A MESSAGE FROM THE CHANCELLOR

Undeniably, our University is an inspiring place at the forefront of research and learning. It is collectively energised by the people who are part of our community of scholars, and our donors and benefactors form an integral part of that community underpinning our success.

The generosity of the University's donors and benefactors in 2010 was, as always, tremendously heartening. So too was the sheer number of donors, with many thousands of generous individuals and organisations supporting us.

The stories in Sydney Annual demonstrate the true impact which our donors and benefactors have on the University and, indeed, Australia. This year's inspirational stories cover a breadth of disciplines and initiatives, from diabetes research and chemotherapy patient support, to initiatives in Indigenous communities, through to research and education in international security and human rights.

It gives me great pleasure to thank and honour all of the University's donors and benefactors. Your belief in the University of Sydney and the power of research and education is truly commendable. Indeed, it is a most valuable investment in our nation.

Her Excellency Professor Marie Bashir AC CVO

Chancellor
The University of Sydney

A MESSAGE FROM THE VICE-CHANCELLOR

2010 was a pivotal year for the University in which we laid down our strategic plan for the next five years.

The plan reflects our vision for the University as an institution in which students and researchers have a sense of belonging to a single community of scholars, of being engaged together in learning and enquiry, and in which excellence in research and education is prized because of the benefits it creates for Australia and the wider world. In this vision, our community of scholars is marked by its diversity, by its global orientation, and by its commitment to working in partnership with Indigenous Australia.

This year's edition of Sydney Annual demonstrates to me how our donors are already helping us to achieve this vision. It highlights just a few of the many gifts that are already helping to drive the University forward, and will continue to help us far into the future, increasing the breadth and intensity of our enquiry and ensuring we attract and support the most promising students from all backgrounds.

Sydney is immensely fortunate to have a large and growing number of supporters who believe in our vision and purpose. It gives me great pleasure to be able to thank all of our 8700-plus donors, on behalf of those who have benefited from your support. Your generosity and foresight is core to our University and its achievements.

Dr Michael Spence

Vice-Chancellor and Principal
The University of Sydney

THE INSPIRATION FACTORY

The University of Sydney will spearhead new research on diabetes thanks to the support of the Australian Diabetes Council, writes Chris Rodley.

The eating habits of locusts may sound like an unlikely place to start in the search for new ways to tackle diabetes. But by understanding how the insects regulate their intake of protein – they tend to keep eating until they reach a target level of protein – University of Sydney researchers could help us take an important step forward in the fight against Australia's looming obesity and diabetes crisis.

Work by biologist and locust expert Professor Stephen Simpson has raised the possibility that falling protein levels in our food could be preventing us from feeling full, triggering us to overeat, and thereby driving up rates of obesity: a major risk factor for type 2 diabetes.

His team recently confirmed this hypothesis through experiments in which human subjects had the protein concentration in their diet covertly manipulated over a three-week period. As predicted, diluting the protein content resulted in overeating – even when subjects had no idea how much protein their diet contained.

Professor Simpson's research project is just one of many surprising fields of study arising from a major new effort to combat obesity, diabetes and cardiovascular disease using a cross-disciplinary approach. The University's state-of-the-art Centre for Obesity, Diabetes and Cardiovascular Disease, to be completed in 2013, aims to become a global hub for innovative research into the three related conditions.

At the heart of the centre will be the newly created Australian Diabetes Council Chair of Diabetes, which will spearhead research specifically into type 1 and 2 diabetes as well as being an advocate for greater awareness. More than one million Australians have type 1 or type 2 diabetes, and prevalence is growing; around 100,000 people develop the condition each year.

The Chair will be funded by a generous $5 million endowment from the Australian Diabetes Council, the nation's largest diabetes charity. "We were inspired by the University's vision to break down the barriers between traditionally individualistic disciplines," says Dr Neville Howard, president of the Council. "The scale of the epidemic, and its cost in human and monetary terms, is such that we have to continually think of new ways to try and combat the disease."

Leading the fight will be researchers doing basic scientific work on animal and cell-based models, as well as those undertaking clinical and translational research – with much cross-fertilisation between the different areas.

"Key questions will include why the pancreas fails (leading to diabetes), how to prevent and treat diabetes complications, and how to optimise health care service delivery for diabetics, who often need highly personalised medical care," explains Professor Stephen Twigg, Associate Professor in Medicine at the University of Sydney Medical School and theme leader for diabetes at the centre.

"We were inspired by the University's vision to break down the barriers between traditionally individualistic disciplines."

DR NEVILLE HOWARD
PRESIDENT OF THE AUSTRALIAN DIABETES COUNCIL

Another area under the spotlight will be risk factors for diabetes, such as obesity and a sedentary lifestyle: "Much of the focus will be on how we can have a healthier community, which means trying to minimise obesity, increase physical activity, and maintain as normal a body weight as possible."

To address these issues the centre will take a world-first interdisciplinary approach, bringing together public health and policy experts, social scientists, urban planners, architects and engineers, whose combined expertise can help society build more active communities where people drive less and walk more. Meanwhile, legal scholars will have a role in asking how society might better regulate unhealthy food.

On top of all that, the centre will examine the family, ethnic and genetic factors that can combine with lifestyle to predispose some people to diabetes, and determine why some people appear more prone to developing diabetes complications than others. "As you can see, we have our work cut out for us," says Professor Twigg.

The Australian Diabetes Council's members are hopeful that the Chair will bring us closer to a potential cure for diabetes as well as unlocking practical ways to manage the disease.

If current research at the University is anything to go by, the centre is likely to bring tangible improvements to diabetics' lives. One Sydney researcher, Professor Anthony Keech, is having great success using the cholesterol-lowering drug fenofibrate to prevent complications such as human diabetic eye disease.

As well, animal models are being developed that better mimic human disease and provide a clearer research window into human diabetes and its complications.

Professor Twigg witnesses the results of university research every day in his practice. He gives the example of a patient he treated recently: a woman in her 20s with type 1 diabetes who had unstable blood glucose.

"By putting our research knowledge into practice, including new technologies, we were able to avoid a hospital admission by reversing the excess acid which was developing in her blood. At the same time we stabilised her blood glucose to help prevent unconscious low-blood-glucose episodes from occurring in the immediate and long term," he says.

"This is a very exciting aspect of patient management; seeing that quality of life as well as lifespan can be improved in people with diabetes. And it's only by applying key learning acquired through research that we can find the best way to do it."

LET THERE BE MUSIC!

The donation of the Gerald Westheimer Instrument Collection to the Sydney Conservatorium of Music gave Madeline Procopio the extraordinary opportunity to play the Bernadel – a prized mid 19th century French-made violin.

Madeline Procopio, a solo violinist at the Sydney Conservatorium of Music, has always had a passion for performing. “It gives me great satisfaction to be able to communicate what I feel about the music to the audience, so they can feel the same emotions I do,” she says.

Procopio has pursued a passion for the violin ever since she first played one at age seven. From childhood, her studies in violin continued through school and on to a bachelor’s degree in music performance.

After completing her undergraduate studies Procopio enrolled at the Sydney Conservatorium of Music to study with renowned violin teacher and string pedagogue Alice Waten, Chair of Strings at the Conservatorium.

Encouraged by a Conservatorium scholarship, Procopio is aiming high. She recently gained a Graduate Diploma in Music (Performance) and is now working towards a Master of Music Studies (Performance). The next step is a three-year doctorate in Musical Arts, researching the pedagogical aspects of teaching and the psychology behind learning as a child and an adult.

Procopio is no stranger to precious violins, having previously played with a Tomaso Eberle and Arthur E Smith violin. However, she describes the opportunity to play the Bernadel as “a life-changing experience. It makes me enjoy practising,” she says. “I love learning how to make the most gorgeous sounds on this instrument.”

The Bernadel was given to the Sydney Conservatorium of Music as part of a series of donations by alumnus Professor Gerald Westheimer AM (BSc ’48). Professor Westheimer has since given a second Bernadel, an 1879 Anton Sprenger violin, and an endowment to care for the collection.

These instruments form the beginning of the ‘Gerald Westheimer Instrument Collection’, which Professor Westheimer hopes to build on during the coming years. In his own words, he wants the collection to “enable talented young Australian artists studying at the Conservatorium to perfect their performance skills on high quality instruments”.

Alice Waten believes the Bernadel, in Procopio’s hands, is already fulfilling Westheimer’s wish. “This beautiful French violin is helping Madeline to explore a richer and finer sound, as well as discover more subtle tonal qualities. She is already a talented violinist, but is now taking her performance skills to the next level.”

Professor Westheimer’s donations are a magnificent addition to the resources of the Sydney Conservatorium of Music – gifts that will benefit students for generations to come, according to Kim Walker, Dean of the Conservatorium. “Our young performers need to learn on quality instruments, to develop and refine their virtuosity and musicianship. We can’t thank Gerald Westheimer enough for beginning a collection on behalf of young Australians who deserve this vital opportunity.”

HUMAN RIGHTS NO THEORETICAL MATTER

Leila Jabbour learns about one student's determination to improve human rights in Burma.

For Chaw Ei Win Zaw (pictured), there's nothing theoretical about studying human rights. As a child in Burma she saw her father imprisoned for 13 years without contact with his family – an experience that fuelled her resolution to help political prisoners and their families when she grew up. Now an experienced human rights worker, she is midway through the new Master of Human Rights and Democratisation (Asia Pacific) at the University of Sydney.

"When my father was in jail," she says, "my mother, brother and I were not allowed to visit him, and my mother struggled to provide basic needs to her two little children. Those periods were a nightmare for my family."

Chaw Ei's father is veteran Burmese journalist, writer and freedom fighter Ludu Sein Win. In 1960, aged 20, he started work as an editor with a local newspaper. Seven years later his paper was shut down and he and the other five editors were arrested.

Ludu Sein was sent to notorious Insein Prison and put in solitary confinement for two years. This was followed by three years imprisonment in Great Coco Island, and another stint at Insein Prison before he was released in 1976.

His freedom was short lived. Chaw Ei remembers the day Burma's military intelligence unit returned to their house. "They asked my father to come with them, as they wanted some information from him." Ludu Sein's next period of detainment lasted four years. He was finally released after he suffered a stroke in an Insein cell where he had been kept alone for three years. Though the right side of his body was paralysed, he learned to write with his left hand after his release, and continued to produce articles for many journals and magazines.

Chaw Ei has clearly inherited her father's indomitable spirit. "Her commitment to justice and human rights is absolute," says Dr Danielle Celermajer, academic director of the master's program. "She's always asking,

'How do I help? How do I make a difference to my country?'"

Chaw Ei was keenly aware of human rights issues from an early age. "Government spies were everywhere," she says. "On the campus, in the classrooms, near homes. When I graduated from high school, I was not allowed to enter the university I liked. The government chose for me, and my bachelor's degree took six years, as the government forced the university to close for over two years."

Undeterred, she completed her Bachelor of Science in Burma, and later a Bachelor of Science (Honours) in the UK and a Master of Public Policy in Singapore. Keen to develop her skills further ("learning is never-ending," she says) she enrolled to study the Master of Human Rights and Democratisation at the University of Sydney.

Chaw Ei is exactly the kind of person the program was designed for. Established with funding from the European Union and supported by donations from alumni and friends to the Sydney Development Fund, it was launched by the then Faculty of Arts in July 2010 with an initial enrolment of about 30 students from 13 countries including Australia.

Over two semesters the course teaches practical skills to help people advocate for human rights and democracy, both within local communities and across the region. The first semester involves intensive coursework at Sydney. The second takes place at one of four partner universities – in Indonesia, Nepal, Sri Lanka or Thailand – and comprises further coursework plus a dissertation or internship with a relevant organisation.

Chaw Ei has chosen to spend her second semester as an intern in Thailand, as it will give her a chance to work with refugees at the Thai-Burma border, and facilitate a comparative study between Thailand and Burma on human rights protection.

While benefiting from the University’s research and academic expertise, the students also contribute to the rich learning environment – sharing their own first-hand experiences and perspectives with students from other courses. “Our classes have been transformed by their presence,” says Dr Celermajer.

This ties in with the University’s larger objective: to be an active part of a civil society. Dr Celermajer believes the people of Australia are concerned about regional security in other countries, and this has to take into account issues like whether the people have enough to eat and can live without fear of violence.

For example, the Australian response to events in Burma has been strong, but it’s not necessarily the military threat that most Australians relate to. “It’s more a recognition of what it means in terms of the oppression of the Burmese people, and their ability to live a decent life,” says Dr Celermajer. “If we can teach our students to think strategically, we can have a significant impact on these situations.”

Chaw Ei also believes education is the key. “Burmese people like myself live always in fear,” she says. “They do not even know what their rights are. If we can educate them, if we can build their capacity, they certainly will come out to fight.”

Her own long-term goal is clear. Together with fellow student and human rights advocate Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, she wants to build an ‘ami-meritocracy’ system in Burma (a combination of amity and meritocracy) – a nation rich with expertise for economic development, humility to respect the rights of others as human beings, and peace to avoid war and violence.

YEAR OF THE DRAGON

China is starting to flex its muscles in ways that have major implications for Australia and our region, writes Chris Rodley.

In November last year, an anonymous source uploaded 44 minutes of footage to video-sharing website YouTube. The leaked video – quickly taken down but later reposted by others – appeared to show a Chinese fishing trawler ramming into a Japanese coastguard vessel.

The incident in the video took place two months earlier, near the disputed Senkaku Islands, which are claimed by both China and Japan. Following the collision between the vessels, the Japanese coastguard took the Chinese boat into custody and detained its captain for questioning.

Japan's response infuriated China, which demanded its skipper back amid anti-Japanese protests held across the country. Exports of Chinese minerals to Japan were reportedly halted while the invitations for 1000 Japanese young people to attend the Shanghai Expo were cancelled. After two weeks of pressure, Japan relented and released the Chinese captain.

The confrontation on the high seas is a prime example of the assertive new posture being taken by China in recent times, according to Professor Alan Dupont, who holds the Michael Hintze Chair of International Security and heads the University of Sydney's Centre for International Security Studies (CISS). "The great dragon is starting to flex its muscles", he says.

This development has major implications for local security and the world at large, and raises important strategic questions. Can China's rise be managed in a way that avoids confrontation? And what role will Australia play in maintaining stability?

Professor Alan Dupont has worked on Australian defence and security issues for over 30 years as a strategist, policy analyst and diplomat. His current role as Chair of International Security was created in 2006 thanks to a major gift from the distinguished University of Sydney alumnus and London-based financier Michael Hintze (BSc '75, BE (Elec) '77).

Mr Hintze – who founded the hedge fund CQS Management and is one of Britain's most prominent philanthropists – gave the multi-million dollar endowment in a bid to help find solutions to the security challenges facing an uncertain world.

Fast-forward to today, and Professor Dupont now oversees a large, multidisciplinary program of research spanning the full spectrum of security issues. As well as covering traditional topics like defence, he has gained a strong international profile for his work on non-traditional security issues relating to food, water and energy supplies as well as climate change.

The prospect of a clash between China and the United States is a pressing concern for Professor Dupont, who points to a number of episodes that have ratcheted up tensions between China and its neighbours. One episode followed the sinking of the South Korean navy ship Cheonan in March last year, which resulted in the deaths of 46 sailors. After a torpedo from a North Korean submarine was held to be responsible for the attack, the US planned to signal to the north that further aggression would not be tolerated by deploying an aircraft carrier into the area. But China objected vehemently to the ship being moved into the Yellow Sea, which lies between China and Korea, resulting in the US moving it to the Sea of Japan.

Another factor with the potential to increase tensions in the Western Pacific is China's development of a more expansive 'far sea' defence strategy. Whereas it was once principally concerned with protecting its own waters and Taiwan, China now wants to be able to send ships not only into the South China Sea but further into the Pacific where the US has historically dominated, explains Professor Dupont. China is expected to have a formidable blue water navy, equipped with aircraft carriers, by 2030.

"This is a very important signal from the Chinese that the status quo no longer applies and they intend to assert their rights as a Pacific power as well as an Asian power,” he says. “This is tantamount to waving a red rag to the American bull. It will inevitably draw a US response.”

the University of Sydney.

For its own part, the US is also becoming more assertive on the issue of China. “Up until this year they’ve been distracted by other changes – terrorism, Iraq and Afghanistan – and were relatively disengaged from Asia,” he says. But during President Barack Obama’s tour of Asia and at the 2010 Australia United States Ministerial gathering, the US signalled its intention to continue being a strong player in the region.

The growing potential for conflict between the two behemoths should be taken seriously by Australia, Professor Dupont emphasises. “Conflict between our major trading partner and major ally is the nightmare scenario for us.”

To manage the risk of conflict, he contends that we must build a new architecture for interaction between China and the US, including multilateral agreements for discussing contentious issues. More transparency is also needed, he adds, through Cold-War-style hotlines and the establishment of information protocols to share details of major naval deployments and military exercises.

In this process of risk management, Australia could play a significant role as a facilitator and bridge builder. As a friend and partner to both sides, our nation can encourage the two parties to minimise their differences and develop a more constructive relationship. “We probably have more leverage over China and the US than many think, and we also have excellent relations with South Korea and Japan.”

Professor Dupont also believes that Australian research could play an influential role in seeding ideas, including practical proposals for building trust and conflict prevention. He believes the establishment of the new China Studies Centre by the University of Sydney will contribute to this process (see page 15).

“Given our strategic focus on China as a rising power in Asia, the China Studies Centre is set to become a major research partner and a valuable resource which can only grow in importance as its expertise expands and deepens in the years ahead.”

Professor Dupont firmly believes that academics should focus on solutions as well as analysis – “this is our guiding philosophy at the University of Sydney; and no issue in international security is more important than China’s strategic future.”

“Australia could play a significant role as a facilitator and bridge builder. Our nation can encourage the two parties to develop a more constructive relationship.”

EMBRACING THE CHINESE CENTURY

The University of Sydney has a long history of leadership when it comes to Australia’s relationship with China.

We already have much to be proud about. Back in 1918, Sydney was the first university in Australia to teach Chinese language and culture, and after the Cultural Revolution (mid-60s–70s) it was one of the first universities in the Western world to welcome Chinese students.

Continuing that tradition, the University has just launched the China Studies Centre, a hub for cross-discipline research partnerships, leadership dialogue, and business/government development between Australia and China. Covering fields as diverse as history, business, environmental science, law, information technology, politics and public health, the centre opened its doors on 1 January 2011, with Professor David Goodman as interim director.

“We have considerable expertise on China,” says Professor Goodman. “We produce more cited research on China studies than anyone else in Australia, but until now it has never been brought together to create a critical mass.”

The centre will transform the way we approach China studies, and will lead to significant improvements in our relationship with the People’s Republic of China. Academics from every corner of the University will be brought together to explore the new horizons revealed by collaboration. For example, archaeologists studying Bronze Age China will join experts tracking cardiovascular disease in modern-day China. Professor Alan Dupont, international security expert, will work alongside historians of the Chinese Communist Party and experts on information technology, to examine China’s use of the internet.

The centre aims to have a positive effect offshore and at home. It will engage with provincial businesses and local tiers of government in major Chinese cities, including the Guangdong Province (NSW’s sister-state) to encourage deeper business connections, language and cultural links.

The Australian workforce will also benefit from the influx of experienced, China-literate graduates with specialised master’s qualifications gained through the centre.

For all these reasons, the China Studies Centre is an important step forward for both the University and Australia – enhancing our present relationship with China and laying the foundation for a warm and prosperous future. More than simply a good idea, Professor Goodman views this as a necessity.

“Australians need to know about China – the country and its culture – and we are here to provide that knowledge,” he says. “Our future economic growth, prosperity, social and cultural wellbeing depends on it.”

NURTURING SOCIAL ENTREPRENEURS

Two newly established scholarships in the University of Sydney Business School show that entrepreneurship and innovation in business can be about more than generating wealth for shareholders.

Named in honour of his parents, the Westbrook and Jessie Anstice scholarships were established in 2010 by a donation from alumnus David Anstice (BEC '70, Honorary Fellow '09), matched by the University of Sydney Business School.

A lifelong supporter of the University, Anstice is currently president of the University's USA Foundation, a director of the United States Studies Centre (USSC) and chair of the Advisory Committee on Innovation at the USSC.

Anstice is an ardent advocate for innovation, describing it as "the source spring of economic growth". A second key factor is entrepreneurship: "required to transform innovative ideas into commercial viability". He established the scholarships as a tangible expression of his belief that "Australia needs to look for new ideas derived from intellect. Universities are the best place to nurture intellect and thus lead innovation".

The inaugural recipient of the Westbrook and Jessie Anstice Honours Scholarship in Economics and Business was Amelia Rochford, who completed a Bachelor of International Studies with honours in 2010. The scholarship enabled Rochford to complete a thesis about how social enterprise can benefit Australia's long-term unemployed.

Social enterprise is a relatively new hybrid organisational form, Rochford explains. "Unlike traditional commercial activities, it explicitly combines a business model with social goals". An example is Cleanable, a Melbourne-based cleaning business established in 2005. Cleanable gives mentally-ill people an opportunity for retraining and long-term employment using a self-funding business model.

Rochford was drawn to social enterprise because of its innovative approach. "It provides a market-based solution to social problems in a way that allows continued viability. This leads to ongoing benefits for those suffering social exclusion and disadvantage."

Rochford's research has convinced her that social enterprise has great potential to address environmental and societal concerns, especially in the lives of the long-term unemployed, but she is quick to point out the concept is underdeveloped in Australia.

"Although there has been a recent focus on social enterprise through the Productivity Commission's report into the contributions of the non-profit sector, there is still far more that can be done to foster growth. The current government attitude is quite limited. An approach favouring the development of all types of social enterprise would be far more beneficial."

The inaugural recipient of the Westbrook and Jessie Anstice International Travel Scholarship, Andy Thomas, also used his scholarship for altruistic purposes. It enabled him to attend the Global Youth Enterprise and Entrepreneurship

Conference in Washington DC where he researched and shared new ideas about microfinance: the provision of basic financial services (such as savings, credit and insurance) to households below the poverty line as a means to improve their socio-economic position.

“The conference helped me broaden my understanding of microfinance issues”, says Thomas. “Australia has relatively few microfinance organisations – the majority base their Western operations in the United States – so the conference discussion on effective program design and policy advocacy went well beyond the scope that I’ve had access to so far. It was a unique opportunity to meet people who have been involved in the field since its inception.”

Thomas, who will complete a Bachelor of Economics and Law with honours in 2011, will use the knowledge he gained at the conference in his thesis.

“I plan to analyse factors that could restrict the capacity of microfinance institutions to stimulate growth in low-income developing countries. Specifically, I will look at the impact of disparity in bargaining power and information asymmetry in preventing the most efficient outcomes for these institutions.”

Thomas views his thesis as a vital stepping stone towards a career in development economics. After university, he hopes to work for a large development institution, such as the World Bank or the United Nations Development Programme.

“I can think of little more rewarding than working in this field, doing practical work to implement development projects as well as being an advocate for greater government support for policies and programs to foster economic growth in some of the world’s poorest communities.”

Both Rochford and Thomas are immensely grateful for the support provided by the Anstice scholarships. According to Thomas, “the specific focus of the new scholarships shows real foresight about what is in the best interests of students at the University”.

For Rochford, it confirmed that social enterprises were worthy of research. “The scholarship helped me financially but just as importantly it gave me confidence in my topic,” she reflects. “I’ve come to truly believe that social enterprise offers a viable solution to the problems plaguing society.”

BRINGING HOME CANCER SUPPORT

Community nurses help ease the burden of chemotherapy outpatients and their carers, writes Leila Jabbour.

A new study at the Sydney Nursing School is exploring the experiences of family members and other informal carers who support people receiving chemotherapy as outpatients. Made possible in part by a donation from the Maple-Brown Family Charitable Foundation, the study is one of a number of the University of Sydney projects focusing on community care of people with cancer.

FEELING THE STRAIN

Earlier this year Ian (note: names have been changed) was prescribed a course of chemotherapy. Every three weeks he had to visit the hospital's cancer centre for treatment, then return home to rest. Within days of his first treatment Ian began to experience nausea, vomiting and diarrhoea.

Having been warned these were likely side effects, he waited for them to subside. But over the weekend his condition deteriorated, so he and his wife, both anxious by then, decided to return to the hospital.

Since Ian's wife was elderly and smaller than he was, she wasn't able to help him into the car. Ian ended up going to hospital by ambulance and was admitted with dehydration and a low platelet count. He spent a week there receiving replacement fluids and medication to relieve his nausea.

Lynda, another chemotherapy outpatient, was warned about possible side effects, but as neither she nor her daughter felt confident to manage these on their own, they visited the hospital whenever they felt uneasy. As Lynda's daughter explained, "I just feel helpless at home. I tell Mum to drink more but, you know ... there's only so much water you can drink."

Wendy also experienced side effects from chemotherapy. Although she had been told to contact the hospital about any concerns, she resisted making the call when her condition did become serious. This put her husband in a difficult position: he felt his wife needed care but didn't want to override her wishes. Later, Wendy was alarmed by her own lack of action. "Whether my brain had shut down I don't know – I just felt so ill and wanted to stay in bed."

FINDING NEW WAYS TO HELP

As if cancer wasn't enough of a challenge, these examples show how outpatients can also struggle to navigate the health care system when they are feeling very unwell due to the side effects of treatment. And the repercussions don't stop there.

Uncertainty at home about how to respond to troubling symptoms can cause anxiety and distress to cancer sufferers and their carers (friends, family). Medical practitioners also feel frequently frustrated by their inability to extend support to patients at home. As well, unscheduled hospital visits put stress on the health system and cost taxpayer money.

The University of Sydney's new study aims to contribute to finding a solution. Led by Dr Heather McKenzie, Associate Dean (Learning and Teaching) at the Sydney Nursing School, it brings together expertise from the school, the Sydney Cancer Centre at Royal Prince Alfred Hospital, and community nurses from several area health services. Other senior researchers include Kate White, Professor of Cancer Nursing; senior lecturer Dr Lillian Hayes, biostatistician Judith Fethney, and Sydney Cancer Centre nurse practitioner Keith Cox OAM. They are all members of the Cancer Nursing Research Unit, led by Professor Kate White, a collaboration between the Cancer Institute NSW, Sydney Nursing School and Sydney Cancer Centre.

In 2006 Dr McKenzie assembled a team of researchers to investigate the role of community nurses in caring for people with cancer. A sociologist as well as an experienced community nurse, Dr McKenzie has completed a PhD on the experiences of cancer survivors, reflecting a longstanding interest in both fields. She has long been convinced that community nurses can play a significant role in outpatient care.

Such patients however, are not routinely put in touch with a community nurse unless some other aspect of their condition or circumstances calls for home care. An earlier study by Dr McKenzie and her team demonstrated that where a relationship with a community nurse did exist, the nurse played a pivotal role in the patient's care.

UNSCHEDULED HOSPITAL VISITS

The team found that some chemotherapy outpatients (like Ian, Lynda and Wendy) were struggling at home with distressing side effects but not being referred to a community health service for support. Such patients often made unscheduled presentations to hospital in an attempt to resolve their difficulties, resulting in a dual burden of distress on patients and their families, plus an extra workload for hospital staff. With this in mind, Dr McKenzie's team began a second project to investigate the specific reasons for presentations.

They embarked on a 12-month retrospective study at a large Sydney hospital cancer centre, examining records relating to unscheduled presentations of chemotherapy outpatients. The centre treated just over 500 such patients each year, and during the year in question there were more than 250 unscheduled visits. Many visits resulted in admission for a median period of five days – a significant amount of unplanned hospital care. These findings indicated a serious area of unmet need.

A major reason why so many presentations resulted in admission was because people delayed seeking help until their side effects became severe. During interviews, the team discovered many patients had delayed seeking help because they "didn't want to be a nuisance" or "bother" busy hospital staff. Others simply felt too unwell to even consider going to hospital.

"Patients are very carefully educated about what to expect as a side effect of treatment," says Dr McKenzie. "So they think, 'OK I was told there was a fair chance I would get this ...' The problem is it can be difficult for a non-health-professional to decide what is or isn't a serious side effect requiring further medical attention."

EARLY INTERVENTION

The team developed an intervention program designed to reduce the number of unexpected hospital visits and admissions. They linked a small group of chemotherapy outpatients to specially trained community nurses, who visited the patients at home during key times in their treatment program.

When participating patients visited the hospital for their first treatment, information was collected on their condition and passed on to a local community health centre. With each patient's consent the information was also sent to their GP, to further integrate their care.

A local community nurse visited each patient at home the day after their first treatment, three days later, and once during the second treatment cycle. They checked how the patient was coping, physically and emotionally, and sent the information back to the cancer centre and the patient's GP.

Professor Michael Boyer, Director of the Sydney Cancer Centre, believes that while unscheduled hospital visits will always happen (and need to be possible), the additional support provided by community nurses should reduce incidents. "Community support for our outpatients should prevent them from experiencing severe or adverse side effects from treatment," he says.

Keith Cox has played a key role in developing the pilot intervention. In his work as a nurse practitioner at the Sydney Cancer Centre, he regularly sees patients who present at hospital between scheduled treatments. "The majority are acutely unwell," he says. "They are frightened and are experiencing distressing symptoms, such as dehydration, nausea or vomiting, that they can't cope with at home. Yet these are side effects that we can effectively manage – it's about

"It's very reassuring to have a nurse who visits or calls you the day after your treatment. People make a real bond with the community nurse when they're visited in their own home".

getting the right treatment to the patient in a timely manner."

He welcomes the new intervention model. "When you're first told you've got cancer and you need chemotherapy, it's quite overwhelming and you don't know what to expect. It's very reassuring to have a nurse who visits or calls you the day after your treatment. People make a real bond with the community nurse when they're visited in their own home."

Patients involved in the pilot intervention agree. "It was really comforting," says one. "When you have chemo for the first time your mindset changes and you worry a lot more. Any little cut, ache or pain, you just freak out. You think: is the treatment killing me? Is the cancer spreading? It's just so comforting to know that the nurse is coming and you can ask these questions."

"These nurses develop a very finely tuned understanding of their patients," says Dr Hayes, who has a strong clinical and research background in community health.

"Because they visit patients regularly at home, they are able to closely monitor their subtly fluctuating needs – both physical and psychosocial – and respond as necessary."

Dr McKenzie points out that GP participation is another advantage of the intervention scheme. "GPs are often out of the loop," she says. "They may not know what treatments their patients are receiving, or what stage they are at. This model makes them more connected."

WHERE TO FROM HERE?

With the pilot study almost concluded, the team is now interviewing all stakeholders and refining the intervention program. It is anticipated the extra workload for community nurses will be offset by the reduced burden on the hospital system and improved patient outcomes.

To measure this more systematically, the team – which now includes oncologists, a health economist and IT specialists – is seeking funding for a much larger randomised controlled trial involving two groups of patients: one receiving the intervention and one with the standard model of care. This will enable them to clearly identify whether the intervention is a cost-effective means of achieving its dual objectives of reducing unscheduled hospital presentations and increasing patient wellbeing.

For now, Dr McKenzie and her colleagues are focusing on the experiences of the friends and family who support chemotherapy outpatients in the days following a treatment. Their aim is to identify key issues arising in the role of primary support person.

"This will provide information about an area not well understood at the moment," says Dr McKenzie. "While there's a lot known about how to support people caring for others in a more general context, there isn't much, certainly in Australia, about supporting them during the 'chemotherapy window' of cancer treatment."

The results of this research will no doubt be welcomed by all those who care for cancer patients. As one community nurse succinctly put it: "It's as tough on the carer as it is on the client ... a lot of them are so scared. Giving advice and reassurance to patients and their loved ones can make a huge difference. The positive impact is enormous; it's a great thing to see."

FROM CAMPERDOWN TO BIDYADANGA

The Faculty of Veterinary Science is expanding its focus – linking dog health to wider health issues in remote communities. Rachel Sharples looks at initiatives in remote Indigenous towns and on campus.

Dr Graeme Brown has travelled to places most of us have never heard of: Bidyadanga in Western Australia, Ti Tree, Yuendumu and Nguiu in the Northern Territory. He goes there to study dogs with infectious diseases most of us wish we'd never heard of: giardia, salmonella, campylobacter, intestinal parasites, mange ... It's not a glamorous job, but for Australia's remote desert communities, it's a necessary one. Infectious diseases pose serious health concerns not only to dogs but also to the communities in which they live.

HEALTHY DOGS, HEALTHY COMMUNITIES

It's common to hear the phrase 'dogs are like family' in Indigenous communities. Research shows that despite the sometimes outward appearance of neglect, dogs play an integral role in these groups, and the human-dog bond is very strong. Unfortunately, there are a lot of them. When Dr Brown conducted his PhD research in a desert community of 800 people northwest of Alice Springs, he counted 550 dogs. The sheer volume means diseases like salmonella, giardia and campylobacter are easily spread. Dr Brown attributes this in part to what he describes as the "degradation of the ecosystem", particularly evident in the harsh conditions of desert environments where poor nutrition has impacted natural cycles and immune systems.

It's easy to think that improving dogs' health in such areas is simply a matter of culling or educating, but the situation is more complex. The current poor state of dog health is the result of many factors, such as inadequate access to veterinary services, socio-economic disadvantage, and lack of cross-cultural awareness in animal health education programs.

These are the challenges that face the Veterinary Science faculty, as they seek to promote and protect veterinary public health in Indigenous communities.

One of the faculty's initiatives is an Australian Research Council (ARC) Linkage project called Healthy Dogs, Healthy

LAYLA SCHRIEBER
INDIGENOUS MASTERS STUDENT

Communities – Dr Brown is part of this team. Together, they are investigating ways to improve canine health in remote Indigenous communities and bring health benefits to the wider community. Across six sites in the Northern Territory, Western Australia, Queensland and New South Wales, the team conducts dog health and welfare surveys. The data is then used to develop culturally appropriate education interventions to improve the health and welfare of these dogs.

Dr Brown’s expertise in infectious diseases is an example of the project’s interdisciplinary approach. Other contributions are made by team members with a focus on communication and education. Dr Robert Dixon, the project leader, specialises in animal welfare and public health. Dr Sophie Constable and Dr Rose Dixon develop knowledge-sharing programs that are culturally appropriate and specific to each community. In one region they commissioned female artists to paint stories conveying information on dog health. They also work with local environmental health workers to produce appropriate promotional material.

Layla Schrieber, an Indigenous masters student, is studying the epidemiology of human and canine streptococci in a North Queensland community. Based ‘in community’, Schrieber finds that research is only part of the job description.

“The larger role I find myself doing is supporting local animal health workers. We’ve started dog health days, which we promote by going into schools the week before and getting the kids to look at parasites under the microscope. It helps get them excited about the day. These kinds of community relationships are important.”

Schrieber is acutely aware that making a connection with people is key to her role. “You have to build a relationship with someone in order for them to listen to what you’re saying. And you’ve got to listen to them too, because they know exactly what’s going to work. It’s about them trusting you to help them put it together.”

INDIGENOUS STUDENT PROGRAMS

At present there is a distinct lack of Indigenous veterinarians, especially from (or working in) remote Indigenous communities. The 2006 ARC grant that founded the Healthy Dogs, Healthy Communities project incorporated into its funding structure the employment of Indigenous postgraduate students. Layla was the only Indigenous student to apply. Advertised today, Dr Brown believes the uptake would be higher, but it does highlight the need to attract Indigenous students to the veterinary profession.

The Faculty of Veterinary Science is also concerned about this issue. After an admissions review process in 1998 the faculty set targets to increase its level of Indigenous student participation; showing leadership in this area long before the University created specific policies on Indigenous enrolments.

Dean of the Veterinary Science faculty Professor Rosanne Taylor explains: “Indigenous students are under-represented across the University. We identified early on that as a faculty we needed to make a much greater difference to our Indigenous peoples. It was clear there was a real deficit of Indigenous graduates in the veterinary and animal science professions, and alternative pathways into the faculty were required.”

The faculty now sets aside 12 percent of its places each year for Indigenous, rural and disadvantaged students. Indigenous students enter through the Koori Centre’s Cadigal Program. Retention rates have been high: 17 students have come through the program so far. Professor Taylor believes this can be attributed to Koori Centre support, flexible teaching, in-house leadership programs and a small, friendly faculty environment. Two students will graduate from the Cadigal Program this year and the faculty’s first Indigenous PhD student is due to graduate in 2011.

Professor Taylor admits they've never been able to entirely fill the Indigenous quota, but it's something they hope to improve. They plan to introduce an Indigenous scholarships program, and develop outreach programs to attract students from the most remote and disadvantaged communities. A key element will be the establishment of mentors who can act as ambassadors – students keen to develop relationships with remote Indigenous communities and support Indigenous people during their transition to university.

Mentoring is something Schrieber has given a lot of thought to. She recalls her first visit to the University of Sydney campus. She was alone, she didn't know anyone, and she was dismayed to see other students already conversing in their own groups. Her first inclination was to "run off, just get out of there". Fortunately she had the insight and courage to persevere.

"I'm an educated woman from an urban area, so imagine if you were from a remote community, on your own in a strange city full of foreign-looking buildings. You'd just leave and never come back. Mentoring is something I'd definitely like to do, to make sure nobody has to feel like that. I know that once I got to know people, they were wonderful. The University was excellent and I had a great time."

Nathan Hallet, an Indigenous student now in his fourth year of the Animal and Veterinary Bioscience degree agrees – mentoring helped him immensely when he started at university and he is now eager to mentor others. "These programs are really important because there's still a lot of stigma in Indigenous communities that says you can't achieve. If we can visit these communities and show examples of Indigenous students who have gone on to succeed in the veterinary profession, I think it will make a huge difference."

Foundation plays a crucial role in meeting some of these needs. Established in 2000, the foundation aims to support the faculty's vision of being a world leader in veterinary education and research, focused on the health and welfare of animals, and providing a community service. Over the last nine years the foundation has raised more than $9 million for the faculty. This contributed to upgrades of the university teaching hospitals at the Camperdown and Camden campuses, helped fund research into the Tasmanian devil facial tumour, and helped purchase state-of-the-art equipment for the faculty's clinics and teaching hospitals.

One of the foundation's priorities over the coming year is to help the faculty grow its Indigenous student cohort, especially from remote communities. "The foundation recognises the absolute importance of education for our Indigenous peoples," says Deborah McMurtrie, president of the foundation. "We want to identify and encourage kids from remote communities who might never have considered a university education."

Next up: an Indigenous scholarships program, funded through philanthropy and corporate support. The foundation's key role will be to identify Indigenous ambassadors who can develop relationships in remote communities, identify people who may be interested in veterinary and animal science, and act as mentors to Indigenous students. "We know there are significant costs associated with university, especially if you're coming from a remote area," says McMurtrie. "The scholarships will help cover living expenses and extra tuition costs, as well as mentoring and pastoral care; basically whatever is needed to look after the wellbeing and lifestyle of our students."

With the faculty's first Indigenous students now graduating, Indigenous involvement in the veterinary and animal science professions is going to increase. Through their support of veterinary public health and research work in Indigenous communities, and Indigenous student programs, the Veterinary Science Foundation and the Faculty of Veterinary Science are determined to make a difference.

Professor Taylor adds that, "we're developing multiple, interlocking ways to lift awareness and graduate-readiness to manage animal health in Indigenous communities, as well as developing the next generation of Indigenous veterinary professionals".

CHANGE OF CLIMATE FOR SYDNEY LAW SCHOOL

With energy security becoming a vital priority in the area of climate change, the Sydney Law School is taking up the challenge with a new course.

Global Energy and Resources Law is an exciting addition to the faculty's postgraduate program. It was made possible by seed funding from businessman and alumnus Kevin McCann (LLB '64, BA '61), matched by Macquarie Group Foundation.

The course offers perspectives on global energy security, international access to energy resources and the resolution of cross-jurisdictional energy access disputes. Also on the agenda: reform of the Australian energy market and the implications of climate change on energy resources.

"Australia's position as a supplier of energy and natural resources calls for specialist skills in providing professional legal advice," says Professor Gillian Triggs, Sydney Law School Dean and Challis Chair of International Law. "The new course allows Sydney to take a leadership role in promoting education, research and debate to benefit Australia's security, environment and economy."

As a former energy and resources lawyer and Chairman of Origin Energy, Kevin

McCann is fully aware of the importance of energy security. "Resource and energy exports are likely to underpin the Australian economy for the foreseeable future," he explains, "so it is important we have lawyers with specialisation in these fields. Research into legal and administrative regimes for energy and resources is needed by corporates, regulators and legislators to ensure development occurs efficiently and appropriately."

Feedback from the first intake of students has been very positive. "The unit gave me an excellent overview of the finance and regulatory structure that drives our energy economy," says graduate Amy Kean, managing director of Pinpoint Earth. "I particularly enjoyed learning about the complex interplay between the physical nature, political reality and regulatory frameworks of our energy markets. This knowledge is important if we are to meet the challenges of climate change and transition to a low-carbon economy."

On the evening before classes commenced, the inaugural Kevin McCann Global Energy and Resources Law Lecture was delivered by Dr Zwiggy Switkowski, then Chair of the Australian Nuclear Science and Technology Organisation. His topic was nuclear energy in the context of global energy security. It traced the growing importance of nuclear technology around the world, examined some of the concerns regarding its use, and contended that it cannot be excluded as an option if Australia is to meet its energy and climate change targets.

The support of Kevin McCann and the Macquarie Group Foundation is enabling the Sydney Law School to equip its students with the specialist knowledge needed to deliver sound advice on contemporary global energy and resource realities. With climate change looming large over the world, and moving to the forefront of Australian and global politics, this new course is destined to help shape our energy resources future.

"Resource and energy exports are likely to underpin the Australian economy for the foreseeable future."

GIFT REPORT

The year 2010 once again saw substantial growth in philanthropic income for the University thanks to the generosity and loyalty of our donors. Over $40 million was donated, up from $33 million in 2009.

More than 8700 donors contributed, across all 16 of our faculties. Total donor numbers grew by 16 percent, with the highest growth originating from mail and telephone appeals by the Sydney Development Fund. More than 5200 donors responded to these appeals, a 24 percent increase compared to 2009.

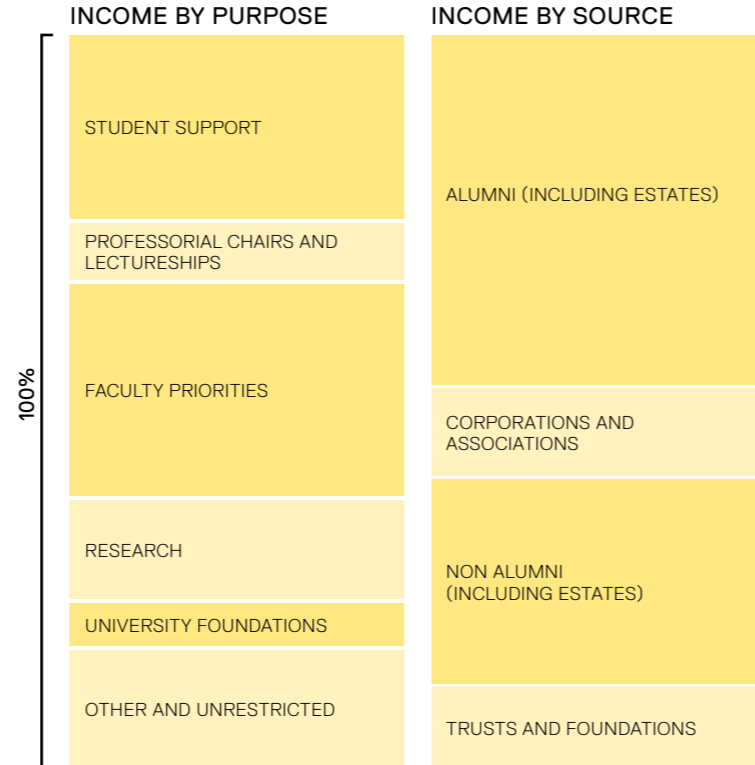

2010 was a record year for bequest income – totalling more than $20 million. Bequests were primarily directed toward student support and research, but considerable unrestricted bequests were also received. These will allow the University to apply funds to its highest priorities now and in the future. Prehistory received significant support, thanks to a bequest from Tom Austen Brown (BA '74, LLB '46).

Donations from individuals and organisations covered a range of purposes across the full spectrum of university life. Significant gifts were made to establish or continue scholarships in business, engineering, medical research, music and pharmacy, among other areas.

Very significant gifts were made to continue or establish professorial chairs, such as the Australian Diabetes Council Chair of Diabetes and the Thomas Wenkart Chair in Endothelium.

The University's faculties, research programs and foundations benefited greatly from generous donors, allowing us to maintain world-class standards in teaching and research for the benefit of all Australia and the wider world.

RECENT GRADUATES TAKE UP THE CHALLENGE

The willingness of young alumni to give back to the University as part of the 'Challenge Fund' is reinventing traditional preconceptions of the typical donor.

Launched in November 2009, the Challenge Fund is an initiative that encourages recent alumni (graduated since 2005) to donate to the University of Sydney, by matching every dollar from a specific fund gifted by a small number of generous alumni.

Since its launch the Challenge Fund has been used in six separate appeals, including three successful telephone programs, and by the end of 2010 had received a total of 901 gifts.

It proved a major incentive for young alumni considering their first-ever gift to their university, and has greatly expanded the cohort of alumni support.

By the end of 2010, the combined effort of the campaigns and matching funds had raised $86,184. The majority of donations were for student scholarships and support; a reflection of the bond that recent graduates feel towards current students at the University.

Adrian Vandenberg (BA '05, BE '05) sums up his reason for becoming a donor: "As a recent graduate, running a budget while studying is not a distant memory. I enjoyed my time at the University and would like future students to enjoy theirs."

Gifts were also allocated to the University's work with the Australian Indigenous Mentoring Experience, the faculties, the museums and art gallery, the library, research and the Compass Project.

The University is indebted to the benefactors of the Challenge Fund for providing a means to attract the next generation of donors and ensure its long-term sustainability.

We would also like to thank our new graduates for their generosity, and welcome them into our donor community.

HONOUR ROLL 2010

The University of Sydney thanks the following alumni, friends, organisations and estates for their generous support during 2010. Each and every gift is sincerely appreciated.

INVESTMENT AND CAPITAL MANAGEMENT REPORT

Investment and Capital Management (ICM) is charged with managing the University of Sydney's endowment and trust assets, investment funds and commercial real estate investments. The ICM team is highly experienced with several members having spent more than 15 years in the financial markets. All University funds invested in debt securities are managed internally by the team, while funds invested in growth assets are managed externally by professional sector specialist managers. The team is supported by an external consultant adviser.

Given the perpetual nature of the University's donated funds, ICM seeks to generate an optimal risk-adjusted total return through the employment of a structured long-term investment philosophy based around strategic asset allocation targets.

LONG-TERM ENDOWMENT FUNDS PERFORMANCE IN 2010

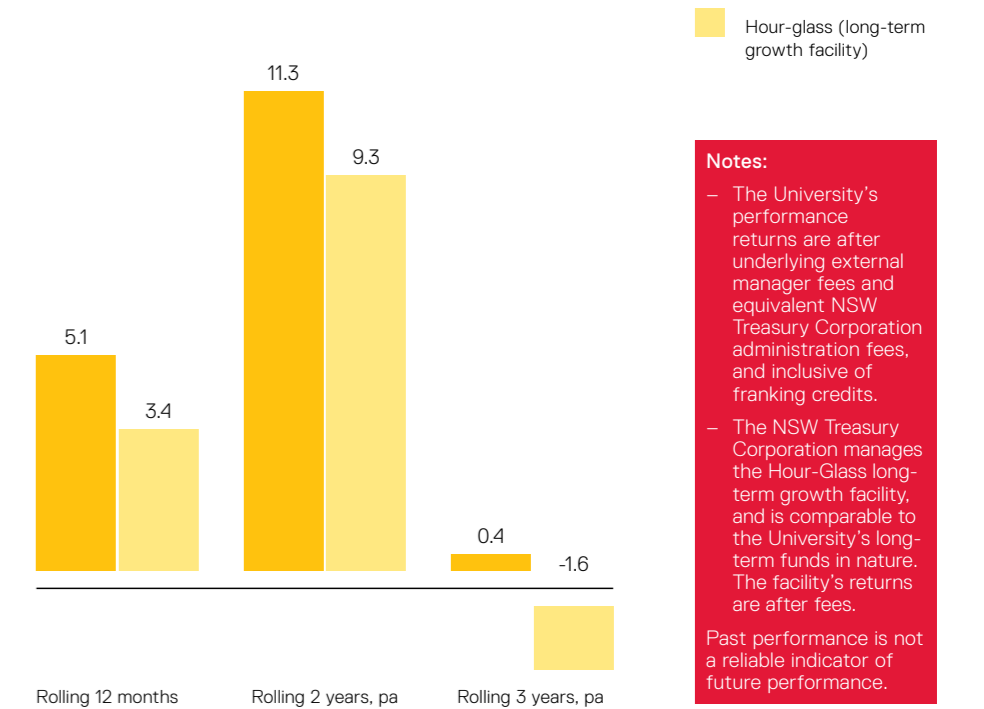

Long-term endowment funds generally consist of bequests and endowments.

The year witnessed a consolidation in equity markets across the world, as developed economies experienced a return to economic growth and expansion. Following the 2009 rebound, the MSCI World (ex-Australia) Accumulation Index (hedged) closed the year 13.1% higher and the Australian equity market ended 2010 up by 1.6 percent.

The return on the University's long-term funds was above the relevant NSW Treasury Corporation Hour-Glass Facility over the one-, two- and three-year periods.

If you would like a copy of ICM's 2010 investment report please email donor.relations@sydney.edu.au.

Long-Term Funds Performance (%) – end December 2010

Notes:

- The University's performance returns are after underlying external manager fees and equivalent NSW Treasury Corporation administration fees, and inclusive of franking credits.
- The NSW Treasury Corporation manages the Hour-Glass long-term growth facility, and is comparable to the University's long-term funds in nature. The facility's returns are after fees.

Past performance is not a reliable indicator of future performance.
