DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The present mission church at Socorro was built after the 1829 flood which changed the course of the Rio Grande and destroyed the mission and the pueblo (this date given in Binion, An Introduction to El Paso Landmarks). The present church was probably constructed during the next decade. The Historic American Buildings Survey records the date 1840 in their measured drawings done in 1936.

The structure, which is of adobe covered with whitewashed adobe plaster, is nearly H-shaped in plan, and is 117 feet long, 72 feet wide on the entrance (south) facade, and 67 feet wide at the transept. The foyer is flanked by the baptistry on the east and a mortuary chapel on the west. These three elements combine to make up the long, flat south facade of the church.

The south facade has a central doorway with statuary niches flanking the entranceway and appearing on center above it. A stepped parapet surmounts the front wall and supports an espadana or wall belfry. Similar stepped parapets terminate the east and west end of this facade. The effect of these stepped elements capping the wall is similar to abstract Indian geometric designs used to decorate domestic articles.

There is a choir balcony above the foyer containing a finely carved turned balustrade. The finest feature of the mission church are the finely painted and decorated vigas or beams which support the ceiling. These beams, which measure roughly 8 by 10 inches, were salvaged from the eighteenth century Socorro mission and reused. Above the beams, the ceiling is made up of round saplings, 1½ to 2 inches in diameter, laid in a herring bone pattern. The decorative pattern generally consists of three sticks stained black, then five white, then three black, etc. The beams themselves are decorated in geometric patterns with red, black and yellow staining.

The transept or crucero is 60 feet wide on the interior and the width of the east and west transepts are 15 feet, 9 inches, and 15 feet, 11 inches respectively. With the exception of the vigas, little of the original interior woodwork remains. The segmental arch which separates the sanctuary from the nave is also not contemporaneous with the circa 1840 structure.

The entrances into the transept and the large transept windows have unusual architectural details and frames with flanking pilasters and flared decorative lintels which also incorporate the semi-circular head of the apertures. These (continued) decorative frames on the two doors and two windows were originally of whitewashed adobe. These have in recent years been replaced with concrete frames which more or less follow the same design.

Adjacent to the transept and flanking the sanctuary are the east and west sanctuaries. These chambers are differentiated from the principal spaces of the church by a considerable reduction in ceiling height. The baptistry and mortuary chapel, being subsidiary spaces, also have lower ceilings.

The walls of the structure vary considerably in width. The wall between the foyer and baptistry is 5 feet, 6 inches, wide, and the wall on the east side of the sacristy is 2 feet, 10 inches, wide. Generally, however, the nave and transept walls are about 4 feet thick and are covered on the interior and exterior with adobe plaster, whitewashed.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Nuestra Señora de la Concepcion del Socorro was founded in the spring of 1682 as the third pueblo in the resettlement of the New Mexico Indians who fled with the Spanish during the Popé Uprising (Pueblo Revolt). The pueblo and mission at Socorro were founded to serve the displaced Piro, Tano and Jemez Indians of New Mexico. Architecturally, Socorro and Ysleta are displaced New Mexican missions, much the same as the Indian population which they served. The massing, materials and use of native decorative elements in these mission churches, particularly Socorro, show a strong kinship to the architectural traditions which evolved in the seventeenth century in Spanish New Mexico. The history of these missions was also, for a century and a half after their establishment, more closely related to New Mexico than Texas.

Franciscan missionaries established the Socorro pueblo and mission on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande, seven and a half leagues south of Ysleta. Because of an uprising among the Indians in 1683, the original site was abandoned and a location one league from Ysleta was chosen. This closer site was selected to allow a degree of protection for the Spanish missionary in charge.

In 1760 Bishop Tamaron visited Socorro, as well as the other missions in the El Paso del Norte area, and left the following account: "From Isleta to Socorro was about one league east. This mission and pueblo, like the others, was near the river and had its resident missionary. There were 46 Zuma families with 182 persons living in the pueblo. A small settlement called Tuburcio, made up entirely of Spaniards, formed part of the mission. There were 82 families with 424 persons in Tuburcio. The mission church was 36 varas long (one vara = 33.33 inches) and seven wide, with a transept 14 3/4 varas from end to end" (Our Catholic Heritage, p.235).

According to Bishop Tamaron's description, the original church at Socorro was somewhat larger than the mission at Ysleta, the nave was about 5 to 6 feet wider, and the transept (see continuation sheet #3) was more than 15 feet wider than at Ysleta. This church was destroyed by flood in the first decades of the nineteenth century. According to local tradition, the mission, which was rebuilt about ½ mile from the flooded site, on the location of a legendary miracle, was similar to the destroyed structure and the new church reused some of the old materials. The third site of Socorro mission occupies the location where a miracle concerning the transport of a Spanish statue of Saint Michael is reported to have occurred.

"According to the legend, Indians were taking the statue to a mission in New Mexico. But the heavy wheels of the cart creaked to a halt in the sandy soil of the El Paso lower Valley.. the phenomenon was finally explained as a sign from heaven that the statue of Saint Michael should remain where it was, and a small chapel was built to protect it." (Binion, An Introduction to El Paso.); This same statue of Saint Michael is on the altar in the west transept.

The present church was constructed circa 1840 and, excluding the replacement of windows, doors and some interior decoration, the fabric of the structure is basically unchanged. The Socorro Mission has served the surrounding community since its establishment in 1682 and continues to be an active religious institution.

Recorded Texas Historic Landmark - 1964.
