen (en hetzelfde geldt voor de interstatelijke context): de visie dat men tot op zekere hoogte rekening kan houden met de ernst van de misdrijven wanneer men moet besluiten wat de gevolgen zullen zijn van een bepaalde male captus, kan op geen enkele wijze gezien worden als instemming met het gebruik van bepaalde male captus technieken in de context van internationale misdrijven. Sommige male captus situaties zijn zo ernstig – bijvoorbeeld omdat de OTP opzettelijk ernstige (procedurele) onregelmatigheden heeft gepleegd in het proces van overlevering van een verdachte aan justitie, zoals een ontvoering – dat jurisdictie geweigerd zou moeten worden indien het tribunaal serieus genomen wil worden als *recht*shof, of het nu te maken heeft met een verdachte van ernstige misdrijven of niet. Men zou hier ook praktische overwegingen kunnen noemen; naar het oordeel van deze studie zou het voortzetten van de zaak onder zulke omstandigheden ook schadelijk zijn voor de totale missie van het tribunaal. Bovendien mag men niet vergeten dat de negatieve gevolgen van het voortzetten van een ontvoeringszaak niet beperkt hoeven te blijven tot de context van de tribunalen. Voor nationale staten/gerechten kunnen deze internationale instituties gezien worden als de na te volgen voorbeelden. Wanneer werknemers van een tribunaal betrokken zijn bij een ontvoering en daar – in zekere zin – mee wegkomen (omdat de rechters geen jurisdictie weigeren), dan kunnen nationale staten/gerechten verwijzen naar de aanpak van het tribunaal om hun eigen (mogelijk) dubieuze methoden teneinde verdachten voor het gerecht te brengen te rechtvaardigen of om hun 'goedkeuring' van zulke methoden te verdedigen door de zaak voort te zetten. Dat zou op zijn beurt weer schade berokkenen aan de integriteit van deze staten/gerechten, aan de mensenrechten van hun verdachten en – wat veel belangrijker is voor de horizontale context dan voor de tribunalencontext – aan de absolute fundering van het interstatelijke niveau zelf, namelijk aan het respect voor de soevereiniteit van een andere staat.

Hoofdstuk VII verduidelijkte dat het element 'ernst van de vermeende misdrijven' ook werd aanvaard in de meer controversiële context van de gevolgen van de vaststelling dat de arrestatie of detentie van een persoon onrechtmatig was. Wijzende op de problemen van de remedie vrijlating zoals eerder in Hoofdstuk III van dit boek vastgesteld, en benadrukkende dat een vrijlating in de context van de tribunalen zelfs nog gemakkelijker er toe kan leiden dat een verdachte van internationale misdrijven, vanwege relatief kleine onregelmatigheden, aan de greep van justitie ontsnapt, werd aangegeven dat, hoewel het recht natuurlijk moet worden gerespecteerd, men ook voorzichtig moet zijn om het recht niet op zulke strikte wijze toe te passen dat dit tot groot onrecht verwordt: summum ius, summa iniuria.

Met andere woorden, onderstreepte Hoofdstuk VII, de mensenrechten van alle verdachten moeten geëerbiedigd worden. Het feit dat men te maken heeft met verdachten van internationale misdrijven kan op geen enkele wijze aangegrepen worden als excuus om mensenrechten te schenden of om te stellen dat überhaupt geen schending heeft plaatsgevonden wanneer zo'n schending overduidelijk aanwezig was. Ook moeten, waar schendingen plaatsvinden, geëigende remedies worden verleend. Echter, bij het verlenen van deze remedies moet men in het oog houden dat men niet mogelijk de weg vrijmaakt voor absurde gevolgen die niets meer met het concept rechtvaardigheid te maken hebben, bijvoorbeeld, door een strikte toepassing van de remedie vrijlating in het geval van een onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie. In zo'n geval zou het naar het oordeel van deze studie juister zijn om in plaats daarvan een verdachte van internationale misdrijven in hechtenis te houden en geëigende en werkelijke remedies te verlenen, rekening houdende met de ernst van de male captus.

Een laatste belangrijk punt van Hoofdstuk VII dat in deze samenvatting genoemd zou moeten worden, is dat werd gesteld dat alle schendingen die plaatsvinden in de context van een tribunaalzaak hersteld moeten worden, en dit niet alleen wanneer deze schendingen aan het tribunaal kunnen worden toegerekend (hoewel het duidelijk is dat betrokkenheid van het tribunaal tot meer verstrekkende remedies kan leiden).

Deze suggestie was in de context van de abuse of process doctrine niet controversieel; in de context van de vraag of de male captus zo ernstig is dat de rechters naar eer en geweten de zaak niet kunnen voortzetten hebben de tribunalen bevestigd dat zij de schendingen zullen bezien, ongeacht welke entiteit verantwoordelijk is voor deze schendingen.

Dit lag echter veel minder duidelijk ten aanzien van minder ernstige schendingen welke niet binnen het domein van de abuse of process doctrine komen. Desalniettemin werd gesteld dat het nogal vreemd zou zijn wanneer de tribunalen alleen de acties van derde partijen zouden bezien indien deze acties een bepaalde mate van ernst bereiken. Als het tribunaal bereid is, via de abuse of process doctrine, om de ultieme verantwoordelijkheid te nemen voor acties van derde partijen (namelijk door het weigeren van jurisdictie), dan zou het ook heel wel in staat moeten zijn verantwoordelijkheid te nemen voor minder ernstige schendingen. Om veilig te stellen dat de verdachte niet het slachtoffer wordt van de omstandigheid dat zijn proces over twee of meer systemen is verdeeld is het fair als de laatste oordelende instantie, het tribunaal, in de context van wiens zaak deze schendingen hebben plaatsgevonden, de verantwoordelijkheid neemt voor elke schending. Dit impliceert natuurlijk weer dat de rechter in staat moet zijn na te gaan hoe de arrestatie/detentie/overlevering was uitgevoerd 'on the ground', bijvoorbeeld, of de entiteiten die de arrestatie uitvoerden op verzoek van het tribunaal alle (nationale) arrestatieprocedures hebben geëerbiedigd. Immers, wanneer een arrestatie duidelijk in strijd was met zulke procedures, is het moeilijk vol te houden dat het recht van een persoon op vrijheid en veiligheid niet was geschonden, zelfs wanneer alle regels van het tribunaal (zoals het uitvaardigen van een geldige aanklacht en een arrestatiebevel) zijn nageleefd.

Uiteengezet werd dat in deze specifieke context tribunaalbeslissingen zijn uitgevaardigd die er een enigszins non-inquiry/op male captus bene detentus gelijkende visie op na houden en die het idee ondersteunen dat de rechtmatigheid van de nationale arrestatie/detentieprocedures niet onderzocht kan worden. Echter, er waren ook zaken die geïnterpreteerd konden worden als inhoudend dat het tribunaal zou bezien wat er op het nationaal niveau gebeurde en dat het zelfs elke schending zou herstellen die plaatsvond in die context, ook indien het tribunaal, strikt genomen, hier geen verantwoordelijkheid voor droeg.

Echter, als het inderdaad juist was dat de rechtspraak beide interpretaties bevatte, dan zou de rechter, zo werd gesteld, moeten kiezen voor de tweede interpretatie, de interpretatie die alle onregelmatigheden in de voorfase van het strafproces onderzoekt en die niet de toerekening van de schendingen aan het tribunaal/de strikte juridische verantwoordelijkheid van het tribunaal voor deze schendingen eist. Afschrikking, de integriteit van het proces en simple fairness ten opzichte van de verdachte (in die zin dat voorkomen wordt dat de verdachte in een juridisch vacuüm terechtkomt) eisen dat het nu vervolgende forum alle schendingen herstelt die in de context van zijn zaak zijn gepleegd. Deze opstelling zou ook het (impopulaire) male captus bene detentus imago dat de tribunalen hebben, kunnen 'verzachten'; het verlenen van remedies voor alle schendingen die zich hebben voorgedaan in de context van hun zaken laat zien dat de tribunalen zich niet alleen bekommeren om het vervolgen van verdachten van internationale misdrijven, maar ook om het veilig stellen van een eerlijk proces voor deze verdachten. In dit kader kon men mensen die bezwaar hebben tegen deze opstelling ook gerust stellen, in die zin dat het verlenen van remedies geen drastische gevolgen hoeft te hebben. Aannemelijk is dat de rechter heel vaak geconfronteerd zal worden met slechts geringe schendingen. Voor zulke schendingen past het om geringe remedies te verlenen, bijvoorbeeld, een (beperkte) strafvermindering in het geval van veroordeling. Dit leidt ertoe dat zowel aan het rechtvaardigheidsgevoel van de persoon in kwestie (in die zin dat de jegens hem begane schendingen worden hersteld) als aan dat van de slachtoffers/de internatonale gemeenschap als geheel (in die zin dat een verdachte van internationale misdrijven, indien deze schuldig wordt bevonden, een geëigende (hetgeen vaak zal betekenen: zware) straf voor zijn daden krijgt) tegemoet wordt gekomen.

Na dit belangrijke hoofdstuk, waaraan dienovereenkomstig de nodige aandacht is besteed in deze samenvatting, werd het tijd om Deel 4 van dit boek te behandelen, dat de context van het IS onder de loep nam. In het eerste hoofdstuk van dit deel, Hoofdstuk VIII, werd het meer algemene samenwerkingsregime, inclusief de meer specifieke arrestatie- en overdrachtsbepalingen, onderzocht. In deze context werd ook de rol van internationale troepen bij het overdragen van verdachten aan het IS behandeld. Een cruciaal onderwerp, onder andere omdat staten die wensen samen te werken met het IS hier vaak niet toe in staat zijn omdat de oorlog die de aandacht van het IS heeft getrokken misschien ook het juridische systeem van deze staten heeft geruïneerd.

In Hoofdstuk VIII werd speciale aandacht besteed aan artikel 59, lid 2 van het IS Statuut, een op habeas corpus gelijkende bepaling die gezien kan worden als een van de meest belangrijke in het arrestatie- en overdrachtssysteem van het IS, de bepaling waar het nationale en internationale niveau elkaar ontmoeten. Opgemerkt werd dat er nog vrij veel vragen blijven bestaan ten aanzien van deze bepaling, waarvan de belangrijkste is wat de gevolgen zijn wanneer de bevoegde gerechtelijke autoriteit in de 'staat van bewaring' vaststelt dat een persoon niet is aangehouden overeenkomstig de juiste procedure en dat de rechten van die persoon niet zijn geëerbiedigd. Geconcludeerd werd dat het antwoord op deze vraag van staat tot staat kan verschillen maar dat men het om meerdere redenen, inclusief het belangrijke feit dat niet-medewerkende staten deze bepaling zouden kunnen misbruiken, met de meeste auteurs eens kon zijn dat nationale autoriteiten zeer afkerig zouden moeten zijn de overdracht van een verdachte te weigeren wanneer op het nationale niveau wordt vastgesteld dat een persoon niet is aangehouden overeenkomstig de juiste procedure of dat de rechten van die persoon niet zijn geëerbiedigd. Desalniettemin zou een staat heel wel gerechtvaardigd kunnen stellen dat vrijlating de juiste juridische remedie is in het geval van schendingen. Echter, voor dat geval werden de nationale autoriteiten aan de eerder gesignaleerde problemen met betrekking tot deze remedie herinnerd. Sterker, in de context van het IS zou een vrijlating van een verdachte zelfs nog gemakkelijker kunnen leiden tot een ontsnapping, nu de vrijgelaten verdachte naar vele staten die niet partij zijn bij het IS zou kunnen vluchten. Staten die, in principe, niet verplicht zijn samen te werken met het IS, een kenmerk dat niet aanwezig is in de context van het ICTY/ICTR.

Bovendien werd er ook aan herinnerd dat artikel 59 van het IS Statuut – dat in het algemeen veel meer belang hecht aan nationaal recht (geïnterpreteerd in het licht van mensenrechtenrecht) en nationale autoriteiten dan het verticale regime van het ICTY/ICTR doet – 'slechts' het arrestatieproces voor staten reguleert en dat de arrestatieprocedures voor bijvoorbeeld vredestroepen – indien deze mandaat hebben om arrestaties uit te voeren voor het IS – onduidelijk blijven. Niettemin werden verschillende voorstellen van rechtswetenschappers besproken die deze problemen zouden kunnen oplossen, zoals een directe overdracht van de verdachte door vredestroepen aan het IS, op voorwaarde dat bepaalde waarborgen worden geëerbiedigd.

Een belangrijk punt, opgemerkt in Hoofdstuk VIII, was dat vele aspecten van de mensenrechtelijke habeas corpus bepalingen, dankzij de artikelen 55, 59 en 60 van het IS Statuut, voorkwamen in het arrestatie- en overdrachtsregime van het IS, en dat dit een belangrijke verbetering was vergeleken met de juridische context van het ICTY/ICTR, maar dat een ondubbelzinnig en expliciet recht van de verdachte om de rechtmatigheid van zijn arrestatie en detentie aan te vechten en om in het geval van een onrechtmatige arrestatie en detentie vrijgelaten te worden, ontbrak. Dit nogal merkwaardige punt zou terugkomen in Hoofdstuk IX.

Tenslotte werd geconcludeerd dat Hoofdstuk VIII had uitgewezen dat het regime van het IS zowel verticale als horizontale elementen bevat en dat de door Currie geïntroduceerde term "lateraal" daarvoor een passende (en in ieder geval originele) kwalificatie zou kunnen zijn.

In het volgende hoofdstuk, Hoofdstuk IX, werd het interne toetsingskader van deze studie gecreëerd door middel van een analyse van artikel 21 van het IS Statuut. Niet alleen de inhoud van de drie verschillende leden van dit artikel, maar ook de samenhang tussen de drie onderdelen van het eerste lid werden behandeld aan de hand van zowel doctrine als rechtspraak.

Aangezien artikel 21, lid 1 onder (a) van het IS Statuut zweeg over de male captus kwestie, werd gebruik gemaakt van de algemene regel van uitlegging en de aanvullende middelen van uitlegging zoals deze gevonden kunnen worden in het Verdrag van Wenen inzake het verdragenrecht. Daar een tekstuele/contextuele/teleologische uitlegging van enkele bepalingen van de eigen IS documenten die gezien zouden kunnen worden als (indirect) relevant voor de male captus discussie geen opheldering gaf over de vraag of het IS Statuut gezien kon worden als duidelijk de voorkeur gevende aan hetzij male captus bene detentus hetzij male captus male detentus (artikel 31, lid 1 van het Verdrag van Wenen inzake het verdragenrecht), werd aansluiting gezocht bij de travaux préparatoires van het IS Statuut (artikel 32 van het Verdrag van Wenen inzake het verdragenrecht). Hoewel in deze documenten enkele interessante opmerkingen werden aangetroffen met betrekking tot de correlatie tussen het IS en de kwestie van onregelmatige arrestaties, inclusief een expliciete opmerking van de Jamaicaanse gedelegeerde Patrick Robinson dat male captus bene detentus niet van toepassing zou moeten zijn op de jurisdictie van het IS, werd geconcludeerd dat een analyse van de travaux préparatoires niet de algemene opvatting van de 120 staten die vóór het IS Statuut hadden gestemd met betrekking tot de male captus kwestie, had verduidelijkt. Daarom werd geoordeeld dat een analyse van verschillende bepalingen van het IS Statuut en diens travaux préparatoires geen duidelijkheid had geschapen ten aanzien van de male captus kwestie, hetgeen betekende dat er op dit punt een juridische lacune was die moest worden ingevuld met behulp van artikel 21, lid 1 onder (b) en (c) van het IS Statuut.

Echter, alvorens dit werd gedaan ging Hoofdstuk IX ook een gerelateerd punt na, namelijk wat de IS documenten zeiden over de gevolgen van een onrechtmatige arrestatie. Eerder was al vastgesteld – ook in deze samenvatting – dat vele aspecten van de mensenrechtelijke habeas corpus bepalingen, dankzij de artikelen 55, 59 en 60 van het IS Statuut, voorkwamen in het arrestatie- en overdrachtsregime van het IS, maar dat een ondubbelzinnig en expliciet recht van de verdachte om de rechtmatigheid van zijn arrestatie en detentie aan te vechten en om in het geval van een onrechtmatige arrestatie en detentie vrijgelaten te worden, ontbrak. De vraag werd gesteld hoe het ontbreken van de remedie vrijlating, van het recht op vrijheid en veiligheid, zoals dat teruggevonden kan worden in artikel 55, lid 1 onder (d) van het IS Statuut, gezien moest worden. Moest het gezien worden als een doelbewuste keuze van de opstellers dat deze remedie niet van toepassing is op verdachten of was het eenvoudigweg vergeten of niet belangrijk genoeg geacht om te vermelden in het IS Statuut?

Opnieuw werd aansluiting gezocht bij het Verdrag van Wenen inzake het verdragenrecht. Ook in de context van de remedie vrijlating bood een tekstuele/contextuele/teleologische uitlegging van artikel 55, lid 1 onder (d) van het IS Statuut (artikel 31 van het Verdrag van Wenen inzake het verdragenrecht) geen soelaas, hetgeen een analyse op basis van artikel 32 van het Verdrag van Wenen inzake het verdragenrecht (de travaux préparatoires) noodzakelijk maakte.

Na een gedetailleerde analyse werd geconcludeerd dat het moeilijk was vol te houden dat het duidelijk is dat de opstellers van het IS Statuut bewust de remedie vrijlating hadden weggelaten omdat zij niet wilden dat deze remedie voorhanden was voor een verdachte die onrechtmatig was gearresteerd of gedetineerd. Nu de IS wetgeving op dit punt een juridische lacune vertoonde, was het gerechtvaardigd om artikel 21, lid 1 onder (b) van het IS Statuut tegen het licht te houden.

Artikel 21, lid 1 onder (b) van het IS Statuut moest dus onderzocht worden, niet alleen in het kader van de echte male captus bene/male detentus vraag, maar ook in het kader van het punt gerelateerd aan de male captus discussie, namelijk de remedie vrijlating in het geval van een onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie.

Een analyse van artikel 21, lid 1 onder (b) van het IS Statuut liet zien dat de term "applicable treaties" geen licht wierp op de male captus kwestie, maar dat deze term wel de remedie vrijlating in het geval van een onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie behelsde en dat deze remedie zou kunnen worden toegepast door de IS rechters "where appropriate".

Ten aanzien van de betekenis van de term "the principles and rules of international law" werd geconcludeerd dat deze term in ieder geval internationaal gewoonterecht omvatte en dat men aan de hand van de conclusie van paragraaf 2 van Hoofdstuk VII van dit boek kon nagaan wat internationaal gewoonterecht te zeggen had over de male captus kwestie. Dit was iets bijzonders, aangezien het externe toetsingskader van deze studie, dat (slechts) was gecreëerd om na te gaan hoe vergelijkbaar of verschillend de huidige opstelling van het IS ten aanzien van de male captus kwestie was in vergelijking met de opstelling van andere hoven, nu via het begrip internationaal gewoonterecht, het minder vrijblijvende interne toetsingskader, dat was opgezet om te zien hoe de actuele opstelling van het IS beoordeeld moest worden in het licht van het eigen recht van het Hof, was binnengedrongen.

Opgemerkt werd dat paragraaf 2 van Hoofdstuk VII van dit boek had verduidelijkt dat men niet in het algemeen kan stellen dat male captus bene detentus of male captus male detentus een internationaal gewoonterechtelijk status had bereikt, aangezien zulke algemene beweringen geen recht deden aan de enorme variëteit aan mogelijke male captus situaties en de verschillende manieren waarop deze uiteenlopende situaties door gerechten waren behandeld. Sterker, Hoofdstuk VII had geconcludeerd dat slechts één male captus situatie waarschijnlijk gezien kon worden als een met internationaal gewoonterechtelijke status, namelijk de situatie dat rechters jurisdictie zullen weigeren in het geval van een ontvoering, uitgevoerd door de autoriteiten van het vervolgende forum en gevolgd door een protest en verzoek tot teruggave van de verdachte door de gelaedeerde staat. Echter, opgemerkt werd ook dat men zich vanwege de mogelijke beweegreden achter deze regel en de andere rol van staatssoevereiniteit in de context van het IS kan afvragen of de rechters het "appropriate" zouden vinden om deze regel naar het specifieke systeem van het IS over te zetten. Desondanks werd ook gesteld dat het IS, zelfs wanneer inderdaad kon worden geoordeeld dat het niet gepast zou zijn om deze regel naar de context van het IS over te zetten en dus dat het Hof deze niet hoefde te volgen, het resoluut jurisdictie zou moeten weigeren als het betrokken zou zijn bij een ontvoering, of deze ontvoering nu wel of niet was gevolgd door een protest en een verzoek tot teruggave van de verdachte door de gelaedeerde staat.

Hierna werd de vraag gesteld, nu paragraaf 2 van Hoofdstuk VII het interne toetsingskader van deze studie was binnengedrongen, of ook paragraaf 3 van Hoofdstuk VII (de beginselen afgeleid uit de male captus rechtspraak van de internationale/geïnternationaliseerde straftribunalen) eveneens dit interne toetsingskader zouden kunnen binnendringen. Zouden deze beginselen misschien ook onder de notie internationaal gewoonterecht kunnen vallen?

Gebruik makende van de traditionele definitie van internationaal gewoonterecht, die zich richt op de *staten*praktijk (maar erkennende dat men zich kan afvragen of de vorming van internationaal gewoonterecht nog wel gezien kan worden als het privilege van staten), werd geconcludeerd dat de beslissingen van het ICTY/ICTR als zodanig (dus niet die beslissingen die overzichten van de statenpraktijk presenteerden) niet gebruikt kunnen worden om internationaal gewoonterecht op te sporen. Dit kon echter anders zijn ten aanzien van geïnternationaliseerde straftribunalen, waarvan enkele gezien zouden kunnen worden als deel uitmakende van het juridische systeem van een staat.

Tenslotte werd het gerelateerde onderwerp van de remedie vrijlating behandeld. Geconcludeerd werd dat deze remedie gezien kon worden als een met internationaal gewoonterechtelijke status. Wanneer deze remedie dus niet al zou vallen onder de notie "applicable treaties", zou ze in ieder geval gedekt worden door de term "principles and rules of international law".

Na deze analyse van internationaal gewoonterecht werd de vraag gesteld of de term "principles and rules of international law" ook méér zouden kunnen behelzen dan slechts internationaal gewoonterecht. Geconcludeerd werd dat dit inderdaad het geval was en dat de praktijk van het ICTY/ICTR (en dit zou misschien ook gelden voor andere internationale (juridische) instituten zoals het Mensenrechtencomité, het Europees Hof voor de Rechten van de Mens en bepaalde geïnternationaliseerde straftribunalen) door de IS rechters zou kunnen worden toegepast wanneer deze rechters, na een uitvoerige analyse, van oordeel zijn dat bepaalde praktijken kunnen worden overgezet naar het specifieke systeem van het IS als een beginsel/regel van internationaal recht. In dat geval zouden ook de conclusies van paragraaf 3 van Hoofdstuk VII het interne toetsingskader van deze studie kunnen binnendringen. Wat betreft deze praktijken van de internationale straftribunalen zou men kunnen denken aan de aanvaarding van een breed concept abuse of process (in die zin dat jurisdictie in zeer ernstige male captus zaken kan worden geweigerd, ongeacht welke entiteit verantwoordelijk is) en aan de omstandigheid dat, bij het toepassen van de abuse of process doctrine, rekening kan worden gehouden met de ernst van de misdrijven waarvoor de verdachte is aangeklaagd. Ten aanzien van de gerelateerde kwestie van de remedie vrijlating zou men kunnen denken aan het feit dat al deze tribunalen het belang van habeas corpus hebben onderstreept, zelfs indien de regulerende documenten van het tribunaal in kwestie niet zo'n expliciete bepaling bevatten.

Echter, opgemerkt werd ook dat wanneer de IS rechters van oordeel zijn dat het niet gepast zou zijn om de vaste praktijk van internationale straftribunalen met betrekking tot de male captus kwestie, als beginselen en regels van internationaal recht, naar het specifieke systeem van het IS over te zetten, of als zij van oordeel zijn dat men helemaal niet de jurisprudentie van deze tribunalen zou moeten bezien in de context van deze bepaling, dat dan artikel 21, lid 1 onder (c) van het IS Statuut moest worden onderzocht.

Dientengevolge werd ook het laatste onderdeel van artikel 21, lid 1 van het IS Statuut geanalyseerd. Geconcludeerd werd dat bij het nagaan of er algemene beginselen bestaan ten aanzien van het male captus probleem, men opnieuw de overzichten van Hoofdstuk V en de afgeleide beginselen van paragraaf 2 van Hoofdstuk VII kon bezien. Ook hier konden dus de resultaten van het externe toetsingskader gebruikt worden voor het interne toetsingskader.

Ten aanzien van het male captus bene/male detentus maxime zelf werd geoordeeld dat de overzichten van Hoofdstuk V duidelijk aantoonden dat men niet in het algemeen kan stellen dat een van beide maximes tegenwoordig gezien kan worden als een algemeen rechtsbeginsel. Echter, er werd ook opgemerkt dat er zeker elementen zijn uit de male captus rechtspraak die gedeeld werden door de meeste rechtssystemen, elementen die wellicht – rekening houdende met de omstandigheid dat de overzichten van deze studie uitgebreid maar niet uitputtend waren – gezien kunnen worden als algemene rechtsbeginselen op basis van de terminologie gebruikt in artikel 21, lid 1 onder (c) van het IS Statuut. Men kon bijvoorbeeld denken aan het feit dat de meeste gerechten geconfronteerd met een male captus hun discretie zullen gebruiken, bijvoorbeeld (in het common law systeem) met behulp van de abuse of process doctrine, om al de verschillende elementen van de zaak te wegen teneinde te beslissen of de male captus wel of niet zo ernstig is dat jurisdictie moet worden geweigerd. Bovendien leken de meeste gerechten alleen jurisdictie te weigeren wanneer hun eigen autoriteiten bij de male captus zijn betrokken. Tenslotte leek het erop dat nogal wat gerechten – hoewel onduidelijk was of "nogal wat" voldoende was om tot een algemeen rechtsbeginsel op basis van artikel 21, lid 1 onder (c) van het IS Statuut te komen – rekening zouden houden, bij het besluit of jurisdictie wel of niet geweigerd moet worden, met de ernst van de misdrijven waarvoor het slachtoffer van de male captus was aangeklaagd.

Ten aanzien van de gerelateerde kwestie van de remedie vrijlating werd geconcludeerd dat niet alleen het algemene recht op vrijheid en veiligheid/het recht niet te worden onderworpen aan willekeurige arrestatie of gevangenhouding, maar ook zijn meer specifieke habeas corpus bepaling (inclusief de vrijlating in het geval van een onrechtmatige (arrestatie of) detentie), gezien kon worden als een algemeen rechtsbeginsel.

Tenslotte werd opgemerkt dat ook ten aanzien van onderdeel (c) (vergelijk de woorden "where appropriate" in de context van onderdeel (b)) de IS rechters waarschijnlijk alleen deze oplossingen van het nationale niveau zullen hanteren indien zij menen dat zij deze oplossingen kunnen overbrengen naar het specifieke systeem van het IS. Dat zou kunnen betekenen dat de IS rechters de bovengenoemde beginselen zouden kunnen volgen die aan de echte male captus kwestie gerelateerd kunnen worden, maar meer afwijzend zouden kunnen staan tegenover de problematische remedie vrijlating in het geval van een onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie.

Na een korte verwerping van artikel 21, lid 2 van het IS Statuut voor het doel van het interne toetsingskader van deze studie, werd aandacht besteed aan het laatste lid van dit cruciale artikel.

In de analyse van artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut werd gesteld dat iedere keer dat het IS jurisdictie uitoefent, iedere keer dat het betrokken is bij een zaak, die betrokkenheid, die uitoefening van jurisdictie, toegepast en geïnterpreteerd diende te worden op een wijze verenigbaar met die internationaal erkende mensenrechten die relevant zijn voor het functioneren van het IS. Die uitoefening van jurisdictie/betrokkenheid omvatte natuurlijk het proces in de rechtszaal, wanneer het IS daadwerkelijk een zaak berecht, maar het zou ook de uitoefening van jurisdictie/betrokkenheid in de voorfase van het strafproces omvatten en dus ook, bijvoorbeeld, de acties van derde partijen indien deze partijen arrestaties/detenties/overdrachten uitvoeren op verzoek van het IS. Bovendien werd opgemerkt dat het IS in elk geval dat pad zou moeten volgen: ervoor zorg dragen dat iedere keer dat het IS betrokken is bij een zaak (inclusief de acties van derde partijen die werken op verzoek van het IS), die betrokkenheid verenigbaar is met internationaal erkende mensenrechten. Aangevoerd werd echter dat het zelfs nog fairder zou zijn wanneer het IS zijn verantwoordelijkheid neemt voor schendingen in de context van zijn zaak in het algemeen. Hoewel arrestaties/detenties uitgevoerd op verzoek van het IS een groot deel vormt van de 'voorraad' IS arrestaties/detenties, kan het IS altijd geconfronteerd worden met male captus claims die verder gaan dan deze situaties (vergelijk de ontvoering door particulieren). Het zou zeer gerechtvaardigd zijn wanneer het IS, als het ultiem berechtende forum, ook zulke schendingen zou herstellen, zelfs wanneer het niet betrokken was bij de male captus.

Wat betreft de internationaal erkende mensenrechten die relevant zijn voor het functioneren van het IS in de context van de voorfase van het strafproces zou men bijvoorbeeld kunnen denken aan een breed concept van het recht op een eerlijk proces en op het recht op vrijheid en veiligheid, inclusief de remedie vrijlating in het geval van een onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie.

Tijdens de analyse van lid 3 werd de eerdere correlatie tussen de verschillende onderdelen van artikel 21, lid 1 van het IS Statuut opnieuw beoordeeld. Dit had consequenties voor de kwestie van de remedie vrijlating. Uiteengezet werd dat bij het interpreteren van artikel 21, lid 1 onder (a) van het IS Statuut (het recht op vrijheid en veiligheid zonder de remedie vrijlating in het geval van een onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie) de IS rechters ook lid 3 in ogenschouw dienden te nemen. Aangezien dit laatste lid de remedie vrijlating in het geval van een onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie omvat, hadden de rechters niet langer een discretie om na te gaan of het "appropriate" zou zijn om de remedie vrijlating naar de context van het IS over te zetten (zie lid 1 onder (b)) of om na te gaan of zij deze remedie zouden kunnen overbrengen in deze context (zie lid 1 onder (c)). Met andere woorden, de remedie vrijlating zou in beginsel toegepast moeten worden. Vervolgens werd uiteengezet dat deze uitkomst wellicht niet zo problematisch was aangezien deze studie had betoogd dat niet duidelijk kon worden vastgesteld dat de opstellers van het IS Statuut bewust deze remedie achterwege wilden laten. Echter, de zaken zouden gecompliceerder worden als men, op basis van de informatie gepresenteerd in Hoofdstuk IX, van oordeel zou zijn dat het juist wel duidelijk de bedoeling was van de opstellers om deze remedie achterwege te laten. In dat geval moest worden nagegaan welke oplossing hier voorrang zou hebben: de bedoeling van de opstellers (geen remedie vrijlating) of de remedie vrijlating op basis van lid 3. In dit kader werden twee doctrinaire keuzen gepresenteerd, die van Pellet (wiens aanpak zou leiden tot de remedie vrijlating) en die van Hafner en Binder (wier aanpak niet zou leiden tot de remedie vrijlating). Deze studie had meer sympathie voor Pellets visie.

Erkend werd echter ook dat het feit dat de IS rechters, indien zij de visie van Pellet zouden volgen, de remedie vrijlating moeten toepassen, zelfs wanneer het duidelijk de bedoeling was van de opstellers om deze remedie niét te verlenen, niet tot gevolg heeft dat de problemen die kunnen worden verbonden aan deze remedie plotseling verdwijnen. Daarom werd betoogd dat rechters konden kiezen voor de in dit onderzoek aangedragen oplossing; zij zouden, zich realiserende dat deze remedie in principe moet worden geëerbiedigd en dus dat remedies moeten worden verleend in het geval van een onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie, de verdachte in hechtenis kunnen houden en echte remedies verlenen, een en ander afhankelijk van de precieze omstandigheden van het geval. Zij zouden daarbij ook kunnen vertrouwen op het recht op een effectieve remedie, een ander recht dat zeker gezien kan worden als een internationaal erkend mensenrecht op basis van artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut.

In het laatste hoofdstuk van Deel 4, Hoofdstuk X, trachtte deze studie de huidige opstelling van het IS ten aanzien van de male captus kwestie vast te stellen door middel van een analyse van de drie zaken van het IS waarin het male captus item een (belangrijke) rol had gespeeld in het proces: Lubanga Dyilo, Bemba Gombo en Katanga. Aangezien het laatste hoofdstuk van dit boek, Hoofdstuk XI, de conclusies van Hoofdstuk X samenvatte, is het aangewezen om nu direct door te gaan naar de samenvatting van Hoofdstuk XI.

In het laatste deel van dit boek, Deel 5, dat slechts uit één hoofdstuk (Hoofdstuk XI) bestond, kwam deze studie ten einde. Omdat dit hoofdstuk zo belangrijk is voor de bevindingen van deze studie zal deze samenvatting daaraan de meeste aandacht besteden. Dat men dit hoofdstuk niet kort kan samenvatten was ook een gevolg van het eerste probleem waar Hoofdstuk XI op stuitte: na de centrale vraag van deze studie zoals gepresenteerd in Hoofdstuk I te hebben herhaald, werd opgemerkt dat het moeilijk is een helder antwoord te geven op deze vraag omdat de huidige opstelling van het IS ten aanzien van de male captus kwestie – een cruciaal onderdeel van de centrale vraag – niet erg duidelijk leek. Dit had verscheidene redenen.

Allereerst bevatte de beslissing van de Kamer van Beroep in Lubanga Dyilo, volgens deze studie de meest gezaghebbende beslissing ten aanzien van deze kwestie, verschillende formuleringen van wat de male detentus drempel van het IS zou kunnen zijn. Echter, opgemerkt werd ook dat de brede eerste formulering (bevestigd door de derde formulering) – anders dan de beperkte tweede formulering, die bepaalde dat "[w]here the breaches of the rights of the accused are such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence within the framework of his[/her] rights, no fair trial can take place and the proceedings can be stayed" – waarschijnlijk de correcte standaard was:

> Where fair trial becomes impossible because of breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect or the accused by his/her accusers, it would be a contradiction in terms to put the person on trial. Justice could not be done. A fair trial is the only means to do justice. If no fair trial can be held, the object of the judicial process is frustrated and the process must be stopped [oorspronkelijke voetnoten weggelaten, ChP].

Echter, een ander probleem ten aanzien van de male captus opstelling van het IS werd gesignaleerd. In de Duch zaak voor het ECCC werd gesteld dat de Kamer van Beroep van het IS in Lubanga Dyilo ook jurisdictie zou weigeren, op grond van de abuse of process doctrine, in het geval van zware schendingen van de rechten van verdachte (waarbij men zich concentreerde op de meer 'fysieke' woorden ernstige mishandeling/marteling) als zodanig, dus ongeacht welke entiteit verantwoordelijk is. Hierbij werd verwezen naar de volgende formulering van de Kamer van Beroep: "[T]he findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber respecting the absence of torture or serious mistreatment have not been shown to be erroneous in any way." Er werd echter uiteengezet dat het helemaal niet duidelijk was of de Kamer van Beroep van het IS, naast haar bovengenoemde male detentus standaard – die de betrokkenheid vereist van het IS (of van derde partijen die werken op verzoek van het IS), zie de woorden "by his/her accusers" – ook jurisdictie zou weigeren in het geval van zware schendingen/ernstige mishandeling/marteling als zodanig, ongeacht welke entiteit verantwoordelijk is (dus ook in het geval van particulieren). Allereerst werd aangegeven dat de opmerkingen over ernstige mishandeling/marteling van de Kamer van Vooronderzoek gemaakt waren in de context van de abuse of process doctrine, een doctrine die de Kamer van Beroep expliciet had verworpen. In de tweede plaats was er onduidelijkheid over de opstelling van de Kamer van Vooronderzoek zelf ten aanzien van de abuse of process doctrine aangezien zij opmerkte dat de toepassing van deze doctrine, tot op heden, "ha[d] been confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal [nadruk toegevoegd en oorspronkelijke voetnoten weggelaten, ChP]". De cursieve woorden zijn niet correct, maar het was onduidelijk of de Kamer van Vooronderzoek desondanks haar formulering zou volgen (die vereist dat de male captus wordt gepleegd door de nationale autoriteiten) of dat zij van oordeel zou zijn dat deze woorden inderdaad onjuist waren, hetgeen met zich zou mee zou brengen dat zij ook jurisdictie zou weigeren in het geval van ernstige mishandeling/marteling, ongeacht welke entiteit verantwoordelijk is en bijvoorbeeld dus ook acties van particulieren omvattende.

Een ander onduidelijk punt had te maken met het feit dat de Kamer van Beroep schijnbaar akkoord ging met de visie van de Kamer van Vooronderzoek, te weten dat zij onregelmatigheden zou bezien indien deze waren gepleegd in de context van concerted action tussen het IS en derde partijen, zelfs vóórdat het verzoek van het IS tot aanhouding/overdracht was verstuurd (dus voor de constructive custody). Deze term, "concerted action", is zeer algemeen en zou elke betrokkenheid van het IS bij onregelmatigheden kunnen omvatten. Echter, zelfs indien de Kamer van Beroep de term concerted action aldus zou aanvaarden, een term die een nationale arrestatie/detentie zou kunnen behelzen indien deze arrestatie/detentie op een bepaalde manier aan het IS proces kon worden gekoppeld, stelde de Kamer van Beroep tevens een aanvullende voorwaarde, namelijk dat alleen schendingen van de rechten van verdachte die gerelateerd zijn aan het "process of bringing the appellant to justice for the crimes that form the subject-matter of the proceedings before the Court (…) may provide ground for halting the process". Dat was echter, zo werd gesteld, een striktere voorwaarde.

Een laatste onduidelijkheid was dat de Kamer van Beroep van het IS een motion van een verdachte die beweerde het slachtoffer te zijn geweest van een male captus, en die volhield dat het IS jurisdictie zou moeten weigeren vanwege die male captus, niet zag als een betwisting van haar jurisdictie op grond van artikel 19 van het IS Statuut. Zij zag een dergelijk verweer als een sui generis/atypische motion die aanhouding van de zaak verlangde. Deze zienswijze, op grond waarvan de Kamer van Beroep de beslissing van de Kamer van Vooronderzoek in deze zaak corrigeerde, werd echter schijnbaar verworpen in de beslissing van de Kamer van Vooronderzoek in Katanga, uitgesproken na de beslissing van de Kamer van Beroep in Lubanga Dyilo. Ofschoon de Kamer van Berechting in Katanga refereerde aan de zienswijze van de Kamer van Beroep in Lubanga Dyilo, leverde zij daar verder geen commentaar op.

Hoewel deze studie dus op verschillende onduidelijkheden met betrekking tot de opstelling van het IS ten aanzien van de male captus kwestie was gestuit, kon zij ook een paar minder onbegrijpelijke kenmerken aanduiden van de manier waarop het IS omgaat met een vermeende male captus zaak.

In de eerste plaats aanvaardde het IS de doctrine die zo vaak tegenover de male captus bene detentus regel wordt gesteld, de abuse of process doctrine, niet, omdat deze niet werd gedekt door artikel 21 van het IS Statuut. Echter, wat wel was gedekt door deze bepaling, namelijk door lid 3, was de mensenrechtelijke dimensie van de abuse of process doctrine. Het was die mensenrechtelijke dimensie die het IS gebruikte om male captus claims op te lossen. Het was duidelijk dat het IS in theorie veel belang hechtte aan mensenrechten – en de mensenrechten op een eerlijk proces en op vrijheid en veiligheid (inclusief het recht de rechtmatigheid van de detentie aan te vechten, een recht dat niet expliciet genoemd wordt in de eigen documenten van het IS) in het bijzonder.

Het IS leek zich verder te concentreren op de schendingen zelf en niet zozeer op de vraag of het IS (of derde partijen die werkten op verzoek van het IS) opzettelijk bepaalde normen schond(en). Wat echter wel vereist leek te zijn, zie de Bemba Gombo zaak, was dat de schendingen moesten resulteren in werkelijk nadeel voor de verdachte.

Een ander belangrijk aspect van de male captus kwestie betrof de rol van de bevoegde gerechtelijke autoriteit van de 'staat van bewaring' in de hele procedure. Hoofdstuk XI liet zien dat de Kamer van Beroep in Lubanga Dyilo, in tegenstelling tot de Kamer van Vooronderzoek, niet uiteenzette in hoeverre die autoriteit, op basis van artikel 59 van het IS Statuut, onregelmatigheden voorafgaand aan de officiële arrestatie/detentie zou kunnen bezien. Bovendien, en dit keer juist zoals de Kamer van Vooronderzoek, verduidelijkte de Kamer van Beroep niet de rol van de IS rechters, die marginaal toezien op het bepaalde in artikel 59, lid 2 onder (b) en (c) van het IS Statuut, in deze context van de eerdere arrestatie/detentie. Tenslotte, en hierbij weer de Kamer van Vooronderzoek volgend, helderde de Kamer van Beroep niet op in hoeverre rekening moest worden gehouden met bepalingen zoals artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut en artikel 55, lid 1 onder (d) van het IS Statuut. Men leek zich alleen op nationaal recht te concentreren.

Een laatste punt was dat de Kamer van Beroep alleen geïnteresseerd leek in de ultieme remedie, de weigering van jurisdictie/het stilleggen van het proces.

Nu de huidige opstelling van het IS ten opzichte van de male captus kwestie was beschreven – rekening houdend met het feit dat verschillende aspecten niet erg duidelijk waren – werd die opstelling beoordeeld in de context van het externe toetsingskader van dit boek, vis-à-vis de opstelling van andere hoven.

Allereerst werd uiteengezet dat het erop leek dat het IS, zoals bijna elke modern gerecht of tribunaal, niet de ouderwetse versie van male captus bene detentus aanvaardde dat jurisdictie zal worden uitgeoefend, ongeacht de manier waarop de verdachte in het gezag van het Hof was gekomen. Mensenrechten werden zeer belangrijk geacht en strekten zich uit tot het gehele proces, inclusief de voorfase van het strafproces. Dit omvatte het (voor deze studie) zo belangrijke mensenrecht op vrijheid en veiligheid, inclusief zijn deelrecht om de rechtmatigheid van de detentie aan te vechten, zelfs indien dat deelrecht niet expliciet was genoemd in de eigen documenten van het IS. Deze opstelling, zo werd gesteld, leek op de opstelling van andere tribunalen. Op grond daarvan zullen IS rechters de voorfase van het strafproces onderzoeken om na te gaan wat voor effect schendingen van deze rechten zouden kunnen hebben op de jurisdictie van het Hof. Er werd opgemerkt dat de Kamer van Berechting in Katanga dit niet had gedaan op procedurele gronden – en hiervoor kon worden bekritiseerd – maar dat het onduidelijk, en zelfs onwaarschijnlijk, was dat deze beslissing gezien kon worden als steun voor de hierboven genoemde ouderwetse versie van male captus bene detentus.

Hoofdstuk XI zette vervolgens uiteen dat wanneer men van oordeel was dat de enige echte male detentus standaard van de Kamer van Beroep van het IS gevonden kon worden in de eerste formulering uit Lubanga Dyilo (zie het bovengenoemde blokcitaat in deze samenvatting), het IS dan de zienswijze deelde van, bijvoorbeeld, de Kamer van Berechting van het ICTY in Nikolić en de Ebrahim zaak, in die zin dat de Aanklager (inclusief derde partijen die op zijn verzoek werken) naar het gerecht moeten komen with clean hands. Indien dat niet het geval zou zijn, bijvoorbeeld indien de fundamentele rechten van de verdachte geschonden waren in diens overdrachtsproces aan het IS, dan zouden rechters kunnen concluderen dat men niet meer van een eerlijk proces in de brede zin des woords kan spreken, een conclusie die tot het einde van de zaak moet leiden. Er werd opgemerkt dat nu de omschrijving “breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect” zeer algemeen was geformuleerd, deze allerlei male captus situaties zou kunnen omvatten, zoals ontvoeringen, luring situaties en andere technieken die (mogelijk) gezien konden worden als schendingen van iemands recht op vrijheid en veiligheid.

Voordat Hoofdstuk XI verder ging met dit onderwerp, werd aangegeven dat het IS zich leek te concentreren op de schendingen zelf en niet zozeer op de vraag of het IS (of derde partijen die werken op verzoek van het IS) opzettelijk bepaalde normen hebben geschonden. Dit kon worden beschouwd als een vrij liberale opvatting omdat andere hoven in hun male detentus standaarden vaak een intentie hadden geëist aan de zijde van de vervolgende autoriteiten om de male captus te plegen. Echter, wat wel vereist leek te zijn, zie de Bemba Gombo zaak, was dat schendingen moesten resulteren in werkelijk nadeel voor de verdachte. Andere tribunaalzaken konden daarentegen gezien worden als steun voor de visie dat de mate van nadeel alleen relevant was om de ernst van de schendingen te bepalen (en derhalve wat voor soort remedie moest worden verleend) en niet voor de vraag of er überhaupt schendingen waren/of de verdachte recht had op een remedie.

Vervolgens kwam Hoofdstuk XI terug op het punt dat de omschrijving van het IS "breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect" zo algemeen was geformuleerd dat deze allerlei soorten male captus situaties zou kunnen omvatten, inclusief ontvoeringen en luring situaties.

Uiteengezet werd dat indien het IS jurisdictie zou weigeren wanneer de accusers van de verdachte verantwoordelijk waren voor een ontvoering als zodanig, het zich zou aansluiten bij beslissingen als Levinge, Bennett, Ebrahim en Beahan. Daar ging het om opvattingen die onder de standaard 'doken' ten aanzien waarvan de meer recente statenpraktijk het er schijnbaar over eens was dat deze, in elk geval, moet leiden tot een verwerping van de male captus bene detentus regel (zie de hierboven genoemde Toscanino uitzonderingen). Met betrekking tot de context van de tribunalen werd verduidelijkt dat indien het IS jurisdictie zou weigeren wanneer de accusers van de verdachte verantwoordelijk zouden zijn voor een ontvoering als zodanig, het IS zich waarschijnlijk ook zou aansluiten bij de tribunaalzaken. Hoewel geen van deze zaken betrekking had op door het tribunaal zelf uitgevoerde ontvoeringen kon men hier verwijzen naar algemene verklaringen uit, bijvoorbeeld, Nikolić en Barayagwiza.

Overstappende naar het concept luring zette deze studie uiteen dat de omschrijving van het IS "breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect" zo algemeen geformuleerd was dat het ook een luring situatie kon omvatten, zolang de rechters maar van oordeel waren dat dit een schending van de fundamentele rechten van de verdachte (namelijk zijn recht op vrijheid en veiligheid) zou opleveren. Als dat zo zou zijn, zou het IS de meer progressieve interstatelijke zaken Levinge en Bennett volgen, zaken die/waarvan men vindt dat zij zeer algemene male detentus redeneringen bevatten en die luring situaties zouden kunnen omvatten (zelfs indien deze zaken zelf geen luring operaties betroffen), maar dat het zich zou distantiëren van de interstatelijke luring zaken als Yunis en Stocké waar de rechters waarschijnlijk alleen jurisdictie zouden weigeren indien de luring gepaard zou gaan met ernstige mishandeling. De tribunalencontext, zo vervolgde Hoofdstuk XI, was echter minder duidelijk. Hoewel helder was dat wanneer het IS jurisdictie zou weigeren in een luring zaak als zodanig, het zich liberaler zou opstellen dan de ICTY rechters in Dokmanović hadden gedaan, waren er meer algemene omschrijvingen van de tribunalen bekendgemaakt na Dokmanović die ook een luring operatie zouden kunnen omvatten.

Terugkerende naar 'de' opstelling van het IS merkte Hoofdstuk XI vervolgens op dat indien men daarentegen van oordeel zou zijn dat het vereiste van de Kamer van Beroep dat men niet langer kan spreken van een eerlijk proces, gezien moest worden in de beperkte zin des woords, namelijk een eerlijk proces in de rechtszaal (zie de bovengenoemde tweede formulering van de standaard van het IS, welke vereist dat de schendingen van dien aard moeten zijn dat de aangeklaagde niet meer zijn verdediging kan voeren, ten aanzien waarvan deze studie ook concludeerde dat het onduidelijk was of dit de male detentus opstelling is van het IS), dat dan de opstelling van het IS naar het oordeel van deze studie afwijkend was van de meeste meer recente nationale en internationale hoven. De meeste van deze hoven – hoewel er ook een paar uitzonderingen waren – weigerden schijnbaar ook jurisdictie, niet alleen wanneer men niet meer kan spreken van een eerlijk proces in de beperkte zin des woords, maar ook in de brede zin, namelijk wanneer het meer in het algemeen unfair zou zijn/het de integriteit van het hof zou ondermijnen om überhaupt een zaak te beginnen (hierbij vaak gebruik makende van de abuse of process doctrine).

Een ander punt dat beoordeeld moest worden betrof de onduidelijkheid over de vraag of de male detentus standaard van de Kamer van Beroep betrokkenheid van het IS vereiste, of dat het IS ook jurisdictie zou weigeren in het geval van, bijvoorbeeld, ernstige mishandeling/marteling, ongeacht welke entiteit verantwoordelijk is, zoals wanneer die mishandeling/marteling was gepleegd door particulieren.

Uiteengezet werd dat als men ervan uitging dat het IS alleen de male detentus standaard volgde die betrokkenheid van het IS zelf vereist, het IS dan de meeste nationale zaken zou volgen die de betrokkenheid van eigen mensen eisen. Echter, in dat geval zou dit ook duidelijk afwijken van de tribunaalzaken die erkennen dat, op grond van de abuse of process doctrine, een doctrine die de Kamer van Beroep van het IS verwierp, zeer ernstige male captus zaken kunnen leiden tot het einde van de zaak, ongeacht welke entiteit verantwoordelijk is.

Indien (de Kamer van Beroep van) het IS echter jurisdictie zou weigeren bij zeer ernstige male captus zaken, ongeacht welke entiteit verantwoordelijk is – zó hebben de onderzoeksrechters in Duch de beslissing van de Kamer van Beroep gelezen – en indien zij/het de uiteenzetting van de Kamer van Vooronderzoek in die zaak zou volgen (uitgaande van het feit dat de verwijzing naar "torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State [nadruk toegevoegd, ChP]" onjuist was), dan zou (de Kamer van Beroep van) het IS ook erkennen dat deze male detentus route niet beperkt is tot marteling of ernstige mishandeling, zie de formulering van de Kamer van Vooronderzoek dat de toepassing van de abuse of process doctrine "to date (…) ha[d] been confined to instances of torture or serious mistreatment by national authorities of the custodial State in some way related to the process of arrest and transfer of the person to the relevant international criminal tribunal [nadruk toegevoegd en oorspronkelijke voetnoten weggelaten, ChP]". Dit betekende, zo verduidelijkte Hoofdstuk XI, dat het IS ook jurisdictie zou kunnen weigeren in andere ernstige male captus zaken dan ernstige mishandeling/marteling. Opgemerkt werd dat deze opvatting vergelijkbaar leek te zijn met de opstelling van de tribunalen. Hoewel verschillende zaken, wellicht geïnspireerd door de terminologie van de Kamer van Berechting in Dokmanović, een zaak die was berecht vóór (de abuse of process standaard van) de Barayagwiza zaak, zich hadden geconcentreerd op de meer 'fysiek' getinte woorden "serious mistreatment" en "torture", had de recentere Karadžić zaak verduidelijkt dat ernstige mishandeling/marteling slechts gezien moeten worden als voorbeelden van zaken die zo ernstig zijn dat een hof jurisdictie zou kunnen weigeren.

Een ander punt dat Hoofdstuk XI moest bespreken betrof de scope of review. Zoals hierboven besproken, bestond er onduidelijkheid over de vraag of de Kamer van Beroep, voorafgaand aan de constructive custody van het IS, onregelmatigheden zou onderzoeken tijdens een nationale detentie die meer in het algemeen het gevolg zijn van concerted action tussen het IS en derde partijen of dat zij alleen onregelmatigheden zou bezien wanneer de verdachte in detentie zou verblijven voor dezelfde misdrijven als waarvoor hij nu berecht wordt bij het IS.

Allereerst werd de context van de constructive custody zelf behandeld. Het leek erop dat het IS aanvaardde dat het alle schendingen zou onderzoeken en daarvoor verantwoordelijkheid zou nemen die plaatsvinden in deze context, dat wil zeggen met betrekking tot een arrestatie/detentie uitgevoerd op verzoek van het IS. Opgemerkt werd dat verschillende tribunaalzaken gezien konden worden als steun voor die visie, hoewel er ook zaken waren waarin de rechters weigerden de rechtmatigheid van de nationale arrestatie/detentie procedures te beoordelen.

Ten aanzien van het onderzoeken van onregelmatigheden, anders dan die gepleegd in de constructive custody, werd uiteengezet dat indien het IS meer in het algemeen onregelmatigheden zou bezien die het resultaat waren van concerted action tussen het IS en derde partijen, het verschillende (inter)nationale hoven zou volgen die erkend hadden dat verantwoordelijkheid moet worden genomen voor een actie waarin eigen autoriteiten van het vervolgende forum participeerden, waarbij die eigen autoriteiten betrokken waren. Echter, zo vervolgde Hoofdstuk XI, er waren ook rechters die de kwestie van verantwoordelijkheid breder bezagen en die zich niet beperkten tot concerted action. Tenslotte werd opgemerkt dat indien (de Kamer van Beroep van) het IS niet concerted action in het algemeen zou bezien, maar alleen onregelmatigheden, voorafgaand aan de constructive custody van het IS, wanneer de verdachte in detentie zou verblijven voor dezelfde misdrijven als waarvoor hij nu wordt vervolgd bij het IS, die opvatting zou afwijken van andere (inter)nationale hoven die enkel geïnteresseerd lijken te zijn in de ernst van de onregelmatigheden in de voorfase van het strafproces, los van de vraag of de verdachte nu wel of niet in detentie zat voor dezelfde misdrijven als waarvoor het hof hem nu vervolgt.

Hierna werden nog enkele overgebleven punten van het externe toetsingskader kort behandeld.

Allereerst werd opgemerkt dat de bevoegde gerechtelijke autoriteit in de 'staat van bewaring', op grond van artikel 59 van het IS Statuut, een veel serieuzere en invloedrijkere schakel was geworden in de overdrachtsprocedures dan de nationale autoriteiten in de context van de VN ad hoc Tribunalen.

In de tweede plaats werd uiteengezet dat de (mogelijke) opvatting van het IS dat een male captus motion niet gezien kan worden als een betwisting van de jurisdictie (ratione personae) van het IS, niet gedeeld lijkt te worden door andere (inter)nationale hoven, zelfs als, strikt genomen, de motion de uitoefening van persoonlijke jurisdictie en niet de persoonlijke jurisdictie zelf betwist.

In de derde plaats werd ten aanzien van de omstandigheid dat het IS zich alleen concentreerde op de ultieme remedie (male detentus), opgemerkt dat de zaken onderzocht op het interstatelijke niveau niet duidelijk de zienswijze aanhingen dat de verdachte, wanneer zijn claim voor een male detentus was verworpen, recht zou kunnen hebben op andere remedies van het vervolgende forum zoals strafvermindering of financiële compensatie, hoewel het natuurlijk mogelijk bleef voor het male captus slachtoffer om zijn kidnappers in een civiele zaak aan te klagen. Met betrekking tot de context van de tribunalen werd uiteengezet dat het gegeven dat men enkel aandacht had voor de ultieme remedie, weigering van jurisdictie, hier zeker kon worden teruggevonden. Echter, zo vervolgde Hoofdstuk XI, er waren ook zaken waarin de rechters, na de male detentus claim te hebben verworpen, hebben onderzocht of de verdachte niettemin recht zou hebben op andere, minder verstrekkende, remedies.

In de vierde plaats werd opgemerkt dat het IS nog niet expliciet het element 'ernst van de misdrijven' had genoemd bij het beoordelen van male captus claims, een element dat kon worden gevonden in de context van zowel de interstatelijke zaken als de tribunaalzaken. Dit was echter niet zo vreemd aangezien het IS de abuse of process doctrine had verworpen, een doctrine waarin dit element een belangrijke rol speelde. Uiteengezet werd dat indien het IS de Kamer van Vooronderzoek echter zou volgen en zou overwegen jurisdictie te weigeren in het geval van ernstige schendingen, ongeacht welke entiteit verantwoordelijk is (vooralsnog aannemende dat dit de opstelling van de Kamer van Vooronderzoek is), men dan kan verwachten dat het IS niet te gemakkelijk jurisdictie zou weigeren en in dat kader zou verwijzen zowel naar de afwezigheid van verantwoordelijkheid aan de zijde van de accusers van de verdachte als naar het belang van vervolging (lees: de ernst van de vermeende misdrijven van de verdachte).

Een laatste punt was dat het IS niet expliciet het male captus bene/male detentus maxime onderschreef. Dit was vergelijkbaar met andere gerechten en tribunalen. Ofschoon de Kamer van Beroep de male captus bene detentus regel en de abuse of process doctrine tegenover elkaar stelde en hoewel deze laatste doctrine door de Kamer van Beroep verworpen werd, hetgeen geïnterpreteerd zou kunnen worden als aanwijzing voor het feit dat de Kamer van Beroep de male captus bene detentus regel volgde, was dit laatste zeker niet het geval, aangezien de Kamer van Beroep duidelijk een aanmerkelijk gedeelte, namelijk de mensenrechtelijke dimensie, van de abuse of process doctrine ondersteunde.

Vervolgens beoordeelde Hoofdstuk XI de opstelling van het IS met betrekking tot de male captus kwestie in de context van het interne toetsingskader van deze studie, vis-à-vis het recht van het IS zelf.

Na het in deze samenvatting reeds genoemde punt herhaald te hebben dat deze studie had laten zien dat de twee toetsingskaders konden samengaan, dat enige onduidelijke begrippen uit artikel 21 van het IS Statuut – het centrale artikel van het interne toetsingskader – de resultaten van het externe toetsingskader konden omvatten, werd de vraag gesteld of enkele aspecten van wat de opstelling van het IS met betrekking tot de male captus kwestie zou kunnen zijn (zoals reeds uiteengezet was deze niet helemaal helder), in overeenstemming waren met artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut.

Uiteengezet werd bijvoorbeeld dat men zich kan afvragen of de standaard die vereist dat bepaalde schendingen van dien aard moeten zijn dat de persoon niet meer zijn verdediging kan voeren alvorens men kan spreken van de onmogelijkheid van een eerlijk proces – hetgeen de male detentus standaard van het IS zou kunnen zijn, hoewel dit werd betwijfeld door deze studie – wel in overeenstemming was met artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut. Opgemerkt werd dat deze laatste bepaling zeker het mensenrecht op een eerlijk proces omvatte en wel, naar het oordeel van deze studie, op een eerlijk proces dat niet was beperkt tot een eerlijk proces in de rechtszaal, maar dat zich uitstrekte tot de gehele procedure. Echter, aangegeven werd ook dat indien het IS zou blijven bij zijn omschrijving die zich richtte op een breed concept van een eerlijk proces (en dat was waarschijnlijk aannemelijker), er geen schending van het IS recht zou zijn. In deze context werd ook uiteengezet dat de visie van het IS dat een breed concept van een eerlijk proces gekoesterd moest worden, zelfs ten aanzien van personen die aangeklaagd zijn voor zeer ernstige misdrijven, zeker verenigbaar was met internationaal erkende mensenrechten.

Vervolgens werd opgemerkt dat artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut ook het mensenrecht op vrijheid en veiligheid omvatte, inclusief het recht van een persoon om de rechtmatigheid van zijn detentie aan te vechten, zelfs als dat recht niet expliciet genoemd was door het IS Statuut, en dat de weigering van de rechters in de Katanga zaak om de motion van de verdachte te bezien die de rechtmatigheid van zijn arrestatie en detentie in de voorfase van het strafproces aanvocht, enkel en alleen omdat de motion te laat was ingediend, mogelijk gezien zou kunnen worden als een schending van dit recht en dus van het IS recht. In dit verband werd uiteengezet dat dit recht zo cruciaal was dat het IS, op basis van artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut, een dergelijk verweer altijd moet toelaten en moet bezien, al helemaal wanneer de motion aanvoert dat de onrechtmatigheid van de arrestatie/detentie zo ernstig was dat het tot het einde van de zaak zou moeten leiden. Dit was het geval, ongeacht of het verweer, strikt genomen, nu wel of niet gezien kon worden als een betwisting van de jurisdictie van het IS.

Hoofdstuk XI zette vervolgens uiteen dat de omstandigheid dat het IS zich concentreerde op de schendingen zelf (en niet zozeer op de vraag of rechten opzettelijk waren geschonden), gezien kon worden als zijnde in overeenstemming met het recht op een effectieve remedie in het geval van schendingen, een recht waarvan paragraaf 3 van Hoofdstuk IX had geconcludeerd dat het ook kon worden gekwalificeerd als een internationaal erkend mensenrecht. Echter, er werd ook aangegeven dat het aanvullende vereiste zoals gevonden kon worden in de Bemba Gombo zaak – te weten dat de schending daadwerkelijk nadeel moet hebben berokkend aan de verdachte voordat remedies kunnen worden toegekend – niet in overeenstemming met dit recht zou zijn.

Hoofdstuk XI bezag vervolgens het gegeven dat het IS had erkend dat het iedere keer dat het jurisdictie zou uitoefenen, iedere keer dat het betrokken was bij een zaak, die betrokkenheid verenigbaar diende te zijn met internationaal erkende mensenrechten. Dit leek een correcte interpretatie van artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut te zijn. Daarna werd uiteengezet dat indien (de Kamer van Beroep van) het IS akkoord zou gaan met de zienswijze van de Kamer van Vooronderzoek dat zij/het, behalve de onregelmatigheden gepleegd in de constructive custody van de verdachte, ook onregelmatigheden zou bezien die het resultaat zijn van concerted action tussen het IS en derde partijen, deze opvatting in overeenstemming zou zijn met de draagwijdte van artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut. Echter, opgemerkt werd ook dat indien de Kamer van Beroep vast hield aan haar aanvullende vereiste, te weten dat zij alleen onregelmatigheden begaan tegen de verdachte zou bezien wanneer deze verdachte in detentie verbleef voor dezelfde misdrijven als waarvoor hij nu vervolgd wordt bij het IS, dit als een schending van artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut zou kunnen worden gezien, aangezien die bepaling van toepassing was op èlke situatie waarbij het IS is betrokken.

Een van de meest interessante punten van het interne toetsingskader was dat de male detentus standaard van het IS uitging van de betrokkenheid van het IS (of van derde partijen die voor het IS werken). Het leek dat het IS niet jurisdictie zou weigeren indien bijvoorbeeld particulieren verantwoordelijk zouden zijn voor een zeer ernstige male captus. Dit zou niet problematisch zijn wanneer het IS de abuse of process doctrine had aanvaard, die zeer algemeen is en slechts vereist dat de rechters jurisdictie moeten weigeren indien zij van mening zijn dat de male captus zo ernstig is dat het de integriteit van het hof/hun rechtsgevoel/het idee van een eerlijk proces in het algemeen zou ondermijnen indien de zaak zou worden voortgezet. Echter, het IS had deze doctrine verworpen. Hoe diende deze verwerping van de abuse of process doctrine te worden beoordeeld vis-à-vis het recht van het IS?

Opgemerkt werd dat de rechters van het IS gelijk hadden toen zij stelden dat deze doctrine niet in de eigen IS documenten op basis van artikel 21, lid 1 onder (a) van het IS Statuut kon worden gevonden. Echter, na verduidelijkt te hebben dat een zekere bepaling in het IS Statuut – artikel 4, lid 1 van het IS Statuut – "cannot be construed as providing power to stay proceedings for abuse of process", concludeerden zij dat artikel 21, lid 1 onder (a) van het IS Statuut uitputtend was ten aanzien van deze kwestie en dus dat artikel 21, lid 1 onder (b) en (c) van het IS Statuut niet behandeld hoefde te worden.

Serieuze twijfel werd echter geuit of deze conclusie wel in overeenstemming was met het recht van het IS. Opgemerkt werd dat het veel te eenvoudig leek om te concluderen dat het IS Statuut ten aanzien van deze kwestie uitputtend was om de enkele reden dat de abuse of process doctrine niet expliciet genoemd danwel impliciet (via – het ogenschijnlijk irrelevante – artikel 4, lid 1 van het IS Statuut) gedekt werd door de IS documenten. Uiteengezet werd dat de rechters, die naar het oordeel van deze studie zich hier teveel concentreerden op de common law kwalificatie 'abuse of process', niet serieus andere relevante bepalingen hadden onderzocht welke licht konden werpen op de vraag of het IS de mogelijkheid had om een male detentus oordeel uit te spreken in het geval van een ernstige male captus, met in acht name van de regels van uitlegging van het Verdrag van Wenen inzake het verdragenrecht (zoals was gedaan in Hoofdstuk IX van dit boek). Hoofdstuk XI stelde dat het aanmerkelijk uitgebreidere onderzoek in Hoofdstuk IX naar het oordeel van deze studie had aangetoond dat artikel 21, lid 1 onder (a) van het IS Statuut, rekening houdende met artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut, niet uitputtend was ten aanzien van deze kwestie en dat men dus aandacht zou kunnen besteden aan artikel 21, lid 1 onder (b) en (c) van het IS Statuut teneinde deze juridische lacune in te vullen. En zoals in dat hoofdstuk betoogd, de mogelijkheid van een hof om jurisdictie te weigeren in het geval van een ernstige male captus zou gezien kunnen worden als een beginsel/regel van internationaal recht op basis van artikel 21, lid 1 onder (b) van het IS Statuut (namelijk als praktijk van internationale hoven) dan wel als een algemeen rechtsbeginsel op basis van artikel 21, lid 1 onder (c) van het IS Statuut. Bovendien werd uiteengezet dat, nu de mogelijkheid van een hof om in zeer ernstige male captus zaken jurisdictie te weigeren, zonder nu te letten op de precieze kwalificatie daarvan (zoals abuse of process/supervisory powers), door zoveel (inter)nationale hoven was aangewend, dit gezien zou kunnen worden als een inherente mogelijkheid van ieder hof, inclusief van het IS (zelfs indien dit niet geconstrueerd zou kunnen worden via artikel 4, lid 1 van het IS Statuut).

Een ander belangrijk aspect van het interne toetsingskader betrof de visie van het IS met betrekking tot artikel 59 van het IS Statuut. Hoewel de Kamer van Beroep in Lubanga Dyilo niet inging op deze kwestie, verduidelijkte de Kamer van Vooronderzoek in deze zaak dat de bevoegde gerechtelijke autoriteit in de 'staat van bewaring' niet verplicht was de voorfase van het strafproces te bezien indien die fase alleen nationale procedures betrof. Echter, zo vervolgde Hoofdstuk XI, dat leek te betekenen dat het de bevoegde gerechtelijke autoriteit dus wel toegestaan was dit te doen en deze zelfs verplicht was dit te doen in het geval dat die nationale procedures op enigerlei wijze in verband gebracht konden worden met het IS, bijvoorbeeld omdat het IS betrokken was bij deze procedures. Opgemerkt werd dat dat een rol zou zijn in overeenstemming met artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut, dat verenigbaarheid met internationaal erkende mensenrechten eiste vanaf het moment dat het IS betrokken was bij een zaak, hetgeen natuurlijk het geval kan zijn vóórdat de officiële verzoeken aan de nationale autoriteit waren verzonden. Echter, ten aanzien van de rol van de IS rechters, de supervisoren die deze bepaling marginaal beoordelen, merkte Hoofdstuk XI op dat noch de Kamer van Vooronderzoek, noch de Kamer van Beroep bespraken in hoeverre deze rechters de fase voordat de officiële IS verzoeken waren verstuurd, konden bezien. Bovendien onderzochten beide Kamers, en hetzelfde geldt voor de rechters in Bemba Gombo, niet duidelijk de wijze van tenuitvoerlegging van de officiële IS arrestatie aan de hand van bepalingen als artikel 21, lid 3 en 55, lid 1 onder (d) van het IS Statuut. (Zij onderstreepten in hun beslissingen slechts het belang van zulke rechten in het algemeen.) Zij leken alleen geïnteresseerd in nationaal recht. Gesteld werd dat deze beperkte interpretatie in strijd was met het eigen recht van het IS, aangezien beide bepalingen zeker van toepassing zijn op de procedures van artikel 59 van het IS Statuut. (Artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut is reeds van toepassing vanaf het moment dat het IS betrokken raakt bij de zaak en artikel 55, lid 1 onder (d) van het IS Statuut is reeds van toepassing vanaf het moment dat het IS een onderzoek start.)

Het laatste punt dat behandeld moest worden was dat de Kamer van Beroep alleen geïnteresseerd was in de ultieme remedie, de weigering van jurisdictie/het stilleggen van het proces. Echter, uiteengezet werd dat artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut het internationaal erkende mensenrecht op een effectieve remedie bevatte in geval van een schending. Dit betekende dat elke schending vanaf het moment dat het IS betrokken raakt bij de zaak hersteld moest worden, of dit nu wel of niet leidt tot het einde van de zaak. Hoewel het mogelijk was dat er geen schendingen hadden plaatsgevonden in Lubanga Dyilo vanaf het moment dat het IS daarbij betrokken raakte (en dus dat schending van het IS recht niet had plaatsgevonden in deze zaak), werd het IS er in het algemeen aan herinnerd niet te vergeten dat verdachten, op basis van artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut, recht zouden hebben op geëigende remedies in het geval van schendingen vanaf het moment dat het IS bij de zaak betrokken raakt.

Nu de centrale vraag van deze studie was beantwoord, stapte Hoofdstuk XI over naar de belangrijkste aanbevelingen.

Allereerst werd betoogd dat het IS tenminste zijn eigen recht zou moeten volgen. Dit betekende dat het IS alle bovenstaande opvattingen zou moeten verwerpen die gezien zouden kunnen worden als zijnde in strijd met artikel 21 van het IS Statuut, en dan met name lid 3 daarvan.

Aldus werd gesteld dat het IS het ouderwetse en beperkte concept van een eerlijk proces zou moeten prijsgeven, te weten dat sommige schendingen van dien aard moeten zijn dat de persoon niet meer zijn verdediging kan voeren alvorens men kan spreken van de onmogelijkheid van een eerlijk proces (indien dat concept inderdaad gesteund werd door het IS in de male captus discussie).

Verder werd opgemerkt dat het toe te juichen valt dat het IS in theorie zo vaak het belang van mensenrechten heeft onderstreept, zelfs voor verdachten van de meest ernstige misdrijven en zelfs ten aanzien van rechten die niet expliciet genoemd zijn in het IS Statuut (zoals het recht de rechtmatigheid van de detentie aan te vechten), maar dat betekende ook dat verdachten in staat moesten zijn om deze rechten in de praktijk uit te oefenen. Echter, gesteld kon worden, zo vervolgde Hoofdstuk XI, dat bijvoorbeeld de Katanga zaak die gedachte niet concretiseerde. Gesteld werd dat rechters altijd zouden moeten willen uitzoeken wat er gebeurd was met hun verdachten, wat het fundament was van de aan hen voorgelegde zaak. Dit betekende ook dat zij zich niet teveel zouden moeten concentreren op de precieze titel van de male captus motion en niet te gemakkelijk de gehele motion zouden moeten verwerpen omdat deze te laat werd ingediend. Rechters zouden ook de Verdediging kunnen berispen voor haar nalatigheid en nog steeds proprio motu de beschuldigingen beoordelen. Hoewel werd erkend dat het systeem van het IS in vele opzichten uniek is en zoveel mogelijk zou moeten worden geëerbiedigd, werd ook gesteld dat de rechters zich niet daarachter zouden kunnen verschuilen om te veronachtzamen wat naar het oordeel van deze studie hun belangrijkste taak is, namelijk het op een faire wijze berechten van verdachten van internationale misdrijven. Daarbij behoorde een serieus onderzoek naar de manier waarop deze verdachten onder de jurisdictie van het IS waren gebracht, naar het fundament van de aan hen voorgelegde zaak.

Opgemerkt werd dat de indruk die men kreeg in de Katanga zaak, te weten dat de rechters niet werkelijk geïnteresseerd leken in een volledig onderzoek naar de rechtmatigheid van de voorfase van het strafproces, zich ook deed voelen in de Lubanga Dyilo en Bemba Gombo zaken, waar de rechters niet serieus de relevantie van bepalingen als de artikelen 21, lid 3 en 55, lid 1 onder (d) van het IS Statuut onderzochten in de context van artikel 59 van het IS Statuut. Bovendien zou men hier ook kunnen wijzen op het feit dat men zich concentreerde op de ultieme remedie in Lubanga Dyilo. Gesteld werd dat het IS behoedzaam moest zijn om niet, in de woorden van Sluiter "retreat within the safe limits of The Hague".

Het IS had aangegeven dat iedere keer dat het jurisdictie uitoefende, iedere keer dat het betrokken was bij een zaak, die uitoefening van jurisdictie, die betrokkenheid (welke ook de acties van derde partijen omvatte die op verzoek van het IS werken) in overeenstemming moest zijn met artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut. Dat was een correcte uiteenzetting van het recht, hetgeen weer met zich meebracht dat afstand moest worden gedaan van het aanvullende vereiste van de Kamer van Beroep van het IS, dat zij alleen onregelmatigheden zou bezien wanneer de verdachte op het nationaal niveau in detentie verbleef voor dezelfde misdrijven als waarvoor hij nu wordt berecht bij het IS. Echter, Hoofdstuk XI stelde dat, zelfs wanneer de eerstgenoemde uiteenzetting in overeenstemming was met het recht van het IS, de rechters een stap verder zouden moeten gaan: zij zouden elke schending die plaatsvindt in de context van de aan hen voorgelegde zaak in het algemeen moeten onderzoeken, los van de vraag of er nu wel of geen betrokkenheid is aan de zijde van het IS. Uiteengezet werd dat normaal gesproken schendingen die plaatsvinden in een periode waarin het IS nog niet betrokken was bij de zaak, niet snel gezien zullen worden als schendingen die vallen binnen de context van de IS zaak. Praktisch gezien behoefde men dus voor deze bredere standaard niet beducht te zijn. Maar juridisch gezien moest men deze koesteren, omdat het de enige standaard was die rechters in staat zou kunnen stellen om schendingen te herstellen waarvan zij van mening waren dat deze vallen binnen de context van de aan hen voorgelegde zaak, zelfs wanneer het IS er nog niet bij betrokken was.

Een andere belangrijke aanbeveling was dat indien het IS geconfronteerd wordt met een nieuwe male captus zaak, het diepgaander zou moeten onderzoeken of het wel of niet de mogelijkheid heeft om (de uitoefening van) jurisdictie te weigeren in het geval van ernstige male captus zaken, vergelijkbaar met de abuse of process doctrine. Hoofdstuk XI stelde dat de analyse in Hoofdstuk IX naar het oordeel van deze studie had aangetoond dat artikel 21, lid 1 onder (a) van het IS Statuut niet uitputtend was ten aanzien van deze kwestie en dus dat de rechters aandacht zouden kunnen besteden aan artikel 21, lid 1 onder (b) en (c) van het IS Statuut. Indien zij het eens zouden zijn met deze studie dat deze bepalingen, via begrippen als "principles and rules of international law" en "general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world", de vaste praktijk van (inter)nationale hoven zouden kunnen omvatten, dan zouden zij deze praktijk kunnen gebruiken om hun male captus probleem op te lossen.

Ten aanzien van de "principles and rules of international law" wees Hoofdstuk XI op het aanvaarden van een breed abuse of process concept (in die zin dat jurisdictie zou kunnen worden geweigerd in zeer ernstige male captus zaken, ongeacht welke entiteit verantwoordelijk is) en het feit dat bij het toepassen van de abuse of process doctrine rekening gehouden kon worden met de ernst van de misdrijven waarvoor de verdachte is aangeklaagd.

Wanneer deze beginselen geen opening boden, zo vervolgde Hoofdstuk XI, dan zou het IS aandacht kunnen besteden aan de "general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world". Deze bepaalden dat de meeste gerechten, geconfronteerd met een male captus, hun discretie zullen gebruiken, bijvoorbeeld (in het common law systeem) met behulp van de abuse of process doctrine, om al de verschillende elementen van de zaak te wegen teneinde te besluiten of de male captus al dan niet zo ernstig is dat jurisdictie moet worden geweigerd. Bovendien leken de meeste gerechten alleen jurisdictie te weigeren indien hun eigen autoriteiten bij de male captus waren betrokken. Tenslotte leek het erop dat nogal wat gerechten – hoewel onduidelijk was of "nogal wat" voldoende zou zijn om tot een algemeen rechtsbeginsel op basis van artikel 21, lid 1 onder (c) van het IS Statuut te komen – ook rekening zouden houden, bij de beslissing of wel of geen jurisdictie moest worden geweigerd, met de ernst van de misdrijven waarvoor het slachtoffer van de male captus was aangeklaagd.

Tenslotte zette Hoofdstuk XI uiteen dat, nu zowel de "principles and rules of international law" als de "general principles of law derived by the Court from national laws of legal systems of the world" een op abuse of process gelijkende mogelijkheid leken te aanvaarden, men zou kunnen betogen dat ieder hof, inclusief het IS, over zo'n inherente mogelijkheid beschikte.

Hoofdstuk XI voerde dus aan dat zelfs indien de rechters niet aanvaardden dat de gedachte achter de abuse of process doctrine gezien kon worden als een beginsel/regel van internationaal recht op basis van artikel 21, lid 1 onder (b) van het IS Statuut, dan wel als een algemeen rechtsbeginsel dat door het Hof werd ontleend aan de nationale wetten van rechtsstelsels van de wereld op basis van artikel 21, lid 1 onder (c) van het IS Statuut, zij de op abuse of process gelijkende mogelijkheid moesten omarmen die zij naar het oordeel van deze studie al bezaten ("inherent") – op dezelfde manier als zij het recht leken te omarmen van een verdachte om de rechtmatigheid van zijn detentie aan te vechten (waarschijnlijk inclusief, in beginsel, de remedie om vrijgelaten te worden in het geval van een onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie), zelfs als dat recht niet expliciet genoemd was in de IS documenten. Bij het uitoefenen van deze mogelijkheid, zo vervolgde Hoofdstuk XI, zouden zij dan al de verschillende elementen van de zaak moeten afwegen om tot de meest geëigende remedies voor schendingen te komen, zoals de ernst van de vermeende misdrijven/het belang om de zaak voort te zetten en de ernst van de male captus, welke toenam naarmate de betrokkenheid van het IS groter was (waarbij gelet kon worden op alle verschillende mogelijkheden om gedrag aan het IS toe te rekenen, inclusief, bijvoorbeeld, gedrag dat het (IS) erkent en tot het zijne maakt), naarmate de schendingen opzettelijk waren gepleegd, naarmate de male captus groot nadeel aan de verdachte had berokkend, naarmate de male captus met ernstige mishandeling gepaard was gegaan, etc.

Hoofdstuk XI merkte vervolgens op dat indien het IS niet overtuigd was dat zo'n brede balancing exercise gevonden kon worden in het recht van het IS of niet gezien kon worden als een inherente mogelijkheid van het Hof, het wellicht meer ontvankelijk zou kunnen zijn voor praktische argumenten. Hoofdstuk XI riep in herinnering dat de male detentus standaard van het IS 'slechts' rekening hield met de mensenrechtelijke dimensie van de abuse of process doctrine. Bovendien ging het uit van betrokkenheid van het IS (of van derde partijen die op zijn verzoek werken).

Volgens deze studie kon dit leiden tot ernstige problemen veroorzaakt door male captus situaties, die, bijvoorbeeld, schendingen van staatssoevereiniteit en/of schendingen gepleegd door staten/particulieren waarbij het IS niet was betrokken, inhielden.

Hoofdstuk XI zette uiteen dat rechters met behulp van de abuse of process doctrine jurisdictie zouden kunnen weigeren wanneer zij van oordeel zijn dat zo'n ernstige male captus in de context van een zaak van het IS heeft plaatsgevonden dat zij de zaak niet langer naar eer en geweten kunnen voortzetten. Dit is een heel algemene standaard welke bijvoorbeeld schending van staatssoevereiniteit en schendingen gepleegd door staten/particulieren waarbij het IS niet was betrokken, zou kunnen omvatten. (In dit kader werd opgemerkt dat het waarschijnlijk, of in ieder geval: te hopen, was dat de IS rechters niet de 'carte blanche' beslissing van de Kamer van Beroep van het ICTY in Nikolić zouden volgen en méér belang zouden hechten aan staatssoevereiniteit, een concept dat de rechters van het "laterale" IS niet konden negeren op dezelfde manier als de rechters van het werkelijk "verticale" ICTY hadden gedaan.) Echter, zo vervolgde Hoofdstuk XI, dit leek niet mogelijk te zijn bij de huidige IS standaard, terwijl het IS zeker het gereedschap, de mogelijkheid zou moeten hebben om in zulke situaties jurisdictie te weigeren.

Een andere belangrijke aanbeveling was verbonden met het reeds genoemde recht van een verdachte om de rechtmatigheid van zijn arrestatie/detentie aan te vechten. Hoofdstuk XI zette uiteen dat indien de rechter van oordeel is dat diens arrestatie/detentie inderdaad onrechtmatig is (maar niet zo ernstig dat jurisdictie moet worden geweigerd), hij zich kan afvragen wat de gevolgen van deze vaststelling moeten zijn, nu het IS Statuut niet de remedie vrijlating in het geval van een onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie noemt en nu dit recht, inclusief de remedie vrijlating, gezien kan worden als een recht met internationaal gewoonterechtelijke status en dus in principe ook van toepassing is op het IS. Op dit punt verduidelijkte Hoofdstuk XI dat de rechters zich zouden kunnen aansluiten bij de analyse van deze remedie in Hoofdstuk IX, waar werd geconcludeerd dat op basis van artikel 21, lid 3 van het IS Statuut deze remedie in principe zou moeten worden verleend. Echter, in die context (en tevens elders in dit boek en in deze samenvatting) werd ook betoogd dat deze remedie problematisch is omdat ze ongenuanceerd is, omdat ze gebruikt kan worden als een pro forma remedie en tenslotte omdat er een risico is dat een verdachte van internationale misdrijven aan vervolging zal ontsnappen omdat hij wordt vrijgelaten ten gevolge van een lichte schending, bijvoorbeeld, omdat hij niet onverwijld op de hoogte was gebracht van de redenen van zijn arrestatie. Deze studie stelde dat een rechter niet alleen in de context van de abuse of process doctrine (of een vergelijkbare doctrine welke gebruikt kan worden om na te gaan of de male captus zo ernstig is dat jurisdictie moet worden geweigerd), maar ook in de context van deze problematische remedie in staat zou moeten zijn rekening te houden met alle relevante facetten van de zaak, inclusief de ernst van de vermeende misdrijven. Dat betekende, zo vervolgde Hoofdstuk XI, dat een verdachte van internationale misdrijven niet zou moeten worden vrijgelaten bij de vaststelling 'onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie', maar in hechtenis zou moeten blijven en andere geëigende remedies zou moeten krijgen, zoals strafvermindering (op basis van Regel 145 van de IS Reglement van Proces- en Bewijsvoering), compensatie (hetgeen in ieder geval verplicht leek op basis van artikel 85 van het IS Statuut) of wellicht enkel een verklaring dat een schending had plaatsgevonden en dat dit te betreuren was, een en ander met in acht name van de ernst van de male captus. Echter, Hoofdstuk XI merkte ook op dat wanneer de onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie zeer ernstig was, bijvoorbeeld omdat het IS een ontvoering organiseerde, dan jurisdictie zou moeten worden geweigerd en de verdachte definitief vrijgelaten zou moeten worden. Dit is een verstrekkend gevolg, maar sommige male captus situaties zijn zo ernstig dat het IS niet in gemoede de zaak kan voortzetten zonder zijn integriteit als *rechts*instituut te ondermijnen. Bovendien werd ook benadrukt dat de omstandigheid dat het IS niet langer deze verdachte zou kunnen berechten, niet betekende dat het er niet alles aan zou moeten doen om te bewerkstelligen dat de verdachte voor een ander hof werd berecht. Het had nog steeds een algemene verplichting om te strijden tegen straffeloosheid, of die strijd nu wel of niet voor het IS plaatsvindt.

Echter, Hoofdstuk XI stelde dat het belangrijkste punt was dat tribunalen/IS rechters, als zijnde de laatste oordelende instanties, als de ultieme hoeders van de rechten van verdachte, elke schending die plaatsvindt in de context van de aan hen voorgelegde zaak herstellen, of dit nu wel of niet leidt tot een weigering van jurisdictie en ongeacht welke entiteit verantwoordelijk is. Aangevoerd werd dat zo'n aanpak, in welk kader de IS rechters gebruik zouden kunnen maken van de bevindingen van de bevoegde gerechtelijke autoriteit in de 'staat van bewaring', als eerste indicatie hoe bepaalde onregelmatigheden op het nationale niveau dienden te worden beoordeeld, partijen betrokken bij het arrestatie- en overdrachtsproces zou afschrikken om onregelmatigheden te plegen, het best de integriteit van het IS zou kunnen beschermen en fairness zou kunnen bieden aan de verdachte, die zo niet het slachtoffer zou worden van een juridisch vacuüm veroorzaakt door het feit dat zijn zaak over twee of meer jurisdicties was verdeeld. Bovendien werd gesteld dat, aangezien niet veel male captus zaken zo ernstig zijn dat jurisdictie moet worden geweigerd, het ook niet snel het fairness idee van de slachtoffers (in die zin dat een proces moet worden gevoerd) in gevaar zou brengen. Verder zou het ook tot meer nuance leiden in een context die zich soms te veel richt op de ultieme remedie (weigering van jurisdictie). Dit, zo vervolgde Hoofdstuk XI, zou ook het ouderwetse male captus bene detentus imago 'verzachten' dat internationale tribunalen hebben. Zelfs indien het erop leek dat het IS de male captus male detentus zienswijze volgde ten aanzien van ernstige onregelmatigheden gepleegd door de "accusers" van de verdachte (hetgeen ook de actie van derde partijen die voor het IS werken omvatte), iets dat toegejuicht moest worden, werd betoogd dat de male captus zaken waarmee het IS geconfronteerd zou worden niet vaak zulke onregelmatigheden met zich mee zouden brengen. Dat betekende dat in de praktijk het IS waarschijnlijk bijna altijd de male captus zaak zou voortzetten, hetgeen, in zekere zin, gezien zou kunnen worden als aanvaarding van de male captus bene detentus regel. (In dat opzicht werd toegejuicht dat het IS noch de male captus bene detentus noch de male captus male detentus regel expliciet onderschreef, aangezien deze maximes naar het oordeel van deze studie het toppunt van eenvoud waren en totaal geen ruimte boden voor nuance.)

Wat betreft het bovengenoemde punt dat het erop leek dat het IS de male captus male detentus zienswijze volgde met betrekking tot ernstige onregelmatigheden gepleegd door de "accusers" van de verdachte: deze studie sprak zich zeer uit voor het toekennen van discretie aan rechters, in de context van de abuse of process doctrine (of een vergelijkbare doctrine) en in de context van het vaststellen van de gevolgen van een onrechtmatige arrestatie/detentie, teneinde alle relevante elementen van de zaak te wegen. Echter, zij was er zich ook van bewust dat teveel discretie tot problemen kan leiden, bijvoorbeeld, op het gebied van gelijkheid, transparantie en voorspelbaarheid. Er moesten dus bepaalde bakens zijn om deze discretie vorm te geven.

Allereerst stelde Hoofdstuk XI dat in sommige gevallen men diende te begrijpen dat er normaal gesproken maar één uitkomst mogelijk was. Indien bijvoorbeeld duidelijk zou worden dat de OTP betrokken was bij een ontvoeringsoperatie die alle relevante juridische regels negeerde, dan zouden de rechters alleen maar jurisdictie kunnen weigeren, indien zij tenminste nog serieus genomen wilden worden als hoeders van het recht, of de verdachte nu wel of niet aangeklaagd was voor ernstige misdrijven. Deze visie, merkte Hoofdstuk XI op, die onder de standaard 'dook' ten aanzien waarvan de meer recente statenpraktijk het schijnbaar eens was dat deze, in elk geval, moet leiden tot een verwerping van de male captus bene detentus regel, was waarschijnlijk ook de visie van het IS en dat viel toe te juichen. In andere, minder duidelijke, zaken dienden alle bovengenoemde elementen een leidende rol te spelen bij het bepalen of wel of geen jurisdictie moest worden geweigerd. Hoewel dus bepaalde indicatoren gevolgd moesten worden in de balancing exercise om te bereiken dat de discretie niet ongelimiteerd is, diende de ultieme verantwoordelijkheid, zo stelde Hoofdstuk XI, toch te liggen bij de rechters, aangezien aangetoond was dat té strikte regels ook tot misbruik konden leiden en omdat rechters altijd geconfronteerd zouden kunnen worden met niet voorziene situaties.

Tenslotte merkte Hoofdstuk XI op dat het boek twee kenmerken van het IS systeem had vóórondersteld, namelijk dat het IS geen verdachten in absentia kan berechten en dat het geen eigen politiemacht heeft. Uiteengezet werd echter dat men zich natuurlijk zou kunnen voorstellen dat wanneer het IS wèl deze kenmerken zou hebben, de kans kleiner zou kunnen worden dat IS rechters überhaupt geconfronteerd zouden worden met een male captus zaak.

In deze context werd gesteld dat hoewel deze studie had laten zien dat het idee van een eigen internationaal *arrestatie*team nog niet politiek haalbaar was, het IS zou kunnen overwegen het voorbeeld van het ICTY te volgen met betrekking tot het creëren van tracking teams. Echter, omdat het werk van zulke teams bestond uit traditioneel politiewerk in de staat in kwestie, hadden zij ook toestemming nodig van die staat, hetgeen uiteraard erg lastig, zo niet onmogelijk, te verkrijgen zou zijn van niet-meewerkende staten.

Hoofdstuk XI merkte vervolgens op dat het toestaan – onder bepaalde omstandigheden – van processen in absentia dat probleem zou oplossen.

Echter, omdat het IS eenvoudigweg (nog) niet was toegerust met deze kenmerken werd uiteengezet dat dit betekende dat het (wellicht meer) gebruik moet maken van het gereedschap dat het al heeft.

In deze context werd in het algemeen gesteld dat het IS verre moet blijven van dubieuze methoden om een verdachte onder zijn jurisdictie te brengen, omdat het uitwijken naar zulke methoden teneinde een korte termijn doel te bereiken, naast het feit dat het op dat specifieke moment reeds de waarden waar het IS voor staat ondermijnt, en naast het feit dat zo'n aanpak helemaal nog niet zo 'succesvol' hoeft te zijn aangezien zulke tactieken kunnen leiden tot het einde van de zaak (zie hierboven), de missie van het IS op lange termijn ernstig kan beschadigen.

Dit kwam, zo zette Hoofdstuk XI uiteen, omdat, onder andere, het IS de praktische steun van de internationale gemeenschap nodig heeft, in het bijzonder omdat het niet over een eigen handhavingsarm beschikt. Om veilig te stellen dat het dus de voortdurende welwillendheid van staten heeft, van de handhavers van het IS, moet het altijd een verdachte op een faire, rechtsbestendige manier vervolgen. Wanneer sceptische gestemde, maar machtige staten (zoals de VS) zien dat het IS een fair hof is, zo vervolgde Hoofdstuk XI, dan zouden zij wel eens sneller partij kunnen worden bij het IS Statuut, hetgeen op zijn beurt weer zal leiden tot meer steun en een meer daadkrachtigere handhavingsarm van het IS.

Daarom stelde deze studie dat wanneer rechters geconfronteerd worden met het dilemma zoals gepresenteerd in het allereerste hoofdstuk van dit boek, namelijk effectiviteit (in de zin van het tot stand komen van vervolgingen en veroordelingen) versus fairness, zij altijd voor het laatste concept zouden moeten kiezen. Alleen fairness kan leiden tot werkelijke effectiviteit, namelijk effectiviteit op lange termijn.

Een ander belangrijk punt dat werd duidelijk gemaakt in Hoofdstuk XI was dat het introduceren van nieuwe hulpmiddelen voor het IS teneinde diens mogelijkheden om een proces te starten te vergroten, zoals een bepaling die processen in absentia toestaat (als die mogelijkheid geïntroduceerd zou worden in de toekomst), het risico in zich bergt dat het echte probleem wordt gemaskeerd, namelijk de vraag waarom de handhavingsarm van het IS, gevormd door staten die partij zijn bij het IS Statuut (en staten die door de VN Veiligheidsraad verordonneerd zijn samen te werken met het IS) niet functioneert zoals hij zou moeten functioneren. Er werd aan herinnerd dat staten de voornaamste verplichting hebben tot het arresteren en overdragen van verdachten en dat deze verplichting zeer serieus moet worden genomen.

Volgens Hoofdstuk XI betekende dit bijvoorbeeld dat als verdachten niet konden worden aangehouden door de 'staat van bewaring', andere staten (of staten die samenwerken in een internationale vredesmacht) die staat in zijn pogingen dienden te ondersteunen. Niet alleen logistiek en financieel, maar wellicht ook met een echt arrestatieteam.

Ten aanzien van niet-meewerkende staten werd uiteengezet dat derde staten gebruik moesten maken van de carrot-and-stick methode die zo goed had gewerkt voor het ICTY, hetgeen betekende dat zij dienden te onderstrepen dat samenwerking met het IS zou leiden tot financiële/politieke steun en dat niet-samenwerking zou leiden tot embargo's/sancties/politiek isolement. Zo'n methode, vervolgde Hoofdstuk XI, zou meer legitimiteit hebben indien deze zou worden uitgevoerd in het kader van een collectiviteit van staten, zoals internationale organisaties. In deze context werd ook verwezen naar de rol van de VN Veiligheidsraad. Hoewel Hoofdstuk XI erkende dat de verhouding tussen dit orgaan en het IS een lastige is, werd aangevoerd dat als dit orgaan beslist dat bepaalde staten moeten samenwerken met het IS en als die staten dat weigeren te doen, de VN Veiligheidsraad in actie moet komen en wel veel krachtdadiger dan hij tot nu toe heeft gedaan. In dit kader werden ook enkele strategieën gepresenteerd die de VN Veiligheidraad zouden kunnen helpen in zijn pogingen om de strijd met straffeloosheid aan te gaan en om zijn eigen geloofwaardigheid te behouden.

Kortom, Hoofdstuk XI stelde dat de internationale gemeenschap, de handhavingspilaar van het IS, (beter) moet begrijpen dat zij grote verantwoordelijkheden heeft in het functioneren, de effectiviteit en dus het succes en de geloofwaardigheid van het IS. De internationale gemeenschap heeft hier, in de woorden van Rastan, een responsibility to enforce.

Hoofdstuk XI, Deel 5 en deze studie eindigden met een kort nawoord waarin onder andere de hoop werd uitgesproken dat deze studie (inclusief haar kritische observaties van deelparagraaf 2.3 en paragraaf 3 van Hoofdstuk XI), dan wel de discussies die zij zou kunnen oproepen, het IS zullen inspireren en behulpzaam zijn indien dit geconfronteerd wordt met een nieuwe male captus situatie om een beslissing te nemen die (meer) recht doet aan zijn moeilijke, maar zo prijzenswaardige doelstelling, namelijk om op een faire manier te strijden tegen straffeloosheid. Een strijd, waarvan paragraaf 3 van Hoofdstuk XI had aangevoerd dat deze alleen gewonnen kon worden wanneer de internationale gemeenschap haar verantwoordelijkheid als de handhaver van het IS serieus neemt.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Books

Abbell 2001
M. Abbell, Extradition To and From the United States, Transnational Publishers: Ardsley 2001 (loose-leaf).

Arendt 1994
H. Arendt, Eichmann in Jerusalem. A Report on the Banality of Evil, rev. and enl. edn., Penguin Books: London [etc.] 1994, VII, 312 pp.

Bauer 1968
E.F. Bauer, Die völkerrechtswidrige Entführung, Duncker & Humblot: Berlin 1968, 208 pp.

Bodin 1986
J. Bodin, Les Six Livres De La République, Livre Premier (Texte revu par Ch. Frémont, M.-D. Couzinet et H. Rochais), Fayard: Paris 1986, 341 pp.

Bodin 1992
J. Bodin, On Sovereignty. Four chapters from The Six Books of the Commonwealth, edited and translated by J.H. Franklin, Cambridge University Press: Cambridge [etc.] 1992, XLV, 141 pp.

Bos 1984
M. Bos, A Methodology of International Law, North-Holland: Amsterdam [etc.] 1984, XXI, 357 pp.

Brownlie 1998
I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, Fifth edn., Clarendon Press: Oxford 1998, XLVIII, 743 pp.

Brownlie 2003
I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, Sixth edn., Oxford University Press: Oxford 2003, XLII, 742 pp.

Cheng 1953
B. Cheng, General principles of law as applied by international courts and tribunals, Stevens & Sons Limited: London 1953, LI, 490 pp.

Cherif Bassiouni 1974
M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition and World Public Order, Sijthoff/Oceana Publications: Leyden/Dobbs Ferry 1974, XX, 630 pp.

Cherif Bassiouni 1987
M. Cherif Bassiouni, International Extradition: United States Law and Practice, Second rev. edn., Vol. 1 (Chapters 1-8), Oceana Publications: London [etc.] 1987, XXI, 496 pp.

Cherif Bassiouni and Wise 1995
M. Cherif Bassiouni and E.M. Wise, Aut dedere aut judicare. The duty to extradite or prosecute in international law, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers: Dordrecht 1995, XIV, 340 pp.

Choo 1993
A.L.-T. Choo, Abuse of process and judicial stays of criminal proceedings, Clarendon Press: Oxford 1993, XXXIII, 207 pp.

Conforti 1993
B. Conforti, International Law and the Role of Domestic Legal Systems, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers: Dordrecht [etc.] 1993, XXII, 207 pp.

Cryer et al. 2007
R. Cryer, H. Friman, D. Robinson and E. Wilmshurst, An Introduction to International Criminal Law and Procedure, Cambridge University Press: Cambridge 2007, XLIV, 477 pp.

Del Ponte 2009
C. Del Ponte (in collaboration with Ch. Sudetic), Madame Prosecutor. Confrontations with Humanity's Worst Criminals and the Culture of Impunity. A Memoir, Other Press: New York 2009, X, 434 pp.

Duker 1980
W.F. Duker, A Constitutional History of Habeas Corpus, Greenwood Press: Westport [etc.] 1980, IX, 349 pp.

Flinterman 2000
C. Flinterman, Soevereiniteit en de rechten van de mens. Inaugurele rede ter gelegenheid van de aanvaarding van het ambt van hoogleraar rechten van de mens aan de Universiteit Utrecht, 19 januari 2000, Universiteit van Utrecht/Studie- en Informatiecentrum Mensenrechten (SIM)/Onderzoekschool Rechten van de Mens: Utrecht 2000, 34 pp.

Franken 2004
A.A. Franken, Voor de vorm. Rede uitgesproken bij de aanvaarding van het ambt van hoogleraar Strafrechtspraktijk aan de Universiteit van Utrecht op 11 november 2004, Boom Juridische uitgevers: Den Haag 2004, 47 pp.

Friedmann 1967
W. Friedmann, Legal Theory, Fifth edn., Stevens & Sons: London 1967, XX, 607 pp.

Gardam 2004
J. Gardam, Necessity, Proportionality and the Use of Force by States, Cambridge University Press: Cambridge [etc.] 2004, XXIII, 259 pp.

Garner 2004
B.A. Garner (ed.), Black's Law Dictionary, Eighth edn., West Group: St. Paul 2004, XXV, 1810 pp.

Gellately 2004
R. Gellately (ed.), The Nuremberg Interviews. Conducted by Leon Goldensohn, Alfred A. Knopf: New York 2004, XXXI, 490 pp.

Gilbert 1998
G. Gilbert, Transnational fugitive offenders in international law: extradition and other mechanisms, Nijhoff: The Hague [etc.] 1998, XXXI, 486 pp.

Goldstone 1996
R. Goldstone, Prosecuting war criminals, The David Davies Memorial Institute of International Studies: London 1996, 21 pp.

Groenhuijsen and Knigge 2004
M.S. Groenhuijsen and G. Knigge (eds.), Afronding en verantwoording. Eindrapport onderzoeksproject Strafvordering 2001, Kluwer: Deventer 2004, XIII, 602 pp.

Grotius 1913
H. Grotius, De Jure Belli ac Pacis Libri Tres, in quibis Jus Naturae & Gentium, item Juris Publici praecipua explicantur, Editio Nova, cum Annotatis Auctoris, Ex postrema ejus ante obitum cura multo nunc auctior. Accesserunt & Annotata in Epistolam Pauli ad Philemonem, Vol. One, Reproduction of the Edition of 1646, Carnegie Institution of Washington: Washington 1913, XXXVI, 618 pp., 46 pp.

Harel 1975
I. Harel, The house on Garibaldi Street: the first full account of the capture of Adolf Eichmann told by the former head of Israel's Secret Service Isser Harel, The Viking Press: New York 1975, XX, 296 pp.

Hewett and Stoop 1994
M.L. Hewett and B.C. Stoop (eds.), On Crimes: A Commentary on Books XLVII and XLVIII of the Digest by Antonius Matthaeus J.C., Vol. III, University of Cape Town Press: Cape Town 1994, XI, pp. 339-538.

Higgins 1994
R. Higgins, Problems and Process, International Law and How We Use It, Clarendon Press: Oxford 1994, XXVII, 274 pp.

Howard 1998
A.E.D. Howard, Magna Carta: Text & Commentary, rev. edn., University Press of Virginia: Charlottesville 1998, VII, 58 pp.

Hyde 1945
Ch.Ch. Hyde, International Law Chiefly as Interpreted and Applied by the United States, Second rev. edn., Vol. 2, Little, Brown and Company: Boston 1945, XVII, pp. 823-1678.

International Law Association 1994
International Law Association, Report of the Sixty-Sixth Conference. Held at Buenos Aires, Argentina, 14 to 20 August 1994, International Law Association: London 1994, 725 pp.

Jägers 2002
N. Jägers, Corporate Human Rights Obligations: in Search of Accountability, Intersentia: Antwerpen [etc.] 2002, XIV, 309 pp.

Jennings and Watts 1992
R. Jennings and A. Watts, Oppenheim's international law, Vol. I, Peace, Ninth edn., Longman: Burnt Mill 1992, LXXXVI, 554 pp.

Jones and Doobay 2004
A. Jones and A. Doobay, Jones and Doobay on Extradition and Mutual Assistance, Third edn., Sweet & Maxwell: London 2004, LXII, 918 pp.

Kelsey 1925
F.W. Kelsey, De Jure Belli ac Pacis Libri Tres, by Hugo Grotius, Vol. Two, The Translation, Book I, Clarendon Press: Oxford 1925, XLVI, 948 pp.

Knoops 2002
G-J.A. Knoops, Surrendering to international criminal courts: contemporary practice and procedures, Transnational Publishers: Ardsley 2002, XXXVII, 407 pp.

Knoops 2005
G-J.A. Knoops, Theory and Practice of International and Internationalized Criminal Proceedings, Kluwer Law International: The Hague 2005, XXXI, 358 pp.

Lauterpacht 1970
E. Lauterpacht, International Law: Being the Collected Papers of Hersch Lauterpacht, Vol. I: The General Works, Cambridge University Press: Cambridge 1970, XXIII, 539 pp.

Liebs, Lehmann and Strobel 1982
D. Liebs, H. Lehmann and G. Strobel, Lateinische Rechtsregeln und Rechtssprichwörter, Second rev. edn., Beck: München 1982, 276 pp.

Meron 1989
Th. Meron, Human Rights and Humanitarian Norms as Customary Law, Clarendon Press: Oxford 1989, X, 263 pp.

Mevis, Reijntjes and Stamhuis 2004
P.A.M. Mevis, J.M. Reijntjes and E.F. Stamhuis (eds.), International Criminal Law 2005/2007, First edn., Ars Aequi Libri: Nijmegen 2004, 221 pp.

Mommsen 1955
Th. Mommsen, Römisches Strafrecht (Unveränderter photomechanischer Nachdruck der 1899 (…) in Leipzig erschienenen Ausgabe), Akademische Druck- und Verlagsanstalt: Graz 1955, XXIII, 1078 pp.

Mommsen, Krueger and Watson 1985 A
Th. Mommsen, P. Krueger and A. Watson (eds.), The Digest of Justinian, Vol. 1, University of Pennsylvania Press: Philadelphia 1985, LXIX, 458 pp.

Mommsen, Krueger and Watson 1985 B
Th. Mommsen, P. Krueger and A. Watson (eds.), The Digest of Justinian, Vol. 4, University of Pennsylvania Press: Philadelphia 1985, XXIII, pp. 487-969.

Nowak 1993
M. Nowak, U.N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. CCPR Commentary, N.P. Engel, Publisher: Kehl [etc.] 1993, XXVIII, 947 pp.

Nowak 2005
M. Nowak, U.N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. CCPR Commentary, Second rev. edn., N.P. Engel Verlag: Kehl 2005, XXXIX, 1277 pp.

Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights and International Bar Association 2003
Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights and International Bar Association, Human rights in the administration of justice: a manual on human rights for judges, prosecutors and lawyers, UN: New York 2003, XXXIV, 885 pp.

Packer 1968
H.L. Packer, The limits of the criminal sanction, Stanford University Press: Stanford 1968, XI, 385 pp.

Paust et al. 1996
J.J. Paust, M. Cherif Bassiouni, S.A. Williams, M. Scharf, J. Gurulé and B. Zagaris, International Criminal Law: Cases and Materials, Carolina Academic Press: Durham 1996, XIV, 1438 pp.

Pearlman 1963
M. Pearlman, The capture and trial of Adolf Eichmann, Weidenfeld and Nicolson: London 1963, VI, 666 pp.

Raimondo 2008
F.O. Raimondo, General Principles of Law in the Decisions of International Criminal Courts and Tribunals, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers: Leiden [etc.] 2008, XXI, 212 pp.

Robinson 1995
O.F. Robinson, The Criminal Law of Ancient Rome, Duckworth: London, 1995, X, 212 pp.

Rodley 1999
N.S. Rodley, The Treatment of Prisoners Under International Law, Second edn., Clarendon Press: Oxford 1999, XXIX, 479 pp.

Romano, Nollkaemper and Kleffner 2004
C.P.R. Romano, A. Nollkaemper and J.K. Kleffner, Internationalized Criminal Courts. Sierra Leone, East Timor, Kosovo, and Cambodia, Oxford University Press: Oxford [etc.] 2004, LVIII, 491 pp.

Sadat 2002
L.N. Sadat, The International Criminal Court and the Transformation of International Law: Justice for the New Millennium, Transnational Publishers: Ardsley 2002, XVIII, 566 pp.

Santalucia 1998
B. Santalucia, Diritto e processo penale nell'antica Roma, Seconda edizione, Giuffrè editore: Milano 1998, XX, 330 pp.

Schabas 2004
W.A. Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court, Second edn., Cambridge University Press: Cambridge [etc.] 2004, XII, 481 pp.

Schabas 2006
W.A. Schabas, The UN international criminal tribunals: the former Yugoslavia, Rwanda and Sierra Leone, Cambridge University Press: Cambridge [etc.] 2004, LIV, 711 pp.

Schabas 2007
W.A. Schabas, An Introduction to the International Criminal Court, Third edn., Cambridge University Press: Cambridge [etc.] 2007, XIII, 548 pp.

Schreiber 1976
H.-L. Schreiber, Gesetz und Richter. Zur geschichtlichen Entwicklung des Satzes nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege, Alfred Metzner Verlag: Frankfurt am Main 1976, 265 pp.

Seiderman 2001
I.D. Seiderman, Hierarchy in International Law. The Human Rights Dimension, Intersentia/Hart: Antwerp [etc.]/Oxford 2001, XIII, 337 pp.

Shaw 2003
M.N. Shaw, International law, Fifth edn., Cambridge University Press: Cambridge 2003, CXLV, 1288 pp.

Shearer 1971
I.A. Shearer, Extradition in international law, Manchester University Press: Manchester 1971, XXIII, 283 pp.

Sjöcrona and Orie 2002
J.M. Sjöcrona and A.M.M. Orie, Internationaal strafrecht vanuit Nederlands perspectief, derde, geheel herziene druk, Kluwer: Deventer 2002, XXII, 468 pp.

Sluiter 2002 C
G. Sluiter, International Criminal Adjudication and the Collection of Evidence: Obligations of States, Intersentia: Antwerpen [etc.] 2002, XIX, 441 pp.

Sluiter 2007
G. Sluiter, Het international strafprocesrecht. De geboorte van een rechtsgebied, Rede uitgesproken bij de aanvaarding van het ambt van hoogleraar in het Internationaal Strafprocesrecht aan de Universiteit van Amsterdam op vrijdag 22 juni 2007, Vossiuspers Amsterdam University Press: Amsterdam 2007, 31 pp.

Stein 1966
P.G. Stein, Regulae Iuris. From Juristic Rules to Legal Maxims, Edinburgh University Press: Edinburgh 1966, X, 206 pp.

Stein 1999
P.G. Stein, Roman Law in European History, Cambridge University Press: Cambridge 1999, IX, 137 pp.

Strachan-Davidson 1969
J.L. Strachan-Davidson, Problems of the Roman Criminal Law, Reproduction of Strachan-Davidson's book, in two volumes, from 1912, Rodopi: Amsterdam 1969, XXI, 245 pp. (Vol. I), 287 pp. (Vol. II)

Tellegen-Couperus 1993
O. Tellegen-Couperus, A Short History of Roman Law, Routledge: London [etc.] 1993, XII, 174 pp.

Tomuschat 2003
Ch. Tomuschat, Human rights: between idealism and realism, Oxford University Press: Oxford [etc.] 2003, XLVI, 333 pp.

Trechsel 2005
S. Trechsel, Human rights in criminal proceedings, Oxford University Press: Oxford [etc.] 2005, CX, 611 pp.

Van der Kruijs 2004
P. Van der Kruijs, De praktijk van het voorarrest, SDU Uitgevers: Den Haag 2004, XV, 187 pp.

Van Dijk and Van Hoof 1998
P. Van Dijk and G.J.H. Van Hoof, Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, Third edn., Kluwer Law International: The Hague [etc.] 1998, XXVII, 850 pp.

Willis 1982
J.F. Willis, Prologue to Nuremberg. The Politics and Diplomacy of Punishing War Criminals of the First World War, Greenwood Press: Westport [etc.] 1982, XIII, 293 pp.

Wilske 2000
S. Wilske, Die völkerrechtswidrige Entführung und ihre Rechtsfolgen, Duncker & Humblot: Berlin 2000, 448 pp.

Zahar and Sluiter 2008
A. Zahar and G. Sluiter, International criminal law. A critical introduction, Oxford University Press: Oxford 2008, XLVIII, 530 pp.

Zappalà 2003
S. Zappalà, Human Rights in International Criminal Proceedings, Oxford University Press: Oxford [etc.] 2003, XXVIII, 280 pp.

Zweigert, Kötz and Weir 1998
K. Zweigert, H. Kötz and T. Weir, Introduction to Comparative Law, Clarendon Press: Oxford [etc.] 1998, XXVI, 714 pp.

Articles

Aceves 1996
W.J. Aceves, 'The Legality of Transborder Abductions: A Study of United States v. Alvarez-Machain', 3 Southwestern Journal of Law and Trade in the Americas (1996), pp. 101-178.

Acquaviva 2007
G. Acquaviva, 'Human Rights Violations before International Tribunals: Reflections on Responsibility of International Organizations', 20 Leiden Journal of International Law (2007), pp. 613-636.

Anonymous 1975
Anonymous, 'Constitutional Law – Criminal Law – A Federal Court Lacks Jurisdiction Over a Criminal Defendant Brought into the District by Forcible Abduction; the Fourth Amendment Protects an Alien Residing Abroad Against Unreasonable Searches and Seizures Conducted by American Agents. – United States v. Toscanino, 500 F.2d 267 (2d Cir. 1974)', 88 Harvard Law Review (1974-1975), pp. 813-825.

Arbour 2004
L. Arbour, 'The Crucial Years', 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2004), pp. 396-402.

Arbour 2006
L. Arbour, 'In Our Name and On Our Behalf', 55 International and Comparative Law Quarterly (2006), pp. 511-526.

Arnell 2004
P. Arnell, 'Male captus bene detentus in Scotland', 2004 The Juridical Review (2004), pp. 251-263.

Arsanjani 1999
M.H. Arsanjani, 'The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', 93 American Journal of International Law (1999), pp. 22-43.

Baade 1961
H. Baade, 'The Eichmann Trial: Some Legal Aspects', 1961 Duke Law Journal (1961), pp. 400-420.

Baker 2004
A.W. Baker, 'Forcible Transborder Abduction: Defensive versus Offensive Remedies for Alvarez-Machain', 48 Saint Louis University Law Journal (2003-2004), pp. 1373-1418.

Barnidge, Jr. 2006
R.P. Barnidge, Jr., 'The Due Diligence Principle Under International Law', 8 International Community Law Review (2006), pp. 81-121.

Bekou and Shah 2006
O. Bekou and S. Shah, 'Realising the Potential of the International Criminal Court: The African Experience', 6 Human Rights Law Review (2006), pp. 499-544.

Beresford 2002
S. Beresford, 'Redressing the wrongs of the international justice system: compensation for persons erroneously detained, prosecuted, or convicted by the ad hoc tribunals', 96 American Journal of International Law (2002) pp. 628-646.

Bevers, Blokker and Roording 2003
H. Bevers, N. Blokker and J. Roording, 'The Netherlands and the International Criminal Court: On Statute Obligations and Hospitality', 16 Leiden Journal of International Law (2003), pp. 135-156.

Bhattacharyya 1996
R. Bhattacharyya, 'Establishing a Rule-of-law International Criminal Justice System', 31 Texas International Law Journal (1996), pp. 57-100.

Birkett 1991
W.C. Birkett, 'Cracks in the Foundation of Extraterritorial Law Enforcement – A Challenge to Basic Judicial Doctrines', 15 Southern Illinois University Law Journal (1990-1991), pp. 559-622.

Borelli 2003
S. Borelli, 'Terrorism and Human Rights: Treatment of Terrorist Suspects and Limits on International Co-operation', Leiden Journal of International Law, Vol. 16 (2003), pp. 803-820.

Borelli 2005
S. Borelli, 'Casting light on the legal black hole: International law and detentions abroad in the "war on terror"', 87 International Review of the Red Cross (2005), pp. 39-68.

Brants 2009
Ch. Brants, 'Developments in the protection of fundamental human rights in criminal process. Introduction', 5 Utrecht Law Review (2009), pp. 1-6.

Brants and Franken 2009
Ch. Brants and S. Franken, 'The protection of fundamental human rights in criminal process. General report', 5 Utrecht Law Review (2009), pp. 7-65.

Bugnion 2002
F. Bugnion, 'Guerre juste, guerre d'agression et droit international humanitaire', 84 International Review of the Red Cross (2002), pp. 523-546.

Burke-White 2008
W.W. Burke-White, 'Bargaining for Arrests at the International Criminal Court: A Response to Roper and Barria', 21 Leiden Journal of International Law (2008), pp. 477-482.

Burr 2001
S.L. Burr, 'From Noriega to Pinochet: Is there an International Moral and Legal Right to Kidnap Individuals Accused of Gross Human Rights Violations?', 29 Denver Journal of International Law and Policy (2000-2001), pp. 101-114.

Bush 1993
J.A. Bush, 'How Did We Get Here? Foreign Abduction After Alvarez-Machain', 45 Stanford Law Review (1992-1993), pp. 939-984.

Calica 2004
A.J. Calica, 'Self-Help Is the Best Kind: The Efficient Breach Justification for Forcible Abduction of Terrorists', Cornell International Law Journal, Vol. 37 (2004), pp. 389-429.

Cardozo 1961
M.H. Cardozo, 'When Extradition Fails, Is Abduction the Solution?', 55 American Journal of International Law (1961), pp. 127-135.

Caron 2002
D.D. Caron, 'The ILC Articles on State Responsibility: The Paradoxical Relationship Between Form and Authority', 96 American Journal of International Law (2002), pp. 857-873.

Cassese 1998
A. Cassese, 'On the Current Trends towards Criminal Prosecution and Punishment of Breaches of International Humanitarian Law', 9 European Journal of International Law (1998), pp. 2-17.

Cassese 1999
A. Cassese, 'The Statute of the International Criminal Court: Some Preliminary Reflections', 10 European Journal of International Law (1999), pp. 144-171.

Cazala 2007
J. Cazala, 'L'adage male captus bene detentus face au droit international', 134 Journal du Droit International (2007), pp. 837-862.

Cherif Bassiouni 1973
M. Cherif Bassiouni, 'Unlawful Seizures and Irregular Rendition Devices As Alternatives to Extradition', 7 Vanderbilt Journal of Transnational Law (1973-1974), pp. 25-70.

Cherif Bassiouni 1993
M. Cherif Bassiouni, 'Human Rights in the Context of Criminal Justice: Identifying International Procedural Protections and Equivalent Protections in National Constitutions', 3 Duke Journal of Comparative & International Law (1992-1993), pp. 235-298.

Chin 1998
L.Y.W. Chin, 'Not Just A War Crimes Court: The Penal Regime Established by the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', 10 Singapore Academy of Law Journal (1998), pp. 321-369.

Choo 1994 A
A.L.-T. Choo, 'Ex parte Bennett: The Demise of the Male Captus, Bene Detentus Doctrine in England?', 5 Criminal Law Forum (1994), pp. 165-179.

Choo 1994 B
A.L.-T. Choo, 'International kidnapping, disguised extradition and abuse of process', 57 The Modern Law Review (1994) pp. 626-635.

Choo 1995
A.L.-T. Choo, 'Halting Criminal Prosecutions: The Abuse of Process Doctrine Revisited', 1995 Criminal Law Review (1995), pp. 864-874.

Ciampi 2006
A. Ciampi, 'Current and Future Scenarios for Arrest and Surrender to the ICC', 66 Zeitschrift für ausländisches öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht (2006), pp. 719-736.

Clapham 2003
A. Clapham, 'Symbiosis in International Human Rights Law: The Öcalan Case and the Evolving Law on the Death Sentence', 1 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2003), pp. 475-489.

Cogan 2002
J.K. Cogan, 'International Criminal Courts and Fair Trials: Difficulties and Prospects', 27 Yale Journal of International Law (2002), pp. 111-140.

Condorelli and Ciampi 2005
L. Condorelli and A. Ciampi, 'Comments on the Security Council Referral of the Situation in Darfur to the ICC', 3 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2005), pp. 590-599.

Costi 2003
A. Costi, 'Problems with current international and national practices concerning extraterritorial abductions', 9 Revue Juridique Polynésienne (2003) pp. 57-100.

Cowling 1992
M.G. Cowling, 'Unmasking 'Disguised' Extradition – Some Glimmer of Hope', 109 South African Law Journal (1992), pp. 241-255.

Crane 2006
D.M. Crane, 'Terrorists, Warlords, and Thugs', 21 American University International Law Review (2005-2006), pp. 505-516.

Currie 2007
R.J. Currie, 'Abducted Fugitives Before the International Criminal Court: Problems and Prospects', 18 Criminal Law Forum (2007), pp. 349-393.

Deen-Racsmány 2001
Z. Deen-Racsmány, 'The Nationality of the Offender and the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court', 95 American Journal of International Law (2001), pp. 606-623.

Deen-Racsmány 2007
Z. Deen-Racsmány, 'Lessons of the European Arrest Warrant for Domestic Implementation of the Obligation to Surrender Nationals to the International Criminal Court', 20 Leiden Journal of International Law (2007), pp. 167-191.

DeFrancia 2001
C. DeFrancia, 'Due Process in International Criminal Courts. Why Procedure Matters', 87 Virginia Law Review (2001), pp. 1381-1440.

Degan 2005
V.-D. Degan, 'On the Sources of International Criminal Law', 4 Chinese Journal of International Law (2005), pp. 45-83.

De Londras 2007
F. De Londras, 'The Right to Challenge the Lawfulness of Detention: An International Perspective on US Detention of Suspected Terrorists', 12 Journal of Conflict and Security Law (2007), pp. 223-260.

De Sanctis 2004
F. De Sanctis, 'The practice of national and international courts on transnational seizure: is a fair balance between human rights and accountability possible?', 22 Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights (2004), pp. 529-557.

De Schutter 1965
B. De Schutter, 'Competence of the national judiciary power in case the accused has been unlawfully brought within the national frontiers', 1 Revue Belge de Droit International (1965), pp. 88-124.

De Zayas 2005
A. De Zayas, 'Human Rights and indefinite detention', 87 International Review of the Red Cross (2005), pp. 15-38.

DiMento and Geis 2006
J.F.C. DiMento and G. Geis, 'The Extraordinary Condition of Extraordinary Rendition: The C.I.A, the D.E.A, Kidnaping, Torture, and the Law', 2 War Crimes, Genocide & Crimes against Humanity (2006), pp. 35-64.

Doehring 1965
K. Doehring, 'Restitutionsanspruch, Asylrecht und Auslieferungsrecht im Fall Argoud', 25 Zeitschrift für ausländisches öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht (1965), pp. 209-222.

Dugard 1991
J. Dugard, 'No Jurisdiction over Abducted Persons in Roman-Dutch Law: Male Captus, Male Detentus', 7 South African Journal on Human Rights (1991), pp. 199-203.

Edwards 2001
G.E. Edwards, 'International Human Rights Law Challenges to the New International Criminal Court: The Search and Seizure Right to Privacy', 26 Yale Journal of International Law (2001), pp. 323-412.

El Zeidy 2006
M.M. El Zeidy, 'Critical Thoughts on Article 59(2) of the ICC Statute', 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2006), pp. 448-465.

Fairman 1953
Ch. Fairman, 'Ker v. Illinois Revisited', 47 American Journal of International Law (1953), pp. 678-686.

Findlay 1988
D.C. Findlay, 'Abducting Terrorists Overseas for Trial in the United States: Issues of International and Domestic Law', 23 Texas International Law Journal (1988), pp. 1-54.

Friman 2003
H. Friman, 'Inspiration from the International Criminal Tribunals when Developing Law on Evidence for the International Criminal Court', 2 The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals (2003), pp. 373-400.

Frowein 1997
J.A. Frowein, 'International Law in Municipal Courts', 91 American Society of International Law Proceedings (1997), pp. 290-294.

Frulli 2006
M. Frulli, 'A Turning Point in International Efforts to Apprehend War Criminals. The UN Mandates Taylor's Arrest in Liberia', 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2006), pp. 351-361.

Furuya 1999
S. Furuya, 'Rule 61 Procedure in the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia: A Lesson for the ICC', 12 Leiden Journal of International Law (1999), pp. 635-669.

Gaeta 1998
P. Gaeta, 'Is NATO authorized or obliged to arrest persons indicted by the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia?', 9 European Journal of International Law (1998) pp. 174-181.

Gallant 1994
K.S. Gallant, 'Securing the Presence of Defendants before the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia: Breaking with Extradition', 5 Criminal Law Forum (1994), pp. 557-588.

Gallant 2003 A
K.S. Gallant, 'Jurisdiction to Adjudicate and Jurisdiction to Prescribe in International Criminal Courts', 48 Villanova Law Review (2003), pp. 763-842.

Gallant 2003 B
K.S. Gallant, 'The International Criminal Court in the System of States and International Organizations', 16 Leiden Journal of International Law (2003), pp. 553-591.

Garcia-Mora 1957
M.R. Garcia-Mora, 'Criminal Jurisdiction of a State over Fugitives Brought from a Foreign Country by Force or Fraud: A Comparative Study', 32 Indiana Law Journal (1956-1957), pp. 427-449.

Gershenson 1954
M.G. Gershenson, 'Kidnapping and Abduction', 21 Brooklyn Law Review (1954-1955), pp. 20-37.

Gillett 2008
M. Gillett, 'Fighting Impunity: Assisted Arrests at the ICC', 3 Yale Journal of International Affairs (2008), pp. 16-32.

Glashausser 2005
A. Glashausser, 'What We Must Never Forget When It Is A Treaty We Are Expounding', 73 University of Cincinnati Law Review (2004-2005), pp. 1243-1346.

Glennon 1992
M.J. Glennon, 'State-Sponsored Abduction: A Comment on United States v. Alvarez-Machain', 86 American Journal of International Law (1992), pp. 746-756.

Gluck 1994
J.A. Gluck, 'The Customary International Law of State-Sponsored International Abduction and United States Courts', 44 Duke Law Journal (1994-1995), pp. 612-656.

Goldie 1987
L.F.E. Goldie, 'Profile of a Terrorist: Distinguishing Freedom Fighters from Terrorists', 14 Syracuse Journal of International Law and Commerce (1987-1988), pp. 125-140.

Goldstone and Simpson 2003
R. J. Goldstone and J. Simpson, 'Evaluating the Role of the International Criminal Court as a Legal Response to Terrorism', Harvard Human Rights Journal, Vol. 16 (2003), pp. 13-26.

Gordon 2007
G.S. Gordon, 'Towards an International Criminal Procedure: Due Process Aspirations and Limitations', 45 Columbia Journal of Transnational Law (2006-2007), pp. 635-710.

Grams 1994
H.A. Grams, 'Jurisdiktion im Anschluβ an die Ergreifung eigener Staatsangehöriger im Ausland. Male captus bene iudicatus or ex iniuria ius non oritur?, 1994 Juristische Arbeitsblätter (1994), pp. 65-72.

Gray 1991
J.L. Gray, 'International Kidnapping and the Constitutional Rights of the Kidnapped', 44 Rutgers Law Review (1991-1992), pp. 165-204.

Green 1963
L.C. Green, 'Legal Issues of the Eichmann Trial', 37 Tulane Law Review (1962-1963), pp. 641-684.

Green 2006
J.A. Green, 'Docking the Caroline: Understanding the Relevance of the Formula in Contemporary Customary International Law Concerning Self-Defense', 14 Cardozo Journal of International and Comparative Law (2006), pp. 429-480.

Gurulé 1994
J. Gurulé, 'Terrorism, Territorial Sovereignty, and the Forcible Apprehension of International Criminals Abroad', 17 Hastings International & Comparative Law Review (1993-1994), pp. 457-496.

Hafner and Binder 2004
G. Hafner and Ch. Binder, 'The Interpretation of Article 21 (3) ICC Statute. Opinion Reviewed.', 9 Austrian Review of International and European Law (2004), pp. 163-190.

Halberstam 1992
M. Halberstam, 'In Defense of the Supreme Court Decision in Alvarez-Machain' (in: 'Agora: International Kidnapping'), 86 American Journal of International Law (1992), pp. 736-746.

Hamid 2004
A.G. Hamid, 'Jurisdiction over a Person Abducted from a Foreign Country: Alvarez Machain case Revisited', 31 Journal of Malaysian and Comparative Law (2004), pp. 69-86.

Harmon and Gaynor 2004

M.B. Harmon and F. Gaynor, 'Prosecuting Massive Crimes with Primitive Tools: Three Difficulties Encountered by Prosecutors in International Criminal Proceedings', 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2004), pp. 403-426.

Heller 2008

K.J. Heller, 'What Happens to the Acquitted?', 21 Leiden Journal of International Law (2008), pp. 663-680.

Henderson 2006

B. Henderson, 'From Justice to Torture: The Dramatic Evolution of U.S.-Sponsored Renditions', 20 Temple International & Comparative Law Journal (2006), pp. 189-218.

Henquet 1999

Th. Henquet, 'Mandatory Compliance Powers vis-à-vis States by the Ad Hoc Tribunals and the International Criminal Court: A Comparative Analysis', 12 Leiden Journal of International Law (1999), pp. 969-999.

Hessbruegge 2004

J.A. Hessbruegge, 'The Historical Development of the Doctrines of Attribution and Due Diligence in International Law', 36 New York University Journal of International Law and Politics (2003-2004), pp. 265-306.

Heyder 2006

C. Heyder, 'The U.N. Security Council's Referral of the Crimes in Darfur to the International Criminal Court in Light of U.S. Opposition to the Court: Implications for the International Criminal Court's Functions and Status' 24 Berkeley Journal of International Law (2006), pp. 650-671.

Izes 1997

B. Izes, 'Drawing Lines in the Sand: When State-Sanctioned Abductions of War Criminals Should be Permitted', 31 Columbia Journal of Law and Social Problems (1997-1998), pp. 1-38.

Jones 1996

J.R.W.D. Jones, 'The Implications of the Peace Agreement for the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia', 7 European Journal of International Law (1996), pp. 226-244.

Kalinauskas 2002
M. Kalinauskas, 'The Use of International Military Force in Arresting War Criminals: The Lessons of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia', 50 Kansas Law Review (2001-2002), pp. 383-430.

Kash 1997
D. Kash, 'Abducting Terrorists Under PDD-39: Much Ado About Nothing New', 13 American University International Law Review (1997-1998), pp. 139-156.

Kiss 1965
A-Ch. Kiss, 'Jurisprudence française relative au droit international public', 11 Annuaire français de droit international (1965), pp. 933-982.

Klip 1997
A. Klip, 'The decrease of protection under human rights treaties in international criminal law', 68 International Review of Penal Law (1997), pp. 291-310.

Kovac 2002
M.A. Kovac, 'Apprehension of War Crimes Indictees: Should the United Nations' Courts Outsource Private Actors to Catch Them?', 51 Catholic University Law Review (2001-2002), pp. 619-654.

Kreß 2007
C. Kreß, 'The Procedural Texts of the International Criminal Court', 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2007), pp. 537-543.

Kress 2003
C. Kress, 'The Procedural Law of the International Criminal Court in Outline: Anatomy of a Unique Compromise', 1 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2003), pp. 603-617.

Künzli 2004
A. Künzli, 'Öcalan v. Turkey: Some Comments', 17 Leiden Journal of International Law (2004), pp. 141-154.

Lasok 1962
D. Lasok, 'The Eichmann Trial', 11 International and Comparative Law Quarterly (1962), pp. 355-374.

Lipson 1991
Ch. Lipson, 'Why are Some International Agreements Informal?', 45 International Organization (1991), pp. 495-538.

Loan 2005
J. Loan, 'Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain: Extraterritorial Abduction and the Rights of Individuals under International Law', 12 ILSA Journal of International and Comparative Law (2005), pp. 253-300.

Lowenfeld 1990
A.F. Lowenfeld, 'U.S. Law Enforcement Abroad: The Constitution and International Law, Continued', 84 American Journal of International Law (1990), pp. 444-493.

Lucchini 1964
L. Lucchini, 'Pratique comparée des états en matière internationale', 91 Journal du droit international (1964), pp. 187-194.

Magliveras 2002
K.D. Magliveras, 'The Interplay Between the Transfer of Slobodan Milosevic to the ICTY and Yugoslav Constitutional Law', 13 European Journal of International Law (2002), pp. 661-677.

Maki 1980
L.J. Maki, 'General Principles of Human Rights Law Recognized by All Nations: Freedom From Arbitrary Arrest and Detention', 10 California Western International Law Journal (1980), pp. 272-313.

Manning 2007
J. Manning, 'On Power, Participation and Authority: The International Criminal Court's Initial Appellate Jurisprudence', 38 Georgetown Journal of International Law (2006-2007), pp. 803-842.

Maogoto 2004
J.N. Maogoto, 'A Giant Without Limbs: The International Criminal Court's State-Centric Cooperation Regime', 23 Queensland Law Journal (2004), pp. 102-133.

Marcoux, Jr. 1982
L. Marcoux, Jr., 'Protection from Arbitrary Arrest and Detention Under International Law', 5 Boston College International & Comparative law Review (1982), pp. 345-376.

McNeal and Field 2007
G.S. McNeal and B.J. Field, 'Snatch-and-Grab Ops: Justifying Extraterritorial Abduction', 16 Transnational Law & Contemporary Problems (2006-2007), pp. 491-522.

Meron 1986
Th. Meron, 'On a Hierarchy of International Human Rights', 80 American Journal of International Law (1986), pp. 1-23.

Meron 2006
Th. Meron, 'Reflections on the Prosecution of War Crimes by International Tribunals', 100 American Journal of International Law (2006), pp. 551-579.

Michell 1996
P. Michell, 'English-Speaking Justice: Evolving Responses to Transnational Forcible Abduction After Alvarez-Machain', 29 Cornell International Law Journal (1996), pp. 383-500.

Mohan 2009
M. Mohan, 'Schisms in Humanitarianism – The Khmer Rouge Tribunal's First Hearing', 4 Asian Journal of Comparative Law (2009), pp. 1-29.

Morris and Bourloyannis-Vrailas 1994
V. Morris and M.-Ch. Bourloyannis-Vrailas, 'The Work of the Sixth Committee at the Forty-Eighth Session of the UN General Assembly', 88 American Journal of International Law (1994), pp. 343-360.

Mowbray 2003
A. Mowbray, 'European Convention on Human Rights: Institutional Reforms Proposals and Recent Cases', 3 Human Rights Law Review (2003), pp. 301-321.

Mundis 2003
D.A. Mundis, 'Recent Books on International Law' (Review of the books International Criminal Evidence and Surrendering to International Criminal Court: Contemporary Practice and Procedures), 97 American Journal of International Law (2003), pp. 1012-1019.

Murphy 2001
S.D. Murphy, 'ICTY Order for Disclosure of Information by NATO/SFOR', 95 American Journal of International Law (2001), pp. 401-404.

Nadelmann 1993
E.A. Nadelmann, 'The Evolution of United States Involvement in the International Rendition of Fugitive Criminals', 25 New York University Journal of International Law and Politics (1992-1993), pp. 813-886.

Norton 1975
W.J. Norton, 'United States Obligations under Status of Forces Agreements: A New Method of Extradition?', 5 Georgia Journal of International & Comparative Law (1975), pp. 1-76.

Nsereko 2008
D.D.N. Nsereko, 'The Abuse of Process Doctrine in the Administration of Criminal Justice Before National Courts and International Tribunals', 7 University of Botswana Law Journal (2008), pp. 29-72.

Oosterveld, Perry and McManus 2002
V. Oosterveld, M. Perry and J. McManus, 'The Cooperation of States with the International Criminal Court', 25 Fordham International Law Journal (2001-2002), pp. 767-839.

Orie 1978
A.M.M. Orie, 'Werd Menten rechtmatig van Zwitserland naar Nederland gebracht? (een geval van verkapte uitlevering)', 1978 Rechtsgeleerd Magazijn Themis, (1978), pp. 138-157.

O'Shea 1995-1996
S. O'Shea, 'Interaction Between International Criminal Tribunals and National Legal Systems', 28 New York University Journal of International Law and Politics (1995-1996), pp. 367-434.

Parry 2005
J.T. Parry, 'The shape of modern torture: extraordinary rendition and ghost detainees', 6 Melbourne Journal of International Law (2005), pp. 516-533.

Paust 1992
J.J. Paust, 'The Other Side of Right: Private Duties Under Human Rights Law', 5 Harvard Human Rights Journal (1992), pp. 51-64.

Paust 1993
J.J. Paust, 'After Alvarez-Machain: Abduction, Standing, Denials of Justice, and Unaddressed Human Rights Claims', 67 St. John's Law Review (1993), pp. 551-580.

Paust 2003
J.J. Paust, 'Legal Responses to Terrorism: Security, Prosecution, and Rights. Detention, Judicial Review of Detention, and Due Process During Prosecution', 97 American Society of International Law Proceedings (2003), pp. 13-18.

Plumb, Jr. 1939
W.T. Plumb, Jr. 'Illegal Enforcement of the Law', 24 Cornell Law Quarterly (1938-1939), pp. 337-393.

Poort 1988
T. Poort, 'Male captus, bene judicatus: disguised extradition and other practices', 1 Leiden Journal of International Law (1988), pp. 65-77.

Preuss 1935
L. Preuss, 'Kidnaping of Fugitives from Justice on Foreign Territory', 29 American Journal of International Law (1935), pp. 502-507.

Preuss 1936
L. Preuss, 'Settlement of the Jacob Kidnaping case (Switzerland-Germany), 30 American Journal of International Law (1936), pp. 123-124.

Pulkowski 2001
D. Pulkowski, 'Wilske, Stephan. Die völkerrechtswidrige Entführung und ihre Rechtsfolgen [Abduction contrary to international law and its legal consequences], Berlin: Duncker & Humblot 2000. Pp 448. DM 144. ISBN 3-428-09464-6.' (Book Review), 12 European Journal of International Law (2001), pp. 1035-1038.

Quigley 1988
J. Quigley, 'Government Vigilantes at Large: The Danger to Human Rights from Kidnapping of Suspected Terrorists', 10 Human Rights Quarterly (1987-1988), pp. 193-213.

Quigley 1993
J. Quigley, 'Our Men in Guadalajara and the Abduction of Suspects Abroad: A Comment on United States v. Alvarez-Machain, 68 Notre Dame law Review (1992-1993), pp. 723-746.

Quintal 1998
A.L. Quintal, 'Rule 61: The "Voice of the Victims" Screams Out For Justice', 36 Columbia Journal of Transnational Law (1998), pp. 723-760.

Radosavljevic 2008
D. Radosavljevic, 'Mala Captus Bene Detentus and the Right to Challenge the Legality of Arrests Under the ICC Statute', 29 Liverpool Law Review (2008), pp. 269-285.

Rastan 2008
R. Rastan, 'Testing Co-operation: The International Criminal Court and National Authorities', 21 Leiden Journal of International Law (2008), pp. 431-456.

Rayfuse 1993
R. Rayfuse, 'International Abduction and the United States Supreme Court: The Law of the Jungle Reigns', 42 International and Comparative Law Quarterly (1993), pp. 882-897.

Ré 1993
S.A. Ré, '"The Treaty Doesn't Say We Can't Kidnap Anyone" – Government Sponsored Kidnapping as a Means of Circumventing Extradition Treaties', 44 Washington University Journal of Urban and Contemporary Law (1993), pp. 265-280.

Ris 1991
M. Ris, 'Treaty Interpretation and ICJ Recourse to Travaux Préparatoires: Towards a Proposed Amendment of Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties', 14 Boston College International & Comparative Law Review (1991), pp. 111-136.

Roberts 2001
A.E. Roberts, 'Traditional and Modern Approaches to Customary International Law: A Reconciliation', 95 American Journal of International Law (2001), pp. 757-791.

Rogers 1887
H.W. Rogers, 'Recent American Decisions. Supreme Court of the United States. United States v. Rauscher', 35 American Law Register (1887), pp. 218-246.

Roper and Barria 2008
S.D. Roper and L.A. Barria, 'State Co-operation and International Criminal Court Bargaining Influence in the Arrest and the Surrender of Suspects', 21 Leiden Journal of International Law (2008) pp. 457-476.

Roth 2004
B.R. Roth, 'Scope of Alien Tort Statute – arbitrary arrest and detention as violations of custom. Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain; United States v. Alvarez-Machain. 124 S.Ct. 2739. United States Supreme Court, June 29, 2004', 98 American Journal of International Law (2004), pp. 798-804.

Ruiz-Bravo 1993
H. de J. Ruiz-Bravo, 'Monstrous Decision: Kidnapping is Legal', 20 Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly (1992-1993), pp. 833-876.

Ryngaert 2008
C. Ryngaert, 'The Doctrine of Abuse of Process: A Comment on the Cambodia Tribunal's Decisions in the Case against Duch (2007)', 21 Leiden Journal of International Law (2008), pp. 719-737.

Sadat 1999
L.N. Sadat, 'The Establishment of the International Criminal Court: From The Hague to Rome and Back Again, 8 Michigan State University-DCL Journal of International Law (1999), pp. 97-118.

Sadat 2000
L.N. Sadat, 'Custom, Codification and Some Thoughts about the Relationship between the Two: Article 10 of the ICC Statute', 49 DePaul Law Review (1999-2000), pp. 909-924.

Schabas 2000
W.A. Schabas, 'Barayagwiza v. Prosecutor (Decision, and Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)) Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72', 94 American Journal of International Law (2000), pp. 563-571.

Scharf 1998
M.P. Scharf, 'The prosecutor v. Slavko Dokmanović: irregular rendition and the ICTY', 11 Leiden Journal of International Law (1998) pp. 369-382.

Scharf 2000
M.P. Scharf, 'The Tools for Enforcing International Criminal Justice in the New Millennium: Lessons from the Yugoslavia Tribunal', 49 DePaul Law Review (1999-2000), pp. 925-980.

Schlesinger 1957
R.B. Schlesinger, 'Research on the General Principles of Law Recognized by Civilized Nations', 51 American Journal of International Law (1957), pp. 734-753.

Schneebaum 1992
S.M. Schneebaum, 'The Supreme Court Sanctions Transborder Kidnapping in United States v. Alvarez-Machain: Does International Law Still Matter?', 18 Brooklyn Journal of International Law (1992), pp. 303-312.

Schomburg 1995
W. Schomburg, 'The Regionalization of International Criminal Law and the Protection of Human Rights in International Cooperation in Criminal Proceedings. Section IV of the XV Congress of The International Association of Penal Law, IAPL', 3 European Journal of Crime, Criminal Law and Criminal Justice (1995), pp. 98-105.

Schultz 1967
H. Schultz, 'Male Captus Bene Iudicatus?', 24 Schweizerisches Jahrbuch für Internationales Recht (1967), pp. 67-86.

Schultz 1984
H. Schultz, 'Male Captus, Bene Deditus?', 40 Schweizerisches Jahrbuch für Internationales Recht (1984), pp. 93-111.

Scott, Jr. 1953
A.W. Scott, Jr., 'Criminal Jurisdiction of a State over a Defendant Based upon Presence Secured by Force or Fraud', 37 Minnesota Law Review (1952-1953), pp. 91-107.

Seaman 1985
P.J. Seaman, 'International Bountyhunting: A Question of State Responsibility', 15 California Western International Law Journal (1985), pp. 397-417.

Selleck 1985
K. Selleck, 'Jurisdiction after International Kidnapping: A Comparative Study', 8 Boston College International & Comparative Law Review (1985), pp. 237-266.

Semmelman 1992
J. Semmelman, 'Due Process, International Law, and Jurisdiction over Criminal Defendants Abducted Extraterritorially: The Ker-Frisbie Doctrine Reexamined', 30 Columbia Journal of Transnational Law (1992), pp. 513-576.

Semmelman 1993
J. Semmelman, 'State v. Ebrahim. [1991] 2 S. Afr. L.R. 553 (a), abbreviated in 31 ILM 888 (1992). Supreme Court (app. Div.), Feb. 16, 1991', 87 American Journal of International Law (1993), pp. 133-137.

Sharp, Sr. 1997
W.G. Sharp, Sr., 'International Obligations to Search for and Arrest War Criminals: Government Failure in the former Yugoslavia?', 7 Duke Journal of Comparative & International Law (1996-1997), pp. 411-460.

Shaw 1998
M.N. Shaw, 'The International Criminal Court – Some Procedural and Evidential Issues', 3 Journal of Armed Conflict (1998), pp. 65-96.

Sheely 2003
B. Sheely, 'United States v. Best: International Violation Schmiolation – The Ker-Frisbie Doctrine Trumps All', 11 Tulane Journal of International and Comparative law (2003), pp. 429-446.

Shen 1994
J. Shen, 'Responsibilities and Jurisdiction Subsequent to Extraterritorial Apprehension', 23 Denver Journal of International Law and Policy (1994-1995), pp. 43-86.

Shen 2001
J. Shen, 'The Non-Intervention Principle and Humanitarian Interventions Under International Law', 7 International Legal Theory (2001), pp. 1-32.

Silving 1961
H. Silving, 'In Re Eichmann: A Dilemma of Law and Morality', 55 American Journal of International Law (1961), pp. 307-358.

Slater 2004
M.A. Slater, 'Trumpeting Justice: The Implications of U.S. Law and Policy for the International Rendition of Terrorists from Failed or Uncooperative States', 12 University of Miami International and Comparative Law Review (2004), pp. 151-188.

Sloan 2003 A
J. Sloan, 'Prosecutor v. Todorović: Illegal Capture as an Obstacle to the Exercise of International Criminal Jurisdiction', 16 Leiden Journal of International Law (2003), pp. 85-113.

Sloan 2003 B
J. Sloan, 'Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić: Decision on Defence Motion on Illegal Capture', 16 Leiden Journal of International Law (2003), pp. 541-552.

Sloan 2005
J. Sloan, 'Prosecutor v. Dragan Nikolić (Decision of the Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest), Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, Appeals Chamber, 5 June 2003, 4 The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals (2005), pp. 491-500.

Sluiter 2002 B
G. Sluiter, 'Naleving van de rechten van de mens door internationale straftribunalen', 27 NJCM-Bulletin (2002) pp. 699-713.

Sluiter 2003 B
G. Sluiter, 'International Criminal Proceedings and the Protection of Human Rights', 37 New England Law Review (2002-2003), pp. 935-948.

Sluiter 2003 C
G. Sluiter, 'The Surrender of War Criminals to the International Criminal Court', 25 Loyola of Los Angeles International and Comparative Law Review (2002-2003), pp. 605-652.

Sluiter 2004 A
G. Sluiter, 'Implementation of the ICC Statute in the Dutch Legal Order', 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2004), pp. 158-178.

Sluiter 2006 A
G. Sluiter, 'International Criminal Court (ICC)', 24 Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights (2006), pp. 149-154.

Sluiter 2006 B
G. Sluiter, 'Due Process and Criminal Procedure in the Cambodian Extraordinary Chambers', 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2006), pp. 314-326.

Sluiter 2006 C
G. Sluiter, 'The Law of International Criminal Procedure and Domestic War Crimes Trials', 6 International Criminal Law Review (2006), pp. 605-635.

Sluiter 2008 A
G. Sluiter, 'Karadžić on Trial - Two Procedural Problems', 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2008), pp. 617-626.

Sluiter 2008 B
G. Sluiter, 'Obtaining Cooperation from Sudan – Where is the Law?', 6 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2008), pp. 871-884.

Sridhar 2006
A. Sridhar, 'The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia's Response to the Problem of Transnational Abduction', 42 Stanford Journal of International Law (2006), pp. 343-364.

Stapleton 1999
S. Stapleton, 'Ensuring a Fair Trial in the International Criminal Court: Statutory Interpretation and the Impermissibility of Derogation', 31 New York University Journal of International Law and Politics (1999), pp. 535-610.

Stark 1993
R.J. Stark, 'Comment: The Ker-Frisbie-Alvarez Doctrine: International Law, Due Process, and United States Sponsored Kidnapping of Foreign Nationals Abroad', 9 Connecticut Journal of International Law (1993-1994), pp. 113-164.

Starr 2008
S.B. Starr, 'Rethinking "Effective Remedies": Remedial Deterrence in International Courts', 83 New York University Law Review (2008), pp. 693-768.

Steinhardt 2004
R.G. Steinhardt, 'Laying One Bankrupt Critique to Rest: Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain and the Future of International Human Rights Litigation in U.S. Courts', 57 Vanderbilt Law Review (2004), pp. 2241-2302.

Strauss 1994
A.L. Strauss, 'A Global Paradigm Shattered: The Jurisdictional Nihilism of the Supreme Court's Abduction Decision in Alvarez-Machain', 67 Temple Law Review (1994), pp. 1209-1258.

Strijards 2003
G.A.M. Strijards, 'Het proces Eichmann (1961)', 52 Ars Aequi (2003) pp. 749-758.

Supernor 2001
Ch.M. Supernor, 'International Bounty Hunters for War Criminals: Privatizing the Enforcement of Justice', 50 Air Force Law Review (2001), pp. 215-252.

Swart 2007
B. Swart, 'Cooperation Challenges for the Special Tribunal for Lebanon', 5 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2007), pp. 1153-1163.

Thieroff and Amley, Jr. 1998
M. Thieroff and E.A. Amley, Jr., 'Proceeding to Justice and Accountability in the Balkans: The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and Rule 61', 23 Yale Journal of International Law (1998), pp. 231-274.

Tolbert 2003
D. Tolbert, 'The ICTY and Defense Counsel: A Troubled Relationship', 37 New England Law Review (2002-2003), pp. 975-986.

Townsend 1997
G. Townsend, 'State Responsibility for Acts of De Facto Agents', 14 Arizona Journal of International and Comparative Law (1997), pp. 635-678.

Trapp 2007
K.N. Trapp, 'Back to Basics: Necessity, Proportionality, and the Right of Self-Defence Against Non-State Terrorist Actors', 56 International and Comparative Law Quarterly (2007), pp. 141-156.

Tunkin 1993
G. Tunkin, 'Is General International Law Customary law Only?', 4 European Journal of International Law (1993), pp. 534-541.

Ülgen 2003
Ö. Ülgen, 'The ICTY and Irregular Rendition of Suspects', 2 The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals (2003), pp. 441-466.

Van den Wyngaert 1990
Ch. Van den Wyngaert, 'Applying the European Convention on Human Rights to Extradition: Opening Pandora's Box?', 39 International and Comparative Law Quarterly (1990), pp. 757-779.

Vandermeersch 2004
D. Vandermeersch, 'The ICC Statute and Belgian Law', 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2004), pp. 133-157.

Van der Wilt 2004
H. Van der Wilt, 'Het Joegoslavië Tribunaal en het beginsel male captus, bene judicatus', 34 Delikt en Delinkwent (2004) pp. 274-300.

Van Genugten 1992
W.J.M. Van Genugten, 'Mensenrechten tussen staatssoevereiniteit en internationale jurisdictie', 21 Nederlands Tijdschrift voor Rechtsfilosofie en Rechtstheorie (1992), pp. 204-223.

Van Sliedregt 2001 A
E. Van Sliedregt, 'Milosevic en command responsibility. De strafrechtelijke aansprakelijkheid van een agressor', 50 Ars Aequi (2001) pp. 635-638.

Vasiliev 2009
S. Vasiliev, 'Proofing the ban on 'witness proofing': Did the ICC get it right?', 20 Criminal Law Forum (2009), pp. 193-261.

Vervaele 2009
J.A.E. Vervaele, 'Special procedural measures and the protection of human rights. General report', 5 Utrecht Law Review (2009), pp. 66-103.

Vierucci 2004
L. Vierucci, 'The European Arrest Warrant. An Additional Tool for Prosecuting ICC Crimes', 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2004) pp. 275-285.

Vincenzi 1987
Ch. Vincenzi, 'Irregular Extradition and Abuse of Process', 51 Journal of Criminal Law (1987), pp. 206-220.

Wald 2001
P.M. Wald, 'The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia Comes of Age: Some Observations on Day-To-Day Dilemmas of an International Court', 5 Washington University Journal of Law & Policy (2001) pp. 87-118.

Warbrick 2000
C. Warbrick, 'Judicial jurisdiction and abuse of process', 49 International and Comparative Law Quarterly (2000) pp. 489-496.

Webb 1975
K.G. Webb, 'Constitutional and International Law – International Kidnaping – Government Illegality as a Challenge to Jurisdiction', 50 Tulane Law Review (1975-1976), pp. 169-178.

Weissman 1994
K.B. Weissman, 'Extraterritorial Abduction: The Endangerment of Future Peace', 27 University of California Davis Law Review (1993-1994), pp. 459-500.

Williams 1946
T.C. Williams, 'Annotation: Right to try one brought within jurisdiction illegally or as a result of a mistake as to identity', 165 American Law Reports, Annotated (1946), pp. 947-967.

Wilmshurst 2006
E. Wilmshurst, 'The Chatham House Principles on International Law on the Use of Force in Self-Defence', 55 International and Comparative Law Quarterly (2006), pp. 963-972.

Wilske and Schiller 1998
S. Wilske and T. Schiller, 'Jurisdiction Over Persons Abducted in Violation of International Law in the Aftermath of United States v Alvarez-Machain', 5 University of Chicago Law School Roundtable (1998), pp. 205-242.

Wood Renton 1898
A. Wood Renton, 'The Judicial Work of Chief Justice Cockburn', 10 The Juridical Review (1898), pp. 395-411.

Zaid 1997
M.S. Zaid, 'Military Might Versus Sovereign Right: The Kidnapping of Dr. Humberto Alvarez-Machain and the Resulting Fallout', 19 Houston Journal of International Law (1997), pp. 829-862.

Zhou 2006
H.-R. Zhou, 'The Enforcement of Arrest Warrants by International Forces. From the ICTY to the ICC', 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice (2006), pp. 202-218.

Zhu 2006
W. Zhu, 'On co-operation by states not party to the International Criminal court', 88 International Review of the Red Cross (2006), pp. 87-110.

Contributions

Alkema 1988
E. Alkema, 'The third-party applicability or "Drittwirkung" of the ECHR', in: F. Matscher and H. Petzhold (eds.), Protecting Human Rights: The European Dimension. Studies in honour of Gérard J. Wiarda, Carl Heymanns Verlag KG: Köln [etc.], pp. 33-45.

Baaijens-van Geloven 2004
Y.G.M. Baaijens-van Geloven, 'De rechtsgevolgen (sanctionering) van onrechtmatigheden in het opsporingsonderzoek', in: M.S. Groenhuijsen and G. Knigge (eds.), Afronding en verantwoording. Eindrapport onderzoeksproject Strafvordering 2001, Kluwer: Deventer 2004, pp. 341-420.

Bergsmo and Triffterer 2008
M. Bergsmo and O. Triffterer, 'Preamble', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Second edn., Beck: München 2008, pp. 1-14.

Bitti 2009
G. Bitti, 'Article 21 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court and the treatment of sources of law in the jurisprudence of the ICC', in: C. Stahn and G. Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court, Martinus Nijhoff/Brill: Leiden/Boston 2009, pp. 285-304.

Blomeyer-Bartenstein 1987
H. Blomeyer-Bartenstein, 'Due diligence', in: R. Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law, Vol. 10: States – Responsibility of States – International Law and Municipal Law, North-Holland: Amsterdam [etc.] 1987, pp. 138-143.

Borelli 2004
S. Borelli, 'The Rendition of Terrorist Suspects to the United States: Human Rights and the Limits of International Cooperation', in: A. Bianchi (ed.), Enforcing International Law Norms Against Terrorism, Hart Publishing: Oxford [etc.] 2004, pp. 331-373.

Caracciolo 2000
I. Caracciolo, 'Applicable Law', in: F. Lattanzi and W.A. Schabas (eds.), Essays on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Vol. I, il Sirente: Ripa Fagnano Alto 2000, pp. 211-232.

Carcano 2005

A. Carcano, 'The ICTY Appeals Chamber's Nikolić Decision on Legality of Arrest: Can an International Criminal Court Assert Jurisdiction over Illegally Seized Offenders?', in: B. Conforti et al. (eds.), The Italian Yearbook of International Law, Vol. XIII, 2003, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers: Leiden 2005, pp. 77-93.

Cherif Bassiouni 1999

M. Cherif Bassiouni, 'Law and Practice of the United States', in: M. Cherif Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law, Vol. II, Procedural and Enforcement Mechanisms, Second edn., Transnational Publishers: Ardsley 1999, pp. 191-256.

Ciampi 2002

A. Ciampi, 'The obligation to cooperate', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J.R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: a commentary, Vol. II, Oxford University Press: Oxford 2002, pp. 1607-1638.

Clark 2008

R.S. Clark, 'Article 119: Settlement of disputes', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Second edn., Beck: München 2008, pp. 1727-1735.

Dhont 2004

F. Dhont, 'Artikel 5. Recht op persoonlijke vrijheid en veiligheid', in: J. Vande Lanotte and Y. Haeck (eds.), Handboek EVRM. Deel 2. Artikelgewijze Commentaar. Vol. 1, Intersentia: Antwerpen [etc.] 2004, pp. 267-370.

Fawcett 1964

J.E.S. Fawcett, The Eichmann Case, in: H. Waldock and R.Y. Jennings (eds.), The British Year Book of International Law 1962, Thirty-Eighth Year of Issue, Oxford University Press: London [etc.] 1964, pp. 181-215.

Feinrider 1997

M. Feinrider, 'Kidnapping', in: R. Bernhardt, R.L. Bindschedler and P. Macalister-Smith (eds.), Encyclopedia of public international law, Vol. III (Jan Mayen to Pueblo Incident), Elsevier: Amsterdam [etc.] 1997, pp. 79-82.

Fernández de Gurmendi and Friman 2002

S.A. Fernández de Gurmendi and H. Friman, 'The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Court', in: H. Fischer and A. McDonald (eds.), Yearbook of International Humanitarian Law, Vol. 3 (2000), T.M.C. Asser Press: The Hague 2002, pp. 289-336.

Friman 1999

H. Friman, 'Rights of Persons Suspected or Accused of a Crime', in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court. The Making of the Rome Statute. Issues, Negotiations, Results, Kluwer Law International: The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 247-262.

Frowein 1994

J.A. Frowein, 'Male Captus Male Detentus – a Human Right', in: R. Lawson and M. de Blois (eds.), The dynamics of the protection of human rights in Europe. Essays in honour of Henry G. Schermers, Vol. III, Nijhoff: Dordrecht 1994, pp. 175-185.

Gallant 1999

K.S. Gallant, 'Individual Human Rights in a New International Organization: The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court', in: M. Cherif Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law, Second edn., Transnational Publishers: Ardsley 1999, pp. 693-723.

Geck 1992

W.K. Geck, 'Diplomatic Protection', in: R. Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law, Vol. 1: Aalands Islands to Dumbarton Oaks Conference (1944), North-Holland: Amsterdam [etc.] 1992, pp. 1045-1067.

Gill 2007

T.D. Gill, 'The Temporal Dimension of Self-Defence: Anticipation, Pre-emption, Prevention and Immediacy', in: M.N. Schmitt and J. Pejic (eds.), International Law and Armed Conflict: Exploring the Faultlines. Essays in Honour of Yoram Dinstein, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers: Leiden [etc.] 2007, pp. 113-155.

Goldstone 1998

R.J. Goldstone, 'Bringing War Criminals to Justice during an Ongoing War', in: J. Moore (ed.), Hard Choices. Moral Dilemmas in Humanitarian Intervention, Rowman & Littlefield Publishers: Lanham 1998, pp. 195-210.

Hall 2008 A

Ch.K. Hall, 'Article 55: Rights of persons during an investigation', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Second edn., Beck: München 2008, pp. 1089-1105.

Hall 2008 B

Ch.K. Hall, 'Article 59: Arrest proceedings in the custodial State', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Second edn., Beck: München 2008, pp. 1147-1158.

Henkin 1990

L. Henkin, 'International Law: Politics, Values and Functions. General Course on Public International Law', in: Académie de Droit International de La Haye/Hague Academy of International Law, Recueil des Cours. Collected Courses of The Hague Academy of International Law, Vol. 216 (1989 IV), Martinus Nijhoff Publishers: Dordrecht [etc.] 1990, pp. 9-416.

Henquet 2003

Th. Henquet, 'Accountability for Arrests: The Relationship between the ICTY and NATO's NAC and SFOR', in: G. Boas and W. Schabas (eds.), International Criminal Law Developments in the Case Law of the ICTY, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers: Leiden [etc.] 2003, pp. 113-155.

Kaul and Kreß 2000

H.-P. Kaul and C. Kreß, 'Jurisdiction and Cooperation in the Statute of the International Criminal Court: Principles and Compromises', in: A. McDonald (ed.), Yearbook of International Humanitarian Law, Vol. 2 (1999), T.M.C. Asser Press: The Hague 2000, pp. 143-175.

Khan 2008

K.A.A. Khan, 'Article 60: Initial proceedings before the Court', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Second edn., Beck: München 2008, pp. 1159-1169.

Knoops 2003

G-J. Knoops, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Arbitrary Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused and on the Defence Notice of Urgent Motion to Expand and Supplement the Record of 8 December 1999 Hearing, Prosecutor v. Kajelijeli, Case No. ICTR-98-44-I, T. Ch. II, 8 May 2000, Decision on the Defence Extremely Urgent Motion on Habeas Corpus and for Stoppage of Proceedings, Prosecutor v. Kanyabashi, Case No. ICTR-96-15-I, T. Ch. II, 23 May 2000, Decision, Semanza v. Prosecutor, Case No. ICTR-97-23-A, A. Ch., 31 May 2000, Declaration of Judge Lal Chand Vohrah, Declaration of Judge Rafael Nieto-Navia, Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, Decision on the Defence Motion Concerning the Illegal Arrest and Illegal Detention of the Accused, Prosecutor v. Rwamakuba and others, Case No. ICTR-98-44-T, T. Ch. II, 12 December 2000, Commentary', in: A. Klip and G. Sluiter (eds.), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals, Vol. VI: The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda 2000-2001, Intersentia: Antwerp [etc.] 2003, pp. 216-221.

Kreß and Prost 2008 A

C. Kreß and K. Prost, 'Article 87: Requests for cooperation: general provisions', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Second edn., Beck: München 2008, pp. 1517-1531.

Kreß and Prost 2008 B

C. Kreß and K. Prost, 'Article 94: Postponement of execution of a request in respect of ongoing investigation or prosecution', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Second edn., Beck: München 2008, pp. 1589-1591.

Kreß and Prost 2008 C

C. Kreß and K. Prost, 'Article 102: Use of terms', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Second edn., Beck: München 2008, pp. 1645-1646.

Lamb 2000

S. Lamb, 'The powers of arrest of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia', in: J. Crawford and V. Lowe (eds.), The British Year Book of International Law 1999, Seventieth Year of Issue, Oxford University Press: Oxford 2000, pp. 165-244.

Lamb 2001

S. Lamb, 'Illegal arrest and the jurisdiction of the ICTY', in: R. May et al. (eds.), Essays on ICTY procedure and evidence in honour of Gabrielle Kirk McDonald, Kluwer Law International: The Hague 2001, pp. 27-43.

Lauren 2004

P.G. Lauren, 'From impunity to accountability: Forces of transformation and the changing international human rights context', in: R. Thakur and P. Malcontent (eds.), From sovereign impunity to international accountability: The search for justice in a world of states, UN University Press: Tokyo [etc.] 2004, pp. 15-42.

Lavrijssen 1998

S. Lavrijssen, 'Report of the debate', in: M. Boot and W. Van Genugten (eds.), Gross Human Rights Violations: Reconciliation or Prosecution? Proceedings of a Symposium held in honour of Richard Goldstone at Tilburg University, 3 December 1997, W.E.J. Tjeenk Willink: Deventer 1998, pp. 25-38.

Leurdijk 2001

D.A. Leurdijk, 'The establishment of an international arresting team; fiction, reality or both?', in: W.A.M. Van Dijk and J.L. Hovens (eds.), Arresting war criminals, Wolf Legal Productions: Nijmegen 2001, pp. 59-72.

Liskofsky 1961

S. Liskofsky, 'The Eichmann Case', in: M. Fine and M. Himmelfarb (eds.), American Jewish Year Book, Vol. 62 (1961), The American Jewish Committee/The Jewish Publication Society of America: New York/Philadelphia 1961, pp. 199-208.

Mann 1989

F.A. Mann, 'Reflections on the prosecution of persons abducted in breach of international law', in Y. Dinstein and M. Tabory (eds.), International law at a time of perplexity. Essays in honour of Shabtai Rosenne, Nijhoff: Dordrecht 1989, pp. 407-421.

McAuliffe deGuzman 1999

M. McAuliffe deGuzman, 'Article 21. Applicable law', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Nomos: Baden-Baden 1999, pp. 435-446.

McAuliffe deGuzman 2008

M. McAuliffe deGuzman, 'Article 21. Applicable law', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Second edn., Beck: München 2008, pp. 701-712.

Mevis and Blom 2000

P.A.M. Mevis and T. Blom, 'Artikel 15', in: A.K. Koekkoek (ed.), de Grondwet. Een systematisch en artikelgewijs commentaar, derde druk, W.E.J. Tjeenk Willink: Deventer 2000, pp. 203-208.

Mohit 2006

A. Mohit, 'The Customary Law of International Abductions: Limits and Boundaries', in: B.S. Chimni, M. Masahiro and S.P. Subedi (eds.), Asian Yearbook of International Law. Vol. 11: 2003-2004, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers: Leiden [etc.] 2006, pp. 123-146.

Moreno Ocampo 2009

L. Moreno Ocampo, 'Building a Future on Peace and Justice: The International Criminal Court', in: K. Ambos, J. Large and M. Wierda (eds.), Building a Future on Peace and Justice: Studies on Transitional Justice, Peace and Development. The Nuremberg Declaration on Peace and Justice, Springer: Berlin [etc.] 2009, pp. 9-13.

Morgenstern 1953

F. Morgenstern, 'Jurisdiction in Seizures Effected in Violation of International Law', in: H. Lauterpacht (ed.), The British Year Book of International Law 1952, Twenty-Ninth Year of Issue, Oxford University Press: Oxford [etc.] 1953, pp. 265-282.

Mundis 2002

D.A. Mundis, 'State Cooperation with the ICTY', in: R. Yepes-Enríquez and L. Tabassi (eds.), Treaty Enforcement and International Cooperation in Criminal Matters – with special reference to the Chemical Weapons Convention, T.M.C. Asser Press: The Hague 2002, pp. 117-126.

Nerlich 2009

V. Nerlich, 'The status of ICTY and ICTR precedent in proceedings before the ICC', in: C. Stahn and G. Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court, Martinus Nijhoff/Brill: Leiden/Boston 2009, pp. 305-325.

O'Dowd 2004

J. O'Dowd, 'Decision on Motion by Momir Talić for Provisional Release, Prosecutor v. Brđanin and Talić, Case No. IT-99-36-PT, T. Ch. II, 28 March 2001, Commentary', in: A. Klip and G. Sluiter (eds.), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals, Vol. VII: The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia 2001, Intersentia: Antwerp [etc.] 2004, pp. 93-100.

Oehmichen 2007

A. Oehmichen, 'Male Captus – Bene Detentus', in: H.-H. Kühne, R. Esser and M. Gerding (eds.), Völkerstrafrecht, Julius Jonscher Verlag: Osnabrück 2007, pp. 217-250.

O'Higgins 1961

P. O'Higgins, 'Unlawful Seizure and Irregular Extradition', in: H. Waldock and R.Y. Jennings (eds.), The British Year Book of International Law 1960, Thirty-Sixth Year of Issue, Oxford University Press: London [etc.] 1961, pp. 279-320.

Palmisano 1999

G. Palmisano, 'The International Criminal Court and Third States', in: F. Lattanzi and W.A. Schabas (eds.), Essays on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Vol. I, il Sirente: Ripa Fagnano Alto 1999, pp. 391-425.

Paulussen 2008

Ch. Paulussen, 'Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Legality of Arrest, Prosecutor v. Nikolić, Case No. IT-94-2-AR73, A. Ch., 5 June 2003, Commentary', in: A. Klip and G. Sluiter (eds.), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals, Vol. XIV: The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia 1 April 2003 – 13 October 2003, Intersentia: Antwerp [etc.] 2008, pp. 131-142.

Paulussen 2010

Ch. Paulussen, 'Legal Assistance in the Context of the International Criminal Court', in: C. Fijnaut and J. Ouwerkerk (eds.), The Future of Police and Judicial Cooperation in the European Union, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers: Leiden [etc.] 2010, pp. 189-229.

Pellet 2002 A

A. Pellet, 'Applicable law', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J.R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: a commentary, Vol. II, Oxford University Press: Oxford 2002, pp. 1051-1084.

Pellet 2002 B

A. Pellet, 'Settlement of Disputes', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J.R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: a commentary, Vol. II, Oxford University Press: Oxford 2002, pp. 1841-1848.

Pisillo-Mazzeschi 1993

R. Pisillo-Mazzeschi, 'The due diligence rule and the nature of the international responsibility of states', in: J. Delbrück, R. Hofmann and A. Zimmermann (eds.), German Yearbook of International Law, Vol. 35 (1992), Duncker & Humblot: Berlin 1993, pp. 9-51.

Prost 2005

K. Prost, 'Co-operation with the ICC: Arrests and Surrender, the Gathering of Evidence and Asset Forfeiture', in: B. Brandon and M. du Plessis (eds.), The Prosecution of International Crimes. A Practical Guide to Prosecuting ICC Crimes in Commonwealth States, Commonwealth Secretariat: London 2005, pp. 73-93.

Randelzhofer 2002

A. Randelzhofer, 'Article 51', in: B. Simma (ed.), The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary, Second edn., Vol. I, Oxford University Press: Oxford 2002, pp. 788-806.

Rastan 2009

R. Rastan, 'The responsibility to enforce – connecting justice with unity', in: C. Stahn and G. Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court, Martinus Nijhoff/Brill: Leiden/Boston 2009, pp. 163-182.

Rückert 2008

W. Rückert, 'Article 4: Legal status and powers of the Court', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Second edn., Beck: München 2008, pp. 121-127.

Ruxton 2001

G.F. Ruxton, 'Present and future record of arresting war criminals; the view of the public prosecutor of the ICTY', in: W.A.M. Van Dijk and J.L. Hovens (eds.), Arresting war criminals, Wolf Legal Productions: Nijmegen 2001, pp. 19-23.

Saland 1999

P. Saland, 'International Criminal Law Principles', in: R.S. Lee (ed.), The International Criminal Court. The Making of the Rome Statute. Issues, Negotiations, Results, Kluwer Law International: The Hague [etc.] 1999, pp. 189-216.

Schabas 2003

W.A. Schabas, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration), Barayagwiza v. Prosecutor, Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, A. Ch., 31 March 2000, Declaration of Judge Lal Chand Vohrah, Declaration of Judge Rafael Nieto-Navia, Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, Commentary', in: A. Klip and G. Sluiter (eds.), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals, Vol. VI: The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda 2000 – 2001, Intersentia: Antwerp [etc.] 2003, pp. 261-266.

Schabas 2008

W.A. Schabas, 'Article 67: Rights of the accused', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Second edn., Beck: München 2008, pp. 1247-1274.

Schomburg 2005

W. Schomburg, 'The Protection of Human Rights of the Accused before the International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) and Rwanda (ICTR)', in: K. Bárd and R. Soyer (eds.), Internationale Strafgerichtsbarkeit – Status quo und Perspektiven. Strafvervolgung und Strafverteidigung vor internationalen Strafgerichtshöfen, MWV: Wien [etc.] 2005, pp. 71-95.

Skubiszewski 1968

K. Skubiszewski, 'Use of Force by States. Collective Security. Law of War and Neutrality', in: M. Sørensen (ed.), Manual of Public International Law, Macmillan/St Martin's Press: London [etc.]/New York 1968, pp. 739-854.

Sloan 2006

J. Sloan, 'Breaching International Law to Ensure its Enforcement: The Reliance by the ICTY on Illegal Capture', in: T. McCormack and A. McDonald (eds.), Yearbook of International Humanitarian Law, Vol. 6 (2003), T.M.C. Asser Press: The Hague 2006, pp. 319-344.

Sluiter 2001
G. Sluiter, 'Decision on the Motion for Release by the Accused Slavko Dokmanović, Prosecutor v. Mrkšić, Radić, Šlijvančanin and Dokmanović, Case No. IT-95-13a-PT, T. Ch. II, 22 October 1997, Commentary', in: A. Klip and G. Sluiter (eds.), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals, Vol. III: The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia 1997-1999, Intersentia: Antwerp 2001, pp. 151-156.

Sluiter 2002 A
G. Sluiter, 'State Cooperation with the ICC', in R. Yepes-Enríquez and L. Tabassi (eds.), Treaty Enforcement and International Cooperation in Criminal Matters – with special reference to the Chemical Weapons Convention, T.M.C. Asser Press: The Hague 2002, pp. 127-137.

Sluiter 2003 A
G. Sluiter, 'Decision Denying Request for Assistance in Securing Documents and Witnesses from the International Committee of the Red Cross, Prosecutor v. Simić, Simić, Tadić, Todorović and Zarić, Case No. IT-95-9-PT, T. Ch. III, 7 June 2000, Separate Opinion of Judge David Hunt on Motion by Todorović for Order Requesting Assistance of the International Committee of the Red Cross, Prosecutor v. Simić, Simić, Tadić, Todorović and Zarić, Case No. IT-95-9-PT, T. Ch. III, 7 June 2000, Order for the Production of Documents by the European Community Monitoring Mission and its Member States, Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, Case No. IT-95-14/2-T, T. Ch. III, 4 August 2000, Decision on Ex Parte Application for the Issuance of an Order to the European Community Monitoring Mission, Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, Case No. IT-95-14/2-T, T. Ch. III, 3 May 2000, Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and Others, Prosecutor v. Simić, Simić, Tadić, Todorović and Zarić, Case No. IT-95-9-PT, T. Ch. III, 18 October 2000, Separate Opinion of Judge Robinson, Prosecutor v. Simić, Simić, Tadić, Todorović and Zarić, Case No. IT-95-9-PT, T. Ch. III, 18 October 2000, Commentary', in: A. Klip and G. Sluiter (eds.), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals, Vol. V: The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia 2000-2001, Intersentia: Antwerp 2001, pp. 283-289.

Sluiter 2004 B
G. Sluiter, 'Legal Assistance to Internationalized Criminal Courts and Tribunals', in: C.P.R. Romano, A. Nollkaemper and J.K. Kleffner (eds.), Internationalized Criminal Courts. Sierra Leone, East Timor, Kosovo, and Cambodia, Oxford University Press: Oxford [etc.] 2004, pp. 379-406.

Sluiter 2004 C

G. Sluiter, 'Decision on Prosecution Motion to Withdraw Counts of the Indictment and Defence Motion to Withdraw Pending Motions, Prosecutor v. Todorović, Case No. IT-95-9/1, T. Ch. I, 26 February 2001, Order on Request for Review pursuant to Rule 108bis of Decision on Motion for Judicial Assistance to be Provided by SFOR and others dated 18 October 2000, Prosecutor v. Simić, Simić,Tadić, Todorović and Zarić, Case No. IT-95-9-AR108bis, A. Ch., 27 March 2001, Declaration of Judge Shahabuddeen, Prosecutor v. Simić, Simić, Tadić, Todorović and Zarić, Case No. IT-95-9-AR108bis, A. Ch., 27 March 2001, Commentary', in A. Klip and G. Sluiter (eds.), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals, Vol. VII: The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia 2001, Intersentia: Antwerp 2004, pp. 243-247.

Sluiter 2009

G. Sluiter, 'Human rights protection in the ICC pre-trial phase', in: C. Stahn and G. Sluiter (eds.), The Emerging Practice of the International Criminal Court, Martinus Nijhoff/Brill: Leiden/Boston 2009, pp. 459-475.

Smeulers 2007

A. Smeulers, 'Decision on Defence Motion Challenging the Exercise of Jurisdiction by the Tribunal, Prosecutor v. Nikolić, Case No. IT-94-2-PT, T. Ch. II, 9 October 2002, Commentary', in: A. Klip and G. Sluiter (eds.), Annotated Leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals, Vol. XI: The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia 2002-2003, Intersentia: Antwerp 2007, pp. 106-112.

Staker 2008

Ch. Staker, 'Article 85: Compensation to an arrested or convicted person', in: O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court – Observers' Notes, Article by Article, Second edn., Beck: München 2008, pp. 1499-1502.

Stein 1995

T. Stein, 'Extradition', in: R. Bernhardt, R.L. Bindschedler and P. Macalister-Smith (eds.), Encyclopedia of public international law, Vol. II (East African Community to Italy-United States Air Transport Arbitration (1965)), North-Holland: Amsterdam [etc.] 1995, pp. 327-334.

Steinberger 1987

H. Steinberger, 'Sovereignty', in: R. Bernhardt and R.L. Bindschedler (eds.), Encyclopedia of public international law, Vol. X (States – Responsibility of States – International Law and Municipal Law), North-Holland: Amsterdam [etc.] 1987, pp. 397-418.

Strijards 2001
G.A.M. Strijards, 'Arresting the Criminal abroad', in: W.A.M. Van Dijk and J.L. Hovens (eds.), Arresting war criminals, Wolf Legal Productions: Nijmegen: 2001, pp. 85-117.

Swart 2001
B. Swart, 'Decision on the Extremely Urgent Motion by the Defence for Orders to Review and/or Nullify the Arrest and Provisional Detention of the Suspect, Prosecutor v. Barayagwzia, Case No. ICTR-97-19-I, T. Ch. II, 24 November 1998, Decision, Barayagwiza v. Prosecutor, Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, A. Ch., 3 November 1999, Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen, Declaration of Judge Nieto-Navia, Decision on the "Motion to Set Aside the Arrest and Detention of Laurant Semanza as Unlawful", Prosecutor v. Semanza, Case No. ICTR-97-20-I, T. Ch. III, 6 October 1999, Commentary', in: A. Klip and G. Sluiter (eds.), Annotated leading Cases of International Criminal Tribunals, Vol. II: The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda 1994-1999, Intersentia: Antwerp 2001, pp. 197-207.

Swart 2002 A
B. Swart, 'Arrest proceedings in the custodial state', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J.R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: a commentary, Vol. II, Oxford University Press: Oxford 2002, pp. 1247-1255.

Swart 2002 B
B. Swart, 'International Cooperation and Judicial Assistance – General Problems', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J.R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: a commentary, Vol. II, Oxford University Press: Oxford 2002, pp. 1589-1605.

Swart 2002 C
B. Swart, 'Arrest and surrender', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J.R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: a commentary, Vol. II, Oxford University Press: Oxford 2002, pp. 1639-1703.

Swart 2002 D
B. Swart, 'The Netherlands', in: A. Eser, O. Lagodny and Ch.L. Blakesley (eds.), The Individual as Subject of International Cooperation in Criminal Matters. A Comparative Study, Nomos Verlagsgesellschaft: Baden-Baden 2002, pp. 435-523.

Swart and Sluiter 1999

B. Swart and G. Sluiter, 'The International Criminal Court and International Criminal Co-operation', in: H.A.M. von Hebel, J.G. Lammers and J. Schukking (eds.), Reflections on the International Criminal Court: Essays in Honour of Adriaan Bos, T.M.C. Asser Press: The Hague 1999, pp. 91-127.

Van Sliedregt 2001 B

E. Van Sliedregt, 'Arresting war criminals; Male captus bene detentus. Human rights and the rule of law', in W.A.M. Van Dijk and J.L. Hovens (eds.), Arresting war criminals, Wolf Legal Productions: Nijmegen 2001, pp. 73-83.

Verhoeven 2004

J. Verhoeven, 'Article 21 of the Rome Statute and the Ambiguities of Applicable Law', in N.M. Blokker, N.J. Schrijver, L.A.M.N. Barnhoorn et al. (eds.), Netherlands Yearbook of International Law, Vol. XXXIII (2002), Cambridge University Press: Cambridge 2004, pp. 3-22.

Wolfrum 1987

R. Wolfrum, 'Internationally Wrongful Acts', in: R. Bernhardt (ed.), Encyclopedia of Public International Law, Vol. 10: States – Responsibility of States – International Law and Municipal Law, North-Holland: Amsterdam [etc.]1987, pp. 271-277.

Young 2001

S.N.M. Young, 'Surrendering the Accused to the International Criminal Court', in: J. Crawford and V. Lowe (eds.), The British Year Book of International Law 2000, Seventy-First Year of Issue, Oxford University Press: Oxford 2001, pp. 317-356.

Zappalà 2002 A

S. Zappalà, 'Rights of persons during an investigation', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J.R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: a commentary, Vol. II, Oxford University Press: Oxford 2002, pp. 1181-1203.

Zappalà 2002 B

S. Zappalà, 'The rights of the accused', in: A. Cassese, P. Gaeta and J.R.W.D. Jones (eds.), The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: a commentary, Vol. II, Oxford University Press: Oxford 2002, pp. 1319-1354.

TABLE OF SELECTED CASES

Human rights supervisory bodies

ECmHR

ECmHR (Plenary), Bozano v/France, Application No. 9990/82, 'Decision of 15 May 1984 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 39, pp. 119-146

ECmHR (Plenary), Bozano v/Italy, Application No. 9991/82, 'Decision of 12 July 1984 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports. No. 39, pp. 147-157

ECmHR (Plenary), Bozano v/Switzerland, Application No. 9009/80, 'Decision of 12 July 1984 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 39, pp. 58-70

ECmHR (Plenary), Bozano v/Switzerland, Application No. 9009/80, 'Decision of 13 December 1984 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 39, pp. 71-74

ECmHR (Plenary), C. v/the Federal Republic of Germany, Application No. 10893/84, 'Decision of 2 December 1985 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 45, pp. 198-204

ECmHR (Plenary), Illich Sánchez Ramirez v/France, Application No. 28780/95, 'Decision of 24 June 1996 on the admissibility of the application', Decisions and Reports, No. 86-B, pp. 155-162

ECtHR

ECtHR (First Section), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 March 2003

ECtHR (Fourth Section), 'Decision as to the admissibility of Application No. 51891/99 by Mladen Naletilić against Croatia', 4 May 2000

ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Beer and Regan v. Germany, Application No. 28934/95, 'Judgment', 18 February 1999

ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Loizidou v. Turkey (Preliminary Objections), Application No. 15318/89, 'Judgment', 23 March 1995

ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Matthews v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 24833/94, 'Judgment', 18 February 1999

ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Öcalan v. Turkey, Application No. 46221/99, 'Judgment', 12 May 2005

ECtHR (Grand Chamber), Case of Waite and Kennedy v. Germany, Application No. 26083/94, 'Judgment', 18 February 1999

ECtHR (Grand Chamber), 'Decision as to the Admissibility of Application No. 52207/99 by Vlastimir and Borka Banković, Živana Stojanović, Mirjana Stoimenovski, Dragana Joksimović and Dragan Suković against Belgium, the Czech Republic, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Spain, Turkey and the United Kingdom', 12 December 2001

ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Brogan and Others v. the United Kingdom, Application No. 11209/84; 11234/84; 11266/84; 11386/85, 'Judgment', 29 November 1988

ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Soering v. The United Kingdom, Application No. 14038/88, 7 July 1989

ECtHR (Plenary), Case of Van Droogenbroeck v. Belgium, Application No. 7906/77, 'Judgment', 24 June 1982

ECtHR (Second Section), 'Decision as to the admissibility of Application No. 77631/01 by Slobodan Milošević against the Netherlands', 19 March 2002

ECtHR (Third Section), Case of Čonka v. Belgium, Application No. 51564/99, 'Judgment', 5 February 2002

ECtHR (Third Section), Case of Jėčius v. Lithuania, Application No. 34578/97, 'Judgment', 31 July 2000

ECtHR (Third Section), Case of Stašaitis v. Lithuania, Application No. 47679/99, 'Judgment', 21 March 2002

HRC

HRC, Cañón García v. Ecuador, Communication No. 319/1988 (5 November 1991), UN Doc. CCPR/C/43/D/319/1988 at 90 (1991), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/undocs/html/dec319.htm

HRC, Lilian Celiberti de Casariego v. Uruguay, Communication No. R.13/56 (29 July 1981), UN Doc. Supp. No. 40 (A/36/40) at 185 (1981), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/undocs/session36/13-56.htm

HRC, María del Carmen Almeida de Quinteros et al. v. Uruguay, Communication No. 107/1981 (21 July 1983), UN Doc. CCPR/C/OP/2 at 138 (1990), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/undocs/newscans/107-1981.html

HRC, Pierre Giry v. Dominican Republic, Communication No. 193/1985 (20 July 1990), UN Doc. CCPR/C/39/D/193/1985 (1990), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/undocs/session39/193-1985.html

HRC, Sergio Ruben Lopez Burgos v. Uruguay, Communication No. R.12/52 (29 July 1981), UN Doc. Supp. No. 40 (A/36/40) at 176 (1981), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/undocs/session36/12-52.htm

IACtHR

IACtHR, Castillo Páez, 'Judgment', 3 November 1997, Ser. C., No. 34 (1997), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/C/34-ing.html

IACtHR, Habeas Corpus in Emergency Situations, 'Advisory Opinion OC-8/87', 30 January 1987, Ser. A., No. 8 (1987), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/b_11_4h.htm

IACtHR, Judicial Guarantees in States of Emergency, 'Advisory Opinion OC-9/87', 6 October 1987, Ser. A., No. 9 (1987), available at: http://www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/b_11_4i.htm

International criminal tribunals

ICC

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of the Prosecutor against Pre-Trial Chamber II's "Decision on the Interim Release of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo and Convening Hearings with the Kingdom of Belgium, the Republic of Portugal, the Republic of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Italian Republic, and the Republic of South Africa"' (Public Redacted Version), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA 2, 2 December 2009

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Central African Republic, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber III entitled "Decision on application for interim release"' (Public document), ICC-01/05-01/08 OA, 16 December 2008 (including Dissenting opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis)

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the admissibility of the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la confirmation des charges" of 29 January 2007 (…)' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 OA8, 13 June 2007

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Decision on the Prosecutor's "Application for Leave to Reply to 'Conclusions de la défense en réponse au mémoire d'appel du Procureur'" (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 12 September 2006, Separate opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Defence Reply to the Observations of the Government of the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 27 November 2006

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of [the] Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Defence Reply to the Observations of the Victims' Representatives' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 28 November 2006

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the decision of Pre-Trial Chamber I entitled "Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire de Thomas Lubanga Dyilo"' (Public Document), [ICC-]01/04-01/06 (OA 7), 13 February 2007 (including Separate Opinion of Judge Georghios M. Pikis)

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Judgment on the Appeal of Mr. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19 (2) (a) of the Statute of 3 October 2006' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06 (OA4), 14 December 2006

[ICC, Appeals Chamber,] Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Observations of the Democratic Republic of the Congo', [ICC-01/04-01/06, 4 December 2006] (this is the English translation of the French document of 21 November 2006)

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor v. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Observations of Victims a/0001/06, a/0002/06 and a/0003/06 with respect to the Defence appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to the Jurisdiction of the Court pursuant to article 19(2)(a) of the Statute' (Public Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 22 November 2006

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Defence Appeal against the Decision on the Defence Challenge to Jurisdiction of 3 October 2006' (Public Redacted Document), ICC-01/04-01/06, 17 November 2006

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, In the Case of The Prosecutor vs. Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, 'Prosecution's Response to Defence Appeal Against the 'Décision sur la demande de mise en liberté provisoire Thomas Lubanga Dyilo'' (Public), ICC-01/04-01/06, 1 November 2006

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Judgment on the Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 13 July 2006

ICC, Appeals Chamber, Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, 'Prosecutor's Application for Extraordinary Review of Pre-Trial Chamber I's 31 March 2006 Decision Denying Leave to Appeal' (Public Document), ICC-01/04, 24 April 2006

ICTR

ICTR, Appeals Chamber, André Rwamakuba v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision (Appeal Against Dismissal of Motion Concerning Illegal Arrest and Detention)', Case No. ICTR-98-44-A, 11 June 2001

ICTR, Appeals Chamber, André Rwamakuba v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision on Appeal against Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-A, 13 September 2007

ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 3 November 1999 (Including Separate Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen)

ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza v. The Prosecutor, 'Decision (Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration)', Case No. ICTR-97-19-AR72, 31 March 2000

ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Jean Kambanda v The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR[-]97-23-A, 19 October 2000

ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Juvénal Kajelijeli v. The Prosecutor, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44A-A, 23 May 2005

ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Laurent Semanza vs. The Prosecutor, 'Decision', Case No. ICTR-97-20-A, 31 May 2000 (Including Declaration by Judge Lal Chand Vohrah)

ICTR, Appeals Chamber, Prosecutor v. Gratien Kabiligi, 'Decision Rejecting Notice of Appeal', Case No. ICTR-97-34-A, 18 December 1998

ICTR, Appeals Chamber, The Prosecutor v. Jean-Paul Akayesu, 'Judgment', Case No. ICTR-96-4-A, 1 June 2001

ICTR, Judge Lennert Aspegren, The Prosecutor versus Jean[-]Bosco Barayagwiza, 'Decision Confirming the Indictment', Case No. ICTR-97-19-I, 23 October 1997

ICTR, Office of the Prosecutor, The Prosecutor against Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza, 'Amended Indictment', Case No. ICTR-97-19, 13 April 2000

ICTR, Prosecutor, The Prosecutor of the Tribunal versus Laurent Semanza, 'Indictment', Case No. ICTR-97-20-I, 16 October 1997

ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Matthieu Ngirumpatse, 'Decision on the Defence Motion Challenging the Lawfulness of the Arrest and Detention and Seeking Return or Inspection of Seized Items', Case No. ICTR-97-44-I, 10 December 1999

ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Pauline Nyiramasuhuko, 'Decision on Defence Motion for a Stay of Proceedings and Abuse of Process', Case No. ICTR-97-21-T, 20 February 2004

ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Pauline Nyiramasuhuko, 'Decision on the Defence Motion for Exclusion of Evidence and Restitution of Property Seized', Case No. ICTR-97-21-T, 12 October 2000

ICTR, Trial Chamber II, The Prosecutor v. Samuel Musabyimana, 'Decision on Musabyimana's Motion on the Violation of Rule 55 and International Law at the Time of his Arrest and Transfer', Case No. ICTR-2001-62-T, 20 June 2002

ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Decision on Appropriate Remedy', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 31 January 2007

ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. André Rwamakuba, 'Judgement', Case No. ICTR-98-44C-T, 20 September 2006

ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor v. Laurent Semanza, 'Decision on the "Motion to Set Aside the Arrest and Detention of Laurent Semanza as Unlawful"', Case No. ICTR-97-20-I, 6 October 1999

ICTR, Trial Chamber III, The Prosecutor vs. Laurent Semanza, 'Judgement and Sentence', Case No. ICTR-97-20-T, 15 May 2003

TPIR, Chambre d'Appel, Le Procureur contre Laurent Semanza, 'Réponse du Procureur au Mémoire Préalable [à] l'Appui de l'Acte d'Appel du 12 Octobre 1999 contre l'Ordonnance du 6 Octobre 1999 de la Chambre de Premi[è]re Instance III Relative [à] la Requête de la Défense en Annulation de la Procédure d'Arrestation et de Détention de Laurent Semanza pour Cause d'Illégalité', Affaire No. ICTR-97-20-I, 21 janvier 2000

ICTY

Internationalised criminal tribunals

ECCC

SCSL

National courts

Australia

New South Wales Court of Appeal, Levinge v Director of Custodial Services, Department of Corrective Services, 23 July 1987, 89 FLR 133

England

Court for Crown Cases Reserved, Regina v. Christian Sattler, 23 January 1858, Dears. & Bell 525 and 539-547, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), p. 576 and pp. 582-586

Court of Appeal, Criminal Division, Regina v. Mullen, 4 February 1999, [2000] Q.B. 520*ff*

Court of Appeal, Divisional Court, R v. Bow Street Magistrates ex parte Mackeson, 25 June 1981 (1982) 75 Cr. App. R. 24

Court of King's Bench, Lord Chief Justice Tenterden, Ex parte Susannah Scott, 19 May 1829, 9 Barnewall & Cresswell's King's Bench Reports (1829), pp. 446-448; 109 English Reports (1829), pp. 166-167

House of Lords, Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court and another, 24 June 1993, [1993] 3 All England Law Reports 138

House of Lords, Bremer Vulkan v. South India Shipping, 22 January 1981, [1981] A.C. 909

House of Lords, In Re Schmidt, 30 June 1994, [1995] 1 A.C. 339*ff* (Decision of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division: pp. 342-362. Decision of the House of Lords: pp. 362*ff*.)

House of Lords, Regina v. Latif; Regina v. Shazad, 18 January 1996, 1 W.L.R. 104-117 [1996]

King's Bench Division, R. v. O./C. Depot Battalion, R.A.S.C., Colchester, Ex parte Elliott, 18 and 19 January 1949, [1949] 1 All England Law Reports 373

Queen's Bench Division, In re Parisot, 9 March 1889, 5 T.L.R. 344-345, British International Law Cases, Vol. 5: the individual in international law (continued) aliens: extradition: fugitive offenders (1967), pp. 314-315

Queen's Bench Division, R. v Plymouth Magistrates' Court and others, ex parte Driver, 3 April 1985 [1985] 2 All England Law Reports 681

France

Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Barbie, 6 October 1983, International Law Reports, Vol. 78 (1988), pp. 128-131

Court of Cassation (Criminal Chamber), Re Argoud, 4 June 1964, International Law Reports, Vol. 45 (1972), pp. 90-107

Tribunal Correctionnel d'Avesnes, In re Jolis, 22 July 1933, Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, Vol. 7 (1933-1934), Case No. 77, pp. 191-192

Germany

BVerfG (1. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 17.7 1985 – 2 BvR 1190/84. NJW 1986, Heft 22, pp. 1427-1429

BVerfG (3. Kammer des Zweiten Senats), Beschl. v. 3.6 1986 – 2 BvR 837/85. NJW 1986, Heft 48, pp. 3021-3022

German Federal Constitutional Court: In the Proceedings on the Constitutional Complaint of Mr. Al-M., and his Motion for a Temporary Injunction (Bundesverfassungsgericht, Order of the Second Senate of 5 November 2003, 2 BvR 1506/03), 43 International Legal Materials (2004), pp. 774-788

Ireland

Supreme Court of Ireland, The State (Trimbole) v. The Governor of Mountjoy Prison, 26 March 1985 [1985] I.R. 550

Israel

District Court of Jerusalem, The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann, 'Decision on the Preliminary Objections', 17 April 1961, Criminal Case No. 40/61, available at: http://www.nizkor.org/hweb/people/e/eichmann-adolf/transcripts/Sessions/Session-006-01.html

District Court of Jerusalem, The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Adolf Eichmann, 'Judgment', 12 December 1961, Criminal Case No. 40/61 (36 International Law Reports 1968, pp. 18-276)

Supreme Court of Israel, Adolf Eichmann v. The Attorney-General of the Government of Israel, 'Judgment', 29 May 1962, Criminal Appeal No. 336/61 (36 International Law Reports 1968, pp. 277-342)

Namibia

Supreme Court of Namibia, The State v. Mushwena and Others, 'Appeal judgment', 21 July 2004, Case No. SA6/2004, available at: http://www.superiorcourts.org.na/supreme/docs/judgments/Criminal/Mushwena.pdf

New Zealand

Court of Appeal, R v. Hartley, 5 August 1977, [1978] 2 N.Z.L.R. 199 (International Law Reports, Vol. 77 (1988), pp. 330-335)

Palestine

Supreme Court of Palestine (sitting as a Court of Criminal Appeal), Afouneh v. Attorney-General, 11 February 1942, Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, Vol. 10 (1941-1942), Case No. 97, pp. 327-328

Supreme Court of Palestine (sitting as a Court of Criminal Appeal), Yousef Said Abu Dourrah v. The Attorney-General, 20 January 1941, Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, Vol. 10 (1941-1942), Case No. 101, pp. 331-332

Scotland

High Court of Justiciary, HM Advocate v. Vervuren, 12 April 2002, 2002 S.L.T. 555

High Court of Justiciary, Sinclair v. Her Majesty's Advocate and Another, 20 March 1890, 17 R. (Just. Cas.) 38, British International Law Cases, Vol. 3: jurisdiction (1965), pp. 5-10

South Africa

Constitutional Court of South Africa, Mohamed and Dalvie v. The President of the Republic of South Africa and others, 28 May 2001, CCT 17/01, 2001 (3) SA 893 CC (available at: http://www.saflii.org/za/cases/ZACC/2001/18.html)

Supreme Court (Appellate Division), Opinion in State v. Ebrahim, 16 February 1991, 31 International Legal Materials (1992), pp. 888-899 and 95 International Law Reports (1994), pp. 417-445

Spain

Supreme Court, Fiscal v. Samper, 22 June 1934, Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, Vol. 9 (1938-1940), Case No. 152, pp. 402-405

Switzerland

Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, P 1201/81/fs, Urteil der II. öffentlichrechtlichen Abteilung vom 15. Juli 1982, X, belgischer Staatsangehöriger, gegen Bundesanwaltschaft, Eidg. Justiz- und Polizeidepartement, Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift 1983, pp. 435-438

Schweizerisches Bundesgericht, Lausanne, T 0/2 1B_87/2007/fun, Urteil vom 22. Juni 2007, I. öffentlichrechtliche Abteilung, X. gegen Staatsanwaltschaft III des Kantons Zürich, Bezirksgericht Zürich (available at: http://jumpcgi.bger.ch/cgi-bin/JumpCGI?id=22.06.2007_1B_87/2007)

US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, United States v. Matta-Ballesteros, 1 December 1995, No. 91-50336 (71 F.3d 754)

US Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 22 July 1991, No. 88-5462 (939 F.2d 1341)

US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler, 8 January 1975, No. 449, Docket 74-2084 (510 F.2d 62)

US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Archer, 12 July 1973, Nos. 1039, 1040, 1041, Dockets 73-1527, 73-1528, 73-1711 (486 F.2d 670)

US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Reed, 27 January 1981, Nos. 224, 227 and 228, Docket 80-1236, 80-1240 and 80-1264 (639 F.2d 896)

US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Toscanino, 15 May 1974, No. 746, Docket 73-2732 (500 F 2d 267)

US Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, United States v. Yousef, 4 April 2003, Docket Nos. 98-1041L, 98-1197, 98-1355, 99-1544, 99-1554 (327 F.3d 56)

US District Court, District of Columbia, United States v. Yunis, 23 February 1988, Crim. No. 87-0377 (681 F.Supp. 909)

US District Court, Eastern District of New York, United States v. Toscanino, 10 July 1975, No. 73 CR 194 (398 F.Supp. 916)

US District Court, Southern District of Florida, United States v. Noriega, 8 June 1990, No. 88-79-CR (746 F.Supp. 1506)

US District Court, Southern District of New York, United States v. Bin Laden, 23 July 2001, No. S(7) 98 CR 1023 LBS (156 F.Supp.2d 359)

US Supreme Court, Frisbie v. Collins, 10 March 1952, No. 331 (342 US 519)

US Supreme Court, Ker v. Illinois, 6 December 1886 (119 US 436)

US Supreme Court, Olmstead et al. v. United States (No. 493), Green et al. v. Same (No. 532) and McInnis v. Same (No. 533), 4 June 1928 (277 US 438)

US Supreme Court, Rochin v. California, 2 January 1952, No. 83 (342 US 165)

US Supreme Court, Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-339) and United States v. Alvarez-Machain et al. (No. 03-485), 29 June 2004 (542 US 692)

INDEX

Terms are followed by (the more relevant) chapter and (sub)section numbers.

F

J

R

S

T

CURRICULUM VITAE

Christophe Paulussen LL.M M.Phil (1979) was born in Maastricht where he also attended high school (gymnasium alpha). After a year of French (language) courses at the Université Marc Bloch (Strasbourg) and the Université Catholique de l'Ouest (Angers), he went to Tilburg to study law. After a propedeuse Dutch law (cum laude), a doctoraal International and European Law (with distinction) and a research master (cum laude), he started working as a PhD candidate at the Department of European and International Public Law, where he also co-lectured, among other things, the master's course 'International Criminal Prosecution of Genocide, War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity'. Inspiration for the subject of his PhD thesis was drawn from the (more or less homonymic) thesis of his doctoraal studies which won not only the Tilburg University Thesis Prize 2004 but also the first prize for master's theses in the framework of the Max Van Der Stoel Human Rights Award 2004.

SCHOOL OF HUMAN RIGHTS RESEARCH SERIES

The School of Human Rights Research is a joint effort by human rights researchers in the Netherlands. Its central research theme is the nature and meaning of international standards in the field of human rights, their application and promotion in the national legal order, their interplay with national standards and the international supervision of such application. The School of Human Rights Research Series only includes English titles that contribute to a better understanding of the different aspects of human rights.

Published titles within the Series:

1 Brigit C.A. Toebes, The Right to Health as a Human Right in International Law
ISBN 90-5095-057-4

2 Ineke Boerefijn, The Reporting Procedure under the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Practice and Procedures of the Human Rights Committee
ISBN 90-5095-074-4

3 Kitty Arambulo, Strengthening the Supervision of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. Theoretical and Procedural Aspects
ISBN 90-5095-058-2

4 Marlies Glasius, Foreign Policy on Human Rights. Its Influence on Indonesia under Soeharto
ISBN 90-5095-089-2

5 Cornelius D. de Jong, The Freedom of Thought, Conscience and Religion or Belief in the United Nations (1946-1992)
ISBN 90-5095-137-6

6 Heleen Bosma, Freedom of Expression in England and under the ECHR: in Search of a Common Ground. A Foundation for the Application of the Human Rights Act 1998 in English Law
ISBN 90-5095-136-8

7 Mielle Bulterman, Human Rights in the Treaty Relations of the European Community. Real Virtues or Virtual Reality?
ISBN 90-5095-164-3

8 Esther M. van den Berg, The Influence of Domestic NGOs on Dutch Human Rights Policy. Case Studies on South Africa, Namibia, Indonesia and East Timor
ISBN 90-5095-159-7

9 Ian D. Seiderman, Hierarchy in International Law. The Human Rights Dimension
ISBN 90-5095-165-1

10 Anna Meijknecht, Towards International Personality: The Position of Minorities and Indigenous Peoples in International Law
ISBN 90-5095-166-X

11 Mohamed S.M. Eltayeb, A Human Rights Approach to Combating Religious Persecution. Cases from Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Sudan
ISBN 90-5095-170-8

12 Machteld Boot, Nullum Crimen Sine Lege and the Subject Matter Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court. Genocide, Crimes against Humanity and War Crimes
ISBN 90-5095-216-X

13 Corinne A.A. Packer, Using Human Rights to Change Tradition. Traditional Practices Harmful to Women's Reproductive Health in sub-Saharan Africa
ISBN 90-5095-226-7

14 Theo R.G. van Banning, The Human Rights to Property
ISBN 90-5095-203-8

15 Yvonne M. Donders, Towards a Right to Cultural Identity?
ISBN 90-5095-238-0

16 Göran Sluiter, International Criminal Adjudication and the Collection of Evidence: Obligations of States
ISBN 90-5095-227-5

17 Nicola Jägers, Corporate Human Rights Obligations: in Search of Accountability
ISBN 90-5095-240-2

18 Magdalena Sepúlveda, The Nature of the Obligations under the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights
ISBN 90-5095-260-7

19 Mitsue Inazumi, Universal Jurisdiction in Modern International Law: Expansion of National Jurisdiction for Prosecuting Serious Crimes under International Law
ISBN 90-5095-366-2

20 Anne-Marie L.M. de Brouwer, Supranational Criminal Prosecution of Sexual Violence. The ICC and the Practice of the ICTY and the ICTR
ISBN 90-5095-533-9

21 Jeroen Gutter, Thematic Procedures of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights and International Law: in Search of a Sense of Community
ISBN 90-5095-557-6

22 Hilde Reiding, The Netherlands and the Development of International Human Rights Instruments
ISBN 978-90-5095-654-3

23 Ingrid Westendorp, Women and Housing: Gender Makes a Difference
ISBN 978-90-5095-669-7

24 Quirine A.M. Eijkman, We Are Here to Serve You! Public Security, Police Reform and Human Rights Implementation in Costa Rica
ISBN 978-90-5095-704-5

25 Antoine Buyse, Post-Conflict Housing Restitution. The European human rights perspective, with a case study on Bosnia and Herzegovina
ISBN 978-90-5095-770-0

26 Gentian Zyberi, The Humanitarian Face of the International Court of Justice. Its Contribution to Interpreting and Developing International Human Rights and Humanitarian Law Rules and Principles
ISBN 978-90-5095-792-2

27 Dragos Cucereanu, Aspects of Regulating Freedom of Expression on the Internet
ISBN 978-90-5095-842-4

28 Ton Liefaard, Deprivation of Liberty of Children in Light of International Human Rights Law and Standards
ISBN 978-90-5095-838-7

29 Laura van Waas, Nationality Matters. Statelessness under international law
ISBN 978-90-5095-854-7

30 Jeroen Denkers, The World Trade Organization and Import Bans in Response to Violations of Fundamental Labour Rights
ISBN 978-90-5095-855-4

31 Irene Hadiprayitno, Hazard or Right? The Dialects Between Development Practices and the Internationally Declared Right to Development, with Special Reference to Indonesia
ISBN 978-90-5095-932-2

32 Michal Gondek, The Reach of Human Rights in a Globalising World: Extraterritorial Application of Human Rights Treaties
ISBN 978-90-5095-817-2

33 Jeff Handmaker, Advocating for Accountability: Civic-State Interactions to Protect Refugees in South Africa
ISBN 978-90-5095-910-0

34 Anna Oehmichen, Terrorism and Anti-Terror Legislation: The Terrorised Legislator? A Comparison of Counter-Terrorism Legislation and Its Implications on Human Rights in the Legal Systems of the United Kingdom, Spain, Germany and France
ISBN 978-90-5095-956-8

35 Simon Walker, The Future of Human Rights Impact Assessments of Trade Agreements
ISBN 978-90-5095-986-5

36 Fleur van Leeuwen, Women's Rights Are Human Rights. The Practice of the United Nations Human Rights Committee and the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights
ISBN 978-90-5095-980-3

37 Eva Rieter, Preventing Irreparable Harm. Provisional Measures in International Human Rights Adjudication
ISBN 978-90-5095-931-5

38 Desislava Stoitchkova, Towards Corporate Liability in International Criminal Law
ISBN 978-94-000-0024-7

39 Paulien Muller, Scattered Families. Transnational Family Life of Afghan Refugees in the Netherlands in the Light of the Human Rights-Based Protection of the Family
ISBN 978-94-000-0021-6

40 Bibi van Ginkel, The Practice of the United Nations in Combating Terrorism from 1946 to 2008. Questions of Legality and Legitimacy
ISBN 978-94-000-0076-6