Abstract: Information on lichens of Franz Josef Land is summarized based on original and literature data. Two hundred twenty nine lichen species are documented, of which 59 species and two varieties are newly reported for this territory. This represents only 13% of the Arctic lichen flora richness. We have found 28 rare lichen species in the archipelago and recommend to include 9 species in the Red Data Book of the Arkhangelsk Region of Russia.

Key words: Russian Arctic, Franz Josef Land, lichenized fungi, polar desert, new records.

Introduction

The first information about lichens of Franz Josef Land was published by Fischer (1896), who reported seven lichen species collected by the expedition of Jackson and Harmsworth in 1894–97. The Italian expedition “Spedizione Polare di S. A. R. Luigi Amadeo di Savoia Duca degli Abruzzi 1899–1900” collected 24 lichen species which were subsequently determined by A. Jatta and published by Mattiolo and Belli (1903). Elenkin and Savicz (1912) reported 41 lichen species collected by I.V. Palibin during the Russian expedition on the icebreaker “Ermak” in 1901. Lyngé (1931) published 69 lichen species collected by O. Hanssen during the Norwegian expedition in 1930. Around the same time Savicz (1932) published results of the Russian expedition on the icebreaker “Sedow” in 1929. Further contributions to the lichen flora were done within the framework of the geobotanical study of Alexandra Land Island (Alexandrova 1969, 1977, 1981, 1983). Additional information on some lichen taxa from the region occurred in subsequent papers on lichens or lichenicolous fungi (Vitikainen 1994; Zhurbenko and Santesson 1996; Urbanavichus 2001; Jørgensen 2004; Halonen et al. 2009; Zhurbenko 2009; Kukwa and Zhurbenko 2010; Onut-Brännström et al. 2018). Andreev et al. (1996) summarized data on 127 lichen taxa known by that time from Franz Josef Land. The panarctic lichen checklist (Kristinsson et al. 2010) lists 154 species for the archipelago. Recent book on plants and fungi of the polar deserts in the northern hemisphere (Zhurbenko and Konoreva 2015) contains data on 100 terrestrial lichen species from the area.

The aim of this paper is to summarize all information on lichens of Franz Josef Land based on original and literature data.

Materials and methods

This synopsis presented below is mainly based on identification of lichen collections of S.S. Kholod (2012, 2015) and V.P. Savicz (1930). Results of revision of some additional lichen collections, as well as all available literature reports, are also included. The parts of the archipelago where lichens were collected by S.S. Kholod and prior to his field studies are shown in Figs 1 and 2, respectively. Lichen identification was performed by standart light microscopy using Zeiss Primo Star, MBS-10 and MS-2 microscopes. For determination of lichen substances of Lepraria, Ochrolechia, Pertusaria and Stereocaulon species thin layer chromatography was employed (Orange et al. 2001). The maps were prepared using MapInfo programme. Voucher specimens are housed in the lichen herbarium of the Komarov Botanical Institute in St. Petersburg, Russia (LE).

Study area

Franz Josef Land archipelago (Arkhangelsk Region of Russia) consisting of 192 islands is located in the northern part of the Barents Sea, within 79°55'–81°51'N and 44°50'–65°30'E. Its area is 16134 km². The Austrian and British straits divide the archipelago into 3 groups: western, central and eastern (Govorucha 1968). The distribution of water masses and degree of ice cover of the surrounding water spaces have a significant effect on the physics-geographical conditions of the archipelago. Its western part is under the prevailing influence of the Atlantic waters. The Arctic waters predominate in its eastern and northeastern parts. The central islands are under the mixed influence of the Atlantic, Arctic and Barents Sea waters. The arrival of radiation heat in the archipelago is 60 kcal/year. Its low value is due to the low standing of the sun, the high albedo of glacial surfaces, and the prolonged polar night (up to 130 days). Despite the lack of radiation heat, the overcooling of the archipelago does not occur due to the influx of advective heat and the influence of the sea. Average monthly temperatures in winter do not drop below -27°C . The average monthly summer temperatures do not exceed $+2^{\circ}\text{C}$ (July, August), the average annual air temperature is -12°C . The summer on the archipelago is damp and cold, often with night frosts (Govorucha 1968).

Most of the islands are an elevated basaltic plateau divided into separate blocks by tectonic faults. 85% of the archipelago is covered with glaciers. Melt waters of glaciers are the main sources of rivers, lakes and lightly saline lagoons. Different types of ecotopes are represented by such landscape elements as coastal shafts, marine terraces, mountain slopes, moraine ridges or areas along the glacier margins with thixotropic soils.

Franz Josef Land is located within the polar desert nature zone (Matveyeva 2015). The soil profiles are thin, incomplete and characterized by weak expression of genetic horizons. Humus soils occur in the west of the archipelago, sandy and sandy loamy soils dominate in its eastern parts. Cryogenic processes led to widespread polygonal soils. Bryophytes and lichens dominate in the vegetation cover. In most plant communities the projective cover is 3–5%, however, along the banks of meltwater streams it reaches 20–25%, and occasionally, for instance near bird colonies, even 90%.

Doubtful and excluded taxa

Brodoa intestiniformis (Vill.) Goward [syn. Hypogymnia intestiniformis (Vill.) Räsänen, H. encausta (Sm.) W.R.Watson, Parmelia intestiniformis (Vill.) Ach.] – LITERATURE REPORTS: Alexandra Land Island (Alexandrova 1983); without localities (Andreev et al. 1996). According to Urbanavichus (2001) these records are based on misidentification of Brodoa oroarctica.

Platismatia lacunosa (Ach.) W.L.Culb. et C.F.Culb. [syn. Cetraria lacunosa Ach.] – LITERATURE REPORTS: Rudolf Island (Mattirola and Belli 1903); without localities (Andreev et al. 1996; Kristinsson et al. 2010). This records must be verified as the only form of Cetraria lacunosa, viz. C. lacunosa f.

norvegica Lynge, currently named Platismatia norvegica (Lynge) W.L.Culb. et al. C.F.Culb. is a boreal species (Thell 2011).

Polycauliona candelaria (L.) Frödén et al. [syn. Xanthoria candelaria (L.) Th.Fr.] – LITERATURE REPORTS: Northbrook Island, Rudolf Island (Mattirollo and Belli 1903); Georg Land Island, Northbrook Island (Lynge 1931); Northbrook Island (Elenkin and Savicz 1912); without localities (Andreev et al. 1996; Kristinsson et al. 2010). According to Zhurbenko and Konoreva (2015) these records probably refer to Xanthomendoza borealis.

Stereocaulon paschale (L.) Hoffm. – LITERATURE REPORTS: Northbrook Island and Hochstetter Island (Elenkin and Savicz 1912); without localities (Andreev et al. 1996; Kristinsson et al. 2010). According to Zhurbenko and Konoreva (2015) this records must be verified, but original material was not found.

Discussion

By the beginning of our research, 170 lichen species were known for the archipelago (Kristinsson et al. 2010). As a result of the research, another 59 species were discovered, and thus the total richness of its known lichen flora numbers 229 species. However, this represents only 13% of the Arctic lichen flora richness (Kristinsson et al. 2010), which suggests that lichen flora of the archipelago is far from being fully revealed. Indeed, many lichen collections were made by geobotanists, which usually omit species growing on stone and drift-wood.

The most frequently reported lichen species in Franz Josef Land are the following: Bryocaulon divergens, Cetrariella delisei, Cladonia coccifera, C. gracilis, C. pyxidata, Ochrolechia frigida, Peltigera canina, P. rufescens, Pseudephebe minuscula, P. pubescens, Sphaerophorus fragilis, S. globosus, Stereocaulon alpinum, Tremolecia atrata, Umbilicaria hyperborea and U. proboscidea. Among the most rarely reported lichen species in the archipelago are Agonimia gelatinosa, Alectoria gowardii, Allocetraria madrepورiformis, Arctocetraria nigricascens, Arctomia delicatula, Bilimbia microcarpa, Bryonora septentrionalis, Bryostigma muscigena, Buellia badia, Catillaria contristans, Cladonia libifera, Lecania subfuscula, Lecanora campestris, Lecidella bullata, Lichenomphalia alpina, Masonhalea inermis, Micarea lignaria, Multiclavula corynoides, M. vernalis, Peltigera elisabethae, P. lyngei, Placopsis lambii, Protothelenella spinctrinoidella, Rhizocarpon lecanorinum, Schadonia alpina, Thelidium papulare, Umbilicaria aprina and U. leiocarpa. The latter includes species that are difficult to detect in the field, species with obscure taxonomy, and/or species on the border of their range. The lists of common and rare species of Franz Josef Land and the Arctic are generally the same (Kristinsson et al. 2010).

According to the results of our research, we can recommend to include the following lichen species in the Red Data Book of the Arkhangelsk Region of Russia: Alectoria gowardii, Allocetraria madreporiformis, Arctocetraria nigricascens, Masonhalea inermis, Peltigera lyngei, P. elisabethae, Placopsis lambii, Umbilicaria aprina and U. leiocarpa.
